"I should like much to see her," said a third, not noticing the latter remark.

"And you shall; you shall come with me to-morrow. Heighho! I should not like to die for her sake!"

"Does her wretched relation attempt to regain her?"

"Her relation! No; she is no more—she died about two years since! Poor Mary! I—well, this is folly. But Fanny is at present in a convent; they are all kind to her, but then I pay well; if I were dead and the pay stopped, again I ask, what would become of her, unless as I before said, my father—"

"But you are making a fortune now?"

"If this lasts—yes; but I live in fear: the police of this cursed city are lynx-eyed; however, that is the bright side of the question."

"Why not have the child with you, since you love her so much? She would be a great comfort to you."

"Is this a place for a child—a girl?" said Gawtrety, stamping his foot impatiently. "I should go mad if I saw that villanous dead man's eye bent upon her!"

"You speak of Birnie. How can you endure him?"

"When you are of my age you will know why we endure what we dread—why we make friends of those who else would be most horrible foes: no, no, nothing can deliver me of this man but Death. And—and—" added Gawtrety, turning pale, "I cannot murder a man who eats my bread. There are stronger ties, my lad, than affection, that bind men like galley slaves together. He who can hang you puts the halter round your neck, and leads you by it like a dog."

A shudder came over the young listener. And what dark secrets, known only to those two, had bound, to a man seemingly his subordinate and tool, the strong will and resolute temper of William Gawtrety!

"But begone dull care!" exclaimed Gawtrety, rousing himself. "And, after all; Birnie is a useful fellow, and dare no more turn against me than I against him! Why don't you drink more?"

"Oh! have you e'er heard of the famed Captain Wattle?"

and Gawtrety broke out into a loud Bacchanalian hymn, in which Philip could find no mirth, and from which the songster suddenly paused to exclaim,

"Mind you say nothing about Fanny to Birnie; my secrets with him are not of that nature. He could not hurt her, poor lamb! it is true—at least, as far as I can foresee. But one can never feel too sure of one's lamb if one once introduces it to the butcher!"

"The next day being Sunday, the bureau was closed, and Philip and Gawtrety repaired to the convent. It was a dismal-looking place as to the exterior; but within there was a large garden, well kept, and, notwithstanding the winter, it seemed fair and refreshing compared with the polluted streets. The window of the room into which they were shown looked upon the green-sward, with walls covered with ivy at the farther end. And Philip's own childhood came back to him as he gazed on the quiet of the lonely place.

The door opened: an infant voice was heard; a voice of glee—of rapture; and a child, light and beautiful as a fairy, bounded to Gawtrety's breast.

Nestling there, she kissed his face, his hands, his clothes, with a passion that did not seem to belong to her age, laughing and sobbing almost at a breath.

On his part, Gawtrety appeared equally affected; he stroked down her hair with his huge hand, calling her all manner of pet names, in a tremulous voice that vainly struggled to be gay.

At length he took the toys he had brought with him from his capacious pockets, and, strewing them on the floor, fairly stretched his vast bulk along; while the child tumbled over him, sometimes grasping at the toys, and then again returning to his bosom and laying her head there, looked up quietly into his eyes, as if the joy were too much for her.

Morton, unheeded by both, stood by with folded arms. He thought of his lost and ungrateful brother, and muttered to himself,

"Fool! when she is older she will forsake him!"

Fanny betrayed in her face the Italian origin of her father. She had that exceeding richness of complexion which, though not common even in Italy, is only to be found in the daughters of that land, and which harmonised well with the purple lustre of her hair, and the full, clear iris of the dark eyes. Never were parted cherries brighter than her dewy lips; and the colour of the open neck and the rounded arms was of a whiteness still more dazzling, from the darkness of the hair and the carnation of the glowing cheek.

Suddenly Fanny started from Gawtrety's arms, and, running up to Morton, gazed at him wistfully, and said in French,

"Who are you? Do you come from the moon? I think you do." Then, stopping abruptly, she broke into a verse of a nursery-song, which she chanted with a low, listless tone, as if she were not conscious of the sense. As she thus sung, Morton, looking at her, felt a strange and painful doubt seize him. The child's eyes, though soft, were so vacant in their gaze.

"And why do I come from the moon?" said he.

"Because you look sad and cross. I don't like you—I don't like the moon, it gives me a pain here!" and she put her hand to her temples. "Have you got any thing for Fanny—poor, poor Fanny?" and, dwelling on the epithet, she shook her head mournfully.

"You are rich Fanny, with all those toys."

"Am I! Every body calls me poor Fanny—everybody but papa;" and then she ran again to Gawtrety, and laid her head on his shoulder.

"She calls me papa!" said Gawtrety, kissing her: "you hear it? Bless her!"

"And you never kiss any one but Fanny—you have no other little girl!" said the child, earnestly, and with a look less vacant than that which had saddened Morton.

"No other—no—nothing under heaven, and perhaps above it, but you!" and he clasped her in his arms. "But," he added, after a pause, "but mind me, Fanny, you must like this gentleman. He will be always good to you; and he had a little brother whom he was as fond of as I am of you."

"No, I won't like him—I won't like anybody but you and my sister!"

"Sister! Who is your sister!"

The child's face relapsed into an expression almost of idiocy. "I don't know; I never saw her. I hear her sometimes, but I don't understand what she says. —Hush! come here!" and she stole to the window on tiptoe. Gawtrety followed and looked out.

"Do you hear her now?," said Fanny. "What does she say?"

As the girl spoke, some bird among the evergreens uttered a shrill, plaintive cry rather than song: a sound that the thrush occasionally makes in the winter, and which seems to express something of fear, and pain, and impatience.

"What does she say? Can you tell me?" asked the child.

"Pooh! that is a bird: why do you call it your sister?"

"I don't know because it is—because it—because—I don't know—is it not in pain? Do something for it, papa!"

Gawtrety glanced at Morton, whose face betokened his deep pity, and creeping up to him, whispered,

"Do you think she is really touched here? No, no, she will outgrow it—I am sure she will!" Morton sighed.

Fanny by this time had again seated herself in the middle of the floor, and arranged her toys, but without seeming to take pleasure in them.

At last Gawtrety was obliged to depart. The lay sister who had charge of Fanny was summoned into the parlour, and then the child's manner entirely changed; her face grew purple; she sobbed with as much anger as grief; "She would not leave papa; she would not go—that she would not."

"It is always so," whispered Gawtrety to Morton, in an abashed and apologetic voice. "It is so difficult to get away from her. Just go and talk with her while I steal out."

Morton went to her as she struggled with the patient, good-natured sister, and began to soothe and caress her, till she turned on him her large humid eyes, and said mournfully,

"Tu es méchant, tu. Poor Fanny!"

"But this pretty doll—" began the sister.

The child looked at it joylessly.

"And papa is going to die!"

"Whenever monsieur goes," whispered the nun, "she always says that he is dead, and cries herself quietly to sleep; when monsieur returns, she says he is come to life again. Some one, I suppose, once talked to her about death; and she thinks, when she loses sight of any one, that that is death."

"Poor child!" said Morton with a trembling voice.

The child looked up, smiled, stroked his cheek with her little hand, and said,

"Thank you! Yes! poor Fanny! Ah, he is going—see!—let me go too—tu es méchant."

"But," said Morton, detaining her gently, "do you know that you give him pain? You make him cry by showing pain yourself. Don't make him so sad!"

The child seemed struck; hung down her head for a moment, as if in thought; and then, jumping from Morton's lap, ran to Gawtrety, put up her pouting lips, and said,

"One kiss more!"

Gawtrety kissed her and turned away his head.

"Fanny is a good girl;" and Fanny, as she spoke, went back to Morton, and put her little fingers into her eyes, as if either to shut out Gawtrety's retreat from her sight, or to press back her tears.

"Give me the doll now, Sister Marie."

Morton smiled and sighed; placed the child, who struggled no more, in the nun's arms, and left the room; but, as he closed the door, he looked back, and saw that Fanny had escaped from the sister, thrown herself on the floor, and was crying, but not aloud.

"Is she not a little darling?" said Gawtrety, as they gained the street.

"She is, indeed, a most beautiful child!"

"And you will love her if I leave her penniless," said Gawtrety, abruptly. "It was your love for your mother and your brother that made me like you from the first. Ay," continued Gawtrety, in a tone of great earnestness, "ay; and, whatever may happen to me, I will strive and keep you, my poor lad, harmless, and, what is better, innocent even of such matters as sit light enough on my own well-seasoned conscience. In turn, if ever you have the power, be good to her—yes, be good to her! I won't say a harsh word to you if ever you like to turn king's evidence against myself."

"Gawtrety!" said Morton, reproachfully, and almost fiercely.

"Bah! such things are! But, tell me honestly, do you think she is very strange—very deficient?"

"I have not seen enough of her to judge," answered Morton, evasively.

"She is so changeful!" persisted Gawtrety; "sometimes you would say that she was above her age, she comes out with such thoughtful, clever things; then, the next moment, she throws me into despair. These nuns are very skilful in education—at least they are said to be so. The doctors give me hope, too; you see her poor mother was very unhappy at the time of her birth—delirious, indeed—that may account for it. I often fancy that it is the constant excitement which her state occasions me that makes me love her so much; you see she is one who can never shift for herself. I must get money for her; I have left a little already with the superior, and I would not touch it to save myself from famine! If she has money, people will be kind enough to her. And then," continued Gawtrety, "you must perceive that she loves nothing in the world but me—me, whom nobody else loves! Well, well, now to the shop again!"

On returning home, the bonne informed them that a lady had called, and asked both for Monsieur Love and the young gentleman, and seemed much chagrined at missing both. By the description, Morton guessed she was the fair incognita; and felt disappointed at having lost the interview.

CHAPTER V.

"The cursed carle was at his wonted trade,
Still tempting heedless men into his snare,
In witching wise, as I before have said;
But when he saw, in goodly gear arrayed,
The grave, majestic knight approaching nigh,
His countenance fell."

THOMPSON: Castle of Indolence.

The morning rose that was to unite Monsieur Goupille with Mademoiselle Adele de Courval. The ceremony was performed, and bride and bridegroom went through that trying ordeal with becoming gravity. Only the elegant Adele seemed more unaffectedly agitated than Mr. Love could well account for; she was very nervous in church, and more often turned her eyes to the door than to the altar. Perhaps she wanted to run away; but it was either too late or too early for that proceeding. The rite performed, the happy pair and their friends adjourned to the Cadran Bleu, that restaurant so celebrated in the festivities of the good citizens of Paris. Here

Mr. Love had ordered, at the épiciers' expense, a most tasteful entertainment.

"Sacré! but you have not played the economist, Monsieur Love," said Monsieur Goupille, rather querulously, as he glanced at the long room adorned with artificial flowers, and the table à cinquante couverts.

"Bah!" replied Mr. Love, "you can retrench afterward. Think of the fortune she brought you."

"It is a pretty sum, certainly," said Monsieur Goupille, "and the notary is perfectly satisfied."

"There is not a marriage in Paris that does me more credit," said Mr. Love; and he marched off to receive the compliments and congratulations that awaited him among such of the guests as were aware of his good offices. The Vicomte de Vaudemont was, of course, not present. He had not been near Mr. Love since Adele had accepted the épicier. But Madame Beavor, in a white bonnet lined with lilach, was hanging sentimentally on the arm of the Pole, who looked very grand with his white favour; and Mr. Higgins had been introduced by Mr. Love to a little dark Creole, who wore paste diamonds, and had very languishing eyes; so that Mr. Love's heart might well swell with satisfaction at the prospect of the various blisses to come, which might owe their origin to his benevolence. In fact, that archpriest of the temple of Hymen was never more great than he was that day; never did his establishment seem more solid, his reputation more popular, or his fortune more sure. He was the life of the party.

The banquet over, the revellers prepared for a dance. Monsieur Goupille, in tights, still tighter than he usually wore; and of a rich nankeen, quite new, with striped silk stockings, opened the ball with the lady of a rich patissier in the same faubourg; Mr. Love took out the bride. The evening advanced; and, after several other dances of ceremony, Monsieur Goupille conceived himself entitled to dedicate one to connubial affection. A country-dance was called, and the épicier claimed the fair hand of the gentle Adele. About this time, two persons, not hitherto perceived, had quietly entered the room, and, standing near the doorway, seemed examining the dancers, as if in search for some one. They bobbed their heads up and down, to and fro—now stooped, now stood on tiptoe. The one was a tall, largewhiskered, fair-haired man; the other a little, thin, neatly-dressed person, who kept his hand on the arm of his companion, and whispered to him from time to time. The whiskered gentleman replied in a guttural tone, which proclaimed his origin to be German. The busy dancers did not perceive the strangers. The bystanders did, and a hum of curiosity circled round; who could they be? who had invited them? they were new faces in the faubourg—perhaps relations to Adele?

In high delight, the fair bride was skipping down the middle, while Monsieur Goupille, wiping his forehead with care, admired her agility; when, lo and behold! the whiskered gentleman I have described abruptly advanced from his companion, and cried,

"La voilà! sacré tonnerre!"

At that voice—at that apparition, the bride halted; so suddenly, indeed, that she had not time to put down both feet, but remained with one high in air, while the other sustained itself on the light fantastic toe. The company naturally imagined this to be an operatic flourish which called for approbation. Monsieur Love, who was thundering down behind her, cried "Bravo!"

and as the well-grown gentleman had to make a sweep to avoid disturbing her equilibrium, he came full against the whiskered stranger, and sent him off as a bat sends a ball.

"Mon Dieu!" cried Monsieur Goupille. "Ma douce amie—she has fainted away!" And, indeed, Adele had no sooner recovered her balance, than she resigned it once more into the arms of the startled Pole, who was happily at hand.

In the mean time, the German stranger, who had saved himself from falling by coming with his full force upon the toes of Mr. Higgins, again advanced to the spot, and, rudely seizing the fair bride by the arm, exclaimed,

"No sham, if you please, madam. Speak! What the devil have you done with the money?"

"Really, sir," said Monsieur Goupille, drawing up his cravat, "this is very extraordinary conduct! What have you got to say to this lady's money? It is my money now, sir!"

"Oho! it is, is it? We'll soon see that. Approchez donc, Monsieur Favart, faites votre devoir."

At these words, the small companion of the stranger slowly sauntered to the spot, while, at the sound of his name and the tread of his step, the throng gave way to the right and left: for Monsieur Favart was one of the most renowned chiefs of the great Parisian police—a man worthy to be the cotemporary of the illustrious Vidocq.

"Calmez vous, messieurs; do not be alarmed, ladies," said this gentleman, in the mildest of all human voices; and, certainly, no oil dropped on the waters ever produced so tranquillising an effect as that small, feeble, gentle tenor. The Pole, in especial, who was holding the fair bride with both his arms, shook all over, and seemed about to let his burden gradually slide to the floor, when Monsieur Favart, looking at him with a benevolent smile, said,

"Aha, mon brave! c'est toi. Restez donc. Restez, tenez toujours la dame!"

The Pole, thus condemned, in the French idiom, "always to hold the dame," mechanically raised the arms he had previously dejected, and the police officer, with an approving nod of the head, said,

"Bon! ne bougez point, c'est ça!"

Monsieur Goupille, in equal surprise and indignation to see his better half thus consigned, without any care to his own marital feelings, to the arms of another, was about to snatch her from the Pole, when Monsieur Favart, touching him on the breast with his little finger, said, in the suavest manner,

"Mon bourgeois, meddle not with what does not concern you!"

"With what does not concern me!" replied Monsieur Goupille, drawing himself up to so great a stretch that he seemed pulling off his tights the wrong way. "Explain yourself, if you please! This lady is my wife!"

"Say that again—that's all!" cried the whiskered stranger, in most horrible French, and with a furious grimace, as he shook both his fists under the nose of the épicier.

"Say it again, sir," said Monsieur Goupille, by no means daunted; "and why should not I say it again? That lady is my wife!"

"You lie! she is mine!" cried the German; and, bending down, he caught the fair Adele from the Pole with as little ceremony as if she had never had a great grandfather a marquis, and giving her a shake that might have roused the dead, thundered out,

"Speak! Madame Bihl! Are you my wife or not?"

"Monstre!" murmured Adele, opening her eyes.

"There—you hear—she owns me!" said the German, appealing to the company with a triumphant air.

"C'est vrai!" said the soft voice of the policeman. "And now, pray don't let us disturb your amusements any longer. We have a fiacre at the door. Remove your lady, Monsieur Bihl."

"Monsieur Love! Monsieur Love!" cried, or, rather, sneered the épicier, darting across the room, and seizing the chef by the tail of his coat just as he was half way through the door, "come back! Quelle mauvais plaisanterie me faites vous ici! Did you not tell me that lady was single? Am I married or not? Do I stand on my head or my heels?"

"Hush—hush! mon bon bourgeois!" whispered Mr. Love; "all shall be explained to-morrow!"

"Who is this gentleman?" asked Monsieur Favart, approaching Mr. Love, who, seeing himself in for it, suddenly jerked off the épicier, thrust his hands down into his breeches pockets, buried his chin in his cravat, elevated his eyebrows, screwed in his eyes, and puffed out his cheeks, so that the astonished Monsieur Goupille really thought himself bewitched, and literally did not recognise the face of the matchmaker.

"Who is this gentleman?" repeated the little officer, standing beside, or, rather, below Mr. Love, and looking so diminutive by the contrast that you might have fancied that the Priest of Hymen had only to breathe to blow him away.

"Who should he be, monsieur?" cried, with great pertness, Madame Rosalie Caumartin, coming to the relief with the generosity of her sex: "this is Monsieur Love—Anglais célèbre. What have you to say against him?"

"He has got 500 francs of mine!" cried the épicier.

The policeman scanned Mr. Love with great attention. "So you are in Paris again! Hein! vous jouez toujours votre rôle!"

"Ma foi!" said Mr. Love, boldly, "I don't understand what monsieur means; my character is well known; go and inquire it in London—ask the secretary of foreign affairs what is said of me—inquire of my ambassador—demand of my—"

"Votre passeport, monsieur?"

"It is at home. A gentleman does not carry his passport in his pocket when he goes to a ball!"

"I will call and see it: au revoir! Take my advice, and leave Paris; I think I have seen you somewhere!"

"Yet I have never had the honour to marry monsieur!" said Mr. Love, with a polite bow.

In return for his joke, the policeman gave Mr. Love one look—it was a quiet look, very quiet; but Mr. Love seemed uncommonly affected by it; he did not say another word, but found himself outside the house in a twinkling. Monsieur Favart turned round, and saw the Pole making himself as small as possible behind the goodly proportions of Madame Beavor.

"What name does that gentleman go by?"

"So—vo—lofski, the heroic Pole," cried Madame Beavor, with sundry misgivings at the unexpected cowardice of so great a patriot.

"Hein! take care of yourselves, ladies, I have nothing against that person this time. But Monsieur Latour has served his apprenticeship at "the galleys, and is no more a Pole than I am a Jew."

"And this lady's fortune!" cried Monsieur Goupille, pathetically; "the settlements are all made, the notaries all paid. I am sure that there must be some mistake."

Monsieur Bihl, who had by this time restored his lost Helen to her senses, stalked up to the epicier, dragging the lady along with him.

"Sir, there is no mistake! But, when I have got the money, if you like to have the lady, you are welcome to her."

"Monstre!" again muttered the fair Adele.

"The long and the short of it," said Monsieur Favart, "is, that Monsieur Bihl is a brave garçon, and has been half over the world as a courier."

"A courier!" exclaimed several voices.

"Madame was nursery-governess to an English milord. They married, and quarreled—no harm in that, mes amis—nothing more common. Monsieur Bihl is a very faithful fellow; nursed his last master in an illness that ended fatally, because he traveled with his doctor. Milord left him a handsome legacy; he retired from service, and fell ill, perhaps from idleness or beer. Is not that the story, Monsieur Bihl?"

"He was always drunk—the wretch!" sobbed Adele.

"That was to drown my domestic sorrows," said the German; "and, when I was sick in my bed, madame ran off with my money. Thanks to monsieur, I have found both, and I wish you a very good night."

"Dancez vous toujours, mes amis," said the officer, bowing. And, following Adele and her spouse, the little man left the room—where he had caused, in chests so broad and limbs so doughty, much the same consternation as that which some diminutive ferret occasions in a burrow of rabbits twice his size.

Morton had outstayed Mr. Love. But he thought it unnecessary to linger long after that gentleman's departure; and, in the general hubbub that ensued, he crept out unperceived, and soon arrived at the bureau. He found Mr. Love and Mr. Birnie already engaged in packing up their effects. "Why, when did you leave?" said Morton to Mr. Birnie.

"I saw the policeman enter."

"And why the deuce did not you tell us?" said Gawtrety.

"Every man for himself. Besides, Mr. Love was dancing," replied Mr. Birnie, with a dull glance of disdain.

"Philosophy!" muttered Gawtrety, thrusting his dress-coat into his trunk; then suddenly changing his voice, "Ha! ha! it was a very good joke, after all—own I did it well. Ecod! if he had not given me that look, I think I should have turned the tables on him. But those d—d fellows learn of the mad doctors how to tame us. Faith, my heart went down to my shoes—yet I'm no coward!"

"But, after all, he evidently did not know you," said Morton; "and what has he to say against you? Your trade is a strange one, but not dishonest. Why give up as if—"

"My young friend," interrupted Gawtrety, "whether the officer comes after us or not, our trade is ruined: that infernal Adele, with her fabulous grandmaman, has done for us. Goupille will blow the temple about our ears. No help for it—eh, Birnie?"

"None."

"Go to bed, Philip: we'll call thee at daybreak, for we must make clear work before our neighbours open their shutters."

Reclined, but half undressed, on his bed in the little cabinet, Morton revolved the events of the evening. The thought that he should see no more of that white hand and that lovely mouth, which still haunted his recollection as appertaining to the incognita, greatly indisposed him towards the abrupt flight intended by Gawtrety, while (so much had his faith in that person depended upon respect for his confident daring, and so thoroughly fearless was Morton's own nature) he felt himself greatly shaken in his allegiance to the chief by recollecting the effect produced on his valour by a single glance from the instrument of law. He had not yet lived long enough to be aware that men are sometimes the representatives of things; that what the scytale was to the Spartan hero, a sheriff's writ often is to a Waterloo medallist; that a Bow-street runner will enter the foulest den, where murder sits with his fellows, and pick out his prey with the beck of his fore-finger. That, in short, the thing called LAW, once made tangible and present, rarely fails to palsy the fierce heart of the thing called CRIME. For LAW is the symbol of all mankind reared against one foe—the Man of Crime. Not yet aware of this truth, nor, indeed, in the least suspecting Gawtrety of worse offences than those of a charlatanic and equivocal profession, the young man mused over his protector's cowardice in disdain and wonder; till, wearied with conjectures, distrust, and shame at his own strange position of obligation to one whom he could not respect, he fell asleep.

When he woke he saw the gray light of dawn, that streamed cheerlessly through his shutterless window, struggling with the faint ray of a candle that Gawtrety, shading with his hand, held over the sleeper. He started up, and, in the confusion of waking and the imperfect light by which he beheld the strong features of Gawtrety, half imagined it was a foe who stood before him.

"Take care, man!" said Gawtrety, as Morton, in this belief, grasped his arm. "You have a precious rough gripe of your own. Be quiet, will you? I have a word to say to you." Here Gawtrety, placing the candle on a chair, returned to the door and closed it.

"Look you," he said, in a whisper, "I have nearly ran through my circle of invention, and my wit, fertile as it is, can present to me little encouragement in the future. The eyes of this Favart, once on me, every disguise and every double will not long avail. I dare not return to London; I am too well known in Brussels, Berlin, and Vienna—"

"But," interrupted Morton, raising himself on his arm, and fixing his dark eyes upon his host, "but you have told me again and again that you have committed no crime—why, then, be so fearful of discovery?"

"Why!" repeated Gawtrety, with a slight hesitation which he instantly overcame, "why! Have not you yourself learned that appearances have the effect of crimes? Were you not chased as a thief when I rescued you from your foe, the Law? Are you not, though a boy in years, under an alias, and an exile from your own land? And how can you put these austere questions to me, who am growing gray in the endeavour to extract sunbeams from cucumbers—subsistence from poverty? I repeat that there are reasons why I must avoid, for the present, the great capitals. I must sink in life, and take to the provinces. Birnie is sanguine as ever; but he is a terrible sort of comforter. Enough of that. Now to yourself. Our savings are less than you might expect; to be sure Birnie has been treasurer, and I have laid by a little for Fanny, which I will rather starve than touch. There remain, however, 150 Napoleons, and our effects, sold at a fourth their value, will fetch 150 more. Here is your share. I have compassion on you. I told you I would bear you harmless and innocent. Leave us while yet time."

It seemed, then, to Morton that Gawtrety had divined his thoughts of shame and escape of the previous night; perhaps Gawtrety had: and such is the human heart, that, instead of welcoming the very release he had half contemplated, now that it was offered him, Philip shrunk from it as a base desertion.

"Poor Gawtrety!" said he, pushing back the canvass bag of gold held out to him. "you shall not go over the world, and feel that the orphan you fed and fostered left you to starve with your money in his pocket. When you again assure me that you have committed no crime, you again remind me that gratitude has no right to be severe upon the shifts and errors of its benefactor. If you do not conform to society, what has society done for me? No! I will not forsake you in a reverse. Fortune has given you a fall. What, then, courage, and at her again!"

These last words were said so heartily and cheerfully as Morton sprang from the bed, that it inspired Gawtrety, who had really desponded of his lot.

"Well," said he, "I cannot reject the only friend left me; and while I live—But I will make no professions. Quick, then; our luggage is already gone, and I hear Birnie grunting the rogue's march of retreat."

Morton's toilet was soon completed, and the three associates bade adieu to the bureau.

Birnie, who was taciturn and impenetrable as ever, walked a little before as guide. They arrived, at length, at a serrurier's shop, placed in an alley near the Porte St. Denis. The serrurier himself, a tall, begrimed, black-bearded man, was taking the shutters from his shop as they approached. He and Birnie exchanged silent nods; and the former, leaving his work, conducted them up a very filthy flight of stairs to an attic, where a bed, two stools, one table, and an old walnut-tree bureau formed the sole articles of furniture. Gawtrety looked rather ruefully round the black, low, damp walls, and said, in a crest-fallen tone,

"We were better off at the Temple of Hy-men. But get us a bottle of wine, some eggs, and a frying-pan—by Jove, I am a capital hand at an omelet!"

The serrurier nodded again, grinned, and withdrew.

"Rest here," said Birnie, in his calm, passionless voice, that seemed to Morton, however, to assume an unwonted tone of command. "I will go and make the best bargain I can for our furniture, buy fresh clothes, and engage our places for Tours."

"For Tours?" repeated Morton.

"Yes—there are some English there; one can live wherever there are English," said Gawtrety.

"Hum!" grunted Birnie, drily; and, buttoning up his coat, he walked slowly away.

About noon he returned with a bundle of clothes, which Gawtrety, who always regained his elasticity of spirit wherever there was fair play to his genius and experience. Oh! how many dreams begun, how many inspirations which had formerly but faintly glimmered on his mind, then burst upon him in all their glory! and he groaned, the poet, for that moment had furnished him with more ideas than the labour of a whole life could develop. And he was about to hazard all this against the dexterity of a bravo. He pressed his hand against his forehead, as if to tear from it the treasures which were about to perish with him. For so it is with man: he considers his intelligence as the common inheritance of humanity, and that, were he to keep aught of it to himself, he would commit a robbery on mankind. He cannot take upon himself to carry with him a thought unexpressed.

But time passed away. The count rapidly finished to put every thing in order. He wrote to his sister, bade an eternal adieu to everything he loved in this world, and then descended into the saloon.

Cellini and Marliano were there alone. The former was warm in praise of a volume of Machiavel which he held in his hand.

"I do not know it," said Marliano coolly.

"Should you wish to read it?" asked the young man, presenting him the book.

"I never read."

Cellini looked at him with astonishment. This was the epoch of the regeneration of ideas which signalled the end of the eighteenth century. The nobility seemed to have suddenly awoke from the long torpidity in which they had lain, to study something more than the mere art of gallantry, or the noble science of arms. There was a universal rush towards literature, so that a man who declared that he could not read, was considered as extraordinary as a being as a courtier of the reign of Charles the Second who lived without a mistress.

The count, who on entering had remarked Cellini's surprise, observed—

"Signor Marliano is quite right; what can gentlemen have to do with books?"

Marliano looked at him, as if to discover whether he was not victimised; but the count's features were so calm that he hardly knew what to conjecture.

"If you really think so, my dear count," said Cellini, laughing, "I wonder at your passing whole nights over your books, as you are accustomed to do."

"Oh! as for me," rejoined the count, "I'm a poet, a madman! I love Plutarch, and am foolish enough to consider such words as liberty, country, as anything but ridiculous. I am one of those who would not have every man's happiness or misery depend on the chance of birth. I dream of a world where recompenses would be awarded to the most worthy, honours to the most devoted, happiness to all: but I'm a madman, you know, whilst Signor Marliano is a gentleman."

All this had been said with so much calm, and with such a sameness of intonation, that it would have puzzled any one to guess the interlocutor's real meaning. Its irony was hidden, but was thereby rendered more poignant—you felt the goad without perceiving it. Marliano knew that he was attacked, and winced under his adversary's infliction; but he likewise knew that a quarrel would drive the marchioness to extremities, and he resolved to avoid it if possible; it was, therefore, with a mixture of anger and reserve that he answered—

"I cannot accept your excuses, count. I am satisfied with the world as it is, and leave to philosophers and philanthropists, as they style themselves, literary knight-errants, the care of remodeling it between their repasts, as they would a play or an opera."

"What can such a man as you have to do with philanthropists and philosophers?" exclaimed Alfieri. "Ah, sir, you are really disposed to show us too much indulgence. Nonsense!—men who wish to enlighten the human mind, the monsters!—who love their fellow creatures, the fools! The clever men are those who profit by abuses instead of combating them, and ornament their avarice and hard-heartedness with the name of principle or political opinions; who grind down the poor to satisfy their habits of indolence and extravagance, and become wealthy on the miseries of others less privileged than themselves. Those are the persons who know how to live; them we should take for our models. Neither is it difficult, heaven knows, to lead the life of the exquisites of high life;—ruin your creditors, dishonour as many women as possible, kill a few of your most intimate friends in duel, and you will leave behind you the reputation of a most perfect gentleman."

Whilst Alfieri had been speaking, Marliano seemed devoured by an increasing irritation. At the last words pronounced by the count, he turned round suddenly, but, as if he wished to avoid a quarrel at any price, he advanced towards a chair on which he had left his hat, and took it up.

"Pardon me, signor," said Alfieri, "perhaps I have wounded your political opinions. I should really be very much grieved if you were obliged to leave the room on my account, although certainly very much flattered at your thus acknowledging yourself conquered."

Marliano threw down his hat. "I was never conquered by anybody," said he haughtily.

Alfieri bowed; a vague smile played on his lips. For a few moments the three persons present were silent. Cellini, embarrassed, hardly knew what his friend was aiming at, and the Genoese evidently seeking to avoid a rupture. He had approached the sideboard, and seemed to be inhaling the perfumes of some rare flowers in a crystal vase, when his eyes fell on a case of pistols, which Cellini had placed there on his return from the shooting-gallery. He opened the box, took out a pistol, which he examined carelessly, and approached the window.

"Are you satisfied with these arms?" asked he of Cellini.

"Very much so; they are of the manufactory of Cosimo."

"Will you allow me to try them?"

"Certainly."

Marliano looked out of the window. "You see that flower yonder," said he, pointing to a rose-bud, which was the only one left on the bush.

"Yes; but it's out of pistol-shot."

Marliano fired.

"Ah signor!" exclaimed Cellini.

"The flower is down of course," said the count, who had remained at the other extremity of the apartment.

"You seem to jest, but it's a fact."

The count smiled; he saw that Marliano wanted to frighten him.

"By Jove, Signor Marliano," said Cellini, who was still looking at the flower, "if we ever fight, I should not feel inclined to choose pistols as the weapons."

"Why not?" exclaimed Alfieri; "on account of the flower?"

"No, no; on my own account."

"Dear me! who knows? it frequently happens that this extraordinary dexterity will disappear at the moment of danger."

Marliano made a movement.

"I do not say that for you, signor; but the most clever villain cannot always support the look of an honest man, and his conscience will sometimes make his hand tremble. Indeed there are many who only make a parade of their skill, in order to avoid a more dangerous struggle, and who volunteer a proof of their address to dispense with giving a proof of courage."

"Count!" exclaimed Marliano, springing towards Alfieri.

"Once more I do not say that for you," quietly returned the latter.

"This assurance is useless," said Marliano, his lips trembling with rage. "I know that you dare not address such words to me. Poets are prudent; they only insult by allusions; they never provoke except from under cover of an oratorical precaution; and when we are tired with their disguised insolence, they feign to be ignorant of its cause; in case of necessity, they might even invoke their bad health, and call themselves ill to have any honour."

"You do not mean that for me either, I suppose," said the count mildly.

"I leave you the judge of that, sir."

"O no," continued Alfieri; "for if such were the case, the signor Marliano knows that I might demand satisfaction."

"Who hinders you from doing so?"

"You then recognise that I have the right to do it? You own that your insolence was directed towards me—that I am insulted?"

"Be it so."

Alfieri sprang towards the Genoese, and seizing his hand—

"I have the choice of arms, sir," exclaimed he.

"It matters not to me."

"We shall soon see."

He ran to the sideboard, seized Cellini's pistols, and returning to Marliano—

"Choose," said he.

"But one of the pistols is unloaded."

"The other will suffice for one of us."

"What!—do you want to fight?"

"Muzzle to muzzle; and let God defend the right."

"It is impossible," exclaimed Marliano.

"Pardon me, signor, I am insulted; you have said it. I have the right to impose the conditions; you have said that too. You cannot refuse, unless you be a vile coward. The point of honour which has served you so frequently, is against you now. You hoped that, like so many others of your victims, I should be fool enough to stand up to serve as a mark for your bullet or your sword, that you might cut me down as you did that flower, with a smile on your lips. But you were mistaken, Baron Rocca."

"Ah! you know my name, do you?"

"Yes, and think not that I will yield a single fraction of my advantages. I do not fight to make a parade of bravery or generosity, but to deliver the marchioness from your odious persecutions. I fight to kill you."

"Your hope may be deceived," exclaimed the baron, whose surprise was now turned into fury.

"I know it; but whatever be the issue of this combat, Bianca will have nothing more to fear from your tyranny. I have taken all my precautions; if I succumb, all Italy will know the cause of my death; I shall have bought with my blood the right of publishing your infamy; and I shall be believed, for the dead, it is known, never lie. I shall be pitied, for my very enemies will take care to exalt my glory. Your fatal celebrity will be affixed to mine as to a funeral pile, and you will be branded as a villain for having killed me. I shall have broken the yoke which you have imposed upon the marchioness. Placed under the safeguard of public opinion, she will have nought to fear from you, and will require no one to defend her, for you will have lost the privileges of a man of honour, and all will refuse to give you satisfaction."

"Enough! enough!" exclaimed the baron, who was now beside himself, "one of us must die. Follow me."

"I am ready sir."

They directed their steps towards the door. Cellini stopped them.

"One moment, gentlemen—you cannot fight without seconds, especially on such conditions: it is impossible."

"You shall be mine," said Alfieri; "the baron will get one."

"Meet me at the spring in an hour," said Marliano, going out.

When Alfieri was left alone, a sort of moral depression seized upon him. He passed over in his mind the events of his life; he thought of Bianca! Cellini's story had led him to believe that he was beloved, but was that sufficient now that he was about to engage in a combat in which his life was at stake? Was it love or pity that had actuated the marchioness? He was buried in these reflections when she entered the apartment with a book in her hand. On perceiving the count she stopped and blushed, but recovering her presence of mind,—

"I was with you, you see," said she showing him the last volume he had published.

"Yes," replied he, "they are more beloved than the author himself. Before people know me, they seek for me in my works, they guess at me through the medium of my poetry; and when they come to find that I am a man like other men, they are astonished, and I fall down from the pinnacle upon which they had placed me. Even you, you love the poet, but you avoid the man: you like my works, Bianca, but you shun me."

The marchioness attempted to reply.
"O! do not deny it," continued Alfieri; "you shun me, and yet you appeared to comprehend me. For an instant I thought I had touched your heart. Then it was that I loved my glory. I was proud to think I should share it with you. Ah! why did you snatch this delicious hope from me?"

The marchioness seemed affected—there was so much prayer in the count's voice, so much sensibility in his looks, that she remained as it were, spell-bound beneath them; she wished to answer but could only stammer out a few words without meaning.

"Bianca, I beseech you, speak to me—you know that I love you; do not envy me this—this happiness, perhaps the last I shall ever enjoy."

"What can you mean?"

"Who knows what may happen? you know the fate which has been predicted to me."

"O! banish all such fearful forebodings."

"Well supposing this prophecy were about to be realised—if I were to see you now for the last time—could you refuse a dying man a word which would make him happy? Ah! you tremble. Good God!—one word, only one—Bianca do you love me?"

"Yes," replied the marchioness, bursting into tears, and hiding her face in her hands.

Alfieri uttered a cry of joy.

"It is then true!—She loves me!—Thanks, thanks—Bianca, dearest Bianca!"

"Ah! why did you force me to speak, if you but knew—"

"Nothing—I will hear nothing, except that you love me—weep not, fear not. Now let my destiny be accomplished."

The clock struck—the count shuddered.

"Adieu, Bianca," said he pressing her to his bosom: "adieu!"

And having disengaged himself from her arms, he rushed out of the room.

The marchioness remained motionless. A vague sensation of terror crept over her, as she thought of the misfortunes that would be the result of the confession which she had made. She then remembered the count's trouble, his precipitate flight; a horrible suspicion arose in her mind.

She ran to the garden—Alfieri was not there. She asked for Marliano—he was absent. Her heart beat as if it were ready to burst. She ran to the count's room, hardly knowing what she was about—it was empty. She rushed to the balcony. At this moment the report of a pistol was heard, she uttered a piercing cry, and tottered against the wall. Almost immediately Cellini appeared at the extremity of the garden exclaiming—

"A surgeon!"

Bianca felt the earth turn under her feet; she stretched out her arms for support, and tried to leave the window. Suddenly a noise was heard on the staircase; the door flew open—she uttered an exclamation of joy.

It was Alfieri!

EASTERN WISDOM.

In the city of Bagdad, a blind man with a jar upon his shoulder and a lantern in his hand was accosted by a person meeting him in the street, thus, "As thou hast no eyes, poor man, of what service is this lantern to thee?" "It is not," replied the blind man, "for my own use alone I carry it,—it is for fear such a heedless fellow as thou art should run against me, to the loss of my jar, which has cost me much trouble to fill."

NEW BOOKS.

The Dowager, or the New School for Scandal. By Mrs. Gore, author of "Mrs. Armytage," &c. Philadelphia, Lea and Blanchard, 1841.

This novel is an admirable satire, not inferior in wit and pungency to the comedy of Sheridan, which undoubtedly suggested the plan of it. The displays of character which abound in the dialogue are capital; and the moral inculcated by the whole course of the story is much more effective than that of the comedy. Scandal is not merely ridiculed. Its tremendous consequences, in destroying the peace of families and demoralising society, are clearly shown and brought home to the reader's mind. The characters of the Dowager and Uncle Johnny are finely conceived.

Wilson's Ornithology.

A Boston house, Messrs. Otis, Broaders and Co., have just issued a new edition of Wilson's Ornithology. It is comprised in a single 8vo. volume executed in a splendid style. By permission of Messrs. Audubon, Buonaparte, Nuttall and Richardson, the respective additions of these gentlemen to the known species of American birds have been added, the notes of Jardine are inserted, and the work is thus rendered the most complete and comprehensive of any extant. The birds, of course, are reduced in size. They are very beautifully engraved and coloured.

When it is recollected that the scientific information given in this volume, costs in any other form in which it can be obtained, more than ten times as much as it costs in this form, and that the volume itself, by the splendour of its embellishments, excels any annual ever published, one may easily perceive that it is destined to be extensively circulated. The book is for sale at the store of Messrs. Marshall, Williams and Butler, and of Messrs. Carey and Hart in this city.

Pastoral Addresses. By John Angell James, author of "Anxious Enquirer after Salvation," &c., with an introduction by the Rev. William Adams. N. York, D. Appleton & Co., 1841.

This is a very excellent work. It was written for private distribution among the author's own parishioners, and not intended for publication. Of a very practical character, it may be considered the earnest exhortation of a pious minister to each member of his congregation, to address himself to the work of improvement in personal holiness. All who are really anxious for spiritual improvement in themselves or their immediate connections, will gladly greet the appearance of such a work.

Sacra Privata. The Private Meditations, Devotions, and Prayers of the Right Rev. T. Wilson, D.D. Lord Bishop of Sodor and Man; with a preface by J. H. Newman, B. D., Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. Reprinted entire. New York, D. Appleton & Co., 1841.

This is one of a series of invaluable works of practical devotion which the American publishers are reprinting from an accurate London edition in a very beautiful style. The "Sacra Privata" of Bishop Wilson is one of the best of the whole series. Valuable to every class of Christians, it will be prized as the purest gold by those who feel the importance of prayer, meditation, and self-examination. As models of private devotional exercises they are unequalled in modern times. The elegant style of printing and embellishment, is worthy of a book which most persons will choose to put in superb binding, and treasure up in that repository where they keep the most precious of their literary gems.

The Artist's Guide and Mechanic's Own Book. By James Pilkington. New York, Alexander V. Blake, 1841.

This volume contains a popular summary of Chemistry, with its application to the mechanic arts; abstracts of Electricity, Galvanism, Magnetism, Pneumatics, Optics, Astronomy, and Mechanical Philosophy, together with mechanical exercises in iron, steel, lead, zinc, copper, and tin soldering, and a variety of useful receipts, applicable to various arts, particularly dyeing silk, woollen, cotton, and leather. Such works are not only useful on account of the actual amount of practical information which they convey; but also for the taste which they inspire for scientific inquiry and experiment. The receipts alone, at the end of the volume, are worth twice its price to any housekeeper or mechanic.

Correspondence between the Right Rev. Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, and the Rev. H. A. Boardman, of Philadelphia, on the alleged Popish character of the Oxford Tracts. Philadelphia, Hooker and Agnew, 1841.

There has been a great deal of mystification about the precise character and drift of the new fashioned Oxford Theology. The mystification is ended now. In this correspondence the disguise is stripped off; and the divine who has performed this duty for the public benefit, never stopped to pull off his gloves before commencing the operation. No one who reads these letters will have occasion again to inquire, What is the meaning of this Oxford Theology?

Gibson's Rambles in Europe.

Messrs. Lea and Blanchard have just published in account of Dr. Gibson's recent tour in Europe. It is a lively, readable, entertaining volume, written in a colloquial, unstudied style, and abounding with interesting sketches of the more distinguished surgeons and physicians, as well as philosophers and literati of the old world. The Doctor's opportunities for becoming acquainted with these gentlemen and visiting them freely were abundant; and, without violating the proprieties so little regarded by some travellers, he has given us a most interesting series of sketches and full length portraits.

The information respecting the social and physical condition of the countries which he visited, and the descriptions of scenery, give additional value and interest to the volume.

JEAN PAUL FRIEDRICH RICHTER.

Except the name, Jean Paul Friedrich Richter is little known out of Germany. The only thing connected with him, we think, that has reached this country, is his saying, imported by Madame de Stael, and thankfully pocketed by most newspaper critics:—"Providence has given to the French the empire of the land, to the English that of the sea, to the Germans that of—the air!" Of this last element, indeed, his own genius might easily seem to have been a denizen: so fantastic, many-coloured, far-grasping, every-way perplexed and extraordinary, is his mode of writing, that to translate him properly is next to impossible; nay, a dictionary of his works has actually been in part published for the use of German readers! These things have restricted his sphere of action, and may long restrict it, to his own country: but there, in return, he is a favourite of the first class: studied through all his intricacies with trustful admiration, and a love which tolerates much. During the last forty years, he has been continually before the public, in various capacities, and growing generally in esteem with all ranks of critics; till at length, his gainsayers have been either silenced or convinced: and Jean Paul, at first reckoned half-mad, has long ago vindicated his singularities to nearly universal satisfaction, and now combines popularity with real depth of endowment, in perhaps a greater degree than any other writer; being second in the latter point to scarcely more than one of his cotemporaries, and in the former second to none.

He was born at Wunsiedel in Bayreuth, in March, 1763. His father was subaltern teacher in the Gymnasium of the place, and afterwards promoted to be clergyman at Schwarzbach on the Saale. Richter's early education was of the scantiest sort; but his fine faculties and unwearied diligence supplied every defect. Unable to purchase books, he borrowed what he could come at, and transcribed from them, often great part of their contents,—a habit of excerpting which continued with him through life, and influenced, in more than one way, his mode of writing and study. To the last, he was an insatiable and universal reader; so that his extracts accumulated on his hands, "till they filled whole chests." In 1780, he went to the university of Leipzig; with the highest character, in spite of the impediments which he had struggled with, for talent and acquirement. Like his father, he was destined for Theology; from which, however, his vagrant genius soon diverged into Poetry and Philosophy, to the neglect, and, ere long, to the final abandonment, of his appointed profession. Not well knowing what to do, he now accepted a tutorship in some family of rank; then he had pupils in his own house,—which, however, like his way of life, he often changed: for by this time he had become an author, and, in his wanderings over Germany, was putting forth,—now here, now there,—the strangest books with the strangest titles: for instance—Greenland Lawsuits—Biographical Recreations under the Cranium of a Giantess—Selection from the Papers of the Devil—and the like. In these indescribable performances, the splendid faculties of the writer, luxuriating as they seemed in utter riot, could not be disputed: nor, with all its extravagance, the fundamental strength, honesty, and tenderness of his nature. Genius will reconcile men to much. By degrees Jean Paul began to be considered not a strange, crackbrained mixture of enthusiast and buffoon, but a man of infinite humour, sensibility, force, and penetration. His writings procured him friends and fame; and at length a wife and a settled provision. With Caroline Mayer his good spouse, and a pension (in 1802) from the King of Bavaria, he settled in Bayreuth, the capital of his native province; where he lived thenceforth, diligent and celebrated in many new departments of literature; and died on the 14th of November, 1825, loved as well as admired by all his countrymen, and most by those who had known him most intimately.

The expected edition of Richter's works is to be in sixty volumes: and they are no less multifarious than extensive; embracing subjects of all sorts, from the highest problems of transcendental philosophy, and the most passionate poetical delineations, to Golden Rules for the Weather-Prophet, and instructions in the Art of Falling Asleep. His chief productions are novels: the Unsichtbare Loge (Invisible Lodge); Flegeljahre (Wild Oats); Life of Fixlein; the Jubel-senior (Parson in Jubilee); Schmelzle's Journey to Flätz; Katzenberger's Journey to the Bath; Life of Fidel; with many lighter pieces: and two works of a higher order, Hesperus and Titan, the largest and the best of his novels. It was the former that first (in 1795) introduced him into decisive and universal estimation with his countrymen; the latter, he himself, with the most judicious of his critics, regarded as his masterpiece. But the name Novelist, as we in England must understand it, would ill describe so vast and discursive a genius: for with all his grotesque, tumultuous pleasantry, Richter is a man of a truly earnest, nay, high and solemn character: and seldom writes without a meaning far beyond the sphere of common romancers.

Hesperus and Titan themselves, though in form nothing more than "novels of real life," as the Minerva Press would say, have solid metal enough in them to furnish whole circulating libraries, were it beaten into the usual filagree; and much which, attenuate it as we might, no quarterly subscriber could well carry with him. Amusement is often, in part almost always, a mean with Richter; rarely or never his highest end. His thoughts, his feelings, the creations of his spirit, walk before us embodied under wondrous shapes, in motley and ever-fluctuating groups: but his essential character, however he disguise it, is that of a Philosopher and moral Poet, whose study has been human nature, whose delight and best endeavour are with all that is beautiful, and tender, and mysteriously sublime in the fate or history of man. This is the purport of his writings, whether their form be that of fiction or of truth; the spirit that pervades and ennobles his delineations of common life, his wild wayward dreams, allegories, and shadowy imaginings, no less than his disquisitions of a nature directly scientific.

There are few writers with whom deliberation and careful distrust of first impressions are more necessary than with Richter. He is a phenomenon from the very surface; he presents himself with a professed and determined singularity; his language itself is a stone of stumbling to the critic; to critics of the grammarian species, an unpardonable, often an insuperable, rock of offence. Not that he is ignorant of grammar, or disdains the sciences of spelling and parsing; but he exercises both in a certain latitudinarian spirit; deals with astonishing liberality in parentheses, dashes, and subsidiary clauses; invents hundreds of new words, alters old ones, or, by hyphen, chains, pairs, and packs them together into most jarring combination; in short, produces sentences of the most heterogeneous, lumbering, interminable kind. Figures without limit, indeed the whole is one tissue of metaphors, and similes, and allusions to all the provinces of Earth, Sea, and Air; interlaced with epigrammatic breaks, vehement bursts, or sardonic turns, interjections, quips, puns, and even oaths! A perfect Indian jungle it seems; a boundless, unparalleled imbrolio; nothing on all sides but darkness, dissonance, confusion worse confounded. Then the style of the whole corresponds, in perplexity and extravagance, with that of the parts. Every work, be it fiction or serious treatise, is embled in some fantastic wrappage; some mad narrative accounting for its appearance, and connecting it with the author, who generally becomes a person of the drama himself, before all is over. He has a whole imaginary geography of Europe in his novels; the cities of Flachsenfingen, Haarhaar, Scheerau, and so forth, with their princes, and privy-councillors, and serene highnesses; most of whom, odd enough fellows every way, are Richter's private acquaintances, talk with him of state matters (in the purest Tory dialect,) and often incite him to get on with his writing. No story proceeds without the most erratic digressions and voluminous tag-rags rolling after it in many a snaky twine. Ever and anon there occurs some "Extra leaf," with its satirical petition, program, or other wonderful intercalation, no mortal can foresee on what. It is, indeed, a mighty maze; and often the panting reader toils after him in vain, or, baffled and spent, indignantly stops short, and retires, perhaps for ever.

Richter has been called an intellectual Colossus; and in truth it is still somewhat in this light that we view him. His faculties are all of gigantic mould; cumbrous, awkward in their movements; large and splendid rather than harmonious or beautiful: yet joined in living union,—and of force and compass altogether extraordinary. He has an intellect vehement, rugged, irresistible; crushing in pieces the hardest problems; piercing into the most hidden combinations of things, and grasping the most distant: an imagination, vague, sombre, splendid, or appalling; brooding over the abysses of Being; wandering through Infinity, and summoning before us, in its dim religious light, shapes of brilliancy, solemnity, or terror; a fancy of exuberance literally unexampled; for it pours its treasures with a lavishness which knows no limit, hanging, like the sun, a jewel on every grassblade, and sowing the earth at large with orient pearl. But deeper than all these lies Humour, the ruling quality with Richter; as it were the central fire that pervades and vivifies his whole being. He is a humourist from his inmost soul; he thinks as a humourist, he feels, imagines, acts as a humourist: Sport is the element in which his nature lives and works. A tumultuous element for such a nature, and wild work he makes in it! A Titan in his sport as in his earnestness, he oversteps all bound, and riots without law or measure. He heaps Pelion upon Ossa, and hurls the universe together and asunder like a case of playthings. The Moon "bombards" the Earth, being a rebellious satellite; Mars "preaches" to the other Planets very singular doctrine; nay, we have Time and Space themselves playing fantastic tricks: it is an infinite masquerade; all Nature is gone forth mumming in the strangest guises.

Yet the anarchy is not without its purpose; these vizards are not mere hollow masks; but there are living faces beneath them, and this mumming has its significance. Richter is a man of mirth, but he seldom or never condescends to be a merry-andrew. Nay, in spite of its extravagance, we should say that his humour is of all his gifts intrinsically the finest and most genuine. It has such witching turns; there is something in it so capricious, so quaint, so heartfelt. From his Cyclopean workshop, and its fuliginous limbecs, and huge unwieldy machinery, the little shriveled twisted figure comes forth at last, so perfect and so living, to be for ever laughed at and for ever loved! Wayward as he seems, he works not without forethought: like Rubens, by a single stroke, he can change a laughing face into a sad one. But in his smile itself a touching pathos may lie hidden, a pity too deep for tears. He is a man of feeling, in the noblest sense of that word; for he loves all living with the heart of a brother; his soul rushes forth, in sympathy with gladness or sorrow, with goodness or grandeur, over all creation. Every gentle and generous affection, every thrill of mercy, every glow of nobleness, awakens in his bosom a response, nay, strikes his spirit into harmony; a wild music as of wind-harps, floating round us in fitful swells, but soft sometimes, and pure and soul-entrancing as the song of angels! Aversion itself with him is not hatred: he despises much, but justly, with tolerance also, with placidity, and even a sort of love. Love, in fact, is the atmosphere he breathes in, the medium through which he looks: his is the spirit which gives life and beauty to whatever it embraces. Inanimate Nature itself is no longer an insensible assemblage of colours and perfumes, but a mysterious Presence, with which he communes in unutterable sympathies. We might call him, as he once called Herder, "a Priest of Nature, a mild Bramin," wandering amid spicy groves, under benignant skies. The infinite Night, with her solemn aspects, Day, and the sweet approach of Even and Morn, are full of meaning for him. He loves the green Earth with her streams and forests, her flowery leas and eternal skies; loves her with a sort of passion, in all her vicissitudes of light and shade; his spirit revels in her grandeur and charms; expands like the breeze over wood and lawn, over glade and dingle, stealing and giving odours.

It has sometimes been made a wonder that things so discordant should go together—that men of humour are often likewise men of sensibility. But the wonder should rather be to see them divided; to find true genial humour dwelling in a mind that was coarse or callous. The essence of humour is sensibility; warm, tender fellow-feeling with all forms of existence. Nay, we may say, that unless seasoned and purified by humour, sensibility is apt to run wild; will readily corrupt into disease, falsehood, or in one word, sentimentality. Witness Rousseau, Zimmerman, in some points also St. Pierre: to say nothing of living instances; or of the Kotzebues, and other pale hosts of wobegone mourners, whose wailings, like the howl of an Irish wake, have from time to time cleft the general ear. The last perfection of our faculties, says Schiller, with a truth far deeper than it seems, is, that their activity, without ceasing to be sure and earnest, becomes sport. True humour is sensibility, in the most catholic and deepest sense; but it is this sport of sensibility; wholesome and perfect therefore; as it were, the playful teasing fondness of a mother to her child.

Richter's worst faults are nearly allied to his best merits; being chiefly exuberance of good, irregular squandering of wealth, a dazzling with excess of true light. These things may be pardoned the more readily, as they are little likely to be imitated.

On the whole, Genius has privileges of its own; it selects an orbit for itself; and be this never so eccentric, if it is indeed a celestial orbit, we mere star-gazers must at last compose ourselves; must cease to cavil at it, and begin to observe it, and calculate its laws. That Richter is a new Planet in the intellectual heavens, we dare not affirm; an atmospheric Meteor he is not wholly; perhaps a Comet, that, though with long aberrations, and shrouded in a nebulous veil, has yet its place in the empyrean.

Richter's works do not always bear sufficient marks of having been in fusion; yet neither are they merely rivetted together; to say the least, they have been welded. A similar remark applies to many of his characters: indeed, more or less, to all of them, except such as are entirely humorous, or have a large dash of humour. In this latter province, certainly, he is at home; a true poet, a maker: his Siebenkas, his Schmelzle, even his Fibel and Fixlein, are living figures. But in heroic personages, passionate, massive, overpowering as he is, we have scarcely ever a complete ideal: art has not attained to the concealment of itself. With his heroines again he is more successful; they are often true heroines, though perhaps with too little variety of character; bustling, buxom mothers and housewives, with all the caprices, perversities, and warm generous helpfulness of women; or white, half-angelic creatures, meek, still, long-suffering, high-minded, of tenderest affections, and hearts crushed, yet uncomplaining. Supernatural figures he has not attempted; and wisely, for he cannot write without belief. Yet many times he exhibits an imagination of a singularity, nay, on the whole, of a truth and grandeur, unexampled elsewhere. In his dreams there is a mystic complexity, a gloom, and amid the dim gigantic, half-ghastly shadows, gleamings of a wizard splendour, which almost recall to us the visions of Ezekiel. By readers who have studied the Dream in the New Year's Eve, we shall not be mistaken.—Edinb. Review.

PASSAGES OF RICHTER, TRANSLATED BY PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW.

Sunset.—I have thought a hundred times, that if I were an angel and had wings and no specific gravity, I would soar just so far upward, that I could see the evening sun glimmer o'er the edge of the earth, and, while I flew around with the earth, and, at the same against its motion on its axis, would hold myself always in such a position, that for a whole year long I could look into the mild, broad eye of the evening sun. But at length I would sink down, drunk with splendour, like a bee o'er-fed with honey, in sweet delirium on the grass.

Evening and Death.—The day is dying amid blossom clouds, and with its own swan-song. The alleys and gardens speak in low tones, like men, when deeply moved; and around the leaves fly the gentle winds, and around the blossoms the bees, with a tender whisper. Only the larks, like man, rise warbling into the sky, and then, like him, drop down again into the furrow; while the great soul and the sea lift themselves unheard and unseen to heaven, and rushing, sublime and fruit-giving, and water-falls and thunder showers, dash down into the valleys.

In a country house on the declivity of the Bergstrasse, an unspeakably sweet tone rises from a woman's breast, like a trembling lark. It sounds as if the Spring were flying down from Heaven with a song and singing on in one continuous tone of rapture hung poised with open wings above the earth, until the flowers should have sprung up for its evening couch.

Harshly upon this voice of song breaks the tolling bell, from a cloister behind Newengleichen. It is the so called passing bell, which the monks always ring when a man is at the point of death, so that the sympathising soul may pray for the dying, around whom the Last Angel has drawn the shades of night, therein to sever his heart-strings, as they bandage one's eyes in the amputation of a limb. If it depended upon me—thou departing Unknown!—I would stop the death-bell and make it mute, so that now in thy darkened battlefield of death no echo of the receding earth should enter; which to thee (since the sense of having survived all other senses) so diamally announces the moment when thou art lost to us;—as to ascending aeronauts, by a discharge of his talents, examined with great attention, and many exclamations of "Bon, c'est ça."

"I have done well with the Jew," said Birnie, drawing from his coat pocket two heavy bags; "one hundred and eighty Napoleons. We shall commence with a good capital."

"You are right, my friend," said Gawtrety.

The serrurier was then despatched to the best restaurant in the neighbourhood, and the three adventurers made a less Socratic dinner than might have been expected.

CHAPTER VI.

"Then out again he flies to wing his mazy round."

THOMSON: Castle of Indulgence.

"Again he gazed. 'It is,' said he, 'the same;
There sits he upright in his seat secure,
As one whose conscience is correct and pure.'"

CHADBE.

The adventurers arrived at Tours, and established themselves there in a lodging, without any incident worth narrating by the way.

At Tours, Morton had nothing to do but to take his pleasure and enjoy himself. He passed for a young heir; Gawtrety for his tutor—a doctor in divinity; Birnie for his valet. The task of maintenance fell on Gawtrety, who hit off his character to a hair; larded his grave jokes with University scraps of Latin; looked big and well-fed; wore knee-breeches and a shovel-hat; and played whist with the skill of a veteran vicar. By his art in that game, he made at first, enough, at least, to defray their weekly expenses. But, by degrees, the good people at Tours, who, under pretence of health, were there for economy, grew shy of so excellent a player; and, though Gawtrety always swore solemnly that he played with the most scrupulous honour (an asseveration which Morton, at least, implicitly believed), and no proof to the contrary was ever detected, yet a first-rate card-player is always a suspicious character, unless the losing parties know exactly who he is. The market fell off, and Gawtrety at length thought it prudent to extend their travels.

"Ah!" said Mr. Gawtrety, "the world nowadays has grown so ostentatious, that one cannot travel advantageously without a post chaise and four horses." At length they found themselves at Milan, which at that time was one of the El Dorados for gamblers. Here, however, for want of introductions, Mr. Gawtrety found it difficult to get into society. The nobles, proud and rich, played high, but were circumspect in their company; the bourgeoise, industrious and energetic, preserved much of the old Lombard shrewdness: there were no table d'hôtes and public reunions. Gawtrety saw his little capital daily diminishing, with the Alps at the rear, and Poverty in the van. At length, always on the qui vive, he contrived to make acquaintance with a Scottish family of great respectability. He effected this by picking up a snuff box which the Scotsman had dropped in taking out his handkerchief. This politeness paved the way to a conversation, in which Gawtrety made himself so agreeable, and talked with such zest of the modern Athens, and the tricks practised upon travellers, that he was presented to Mrs. Macgregor; cards were interchanged; and, as Mr. Gawtrety lived in tolerable style, the Macgregors pronounced him "a vara genteel mon." Once in the house of a respectable person, Gawtrety contrived to turn himself round and round, till he borrowed a hole into the English circle then settled at Milan. His whist-playing came into requisition, and once more Fortune smiled upon Skill.

To this house the pupil one evening accompanied the tutor. When the whist-party, consisting of two tables, was formed, the young man found himself left out with an old gentleman, who seemed loquacious and good-natured, and who put many questions to Morton which he found it difficult to answer. One of the whist-tables was now in a state of revolution, viz., a lady had cut out, and a gentleman cut in, when the door opened, and Lord Lilburne was announced.

Mr. Macgregor, rising, advanced with great respect to this personage.

"I scarcely ventured to hope you would coom, Lord Lilburne, the night is so cold."

"You did not allow sufficiently, then, for the dullness of my solitary inn and the attractions of your circle. Ah! whist, I see."

"You play soometimes?"

"Very seldom now; I have sown all my wild oats, and even the ace of spades can scarcely dig them out again."

"Ha! ha! vara gude."

"I will look on;" and Lord Lilburne drew his chair to the table, exactly opposite to Mr. Gawtrety.

The old gentleman turned to Philip.

"An extraordinary man, Lord Lilburne; you have heard of him, of course?"

"No, indeed; what of him?" asked the young man, rousing himself.

"What of him?" said the old gentleman with a smile; "why, the newspapers, if you ever read them, will tell you enough of the elegant, the witty Lord Lilburne; a man of eminent talent though indolent. He was wild in his youth, as clever men often are; but, on attaining his title and fortune, and marrying into the family of the then premier, he became more sedate. They say he might make a great figure in politics if he would. He has a very high reputation—very. People do say he is still fond of pleasure; but that is a common failing among the aristocracy. Morality is only found in the middling classes, young gentlemen. It is a lucky family, that of Lilburne; his sister, Mrs. Beaufort—"

"Beaufort!" exclaimed Morton; and then muttered to himself, "Ah, true—true, I have heard the name of Lilburne before."

"Do you know the Beauforts? Well, you remember how luckily Robert, Lilburne's brother-in-law, came into that fine property just as his predecessor was about to marry a—"

Morton scowled at his garrulous acquaintance, and stalked abruptly to the card table.

Ever since Lord Lilburne had seated himself opposite to Mr. Gawtrety, that gentleman had evinced a perturbation of manner that became obvious to the company. He grew deadly pale; his hands trembled; he moved uneasily in his seat; he missed deal; he trumped his partner's best diamond; finally he revoked, threw down his money, and said, with a forced smile, "That the heat of the room overcame him." As he rose, Lord Lilburne rose also, and the eyes of both met. Those of Lilburne were calm, but penetrating and inquisitive in their gaze; those of Gawtrety were like balls of fire. He seemed gradually to dilate in his height, his broad chest expanded, he breathed hard.

"Ah, doctor," said Mr. Macgregor, "let me introduce you to Lord Lilburne."

The peer bowed haughtily; Mr. Gawtrety did not return the salutation, but with a sort of gulp, as if he were swallowing some burst of passion, strode to the fire; and then, turning round, again fixed his gaze upon the new guest. Lilburne, however, who had never lost his self-composure at this strange rudeness, was now quietly talking with their host.

"Your doctor seems an eccentric man—a little absent—learned, I suppose. Have you been to Como yet?"

Mr. Gawtrety remained by the fire, beating the devil's tattoo upon the chimney-piece, and ever and anon turning his glance towards Lilburne, who seemed to have forgotten his existence.

Both these guests stayed till the party broke up, Mr. Gawtrety apparently wishing to outstay Lord Lilburne; for when the last went down stairs, Mr. Gawtrety, nodding to his comrade, and giving a hurried bow to the host, descended also. As they passed the porter's lodge, they found Lilburne on the step of his carriage; he turned his head abruptly, and again met Gawtrety's eyes; paused a moment, and whispered over his shoulder,

"So we remember each other, sir? Let us not meet again; and, on that condition, by-gones are by-gones."

"Scoundrel!" muttered Gawtrety, clinching his fists; but the peer had sprung into his carriage with a lightness, scarcely to be expected from his lameness, and the wheels whirled within an inch of the soi disant doctor's right pump.

Gawtrety walked on for some moments in great excitement; at length he turned to his companion:

"Do you guess who Lord Lilburne is? I will tell you; my first foe, and Fanny's grandfather! Now note the justice of fate. Here is this man—mark well—this man, who commenced life by putting his faults on my own shoulders!—from that little boss has funged out a terrible hump—this man, who seduced my affianced bride, and then left her whole soul, once fair and blooming—I swear it—with its leaves fresh from the dews of heaven, one rank leprosy—this man, who rolling in riches, learned to cheat and pilfer as a boy learns to dance and play the fiddle, and (to damn me, whose happiness he had blasted) accused me to the world of his own crime!—here is this man, who has not left off once vice, but added to those of his youth the bloodless craft of the veteran knave—here is this man, flattered, courted, great, marching through lanes of bowing parasites to an illustrious epitaph and a marble tomb; and I, a rogue too, if you will, but rogue for my bread, dating from him my errors and my ruin! I—vagabond—outcast—skulking through tricks to avoid crime—why the difference! Because one is born rich and the other poor; because he has no excuse for crime, and, therefore, no one suspects him?"

The wretched man (for at that moment he was wretched) paused breathless from this passionate and rapid burst; and before him rose in its marble majesty, with the moon full upon its shining spires, the wonder of Gothic Italy—the Cathedral Church of Milan.

"Chafe not yourself at this universal fate," said the young man, with a bitter smile on his lips, and pointing to the Cathedral; "I have not lived long, but I have learned already enough to know this: he who could raise a pile like that, dedicated to heaven, would be honoured as a saint: he who knelt to God by the roadside under a hedge would be sent to the house of correction as a vagabond! The difference between man and man is money, and will be, when you, the despised charlatan, and Lilburne, the honoured cheat, have not left as much dust behind you as will fill a snuff-box. Comfort yourself; you are in the majority."

CHAPTER VII.

"A desert wild
Before them stretched bare, comfortless and vast,
With gibbets, bones, and carcases defiled."
THOMSON: Castle of Indolence.

Mr. Gawtreys did not wish to give his foe the triumph of thinking he had driven him from Milan; he resolved to stay and brave it out; but when he appeared in public, he found the acquaintances he had formed bow politely, but cross to the other side of the way. No more invitations to tea and cards showered in upon the jolly parson. He was puzzled; for people, while they shunned him, did not appear uncivil. He found out, at last, that a report was circulated that he was deranged; though he could not trace this rumour to Lord Lilburne, he was at no loss to guess from whom it had emanated. His own eccentricities, especially his recent manner at Mr. Macgregor's, gave confirmation to the charge. Again the funds began to sink low in the canvass bags, and at length, in despair, Mr. Gawtreys was obliged to quit the field. They returned to France through Switzerland—a country too poor for gamblers; and, ever since the interview with Lilburne, a great change had come over Gawtreys's gay spirit; he grew moody and thoughtful; he took no pains to replenish the common stock; he talked much and seriously to his young friend of poor Fanny, and owned that he yearned to see her again. The desire to return to Paris haunted him like a fatality; he saw the danger that awaited him there, but it only allured him the more, as the candle that has singed its wings does the moth. Birnie, who, in all their vicissitudes and wanderings, their ups and downs, retained the same tacit, immovable demeanour, received with a sneer the orders at last to march back upon the French capital. "You would never have left it if you had taken my advice," he said and quitted the room.

Mr. Gawtreys gazed after him and muttered, "Is the die then cast?"

"What does he mean?" said Morton.

"You will know soon," replied Gawtreys, and he followed Birnie; and from that time, the whispered conferences with that person, which had seemed suspended during their travels, were renewed.

One morning three men were seen entering Paris on foot through the Porte St. Denis. It was a fine day in spring, and the old city looked gay with its loitering passengers and gaudy shops, and under that clear, blue, exhilarating sky so peculiar to France.

Two of these men walked abreast, the other preceded them a few steps. The one who went first—thin, pale, and threadbare—yet seemed to suffer the least from fatigue; he walked with a long, swinging, noiseless stride, looking to the right and left from the corners of his eyes. Of the two who followed, one was handsome and finely formed, but of a swarthy complexion; young, yet with a look of care; the other of a sturdy frame, leaned on a thick stick, and his eyes were gloomily cast down.

"Philip," said the last, "in coming back to Paris, I feel that I am coming back to my grave!"

"Pooh! you were equally despondent in our excursions elsewhere."

"Because I was always thinking of poor Fanny, and because—because—Birnie was ever at me with his horrible temptations!"

"Birnie! I loathe the man! Will you never get rid of him?"

"I cannot! Hush! he will hear us! How unlucky we have been! and now, without a sous in our pockets—here the dunghill, there the jail! We are in his power at last!"

"His power! What mean you!"

"What, ho! Birnie! cried Gawtreys, unheeding Morton's question, "let us halt and break-fast: I am tired."

"You forget! we have no money till we make it," returned Birnie coldly. "Come to the serurier's—he will trust us!"

CHAPTER VIII.

"Gaunt Beggary and Scorn, with many hellhounds more."
THOMSON: Castle of Indolence.

"The other was a fell, despicable fiend."—Ibid.

"Your happiness behold! then straight a wand
He waved, an anti-magic power that bath Truth from illusive falsehood to command."—Ibid.

"But what for us, the children of despair,
Brought to the brink of hell—what hope remains?

It may be observed that there are certain years in which, in a civilised country, some particular crime comes into vogue. It flares its season, and then burns out. Thus at one time we have burking—at another, swingism—now suicide is in vogue—now poisoning trades-people in apple-dumplings—now little boys stab each other with penknives—now common soldiers shoot at their sergeants. Almost every year there is one crime peculiar to it; a sort of annual which overruns the country, but does not bloom again. Unquestionably, the Press has a great deal to do with these epidemics. Let a newspaper once give an account of some out of the way atrocity that has the charm of being novel, and certain depraved minds fasten to it like leeches. They brood over and revolve it; the idea grows up, a horrid phantasmalian monomania; and all of a sudden, in a hundred different places, the one seed sown by the leaden types springs up into foul flowering. But if the first reported aboriginal crime has been attended with impunity, how much more does the imitative faculty cling to it. Ill-judged mercy falls, not like dew, but like a great heap of manure on the rank deed.

Now it happened that, at the time I write of, or, rather, a little before, there had been detected and tried in Paris a most redoubted coiner. He had carried on the business with a dexterity that won admiration even for the offence; and, moreover, he had served previously with some distinction at Austerlitz and Marengo. The consequence was, that the public went with instead of against him, and his sentence was transmuted to three years' imprisonment by the government:

* An old Spanish writer, treating of the Inquisition, has some very striking remarks on the kind of madness which, whenever some terrible notoriety is given to a particular offence, leads persons of disordered fancy to accuse themselves of it. He observes, that when the cruelties of the Inquisition against the imaginary crime of sorcery were the most barbarous, this singular phrensy led numbers to accuse themselves of sorcery. The publication and celebrity of the crime begat the desire of the crime.

No sooner was this case reported in the journals—and even the gravest took notice of it which is not common with the scholastic journal of France—so sooner did it make a stir and sensation, and cover the criminal with celebrity than the result became noticeable in a very large issue of false money.

Coining in the year I now write of was the fashionable crime. The police were roused into full vigour: it became known to them that there was one gang in especial who cultivated this with singular success. Their coinage was indeed so good, so superior to all their rivals, that it was often unconsciously preferred by the public to the real mintage. At the same time, they carried on their calling with such secrecy that the utterly baffled discovery.

An immense reward was offered by the bureau to any one who would betray his accomplices and Monsieur Favart was placed at the head of a commission of inquiry. This person had himself been a faux monnoyer, and was an adept in the art, and it was he who had discovered the most doubted coiner who had brought the crime into such notoriety; Monsieur Favart was a man of the most vigilant acuteness, the most indefatigable research, and of a courage which, perhaps, is more common than we suppose. It is a popular error to suppose that courage means courage in everything. Put a hero on board ship at a five-barred gate, and, if he is not used to hunting, he will turn pale. Put a fox-hunter on one of the Swiss chasms, over which the mountainous springs like a roe, and his knees will knock under him. People are brave in the dangers to which they accustom themselves, either in imagination or practice.

Monsieur Favart, then, was a man of the most daring bravery in facing rogues and cutthroats. He awed them with his very eye; yet he had been known to have been kicked down stairs by his wife, and, when he was drawn into the grand army, he deserted the eve of his first battle. Such, as moralists say, is the inconsistency of man!

But Monsieur Favart was sworn to trace the coiners, and he had never failed yet in any enterprise he undertook. One day he presented himself to his chief with a countenance so elated, that that penetrating functionary said to him at once.

"You have heard of our messieurs?"

"I have: I am to visit them to-night."

"Bravo! How many men will you take?"

"From twelve to twenty, to leave without on guard. But I must enter alone. Such is the condition: an accomplice, who fears his own throat too much to be openly a betrayer, will introduce me to the house—nay, to the very room. By his description, it is necessary I should know the exact locale in order to cut off retreat; so to-morrow night I shall surround the beehive and take the honey."

"They are desperate fellows, these coiners, always; better be cautious."

"You forget I was one of them, and know the masonry."

About the same time this conversation was going on at the bureau of the police, in another part of the town Morton and Gawtreys were seated alone. It is some weeks since they entered Paris, and spring has mellowed into summer. The house in which they lodged was in the lordly quartier of the Faubourg St. Germain; the neighbouring streets were venerable with the ancient edifices of a fallen noblesse; but their tenement was in a narrow, dingy lane, and the building itself seemed beggarly and ruinous. The apartment was in an attic on the sixth story, and the window, placed at the back of the lane, looked upon another row of houses of a better description, that communicated with one of the great streets of the quartier. The space between their abode and their opposite neighbours was so narrow that the sun could scarcely pierce between. In the height of summer might be found there a perpetual shade.

The pair were seated by the window. Gawtrety well dressed, smooth shaven, as in his palmy time; Morton, in the same garments with which he had entered Paris, weather-stained and ragged. Looking at the parallel basement in the opposite house, Gawtrety said, mutteringly, "I wonder where Birnie has been, and why he is not returned: I grow suspicious of that man."

"Suspicious of what?" asked Morton. "Of his honesty? Would he rob you?"

"Rob me! Humph—perhaps! But you see I am in Paris, in spite of the hints of the police; he may denounce me."

"Why then suffer him to lodge away from you?"

"Why? Because, by having separate houses, there are two channels of escape. A dark night, and a ladder thrown across from window to window, he is with us, or we with him."

"But wherefore such precautions? You blind—you deceive me. What have you done? What is your employment now? You are mute. Hark you, Gawtrety! I have pinned my fate to you—I have fallen from hope itself. At times, it almost make me mad to look back; and yet you do not trust me. Since your return to Paris you are absent whole nights—often days; you are moody and thoughtful; yet, whatever your business, it seems to bring you ample returns."

"You think that," said Gawtrety, mildly, and with a sort of pity in his voice, "yet you refuse to take even the money to change those rags."

"Because I know not how the money was gained. Ah! Gawtrety, I am not too proud for charity, but I am for—"

He checked the word uppermost in his thoughts, and resumed,

"Yes; your occupations seem lucrative. It was but yesterday Birnie gave me fifty Napoleons, for which he said you wished change in silver."

"Did he? The ras—well! and you got change for them?"

"I know not why, but I refused."

"That was right, Philip. Do nothing that man tells you."

"Will you then trust me? You are engaged in some horrible traffic: it may be blood! I am no longer a boy; I have a will of my own; I will not be silently and blindly entrapped to perdition. If I march thither, it shall be with my own consent. Trust me, and this day, or we part to-morrow?"

"Be ruled. Some secrets it is better not to know."

"It matters not! I have come to my decision: I ask yours."

Gawtrety paused for some moments in deep thought. At last he lifted his eyes to Philip, and replied,

"Well, then, if it must be. Sooner or later it must have been so, and I want a confidant. You are bold, and will not shrink. You desire to know my occupation—will you witness it to-night?"

"I am prepared: to-night!"

Here a step was heard on the stairs—a knock at the door—and Birnie entered.

He drew aside Gawtrety, and whispered him, as usual, for some moments.

Gawtrety nodded his head, and then said aloud,

"To-morrow we shall talk without reserve before my young friend. To-night he joins us."

"To-night! Very well!" said Birnie, with his cold sneer. "He must take the oath; and you, with your life, will be responsible for his honesty?"

"Ay! it is the rule."

"Good-bye, then, till we meet," said Birnie, and withdrew.

"I wonder," said Gawtrety, musingly, and between his grinded teeth, "whether I shall ever have a good fair shot at that fellow? Ho! ho!" and his laugh shook the walls.

Morton looked hard at Gawtrety as the latter now sunk down in his chair, and gazed with a vacant stare, that seemed almost to partake of imbecility, upon the opposite wall. The careless, reckless, jovial expression which usually characterised the features of the man had for some weeks given place to a restless, anxious, and, at times, ferocious aspect, like the beast that first finds a sport, while the hounds are yet afar and his limbs are yet strong, in the chase which marks him for its victim, but grows desperate with rage and fear as the day nears its close and the death dogs pant hard upon his track; but at that moment the strong features, with their guarded muscle and iron sinews, seemed to have lost every sign both of passion and the will, and to be locked in a stolid and dull repose. At last he looked up at Morton, and said, with a smile like that of an old man in his dotage,

"I'm thinking that my life has been one mistake! I had talents—you would not fancy it—but once I was neither a fool nor a villain! Odd, isn't it? Just reach me the brandy."

But Morton, with a slight shudder, turned and left the room.

He walked on mechanically, and gained, at last, the superb Quai that borders the Seine: there the passengers became more frequent: gay equipages rolled along; the white and lofty mansions looked fair and stately in the clear blue sky of early summer; beside him flowed the sparkling river, animated with the painted baths that floated on its surface: earth was merry and heaven serene: his heart was dark through all: Night within—Morning beautiful without! At last he paused by that bridge, stately with the statues of those whom the caprice of time honours with a name; for, though Zeus and his gods be overthrown, while earth exists will live the worship of dead men—the bridge by which you pass from the royal Tuileries, or the luxurious streets beyond the Rue de Rivoli, to the Senate of the emancipated people, and the gloomy and desolate grandeur of the Faubourg St. Germain, in whose venerable haunts the impoverished descendants of the old feudal tyrants, whom the birth of the Senate overthrew, yet congregate—the ghosts of departed powers, proud of the shadows of great names. As the English outcast paused midway on the bridge, and, for the first time, lifting his head from his bosom, gazed around, there broke at once on his remembrance that terrible and fatal evening, when, hopeless, friendless, desperate, he had begged for charity of his uncle's hireling, with all the feelings that then (so imperfectly and lightly touched on in his brief narrative to Gawtrety) had raged and blackened in his breast, urging to the resolution he had adopted, casting him on the ominous friendship of the man whose guidance he even then had suspected and distrusted. The spot in either city had a certain similitude and correspondence each with each: at the first he had consummated his despair of human destinies—he had dared to forget the Providence of God—he had arrogated his fate to himself: by the first bridge he had taken his resolve, by the last he stood in awe at the result?—stood no less poor—no less abject—equally in rags and squalor; but was his crest as haughty and his eye as fearless, for was his conscience as free and his honour as unstained? Those arches of stone—those rivers that rolled between, seemed to him then to take a more mystic and typical sense than belongs to the outer world: they were the bridges to the rivers of his life. Plunged in thoughts so confused and dim that he could scarcely distinguish, through the chaos, the one streak of light which, perhaps, heralded the reconstruction or regeneration of the elements of his soul, two passengers halted also by his side.

"You will be late for the debate," said one of them to the other. "Why do you stop?"

"My friend," said the other, "I never pass this spot without recalling the time when I stood here without a sous, or, as I thought, a chance of one, and impiously meditated self-destruction."

"You! now so rich—so fortunate in repute and station! Is it possible! How was it? A lucky chance—a sudden legacy?"

"No: Time, Faith, and Energy—the three friends God has given to the poor!"

The men moved on; but Morton, who had turned his face towards them, fancied that the last speaker fixed on him his bright, cheerful eye with a meaning look; and when the man was gone, he repeated those words, and hailed them in his heart of hearts as an augury from above.

Quickly, then, and as if by magic, the former confusion of his mind seemed to settle into distinct shapes of courage and resolve. "Yes," he muttered, "I will keep this night's appointment; I will learn the secret of these men's life. In my inexperience and destitution I have suffered myself to be led hitherto into a partnership, if not with vice and crime, at least with subterfuge and trick. I awake from my reckless boyhood—my unworthy palterings with my better self. If Gawtrety be as I dread to find him—if he be linked in some guilty and hateful traffic with that loathsome accomplice—I will—" He paused, for his heart whispered, "Well, and even so—the guilty man clothed and fed thee!" "I will," resumed his thought, in answer to his heart, "I will go on my knees to him to fly while there is yet time—to work, beg, starve, perish, even—rather than lose the right to look man in the face without a blush, and kneel to his God without remorse!"

And, as he thus ended, he felt suddenly as if he himself were restored to the perception and the joy of the Nature and the World around him: the NIGHT had vanished from his soul; he inhaled the balm and freshness of the air; he comprehended the delight which the liberal June was scattering over the earth; he looked above, and his eyes were suffused with pleasure at the smile or the soft blue skies. The MORNING became, as it were, a part of his own being; and he felt that as the world, in spite of the storms, is fair, so, in spite of evil, God is good. He walked on

—he passed the bridge, but his step was no more the same—he forgot his rags. Why should he be ashamed? And thus, in the very flush of this new and strange elation and elasticity of spirit, he came unawares upon a group of young men, lounging before the porch of one of the chief hotels in that splendid Rue de Rivoli, wherein wealth and the English have made their homes. A groom, mounted, was leading another horse up and down the road, and the young men were making their comments of approbation upon both the horses, especially the latter, which was, indeed, of uncommon beauty and great value. Even Morton, in whom the boyish passion of his earlier life yet existed, paused to turn his experienced and admiring eye upon the stately shape and pace of the noble animal, and, as he did so, a name too well remembered came upon his ear.

"Certainly Arthur Beaufort is the most enviable fellow in Europe!"

"Why, yes," said another of the young men; "he has plenty of money; is good-looking, devilish good-natured, clever, and spends like a prince."

"Has the best horses!"

"The best luck at roulette!"

"The prettiest girls in love with him!"

"And no one enjoys life more. Ah! here he is!"

The group parted as a light, graceful figure came out of a jeweller's shop that adjoined the hotel, and halted gaily amid the loungers. Morton's first impulse was to hurry from the spot; his second impulse arrested his step, and a little apart, and half hid beneath one of the arches of the colonnade which adorns the street, the Outcast gazed upon the Heir. There was no comparison in the natural personal advantages of the two young men; for Philip Morton, despite all the hardships of his rough career, had now grown up and ripened into a rare perfection of form and feature. His broad chest, his erect air, his lithe and symmetrical length of limb, united, happily, the attributes of activity and strength; and, though there was no delicacy of youthful bloom upon his dark cheek, and though lines which should have come later marred its smoothness with the signs of care and thought, yet an expression of intelligence and daring, equally beyond his years, and the evidence of hardy, abstemious, vigorous health, served to show to the full advantage the outline of features which, noble and regular, though stern and masculine, the artist might have borrowed for his ideal of a young Spartan arming for his first battle. Arthur, slight to feebleness, and with the paleness, partly of constitution, partly of gay excess, on his fair and clear complexion, had features far less symmetrical and impressive than his cousin; but what then? All that are bestowed by elegance of dress, the refinements of luxurious habit, the nameless grace that comes from a mind and a manner polished—the one by literary culture, the other by social intercourse—invested the person of the heir with a fascination that rude Nature alone ever fails to give. And about him there was a happy gaiety, an airiness of spirit, an atmosphere of enjoyment, which bespoke one who is in love with life.

"Why, this is lucky! I'm so glad to see you all!" said Arthur Beaufort, with that silver-ringing tone and charming smile which are to the happy spring of man what its music and its sunshine are to the spring of earth. "You must dine with me at Verey's. I want something to rouse me to-day; for I did not get home from the salon till four this morning."

"But you won?"

"Yes, Marsden. Hang it! I always win—I, who could so well afford to lose—I'm quite ashamed of my luck!"

"It is easy to spend what one wins," observed Mr. Marsden, sententiously; "and I see you have been at the jeweller's! A present for Cecile? Well, don't blush, my dear fellow. What is life without women?"

"And wine?" said a second.

"And play?" said a third.

"And wealth?" said a fourth.

"And you enjoy them all! Happy fellow!" said a fifth.

The Outcast pulled his hat over his brows, and walked away.

"This dear Paris!" said Beaufort, as his eye carelessly and unconsciously followed the dark form retreating through the arches; "this dear Paris! I must make the most of it while I stay! I have only been here a few weeks, and next week I must go."

"Pooh! your health is better: you don't look like the same man."

"You think so really? Still I don't know: the doctors say that I must either go to the German waters—the season is begun—or—"

"Or what?"

"Live less with such pleasant companions, my dear fellow! But, as you say, what is life without—"

"Women!"

"Wine!"

"Play!"

"Wealth!"

"Ha! ha! 'Throw physic to the dogs: I'll none of it!'"

And Arthur leaped lightly on his saddle, and, as he rode gaily on, humming the favourite air of the last opera, the hoofs of his horse splashed the mud over a foot-passenger halting at the crossing. Morton checked the fiery exclamation rising to his lips; and, gazing after the brilliant form that hurried on towards the Champs Elysees, his eye caught the statues on the bridge, and a voice, as of a cheering angel, whispered again to his heart, "TIME, FAITH, ENERGY!"

The expression of his countenance grew calm at once; and, as he continued his rambles, it was with a mind that, casting off the burdens of the past, looked serenely and steadily on the obstacles and hardships of the future. We have seen that a scruple of conscience or of pride, not without its nobleness, had made him refuse the importunities of Gawtreys for less sordid raiment; the same feeling made it his custom to avoid sharing the luxurious and dainty food with which Gawtreys was wont to regale himself. For that strange man, whose wonderful felicity of temperament and constitution made him, in all circumstances, keenly alive to the hearty and animal enjoyments of life, would still emerge, as the day declined, from their wretched apartment, and, trusting to his disguises, in which, indeed, he possessed a masterly art, repair to one of the better description of restaurants, and feast away his cares for the moment. William Gawtreys would not have cared three straws for the curse of Damocles. The sword over his head would never have spoiled his appetite. He had lately taken to drinking much more deeply than he had been used to do—the fine intellect of the man was growing thickened and dulled—and this was a spectacle that Morton could not bear to contemplate. Yet so great was Gawtreys's vigour of health, that, after draining wine and spirits enough to have despatched a company of fox-hunters, and after betraying, sometimes in uproarious glee, sometimes in maudlin self-bewailings, that he himself was not quite invulnerable to the thyrus of the god, he would—on any call on his energies, or especially before departing on those mysterious expeditions which kept him from home half, and sometimes all, the night—plunge his head into cold water, drink as much of the lymph as a groom would have shuddered to bestow on a horse, close his eyes in a doze for half an hour, and wake cool, sober, and collected, as if he had lived according to the precepts of Socrates or Cornaro!

But to return to Morton. It was his habit to avoid as much as possible sharing the good cheer of his companion; and now, as he entered the Champs Elysees, he saw a little family, consisting of a young mechanic, his wife, and two children, who, with that love of harmless recreation which yet characterises the French, had taken advantage of a holiday in the craft, and were enjoying their simple meal under the shadow of the trees. Whether in hunger or in envy, Morton paused and contemplated the happy group. Along the road rolled the equipages and trampled the steeds of those to whom all life is a holiday. There was Pleasure—under those trees was Happiness. One of the children, a little boy of about six years old, observing the attitude and gaze of the pausing wayfarer, ran to him, and, holding up a fragment of a coarse kind of gâteau, said to him winningly, "Take it—I have had enough!" The child reminded Morton of his brother; his heart melted within him; he lifted the young Samaritan in his arms, and, as he kissed it, wept.

The mother observed and rose also. She laid her hand on his own: "Poor boy! why do you weep? Can we relieve you?"

Now that bright gleam of human nature, suddenly darting across the sombre recollections and associations of his past life, seemed to Morton as if it came from Heaven, in approval and in blessing of this attempt at reconciliation to his fate.

"I thank you," said he, placing the child on the ground and passing his hand over his eyes, "I thank you—yes! Let me sit down among you." And he sat down, the child by his side, and partook of their fare, and was merry with them—the proud Philip! Had he not begun to discover the "precious jewel" in the "ugly and venomous" adversity?

The mechanic, though a gay fellow on the whole, was not without some of that discontent of his station which is common with his class; he vented it, however, not in murmurs, but in jests. He was satirical on the carriages and the horse-men that passed; and, lolling on the grass, ridiculed his betters at his ease.

"Hush!" said his wife, suddenly; "here comes Madame de Merville;" and, rising as she spoke, she made a respectful inclination of the head towards an open carriage that was passing very slowly towards the town.

"Madame de Merville!" repeated the husband, rising also, and lifting his cap from his head. "Ah! I have nothing to say against her!"

Morton looked instinctively towards the carriage, and saw a fair countenance turned graciously to answer the silent salutations of the mechanic and his wife—a countenance that had long haunted his dreams, though of late it had faded away beneath harsher thoughts—the countenance of the stranger whom he had seen at the bureau of Gawtreys, when that worthy personage had borne a more mellifluous name. He started and changed colour: the lady herself now seemed suddenly to recognise him; for their eyes met, and she bent forward eagerly. She pulled the check string—the carriage halted—she beckoned to the mechanic's wife, who went up to the roadside.

"I worked once for that lady," said the man, with a tone of feeling; "and when my wife fell ill last winter, she paid the doctors. Ah, she is an angel of charity and kindness!"

Morton scarcely heard this eulogium; for he observed, by something eager and inquisitive in the face of Madame de Merville, and the sudden manner in which the mechanic's helpmate turned her head to the spot on which he stood, that he was the object of their conversation. Once more he became suddenly aware of his ragged dress; and with a natural shame—a fear that charity might be extended to him from her—he muttered an abrupt farewell to the operative, and, without another glance at the carriage, walked away.

Before he had got many paces, the wife, however, came up to him, breathless. "Madame de Merville would speak to you, sir!" she said, with more respect than she had hitherto thrown into her manner. Philip paused an instant, and again strode on.

"It must be some mistake," he said, hurriedly: "I have no right to expect such an honour."

He struck across the road, gained the opposite side, and had vanished from Madame de Merville's eyes before the woman regained the carriage. But still that calm, pale, and somewhat melancholy face presented itself before him; and as he walked again through the town, sweet and gentle fancies crowded confusedly on his heart. On that soft summer day—memorable for so many silent but mighty events in that inner life which prepares the catastrophes of the outer one, as in the region of which Virgil has sung, the images of men to be born hereafter repose or glide—on that soft summer day, he felt he had reached the age when Youth begins to clothe in some human shape its first vague ideal of desire and love.

In such thoughts, and still wandering, the day wore away, till he found himself in one of the lanes that surround that glittering microcosm of the vices, the frivolities, the hollow show, and the real beggary of the gay city—the gardens and the galleries of the Palais Royal. Surprised at the lateness of the hour—it was then on the stroke of seven—he was about to return homeward, when the loud voice of Gawtreys sounded behind, and that personage, tapping him on the back, said,

"Hollo, my young friend, well met! This will be a night of trial to you. Empty stomachs produce weak nerves. Come along! you must dine with me. A good dinner and a bottle of old wine—come! nonsense! I say you shall come! Vive la joie!"

While speaking, he had linked his arm in Morton's and hurried him on several paces in spite of his struggles; but, just as the words Vive la joie left his lips, he stood still and mute, as if a thunderbolt had fallen at his feet, and Morton felt that heavy arm shiver and tremble like a leaf. He looked up, and just at the entrance of that part of the Palais Royal in which are situated the restaurants of Verey and Vefour, he saw two men standing but a few paces before them, and gazing full on Gawtreys and himself.

"It is my evil genius," muttered Gawtreys, grinding his teeth.

"And mine!" said Morton.

The younger of the two men thus apostrophized made a step towards Philip, when his companion drew him back and whispered, "What are you about! Do you know that young man?"

"He is my cousin—Philip Beaufort's natural son!"

"Is he? Then discard him for ever. He is with the most dangerous knave in Europe!"

As Lord Lilburne—for it was he—thus whispered his nephew, Gawtreys strode up to him; and, glaring full in his face, said, in a deep and hollow tone, "There is a hell, my lord; I go to drink to our meeting!" Thus saying, he took off his hat with a ceremonious mockery, and disappeared within the adjoining restaurant, kept by Vefour.

"A hell!" said Lilburne, with his frigid smile; "the rogue's head runs upon gambling-houses!"

"And I have suffered Philip again to escape me," said Arthur, in self-reproach; for, while Gawtreys had addressed Lord Lilburne, Morton had plunged back amid the labyrinth of alleys. "How have I kept my oath?"

"Come! your guests must have arrived by this time. As for that wretched young man, depend upon it that he is corrupted, body and soul."

"But he is my own cousin."

"Pooh! there is no relationship in natural children: besides, he will find you out fast enough. Ragged claimants are not long too proud to beg."

"You speak in earnest?" said Arthur, irresolutely.

"Ay! trust my experience of the world. Al-lons!"

And in the very restaurant adjoining that in which the solitary Gawtreys gorged his conscience, Lilburne, Arthur, and their gay friends, soon forgetful of all but the roses of the moment, bathed their airy spirits in the dews of the mirthful wine. Oh, extremes of life! oh, Night! oh, Morning!

CHAPTER IX.

"Meantime a moving scene was open laid,
That lazarus-house."

THOMSON: Castle of Indolence.

It was near midnight. In the mouth of the lane in which Gawtreys resided there stood four men. Not far distant in the broad street at angles with the lane, were heard the wheels of carriages and the sound of music. A lady, fair in form, tender of heart, stainless in repute, was receiving her friends!

"Monsieur Favart," said one of the men to the smallest of the four, "you understand the conditions: 20,000 francs and a free pardon!"

"Nothing more reasonable—it is understood. Still I confess that I should like to have my men close at hand. I am not given to fear; but this is a dangerous experiment."

"You knew the danger beforehand, and subscribed to it; you must enter alone with me, or not at all. Mark you, the men are sworn to murder him who betrays them. Not for twenty times 20,000 francs would I have them know me as the informer. My life were not worth a day's purchase. Now, if you feel secure in your disguise, all is safe. You will have seen them at their work—you will recognise their persons—you can depose against them at the trial—I shall have time to quit France."

"Well, well? as you please."

"Mind, you must wait in the vault with them till they separate. We have so planted your men, that, whatever street each of the gang takes in going home, he can be seized quietly and at once. The bravest and craftiest of all, who, though he has but just joined, is already their captain—him, the man I told you of, who lives in the house, you must take after his return, in his bed. It is the sixth story to the right, remember: here is the key to his door. He is a giant in strength, and will never be taken alive if up and armed."

"Ah, I comprehend! Gilbert!" (and Favart turned to one of the companions who had not yet spoken,) "take three men besides yourself, according to the directions I gave you; the porter will admit you—that's arranged. Make no noise. If I don't return by four o'clock, don't wait for me, but proceed at once. Look well to your primings. Take him alive, if possible—at the worst, dead. And now, mon ami, lead on!"

The traitor nodded, and walked slowly down the street. Favart, pausing, whispered hastily to the man whom he called Gilbert,

"Follow me close—get to the door of the cellar—place the eight men within hearing of my whistle—recollect the picklocks, the axes. If you hear the whistle, break in; if not, I'm safe, and the first orders to seize the captain in his room stand good."

So saying, Favart strode after his guide. The door of a large but ill-favoured looking house stood ajar: they entered—passed unmolested through a courtyard—descended some stairs; the guide unlocked the door of a cellar, and took a dark lantern from under his cloak. As he drew up the slide, the dim light gleamed on barrels and wine-casks, which appeared to fill up the space. Rolling aside one of these, the guide lifted a trapdoor and lowered his lantern. "Enter," said he; and the two men disappeared.

* * * * *

The coiners were at their work. A man, seated on a stool before a desk, was entering accounts in a large book. That man was William Gawtreys. While, with the rapid precision of honest mechanics, the machinery of the dark trade went on in its several departments, apart—alone—at the foot of a long table sat Philip Morton. The truth had exceeded his darkest suspicions. He had consented to take the oath not to divulge what was to be given to his survey; and, when led into that vault, the bandage was taken from his eyes, it was some minutes before he could fully comprehend the desperate and criminal occupations of the wild forms amid which towered the burly stature of his benefactor. As the truth slowly grew upon him, he shrunk from the side of Gawtreys; but, deep compassion for his friend's degradation swallowing up the horror of the trade, he flung himself on one of the rude seats, and felt that the bond between them was indeed broken, and that the next morning he should be again alone in the world. Still, as the obscene jests, the fearful oaths that from time to time rang through the vault, came on his ear, he cast his haughty eye in such disdain over the groups, that Gawtrety, catching it, trembled for his safety; and nothing but the sense of his own impotence, and the brave, not timorous, desire not to perish by such hands, kept silent the fiery denunciations, of a nature still proud and honest, that quivered on his lips. All present were armed with pistols and cutlasses except Morton, who suffered the weapons presented to him to lie unheeded on the table.

"Courage, mes amis!" said Gawtrety, closing his book; "courage!" A few months more, and we shall have made enough to retire upon, and enjoy ourselves for the rest of our days. Where is Birnie?"

"Did he not tell you?" said one of the artisans, looking up. "He has found out the cleverest hand in France—the very fellow who helped Bouchard in all his five-franc pieces. He has promised to bring him to-night."

"Ay, I remember," returned Gawtrety; "he told me this morning; he is a famous decoy!"

"I think so indeed!" quoth a coiner; "for he caught you, the best head to our hands that ever les industriels were blessed with—sacré fichtre!"

"Flatterer!" said Gawtrety, coming from the desk to the table, and pouring out wine from one of the bottles into a huge flagon; "To your healths!"

Here the door slid back, and Birnie glided in.

"Where is your booty, mon brave?" said Gawtrety. "We only coin money; you coin men, stamp with your own seal, and send them current to the devil."

The coiners, who liked Birnie's ability (for the ci-devant engraver was of admirable skill in their craft,) but who hated his joyless manners, laughed at the taunt, which Birnie did not seem to heed except by a malignant gleam of his dead eye.

"If you mean the celebrated coiner, Jacques Giraumont, he waits without. You know our rules—I cannot admit him without leave."

"Bon! we give it, eh, messieurs?" said Gawtrety.

"Ay—ay," cried several voices. "He knows the oath, and will hear the penalty."

"Yes, he knows the oath," replied Birnie, and glided back.

In a moment more he returned with a small man in a mechanic's blouse. The new-comer wore the republican beard and mustache, of a sandy gray; his hair was of the same colour; and a black patch over one eye increased the ill-favoured appearance of his features.

"Diable! Monsieur Giraumont? but you are more like Vulcan than Adonis!" said Gawtrety.

"I don't know any thing about Vulcan, but I know how to make five-franc pieces," said Monsieur Giraumont, doggedly.

"Are you poor?"

"As a church mouse! The only thing belonging to a church, since the Bourbons came back, that is poor!"

At this sally the coiners, who had gathered round the table, uttered the shout with which, in all circumstances, Frenchmen receive a bon mot.

"Humph!" said Mr. Gawtrety. "Who responds, with his own life, for your fidelity?"

"I," said Birnie.

"Administer the oath to him."

Suddenly four men advanced, seized the visitor, and bore him from the vault to another one within. After a few moments they returned.

"He has taken the oath and heard the penalty."

"Death to yourself, your wife, your son, and your grandson, if you betray us!"

"I have neither son nor grandson; as for my wife, Monsieur le Capitaine, you offer a bribe instead of a threat when you talk of her death!"

"Sacré! but you will be an addition to our circle, mon brave!" said Gawtrety, laughing, while again the grim circle shouted applause.

"But I suppose you care for your own life?"

"Otherwise I should have preferred starving to coming here," answered the laconic neophyte.

"I have done with you. Your health?"

On this the coiners gathered round Monsieur Giraumont, shook him by the hand, and commenced many questions with a view to ascertain his skill.

"Show me your coinage first; I see you use both the die and the furnace. Hem! this piece is not bad; you have struck it from an iron die! right—it makes the impression sharper than plaster of Paris. But you take the poorest and the most dangerous part of the trade in taking the Home Market. I can put you in a way to make ten times as much, and with safety! Look at this!" and Monsieur Giraumont took a forged Spanish dollar from his pocket, so skilfully manufactured that the connoisseurs were lost in admiration; "you may pass thousands of these all over Europe except France, and who is ever to detect you? But it will require better machinery than you have here."

Thus conversing, Monsieur Giraumont did not perceive that Mr. Gawtrety had been examining him very curiously and minutely. But Birnie had noted their chief's attention, and once attempted to join his new ally, when Gawtrety laid his hand on his shoulder, and stopped him.

"Do not speak to your friend till I bid you, or—" he stopped short, and touched his pistols.

Birnie grew a shade more pale, but replied with his usual sneer,

"Suspicious! Well, so much the better!" and, seating himself carelessly at the table, lighted his pipe.

"And now, Monsieur Giraumont," said Gawtrety, as he took the head of the table, "Come to my right hand. A half holyday in your honour. Clear these infernal instruments; and more wine, mes amis!"

The party arranged themselves at the table. Among the desperate there is almost invariably a tendency to mirth. A solitary ruffian is moody, but a gang of ruffians are jolly. The coiners talked and laughed loud. Mr. Birnie, from his dogged silence, seemed apart from the rest, though in the centre; and, in a noisy circle, a silent tongue builds a wall round its owner. But that respectable personage kept his furtive watch upon Giraumont and Gawtrety, who appeared talking together very amicably towards the bottom of the table. The younger novice of that night, equally silent, was not less watchful than Birnie. An uneasy, undefinable foreboding had come over him since the entrance of Monsieur Giraumont; this had been increased by the manner of Mr. Gawtrety. His faculty of observation, which was very acute, had detected something false in the chief's blandness to their guest—something dangerous in the glittering eye that Gawtrety ever, as he spoke to Giraumont, bent on that person's lips as he listened to his reply. For, whenever William Gawtrety suspected a man, he watched, not his eyes, but his lips.

Waked from his scornful revery, a strange spell fascinated Morton's attention to the chief and the guest, and he bent forward, with parted mouth and straining ear, to catch their conversation.

"It seems to me a little strange," said Mr. Gawtrety, raising his voice so as to be heard by the party, "that a coiner so dextrous as Monsieur Giraumont should not be known to any of us except our friend Birnie."

"Not at all," replied Giraumont; "I worked only with Bouchard and two others, since sent to the galleys. We were but a small fraternity: everything has its commencement."

"C'est juste: buvez donc, cher ami!"

The wine circulated: Gawtrety began again.

"You have had a bad accident, seemingly, Monsieur Giraumont: how did you lose your eye?"

"In a scuffle with the gens d'armes the night Bouchard was taken and I escaped; such misfortunes are on the cards."

"C'est juste: buvez donc, Monsieur Giraumont!"

Again there was a pause, and again Gawtrety's deep voice was heard.

"You wear a wig, I think, Monsieur Giraumont! To judge by your eyelashes, your own hair has been of a handsomer colour."

"We seek disguise, not beauty, my host! and the police have sharp eyes."

"C'est juste, buvez donc—vieux Réard!—when did we two meet last?"

"Never that I know of!"

"Ce n'est pas vrai! buvez donc, Monsieur FAVART!"

At the sound of that name the company started in dismay and confusion, and the police officer, forgetting himself for the moment, sprang from his seat, and put his right hand into his blouse.

"Ho, there! treason!" cried Gawtrety, in a voice of thunder; and he caught the unhappy man by the throat.

It was the work of a moment. Morton, where he sat, beheld a struggle—he heard a death-cry. He saw the huge form of the master-coiner rising above all the rest, as cutlasses gleamed and eyes sparkled round. He saw the quivering and powerless frame of the unhappy guest raised aloft in those mighty arms, and presently it was hurled along the tables—bottles crashing—the board shaking beneath its weight—and lay before the very eyes of Morton, a distorted and lifeless mass. At the same instant Gawtrety sprang upon the table, his black frown singling out from the group the ashen, cadaverous face of the shrinking traitor. Birnie had darted from the table—he was half way towards the sliding door—his face, turned over his shoulder, met the eyes of the chief.

"Devil!" shouted Gawtrety in his terrible voice, which the echoes of the vault gave back from side to side, "did I not give thee up my soul that thou mightest not compass my death! Hark ye! thus dies my slavery and all our secrets!" The explosion of his pistol half swallowed up the last word, and, with a single groan, the traitor fell on the floor, pierced through the brain; then there was a dead and grim hush, as the smoke rolled slowly along the roof of the dreary vault.

Morton sank back on his seat, and covered his face with his hands. The last seal on the fate of THE MAN OF CRIME was set; the last wave in the terrible and mysterious tide of his destiny had dashed on his soul to the shore whence there is no return. Vain, now and henceforth, the humour, the sentiment, the kindly impulse, the social instincts which had invested that stalwart shape with dangerous fascination, which had im-lied the hope of ultimate repentance, of redemption even in this world. The Hour and the Circumstance had seized their prey; and the self-defence, which a lawless career rendered a necessity, left the eternal die of blood upon his loom!

"Friends, I have saved you," said Gawtreys, lowly gazing on the corpse of his second victim, while he returned the pistol to his belt; "I have not quailed before this man's eye (and he spurned the clay of the officer, as he spoke, with a revengeful scorn) without treasuring up its aspect in my heart of hearts. I knew him when he entered—knew him through his disguise—yet, faith, it was a clever one! Turn up his face and gaze on him now; he will never terrify us again, unless there be truth in ghosts!"

Murmuring and tremulous, the coiners scrambled on the table and examined the dead man. From this task Gawtreys interrupted them, for his quick eye detected, with the pistols under the policeman's blouse, a whistle of metal of curious construction, and he conjectured at once that danger was yet at hand.

"I have saved you, I say, but only for the hour. This deed cannot sleep; see, he had help within call. The police know where to look for their comrade—we are dispersed. Each for himself. Quick, divide the spoils! Sauve qui peut!"

Then Morton heard where he sat, his hands still clasped before his face, a confused hubbub of voices, the jingle of money, the scramble of feet, and the creaking of doors—all was silent!

A strong grasp drew his hands from his eyes.

"Your first scene of life against life," said Gawtreys voice, which seemed fearfully changed to the ear that heard it. "Bah! what would you think of a battle? Come, to our eyrie; the carcasses are gone."

Morton looked fearfully round the vault. He and Gawtreys were alone. His eyes sought the places where the dead had lain—they were removed—no vestige of the deeds, not even a drop of blood.

"Come, take up your cutlass, come!" repeated the voice of the chief, as, with his dim lantern, now the sole light of the vault, he stood in the shadow of the doorway.

Morton rose, took up the weapon mechanically, and followed that terrible guide, mute and unconscious, as a soul follows a dream through the house of Sleep!

CHAPTER X.

"Sleep no more!"—Macbeth.

After winding through gloomy and labyrinthine passages, which conducted to a different range of cellars from those entered by the unfortunate Favart, Gawtreys emerged at the foot of a flight of stairs, which, dark, narrow, and in many places broken, had been probably appropriated to the servants of the house in its days of palmier glory. By these steps the pair regained their attic. Gawtreys placed the lantern on the table, and seated himself in silence. Morton, who had recovered his self-possession and formed his resolution, gazed on him for some moments equally taciturn; at length he spoke:

"Gawtreys?"

"I bade you not call me by that name," said the coiner; for we need scarcely say that in his new trade he had assumed a new appellation.

"It is the least guilty one by which I have known you," returned Morton, firmly. "It is for the last time I call it you! I demanded to see by what means one to whom I had intrusted my fate supported himself. I have seen," continued the young man, still firmly, but with a livid cheek and lip, "and the tie between us is rent for ever. Interrupt me not! It is not for me to blame you. I have eaten of your bread and drank of your cup. Confiding in you too blindly, and believing that you were at least free from those dark and terrible crimes for which there is no expiation, at least in this life—my conscience seared by distress, my very soul made dormant by despair—I surrendered myself to one leading a career equivocal, suspicious, dishonourable perhaps, but still not, as I believed, of atrocity and bloodshed. I wake at the brink of the abyss; my mother's hand beckons to me from the grave; I think I hear her voice while I address you; I recede while it is yet time—we part, and for ever!"

Gawtreys, whose stormy passion was still deep upon his soul, had listened hitherto in sullen and dogged silence, with a gloomy frown on his knitted brow; he now rose with an oath:

"Part! that I may let loose on the world a new traitor! Part! when you have seen me fresh from an act that, once whispered, gives me to the guillotine! Part! never—at least alive!"

"I have said it," said Morton, folding his arms calmly; "I say it to your face, though I might part from you in secret. Frown not on me, man of blood! I am fearless as yourself! In another minute I am gone."

"Ah! is it so?" said Gawtreys; and, glancing round the room, which contained two doors—the one, concealed by the draperies of a bed, communicating with the stairs by which they had entered, the other with the landing of the principal and common flight—he turned to the former, within his reach, which he locked, and put the key into his pocket; and then, throwing across the latter a heavy swing bar, which fell into its socket with a harsh noise, before the threshold he placed his vast bulk, and bust into a loud, fierce laugh:

"Ho! ho! slave and fool, once mine, you were mine, body and soul, for ever!"

"Tempter, I defy you! stand back!" And, firm and dauntless, Morton laid his hand on the giant's vest.

Gawtreys seemed more astonished than enraged. He looked hard at his daring associate, on whose lip the dawn was yet scarcely dark.

"Boy," said he, "off! Do not rouse the devil in me again! I could crush you with a hug."

"My soul supports my body, and I am armed," said Morton, laying his hand on his cutlass. "But you dare not harm me, nor I you; blood-stained as you are, I yet love you! You gave me shelter and bread, but accuse me not that I will save my soul while it is yet time! Shall my mother have blessed me in vain upon her death-bed?"

Gawtreys drew back, and Morton, by a sudden impulse, grasped his hand.

"Oh! hear me—hear me!" he cried, with great emotion. "Abandon this horrible career; you have been decoyed and betrayed to it by one who can deceive or terrify you no more! Abandon it, and I will never desert you! For her sake—for your Fanny's sake—pause, like me, before the gulf swallow us. Let us fly! far to the New World—to any land where our thews and sinews, our stout hands and hearts, can find an honest mart. Men, desperate as we are, have yet risen by honest means. Take her, your orphan, with us. We will work for her, both of us. Gawtreys! hear me. It is not my voice that speaks to you—it is your good angel's!"

Gawtreys fell back against the wall, and his chest heaved.

"Morton," he said, with choked and tremulous accents, "go, now; leave me to my fate! I have sinned against you—shamefully sinned. It seemed to me so sweet to have a friend; in your youth and character of mind there was so much about which the tough strings of my heart wound themselves, that I could not bear to lose you—to suffer you to know me for what I was. I blinded—I deceived you as to my past deeds; that was base in me: but I swore to my own heart to keep you unexposed to every danger, and free from every vice that darkened my own path. I kept that oath till this night, when, seeing that you began to recoil from me, and dreading that you should desert me, I thought to bind you to me for ever by implicating you in this fellowship of crime. I am punished, and justly. Go, I repeat; leave me to the fate that strides nearer and nearer to me day by day. You are a boy still—I am no longer young. Habit is a second nature. Still—still I could repent—I could begin life again! But repose! to look back—to remember—to be haunted night and day with deeds that shall meet me boldly and face to face on the last day—"

"Add not to the spectres! Come—fly this night—this hour!"

Gawtreys paused, irresolute and wavering, when at that moment he heard steps on the stairs below. He started—as starts the boar caught in his lair—and listened, pale and breathless.

"Hush! they are on us! they come!" as he whispered, the key from without turned in the wards—the door shook. "Soft! the bar preserves us both—this way." And the coiner crept to the door of the private stairs. He unlocked and opened it cautiously. A man sprang through the aperture.

"Yield! you are my prisoner!"

"Never!" cried Gawtreys, hurling back the intruder, and clapping to the door, though other and stout men were pressing against it with all their power.

"Ho! ho! Who shall open the tiger's cage?"

At both doors now were heard the sound of voices. "Open in the king's name, or expect no mercy!"

"Hist!" said Gawtreys. "One way yet—the window—the rope."

Morton opened the casement, Gawtreys uncoiled the rope. The dawn was breaking; it was light in the streets, but all seemed quiet without. The door reeled and shook beneath the pressure of the pursuers. Gawtreys flung the rope across the street to the opposite parapet; after two or three efforts, the grappling-hook caught firm hold—the perilous path was made.

"On! quick! loiter not!" whispered Gawtreys; "You are active—it seems more dangerous than it is—cling with both hands—shut your eyes. When on the other side—you see the window of Birnie's room—enter it—descend the stairs—let yourself out, and you are safe."

"Go first," said Morton, in the same tone; "I will not leave you now; you will be longer getting across than I shall. I will keep guard till you are over."

"Hark! hark! are you mad? You keep guard! What is your strength to mine? Twenty men shall not move that door while my weight is against it. Quick, or you destroy us both! Besides, you will hold the rope for me; it may not be strong enough for my bulk of itself. Stay! stay one moment. If you escape, and I fall—Fanny—my father, he will take care of her—you remember—thanks! Forgive me all! Go—that's right."

With a firm pulse, Morton threw himself on that dreadful bridge; it swung and crackled at his weight. Shifting his grasp rapidly—holding his breath—with set teeth—with closed eyes—he moved on—he gained the parapet—he stood safe on the opposite side. And now, straining his eyes across, he saw through the open casement into the chamber he had just quitted. Gawtreys was still standing against the door to the principal staircase, for that, of the two, was the weaker and the more assailed. Presently the explosion of a firearm was heard; they had shot through the panel. Gawtreys seemed wounded, for he staggered forward, and uttered a fierce cry; a moment more he gained the window—he seized the rope—he hung over the tremendous depth! Morton knelt by the parapet, holding the grappling-hook in its place with convulsive grasp, and fixing his eyes, bloodshot with fear and suspense, on the huge bulk that clung for life to that slender cord!"

"Le voilà! le voilà!" cried a voice from the opposite side. Morton raised his gaze from Gawtreys—the casement was darkened by the forms of the pursuers—they had burst into the room—an officer sprung upon the parapet; and Gawtreys, now aware of his danger, opened his eyes, and, as he moved on, glared upon the foe. The policeman deliberately raised his pistol—Gawtreys arrested himself—from a wound in his side the blood trickled slowly and darkly down, drop by drop, upon the stones below; even the officers of law shuddered as they eyed him: his hair bristling, his cheek white, his lips drawn convulsively from his teeth, and his eyes glaring from beneath the frown of agony and menace in which yet spoke the indomitable power and fierceness of the man. His look, so fixed, so intense, so stern, awed the policeman; his hand trembled as he fired, and the ball struck the parapet an inch below the spot where Morton knelt. An indistinct, wild, gurgling sound—half laugh, half yell—of scorn and glee, broke from Gawtreys's lips. He swung himself on—near—near—nearer—a yard from the parapet.

"You are saved!" cried Morton; when at that moment a volley burst from the fatal casement—the smoke rolled over both the fugitives—a groan, or, rather, howl of rage, and despair, and agony, appalled even the hardest on whose ear it came. Morton sprang to his feet, and looked below. He saw on the rugged stones, far down, a dark, formless, motionless mass—the strong man of passion and levity—the giant who had played with life and soul, as an infant with the bawbles that it prizes and breaks—was what the Cæsar and the leper alike are when all clay is without God's breath—what glory, genius, power and beauty would be for ever and ever if there were no God!

"There is another!" cried the voice of one of the pursuers. "Fire!"

"Poor Gawtreys!" muttered Philip, "I will fulfil your last wish;" and, scarcely conscious of the bullet that whistled past him, he disappeared behind the parapet.

CHAPTER XI.

"Gently moved
By the soft wind of whispering silks."—DECKER.

The reader may remember, that while Monsieur Favart and Mr. Birnie were holding commune in the lane, the sounds of festivity were heard from a house in the adjoining street. To that house we are now summoned.

At Paris, the gaieties of balls or soirees are, I believe, very rare in that period of the year in which they are most frequent in London. The entertainment now given was in honour of a christening: the lady who gave it, a relation of the newborn.

Madame de Merville was a young widow; even before her marriage she had been distinguished in literature; she had written poems of more than common excellence; and, being handsome, of good family, and large fortune, her talents made her an object of more interest than they might otherwise have done. Her poetry showed great sensibility and tenderness. If poetry be any index to the heart, you would have thought her one to love truly and deeply. Nevertheless, since she married—as girls in France do—not to please herself, but her parents, she made a mariage de convenance. Monsieur de Merville was a sober, sensible man, past middle age. Not being fond of poetry, and by no means coveting a professional author for his wife, he had, during their union, which lasted four years, discouraged his wife's liaison with Apollo. But her mind, active and ardent, did not the less prey upon itself. At the age of four-and-twenty she became a widow, with an income large even in England for a single woman, and at Paris constituting no ordinary fortune. Madame de Merville, however, though a person of elegant taste, was neither ostentatious nor selfish. She had no children, and she lived quietly in apartments, handsome indeed, but not more than adequate to the small establishment which—where, as on the Continent, the costly convenience of an entire house is not incurred—sufficed for her retinue. She devoted at least half her income, which was entirely at her own disposal, partly to the aid of her own relations, who were not rich, and partly to the encouragement of the literature she cultivated. Although she shrunk from the ordeal of publication, her poems and sketches of romance were read to her own friends, and possessed an eloquence seldom accompanied with so much modesty. Thus, her reputation, though not blown about by the winds, was high in her own circle, and her position in fashion and in fortune made her looked up to by her relations as the head of her family; they regarded her as femme supérieure, and her advice with them was equivalent to a command. Eugénie de Merville was a strange mixture of qualities at once feminine and masculine. On the one hand, she had a strong will, independent views, some contempt for the world, and followed her own inclinations without servility to the opinion of others; on the other hand, she was susceptible, romantic, of a sweet, affectionate, kind disposition. Her visit to Mr. Love, however indiscreet, was not less in accordance with her character than her charity to the mechanic's wife; masculine and careless where an eccentric thing was to be done—curiosity satisfied, or some object in female diplomacy achieved—womanly, delicate, and gentle, the instant her benevolence was appealed to or her heart touched. She had now been three years a widow, and was, consequently, at the age of twenty-seven. Despite the tenderness of her poetry and her character, her reputation was unblemished. She had never been in love. People who are much occupied do not fall in love easily; besides, Madame de Merville was refining, exacting, and wished to find heroes where she only met handsome dandies or ugly authors. Moreover, Eugénie was both a vain and a proud person: vain of her celebrity, and proud of her birth. She was one whose goodness of heart made her always active in promoting the happiness of others. She was not only generous and charitable, but willing to serve people by good offices as well as money. Everybody loved her. The newborn infant, to whose addition to the Christian community the fête of this night was dedicated, was the pledge of a union which Madame de Merville had managed to effect between two young persons, first cousins to each other, and related to herself. There had been scruples of parents to remove—money matters to adjust: Eugénie had smoothed all. The husband and wife, still lovers, looked up to her as the author, under Heaven, of their happiness.

The gala of that night had been, therefore, of a nature more than usually pleasurable, and the mirth did not sound hollow, but rung from the heart. Yet, as Eugénie from time to time contemplated the young couple, whose eyes ever sought each other—so fair, so tender, and so joyous as they seemed—a melancholy shadow darkened her brow, and she sighed involuntarily. Once the young wife, Madame d'Anville, approaching her timidly, said,

"Ah! my sweet cousin, when shall we see you as happy as ourselves? There is such happiness," she added, innocently, and with a blush, "in being a mother!—that little life all one's own—it is something to think of every hour!"

"Perhaps," said Eugénie, smiling, and seeking to turn the conversation from a subject that touched too nearly upon feelings and thoughts her pride did not wish to reveal; "perhaps it is you, then, who have made our cousin, poor Monsieur de Vaudemont, so determined to marry? Pray, be more cautious with him. How difficult I have found it to prevent his bringing into our family some one to make us all ridiculous!"

"True," said Madame d'Anville, laughing. "But then the chevalier is so poor, and in debt. He would fall in love, not with the demoiselle, but the dowry. A propos of that, how cleverly you took advantage of his boastful confession to break off his liaisons with that bureau de mariage."

"Yes; I congratulate myself on that manoeuvre. Unpleasant as it was to go to such a place (for, of course, I could not send for Monsieur Love here), it would have been still more unpleasant to have received such a Madame de Vaudemont as our cousin would have presented to us. Only think—he was the rival of an épicier! I had heard that there was some curious dénoûment to the farce of that establishment; but I could never get from Vaudemont the particulars. He was ashamed of them, I fancy."

"What droll professions there are in Paris!" said Madame d'Anville: "as if people could not marry without going to an office for a spouse, as we go for a servant! And so the establishment is broken up? And you never saw again that dark, wild-looking boy who so struck your fancy, that you have taken him as the original for the Murillo sketch of the youth in that charming tale you read to us the other evening. Ah! cousin, I think you were a little taken with him; the bureau de mariage had its allurements for you as well as for our poor cousin!" The young mother said this laughingly and carelessly.

"Pooh!" returned Madame de Merville, laughing also; but a slight blush broke over her natural paleness. "But à propos of the vicomte. You know how cruelly he has behaved to that poor boy of his by his English wife—never seen him since he was an infant—kept him at some school in England—and all because his vanity does not like the world to know that he has a son of nineteen! Well, I have induced him to recall this poor youth."

"Indeed! and how?"

"Why," said Eugenie, with a smile, "he wanted a loan, poor man, and I could therefore impose conditions by way of interest. But I also managed to conciliate him to the proposition by representing that, if the young man were good-looking, he might himself, with our connections, &c. form an advantageous marriage; and that, in such a case, if the father treated him now justly and kindly, he would naturally partake with the father whatever benefits the marriage might confer."

"Ah! you are an excellent diplomatist, Eugenie; and you turn people's heads by always acting from your heart. Hush, here comes the vicomte!"

"A delightful ball!" said Monsieur de Vaudemont, approaching the ladies. "Pray, has that young lady yonder, in the pink dress, any fortune? She is pretty, eh? you observe she is looking at me—I mean, at us!"

"My dear cousin, what a compliment you pay to marriage. You have had two wives, and you are ever on the qui vive for a third!"

"What would you have me do? we cannot resist the overtures of your bewitching sex. Hum—what fortune has she?"

"Not a sou; besides, she is engaged."

"Oh! now I look at her, she is not pretty—not at all. I made a mistake. I did not mean her. I meant the young lady in blue."

"Worse and worse! she is married already. Shall I present you?"

"Ah, Monsieur de Vaudemont," said Madame d'Anville, "have you found out a new bureau de mariage?"

The vicomte pretended not to hear that question. But, turning to Eugenie, took her aside, and said, with an air in which he endeavoured to throw a great deal of sorrow, "You know, my dear cousin, that, to oblige you, I consented to send for my son, though, as I always said, it is very unpleasant for a man like me, in the prime of life, to hawk about a great boy of nineteen or twenty. People soon say, 'Old Vaudemont and young Vaudemont.' However, a father's feelings are never appealed to in vain." (Here the vicomte put his handkerchief to his eyes, and, after a pause, continued), "I sent for him—I even went to your old bonne, Madame Dufour, to make a bargain for her lodgings, and this day, guess my grief, I received a letter sealed with black. My son is dead!—a sudden fever—it is shocking!"

"Horrible! dead! your own son, whom you hardly ever saw—never since he was an infant!"

"Yes, that softens the blow very much. And now you see I must marry. If the boy had been good-looking, and like me, and so forth, why, as you observed, he might have made a good match, and allowed me a certain sum, or we could all have lived together."

"And your son is dead, and you come to a ball!"

"Je suis philosophe," said the vicomte, shrugging his shoulders. "And, as you say, I never saw him. It saves me 700 francs a year. Don't say a word to any one; I sha'n't give out that he is dead, poor fellow! Pray be discreet: you see there are some ill-natured people who might think it odd I do not shut myself up. I can wait till Paris is quite empty. It would be a pity to lose any opportunity at present, for now, you see, I must marry!" And the philosophe sauntered away.

CHAPTER XII.

"Guinear. Those devotions I am to pay
Are written in my heart, not in this book."

Enter RUTILIO.

I am pursued—all the ports are stopp'd too;
Not any hope to escape: behind, before me,
On either side, I am beset."

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER: The Custom of the Country.

The party were just gone—it was already the peep of day—the wheels of the last carriage had died in the distance.

Madame de Merville had dismissed her woman, and was seated in her own room leaning her head musingly on her hand.

Beside her was the table that held her MSS. and a few books, amid which were scattered vases of flowers. On a pedestal beneath the window was placed a marble bust of Dante. Through the open door were seen in perspective the rooms just deserted by her guests; the lights still burned in the chandeliers and girandoles, contending with the daylight that came through the half-closed curtains. The person of the inmate was in harmony with the apartment. It was characterised by a certain grace, which, for want of a better epithet, writers are prone to call classical or antique. Her complexion, seeming paler than usual by that light, was yet soft and delicate; the features well cut, but small and womanly. About the face there was that rarest of all charms, the combination of intellect with sweetness; the eyes, of a dark blue, were thoughtful, perhaps melancholy in their expression; but the long dark lashes, and the shape of the eyes themselves, more long than full, gave to their intelligence a softness approaching to languor, increased, perhaps, by that slight shadow round and below the orbs which is common with those who have tasked too much either the mind or the heart. The contour of the face, without being sharp or angular, had yet lost a little of the roundness of earlier youth; and the hand on which she leaned was, perhaps, even too white, too delicate, for the beauty which belongs to health; but the throat and bust were of exquisite symmetry.

"I am not happy," murmured Eugenie to herself, "yet I scarce know why. Is it really as we women of romance have said, till the saying is worn threadbare, that the destiny of women is not fame, but love? Strange, then, that while I have so often pictured what love should be, I have never felt it. And now—and now," she continued, half rising, and with a natural pang, "now I am no longer in my first youth. If I loved, should I be loved again? How happy that young pair seemed—they are never alone!"

At this moment, at a distance, was heard the report of firearms—again! Eugenie started, and called to her servant, who, with a waiter hired for the night, was engaged in removing, and nibbling as he removed, the remains of the feast. "What is that, at this hour? Open the window and look out!"

"I can see nothing, madame!"

"Again! this is the third time. Go into the street and look; some one must be in danger."

The servant and the waiter, both curious, and not willing to part company, ran down the stairs, and thence into the street.

Meanwhile Morton, after vainly attempting Birnie's window, which the traitor had previously locked and barred against the escape of his intended victim, crept rapidly along the roof, screened by the parapet not only from the shot, but the sight of the foe. But just as he gained the point at which the lane made an angle with the broad street it adjoined, he cast his eyes over the parapet, and perceived that one of the officers had ventured himself to the fearful bridge: he was pursued; detection and capture seemed inevitable. He paused and breathed hard. He, once the heir to such fortunes, the darling of such affections! he, the hunted accomplice of a gang of miscreants! That was the thought that paralysed; the disgrace, not the danger. But he was in advance of the pursuer; he hastened on—he turned the angle—he heard a shout behind from the opposite side—the officer had passed the bridge: "It is but one man as yet," thought he, and his nostrils dilated and his hands clinched as he glided on, glancing at each casement as he passed.

Now, as youth and vigour thus struggled against Law for life, near at hand Death was busy with toil and disease.

In a miserable grabat or garret, a mechanic, yet young, and stricken by a lingering malady, contracted by the labour of his occupation, was slowly passing from that world in which, for the mass of inhabitants, the curse of Cain is everlastingly at work. Now this man had married for love, and his wife had loved him; and it was the cares of that early marriage that had consumed him to the bone. But extreme want, if long continued, eats up love when it has nothing else to eat. And when people are very long dying, the people they fret and trouble begin to think of that too often hypocritical prettiness of phrase called "a happy release." So the worn-out and half-famished wife did not care three straws for the dying husband whom, a year or two ago, she had vowed to love and cherish in sickness and in health. But still she seemed to care, for she moaned, and pined, and wept as the man's breath grew fainter and fainter.

"Ah, Jean!" said she, sobbing, "what will become of me, a poor lone widow, with nobody to work for my bread?" And with that thought she took on worse than before.

"I am stifling," said the dying man, rolling round his ghastly eyes. "How hot it is? Open the window; I should like to see the light—daylight once again."

"Mon Dieu! what whims he has, poor man!" muttered the woman, without stirring.

The poor wretch put his skeleton hand out and clutched his wife's arm.

"I sha'n't trouble you long, Marie! Air—air!"

"Jean, you will make yourself worse; besides, I shall catch my death of cold. I have scarce a rag on, but I will just open the door."

"Pardon me," groaned the sufferer; "leave me, then."

Poor fellow! perhaps at that moment the thought of unkindness was sharper than the sharp cough which brought blood at every paroxysm. He did not like her so near him, but he did not blame her. Again, I say, poor fellow!

The woman opened the door, went to the other side of the room, and sat down on an old box and began darning an old neck-handkerchief. The silence was soon broken by the moans of the fast dying man, and again he muttered, as he tossed to and fro, with baked white lips,

"Je m'étouffe! Air!"

There was no resisting that prayer, it seemed so like the last. The wife laid down the needle, put the handkerchief round her throat, and opened the window.

"Do you feel easier now?"

"Bless you, Marie—yes; that's good—good. It puts me in mind of old days, that breath of air, before we came to Paris. I wish I could work for you now, Marie."

"Jean! my poor Jean!" said the woman; and the words and the voice took back her hardening heart to the fresh fields and tender thoughts of the past time. And she walked up to the bed, and he leaned his temples, damp with livid dews, upon her breast.

"I have been a sad burden to you, Marie: we should not have married so soon; but I thought I was stronger. Don't cry; we have no little ones, thank God. It will be much better for you when I'm gone."

And so word after word gasped out: he stopped suddenly, and seemed to fall asleep.

The wife then attempted gently to lay him once more on his pillow—the head fell back heavily—the jaw had dropped—the teeth were set—the eyes were open, and like stone—the truth broke on her!

"Jean—Jean! My God, he is dead! and I was unkind to him at the last!" With these words she fell upon the corpse, happily herself insensible.

Just at that moment a human face peered in at the window. Through that aperture, after a moment's pause, a young man leaped lightly into the room. He looked round with a hurried glance, but scarcely noticed the forms stretched on the pallet. It was enough for him that they seemed to sleep, and saw him not. He stole across the room, the door of which Marie had, it will be recollected, left open, and descended the stairs. He had almost gained the courtyard into which the stairs conducted, when he heard voices below by the porter's lodge.

"The police have discovered a gang of coiners!"

"Coiners?"

"Yes; one has been shot dead! I have seen his body in the kennel; another has fled along the roofs—a desperate fellow! We are to watch for him. Let us go up stairs, and get on the roof and look out."

By the hum of approval that followed this proposition, Morton judged rightly that it had been addressed to several persons whom curiosity and the explosion of the pistols had drawn from their beds, and who were grouped round the porter's lodge. What was to be done? To advance was impossible: was there yet time to retreat! It was, at least, the only course left him; he sprang back up the stairs; he had just gained the first flight when he heard steps descending; then, suddenly, it flashed across him that he had left open the window above; that, doubtless, by that imprudent oversight the officer in pursuit had detected a clew to the path he had taken. What was to be done? die as Gawtreys had done! death rather than the galleys. As he thus resolved, he saw to the right the open door of an apartment in which lights still glimmered in their sockets. It seemed deserted; he entered boldly and at once, closing the door after him. Wines and viands still left on the table—gilded mirrors, reflecting the stern face of the solitary intruder—here and there an artificial flower—a knot of riband on the floor—all betokening the gaieties of luxurious life—the dance, the revel, the feast—all this in one apartment! Above, in the same house, the pallet, the corpse, the widow—famine and woe! Such is a great city! such, above all, is Paris! where, under the same roof, are gathered such antagonist features of the social state! Nothing strange in this; but what was strange and sad was, that so little do people thus neighbours know of each other, that the owner of those rooms had a heart soft to every distress, but she did not know the distress so close at hand. The music that had charmed her guests had mounted gaily to the vexed ears of agony and hunger. Morton passed the first room—a second—he came to a third; and Eugénie de Merville, looking up at that instant, saw before her an apparition that might well have alarmed the boldest. His head was uncovered; his dark hair shadowed in wild and disorderly profusion the pale face and features, beautiful, indeed, but at that moment of the beauty which an artist would impart to a young gladiator—stamped with defiance, menace, and despair. The disordered garb—the fierce aspect—the dark eyes, that literally shone through the shadows of the room, all conspired to increase the terror of so abrupt a presence.

"What are you? What do you seek here?" said she, faltering, placing her hand on the bell as she spoke.

Upon that soft hand Morton laid his own.

"I seek my life! I am pursued! I am at your mercy! I am innocent! Can you save me?"

As he spoke, the door of the outer room beyond was heard to open, and steps and voices were at hand.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, recoiling as he recognised her face. "And is it to you that I have fled!"

Eugénie also recognised the stranger; and there was something in their relative positions—the suppliant, the protectress—that excited both her imagination and her pity. A slight colour mantled to her cheeks—her look was gentle and compassionate.

"Poor boy! so young!" she said. "Hush!"

She withdrew her hand from his, retired a few steps, lifted a curtain drawn across a recess, and, pointing to an alcove that contained one of those sofa-beds common in French houses, added, in a whisper,

"Enter—you are saved."

Morton obeyed, and Eugénie replaced the curtain.

CHAPTER XIII.

Guimar. Speak! What are you?
Rutilio. Gracious woman, hear me. I am a stranger;
And in that I answer all demands.
Custom of the Country.

Eugénie replaced the curtain. And scarcely had she done so, ere the steps in the outer room entered the chamber where she stood. Her servant was accompanied by two officers of the police.

"Pardon, madame," said one of the latter; "but we are in pursuit of a criminal. We think he must have entered this house through a window above while your servant was in the street. Permit us to search?"

"Without doubt," answered Eugénie, seating herself. "If he has entered, look in the other apartments. I have not quitted this room."

"You are right. Accept our apologies."

And the officers turned back to examine every corner where the fugitive was not. For, in that, the scouts of justice resembled their mistress: when does man's justice look to the right place?

The servant lingered to repeat the tale he had heard—the sight he had seen. When, at that instant, he saw the curtain of the alcove slightly stirred. He uttered an exclamation—sprung to the bed—his hand touched the curtain—Eugénie seized his arm. She did not speak; but, as he turned his eyes to her, astonished, he saw that her cheek was as white as marble.

"Madame," he said, hesitating, "there is some one hid in the recess."

"There is! Be silent!"

A suspicion flashed across the servant's mind. The pure, the proud, the immaculate Eugénie!

"There is! and in madame's chamber!" he faltered, unconsciously.

Eugénie's quick apprehension seized the foul thought. Her eyes flashed—her cheeks crimsoned. But her lofty and generous nature conquered even the indignant and scornful burst that rushed to her lips. The truth!—could she trust the man? A doubt—and the charge of the human life rendered to her might be betrayed. Her colour fell—tears gushed to her eyes.

"I have been kind to you, Francois. Not a word!"

"Madame, confide in me: it is enough," said the Frenchman, bowing, and with a slight smile on his lips; and he drew back respectfully.

One of the police-officers re-entered.

"We have done, madame: he is not here. Aha! that curtain!"

"It is madame's bed," said Francois. "But I have looked behind."

"I am most sorry to have disarranged you," said the policeman, satisfied with the answer; "but we shall have him yet." And he retired.

The last footsteps died away, the last door of the apartments closed behind the officers, and Eugénie and her servant stood alone, gazing on each other.

"You may retire," said she, at last; and, taking her purse from the table, she placed it in his hands.

The man took it, with a significant look.

"Madame may depend on my discretion."

Eugénie was alone again. Those words rang in her ear—Eugénie de Merville dependant on the discretion of her lackey! She sank into her chair, and, her excitement succeeded by exhaustion, leaned her face on her hands and burst into tears. She was aroused by a low voice; she looked up, and the young man was kneeling at her feet.

"Go—go!" she said; "I have done for you all I can. You heard—you heard—my own hireling, too! At the hazard of my own good name you are saved. Go!"

"Of your good name!" for Eugénie forgot that it was looks, not words, that had so wrung her pride. "Your good name!" he repeated; and, glancing round the room—the toilet, the curtain, the recess he had quitted—all that bespoke that chastest sanctuary of a chaste woman, which for a stranger to enter is, as it were, to profane—her meaning broke on him. "Your good name! your hireling! No, madame, no!" And, as he spoke, he rose to his feet. "Not for me that sacrifice! Your humanity shall not cost you so dear. Ho, there! I am the man you seek." And he strode to the door.

Eugenie was penetrated with the answer. She sprang to him—she grasped his garments.

"Hush! hush! for mercy's sake! What would you do? Think you I could ever be happy again if the confidence you placed in me were betrayed? Be calm—be still. I knew not what I said. It will be easy to undeceive the man—later—when you are saved. And you are innocent—are you not?"

"Oh, madame," said Morton, "from my soul I say it, I am innocent—not of poverty—wretchedness—error—shame—I am innocent of crime. May Heaven bless you!" And, as he reverently kissed the hand laid on his arm, there was something in his voice so touching, in his manner something so above his fortunes, that Eugenie was lost in her feelings of compassion, surprise, and something, it might be, of admiration in her wonder.

"And oh!" he said, passionately, gazing on her with his dark, brilliant eyes, liquid with emotion, "you have made my life sweet in saving it. You—you—of whom, ever since the first time—almost the sole time—I beheld you, I have often mused and dreamed. Henceforth, whatever befall me, there will be some recollections that will—that—"

He stopped short, for his heart was too full for words; and the silence said more to Eugenie than if all the eloquence of Rousseau had glowed upon his tongue.

"And who and what are you?" she asked, after a pause.

"An exile—an orphan—an outcast! I have no name! Farewell!"

"No—stay yet—the danger is not past. Wait till my servant is gone to rest; I hear him yet. Sit down—sit down. And whither would you go?"

"I know not."

"Have you no friends?"

"None."

"No home?"

"None."

"And the police of Paris so vigilant!" cried Eugenie, wringing her hands. "What is to be done? I shall have saved you in vain—you will be discovered! Of what do they charge you? Not robbery—not—"

And she, too, stopped short, for she did not dare to breathe the black word "Murder."

"I know not," said Morton, putting his hand to his forehead, "except of being friends with the only man who befriended me—and they have killed him!"

"Another time you shall tell me all."

"Another time!" he exclaimed, eagerly; "shall I see you again?"

Eugenie blushed beneath the gaze and the voice of joy.

"Yes," she said, "yes. But I must reflect. Be calm—be silent. Ah! a happy thought!"

She sat down, wrote a hasty line, sealed, and gave it to Morton.

"Take this note, as addressed, to Madame Dufour; it will provide you with a safe lodging. She is a person I can depend on: an old servant who lived with my mother, and to whom I have given a small pension. She has a lodging—it is lately vacant—I promised to procure her a tenant. Go: say nothing of what has passed. I will see her, and arrange all. Wait! hark! all is still! I will go first, and see that no one watches you. Stop" (and she threw open the window and looked into the court). "The porter's door is open—that is fortunate! Hurry on, and God be with you!"

In a few minutes Morton was in the streets. It was still early—the thoroughfares deserted—none of the shops yet open. The address on the note was to a street at some distance, on the other side the Seine. He passed along the same Quai which he had trodden but few hours since; he passed the same splendid bridge on which he had stood despairing to quit it, revived; he gained the Rue Faubourg St. Honore. A young man in a cabriolet, on whose fair cheek burned the hectic of late vigils and lavish dissipation, was rolling leisurely home from the gaming-house, at which he had been more than usually fortunate—his pockets were laden with notes and gold. He bent forward as Morton passed him. Philip, absorbed in his reverie, perceived him not, and continued his way. The gentleman turned down one of the streets to the left, stopped and called to the servant dozing behind his cabriolet.

"Follow that passenger! quietly—see where he lodges—be sure to find out and let me know. I shall go home without you." With that he drove on.

Philip, unconscious of the espionage, arrived at a small house in a quiet but respectable street, and rang the bell several times before at last he was admitted by Madame Dufour herself, in her nightcap. The old woman looked askant and alarmed at the unexpected apparition. But the note seemed at once to satisfy her. She conducted him to an apartment on the first floor—small, but neatly and even elegantly furnished—consisting of a sitting-room and a bedchamber, and said quietly,

"Will they suit monsieur?"

To monsieur they seemed a palace. Morton nodded assent.

"And will monsieur sleep for a short time?"

"Yes."

"The bed is well aired. The rooms have only been vacant three days since. Can I get you any thing till your luggage arrives?"

"No."

The woman left him. He threw off his clothes, flung himself on the bed, and did not wake till noon.

When his eyes unclosed—when they rested on that calm chamber, with its air of health, and cleanliness, and comfort, it was long before he could convince himself that he was yet awake. He missed the loud, deep voice of Gawtreys—the smoke of the dead man's meerschaum—the gloomy garret—the distained walls—the stealthy whisper of the loathed Birnie; slowly the life led, and the life gone within the last twelve hours, grew upon his struggling memory. He groaned, and turned uneasily round, when the door slightly opened, and he sprang up fiercely,

"Who is there?"

"It is only I, sir," answered Madame Dufour. "I have been in three times to see if you were stirring. There is a letter I believe for you, sir, though there is no name to it;" and she laid the letter on the chair beside him. Did it come from her—the saving angel? He seized it. The cover was blank; it was sealed with a small device, as of a ring seal. He tore it open, and found four billets de banque for 1000 francs each: a sum equivalent in our money to about £160.

"Who sent this: the—the lady from I whom brought the note?"

"Madame de Merville? Certainly not, sir," said Madame Dufour, who, with the privilege of age, was now unscrupulously filling the water-jugs and settling the toilet table. "A young man called about two hours after you had gone to bed; and, describing you, inquired if you lodged here, and what your name was. I said you had just arrived, and that I did not yet know your name. So he went away, and came again half an hour afterward with this letter, which he charged me to deliver to you safely."

"A young man—a gentleman?"

"No, sir; he seemed a smart but common sort of lad." For the unsophisticated Madame Dufour did not discover in the plain black frock and drab gaiters of the bearer of that letter the simple livery of an English gentleman's groom.

Whom could it come from, if not from Madame de Merville? Perhaps one of Gawtreys's late friends. A suspicion of Arthur Beaufort crossed him, but he indignantly dismissed it. Men are seldom credulous of what they are unwilling to believe! What kindness had the Beauforts hitherto shown him? Left his mother to perish broken-hearted—stolen from him his brother, and steeled in that brother the only heart wherein he had a right to look for gratitude and love! No, it must be Madame de Merville. He dismissed Madame Dufour for pen and paper—rose—wrote a letter to Eugenie, grateful, but proud, and enclosed the notes. He then summoned Madame Dufour, and sent her with his despatch.

"Ah, madame!" said the ci-devant bonne, when she found herself in Eugenie's presence. "The poor lad! how handsome he is, and how shameful in the vicomte to let him wear such clothes!"

"The vicomte?"

"Oh, my dear mistress, you must not deny it. You told me, in your note, to ask him no questions, but I guessed at once. The vicomte told me himself that he should have the young gentleman over in a few days. You need not be ashamed of him. You will see what a difference clothes will make in his appearance; and I have taken it on myself to order a tailor to go to him. The vicomte must pay me."

"Not a word to the vicomte as yet. We will surprise him," said Eugenie, laughing.

Madame de Merville had been all that morning trying to invent some story to account for her interest in the lodger, and now how Fortune favoured her!

"But is that a letter for me?"

"And I had almost forgotten it," said Madame Dufour, as she extended the letter.

Whatever there had hitherto been in the circumstances connected with Morton that had roused the interest and excited the romance of Eugenie de Merville, her fancy was yet more attracted by the tone of the letter she now read. For, though Morton, more accustomed to speak than to write French, expressed himself with less precision, and a less euphuistic selection of phrase than the authors and élégans who formed her usual correspondents, there was an innate and rough nobleness—a strong and profound feeling in every line of his letter, which increased her surprise and admiration.

"All that surrounds him—all that belongs to him is strangeness and mystery!" murmured she; and she sat down to reply.

When Madame Dufour departed with that letter, Eugenie remained silent and thoughtful for more than an hour. Morton's letter before her—and sweet, in their indistinctness, were the recollections and the images that crowded on her mind.

Morton, satisfied by the earnest and solemn assurances of Eugenie that she was not the unknown donor of the sum she re-enclosed, after puzzling himself in vain to form any new conjectures as to the quarter whence it came, felt that, under his present circumstances, it would be an absurd Quixotism to refuse to apply what the very Providence to whom he had anew consigned himself seemed to have sent to his aid. And it placed him, too, beyond the offer of all pecuniary assistance from one from whom he could least have brooked to receive it. He consented, therefore, to all that the loquacious tailor proposed to him. And it would have been difficult to have recognised the wild and frenzied fugitive in the stately and graceful form, with its young beauty and air of well-born pride, which the next day sat by the side of Eugenie. And that day he told his sad and troubled story, and Eugenie wept; and from that day he came daily; and two weeks—happy, dream-like, intoxicating to both—passed by; and as their last sun set, he was kneeling at her feet, and breathing to one to whom the homage of wit, and genius, and complacent wealth had hitherto been vainly proffered, the impetuous, agitated, delicious secrets of the first love. He spoke, and rose to depart for ever, when the look and the sigh detained him.

The next day, after a sleepless night, Eugenie de Merville sent for the Vicomte de Vaudemont.

CHAPTER XIV.

"A silver river small
In sweet accents
Its music vents—
The warbling virginal
To which the merry birds do sing,
Timed with stops of gold the silver string"
SIR RICHARD FANSHAW.

One evening, several weeks after the events just commemorated, a stranger, leading in his hand a young child, entered the church yard of H—. The sun had not long set, and the short twilight of deepening summer reigned in the tranquil skies; you might still hear from the trees above the graves the chirp of some joyous bird; what cared he, the denizen of the skies, for the dead that slept below? what did he value save the greenness and repose of the spot—to him alike, the garden or the grave! As the man and the child passed, the robin, scarcely scared by their tread from the long grass beside one of the mounds, looked at them with its bright blithe eye. It was a famous spot for the robin—the old church-yard! That domestic bird—"the friend of man," as it has been called by the poets—found a jolly supper among the worms!

The stranger on reaching the middle of the sacred ground, paused and looked round him wistfully. He then approached, slowly and hesitatingly, an oblong tablet, on which were graven, in letters yet fresh and new, these words:

TO THE MEMORY OF ONE CALUMNIATED AND WRONGED, THIS BURIAL-STONE IS DEDICATED BY HER SON.

Such, with the addition of the dates of the birth and death, was the tablet which Philip Morton had directed to be placed over his mother's bones; and around it was set a simple palisade, which defended it from the tread of the children, who sometimes, in defiance of the beadle, played over the dust or the former race.

"Thy son!" muttered the stranger, while the child stood quietly by his side, pleased by the trees, the grass, the song of the birds, and recking not of grief or death, "thy son!—but not thy favoured son—thy darling—thy youngest born—on what spot of earth do thine eyes look down on him! Surely in heaven thy love has preserved the one whom on earth thou didst most cherish, from the sufferings and the trials that have visited the less-favoured outcast. Oh, mother, mother! it was not his crime—not Philip's—that he did not fulfil to the last the trust bequeathed to him! Happier, perhaps, as it is! And oh! if thy memory be graven as deeply in my brother's heart as my own, how often will it warn and save him! That memory! it has been to me the angel of my life! To thee—to thee, even in death, I owe it, if, though erring, I am not criminal—if I have lived with the lepers, and am still undefiled!" his lips then were silent—not his heart!

After a few minutes thus consumed, he turned to the child, and said, gently and in a tremulous voice, "Fanny, you have been taught to pray—you will live near this spot—will you come sometimes here and pray that you may grow up good and innocent, and become a blessing to those who love you?"

"Will papa ever come to hear me pray!"

That sad and unconscious question went to the heart of Morton. The child could not comprehend death. He had sought to explain it, but she had been accustomed to consider her protector dead when he was absent from her, and she still insisted that he must come again to life. And that man of turbulence and crime, who had passed unrepented, unabsolved, from sin to judgment; it was an awful question "If he should hear her pray!"

"Yes!" said he after a pause, "yes, Fanny, there is a Father who will hear you pray; and pray to Him to be merciful to those who have been kind to you. Fanny, you and I may never meet again!"

"Are you going to die too! Méchant, every one dies to Fanny!" and, clinging to him endearingly, she put up her lips to kiss him. He took her in his arms; and, as a tear fell on her rosy cheek, she said, "Don't cry brother, for I love you."

"Do you, dear Fanny? Then, for my sake, when you come to this place, if any will give you a few flowers, scatter them on that stone. And now we will go to one whom you must love also, and to whom, as I have told you, he sends you; he who—Come!"

As he thus spoke, and placed Fanny again on the ground, he was startled to see, precisely on the spot where he had seen before the like apparition—on the same spot where the father had cursed the son—the motionless form of an old man. Morton recognised, as if by an instinct rather than by any effort of the memory, the person to whom he was bound.

He walked slowly towards him; but Fanny abruptly left his side, lured by a moth that flitted duskily over the graves.

"Your name, sir, I think, is Simon Gawtre?" said Morton. "I have come to England in quest of you."

"Of me?" said the old man, half rising; and his eyes, now completely blind, rolled vacantly over Morton's person. "Of me? For what? Who are you? I don't know your voice!"

"I come to you from your son!"

"My son!" exclaimed the old man, with great vehemence; "the reprobate! the dishonoured! the infamous! the accursed—"

"Hush! you revile the dead!"

"Dead!" muttered the wretched father, tottering back to the seat he had quitted, "dead!" and the sound of his voice was so full of anguish, that the dog at his feet, which Morton had not hitherto perceived, echoed it with a dismal cry, that recalled to Philip the awful day in which he had seen the son quit the father for the last time on earth.

The sound brought Fanny to the spot; and, with a laugh of delight, which made to it a strange contrast, she threw herself on the grass beside the dog, and sought to entice it to play. So there, in that place of death, were knit together the four links in the Great Chain: lusty and blooming life—desolate and doating age—infancy, yet scarce conscious of a soul—and the dumb brute, that has no warrant of a hereafter.

"Dead!—dead!" repeated the old man, covering his sightless balls with his withered hands. "Poor William!"

"He remembered you to the last. He bade me seek you out; he bade me replace the guilty son with a thing pure and innocent as he had been had he died in his cradle; a child to comfort your old age! Kneel, Fanny; I have found you a father who will cherish you (oh! you will, sir, will you not?) as he whom you may see no more!"

There was something in Morton's voice so solemn that it awed and touched both the old man and the infant; and Fanny, creeping to the protector thus assigned to her, and putting her little hands confidently on his knees, said,

"Fanny will love you if papa wished it. Kiss Fanny."

"Is it his child—his?" said the blind man, sobbing. "Come to my heart; here—here! Oh God, forgive me!"

Morton did not think it right at that moment to undeceive him with regard to the poor child's true connection with the deceased; and he waited in silence till Simon, after a burst of passionate grief and tenderness, rose, and, still clasping the child to his breast, said,

"Sir, forgive me! I am a very weak old man—I have many thanks to give—I have much, too, to learn. My poor son! he did not die in want—did he?"

The particulars of Gawtre's fate, with his real name and the various aliases he had assumed, had appeared in the French journals, and been partially copied into the English; and Morton had expected to have been saved the painful narrative of that fearful death; but the utter seclusion of the old man, his infirmity, and his estranged habits, had shut him out from the intelligence that it now devolved on Philip to communicate. Morton hesitated a little before he answered:

"It is late now; you are not yet prepared to receive this poor infant at your home, nor to hear the details I have to state. I arrived in England but to-day. I shall lodge in the neighbourhood, for it is dear to me. If I may feel sure, then, that you will receive and treasure this sacred and last deposit bequeathed to you by your unhappy son, I will bring my charge to you to-morrow; and we will then, more calmly than we can now, talk over the past."

"You do not answer my question," said Simon, passionately; "answer me that, and I will wait for the rest. They call me a miser! Did I send out my only child to starve? Answer that!"

cannon, is announced the moment in which they vanish from the eyes of the spectators.

Toys.—There are merry good natured girls, who, instead of a head, have only two feet; can do nothing but laugh, sing and tattle, and are never animated with a soul, save when they are dancing—just as the little wooden drummers from Nurenburch drum and pound away—only while the playful child is pulling them round the room.

Human Life.—A spirit throws us from on high down into this life, and then counts seventy or eighty, as we do when we throw a stone into a deep crater; and at the seventieth pulsation or year, he hears the hollow sound as we strike the bottom of the grave.

The Summer Night.—The summer alone might elevate us! God, what a season! In sooth, I often know not whether to stay in the city or go forth into the fields, so alike is it everywhere, and beautiful. If we go outside the city gate, the very beggars gladden our hearts, for they are no longer cold; and the postboys who can pass the whole night on horseback, and the shepherds asleep in the open air. We need no gloomy house: We make a chamber out of every bush and thereby have my good industrious bees before us, and the most gorgeous butterflies. In gardens on the hills sit schoolboys, and in the open air look out words in the dictionary. On account of the game-laws there is no shooting now, and every living thing in bush and furrow and on green branches can enjoy itself right heartily and safely. In all directions come travellers along the roads;—they have their carriages for the most part thrown back—the horses have branches stuck in their saddles, and the drivers roses in their mouths. The shadows of the clouds go trailing along,—the birds fly between them up and down, and journeymen mechanics wander cheerily on with their bundles, and want no work. Even when it rains we love to stand out of doors, and breathe in the quickening influence, and the wet does the herdsman harm no more. And is it night, so sit we only in a cooler shadow, from which we plainly discern the daylight on the northern horizon, and on the sweet warm stars of heaven. Wherever I look, there do I find my beloved blue on the flax in blossom, or the corn-flowers, and the godlike endless heaven into which I would fain spring as into a stream. And now if we turn homeward again, we find indeed but fresh delight. The street is a true nursery, for in the evening after supper, the little ones, though they have but few clothes upon them, are again let out into the open air, and not driven under the bed-quilt as in winter. We sup by daylight, and hardly know where the candlesticks are. In the bed-chamber the windows are open day and night, and likewise most of the doors, without danger. The oldest women stand by the window without a chill, and sew. Flowers lie about everywhere—by the inkstand—on the lawyer's papers—on the justice's table, and the tradesman's counter. The children make a great noise, and one hears the bowling of ninepin-alley half the night through our walks up and down the street; and talks loud, and sees the stars shoot in the high heaven. The foreign musicians, who wend their way homeward towards midnight, go fiddling along the street to their quarters, and the whole neighbourhood runs to the window. The extra posts arrive later, and the horses neigh. One lies in the noise by the window and drops asleep. The post-horns awake him, and the whole starry heaven hath spread itself open. O God! what a joyous life on this little earth!

Love.—Men would have the star of Love like Venus, in Heaven, at first as dreamy Hesperus or Evening Star—announcing the world of dreams and twilight, full of blossoms and nightingales; but afterwards, on the contrary, as the Morning Star, which proclaims the brightness and strength of day—and there is no contradiction here, since both stars are one, and differ only in the time of their appearing.

OF SOLITARINESS AND COMPANIONSHIP.

The bat and the owl are both recluses; yet they are not counted in the number of the wisest birds. Retirement from the world is properest when it is in a tempest; but if it shall be in our power to allay it, we ought even then to immerse our private in the public safety. He may indeed be wise to himself, that can sleep away a storm in a cabin. It is a kind of honest cheating of an ague's fit, by repose. Most men will desire to be housed when lightning and thunder fly and roll abroad. Otherwise, for a man to turn shell-fish, and crawl but in his own dark house, shows him but a dull and earthly thing. They are beasts of rapine or of extreme timidity, that hide themselves in dens, and lurk out day in thickets; whereas those that are creatures of service, are tame, sociable, and do not fly from company.

I deny not but a man may be good in retirement, especially when the world so swarms with vice. One would not travel but upon necessity, when he must be either wetted with the rain of slander, or battered with the hail of injury. It were too great uncharitableness to condemn in general all the monastics that have cloistered up themselves from the world; nor indeed are they purely to be reckoned among such as are shut out from commerce. They are not alone that have books and company within their own walls. He is properly and pitiedly to be counted alone, that is illiterate, and unactively lives hamletted in some untravelled village of the duller country. Yet we see, in the general election of men, a companionable life is preferred before those cells that give them ease and leisure. It is not one of millions that habits himself for a monk out of choice and natural liking; and if we look at those that do it, upon an easy scrutiny we shall find, it is not so much election that hath bowed them against the grain they grew to; either want or vexation, crosses or contingencies, send them unto places nature never meant them born unto.

The soul of man is as well active as contemplative. The Divine Nature rests not only in the speculation of his great creations, but is ever busy in preserving, in ordering, in governing and disposing by providence, the various and infinite affairs of the world. For man to give himself to ease and useless leisure is to contract a rust by lying still. To be becalmed is worse than sometimes tossing with a stirring gale. Certainly an operative rest is acceptable to a man's self and others. But an ineffectual laziness is the seminary both of vice and infamy. It clouds the metalled mind; it mists the wit and chokes up all the sciences; and at last transmits a man to the darkness and oblivion of the grave. When Domitian was alone, he caught but flies. But of Augustus, a wise and prudent prince, we have it recorded, that he slept but little, and was so far from loving to be alone, that he had alternate watchers to discourse him in the night when he waked. Was not Scipio more glorious, fighting in Africa, than Servilius Vacca sleeping in his noiseless country? Certainly the inculture of the world would perish it into a wilderness, should not the activeness of commerce make it a universal city.

Solitude, indeed, may keep a mind in temper, as not being tempted with the frequencies of vice, or the splendour of wealth and greatness. And it is true the withdrawn from society may have more leisure to study virtue, and to think on heaven. But when man shall be overruled by the pondure of his own corruptions, may not time administer thoughts that are evil, as soon as those that be good? The caution, sure, was seasonable, that Cleanthes gave to him that he found alone and talking to himself: "Take heed," says he, "you speak not with an evil man." No man hath commended Timon for that he hated company. He may laugh alone, and that because he is alone; but it hath not so pleased others, as that they have approved of it; and having at his death left this his own mad epitaph, you will not think him mended by his solitude:

"Hic sum post vitam miseramque inopemque sepultus:
Nomen non querat; Dis, lector, te male perdat."

"Life wretched, poor; this earth doth now surround me:
Ne'er ask my name; reader, the gods confound thee."

There is this to be said against solitude. Temptations may approach more freely to him that is alone, and he that thus is tempted may more freely sin. He hath not the benefit of a companion that may give him check, or by his presence loose him from off the hook he hangs upon. Whereas in company, if a man will do good, he shall be encouraged; if bad, he may be hindered. We are not sure the serpent had prevailed upon Eve, if he had not caught her alone and straggling from her husband. A man had need be a great master of his affections, that will live sequestered from the world and company. Neither fools nor madmen are ever to be left to themselves. And albeit a man may upon retiredness make good use of his leisure, yet surely those that, being abroad, communicate a general good, do purchase to themselves a nobler palm than can grow up out of private recess. If a man be good, he ought not to obscure himself. The world hath a share in him, as well as he in himself. He robs his friends and country, that, being of use to both, doth steal himself out of the world. And if he be bad, he will hardly mend by being alone. The mastiff grows more fierce by being shut up or tied; and horses grow more wild by their not seeing company. That actor hath too much trouble, that is never off the stage; and he is as little acceptable, that does never quit the tiring-room. But he that can help, when need requires, in the senate or the field, and when he hath leisure can make a happy use of it, and give himself employment to his benefit, hath doubtless the greatest pleasure, and husbands his life to the best of uses. For by being abroad, he suffers others to reap the advantage of his parts and piety; and by looking sometimes inward, he enjoys himself with ease and contentment.—Fellham.

IMPUDENCE FROM THE LATIN.

What fashionable woman would not rather the republic should be disturbed than her curls?—Seneca.

Advancement of the Ancients in Comfort.—I have alluded to the wheel-tracks which are deeply cut in the stone pavement at Pompeii; but these are not the only marks of actual use which strike the eye everywhere. The stepping-stones at the doors, for example, are mostly worn down by the feet, and the sides of the wells are deeply cut with the bucket ropes. It is very remarkable that even the narrowest streets of Pompeii are furnished with commodious raised pavements for the foot passengers—trottoirs, as they are called in French. And this reminds me of an old jumble of circumstances. The French have the word for the thing, but not the thing itself, while we in England have the thing, but not the word, which obliges us to use the compound expression foot-pavement. What is perhaps still more curious, the Italians, in process of time, instead of improving, have gone backwards in this matter; for Pompeii, which must be upwards of 2000 years old, is far better off for trottoirs than any modern town in Italy. It may be mentioned, also, that at the crossings in the streets of Pompeii, a line of stepping-stones, six or eight inches high, is always placed—a contrivance for the accommodation of foot passengers which I never saw in any other part of the world.

ODE TO GLORY.—TO A BANISHED POET.

From the French of Lamartine.—(Translated by an American Lady.)

The Poet here addressed was, with regard to his fate, a second Camoens. Banished for some political offence, he died in great distress a few years ago, having been a long time a pensioner on the scanty bounty of the French Government.—Ed. Review.

Two different pathways open on your eyes,
Ye noble favourites of the sacred muse,
One leads to pleasure, one to glory's prize,
Mortals, 'tis yours to choose.

Manvel, thy lot the general law obeys,
The Goddess showers her smiles in early years;
Woven of pain and triumph were thy days,
Age dimm'd thine eye with tears.

Yet blush to envy, thou, the vulgar fire,
The sterile rest denied to souls of fire,— Beings of earth in earth-born joys have part—
Ours is the deathless lyre.

Agès are thine—the world thy heritage,
In death, high altars to our honour rise,
Where, for thy genius builds a future age
Fame that outlasts the skies.

So the proud eagle, where the storms sojourn,
Soars in intrepid flight, still upward driven,
And seems to say, "Upon Earth's bosom born,
I claim my home in Heaven—"

Yes—Glory waits thee—pause and contemplate,
The price at which the votary seeks her shrine,
Lo, sits misfortune at the Temple gate,
And keeps the steps divine.

Here dwells the Bard, ungrateful Greece of old,
Saw bear from sea to sea his woes, his years,
Blind, at base price the heavenly gift he sold—
Bread steep'd in exile's tears.

There Tasso burning with his fatal flame,
In irons for his love and his renown,
When he would win the mighty wreath of fame,
To his dark cell goes down.

The wretched, the proscribed, the victim still,
On earth against an adverse fortune strives,
Of woe to noble hearts Heaven's changeless will
A deeper measure gives.

Then hush the wailings of thy plaintive lyre,
Base hearts are whelm'd beneath misfortune's tide,
In thee, a king dethroned, let woe inspire
Nought but a generous pride.

What reck'st thou that the oppressor's stern commands—
Detain thee from the shore that was thy home,
Or that thy destiny in other lands
Prepares a glorious tomb?

Nor exile, nor the tyrant's fetters hard,
Can bind thy glory to the bed of death,
Lisbon shall claim the heritage her bard
Bequeathed with failing breath.

They who despised shall mourn the great man lost,
Athens her victims shrined in domes of fame,
Coriolanus died—and Rome's proud host
Repentant hailed his name.

E'er Ovid to the Stygian realm went down
Towards the wide heavens he stretch'd a suppliant hand,
To foreign shores his dust—but his renown

SHORT SUMMER NIGHTS IN NORWAY.

If I may judge by my own experience, I should say there are few circumstances connected with a Scandinavian tour that afford deeper enjoyment, not unmixed with surprise, than the exquisite beauty of the short summer nights. It has been beautifully said, by one of their native poets, that "At midsummer, on Norway's hills, the blush of Morning kisses the blush of Evening;" and so slight is the interval at this season between the fading of the sun's rays a trifle to the west of the north, and the rapid re-appearance of his orient beams, as little to the east of that point, that this pause between the two sweetest periods of the day might be compared to the balmy breath that parts the coral lips of the sleeping infant. These few brief hours are, indeed, surprisingly lovely in the further north; I say in the further north, for it is not until the Dovre Fjeld is crossed that their full charm can be felt. On the southern side of the Dovre Chain, the nights are only shorter and lighter than those of the Scottish Highlands; when that barrier is passed, they seem to assume an entirely new character. There, at that season, the course of the sun is so oblique to the plane of the horizon that, while he never rises high in the zenith, he also never sinks far beneath view. Unlike, therefore, "the set of the tropic sun, who sudden sinks, and all is night," the glorious orb, for some time before and after the summer solstice, remains so few degrees below the horizon that the refraction of its rays preserves a perpetual twilight; how holier, sweeter far than garish day, and yet how different from our own midsummer nights, sweet though they be! The light is strong enough to enable one to read or write in the interior of a room; and stars, even of the first magnitude, are invisible. Yet it is a chastened, mellow light, not casting strong shadows, but throwing a golden mantle of tranquil repose over every object it touches and beautifies. It is impossible to describe the peculiar effect it produces not only upon the eternal snows of Sneehattan, or "the pine forest's immortal shade," or the silvery cataract's ceaseless turmoil; but still more upon a sleeping city, like Trondhjem. The buildings lie so palpably stretched before the eye, yet so harmoniously blended together, their picturesque points heightened, their harsher defects softened down; the vast Fjord expanding distinctly without a wave or ripple to the feet of the distant blue mountains; the boats rocking idly by the shore; the scenes of labour silent as the grave; all the records of Nature and of man so perceptible, yet so still: it needs but to follow the musings of the imagination to fancy oneself alone in a new world, or realising the conceptions our childhood formed of fairy land. However dreamy such fancies may appear to others, not conversant with these latitudes, they portray but faintly the emotions I have felt on those lovely northern nights, which are classed in my memory of memories with the delicious evenings of Naples and Baïæ.—Two Summers in Norway.

The eminent astronomer, the Abbé Scarpellini, died lately at Rome, aged 81. He continued till the last to fill the posts of Director of the Pontifical Observatory, Professor of Astronomy, and Perpetual Secretary of the Academia dei Lincei at Rome. He was the author of several works of astronomy, mathematics and physics, in Latin and Italian. His valuable collection of astronomical and physical instruments is the more remarkable, as nearly the whole of them were made by himself. They have been purchased by the Government for the University of Rome. The Abbé was a native of Foligno, was one of the earliest members of the Legion of Honour, and had been admitted into innumerable learned societies.

NEW BOOKS.

Sedgwick's Stories.

A collection of stories for the young, written by Miss Sedgwick, has just been published by the Harpers. Of all our writers for the improvement of the young, none has been so uniformly successful as Miss Sedgwick. Her "House," and "Live and Let Live," are incomparable. Considered with reference to their direct adaptation to the wants and institutions, the customs and prejudices of our own countrymen, they are infinitely preferable to the writings of Edgeworth, or Barbauld, or Aiken, the acknowledged leaders in this interesting department of British literature. The new stories just issued, possess the same characteristic excellence. They are national. When all our writers shall become as true to the spirit and institutions of the country as Miss Sedgwick is, we shall possess a truly national literature.

Combe's Phrenological Tour.

This long expected and highly interesting work, has at last made its appearance in two elegant 12mo. volumes, from the press of Messrs. Carey and Hart, of this city. It is precisely such a work as we had anticipated from this accomplished writer and philosopher. In spirit it is highly liberal towards our country; it exhibits great industry and attention in collecting facts, and a fondness for general theories in his classification of those facts, and the conclusions which he draws from them; and it also affords evidence of his having frequently been imposed on by persons pretending to give him information. The very extensive opportunities which Mr. Combe enjoyed of personal intercourse with the most distinguished people in every part of the United States, would be sufficient to give great interest and value to his book, even were he less qualified by natural shrewdness and long cultivated habits of observation, to pronounce opinions on them. By means of his natural qualifications, his opportunities and his indefatigable industry, he has been enabled to give us the best book of travels in the United States, since that of De Toqueville.

Harper's Family Library.

The most recent numbers of this useful and interesting miscellany, are two volumes, embracing a Life of Commodore Perry, by Slidell Mackenzie. The biography is very ably written, and will form a most interesting addition to the library. Every national hero, whose life is written for this library, stands a pretty fair chance of being remembered by his countrymen for centuries to come. The widely extended reputation which he will thus acquire, or preserve, will not easily be lost.

RICHARDSON.

The censure which the Shakspeare of novelists has incurred for the tedious procrastination and the minute details of his fable; his slow unfolding characters, and the slightest gestures of his personages, is extremely unjust; for is it not evident that we could not have his peculiar excellences without these attendant defects? When characters are very fully delineated, the narrative must be suspended. Whenever the narrative is rapid, which so much delights superficial readers, the characters cannot be very minutely featured; and the writer who aims to instruct (as Richardson avowedly did) by the glow and eloquence of his feelings, must often sacrifice to this his local descriptions. Richardson himself has given us the principle that guided him in composing. He tells us, "If I give speeches and conversations, I ought to give them justly; for the humours and characters of persons cannot be known unless I repeat what they say, and their manner of saying."

Foreign critics have been more just to Richardson than many of his own countrymen. I shall notice the opinions of three celebrated writers, D'Alembert, Rousseau, and Diderot.

D'Alembert was a great mathematician. His literary taste was extremely cold; he was not worthy of reading Richardson. The volumes, if he ever read them, must have fallen from his hands. The delicate and subtle turnings, those folds of the human heart, which require so nice a touch, was a problem which the mathematician could never solve. There is no other demonstration in the human heart, but an appeal to its feelings; and what are the calculating feelings of an arithmetician of lines and curves? He therefore declared of Richardson that "La Nature est bonne a amiter, mais non pas jusqu'au l'ennui."

But thus it was not with the other two congenial geniuses! The fervent opinion of Rousseau must be familiar to the reader; but Diderot, in his eulogy on Richardson, exceeds even Rousseau in the enthusiasm of his feelings. I extract some of the most interesting passages.

Of Clarissa he says, "I yet remember with delight the first time it came into my hands. I was in the country. How deliciously was I affected! At every moment I saw my happiness abridged by a page. I then experienced the same sensations those feel who have long lived with one they love, and are on the point of separation. At the close of the work I seemed to remain deserted."

The impassioned Diderot then breaks forth; "O Richardson! thou singular genius in my eyes! thou shalt form my reading in all times. If forced by sharp necessity, my friend falls into indigence: if the mediocrity of my fortune is not sufficient to bestow on my children the necessary cares for their education, I will sell my books,—but thou shalt remain, yes, thou shalt rest in the same class with Moses, Homer, Euripides, and Sophocles, to be read alternately.

"Oh, Richardson, I dare pronounce that the most veritable history is full of fictions, and thy romances are full of truths. History paints some individuals; thou paintest the human species. History attributes to some individuals what they have neither said nor done; all that thou attributest to man he has said and done. History embraces but a portion of duration, a point on the surface of the globe; thou hast embraced all places and all times. The human heart, which has ever been and ever shall be the same, is the model thou copieest. If we were severely to criticise the best historian, would he maintain his ground as thou? In this point of view, I venture to say, that frequently history is a miserable romance; and romance, as thou hast composed it, is a good history. Painter of nature, thou never liest!"

"I have never yet met with a person who shared my enthusiasm, that I was not tempted to embrace, and to press him in my arms!"

"Richardson is no more! His loss touches me, as if my brother was no more. I bore him in my heart without having seen him, and knowing him but by his works. He has not had all the reputation he merited. Richardson! if living, thy merit has been disputed, how great wilt thou appear to our children's children, when they shall view thee at the distance we now view Homer. Then who will dare to steal a line from thy sublime works! Thou hast had more admirers amongst us than in thine own country, and at this I rejoice!"

It is probable that to a Frenchman the style of Richardson is not so objectionable when translated, as to ourselves. I think myself, that it is very idiomatic and energetic; others have thought differently. The misfortune of Richardson was, that he was unskilful in the art of writing, and that he could never lay the pen down while his inkhorn supplied it.

He was delighted by his own works. No author enjoyed so much the bliss of excessive fondness. I heard from the late Charlotte Lennox, the anecdote which so severely reprimanded his innocent vanity, which Boswell has recorded. This lady was a regular visitor at Richardson's house, and she could scarcely recollect one visit which was not taxed by our author reading one of his voluminous letters, or two or three, if his auditor was quiet and friendly.

The extreme delight which he felt on a review of his own works the works themselves witness. Each is an evidence of what some will deem a violent literary vanity. To Pamela is prefixed a letter from the editor (whom we know to be the author,) consisting of one of the most minutely laboured panegyrics of the work itself, that ever the blindest idolater of some ancient classic paid to the object of his phrenetic imagination. In several places there, he contrives to repeat the striking parts of the narrative, which display the fertility of his imagination to great advantage. To the author's own edition of his Clarissa is appended an alphabetical arrangement of the sentiments dispersed throughout the work; and such was the fondness that dictated this voluminous arrangement, that such trivial aphorisms as "habits are not easily changed;" "Men are known by their companions," &c. seem alike to be the object of their author's admiration. This collection of sentiments, said indeed to have been sent to him anonymously, is curious and useful, and shows the value of the work, by the extensive grasp of that mind which could think so justly on such numerous topics. And in his third and final labour, to each volume of Sir Charles Grandison is not only prefixed a complete index, with as much exactness, as if it were a history of England, but there is also appended a list of the similes and allusions in the volume; some of which do not exceed three or four in nearly as many hundred pages.

Literary history does not record a more singular example of that self-delight which an author has felt on a revision of his works. It was this intense pleasure which produced his voluminous labours. It must be confessed there are readers deficient in that sort of genius which makes the mind of Richardson so fertile and prodigal.—D'Israeli.

DOUBTS OF IDENTITY.

An Irish baronet, of delicate health, hearing that he had been a hearty child, expressed a suspicion that his nurse had perhaps changed him.

Some one exhibiting a skull for Cromwell's, objection was made to its being too small for Cromwell, who had a large head; an Irish gentleman settled the doubt, alledging it might be his skull when he was a boy.—Walpole.

That nation is in best estate that hath the fewest laws, and those good. Variety does but multiply snares. If every bush be limed, there is no bird can escape with all his feathers free.—Felltham.

THE FRENCH PRESS.

Here, in a warm, quiet country dining-room, on a very large, and not less brightly polished mahogany table, are spread before me the English "Times" newspaper and the French "National." What a difference! I do not mean in their politics, style, objects, usefulness, or end, but what a difference in their dimensions! The "Times" measures five feet eleven inches in width, and twenty-seven inches in length, but being printed on both sides, contains of course eleven feet ten inches of printing in width, and fifty-four inches in length. The paper consists of forty-eight columns, of which twenty-four are devoted to advertisements, and the remaining twenty-four to politics, news, parliamentary debates, law intelligence, controversies, correspondence, trade, finance, the public funds, markets, births, deaths, marriages and miscellaneous matters. But what is more awful than all, is the quantity of letters in this newspaper of only one day; a total of 498,552 letters, which multiplied by 313 (the number of days in the year on which the Times appears,) will present no less than 156,046,776 letters, which every reader of that journal may peruse in the brief space of twelve calendar months. Who would dare after this to say, that such readers are not men of letters?

But my dwarfish friend the National measures twenty-five inches in width, and fifteen in length; or, as it is also printed on both sides of the paper, a total of fifty inches in width, and thirty in length of letterpress, and contains twelve columns; each number possesses 84,400 letters; i. e. in the course of the year (as the National is published 362 days, and not 313, as is the Times, in twelve months,) a total of 30,552,800 letters;—not quite one fifth of the letters in the Times.

The advertisements of the Times, if estimated at one shilling per line on an average, must yield in the course of the year no less a sum than 90,500*l.*; while those of the National, taken at the rate of two shillings per line on an average, most certainly do not yield 2000*l.* nor anything like it. This is one to forty-five. The Debats can boast of a much larger advertising income, perhaps of 9000*l.*, or as one to ten when compared with the Times. The Debats, Presse, and Siccle, gain the most by their advertisements, but so little is advertising understood in France, that the Times could eat up all the French Lilliputian advertising papers with the least imaginable difficulty, even before breakfast.

The Times journal, with its hundred and fifty-six millions of letters in a year costs its subscribers the paltry sum of 6*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*; whilst the National, with its thirty millions of letters in the same period, is sold to subscribers at the sum of 3*l.* 4*s.* If the principles of common multiplication, or the rule of three direct, were applied to this subject, either the readers of the Times, for their 156 millions of letters ought to pay 16*l.* per annum, instead of 6*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*, which that paper now only costs them; or else the readers of the National, for their thirty millions of letters should pay 1*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* per annum instead of the present subscription of 3*l.* 4*s.* Who will set the example of a change?

The circulation of the Times is, according to the best evidence I possess, about 16,500 per diem, or 5,164,500 per annum. The circulation of the National is 4000 per diem (a few more or less), or 1,448,000 in the course of a year.

But it is time to terminate this comparison of dimensions, quantity, profits, and circulation of these two opposite prints, and examine some of the other French journals, with reference likewise to their statistics. The Moniteur is long, narrow, and ugly. Sometimes, when the Chambers are sitting, and the long-winded orators forward their written speeches to its short-hand writers, that they may be reported with accuracy, this government organ makes in thickness a small volume. At other times, when there are no Chambers, and no official documents, the first page of the Times contains more letters than do the four pages of this official print. The Journal des Debats extended the size of its columns in deference, it is said, to the QUADRUPLE ALLIANCE, and to the interest which would thereafter be taken in the Debates of the British, Spanish, and Portuguese parliaments or cortes; but I suspect that whilst it has doubled its expenses, it has by no means quadrupled its subscribers. The Debats contains about as many letters as two pages of the Times, instead of eight. Its advertisements are more numerous than those of any other French journal, of course always excepting those devoted exclusively to advertising. Of these there are more than one hundred in the departments, and there are three advertising prints in Paris; but the most ancient and important is the Petites Affiches. There was a time when this print had its eight or ten advertisements per diem, whilst now it has nearly as many hundreds. It is classified into advertisements relating to property, to sales, and letting of land and houses, judicial advertisements, sales by auction, objects lost and found, servants or professors seeking places, and masters desiring servants; but never are books announced in this commercial publication. The rate charged for advertising is cheap, and as the distribution of the Petites Affiches is immense, advertisers are sure of finding a pretty maid of all work, a young and charming governess, and, if desired, even a wife of a certain age, with a dot to render her the more acceptable. There have been few speculations in France, at least in modern times, so advantageous to their founders as the Petites Affiches. Of course its good fortune has led others to imitate it, and the Gratias is an advertising print, which is circulated gratuitously in Paris very largely, in order to induce the public to advertise in its columns.

The quack doctors and dentists of that amusing people advertise much more than do our English Charlatans; and quack medicines, both for teeth and toes, liver and lungs, are the staple articles of French advertising papers. The characters of French and English advertisements are as different as the genius of the people. Look down the columns of the Times, beginning at page 1, and terminating at page 8, and what do we see? Steam boats and merchant vessels to all parts of the habitable globe commence the first column of the first page, and sales by auction fill up the last columns of page 8. But where are the steam and shipping advertisements in a French paper? They are not to be found. If a French steamboat proprietor should thus expend a portion of his capital or income, he would be stigmatised as an Anglais, and that would be enough to condemn his enterprise. French advertisements in the daily political journals consist of bon-bon shop announcements, of new liqueurs, of quack doctors, new condiments, novel trusses, infallible cures for gout, asthma, ringworms, and other equally agreeable companions of the worn-out rake, or the badly brought up infant. Then come "Clogs to preserve the feet from damp," "Bear's grease to keep the hair from turning gray," "Dyes to dye those white hairs black which have dared, in spite of the bear's grease, become refractory," "Wood sold by the pound-weight, as dry as sawdust, and all of a certain dimension," "Creosote to burn the teeth out, and make the throat a gas manufactory," "Eau de Botot," to render the breath as pure as the perfume of rosemary; "Pommade Melainocome," to put bald heads out of fashion in a few hours; "Chocolat Voltaire," to suit all stomachs, please all palates, and improve all constitutions; "Pate de Limaçon," or, in vulgar English, snail jelly, to cure consumption the most inveterate with three pots, i. e. if duly prepared by Monsieur Quelquejeu, of the Rue Poitou (but not without); "Chocolat Rafraichissant," to be mixed with almond milk, and drank by the quart by all who want cooling and refreshing drinks; (query:—would not lemonade be equally serviceable!) and "Pommade du Lion," the character of which is, to render the whiskers and moustachios quite unrivaled. Then there are "All Paris for sevenpence-half-penny," (tout Paris pour quinze sous) "Le Cordon Bleu," or how to make the very best soup out of cold water and a cinder in it; "Mathieu Coulon," or the art of fencing made easy to the meanest capacities; "Le Bazaar Chirurgical," or practical surgery rendered so agreeable, that those who visit the bazaar break their legs on purpose to have them cut off with its "inimitable instruments;" and "Agence Générale de

Placement," in which admirable institution drunken butlers, dirty housemaids, dishonest cooks, ignorant governesses, swindling cashiers or accountants, stupid clerks, lazy grooms, robbing stewards, coquetting nursery girls, and downright flirts of ladies' maids, enregister their varied attractions, terms, advantages, and demands, and where lovers of such sorts of prizes never find blanks. There is another class of advertisements known by the "signs of the shops" which appear at the heading. For example "Au pauvre Diable," in the Rue Montmorency near the Palais Royal, where calicoes, muslins, and dimity are sold in immense quantities; "A la Barbe d'or" (the sign of the Golden Beard) in the Rue Richelieu, where silks and satins shine in matchless splendour; "Aux Armes d'Angleterre" (the Arms of England) where Eau de Cologne is sold, quite fresh made at Paris by Messrs. Lebrun and Renault; "Aux Dames Irlandaises (the sign of the Irish Ladies), where real Valenciennes lace may be had much cheaper than the manufacturer can procure it on the spot; yet whoever doubts its reality receives for her reply, "mais vraiment, Madame, est en erreur, c'est la véritable dentelle de Valenciennes;" "Au Chat Botte" (the sign of the Cat in Boots) where boots, shoes, and slippers for men (not for ladies, for they are kept quite distinct in Paris) may be had at all prices, and of all qualities, warranted never to wear out, and to be quite "inaccessible" to water; "A la petite Jeanette" (with her egg-basket empty, the eggs scattered on the ground, and huge white tears streaming down her red cheeks, whilst contemplating her disaster) where the charming "robes" in the window invite the yet more charming Parisians to buy and to wear them; and finally, "to the sign of the Petticoat," not the flannel petticoat, not the dimity petticoat, not the silk, satin, or Persian petticoat, not the stuff, nankeen, or woollen petticoat; oh, no, "'tis something more exquisite still,"—''tis the

"SOUS-JUPES-LOUDINOT,"

"signed" Oudinot. Mark that, ladies! Your petticoats are to be signed! But do hear their description from Oudinot himself, the prince of petticoats; the very ne plus ultra of the petticoat trade, or, in other words, "the" petticoat Oudinot. Hear him! He tells us that these signed petticoats, for which he has received a médaille d'honneur (and all counterfeits of which, he will seize in every town, ay, and on the back of every lady who shall disgrace herself by wearing them) are

"BOUFFANTES ET ELASTIQUES."

Let me dwell a moment on this general description of the "genus" before I proceed to particulars. A "Bouffante" petticoat! Not a Buffon petticoat, nor yet a Buffon petticoat (peace to his manes!)—but a swelling out petticoat, a sort of gas-balloon petticoat, an inflated petticoat, none of your hanging-down petticoats, as loose as my aunt Betsy's, but a petticoat giving itself airs, exclaiming "Make way for me, make way for me, I am coming!" a petticoat that "does not think small beer of itself!" but which stands at the head of the petticoat aristocracy! This is a "Bouffante" petticoat. It stands up of itself. It looks a lady without a lady. If Miss Julia is a little sinuous, it makes her as straight as a poplar tree, though not quite so tall. If one side of her graceful form is a few degrees out of the perpendicular, the petticoat, by its "bouffante" qualities, so contrives with the other side, as to render her a perfect Taglioni; and with one of Oudinot's "signed" sous-jupes she may appear on the Boulevards, or lounge in the Tuilleries, as the very grace as well as life of Parisian society.

But then these petticoats are not merely bouffantes, they are also elastiques. Just think of that, dear Lady Georgiana, an elastic petticoat! You complain of being unable to walk from rheumatism, which has made you prematurely old and stiff at sixty-nine and three-quarters. Never mind now. Take courage. Here are petticoats which will render even you elastic, if you will wear them, and transport you by their bouffante properties from Dan to Beersheba, if you desire it. An "elastic" petticoat! No more of

"Be comforted. He did not die in want; and he has even left some little fortune for Fanny, which I was to place in your hands."

"And he thought to bribe the old miser to be human! Well—well—well! I will go home."

"Lean on me!"

The dog leaped playfully on his master as the latter rose, and Fanny slid from Simon's arms to press and talk to the animal in her own way. As they slowly passed through the churchyard, Simon muttered incoherently to himself for some space, and Morton would not disturb, since he could not comfort him.

At last he said, abruptly, "Did my son repent?"

"I hope," answered Morton, evasively, "that, had his life been spared, he would have amended!"

"Tush, sir!" I am past seventy—we repent! we never amend!" And Simon again sunk into his own dim and disconnected reveries.

At length they arrived at the blind man's house. The door was opened to them by an old woman of disagreeable and sinister aspect, dressed out much too gaily for the station of a servant, though such was her reputed capacity; but the miser's affliction saved her from the chance of comment on her extravagance. As she stood in the doorway with a candle in her hand, she scanned curiously, and with no welcoming eye, her master's companions.

"Mrs. Boxer, my son is dead!" said Simon, in a hollow voice.

"And a good thing it is, then, sir!"

"For shame, woman!" said Morton indignantly.

"Hey-day! sir! whom have we got here?"

"One," said Simon, sternly, "whom you will treat with respect. He brings me a blessing to lighten my loss. One harsh word to this child, and you quit my house!"

The woman looked perfectly thunderstruck; but, recovering herself, she said whiningly,

"I! a harsh word to anything my dear, kind master cares for! And, Lord, what a sweet pretty creature it is! Come here, my dear!"

But Fanny shrunk back, and would not let go Philip's hand.

"To-morrow, then," said Morton; and he was turning away, when a sudden thought seemed to cross the old man:

"Stay, sir, stay! I—I—did my son say I was rich? I am very, very poor; nothing in the house, or I should have been robbed long ago!"

"Your son told me to bring money, not to ask for it!"

"Ask for it! No; but—" added the old man, and a gleam of cunning intellect shot over his face, "but he had got into a bad set. Ask!—no! Put up the door chain, Mrs. Boxer!"

It was with doubt and misgivings that Morton the next day consigned the child, who had already nestled herself into the warmest core of his heart, to the care of Simon. Nothing short of that superstitious respect which all men owe to the wishes of the dead would have made him select for her that asylum; for Fate had now, in brightening his own prospects, given him an alternative in the benevolence of Madame de Merville. But Gawtreys had been so earnest on the subject, that he felt as if he had no right to hesitate. And was it not a sort of atonement to any faults the son might have committed against the parent, to place by the old man's hearth so sweet a charge?

The strange and peculiar mind and character of Fanny made him, however, yet more anxious than otherwise he might have been. She certainly deserved not the harsh name of imbecile or idiot, but she was different from all other children; she felt more acutely than most of her age, but she could not be taught to reason. There was something either oblique or deficient in her intellect, which justified the most melancholy apprehensions; yet often, when some disordered, incoherent, inexplicable train of ideas most saddened the listener, it would be followed by fancies so exquisite in their tenderness, that suddenly she seemed as much above, as before she had seemed below, the ordinary measure of infant comprehension. She was like a creature to which Nature, in some cruel but bright caprice, has given all that belongs to poetry, but denied all that belongs to the common understanding necessary to mankind; or as a fairy changeling, not indeed according to the vulgar superstition, malignant and deformed, but lovelier than the children of men, and haunted by dim and struggling associations of a gentler and fairer being, yet wholly incapable to learn the dry and hard elements which make up the knowledge of actual life.

Morton, as well as he could, sought to explain to Simon the peculiarities in Fanny's mental constitution. He urged on him the necessity of providing for her careful instruction, and Simon promised to send her to the best school the neighbourhood could afford; but, as the old man spoke, he dwelt so much on the supposed fact that Fanny was William's daughter, and with his remorse or affection there ran so interwoven a thread of selfishness and avarice, that Morton thought it would be dangerous to his interest in the child to undeceive his error. He therefore—perhaps excusably enough—remained silent on that subject.

Gawtreys had placed with the superior of the convent, together with an order to give up the child to any one who should demand her in his true name, which he confided to the superior, a sum of nearly £300, which he solemnly swore had been honestly obtained, and which, in all his shifts and adversities, he had never allowed himself to touch. This sum, with the trifling deduction made for arrears due to the convent, Morton now placed in Simon's hands. The old man clutched the money, which was for the most in French gold, with a convulsive gripe; and then, as if ashamed of the impulse, said,

"But you, sir—will any sum—that is, any reasonable sum—be of use to you?"

"No! and if it were, it is neither yours nor mine—it is hers. Save it for her, and add to it what you can."

While this conversation took place, Fanny had been consigned to the care of Mrs. Boxer, and Philip now rose to see and bid her farewell before he departed.

"I may come again to visit you, Mr. Gawtreys! and I pray Heaven to find that you and Fanny have been a mutual blessing to each other. Oh, remember how your son loved her!"

"He had a good heart in spite of all his sins. Poor William!" said Simon.

Philip Morton heard, and his lip curled with a sad and a just disdain.

If, when, at the age of nineteen, William Gawtreys had quitted his father's roof, the father had then remembered that the son's heart was good, the son had been alive still, an honest and a happy man. Do ye not laugh, oh ye all-listening fiends! when men praise those dead whose virtues they discovered not when alive? It takes much marble to build the sepulchre—how little of lath and plaster would have repaired the garret!

On turning into a small room adjoining the parlour in which Gawtreys sat, Morton found Fanny standing gloomily by a dull, soot-grimed window, which looked out on the dead walls of a small yard. Mrs. Boxer, seated by a table, was employed in trimming a cap, and putting questions to Fanny in that falsetto voice of endearment in which people not used to children are apt to address them.

"And so, my dear, they've never taught you to read or write! You've been sadly neglected, poor thing!"

"We must do our best to supply the deficiency," said Morton, as he entered.

"Bless me, sir, is that you?" And the gouvernante bustled up and dropped a low courtesy; for Morton, dressed then in the garb of a gentleman, was of a mien and person calculated to strike the gaze of the vulgar.

"Ah, brother?" cried Fanny, for by that name he had taught her to call him; and she flew to his side. "Come away—it's ugly here—it makes me cold."

"My child, I told you you must stay: but I shall hope to see you again some day. Will you not be kind to this poor creature, ma'am? Forgive me if I offended you last night, and favour me by accepting this to show that we are friends." As he spoke he slid his purse into the woman's hand. "I shall feel ever grateful for whatever you can do for Fanny."

"Fanny wants nothing from any one else—Fanny wants her brother."

"Sweet child! I fear she don't take to me. Will you like me, Miss Fanny?"

"No! get along!"

"Fy, Fanny: you remember you did not take to me at first. But she is so affectionate, ma'am—she never forgets a kindness."

"I will do all I can to please her, sir. And so she is really master's grandchild?" The woman fixed her eyes, as she spoke, so intently on Morton, that he felt embarrassed; and busied himself, without answering, in caressing and soothing Fanny, who now seemed to awake to the affliction about to visit her: for, though she did not weep—she very rarely wept—her slight frame trembled, her eyes closed, her cheeks, even her lips, were white, and her delicate hands were clasped tightly round the neck of the one about to abandon her to strange breasts.

Morton was greatly moved. "One kiss, Fanny! and do not forget me when we meet again."

The child pressed her lips to his cheek, but the lips were cold. He put her down gently: she stood mute and passive.

"Remember that he wished me to leave you here," whispered Morton, using an argument that never failed. "We must obey him: and so—God bless you, Fanny!"

He rose and retreated to the door; the child unclosed her eyes, and gazed at him with a strained, painful, imploring gaze: her lips moved, but she did not speak. Morton could not bear that silent woe. He sought to smile on her consolingly, but the smile would not come. He closed the door, and hurried from the house.

From that day Fanny settled into a kind of dreary, inanimate stupor, which resembled that of the somnambulist whom the magnetizer forgets to waken. Hitherto, with all the eccentricities or deficiencies of her mind, had mingled a wild and airy gaiety. That was vanished. She spoke little—she never played—no toys could lure her—even the poor dog failed to win her notice. If she was told to do anything, she stared vacantly, and stirred not. She evinced, however, a kind of dumb regard to the old blind man; she would creep to his knees, and sit there for hours, seldom answering when he addressed her, but uneasy, anxious, and restless if he left her.

"Will you die too?" she asked once; the old man understood her not, and she did not try to explain. Early one morning, some days after Morton was gone, they missed her; she was not in the house, nor the dull yard where she was sometimes dismissed and told to play—told in vain. In great alarm, the old man accused Mrs. Boxer of having spirited her away; and threatened and stormed so loudly, that the woman, against her will, went forth to the search. At last she found the child in the churchyard, standing wistfully beside a tomb.

"What do you here, you little plague?" said Mrs. Boxer, rudely seizing her by the arm.

"This is the way they will both come back some day! I dreamed so!"

"If ever I catch you here again!" said the housekeeper; and, wiping her brow with one hand, she struck the child with the other. Fanny had never been struck before. She recoiled in terror and amazement; and, for the first time since her arrival, burst into tears.

"Come, come, no crying! and, if you tell master, I'll beat you within an inch of your life!" So saying, she caught Fanny in her arms; and, walking about, scolding and menacing till she had frightened back the tears, she returned triumphantly to the house, and, bursting into the parlour, exclaimed, "Here's the little darling, sir!"

When old Simon learned where the child had been found, he was glad; for it was his constant habit, whenever the evening was fine, to glide out to that churchyard—his dog his guide—and sit on his one favourite spot opposite the setting sun: this not so much for the sanctity of the place, or the meditations it might inspire, as because it was the nearest, the safest, and the loneliest spot in the neighbourhood of his home where the blind man could inhale the air and bask in the light of heaven. Hitherto, thinking it sad for the child, he had never taken her with him: indeed, at the hour of his monotonous excursion, she had generally been banished to bed. Now she was permitted to accompany him; and the old man and the infant would sit there, side by side, as Age and Infancy rested side by side in the graves below. The first symptom of childlike interest and curiosity that Fanny betrayed was awakened by the affliction of her protector. One evening, as they thus sat, she made him explain what the desolation of blindness is. She seemed to comprehend him, though he did not seek to adapt his complaints to her understanding.

"Fanny knows," said she, touchingly; "for she, too, is blind here;" and she pressed her hands to her temples.

Notwithstanding her silence and strange ways, and although he could not see the exquisite loveliness which Nature, as in remorseful pity, had lavished on her outward form, Simon soon learned to love her better than he had ever loved yet: for they most cold to the child are often dotards to the grandchild. For her even his avarice slept. Dainties, never before known at his sparing board, were ordered to tempt her appetite—toyshops ransacked to amuse her indolence. He was long, however, before he could prevail on himself to fulfil his promise to Morton, and rob himself of her presence. At length, however, wearied with

Mrs. Boxer's lamentations at her ignorance, and alarmed himself at some evidences of helplessness, which made him dread to think what her future might be when left alone in life, he placed her at a dayschool in the suburb. Here Fanny, for a considerable time, justified the harshest assertions of her stupidity. She could not even keep her eyes two minutes together on the page from which she was to learn the mysteries of reading: months passed before she mastered the alphabet; and, a month after, she had again forgotten it, and the labour was renewed. The only thing in which she showed ability, if so it might be called, was in the use of the needle. The sisters of the convent had already taught her many pretty devices in this art; and when she found that at the school they were admired—that she was praised instead of blamed—her vanity was pleased, and she learned so readily all that they could teach in this not unprofitable accomplishment, that Mrs. Boxer slyly and secretly turned her tasks to account, and made a weekly perquisite of the poor pupil's industry. Another faculty she possessed, in common with persons usually deficient and with the lower species, viz., a most accurate and faithful recollection of places. At first Mrs. Boxer had been duly sent, morning, noon, and evening, to take her to or bring her from the school; but this was so great a grievance to Simon's solitary superintendent, and Fanny coaxed the old man so endearingly to allow her to go and return alone, that the attendance, unwelcome to both, was waved. Fanny exulted in this liberty: and she never, in going or in returning, missed passing through the burial ground, and gazing wistfully at the tomb from which she yet believed Morton would one day reappear. With his memory she cherished also that of her earlier and more guilty protector; but they were separate feelings, which she distinguished in her own way.

"Papa had given her up. She knew that he would not have sent her away, far—far over the great water, if he had meant to see Fanny again; but her brother was forced to leave her; he would come to life one day, and then they should live together!"

One day, towards the end of autumn, as her schoolmistress, a good woman on the whole, but who had not yet had the wit to discover by what chords to tune the instrument over which so wearily she drew her unskilful hand—one day, we say, the schoolmistress happened to be dressed for a christening party to which she was invited in the suburb: and, accordingly, after the morning lessons, the pupils were to be dismissed to a holiday. As Fanny now came last with the hopeless spelling-book, she stopped suddenly short, and her eyes rested with avidity upon a large bouquet of exotic flowers with which the good lady (she was thin) had enlivened the centre of the parted kerchief, whose yellow gauze modestly veiled that tender section of female beauty which poets have likened to hills of snow—a chilling simile! It was then autumn, and field and even garden flowers were growing rare.

"Will you give me one of those flowers?" said Fanny, dropping her book.

"One of these flowers, child! Why?"

Fanny did not answer; but one of the elder and cleverer girls said,

"Oh! she comes from France, you know, ma'am, and the Roman Catholics put flowers, and ribands, and things over the graves; you know, ma'am, we were reading yesterday about Père la Chaise!"

"Well what then?"

"And Miss Fanny will do any kind of work for us if we will give her flowers."

"Brother told me where to put them; but these pretty flowers, I never had any like them; they may bring him back again! I'll be so good if you'll give me one—only one!"

"Will you learn your lesson if I do, Fanny?"

"Oh! yes! Wait a moment!"

And Fanny stole back to her desk, put the hateful book resolutely before her, pressed both hands tightly on her temples—Eureka! the chord was touched—and Fanny marched in triumph through half a column of hostile double syllables!

From that day the schoolmistress knew how to stimulate her, and Fanny learned to read—her path to knowledge thus literally strewn with flowers! Catharine, thy children were far off, and thy grave looked gay!

It naturally happened that those short and simple rhymes, often sacred, which are repeated in schools as helps to memory, made a part of her studies; and, no sooner had the sound of verse struck upon her fancy, than it seemed to confuse and agitate anew all her senses. It was like the music of some breeze, to which dance and tremble all the young leaves of a wild plant. Even when at the convent, she had been fond of repeating the infant rhymes with which they had sought to lull or to amuse her, but now the taste was more strongly developed. She confounded, however, in meaningless and motley disorder, the various snatches of song that came to her ear, weaving them together in some form which she understood, but which was jargon to all others; and often, as she went alone through the green lanes or the bustling streets, the passenger would turn in pity and fear to hear her half chant, half murmur ditties that seemed to suit only a wandering and unsettled imagination. And as Mrs. Boxer, in her visits to the various shops in the suburb, took care to bemoan her hard fate in attending to a creature so evidently moon-stricken, it was no wonder that the manner and the habits of the child coupled with that strange predilection to haunt the burial ground, which is not uncommon with persons of weak and disordered intellect, confirmed the character thus given to her.

So, as she tripped gaily and lightly along the thoroughfares, the children would draw aside from her path, and whisper, with superstitious fear mingled with contempt, "It's the idiot girl!" Idiot! How much more of heaven's light was there in that cloud than in the rushlights that, flickering in sordid chambers, shed on dull things the dull ray, esteeming themselves as stars!

Months—years passed: Fanny was thirteen, when there dawned a new era to her existence. Mrs. Boxer had never got over her first grudge to Fanny. Her treatment of the poor girl was always harsh, and sometimes cruel. But Fanny did not complain: and as Mrs. Boxer's manner to her before Simon was invariably cringing and caressing, the old man never guessed the hardships his supposed grandchild underwent. There had been scandal some years back in the suburb about the relative connection of the master and the housekeeper; and the flaunting dress of the latter, something bold in her regard, and certain whispers that her youth had not been vowed to Vesta, confirmed the suspicion. The only reason why we do not feel sure that the rumour was false, is this: Simon Gawtreys had been so hard on the early follies of his son! Certainly, at all events, the woman had exercised great influence over the miser before the arrival of Fanny, and she had done much to steel his selfishness against the ill-fated William. And, as certainly, she had fully calculated on succeeding to the savings, whatever they might be, of the miser, whenever Providence should be pleased to terminate his days. She knew that Simon had, many years back, made his will in her favour; she knew that he had not altered that will; she believed, therefore, that, in spite of all his love for Fanny, he loved his gold so much more, that he could not accustom himself to the thought of bequeathing it to hands too helpless to guard the treasure. This had, in some measure, reconciled the house-keeper to the intruder; whom, nevertheless, she hated as a dog hates another dog, not only for taking his bone, but for looking at it.

But, suddenly, Simon fell ill. His age made it probable he would die. He took to his bed—his breathing grew fainter and fainter—he seemed dead. Fanny all unconscious, sat by his bedside as usual, holding her breath not to waken him. Mrs. Boxer flew to the bureau—she unlocked it—she could not find the will, but she found three bags of bright old guineas: the sight charmed her. She tumbled them forth on the distained green cloth of the bureau—she began to count them; and, at that moment, the old man, as if there were a secret magnetism between himself and the guineas, woke from his trance. His blindness saved him the pain, that might have been fatal, of seeing the unhallowed profanation; but he heard the clink of the metal. The very sound restored his strength. But the infirm are always cunning: he breathed not a suspicion. "Mrs. Boxer," said he, faintly, "I think I could take some broth." Mrs. Boxer rose in great dismay, gently reclosed the bureau, and ran down stairs for the broth. Simon took the occasion to question Fanny; and, no sooner had he learned the operations of the heir-expectant, than he bade the girl first lock the bureau and bring him the key, and next run to a lawyer (whose address he gave her,) and fetch him instantly.

With a malignant smile, the old man took the broth from his handmaid: "Poor Boxer, you are a disinterested creature," said he, feebly; "I think you will grieve when I go."

Mrs. Boxer sobbed; and before she had recovered, the lawyer entered. That day a new will was made; and the lawyer politely informed Mrs. Boxer that her services would be dispensed with the next morning, when he should bring a nurse to the house. Mrs. Boxer heard, and took her resolution. As soon as Simon again fell asleep, she crept into the room, led away Fanny, locked her up in her own chamber, returned, searched for the key to the bureau, which she found at last under Simon's pillow, possessed herself of all she could lay her hands on, and the next morning she had disappeared for ever!

Simon's loss was greater than might have been supposed; for, except a trifling sum in the Savings' Bank, he, like many other misers, kept all he had, in notes or specie, under his own lock and key. His whole fortune, indeed, was far less than was supposed; for money does not make money unless it is put out to interest; and the miser cheated himself. Such portion as was in bank notes, Mrs. Boxer probably had the prudence to destroy; for those numbers which Simon could remember were never traced: the gold, who could swear to it? Except the pittance in the Savings' Bank, and whatever might be the paltry worth of the house he rented, the father, who had enriched the menial to exile the son, was a beggar in his dotage. This news, however, was carefully concealed from him, by the advice of the doctor, whom, on his own responsibility, the lawyer introduced, till he had recovered sufficiently to bear the shock without danger; and the delay naturally favoured Mrs. Boxer's escape.

Simon remained for some moments perfectly stunned and speechless, when the news was broken to him. Fanny, in alarm at his increasing paleness, sprang to his breast. He pushed her away: "Go—go—go, child," he said; "I can't feed you now. Leave me to starve."

"To starve!" said Fanny, wonderingly; and she stole away, and sat herself down as if in deep thought. She then crept up to the lawyer as he was about to leave the room, after exhausting his stock of common-place consolation, and, putting her hand in his, whispered, "I want to talk to you—this way." She led him through the passage into the open air. "Tell me," she said, "when poor people try not to starve, don't they work?"

"My dear, yes."

"For rich people buy poor people's work?"

"Certainly, my dear—to be sure."

"Very well. Mrs. Boxer used to sell my work. Fanny will feed grandpapa! Go and tell him never to say 'starve' again."

The good-natured lawyer was moved. "Can you work, indeed, my poor girl? Well, put on your bonnet, and come and talk to my wife."

And that was the new era in Fanny's existence! Her schooling was stopped. But now life schooled her. Necessity ripened her intellect. And many a hard eye moistened as—seeing her glide with her little basket of fancy work along the streets, still murmuring her happy and bird-like snatches of unconnected song—men and children alike said, with respect, in which there was now no contempt, "It's the idiot girl who supports her blind grandfather!"

They called her idiot still!

CHAPTER I.

"Oh, that sweet gleam of sunshine on the lake!"
WILSON'S City of the Plague.

If, reader, you have ever looked through a solar microscope at the monsters in a drop of water, perhaps you have wondered to yourself how things so terrible have been hitherto unknown to you; you have felt a loathing at the limpid element you hitherto deemed so pure; you have half fancied that you would cease to be a water-drinker; yet the next day you have forgotten the grim life that started before you, with its countless shapes, in that teeming globule; and, if so tempted by your thirst, you have not shrunk from the lying crystal, although myriads of the horrible unseen are mangling, devouring, gorging each other, in the liquid you so tranquilly imbibe: so is it with that ancestral and master element called Life. Lapped in your sleek comforts, and lolling on the sofa of your patent conscience—when, perhaps for the first time, you look through the glass of Science upon one ghastly globule in the waters that heave around—that fill up, with their succulence, the pores of earth—that moisten every atom subject to your eyes or handled by your touch—you are startled and dismayed; you say, mentally, "Can such things be? I never dreamed of this before! I thought what was invisible to me was non-existent in itself: I will remember this dread experiment." The next day the experiment is forgotten. The chemist may rarely the globule: can Science make pure the world?

Turn we now to the pleasant surface, seen in the whole, broad and fair to the common eye. Who would judge well of God's great designs, if he could look on no drop pendant from the rose-tree, or sparkling in the sun, without the help of his solar microscope?

It is ten years after the night on which William Gawtreys perished: I transport you, reader, to the fairest scenes in England; scenes consecrated, by the only true pastoral poetry we have known, to Contemplation and Repose.

Autumn had begun to tinge the foliage on the banks of Winandermere. It had been a summer of unusual warmth and beauty; and if that year you had visited the English lakes, you might, from time to time, amid the groups of happy idlers you encountered, have singled out two persons for interest, or, perhaps, for envy: two who might have seemed to you in peculiar harmony with those serene and soft retreats: both young—both beautiful. Lovers you would have guessed them to be; but such lovers as Fletcher might have placed under the care of his "Holy Shepherdess:" forms that might have reclined by

"The virtuous well, about whose flowery banks
The nimble-footed fairies dance their rounds
By the pale moonshine."

For in the love of those persons there seemed a purity and innocence that suited well their youth and the character of their beauty. Perhaps, indeed, on the girl's side, love sprung rather from those affections which the spring of life throws upward to the surface, as the spring of earth does its flowers, than from that concentrated and deep absorption of self in self, which alone promises endurance and devotion, and of which first love, or, rather, first fancy, is often less susceptible than that which grows out of the more thoughtful fondness of maturer years. Yet he, the lover, was of so rare and singular a beauty, that he might well seem calculated to awaken to the utmost the love which wins the heart through the eyes.

But to begin at the beginning. A lady of fashion had, in the autumn previous to the year on which our narrative reopens, taken, with her daughter, a girl then of about eighteen, the tour of the English lakes. Charmed by the beauty of Winandermere, and finding one of the most commodious villas on its banks to be let, they had remained there all the winter. In the early spring, a severe illness had seized the elder lady; and, finding herself, as she slowly recovered, unfit for the gaieties of a London season, nor unwilling, perhaps—for she had been a beauty in her day—to postpone for another year the début of her daughter, she had continued her sojourn, with short intervals of absence, for a whole year. Her husband, a busy man of the world, with occupation in London, and fine estates in the country, joined them only occasionally, glad to escape the still beauty of landscapes which brought him no rental, and, therefore, afforded no charm to his eye.

In the first month of their arrival at Winandermere, the mother and daughter had made an eventful acquaintance in the following manner.

One evening, as they were walking on their lawn, which sloped to the lake, they heard the sound of a flute, played with a skill so exquisite as to draw them, surprised and spellbound, to the banks. The musician was a young man, in a boat, which he had moored beneath the trees of their demesne. He was alone, or, rather, he had one companion in a large Newfoundland dog, that sat watchful at the helm of the boat, and appeared to enjoy the music as much as his master. As the ladies approached the spot, the dog growled, and the young man ceased, though without seeing the fair causes of his companion's displeasure. The sun, then setting, shone full on his countenance as he looked round; and that countenance was one that might have haunted the nymphs of Delos; the face of Apollo, not as the hero, but the shepherd—not of the bow, but of the lute—not of the Python-slayer, but the young dreamer by shady places—he whom the sculptor has portrayed leaning idly against the tree—the boy-god whose home is yet on earth, and to whom the Oracle and the Spheres are still unknown.

At that moment the dog leaped from the boat, and the elderly lady uttered a faint cry of alarm, which, directing the attention of the musician, brought him also ashore. He called off his dog, and apologised, with a not ungraceful mixture of diffidence and ease, for his intrusion. He was not aware the place was inhabited—it was a favourite haunt of his—he lived near. The elder lady was pleased with his address, and struck with his appearance. There was, indeed, in his manner that indefinable charm, which is more attractive than mere personal appearance, and which can never be imitated or acquired. They parted, however, without establishing any formal acquaintance. A few days after, they met at dinner at a neighbouring house, and were introduced by name. That of the young man seemed strange to the ladies; not so theirs to him. He turned pale when he heard it, and remained silent and aloof the rest of the evening. They met again, and often; and for some weeks—nay, even for months—he appeared to avoid, as much as possible, the acquaintance so auspiciously begun; but, by little and little, the beauty of the younger lady seemed to gain ground on his diffidence or repugnance. Excursions among the neighbouring mountains threw them together, and at last he fairly surrendered himself to the charm he had at first determined to resist.

This young man lived on the opposite side of the lake, in a quiet household, of which he was the idol. His life had been one of almost monastic purity and repose; his tastes were accomplished, his character seemed soft and gentle; but beneath that calm exterior, flashes of passion—the nature of the poet, ardent and sensitive—would break forth at times. He had scarcely ever, since his earliest childhood, quitted those retreats; he knew nothing of the world, except in books—books of poetry and romance. Those with whom he lived—his relations, an old bachelor, and the old bachelor's sisters, old maids—seemed equally innocent and inexperienced. It was a family whom the rich respected and the poor loved—inoffensive, charitable, and well off. To whatever their easy fortune might be, he appeared the heir. The name of this young man was Charles Spencer; the ladies were Mrs. Beaufort, and Camilla, her daughter.

Mrs. Beaufort, though a shrewd woman, did not at first perceive any danger in the growing intimacy between Camilla and the young Spencer. Her daughter was not her favourite—not the object of her one thought or ambition. Her whole heart and soul were wrapped in her son Arthur, who lived principally abroad. Clever enough to be considered capable, when he pleased, of achieving distinction; good-looking enough to be thought handsome by all who were on the qui vive for an advantageous match; good-natured enough to be popular with the society in which he lived, scattering to and fro money without limit, Arthur Beaufort, at the age of thirty, had established one of those brilliant and evanescent reputations, which, for a few years, reward the ambition of the fine gentleman. It was precisely the reputation that the mother could appreciate, and which even the more saving father secretly admired, while, ever respectable in phrase, Mr. Robert Beaufort seemed openly to regret. This son was, I say, every thing to them; they cared little, in comparison, for their daughter. How could a daughter keep up the proud name of Beaufort? However well she might marry, it was another house, not theirs, which her graces and beauty would adorn. Moreover, the better she might marry, the greater her dowry would naturally be—the dowry to go out of the family! And Arthur, poor fellow! was so extravagant, that really he would want every sixpence. Such was the reasoning of the father. The mother reasoned less upon the matter. Mrs. Beaufort, faded and meagre, in blonde and cachemere, was jealous of the charms of her daughter; and she herself, as silly women often do, growing sentimental and lachrymose as she advanced in life, had convinced herself that Camilla was a girl of no feeling.

Miss Beaufort was, indeed, of a character singularly calm and placid; it was the character that charms men in proportion, perhaps, to their own strength and passion. She had been rigidly brought up; her affections had been very early chilled and subdued; they moved, therefore, now, with ease, in the serene path of her duties. She held her parents, especially her father, in reverential fear, and never dreamed of the possibility of resisting one of their wishes, much less their commands. Pious, kind, gentle, of a fine and never-ruffled temper, Camilla, an admirable daughter, was likely to make no less admirable a wife; you might depend on her principles, if ever you could doubt her affection. Few girls were more calculated to inspire love. You would scarcely wonder at any folly, any madness, which even a wise man might commit for her sake. This did not depend on her beauty alone, though she was extremely lovely rather than handsome, and of that style of loveliness which is universally fascinating: the figure, especially as to the arms, throat, and bust, was exquisite; the eyes of that velvet softness which to look on is to love. But her charm was in a certain prettiness of manner, an exceeding innocence mixed with the most captivating, because unconscious, coquetry. With all this there was a freshness, a joy, a virgin and bewitching candour in her voice, her laugh—so you might also say in her very movements. Such was Camilla Beaufort at that age. Such she seemed to others. To her parents she was only a great girl rather in the way. To Mrs. Beaufort a rival, to Mr. Beaufort an encumbrance on the property.

I see him not; some cloud envelopes him."

Id.

One day (nearly a year after their first introduction), as, with a party of friends, Camilla and Charles Spencer were riding through those wild and romantic scenes which lie between the sunny Winandermere and the dark and sullen Westwater, their conversation fell on topics more personal than it had hitherto done; for, as yet, if they felt love, they had never spoken of it.

The narrowness of the path allowed only two to ride abreast, and the two to whom I confine my description, were the last of the little band.

"How I wish Arthur were here!" said Camilla; "I am sure you would like him."

"Are you? He lives much in the world—the world of which I know nothing. Are we, then, characters to suit each other?"

"He is the kindest—the best of human beings!" said Camilla, rather evasively, but with more warmth than usually dwelt in her soft and low voice.

"Is he so kind?" returned Spencer, musingly. "Well, it may be so. And who would not be kind to you? Ah! it is a beautiful connection, that of brother and sister: I never had a sister."

"Have you then a brother?" asked Camilla, in some surprise, and turning her ingenuous eyes full on her companion.

Spencer's colour rose—rose to his temples: his voice trembled as he answered "No—no brother!" then, speaking in a rapid and hurried tone, he continued, "My life has been a strange and lonely one. I am an orphan. I have mixed with few of my own age; my boyhood and youth have been spent in these scenes; my education such as nature and books could bestow, with scarcely any guide or tutor save my guardian—the dear old man! Thus the world, the stir of cities, ambition, enterprise, all seem to me as things belonging to a distant land to which I shall never wander. Yet I have had my dreams, Miss Beaufort; dreams of which these solitudes still form a part; but solitudes not unshared. And lately I have thought that those dreams might be prophetic. And you—do you love the world?"

"I, like you, have scarcely tried it," said Camilla, with a sweet laugh. "But I love the country better—oh! far better than what little I have seen of towns. But for you," she continued, with a charming hesitation, "a man is so different from us—for you to shrink from the world—you, so young, and with talents too—nay, it is true!—it seems to me strange."

"It may be so, but I cannot tell you what feelings of dread—what vague forebodings of terror seize me if I carry my thoughts beyond these retreats. Perhaps my good guardian—"

"Your uncle?" interrupted Camilla.

"Ay, my uncle—may have contributed to engender feelings, as you say, strange at my age; but still—"

"Still what?"

"My earlier childhood," continued Spencer, breathing hard and turning pale, "was not spent in the happy home I have now; it was passed in a premature ordeal of suffering and pain. Its recollections have left a dark shadow on my mind, and under that shadow lies every thought that points towards the troublous and labouring career of other men. But," he resumed, after a pause, and in a deep, earnest, almost solemn voice, "but, after all, is this cowardice or wisdom? I find no monotony, no tedium in this quiet life. Is there not a certain morality, a certain religion in the spirit of a secluded and country existence? In it we do not know the evil passions which ambition and strife are said to arouse. I never feel jealous or envious of other men; I never know what it is to hate; my boat, my horse, our garden, music, books, and, if I may dare to say so, the solemn gladness that comes from the hopes of another life—these fill up every hour with thoughts and pursuits, peaceful, happy, and without a cloud, till of late, when—when—"

"When what?" said Camilla; innocently.

"When I have longed, but did not dare, to ask another if to share such a lot would content her!"

He bent, as he spoke, his soft blue eyes full upon the blushing face of her whom he addressed, and Camilla half smiled and half sighed, "Our companions are far before us," said she, turning away her face; "and, see, the road is now smooth." She quickened her horse's pace as she said this; and Spencer, too new to women to interpret favourably her evasion of his words and looks, fell into a profound silence, which lasted during the rest of their excursion.

As, towards the decline of day, he bent his solitary way home, emotions and passions to which his life had hitherto been a stranger, and which, alas! he had vainly imagined a life so tranquil kept everlastingly restrained, swelled his heart.

"She does not love me," he muttered, half aloud; "she will leave me, and what then will all the beauty of the landscape seem in my eyes? And how dare I look up to her? Even if her cold, vain mother—her father, the man, they say, of forms and scruples, were to consent, would they not question closely of my true birth and origin? And if the one blot were overlooked, is there no other? His early habits and vices—his!—a brother's—his unknown career terminating at any day, perhaps, in shame, in crime, in exposure, in the gibbet—will they overlook this?" As he spoke he groaned aloud; and, as if impatient to escape himself, spurred on his horse, and rested not till he reached the belt of trim and sober evergreens that surrounded his hitherto happy home.

Leaving his horse to find its way to the stables, the young man passed through rooms, which he found deserted, to the lawn on the other side, which sloped to the smooth waters of the lake.

Here, seated under the one large tree that formed the pride of the lawn, over which it cast its shadow broad and far, he perceived his guardian poring idly over an oft-read book—one of those books of which literary dreamers are apt to grow fantastically fond—books by the old English writers, full of phrases and conceits half quaint and half sublime, interspersed with praises of the country, imbued with a poetical rather than orthodox religion, and adorned with a strange mixture of monastic learning and aphorisms collected from the weary experience of actual life.

To the left, by a greenhouse, built between the house and the lake, might be seen the white dress and lean form of the eldest spinster sister, to whom the care of the flowers—for she had been early crossed in love—was consigned; at a little distance from her the other two were seated at work, and conversing in whispers, not to disturb their studious brother, no doubt upon the nephew, who was their all in all. It was the calmest hour of eve; and the quiet of the several forms—their simple and harmless occupations, if occupations they might be called—the breathless foliage rich in the depth of summer; behind, the old-fashioned house, unpretending, not mean, its open doors and windows giving glimpses of the comfortable repose within; before, the lake, without a ripple, and catching the gleam of the sunset clouds—all made a picture of that complete tranquillity and stillness which sometimes soothes and sometimes saddens us, according as we are in the temper to woo CONTENT.

The young man glided to his guardian and touched his shoulder: "Sir, may I speak to you? Hush! they need not see us now! It is only you I would speak with."

The elder Spencer rose; and, with his book still in his hand, moved side by side with his nephew under the shadow of the tree and towards a walk to the right, which led for a short distance along the margin of the lake, backed by the interlaced boughs of a thick copse.

"Sir!" said the young man, speaking first, and with a visible effort, "your cautions have been in vain! I love this girl—this daughter of the haughty Beauforts! I love her—better than life I love her!"

"My poor boy," said the uncle, tenderly, and with a simple fondness passing his arm over the speaker's shoulder, "do not think I can chide you: I know what it is to love in vain!"

"In vain! but why in vain?" exclaimed the younger Spencer, with a vehemence that had in it something of both agony and fierceness. "She may love me—she shall love me!" and, almost for the first time in his life, the proud consciousness of his rare gifts of person spoke in his kindled eye and dilated stature. "Do they not say that nature has been favourable to me? What rival have I here? Is she not young? And (sinking his voice till it almost breathed like music) is not love contagious?"

"I do not doubt that she may love you—who would not? But—but—the parents—will they ever consent?"

"Nay!" answered the lover, as, with that inconsistency common to passion, he now argued stubbornly against those fears in another to which he had just before yielded in himself, "nay! after all, am I not of their own blood? Do I not come from the elder branch? Was I not reared in equal luxury and with higher hopes? And my mother—my poor mother—did she not to the last maintain our birthright—her own honour? Has not accident or law unjustly stripped us of our true station? Is it not for us to forgive spoliation? Am I not, in fact, the person who descends—who forgets the wrongs of the dead, the heritage of the living?"

The young man had never yet assumed this tone—had never yet shown that he looked back to the history connected with his birth with the feelings of resentment and the memory of wrong. It was a tone contrary to his habitual calm and contentment—it struck forcibly on his listener—and the elder Spencer was silent for some moments before he replied, "If you feel thus (and it is natural) you have yet stronger reason to struggle against this unhappy affection."

"I have been conscious of that, sir," replied Spencer, mournfully. "I have struggled; and I say again it is in vain! I turn, then, to face the obstacles! My birth—let us suppose that the Beauforts overlook it. Did you not tell me that Mr. Beaufort wrote to inform you of the abrupt and intemperate visit of my brother—of his determination never to forgive it? I think I remember something of this years ago."

"It is true!" said the guardian; "and the conduct of that brother is, in fact, the true cause why you never ought to reassume your proper name—never to divulge it, even to the family with whom you connect yourself by marriage; but, above all, to the Beauforts, who, for that cause, if that cause alone, would reject your suit."

The young man groaned—placed one hand before his eyes, and with the other grasped his guardian's arm convulsively, as if to check him from proceeding farther; but the good man, not divining his meaning and absorbed in his subject, went on, irritating the wound he had touched.

"Reflect! your brother, in boyhood—in the dying hours of his mother, scarcely saved from the crime of a thief; flying from a friendly pursuit with a notorious reprobate; afterward implicated in some discreditable transaction about a horse; rejecting all—every hand that could save him; clinging by choice to the lowest companions and the meanest habits; disappearing from the country, and last seen, ten years ago—the beard not yet on his chin—with that same reprobate of whom I have spoken, in Paris, a day or so only before his companion, a coiner—a murderer—fell by the hands of the police! You remember that when, in your seventeenth year, you evinced some desire to retake your name—nay, even to refund that guilty brother, I placed before you, as a sad and terrible duty, the newspaper that contained the particulars of the death and the former adventures of that wretched accomplice, the notorious Gawtreys; and, telling you that Mr. Beaufort had long since written to inform me that his own son and Lord Lilburne had seen your brother in company with the miscreant just before his fate—nay, was, in all probability, the very youth described in the account as found in his chamber and escaping the pursuit, I asked you if you would now venture to leave that disguise—that shelter under which you would for ever be safe from the opprobrium of the world—from the shame that, sooner or later, your brother must bring upon your name!"

"It is true—it is true!" said the pretended nephew, in a tone of great anguish, and with trembling lips which the blood had forsaken. "Horrible to look either to his past or his future! But—but—we have heard of him no more; no one ever has learned his fate. Perhaps—perhaps (and he seemed to breathe more freely)—my brother is no more!"

And poor Catharine—and poor Philip—had it come to this? Did the one brother feel a sentiment of release, of joy, in conjecturing the death—perhaps the death of violence and shame—of his fellow-orphan? Mr. Spencer shook his head doubtfully, but made no reply. The young man sighed heavily, and strode on for several paces in advance of his protector; then, turning back, he laid his hand on his shoulder:

"Sir," he said, in a low voice and with downcast eyes, "you are right: this disguise—this false name—must be for ever borne! Why need the Beauforts, then, ever know who and what I am? Why not, as your nephew—nephew to one so respected and exemplary—proffer my claims and plead my cause?"

"They are proud—so it is said—and worldly; you know my family was in trade—still—but—" and here Mr. Spencer broke off from a tone of doubt into that of despondency; "but, recollect, though Mrs. Beaufort may not remember the circumstance, both her husband and her son have seen me—have known my name. Will they not suspect, when once introduced to you, the stratagem that has been adopted? Nay, has it not been from that very fear that you have wished me to shun the acquaintance of the family? Both Mr. Beaufort and Arthur saw you in childhood, and their suspicion once aroused, they may recognise you at once; your features are developed, but not altogether changed. Come, come! my adopted, my dear son, shake off this fantasy sometimes: let us change the scene: I will travel with you—read with you—go where—"

"Sir—sir!" exclaimed the lover, smiting his breast, "you are ever kind, compassionate, generous; but do not—do not rob me of hope. I have never—thanks to you—felt, save in a momentary dejection, the curse of my birth. Now how heavily it falls! Where shall I look for comfort?"

As he spoke, the sound of a bell broke over the translucent air and the slumbering lake: it was the bell that every eve and morn summoned that innocent and pious family to prayer. The old man's face changed as he heard it—changed from its customary indolent, absent, listless aspect, into an expression of dignity, even of animation.

"Hark!" he said, pointing upward; "hark! it chides you. Who shall say 'where shall I look for comfort' while God is in the heavens?"

The young man, habituated to the faith and observance of religion till they had pervaded his whole nature, bowed his head in rebuke; a few tears stole from his eyes.

"You are right, father," he said tenderly, giving emphasis to the deserved and endearing name. "I am comforted already!"

So, side by side, silently and noiselessly, the young and the old man glided back to the house. When they gained the quiet room in which the family usually assembled, the sisters and servants were already gathered round the table. They knelt as the loiterers entered. It was the wonted duty of the younger Spencer to read the prayers; and, as he now did so, his graceful countenance more hushed, his sweet voice more earnest than usual in its accents, who that heard could have deemed the heart within convulsed by such stormy passions? Or was it not in that hour—that solemn commune—soothed from its woe? Oh, beneficent Creator! thou who inspirest all the tribes of earth with the desire to pray, hast thou not, in that divinest instinct, bestowed on us the happiest of thy gifts?

CHAPTER III.

"Borrom. I mean the business is not ended, as fearing to hear of it hereafter."

1st Soldier. Do you know this Captain Dumaiz?"—W's Well That Ends Well.

One evening, some weeks after the date of the last chapter, Mr. Robert Beaufort sat alone in his house in Grosvenor Square. He had arrived that morning from Beaufort court, on his way to Winandermere, to which he was summoned by a letter from his wife.

That year was an agitated and eventful epoch in England; and Mr. Beaufort had recently gone through the bustle of an election—not, indeed, contested, for his popularity and his property defied all rivalry in his own county.

The rich man had just dined, and was seated in lazy enjoyment by the side of the fire, which he had had lighted less for the warmth—though it was then September—than for the companionship, engaged in finishing his madeira, and, with half-closed eyes, munching his deviled biscuits.

"I am sure," he soliloquised, while thus employed, "I don't know exactly what to do; my wife ought to decide matters where the girl is concerned; a son is another affair: that's the use of a wife. Humph!"

"Sir," said a fat servant, opening the door, "a gentleman wishes to see you upon very particular business."

"Business at this hour! Tell him to go to Mr. Blackwell."

"Yes, sir."

"Stay! perhaps he is a constituent, Simmons. Ask him if he belongs to the county."

"Yes, sir."

"A great estate is a great plague," muttered Mr. Beaufort; "so is a great constituency. It is pleasanter, after all, to be in the House of Lords. I suppose I could if I wished, but then one must rat—that's a bore. I will consult Lilburne. Humph!" The servant reappeared.

"Sir, he says he does belong to the county."

"Show him in! What sort of a person?"

"A sort of gentleman, sir; that is," continued the butler, mindful of five shillings just slipped within his palm by the stranger, "quite the gentleman."

"More wine, then—stir up the fire."

In a few moments the visier was ushered into the apartment. He was a man between fifty and sixty, but still aiming at the appearance of youth. His dress evinced military pretensions; consisting of a blue coat, buttoned up to the chin, a black stock, loose trowsers of the fashion called Cossacks, and brass spurs. He wore a wig, of great luxuriance in curl and rich auburn in hue; with large whiskers of the same colour, slightly tinged with gray at the roots. By the imperfect light of the room it was not perceptible that the clothes were somewhat threadbare, and that the boots, cracked at the side, admitted glimpses of no very white hosiery within. Mr. Beaufort, reluctantly rising from his repose and gladly sinking back to it, motioned to a chair, and put on a doleful and doubtful semi-smile of welcome. The servant placed the wine and glasses before the stranger: the host and visitor were alone.

"So, sir," said Mr. Beaufort, languidly, "you are from —shire; I suppose about the canal: may I offer you a glass of wine?"

"Most hauppy, sir—your health!" and the stranger, with evident satisfaction, tossed off a bumper to so complimentary a toast.

"About the canal?" repeated Mr. Beaufort.

"No, sir, no? You parliament gentlemen must have a vaust deal of trouble on your haunds—very soine property I understaund yours is, sir. Sir, allow me to drink the health of your good lady!"

"I thank you, Mr.—Mr.—what did you say your name was? I beg you a thousand pardons."

"No offaunce in the least, sir; no ceremony with me—this is perticler good madeira!"

"May I ask you how I can serve you?" said

Mr. Beaufort, struggling between the sense of annoyance and the fear to be uncivil. "And, pray, had I the honour of your vote in the last election?"

"No, sir, no! It's mauny years since I have been in your part of the world, though I was born there."

"Then I don't exactly see—" began Mr. Beaufort, and stopped with dignity.

"Why I call on you," put in the stranger, tapping his boots with his cane; and then, recognising the rent, he thrust both feet under the table.

"I don't say that; but at this hour I am seldom at leisure—not but what I am always at the service of a constituent, that is, a voter! I make a distinction between the two—'tis the duty of a member; Mr.—I beg your pardon, I did not catch your name."

"Sir," said the stranger, helping himself to a third glass of wine, "here's a health to your young folk! And now to business." Here the visitor, drawing his chair nearer to his host, assuming a more grave aspect, and dropping something of his stilted pronunciation, continued, "You had a brother?"

"Well, sir," said Mr. Beaufort, with a very changed countenance.

"And that brother had a wife!"

Had a cannon gone off in the ear of Mr. Robert Beaufort, it could not have shocked or stunned him more than that simple word, with which his companion closed his sentence. He fell back in his chair, his lips apart, his eyes fixed on the stranger. He sought to speak, but his tongue clove to his mouth.

"That wife had two sons born in wedlock!"

"It is false!" cried Mr. Beaufort, finding voice at length, and springing to his feet. "And who are you, sir? and what do you mean by—"

"Hush!" said the stranger, perfectly unconcerned, and regaining the dignity of his haw-haw enunciation: "better not let the servants hear anything. For my pawt, I think servants have the longest pair of ears of auny persons, not excepting jaukasses; their ears stretch from the pauntry to the parlour. Hush, sir!—perticler good madeira, this!"

"Sir!" said Mr. Beaufort, struggling to preserve, or, rather, recover his temper, "your conduct is exceedingly strange: but allow me to say that you are wholly misinformed. My brother never did marry; and, if you have anything to say on behalf of those young men—his natural sons—I refer you to my solicitor, Mr. Blackwell, of Lincoln's Inn. I wish you a good evening."

"Sir! the same to you; I won't trouble you auny farther; it was only out of koinddness I called; I am not used to be treated so; sir, I am in his majesty's service; sir, you will foind that the witness of the marriage is forthcoming; you will think of me then, and, perhaps, be sorry. But I've done: Your most obedient humble, sir!" And the stranger, with a flourish of his hand turned to the door.

At the sight of this determination on the part of his strange guest, a cold, uneasy, vague presentment seized Mr. Beaufort. There, not flashed, but rather froze, across him the recollection of his brother's emphatic but disbelieved assurances—of Catharine's obstinate assertion of her sons' alleged rights—of her then hopeless lawsuit: hopeless because the witness she invoked was not found. With this remembrance came a horrible train of shadowy fears—litigation, witnesses, verdict, surrender; spoliation—arrears—ruin!

The man, who had gained the door, turned back and looked at him with a complacent, half-triumphant leer upon his impudent, reckless face.

"Sir," then said Mr. Beaufort, mildly, "I repeat that you had better see Mr. Blackwell."

The tempter saw his triumph. "I have a secret to communicate, which it is best for you to keep snug. How many people do you wish me to see about it? Come, sir, there is no need of a lawyer; or, if you think so, tell him yourself. Now or never, Mr. Beaufort."

"I can have no objection to hear anything you have to say, sir," said the rich man, yet more mildly than before; and then added, with a forced smile, "Though my rights are already too confined to admit of a doubt."

Without heeding the last assertion, the stranger coolly walked back, resumed his seat, and, placing both arms on the table, and looking Mr. Beaufort full in the face, thus proceeded:

"Sir, of the marriage between Philip Beaufort and Catharine Morton there were two witnesses—the one is dead, the other went abroad—the last is alive still!"

"If so," said Mr. Beaufort, who, not naturally deficient in cunning and sense, felt every faculty now prodigiously sharpened, and was resolved to know the precise grounds for alarm; "if so, why did not the man—it was a servant, sir, a man-servant, whom Mrs. Morton pretended to rely on—appear at the trial?"

"Because, I say, he was abroad, and could not be found: or, the search after him miscarried, from clumsy management and a lack of the rhino."

"Hum!" said Mr. Beaufort; "one witness—one witness, observe, there is only one!—does not alarm me much. It is not what a man deposes, it is what a jury believe, sir! Moreover, what has become of the young men? They have never been heard of for years. They are probably dead; if so, I am heir-at-law!"

"I know where one of them is to be found, at all events."

"The elder? Philip?" asked Mr. Beaufort, anxiously, and with a fearful remembrance of the energetic and vehement character prematurely exhibited by his nephew.

"Pawdon me! I need not answer that question."

"Sir! a lawsuit of this nature, against one in possession, is very doubtful," and, added the rich man, drawing himself up, "and, perhaps, very expensive!"

"The young man I speak of does not want friends, who will not grudge the money."

"Sir!" said Mr. Beaufort, rising and placing his back to the fire; "sir! what is your object in this communication? Do you come, on the part of the young men, to propose a compromise? If so, be plain!"

"I come on my own pawt. It rests with you to say if the young men shall never know it!"

"And what do you want?"

"Five hundred a year as long as the secret is kept."

"And how can you prove that there is a secret, after all?"

"By producing the witness, if you wish."

"Will he go halves in the £500 a year?" asked Mr. Beaufort, artfully.

"That is moy affair, sir," replied the stranger.

"What you say," resumed Mr. Beaufort, "is so extraordinary, so unexpected, and still, to me, seems so improbable, that I must have time to consider. If you will call on me in a week, and produce your facts, I will give you my answer. I am not the man, sir, to wish to keep any one out of his true rights; but I will not yield, on the other hand, to imposture."

"If you don't want to keep them out of their rights, I'd best go and tell my young gentlemen," said the stranger, with cool impudence.

"I tell you I must have time," repeated Beaufort, disconcerted. "Besides, I have not myself alone to look to, sir," he added, with dignified emphasis; "I am a father!"

"This day week I will call on you again. Good-evening, Mr. Beaufort!" And the man stretched out his hand with an air of amicable condescension.

The respectable Mr. Beaufort changed colour, hesitated, and finally suffered two fingers to be entered into the grasp of the visiter, whom he ardently wished at that bourn whence no visiter returns.

The stranger smiled, stalked to the door, laid his finger on his lip, winked knowingly, and vanished, leaving Mr. Beaufort a prey to such feelings of uneasiness, dread, and terror, as a man whom, on some inch or two of slippery rock, the tides have suddenly surrounded.

He remained perfectly still for some moments, and then, glancing round the dim and spacious room, his eyes took in all the evidences of luxury and wealth which it betrayed. Above the huge sideboard, that on festive days groaned beneath the hoarded weight of the silver heirlooms of the Beauforts, hung, in its gilded frame, a large picture of the family seat, with the stately porticoes, the noble park, the groups of deer; and around the wall, interspersed here and there with ancestral portraits of knight and dame, long since gathered to their rest, were placed masterpieces of the Italian and Flemish art, which generation after generation had slowly accumulated, till the Beaufort Collection had become the theme of connoisseurs and the study of young genius.

The still room, the dumb pictures, even the heavy sideboard seemed to gain voice, and speak to him audibly. He thrust his hand into the folds of his waistcoat, and gripped his own flesh convulsively; then, striding to and fro the apartment, he endeavoured to re-collect his thoughts.

"I dare not consult Mrs. Beaufort," he muttered; "no—no—she is a fool! Besides, she's not in the way. No time to lose—I will go to Lilburne."

Scarce had that thought crossed him than he hastened to put it into execution. He rang for his hat and gloves, and sallied out on foot to Lord Lilburne's house in Park Lane; the distance was short, and impatience has long strides.

He knew Lord Lilburne was in town, for that personage loved London for its own sake; and, even in September, he would have said with the old Duke of Queensbury, when some one observed that London was very empty, "Yes; but it is fuller than the country."

Mr. Beaufort found Lord Lilburne reclined on a sofa by the open window of his drawing-room, beyond which the early stars shone upon the glimmering trees and silvered turf of the deserted park. Unlike the simple dessert of his respectable brother-in-law, the costliest fruits, the richest wines of France graced the small table placed beside his sofa; and, as the starch man of forms and method entered the room at one door, a rustling silk, that vanished through the aperture of another, seemed to betray tokens of a tête-à-tête, probably more agreeable to Lilburne than the one with which only our narrative is concerned.

It would have been a curious study for such men as love to gaze upon the dark and wily features of human character, to have watched the contrast between the reciter and the listener, as Beaufort, with much circumlocution, much affected disdain, and real anxiety, narrated the singular and ominous conversation between himself and his visiter.

The servant, in introducing Mr. Beaufort, had added to the light of the room; and the candles shone full on the face and form of Mr. Beaufort. All about that gentleman was so completely in unison with the world's forms and seemings, that there was something moral in the very sight of him! Since his fortune, he had grown less pale and less thin; the angles in his figure were filled up. On his brow there was no trace of younger passion. No able vice had ever sharpened the expression, no exhausting vice ever deepened the lines. He was the beau idéal of a county member; so sleek, so staid, so business-like; yet so clean, so neat, so much the gentleman. And now there was a kind of pathos in his gray hairs, his nervous smile, his agitated hands, his quick and uneasy transition of posture, the tremble of his voice. He would have appeared to those who saw, but heard not, the Good Man in trouble. Cold, motionless, speechless, seemingly apathetic, but, in truth, observant, still reclined on the sofa, his head thrown back, but one eye fixed on his companion, his hands clasped before him, Lord Lilburne listened; and in that repose, about his face, even about his person, might be read the history of how different a life and character! What native acuteness in the stealthy eye! What hardened resolve in the full nostril and firm lips! What sardonic contempt for all things in the intricate lines about the mouth! What animal enjoyment of all things so despised in that delicate nervous system, which, combined with original vigour of constitution, yet betrayed itself in the veins on the hands and temples, the occasional quiver of the upper lip! His was the frame, above all others, the most alive to pleasure—deep-chested, compact, sinewy, but thin to leanness; delicate in its texture and extremities almost to effeminacy. The indifference of the posture, the very habit of the dress—not slovenly, indeed, but easy, loose, careless—seemed to speak of the man's manner of thought and life—his profound disdain of externals.

Not till Beaufort had concluded did Lord Lilburne change his position or open his lips; and then, turning to his brother-in-law his calm face, he said dryly.

"I always thought your brother had married that woman; he was the sort of man to do it. Besides, why should she have gone to law without a vestige of proof, unless she was convinced of her rights? Imposture never proceeds without some evidence. Innocence, like a fool, as it is, fancies it has only to speak to be believed. But there is no cause for alarm."

"No cause! And yet you think there was a marriage."

"It is quite clear," continued Lilburne, without heeding this interruption, "that the man, whatever his evidence, has not got sufficient proofs. If he had, he would go to the young men rather than you: it is evident that they would promise infinitely larger rewards than he could expect from yourself. Men are always more generous with what they expect than what they have. All rogues know this. 'Tis the way Jews and usurers thrive upon heirs rather than possessors; 'tis the philosophy of post-obits. I dare say the man has found out the real witness of the marriage; but ascertained, also, that the testimony of that witness would not suffice to dispossess you. He might be discredited: rich men have a way sometimes of discrediting poor witnesses. Mind, he says nothing of the lost copy of the register, whatever may be the value of that document, which I am not lawyer enough to say—of any letters of your brother avowing the marriage. Consider, the register itself is destroyed—the clergyman dead. Pooh! make yourself easy."

"True," said Mr. Beaufort, much comforted; "what a memory you have!"

"Naturally. Your wife is my sister—I hate poor relations—and I was therefore much interested in your accession and your lawsuit. No; you may feel at rest on this matter, so far as a successful lawsuit is concerned. The next question is, will you have a lawsuit at all? and is it worth while buying this fellow? That I can't say, unless I see him myself."

"I wish to Heaven you would!"

"Very willingly: 'tis a sort of thing I like—I'm fond of dealing with rogues—it amuses me. This day week? I'll be at your house—your proxy; I shall do better than Blackwell. And, since you say you are wanted at the Lakes, go down and leave all to me."

"A thousand thanks. I can't say how grateful I am. You certainly are the kindest and cleverest person in the world."

"You can't think worse of the world's cleverness and kindness than I do," was Lilburne's rather ambiguous answer to the compliment. "But why does my sister want to see you?"

"Oh, I forgot! Here is her letter. I was going to ask your advice in this, too."

Lord Lilburne took the letter, and glanced over it with the rapid eye of a man accustomed to seize in every thing the main gist and pith.

"An offer to my pretty niece—Mr. Spencer—requires no fortune—his uncle will settle all his own—(poor silly old man!) All! Why that's only £1000 a year. You don't think much of this, eh? How my sister can even ask you about it puzzles me."

"Why, you see, Lilburne," said Mr. Beaufort, rather embarrassed, "there is no question of fortune—nothing to go out of the family; and, really, Arthur is so expensive; and, if she marry well, I could not give her less than 15 or 20,000."

"Aha! I see; every man to his taste: here a daughter, there a dowry. You are devilish fond of money, Beaufort. Any pleasure in avarice, eh?"

Mr. Beaufort coloured very much at the remark and the question, and, forcing a smile, said,

"You are severe. But you don't know what it is to be father to a young man."

"Then a great many young women have told me sad fables! But you are right in your sense of the phrase. No, I never had an heir-apparent, thank Heaven! No children imposed on me by law: natural enemies, to count the years between the bells that ring for their majority and those that will toll for my decease. It is enough for me that I have a brother and a sister; that my brother's son will inherit my estates; and that, in the mean time, he grudges me every tick in that clock. What then? If he had been my uncle I had done the same. Meanwhile, I see as little of him as good-breeding will permit. On the face of a rich man's heir is written the rich man's memento mori! But, revenons à nos moutons. Yes, if you give your daughter no fortune, your death will be so much the more profitable to Arthur!"

"Really, you take such a very odd view of the matter," said Mr. Beaufort, exceedingly shocked. "But I see you don't like the marriage: perhaps you are right."

"Indeed, I have no choice in the matter; I never interfere between father and children. If I had children myself, I will, however, tell you, for your comfort, that they might marry exactly as they pleased; I would never thwart them. I should be too happy to get them out of my way. If they married well, one would have all the credit; if ill, one would have an excuse to disown them. As I said before, I dislike poor relations. Though, if Camilla lives at the Lakes when she is married, it is but a letter now and then; and that's your wife's trouble, not yours. But, Spencer? what family? Was there not a Spencer who lived at Winandermere—who—"

"Who went with us in search of these boys, to be sure. Very likely the same; nay, he must be so. I thought so at the first."

"Go down to the Lakes to-morrow. You may hear something about your nephews," at that word Mr. Beaufort winced. "'Tis well to be forearmed."

"Many thanks for all your counsel," said Beaufort, rising, and glad to escape; for, though both he and his wife held the advice of Lord Lilburne in the highest reverence, they always smarted beneath the quiet and careless stings which accompanied the honey. Lord Lilburne was singular in this: he would give to any one who asked it, but especially a relation, the best advice in his power; and none gave better, that is, more worldly advice. Thus, without the least benevolence, he was often of the greatest service; but he could not help mixing up the draught with as much aloes and bitter-apple as possible. His intellect delighted in exhibiting itself even gratuitously. His heart was equally delighted in that only cruelty which polished life leaves to its tyrants towards their equals: thrusting pins into the feelings, and breaking self-love upon the wheel. But, just as Mr. Beaufort had drawn on his gloves and gained the doorway, a thought seemed to strike Lord Lilburne.

"By the by," he said, "you understand that when I promised I would try and settle the matter for you, I only meant that I would learn the exact causes you have for alarm on the one hand, or for a compromise with this fellow on the other. If the last be advisable, you are aware that I cannot interfere. I might get into a scrape; and Beaufort Court is not my property."

"I don't quite understand you."

"I am plain enough, too. If there is money to be given, it is given in order to defeat what is called justice—to keep these nephews of yours out of their inheritance. Now, should this ever come to light, it would have an ugly appearance. They who risk the blame must be the persons who possess the estate."

"If you think it dishonourable or dishonest—" said Beaufort, irresolutely.

"I! I never can advise as to the feelings; I can only advise as to the policy. If you don't think there ever was a marriage, it may be honest in you to prevent the bore of a lawsuit."

"But if he can prove to me that they were married?"

"Pooh!" said Lilburne, raising his eyebrows with a slight expression of contemptuous impatience; "it rests on yourself whether or not he prove it to your satisfaction! For my part, as a third person, I am persuaded the marriage did take place. But if I had Beaufort Court, my convictions would be all the other way. You understand. I am too happy to serve you. But no man can be expected to jeopardise his character, or coquet with the law, unless it be for his own individual interest. Then, of course, he must judge for himself. Adieu! I expect some friends—foreigners—Carlists—to whist. You won't join them?"

"I never play, you know. You will write to me at Winandermere; and, at all events, you will keep off the man till I return?"

"Certainly."

Beaufort, whom the latter part of the conversation had comforted far less than the former, hesitated, and turned the door-handle three or four times; but, glancing towards his brother-in-law, he saw in that cold face so little hope of sympathy in the struggle between interest and conscience, that he judged it best to withdraw at once.

As soon as he was gone, Lilburne summoned his valet, who had lived with him many years, and who was his confidant in all the adventurous gallantries with which he still enlivened the autumn of his life.

"Dykeman," said he, "you have let out that lady?"

"Yes, my lord."

"I am not at home if she calls again. She is stupid; she cannot get the girl to come to her again. I shall trust you with an adventure, Dykeman; an adventure that will remind you of our young days, man. This charming creature—I tell you she is irresistible—her very oddities bewitch me. You must—well, you look uneasy. What would you say?"

"My lord, I have found more about her—and—"

"Well, well."

The valet drew near, and whispered something in his master's ear.

"They are idiots who say it, then," answered Lilburne.

"And," faltered the man, with the shame of humanity on his face, "she is not worthy your lordship's notice; a poor—"

"Yes, I know she is poor; and, for that reason, there can be no difficulty if the thing is properly managed. You never, perhaps, heard of a certain Philip, King of Macedon; but I will tell you what he once said, as well as I can remember it: 'Lead an ass with a pannier of gold: send the ass into the gates of a city, and all the sentinels will run away.' Poor! Where there is love there is charity also, Dykeman. Besides—"

Here Lilburne's countenance assumed a sudden aspect of dark and angry passion; he broke off abruptly, rose, and paced the room, muttering to himself. Suddenly he stopped, and put his hand to his hip, as an expression of pain again altered the character of his face.

"The limb pains me still. Dykeman—I was scarce—twenty-one—when—I became a cripple for life." He paused, and drew a long breath, smiled, rubbed his hands gently, and added, "Never fear—you shall be the ass; and thus Philip of Macedon begins to fill the pannier." And he tossed his purse into the hands of the valet, whose face seemed to lose its anxious embarrassment at the touch of the gold. Lilburne glanced at him with a quiet sneer: "Go! I will give you my orders when I undress."

"Yes!" he repeated to himself, "the limb pains me still. But he died!—shot as a man would shoot a jay or a polecat! I have the newspaper still in that drawer. He died an outcast—a felon—a murderer! And I blazed his name—and I seduced his mistress—and I—am John Lord Lilburne!"

About ten o'clock, some half a dozen of those gay lovers of London, who, like Lilburne, remain faithful to its charms when more vulgar worshippers desert its sunburned streets—mostly single men—mostly men of middle age—dropped in. And soon after came three or four high-born foreigners, who had followed into England the exile of the unfortunate Charles X. Their looks, at once proud and sad—their mustaches curled downward—their beards permitted to grow—made at first a strong contrast with the smooth, gay Englishmen. But Lilburne, who was fond of French society, and who, when he pleased, could be courteous and agreeable, soon placed the exiles at their ease; and, in the excitement of high play, all differences of mood and humour speedily vanished. Morning was in the skies before they sat down to supper.

"You have been very fortunate to-night, milord," said one of the Frenchmen, with an envious tone of congratulation.

"But, indeed," said another, who, having been several times his host's partner, had won largely, "you are the finest player, milord, I ever encountered."

"Always excepting Monsieur Deschapelles and *," replied Lilburne, indifferently. And, turning the conversation, he asked one of the guests why he had not introduced him to a French officer of merit and distinction: "with whom," said Lord Lilburne, "I understand that you are intimate, and of whom I hear your countrymen very often speak."

"You mean De Vaudemont. Poor fellow!" said a middle-aged Frenchman, of a graver appearance than the rest.

"But why 'poor fellow,' Monsieur de Liancourt?"

"He was rising so high before the revolution. There was not a braver officer in the army. But he is but a soldier of fortune, and his career is closed."

"Till the Bourbons return," said another Carlisle, playing with his mustache.

"You will really honour me much by introducing me to him," said Lord Lilburne. "De Vaudemont—it is a good name—perhaps, too, he plays at whist."

"But," observed one of the Frenchmen, "I am by no means sure that he has the best right in the world to the name. 'Tis a strange story."

"May I hear it?" asked the host.

"Certainly. It is briefly this: There was an old Vicomte de Vaudemont about Paris—of good birth, but extremely poor—a mauvais sujet. He had already had two wives, and run through their fortunes. Being old and ugly, and men who survive two wives having a bad reputation among marriageable ladies at Paris, he found it difficult to get a third. Despairing of the noblesse, he went among the bourgeoisie with that hope. His family were kept in perpetual fear of a ridiculous mésalliance. Among these relations was Madame de Merville, whom you may have heard of."

"Madame de Merville! Ah, yes! Handsome, was she not?"

"It is true. Madame de Merville, whose failing was pride, was known more than once to have bought off the matrimonial inclinations of the amorous vicomte. Suddenly there appeared in her circles a very handsome young man. He was presented formally to her friends as the son of the Vicomte de Vaudemont by his second marriage with an English lady, brought up in England, and now, for the first time, publicly acknowledged. Some scandal was circulated—"

"Sir," interrupted Monsieur de Liancourt, very gravely, "the scandal was such as all honourable men must stigmatise and despise—it was only to be traced to some lying lackey—a scandal that the young man was already the lover of a woman of stainless reputation the very first day that he entered Paris! I answer for the falsity of that report. But that report, I own, was one that decided not only Madame de Merville, who was a sensitive—too sensitive a person, but my friend young De Vaudemont, to a marriage, from the pecuniary advantages of which he was too high-spirited not to shrink."

"No," said De Liancourt, somewhat sadly, "it was not so decreed; for De Vaudemont, with a feeling which belongs to a gentleman, and which I honour, while deeply and gratefully attached to Madame de Merville, desired that he might first carve for himself, at least, some honourable distinction before he claimed a hand to which men of fortunes so much higher had aspired in vain. I am not ashamed," he added, after a short pause, "to say that I had been one of the rejected suitors, and that I still revere the memory of Eugenie de Merville. The young man, therefore, was to have entered my regiment. Before, however, he had joined it, and while yet in the full flush of a young man's love for a woman formed to excite the strongest attachment, she—she—" The Frenchman's voice trembled, and he resumed, with affected composure, "Madame de Merville, who had the best and kindest heart that ever beat in a human breast, learned one day that there was a poor widow in the garret of the hotel she inhabited who was dangerously ill—without medicine and without food—having lost her only friend and supporter in her husband some time before. In the impulse of the moment, Madame de Merville tended herself this widow—caught the fever that preyed upon her—was confined to her bed ten days—and died, as she had lived, in serving others and forgetting self. And so much, sir, for the scandal you speak of!"

"A warning," observed Lord Lilburne, "against trifling with one's health by that vanity of parading a kind heart which is called charity. If charity, mon cher, begins at home, it is in the drawing-room, not the garret!"

The Frenchman looked at his host in some disdain, bit his lip, and was silent.

"But still," resumed Lord Lilburne, "still it is probable that your old vicomte had a son; and I can so perfectly understand why he did not wish to be embarrassed with him as long as he could help it, that I do not understand why there should be any doubt of the younger De Vaudemont's parentage."

"Because," said the Frenchman who had first commenced the narrative, "because the young man refused to take the legal steps to proclaim his birth and naturalise himself a Frenchman; because, no sooner was Madame de Merville dead, than he forsook the father he had so newly discovered—forsook France, and entered with some other officers, under the brave *, in the service of one of the native princes of India."

"But perhaps he was poor," observed Lord Lilburne. "A father is a very good thing, and a country is a very good thing, but still a man must have money; and if your father does not do much for you, somehow or other, your country generally follows his example."

"My lord," said De Liancourt, "my friend here has forgotten to say that Madame de Merville left to young Vaudemont the bulk of her fortune; and that, when sufficiently recovered from the stupor of his grief, he summoned her relations round him, declared that her memory was too dear to him for wealth to console him for her loss, and, reserving to himself but a modest and bare sufficiency for the common necessities of a gentleman, he divided the rest among them, and repaired to the East, not only to conquer his sorrow by the novelty and stir of an exciting life, but to carve out with his own hand the reputation of an honourable and brave man. My friend remembered the scandal long buried—he forgot the generous action."

"Your friend, you see, my dear Monsieur de Liancourt," remarked Lilburne, "is more a man of the world than you are!"

"And I was just going to observe," said the friend thus referred to, "that that very action seemed to confirm the rumour that there had been some little manœuvring as to this unexpected addition to the name of De Vaudemont; for, if himself related, however distantly, to Madame de Merville, why have such scruples to receive her bequest?"

"A very shrewd remark," said Lord Lilburne, looking with some respect at the speaker; "and I own that it is a very unaccountable proceeding, and one of which I don't think you or I would ever have been guilty. Well, and the old vicomte!"

"Did not long live!" said the Frenchman, evidently gratified by his host's compliment, while De Liancourt threw himself back in his chair in grave displeasure. "The young man remained some years in India; and, when he returned to Paris, our friend here, Monsieur de Liancourt (then in favour with Charles X.) and Madame de Merville's relations, took him up. He had already acquired a reputation in this foreign service, and he obtained a place at the court, and a commission in the king's guards. I allow that he would certainly have made a career, had it not been for the three days. As it is, you see him in London, like the rest of us, an exile!"

"And, I suppose, without a sou."

"No; I believe that he had still saved, and even augmented in India, the portion he allotted to himself from Madame de Merville's bequest."

"And if he don't play whist, he ought to play it," said Lilburne. "You have roused my curiosity: I hope you will let me make his acquaintance, Monsieur de Liancourt. I am no politician, but allow me to propose this toast: 'Success to those who have the wit to plan and the strength to execute.' In other words, 'The Right Divine!'"

Soon afterward the guests retired.

CHAPTER IV.

"Res. Happily he's the second time come to them."

Hamlet.

It was the evening after that in which the conversations recorded in our last chapter were held—evening in the quiet suburb of H—. The desertion and silence of the metropolis in September had extended to its neighbouring hamlets—a village in the heart of the country could scarcely have seemed more still—the lamps were lighted, many of the shops already closed, a few of the sober couples and retired spinsters of the place might here and there be seen slowly wandering homeward after their evening walk; two or three dogs, in spite of the prohibitions of the magistrates placarded on the walls—manifestoes which threatened all such stragglers with death, and all the inhabitants with madness—were playing in the main road, disturbed from time to time as the slow coach, plying between the city and the suburb, crawled along the thoroughfare, or as the brisk mails whirled rapidly by, announced by the cloudy dust and the guard's lively horn. Gradually even these evidences of life ceased; the saunterers disappeared, the mails had passed, the dogs gave place to the later and more stealthy perambulations of their feline successors "who love the moon." At unfrequent intervals, the more important shops—the linen drapers', the chymists', and the gin-palace—still poured out across the shadowy road their streams of light from windows yet unclosed. But, with these exceptions, the business of the place stood still.

At this time there emerged from a milliner's house (shop, to outward appearance, it was not, evincing its gentility and its degree above the Capelocracy, to use a certain classical neologism, by a brass plate on an oak door, whereon was graven, "Miss Semper, Milliner and Dressmaker, from Madame Devy")—at this time, I say, and from this house, there emerged the light and graceful form of a young female. She held in her left hand a little basket, of the contents of which (for it was empty) she had apparently just disposed; and, as she stepped across the road, the lamplight fell on a face in the first bloom of youth, and characterised by an expression of childlike innocence and candour. It was a face regularly and exquisitely lovely, yet something there was in the aspect that saddened you; you knew not why, for it was not sad itself; on the contrary, the lips smiled and the eyes sparkled. As she now glided along the shadowy street with a light, quick step, a man, who had hitherto been concealed by the portico of an attorney's house, advanced stealthily, and followed her at a little distance. Unconscious that she was dogged, and seemingly fearless of all danger, the girl went lightly on, swinging her basket playfully to and fro, and chanting, in a low but musical tone, some verses, that seemed rather to belong to the nursery than to that age which the fair singer had attained.

As she came to an angle which the main street formed with a lane narrow and partially lighted, a policeman stationed there looked hard at her, and then touched his hat with an air of respect, in which there seemed also a little of compassion,

"Good-night to you," said the girl, passing him, and with a frank, gay tone.

"Shall I attend you home, miss?" said the man.

"What for? I am very well!" answered the young woman, with an accent and look of innocent surprise.

Just at this time, the man who had hitherto followed her gained the spot and turned down the lane.

"Yes," replied the policeman; "but it is getting dark, miss."

"So it is every night when I walk home, except there's a moon. Good-bye. The moon," she repeated to herself, as she walked on, "I use to be afraid of the moon when I was a little child;" and then, after a pause, she murmured, in a low chant,

"The moon, she is a wandering ghost,
That walks in penance nightly,
How sad she is, that wandering moon,
For all she shines so brightly!"

"I watched her eyes when I was young,
Until they turned my brain,
And now I often weep to think
'Twill ne'er be right again."

As the murmur of these words died at a distance down the lane in which the girl had disappeared, the policeman, who had paused to listen, shook his head mournfully, and said, while he moved on,

"Poor thing! they should not let her always go about by herself: and yet, who would harm her?"

Meanwhile the girl proceeded along the lane, which was skirted by small but not mean houses, till it terminated in a cross-stile that admitted into a churchyard. Here hung the last lamp in the path, and a few dim stars broke palely over the long grass and scattered grave-stones, without piercing the deep shadow which the church threw over a large portion of the sacred ground. Just as she passed the stile, the man whom we have before noticed, and who had been leaning, as if waiting for some one, against the pales, approached, and said gently,

"Ah, miss? it is a lone place for one so beautiful as you are to be alone. You ought never to be on foot."

The girl stopped, and looked full, but without any alarm in her eyes, into the man's face.

"Go away!" she said, with half peevish, half kindly tone of command. "I don't know you."

"But I have been sent to speak to you by one who does know you, miss—one who loves you to distraction; he has seen you before at Mrs. West's. He is so grieved to think that you should walk—you, who ought, he says to have every luxury—that he has sent his carriage for you. It is on the other side of the yard. Do come, now;" and he laid his hand, though very lightly, on her arm.

"At Mrs. West's!" she said; and, for the first time, her voice and look showed fear. "Go away directly! How dare you touch Fanny!"

"But, my dear miss, you have no idea how my employer loves you, and how rich he is. See, he has sent you all this money; it is gold—real gold. You may have what you like if you will but come. Now don't be silly, miss."

The girl made no answer, but, with a sudden spring, passed the man, and ran lightly and rapidly along the path, in an opposite direction from that to which the tempter had pointed when inviting her to the carriage. The man, surprised but not baffled, reached her in an instant, and caught hold of her dress.

"Stay! you must come—you must!" he said, threateningly; and loosening his grasp on her shawl, he threw his arms round her waist.

"Don't!" cried the girl, pleadingly, and apparently subdued, turning her fair, soft face upon her pursuer, and clasping her hands. "Be quiet! Fanny is silly! No one is ever rude to poor Fanny!"

"And no one will be rude to you, miss," said the man, apparently touched; "but I dare not go without you. You don't know what you refuse. 'Come!' and he attempted gently to draw her back.

"No, no,!" said the girl, changing from supplication to anger, and raising her voice into a loud shriek, "No! I will—"

"Nay, then," interrupted the man, looking round anxiously; and, with a quick and dexterous movement, he threw a large handkerchief over her face, and as he held it fast to her lips with one hand, he lifted her from the ground. Still violently struggling, the girl contrived to remove the handkerchief, and once more her shriek of terror rang through the violated sanctuary.

At that instant a loud, deep voice was heard, "Who calls?" And a tall figure seemed to rise, as from the grave itself, and emerge from the shadow of the church. A moment more, and a strong gripe was laid on the shoulder of the ravisher. "What is this? On God's ground, too! Release her, wretch!"

The man, trembling, half with superstitious, half with bodily fear, let go of his captive, who fell at once at the knees of her deliverer.

"Don't hurt me too," she said, as the tears rolled down her eyes. "I am a good girl—and my grandfather's blind."

The stranger bent down and raised her; then looking round for the assailant with an eye whose dark fire shone through the gloom, he perceived the coward stealing off. He disdained to pursue.

"My poor child," said he, with that voice which the strong assume to the weak—the man to some wounded infant—the voice of tender superiority and compassion, "there is no cause for fear now. Be soothed. Do you live near. Shall I see you home?"

"Thank you! That's kind! Pray do!" And, with an infantine confidence, she took his hand, as a child does that of a grown up person; so they walked on together.

"And," said the stranger, "do you know that man? Has he insulted you before?"

"No—don't talk of him: ce me fait mal!" And she put her hand to her forehead.

The French was spoken with so French an accent, that, in some curiosity, the stranger cast his eye over her plain dress.

"You speak French well."

"Do I? I wish I knew more words; I only recollect a few. When I am very happy or very sad they come into my head. But I am happy now. I like your voice—I like you. Oh! I have dropped my basket!"

"Shall I go back for it, or shall I buy you another?"

"Another! Oh, no! come back for it. How kind you are! Ah! I see it!" and she broke away and ran forward to pick it up.

When she had recovered it, she laughed—she spoke to it—she kissed it.

Her companion smiled as he said,

"Some sweetheart has given you that basket—it seems but a common basket, too."

"I have had it—oh, ever since—since—I don't know how long! It came with me from France—it was full of little toys. They are gone—I am sorry!"

"How old are you?"

"I don't know."

"My pretty one," said the stranger, with deep pity in his rich voice, "your mother should not let you go out alone at this hour."

"Mother! mother!" repeated the girl, in a tone of surprise.

"Have you no mother?"

"No! I had a father once. But he died, they say. I did not see him die. I sometimes cry when I think that I shall never, never see him again!"

But," she said, changing her accent from melancholy almost to joy, "he is to have a grave here like the other girls' fathers—a fine stone upon it—and all to be done with my money!"

"Your money, my child!"

"Yes, the money I make. I sell my work and take the money to my grandfather; but I lay by a little every week for a gravestone for my father."

"Will the gravestone be placed in that churchyard?" They were now in another lane, and, as he spoke, the stranger checked her, and, bending down to look into her face, murmured to himself, "Is it possible? Yes, it must be—it must!"

"Yes! I love that churchyard; my brother told me to put flowers there; and grandfather and I sit there in the summer, without speaking. But I don't talk much, I like singing better:

All things that good and harmless are,
Are taught, they say, to sing;
The maiden resting at her work,
The bird upon her wing;
The little ones at church, in prayer,
The angels in the sky—
The angels less when babes are born
Than when the aged die."

And, unconscious of the latent moral, dark or cheering, according as we estimate the value of this life, couched in the concluding rhyme, Fanny turned round to the stranger and said, "Why should the angels be glad when the aged die?"

"That they are released from a false, unjust, and miserable world, in which the first man was a rebel, and the second a murderer!" muttered the stranger between his teeth, which he gnashed as he spoke.

The girl did not understand him; she shook her head gently, and made no reply. A few moments, and she paused before a small house.

"This is my home."

"It is so," said her companion, examining the exterior of the house with an earnest gaze; "and your name is Fanny."

"Yes—every one knows Fanny. Come in;" and the girl opened the door with a latch-key.

The stranger bowed his stately height as he crossed the low threshold, and followed his guide into a little parlour.

Before a table, on which burned dimly, and with unheeded wick, a single candle, sat a man of advanced age; and, as he turned his face to the door, the stranger saw that he was blind. The girl bounded to his chair, passed her arms round the old man's neck, and kissed his forehead; then nestling herself at his feet, and leaning her clasped hands caressingly on his knee, she said,

"Grandpapa, I have brought you somebody you must love. He has been so kind to Fanny."

"And neither of you can remember me!" said the guest.

The old man, whose dull face seemed to indicate dotage, half raised himself at the sound of the stranger's voice.

"Who is that?" said he, with a feeble and querulous voice. "Who wants me?"

"I am the friend of your lost son. I am he who, ten years ago, brought Fanny to your roof, and gave her to your care—your son's last charge. And you blessed your son, and forgave him, and vowed to be a father to his Fanny."

The old man, who had now slowly risen to his feet, trembled violently, and stretched out his hands.

"Come near—near; let me put my hands on your head. I cannot see you; but Fanny talks of you, and prays for you; and Fanny—she has been an angel to me!"

The stranger approached and half knelt as the old man spread his hands over his head, muttering inaudibly. Meanwhile Fanny, pale as death—her lips apart—an eager, painful expression on her face—looked inquiringly on the dark, marked countenance of the visiter, and, creeping towards him inch by inch, fearfully touched his dress, his arms, his countenance.

"Brother!" she said at last, doubtfully and timidly. "Brother, I thought I could never forget you! But you are not like my brother; you are older; you are—you are—no! no! you are not my brother!"

"I am much changed, Fanny, and you too!"

He smiled as he spoke; and the smile—sweet and pitying—thoroughly changed the character of his face, which was ordinarily stern, grave, and proud.

"I know you now," exclaimed Fanny, in a tone of wild joy. "And you come back from that grave! My flowers have brought you back at last! I knew they would. Brother, brother!"

And she threw herself on his breast and burst into passionate tears. Then, suddenly drawing herself back, she laid her finger on his arm, and looked up at him beseechingly.

"Pray, now, is he really dead? He, my father! he, too, was lost like you. Can't he come back again as you have done?"

"Do you grieve for him still, then? Poor girl!" said the stranger, evasively, and seating himself. Fanny continued to listen for an answer to her touching question; but, finding that none was given, she stole away to a corner of the room, and leaned her face on her hands, and seemed to think; till, at last, as she so sat, the tears began to flow down her cheeks, and she wept, but silently and unnoticed.

"But, sir," said the guest, after a short pause, "how is this? Fanny tells me she supports you by her work. Are you so poor, then? Yet I left your son's bequest; and you too, I understood, though not rich, were not in want?"

"There was a curse on my gold," said the old man, sternly. "It was stolen from us."

There was another pause. Simon broke it.

"And you young man—how has it fared with you? You have prospered, I hope."

"I am as I have been for years: alone in the world, without kindred and without friends. But, thanks to God, I am not a beggar!"

"No kindred and no friends!" repeated the old man. "No father—no brother—no wife—no sister!"

"None! No one to care whether I live or die," answered the stranger, with a mixture of pride and sadness in his voice. "But, as the song has it,

"I care for nobody—no, not I,
For nobody cares for me!"

There was a certain pathos in the mockery with which he repeated the homely lines, although, as he did, he gathered himself up, as if conscious of a certain consolation and reliance on the resources not dependant on others which he had found in his own strong limbs and his own stout heart.

At that moment he felt a soft touch upon his hand, and he saw Fanny looking at him through the tears that still flowed.

"You have no one to care for you? Don't say so! Come and live with us, brother; we'll care for you. I have never forgot the flowers—never! Do come! Fanny shall love you. Fanny can work for three!"

"And they call her an idiot!" mumbled the old man, with a vacant smile on his lips.

"My sister! You shall be my sister! Forlorn one, whom even nature has fooled and betrayed! Sister!—we, both orphans!—Sister!" exclaimed that dark, stern man, passionately, and with a broken voice; and he opened his arms, and Fanny, without a blush or a thought of shame, threw herself on his breast. He kissed her forehead with a kiss that was, indeed, pure and holy as a brother's: and Fanny felt that he had left upon her cheek a tear that was not her own.

"Well," he said, with an altered voice, and taking the old man's hand, "what say you? Shall I take up my lodging with you? I have a little money; I can protect and aid you both. I shall be often away—in London or elsewhere—and will not intrude too much on you. But you blind, and she" (here he broke off the sentence abruptly and went on)—"you should not be left alone. And this neighbourhood, that burial-place, are dear to me. I too, Fanny, have lost a parent; and that grave—"

He paused, and then added, in a trembling voice, "And you have placed flowers over that grave?"

"Stay with us," said the blind man; "not for our sake, but your own. The world is a bad place. I have been long sick of the world. Yes! come and live near the burial ground; the nearer you are to the grave, the safer you are: and you have a little money, you say!"

"I will come to-morrow, then. I must return now. To-morrow, Fanny, we shall meet again."

"Must you go?" said Fanny, tenderly. "But you will come again; you know I used to think every one died when he left me. I am wiser now. Yet still, when you do leave me, it is true that you die for Fanny!"

At this moment, as the three persons were grouped, each had assumed a posture of form, an expression of face, which a painter of fitting sentiment and skill would have loved to study. The visiter had gained the door; and, as he stood there, his noble height—the magnificent strength and health of his manhood in its full prime—contrasted alike the almost spectral debility of extreme age and the graceful delicacy of Fanny, half girl, half child. There was something foreign in his air, and the half military habit, relieved by the red riband of the Bourbon knighthood. His complexion was dark as that of a Moor, and his raven hair curled close to the stately head. The soldier-mustache—thick, but glossy as silk—shaded the firm lip; and the pointed beard, assumed by the exiled Carlists, heightened the effect of the strong and haughty features, and the expression of the martial countenance.

But, as Fanny's voice died on his ear, he half averted that proud face; and the dark eyes—almost Oriental in their brilliancy and depth of shade—seemed soft and humid. And there stood Fanny, in a posture of such unconscious sadness, such childlike innocence; her arms drooping, her face wistfully turned to his, and a half smile upon the lips, that made still more touching the tears not yet dried upon her cheeks. While thin, frail, shadowy, with white hair and furrowed cheeks, the old man fixed his sightless orbs on space; and his face, usually only animated from the lethargy of advancing dotage by a certain querulous cynicism, now grew suddenly earnest, and even thoughtful, as Fanny spoke of Death!

CHAPTER V.

"Ulysses. Time hath a wallet at his back
Wherein he puts alms for oblivion.
Perseverance, dear my lord,
Keeps honour bright."—Troilus and Cressida.

I have not sought—as would have been easy, by a little ingenuity in the earlier portion of this narrative—whatever source of vulgar interest might be derived from the mystery of names and persons. As in Charles Spencer the reader is allowed at a glance to detect Sidney Morton, so in Philip de Vaudemont (the stranger who rescued Fanny) the reader at once recognises the hero of my tale; but, since neither of these young men has a better right to the name resigned than to the name adopted, it will be simpler and more convenient to designate them by those appellations by which they were now known to the world. In truth, Philip de Vaudemont was scarcely the same being as Philip Morton. In the short visit he had paid to the elder Gawtreys when he consigned Fanny to his charge, he had given no name; and the one he now took (when, towards evening of the next day, he returned to Simon's house) the old man heard for the first time. Once more sunk into his usual apathy, Simon did not express any surprise that a Frenchman should be so well acquainted with English; he scarcely noticed that the name was French. Simon's age seemed daily to bring him more and more to that state when life is mere mechanism, and the soul, preparing for its departure, no longer heeds the tenement that crumbles silently and neglected into its lonely dust. Vaudemont came with but little luggage (for he had an apartment in London,) and no attendant; a single horse was consigned to the stables of an inn at hand; and he seemed, as soldiers are, more careful for the comforts of the animal than his own. There was but one woman servant in the humble household, who did all the ruder work; for Fanny's industry could afford it. The solitary servant and the homely fare sufficed for the simple and hardy adventurer.

Fanny, with a countenance radiant with joy, took his hand and led him to his room. Poor child, with that instinct of woman which never deserted her, she had busied herself the whole day in striving to deck the chamber according to her own notions of comfort. She had stolen from her little hoard wherewithal to make some small purchases, on which the Dowbiggin of the suburb had been consulted. And, what with flowers on the table and a fire at the hearth, the room looked cheerful.

She watched him as he glanced around, and felt disappointed that he did not utter the admiration she expected. Angry at last with the indifference which, in fact, as to external accommodation, was habitual to him, she plucked his sleeve and said,

"Why don't you speak? Is it not nice? Fanny did her best."

"And a thousand thanks to Fanny! It is all I could wish."

"There is another room, bigger than this, but the wicked woman who robbed us slept there; and, besides, you said you liked the churchyard. See!" and she opened the window, and pointed to the church-tower rising dark against the evening sky.

"This is better than all!" said Vaudemont; and he looked out from the window in a silent reverie, which Fanny did not disturb.

And now he was settled! From a career so wild, agitated, and various, the adventurer paused in that humble resting nook. But quiet is not repose, obscurity is not content. Often as, morn and eve, he looked forth upon the spot where his mother's heart, unconscious of love and wo, mouldered away, the indignant and bitter feelings of the wronged outcast, and the son who could not clear the mother's name, swept away the subdued and gentle melancholy into which time usually softens regret for the dead, and with which most of us think of the distant past and the once joyous childhood!

In this man's breast lay, concealed by his external calm, those memories and aspirations which are as strong as passions. In his earlier years, when he had been put to hard shifts for existence, he had found no leisure for close and brooding reflection upon that spoliation of just rights—that calumny upon his mother's name which had first brought the Night into his Morning. His resentment towards the Beauforts, it is true, had ever been an intense, but a fitful and irregular passion. It was exactly in proportion as, by those rare and romantic incidents which Fiction cannot invent, and which Narrative takes with diffidence from the great storehouse of Real Life, his step had ascended in the social ladder, that all which his childhood had lost—all which the robbers of his heritage had gained, the grandeur and the power of WEALTH—above all, the hourly and the tranquil happiness of a stainless name, became palpable and distinct. He had loved Eugenie as a boy loves, for the first time, an accomplished woman. He regarded her—so refined, so gentle, so gifted—with the feelings due to a superior being—with an eternal recollection of the ministering angel that had shone upon him when he stood on the dark abyss. She was the first that had redeemed his fate—the first that had guided aright his path—the first that had tamed the savage at his breast: it was the young lion charmed by the eyes of Una. The outline of his story had been truly given at Lord Lilburne's. Despite his pride, which revolted from such obligations to another, and a woman—which disliked and struggled against a disguise which at once and alone saved him from the detection of the past and the terrors of the future—he had yielded to her, the wise and the gentle, as one whose judgment he could not doubt; and, indeed, the slanderous falsehoods circulated by the lackey, to whose discretion, the night of Gawtreys's death, Eugenie had preferred to confide her own honour rather than another's life, had (as Liancourt rightly stated) left Philip no option but that which Madame de Merville deemed the best, whether for her happiness or his good name. Then had followed a brief season—the holiday of his life—the season of young hope and passion, of brilliancy and joy, closing by that abrupt death which again left him lonely in the world.

When, from the grief that succeeded to the death of Eugenie, he woke to find himself amid the strange faces and exciting scenes of an Oriental court, he turned with hard and disgustful contempt from Pleasure as an infidelity to the dead. Ambition crept over him; his mind hardened as his cheek bronzed under those burning suns; his hardy frame—his energies prematurely awakened—his constitutional disregard to danger, made him a brave and skilful soldier. He acquired reputation and rank. But, as time went on, the ambition took a higher flight; he felt his sphere circumscribed; the Eastern indolence that filled up the long intervals between Eastern action chafed a temper never at rest; he returned to France; his reputation, Liancourt's friendship, and the relations of Eugenie—grateful, as has before been implied, for the generosity with which he surrendered the principal part of her bequest opened for him a new career, but one painful and galling. In the Indian court there was no question of his birth; one adventurer was equal with the rest. But in Paris, a man attempting to rise provoked all the sarcasm of wit, all the cavils of party; and in polished and civil life, what valour has weapons against a jest? Thus, in civilisation, all the passions that spring from humiliated self-love and baffled aspiration again preyed upon his breast. He saw, then, that the more he struggled from obscurity, the more acute would become research into his true origin; and his writhing pride almost stung to death his ambition. To succeed in life by regular means was indeed difficult for this man: always recoiling from the name he bore—always strong in the hope yet to regain that to which he conceived himself entitled—cherishing that pride of country which never deserts the native of a free state, however harsh a parent she may have proved—and, above all, whatever his ambition and his passions, taking, from the very misfortunes he had known, an indomitable belief in the ultimate justice of Heaven, he had refused to sever the last ties that connected him with his lost heritage and his forsaken land—he refused to be naturalised—to make the name he bore legally undisputed: he was contented to be an alien. Neither was Vaudemont fitted exactly for that crisis in the social world when the men of journals and talk bustle aside the men of action. He had not cultivated literature—he had no book-knowledge; the world had been his school, and stern life his teacher. Still, eminently skilled in those physical accomplishments which men admire and soldiers covet—calm and self-possessed in manner—of great personal advantages—of much ready talent, and of practised observation in character, he continued to breast the obstacles around him, and to establish himself in the favour of those in power. It was natural to a person so reared and circumstanced to have no sympathy with what is called the popular cause. He was no citizen in the state—he was a stranger in the land. He had suffered, and still suffered, too much from mankind to have that philanthropy—sometimes visionary, but always noble—which, in fact, generally springs from the studies we cultivate, not in the forum, but the closet. Men, alas! too often lose the democratic enthusiasm in proportion as they find reason to suspect or despise their kind. And if there were not hopes for the future which this hard, practical, daily life does not suffice to teach us, the vision and the glory that belong to the great popular creed, dimmed beneath the injustice, the follies, and the vices of the world as it is, would fade into the lukewarm sectarianism of temporary party. Moreover, Vaudemont's habits of thought and reasoning were those of the camp, confirmed by the systems familiar to him in the East: he regarded the populace as a soldier enamoured of discipline and order usually does. His theories, therefore, or, rather, his ignorance of what is sound in theory, went with Charles the Tenth in his excesses, but not with the timidity which terminated those excesses by dethronement and disgrace. Chafed to the heart, gnawed with proud grief, he obeyed the royal mandates, and followed the exiled monarch: his hopes overthe old fashioned humdrum petticoats, made straight behind and straight before. No, no, henceforth elastic petticoats will be the rage in this era of elasticity, of which not only shall it be recorded by the future historian that in the year 1841 minds were elastic, hearts elastic, opinions elastic, politicians elastic, and purses elastic, but that Oudinot, with the wand of a magician, made petticoats elastic!

But that there may be no mistake about these petticoats, and that none of their imperishable attributes may be unknown, I shall now supply the description given by the immortal Oudinot, in his own bouffante and elastique style:

27, PLACE DE LA BOURSE, A PARIS.

There, ladies! send your measures, your lengths and your breadths, your rotundities, and your defectuosités, simply by letter to "the" Oudinot, No. 27 Place de la Bourse, Paris, and for 1*l.* 5*s.*, 1*l.* 10*s.*, or 2*l.* you may be made the most graceful, most bouffante, most elastique, and most happy of females!

This specimen of French advertisement by no means belongs to the exaggerated class. I could tell of tailors, who measure "geometrically,"—of stay-makers, who "restrain the passions by the cut of their stays;"—of hair-dressers, whose pomatums "add vigour to the intellect;"—of a water, called phénomène, whose properties are so extraordinary, that merely its external application hinders the hair from becoming gray, prevents unpleasant dreams, takes away all wrinkles, and renders the skin fresh and healthy as that of an infant six months old; of a poudre, which makes the nails as beautiful as mother-of-pearl, the skin as soft as velvet, and the teeth much whiter than snow; of a "rouge," and a "white" combined with it, to give a colour to the skin so natural, that, if possible, it gives a tint even more natural than nature herself; of a pommade Trephicôme, which will not allow a single hair ever to leave the head without special permission; of a roseate cream which makes the oldest grand-mamma look younger than her grand-children; of a paste called l'amie de la peau, which defies and defeats the most obdurate and atrocious disorders of the skin; of "an almond and guimauve soap" which gives a sort of supernatural beauty to all who use it; of a poudre à l'améline, prepared for the lovers of luxurious baths, and which so softens and whitens the skin that the softness and whiteness are quite "seraphic;" of a crème de Taïko, for both young and old beards, which has the effect of rendering shaving "quite a luxury;" of an "epilatory paste," which frightens away in a few seconds any daring intruders, in the form of "stubborn down," on the chins or cheeks of the angelic portion of creation; and of "a water to rinse the mouth with," that leaves so ravishing an odour, that in summer weather bees actually arrive by swarms at your mouth, imagining you to be nothing less than a "bed of violets."

The "advertisements" in French provincial papers are far less amusing. The reason is obvious,—all that is elegant, fashionable, and distingué is to be found in Paris. Paris is the government—Paris is the administration—Paris is the source—Paris is every thing. This system of centralisation is carried to such an extent, that if a little wooden bridge over some mountain torrent should be damaged or destroyed by a sudden thaw at the break-up of a long frost, the bridge could not be repaired or rebuilt (though situate five hundred miles from Paris) until the Minister of the Interior, Minister of the Public Works, and the administration des ponts et chaussées had been consulted, nor until reports, maps, surveys and estimates had been ordered, made, transmitted, examined, returned, revised, re-examined, and finally approved. This is no caricature, but an exact statement of a deplorable truth. It was the Emperor Napoleon who habituated the present generation of the French to this centralisation system, and though they feel every day its hourly inconveniences, both moral, political, and physical, they are so used to its workings, that they know not how to set about opposing it, especially as they are stunted in their mental growth by the depressing influence of the system itself. The provincial press, therefore, partakes of the character of the people of the provinces, and consequently all who wish in those provinces to know what is going on, take in or read a Paris paper.

The political papers of Paris are now so well known to the educated classes in England, that a few words will suffice respecting them. The Journal des Débats supports the new dynasty. The Courier Français is in France what the Morning Chronicle would be in England, if such statesmen as those we have just named were in office. The Temps follows in the same train, with this exception, that it would rather more resemble The Globe than The Chronicle. The Constitutionnel has no parallel in England. "All things to all men" who can assist it, is the basis of its policy, but always leaning to the popular side of every question, whatever that question may be. The National is much more republican than The Morning Advertiser, but addresses itself, as does its English contemporary, to the middling classes. The Siccle is a cheap edition of the Courier Français; for whilst the subscription to the Siccle is only fifty francs per annum, that of the Courier Français is eighty francs. The Quotidienne, France, and Gazette, are faithfully represented here by The Morning Post and Standard; but with this exception, that whereas these three French journals are attached to a fallen dynasty, the two English journals are heartily in favour of our young and beloved monarch. The Commerce is about of the same politics as The Sun, and occupies itself, like its English contemporary, much more with home than with foreign questions.

The judicial journals of Paris are by far the most read of any that are published, and pay their proprietors enormously. The trials at the Paris and provincial courts are recorded with talent, learning and wit. The decisions of judges on points of a commercial or general character are given with great caution and much legal knowledge. The alterations from time to time proposed in the code, or laws, are examined with care and science. The courts of justice of other countries are not left unnoticed, and comparisons are instituted, and improvements suggested, in a good spirit, and without party feeling. The rights of the weak are defended, the cause of the innocent protected; and, as a whole, these legal newspapers are by far the most honest, well conducted, and even entertaining of all French journals. The Gazette des Tribunaux still bears the palm of victory, though many attempts have been made to rival or excel it. Its late founder made a large and well-merited fortune; and those who have shares in this print may consider themselves as "very lucky fellows."

The theatrical and gossiping journals are the most lively and witty in Europe. The Charivari is quite unrivalled. Its subscription is certainly very high, for though it is as dear as the Débats, it does not contain more than a sixth of its matter. But then its lithographic caricatures, "every day in the year," always droll, or burlesque, or comic, or satirical, and always so good, are worth all the money, and ten times more. It was generally thought when the celebrated "laws of September" were made and put into vigorous operation against "the press," that the Charivari must fall. It was asked, how can the Charivari go on; now it is interdicted by the law from publishing any print or engraving without the permission of the Minister of the Interior, who will not, of course, allow of political allusions! But so great has been the talent, and so hitherto inexhaustible the wit, fun, and humour of this model journal, that its readers have been unable to perceive that it is daily subjected to a severe censorship. It evades the law most adroitly on all occasions, and is scarcely ever the subject of prosecution. We regret that it should sometimes indulge in caricatures of the king of the French, whom it styles L'ordre des choses; but as the pictorial parts of such caricatures are suppressed, it does not do as much mischief as it did formerly.

The Corsair, the Journal des Théâtres, La Mode, and a score of others of the same light and ephemeral character daily appear, and are full of fun, frolic, life, daily adventures, and the subject of chit-chat and gossip of each twenty-four hours. There is nothing like them in England. Would they answer? I doubt it much. The English when abroad, read and relish these things;—so they do vin ordinaire, purée aux croutons, mayonnaise de volaille, and épinards à la crème; but follow these self-same John Bulls back to their castles, houses, or cottages, and you might as soon expect to see on their good mahogany-roasted frogs and stewed cats, as "sour ordinary red French wine;" pea-soup made without meat; cold fowl cut in pieces and covered over with cold egg, oil, and mustard; and spinach chopped up as fine as parsley and then stewed with cream and butter—and yet these are the self-same dishes that in Paris they pronounce to be "delicious!" The truth is, that the Englishman at home is a very different being, indeed, to the Englishman abroad. At home, he prefers port, sherry, and madeira;—abroad, chablis, bordeaux, and champagne. At home, he fares by fish, roast-beef, and vegetables (especially potatoes), plain, boiled in water; abroad, he never eats fish without it is so concealed as to look like a ragout, vows that roast-beef is poison to him, and regrets that no English cook ever knew how to dress a cauliflower.

As it is with the Englishman's natural palate when he is abroad, so it is with his intellectual taste. At home he enjoys the forty-eight columns closely printed of The Times or The Morning Herald with its supplement; or at least the twenty-four columns of The Morning Chronicle, The Globe or The Sun; but abroad he inveighs against such cumbrous newspapers; thinks the French plan by far the best, and hopes the day will come when the editors of London journals will learn the art of compression. He forgets that the French editor, having little to say, soon says it; whereas the English editor, having a mind well stored with ancient and modern lore, seeks to bring both his genius and his arguments to bear upon the subject which he proposes to investigate.

One word in conclusion. The French press has a greater influence on the public mind in France, than the English press has in England. How is this? Because in France there is no real public mind capable of investigating, discussing, probing, and comparing for itself, whereas in England, the opinion of the people all think, compare, probe, discuss, and investigate. In France, the people are made by the journals. In England, the journals are edited by men who entertain the same sentiments as that portion of public opinion to which they address themselves. In France, every journal has its party. In England, every party has its journal. The difference is immense. In France, the journal is the master; in England the journal is the representative. Which is the best? That which is adapted to the state of each nation. So each system is good in its sphere.

MORAL.—Then let us ALL be happy!

A CROSS-EXAMINATION.

On the celebrated trial of Elizabeth Canning, Mr. Willes, afterwards Solicitor-General in 1766, made a Judge of the King's Bench in 1767, and ultimately raised to the dignity of Chief Justice, thus cross-examined one of the witnesses for the prisoner.*

* As we are all liable to such examinations, we should be acquainted with the process, so as to acquit ourselves with credit.

"What time did she (Elizabeth Canning) come?
—About twelve o'clock at noon.

Did anybody come with her that day?—No, nobody.

Was she in perfect health?—I never saw her better, as I know of.

What had you for dinner?—Some of a cold shoulder of mutton and potatoes, which was dressed the Sunday before.

Did she eat a hearty dinner?—She eat as hearty as she could; she seemed to eat as hearty as I did.

This being new year's day, what did you give her to drink?—She drank some ten-shilling beer, which I had in the house. I was at work in the afternoon.

Does your wife drink tea in the afternoon?—She generally does, whether she has company or not.

Have you seen your niece drink tea?—I have.

Do you think your wife and she had tea that afternoon?—I do really believe they had.

Does your wife generally have bread and butter, or toast with her tea, or not?—She generally chooses toast and butter.

What time did you return home from work?—About seven in the evening.

What had you for supper?—We had some of a sirloin of beef roasted.

Did your niece eat of that?—She eat a small quantity of that, but could not eat much.

What did she drink after that?—She drank a small quantity of ten-shilling beer.

Anecdotes of Westminster Hall.

Whatsoever is rare and passionate, carries the soul to the thoughts of eternity; and by contemplation gives it some glimpses of more absolute perfection, than here it is capable of. When I see the royalty of a state-show at some unwonted solemnity, my thoughts present me something more royal than this. When I see the most enchanting beauties that earth can show me, I yet think there is something far more glorious; methinks I see a kind of higher perfection peeping through the frailty of a face. When I hear the ravishing strains of a sweet-tuned voice, married to the warbles of the artful instrument, I apprehend by this a higher diapason, and do almost believe I hear a little deity whispering through the pory substance of the tongue. When I read a rarely sententious man, I admire him to my own impatience. I cannot read some parts of Seneca, above two leaves together. He raises my soul to contemplation, which sets me a thinking on more than I can imagine. So I am forced to cast and subside to an admiration.—Felltham.

TO A LOST FRIEND.

There came a bird in lovely eventide,
In his wild voice the soul of music beamed;
His eye, like dewy morn, to earth returned,
Hymning the death-knell of the dying day.
"Harp of the sky,
O, come again with the sweet soul therein:"
But it never came again!

They brought me, in my life's green summer time,
The sweetest gift o'er which sweet earth has power;
Beauty's own bright ideal—a glorious flower,
So fresh, so young, so dear, so odour full!
—O beautiful!

In all thy fragrance all thy bloom still beam!—
But it faded like a dream.

Oh, fair are the fond soul's wild reveries!
And one that I remember was among the rest,
Like lily 'mid the flowers with snowy vest—
For hope's own magic hand formed the design.

"Lovely, be mine!"
But her bright face saddened in sweet sympathy,
As she whispered, "Not for thee!"

Glittering on the majestic brow of night,
A star was my companion and my friend:
Vast fields of thought it opened to my mind;

I loved it as friends love the soul that's gone.

Glorious, shine on!
Lead up to loftier heights my mounting way!
But it sank on its grave, the sky!

Lady! that bird, and flower, and dream, and star,
'Twas thou! "Ah, why thus 'reft my torn soul ground?"

And, lo, the great wind from its halls of sound, Sweeping, with master-hand, the chords of air,
—Earth's sister fair,

Did syllable its music into mortal mode:
"It was the will of God!"

THE SPIRIT OF BEAUTY.

The spirit of beauty unfurls her light,
And wheels her course in a joyous flight:
I know her track through the balmy air,
By the blossoms that cluster and whiten there;
She leaves the tops of the mountains green,
And gems the valley with crystal sheen.

At morn, I know where she rested at night,
For the roses are gushing with dewy delight;
Then she mounts again, and around her flings
A shower of light from her purple wings,
Till the spirit is drunk with the music on high
That silently fills it with ecstasy!

At noon, she hies to a cool retreat,
Where bowing elms o'er waters meet;
She dimples the wave where the green leaves dip,
That smiles, as it curls, like a maiden's lip,
Where her tremulous bosom would hide, in vain,
From her lover, the hope that she loves again.

At eve, she hangs o'er the western sky
Dark clouds for a glorious canopy;
And round the skirts of each sweeping fold
She paints a border of crimson and gold,
Where the lingering sunbeams love to stay,
When their god in his glory has pass'd away.

She hovers around us at twilight hour,
When her presence is felt with the deepest power;
She mellows the landscape, and crowds the stream
With shadows that flit like a fairy dream:
Still wheeling her flight through the gladsome air,
'The Spirit of Beauty is everywhere!

NEW BOOKS.

The Quadroon. By the author of Lafitte, &c.
New York, Harper & Brothers, 1841.

The novels of Professor Ingraham being founded on national subjects, are always interesting to the American reader. His style is of that florid character which pleases most of the readers of fiction, and he displays considerable skill in the invention and narration of incidents, and the construction of a plot. This story is, on the whole, his best performance; and we are not surprised to learn that it is acquiring considerable popularity.

Harper's Family Library.

The two volumes of Harper's Family Library, received this week, contain biographies of John Jay and Alexander Hamilton, and of the celebrated traveller, James Bruce.

Professor Renwick is rendering the literature of his country an important service by giving, in a popular style and form, the lives of such men as Jay and Hamilton. The introduction of such works into a collection, so widely diffused as the Family Library, will act as a corrective to the virulence of party abuse, which it is too much the fashion to heap upon the memory of those who have saved the country from ruin in past times.

The biography of Bruce is written by Sir Francis Head, a gentleman whose amusing accounts of his own travels first brought him into notice. It was once doubted whether Bruce had adhered strictly to truth in his accounts of Abyssinia; but the statements of more recent travellers confirm those made by him; and his character stands perfectly fair at the present time. As the discoverer of the source of the Nile, he will be always a celebrated personage.

Turner's History of the Anglo Saxons.

Messrs. Carey & Hart have just published a splendid edition of this celebrated work. It is a history of the Anglo Saxons from the earliest times to the Conquest by William I. In respect to method and completeness this history is a model. It does not confine itself to a mere detail of wars and political changes; but it gives a perfect and most delightful view of the progress of THE PEOPLE in knowledge, arts, liberty and virtue. The chapters on the Anglo Saxon language and literature alone are worth the price of the volumes to any one who wishes to understand the peculiar features of the English language, and to become acquainted with the real secret on which the force and beauty of English composition depend. The Saxon type used in these chapters were cast expressly for this edition. Among all the valuable books recently offered to the American public by Messrs. Carey & Hart, we consider none so valuable as this.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF SOCIETY in the barbarous and civilised state. An Essay towards discovering the origin and course of human improvement. By W. Cooke Taylor, Esq., L.L.D.: M. R. A. S., of Trinity College, Dublin.

This is a very delightful book. In tracing the progress of society, the author introduces a great number of narratives, anecdotes and illustrations which give force to his argument at the same time that they impart a certain vividness and picturesque beauty to the style. His references to the aborigines of this country, exhibit a much more intimate acquaintance with their history and character than we have been accustomed to observe in European writers. On this part, as well in fact as every other part of his subject, Dr. Taylor shows that he has kept up with the progress of science, and is fully acquainted with the reports of the most recent travellers, as well as with the records of old times.

The volumes correspond in style with the Messrs. Appleton's edition of Schlegel's Philosophy of History. Both these works, and all the other recent publications of Messrs. Appleton & Co., are for sale at the book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, 26 South Fifth Street, above Chesnut.

HORACE WALPOLE.

The faults of Horace Walpole's head and heart are indeed sufficiently glaring. His writings, it is true, rank as high among the delicacies of intellectual epicures as the Strasburgh pies among the dishes described in the Almanack des Gourmands. But, as the pâté-de-foie-gras owes its excellence to the diseases of the wretched animal which furnishes it, and would be good for nothing if it were not made of livers preternaturally swollen, so none but an unhealthy and disorganised mind could have produced such literary luxuries as the works of Walpole.

He was, unless we have formed a very erroneous judgment of his character, the most eccentric, the most artificial, the most fastidious, the most capricious of men. His mind was a bundle of inconsistent whims and affectations. His features were covered by mask within mask. When the outer disguise of obvious affectation was removed, you were still as far from seeing the real man. He played innumerable parts, and overacted them all. When he talked misanthropy, he out-Timoned Timon. When he talked philanthropy, he left Howard at an immeasurable distance. He scoffed at courts, and kept a chronicle of their most trifling scandal; at society, and was blown about by its slightest veerings of opinion; at literary fame, and left fair copies of his private letters, with copious notes, to be published after his decease; at rank, and never for a moment forgot that he was an honourable; at the practice of entail, and tasked the ingenuity of conveyancers to tie up his villa in the strictest settlement.

The conformation of his mind was such, that whatever was little, seemed to him great, and whatever was great seemed to him little. Serious business was a trifle to him, and trifles were his serious business. To chat with blue-stockings; to write little copies of complimentary verses on little occasions; to superintend a private press; to preserve from natural decay the perishable topics of Ranelagh and White's; to record divorces and bets, Miss Chudleigh's absurdities, and George Selwyn's good sayings; to decorate a grotesque house with pie-crust battlements; to procure rare engravings and antique chimney-boards; to match odd gauntlets; to lay out a maze of walks within five acres of ground,—these were the grave employments of his long life. From these he turned to politics as to an amusement. After the labours of the print-shop and the auction-room, he unbent his mind in the house of commons. And, having indulged in the recreation of making laws and voting millions, he returned to more important pursuits,—to researches after Queen Mary's comb, Wolsey's red hat, the pipe which Van Tromp smoked during his last seafight, and the spur which King William struck into the flank of Sorrel.

In everything in which he busied himself,—in the fine arts, in literature, in public affairs,—he was drawn by some strange attraction from the great to the little, and from the useful to the odd. The politics in which he took the keenest interest were politics scarcely deserving of the name. The growlings of George the Second, the flirtations of Princess Emily with the Duke of Grafton, the amours of Prince Frederic with Lady Middlesex, the squabbles between Gold Stick and the Master of the Buck-hounds, the disagreements between the tutors of Prince George,—these matters engaged almost all the attention which Walpole could spare from matters more important still;—from bidding for Zinckes and Petitots, from cheapening fragments of tapestry, and handles of old lances, from joining bits of painted glass, and from setting up memorials of departed cats and dogs. While he was fetching and carrying the gossip of Kensington Palace and Carlton House, he fancied that he was engaged in politics, and when he recorded that gossip, he fancied that he was writing history.

If we were to form our opinion of his eminent contemporaries from a general survey of what he has written concerning them, we should say that Pitt was a strutting, ranting, mouthing actor; Charles Townshend, an impudent and voluble jack-pudding; Murray, a demure, cold-blooded, cowardly hypocrite; Hardwicke, an insolent upstart, with the understanding of a pettifogger, and the heart of a hangman; Temple, an impertinent poltroon; Egmont, a solemn coxcomb; Lytleton, a poor creature, whose only wish was to go to heaven in a coronet; Onslow, a pompous proser; Washington, a braggart; Lord Camden, sullen; Lord Townshend, malevolent; Secker, an atheist who had shammed Christian for a mitre; Whitefield, an impostor who swindled his converts out of their watches. The Walpoles fare little better than their neighbours. Old Horace is constantly represented as a coarse, brutal, niggardly buffoon, and his son as worthy of such a father. In short, if we are to trust this discerning judge of human nature, England in his time contained little sense and no virtue, except what was distributed between himself, Lord Waldgrave, and Marshal Conway.

What then is the charm, the irresistible charm of Walpole's writings? It consists, we think, in the art of amusing without exciting. He never convinces the reason, nor fills the imagination, nor touches the heart; but he keeps the mind of the reader constantly attentive and constantly entertained. He had a strange ingenuity peculiarly his own, an ingenuity which appeared in all that he did, in his building, in his gardening, in his upholstery, in the matter and in the manner of his writings. If we were to adopt the classification,—not a very accurate classification,—which Akenside has given of the pleasures of the imagination, we should say, that with the sublime and the beautiful Walpole had nothing to do, but that the third province, the odd, was his peculiar domain.

He is constantly showing us things,—not of very great value, indeed,—yet things which we are pleased to see, and which we can see nowhere else. They are baubles; but they are made curiosities either by his grotesque workmanship, or by some association belonging to them. His style is one of those peculiar styles by which everybody is attracted, and which nobody can safely venture to imitate. He is a mannerist whose manner has become perfectly easy to him. His affectation is so habitual, and so universal, that it can hardly be called affectation. The affectation is the essence of the man. It pervades all his thoughts and all his expressions. If it were taken away, nothing would be left. He coins new words, distorts the senses of old words, and twists sentences into forms which make grammarians stare. But all this he does, not only with an air of ease, but as if he could not help doing it. His wit was, in its essential properties, of the same kind with that of Cowley and Donne. Like theirs, it consisted in an exquisite perception of points of analogy, and points of contrast too subtle for common observation. Like them, Walpole perpetually startles us by the ease with which he yokes together ideas between which there would seem, at first sight, to be no connection. But he did not, like them, affect the gravity of a lecture, and draw his illustrations from the laboratory and from the schools. His tone was light and fltering; his topics were the topics of the club and the ball-room. And therefore his strange combinations, and far-fetched allusions, though very closely resembling those which tire us to death in the poems of the time of Charles the First, are read with pleasure constantly new.

No man who has written so much is so seldom tiresome. In his books there are scarcely any of those passages which, in our school days, we used to call skip. Yet he often wrote on subjects which are generally considered as dull; on subjects which men of great talents have in vain endeavoured to render popular. When we compare the "Historic Doubts" about Richard the Third with Whiaker's and Chalmers's books on a far more interesting question, the character of Mary Queen of Scots; when we compare the "Anecdotes of Painting" with Nichols's "Anecdotes," or even with Mr. D'Israeli's "Quarrels of Authors," and "Calamities of Authors," we at once see Walpole's superiority, not in industry, not in learning, not in accuracy, not in logical power, but in the art of writing what people will like to read. He rejects all but the attractive parts of his subject. He keeps only what is in itself amusing, or what can be made so by the artifice of his diction. The coarser morsels of antiquarian learning he abandons to others; and sets out an entertainment worthy of a Roman epicure, an entertainment consisting of nothing but delicacies,—the brains of singing birds, the roe of mullets, the sunny halves of peaches. This, we think, is the great merit of his "Romance." There is little skill in the delineation of the characters. Manfred is as commonplace a tyrant, Jerome as commonplace a confessor, Theodore as commonplace a young gentleman, Isabella and Matilda as commonplace a pair of young ladies, as are to be found in any of the thousand Italian castles in which condottieri have revelled, or in which imprisoned duchesses have pined. We cannot say that we much admire the big man whose sword is dug up in one quarter of the globe, whose helmet drops from the clouds in another, and who, after clattering and rustling for some days, ends by kicking the house down. But the story, whatever its value may be, never flags for a single moment. There are no digressions, or unseasonable descriptions, or long speeches. Every sentence carries the action forward. The excitement is constantly renewed. Absurd as is the machinery, and insipid as are the human actors, no reader probably ever thought the book dull.

Walpole's "Letters" are generally considered as his best performances, and, we think, with reason. His faults are far less offensive to us in his correspondence than in his books. His wild, absurd, and ever-changing opinions about men and things are easily pardoned in familiar letters. His bitter, scoffing, depreciating disposition, does not show itself in so unmitigated a manner as in his "Memoirs." A writer of letters must be civil and friendly to his correspondent at least, if to no other person.—Macaulay.

From the London New Monthly.

PLAUSIBLE PEOPLE.

BY MRS GORE.

In society, as in the arts, as in politics, or in fifty other things, the world is still deceived by ornament, not alone by gems of price,—"barbaric gold and pearl,"—but by Birmingham gilding as well as barbaric gold—by glass-beads as well as orient pearl. Though aware that "there are counterfeits abroad," we accept people on their own showing, albeit that showing bear as much proportion to the reality, as the portrait of a dwarf or giant placed before a booth at a fair, to the tall man or short woman exhibiting within!

It is a favourite jest with the French, that you may knock a man down, provided you preface the offence with the word "parden!" or, as the song runs,

"qu'on peut tout faire, Quand on le fait poliment!"

In England you may do what you like, provided you do it plausibly. Cant your way through life, with the seven deadly sins in your train, not asserting them to be angels, but wishing to goodness they were not quite so wicked, and humbly hoping some day or other they may see the error of their ways, and you will pass for a heavenly-minded man. Deprecation, whether in tone, manner, or phraseology, is an universal pass-key. There is no knowing exactly where to convict such sinners. They envelope themselves in such a thick coating of sackcloth and ashes, that there is some difficulty in finding out the vulnerable points. Their hypocrisy has a sort of shifting shield, which, like the sails of a windmill, run with your attack, and protects them in whatever direction they are approached.

According to Rochefoucault's definition of a courtier, "un homme sans humeur et sans honneur," they never suffer themselves to be provoked out of their plausible equanimity. Ever gracious, ever placable, their humility is that of Tartuffe, their impassibility that of Talleyrand, who would not allow the person with whom he was conversing to discover, by the expression of his countenance, that he had received a kick from his enemy in the rear.

To this sub-human patience, however, they super-added more active propensities. The plausible person is essentially a talking animal, an ambulatory puff, an utterer of vauntings—"not loud, but deep." He accuses himself in the humblest tone, of being guilty of the cardinal virtues.

According to his own account, the circumstances attending his conduct are invariably extenuating. "He does not wish to praise himself," but he labours under the singular impunity attributed to the right divine of the throne: he can do no wrong. By some strange concatenation of events, he is impeccable. It would grieve him much that he should be supposed to pride himself on this. Heaven forbid that he should be pharisaical in his virtue. On the contrary, humility has been esteemed his leading merit. But so it is, that when others fall into frailty, by some inherent faults (like the leaded foundations of tumblers in Dutch toys), he is forced to stand upright.

The world, that wide-mouthed dupe, swallows all this as glibly as it is uttered. The man who anoints himself all over with the oil of laudation above his fellows, may pass through the eye of a needle, albeit as crooked as a camel. Smooth as a billiard-ball, and sticking at nothing, he makes his infallible way into the pocket, and wins his game. His is the virtue which, so far from being its own reward, obtains a premium from parliament, and sits up like a golden image for the adoration of the multitude.

Plausible people are the fatted kine of this world. They insinuate themselves like the weasel, into the meal-tub; and like Reynard, their stealthy steps make an unsuspected way into the hen-roost. While your ears are still fascinated by their gentle protestations, you find they have been picking your locks or your pocket. You hear a patriot praising himself for more than Spartan virtue, watching your eye all the time for a favourable opportunity to escape up the back stairs, and sneak into the presence of royalty. The next time you see him, he will be on the treasury bench!

Another favourite form of plausibility, is to appear in the arena of life, trembling and defenceless, sans armes comme l'innocence,— Striding the blast."

"a naked new-born babe

You cannot tread upon a thing that crawls to your feet, and calls itself a worm. If it owned itself an asp you would have a right to exterminate the reptile. "But a poor, harmless, miserable, unoffending worm, that could not do mischief if it would, and would not if it could, you would not be such a monster as to set your foot upon its innocent head!" Thus pleaded for by its own weakness, the worm of Nile establishes itself by your heath; and one fine day, when you find yourself stung with mortal venom, the fatal wound proves to have proceeded from "the poor, harmless, miserable, unoffending worm, that could not do mischief if it would, and would not if it could!" Whereupon you utter a few un courteous remarks upon Plausible People.

The force of endeavour will do wonders towards acquiring the form and show of righteousness, by those who "Assume a virtue though they have it not."

In the crowd of beggars that surround a traveling carriage at the foreign post-houses, some halt, some blind, some maimed—all screaming for charity; it requires the eye of a policeman to detect the genuine cripple, and make the dumb speak. If the uninitiated pretend to perform Duke Humphry's miracle, and make the lame man sing aside his crutches and fly the field, they are sure to hit upon the wrong man, so cunning are the impostors. So is it with the Plausible. By dint of strenuously pretending to be good, wise, or zealous, they contrast almost the form and pressure of virtue and wisdom. A jeweller could scarcely detect the pure gold from the crysocal. Though we positively know that it is the clowd preaching in the sacerdotal robe of Sir Topaz, we cannot help listening to his exposition of the doctrines of the Metempsychosis. He looks so very grave—he talks so very learnedly! Our prejudices must have deceived us. The man so very like the chaplain, cannot be the fool!

Above all, it is scarcely possible to detect a plausible woman. Had Messalina chosen to array herself in a vestal's robe, and take her part in the procession as a bearer of the sacred fire, by due gravity of deportment she would have secured the respect of the multitude. So in our own times; just as a quaker's dress in the favourite disguise of the least reputable frequenters of the masquerade, enormous professions of morality form the distinguishing feature of those who have any thing unsatisfactory to conceal behind that whited wall. It is only in a faint whisper that the select few who listen to their chantings, insinuate that "the lady doth protest too much;" that such very strait-lacing usually purports to disguise some imperfection in the shape. The world, edified by her precepts of holiness, her suspirium sanctum, cries "Hear, hear, hear," with all its lungs; and makes affidavit that the Venus de Medicis is not more free from deformity, than the Sheldrake invented form which so sweetly solicits its approbation. How can the public be savage, when so persuasively addressed with the epithet "indulgent!"

When we see judges, juries, ordinaries of Newgate, police magistrates, and other public functionaries whose hearts are supposed to have become as the nether mill-stone through much practice, whose eyes as those of the lynx, whose ears as those of the mole, taken in year after year by the protestations of malefactors, and petitioning the Home Office for reprobates capable of picking the turnkey's pocket of their reprieve, or biting off the ear of the ordinary who has recommended them to mercy, it is impossible to wonder at the unsophistication which exposes the less wary classes of the community to be quacked to death by plausible doctors, ruined in lawsuits by plausible solicitors, or won over to adoration by plausible moralists in prose or verse. It is scarcely possible to be always on our guard, and there is no mendicinity society of good company established for the due examination of people's claims. If in dread of imposition we refuse our obelus to the real Belisarius, we never forgive ourselves, and if we reject with nausea some over-sweetened cup of sweets, the leprous distilment is poured into the porches of our ears as into those of Hamlet's father, some afternoon when we are napping, and our scruples are set at eternal rest!

There is a certain Jonathan Wilson, Esq., a man to whom the hats of bankers fly off in the streets—whose name figures as director of half-a-dozen companies and governor of half-a-dozen institutions. The bankers reverence the governors and directors; the companies and institutions reverence the man who commands the respect of bankers; and while standing like a colossal Croesus, with a foot upon the necks of each, Jonathan Wilson can afford to be not worth a guinea.

Jonathan Wilson was the younger son of a younger brother, without a shilling he could by birthright call his own. Air is sorry food for any thing but camellions and orchidaceous plants, more particularly to a man born like Jonathan Wilson, with an appetite for thrown, his career in France annihilated for ever. But, on entering England, his temper, confident and ready of resource, fastened itself on new food. In the land where he had no name might he yet rebuild his fortunes. It was an arduous effort—an improbable hope; but the words heard by the bridge of Paris—words that had often cheered him in his exile through hardships and through dangers which it is unnecessary to our narrative to detail—yet rung again in his ear as he leaped on his native land: "Time, Faith, Energy."

While such his character in the larger and more distant relations of life, in the closer circles of companionship many rare and noble qualities were visible. It is true that he was stern, perhaps imperious—of a temper that always struggled to command; but he was deeply susceptible of kindness, and, if feared by those who opposed, loved by those who served him. About his character was that mixture of tenderness and fierceness which belonged of old to the descriptions of the warrior. Though so little lettered, life had taught him a certain poetry of sentiment and idea; more poetry, perhaps, in the silent thoughts that, in his happier moments, filled his solitude, than in half the pages that his brother had read and written by the dreaming lake. A certain largeness of idea and nobility of impulse often made him act the sentiments of which bookmen write. With all his passions, he held licentiousness in disdain; with all his ambition for the power of wealth, he despised its luxury. Simple, masculine, severe, abstemious, he was of that mould in which, in earlier times, the successful men of action have been cast. But to successful action, circumstance is more necessary than to triumphant study.

It was to be expected that, in proportion as he had been familiar with a purer and nobler life, he should look with great and deep self-humiliation at his early association with Gawtreys. He was, in this respect, more severe on himself than any other mind ordinarily just and candid would have been, when fairly surveying the circumstances of penury, hunger and despair which had driven him to Gawtreys's roof, the imperfect nature of his early education, the boyish trust and affection he had felt for his protector, and his own ignorance of, and exemption from, all the worse practices of that unhappy criminal. But still, when, with the knowledge he had now acquired, the man looked calmly back, his cheek burned with remorseful shame at his unreflecting companionship in a life of subterfuge and equivocation, the true nature of which the boy (so circumstanced as we have shown him) might be forgiven for not at that time comprehending. Two advantages resulted, however, from the error and the remorse: first, the humiliation it brought curbed, in some measure, a pride that might otherwise have been arrogant and unamiable; and, secondly, as I have before intimated, his profound gratitude to Heaven for his deliverance from the snares that had beset his youth, gave his future the guide of an earnest and heartfelt faith. He acknowledged in life no such thing as accident. Whatever his struggles, whatever his melancholy, whatever his sense of worldly wrong, he never despaired; for nothing now could shake his belief in one directing Providence.

The ways and habits of Vaudemont were not at discord with those of the quiet household in which he was now a guest. Like most men of strong frames, and accustomed to active, not studious pursuits, he rose early, and usually rode to London, to come back late at noon to their frugal meal. And if again, perhaps at the hour when Fanny and Simon retired, he would often return to London, his own pass-key readmitted him, at whatever hour he came back, without disturbing the sleep of the household. Sometimes, when the sun began to decline, if the air was warm, the old man would crawl out, leaning on that strong arm, through the neighbouring lanes, ever returning through the lonely burial-ground; or, when the blind host clung to his fireside, and composed himself to sleep, Philip would saunter forth alone with Fanny; and, on the days when she went to sell her work or select her petty purchases, he always made a point of attending her. And her cheek wore a flush of pride when she saw him carrying her little basket, or waiting without, in musing patience, while she performed her commissions in the shops. Though, in reality, Fanny's intellect was ripening within, yet still the surface often misled the eye as to the depths. It was rather that something yet held back the faculties from their growth, than that the faculties themselves were wanting. Her weakness was more of the nature of the infant's than of one afflicted with incurable imbecility. For instance, she managed the little household with skill and prudence; she could calculate in her head, as rapidly as Vaudemont himself, the arithmetic necessary to her simple duties; she knew the value of money, which is more than some of us wise folks do. Her art, even in her infancy so remarkable in various branches of female handiwork, was carried, not only by perseverance, but by invention and peculiar talent, to a marvellous and exquisite perfection. Her embroidery, especially in what was then more rare than at present, viz., of flowers on silk, was much in request among the great modistes of London, to whom it found its way through the agency of Miss Semper. So that all this had enabled her, for years, to provide every necessary comfort of life for herself and her blind protector. And her care for the old man was beautiful in its minuteness, its vigilance. Wherever her heart was interested there never seemed a deficiency of mind. Vaudemont was touched to see how much of affectionate and pitying respect she appeared to enjoy in the neighbourhood, especially among the humbler classes; even the beggar who swept the crossings did not beg of her, but bade God bless her as she passed; and the rude, discontented artisan would draw himself from the wall and answer, with a softened brow, the smile with which the harmless one charmed his courtesy. In fact, whatever attraction she took from her youth, her beauty, her misfortune, and her affecting industry, was heightened, in the eyes of the poorer neighbours, by many little traits of charity and kindness; many a sick child had she tended, and many a breadless board had stolen something from the stock set aside for her father's grave.

"Don't you think," she once whispered to Vaudemont, "that God attends to us more if we are good to those who are sick and hungry?"

"Certainly we are taught to think so."

"Well, I'll tell you a secret—don't tell again. Grandpapa once said that my father had done bad things; now, if Fanny is good to those she can help, I think that God will hear her more kindly when she prays him to forgive what her father did. Do you think so too? Do say—you are so wise!"

"Fanny, you are wiser than all of us; and I feel myself better and happier when I hear you speak."

There were, indeed, many moments when Vaudemont thought that her deficiencies of intellect might have been repaired, long since, by skilful culture and habitual companionship with those of her own age; from which companionship, however, Fanny, even when at school, had shrunk aloof. At other moments there was something so absent and distracted about her, or so fantastic and incoherent, that Vaudemont, with the man's hard, worldly eye, read in it nothing but melancholy confusion. Nevertheless, if the skein of ideas was entangled, each thread, in itself, was a thread of gold.

Fanny's great object—her great ambition—her one hope, was a tomb for her supposed father. Whether from some of that early religion attached to the grave, which is most felt, perhaps, in Catholic countries, and which she had imbibed at the convent, or from her residence so near the burial-ground, and the affection with which she regarded the spot—whatever the cause, she had cherished for some years, as young maidens usually cherish the desire of the altar, the dream of the grave-stone. But the hoard was amassed so slowly—now old Gawtreys was attacked by illness—now there was some little difficulty in the rent—now some fluctuation in the price of work—and now, and more often than all, some demand on her charity, which interfered with, and drew from, the pious savings. This was a sentiment in which her new friend sympathised deeply; for he, too, remembered that his first gold had bought that humble stone which still preserved above the earth the memory of his mother.

Meanwhile, days crept on, and no new violence was offered to Fanny. Vaudemont learned, then, by little and little—and Fanny's account was very confused—the nature of the danger she had run.

It seemed that one day, tempted by the fineness of the weather up the road that led from the suburb farther into the country, Fanny was stopped by a gentleman in a carriage, who accosted her, as she said, very kindly, and, after several questions, which she answered with her usual unsuspecting innocence, learned her trade, insisted on purchasing some articles of work which she had at the moment in her basket, and promised to procure her a constant purchaser, upon much better terms than she had hitherto obtained, if she would call at a house about a mile from the suburb towards London. This she promised to do, and this she did, according to the address he gave her. She was admitted to a lady more gaily dressed than Fanny had ever seen a lady before; the gentleman was also present; they both loaded her with compliments, and bought her work at a price which seemed about to realise all the hopes of the poor girl as to the grave-stone for William Gawtreys (as if his evil fate pursued that wild man beyond the grave, and his very tomb was to be purchased by the gold of the polluter!) The lady then appointed her to call again; but, meanwhile, she met Fanny in the streets, and, while she was accosting her, it fortunately chanced that Miss Semper, the milliner, passed that way; turned round, looked hard at the lady, used very angry language to her, seized Fanny's hand, led her away, while the lady slunk off; and told her that the said lady was a very bad woman, and that Fanny must never speak to her again. Fanny most cheerfully promised this. And, in fact, the lady, probably afraid, whether of the mob or the magistrates, never again came near her.

"And," said Fanny, "I gave the money they had both given to me to Miss Semper, who said she would send it back."

"You did right, Fanny; and, as you made one promise to Miss Semper, so you must make me one: never to stir from home again without me or some other person. No, no other person—only me. I will give up everything else to go with you."

"Will you? Oh, yes, I promise! I used to like going alone, but that was before you came, brother."

And, as Fanny kept her promise, it would have been a bold gallant indeed who would have ventured to molest her by the side of that stately and strong protector.

CHAPTER VI.

Timon. Each thing's a thief:
The laws, your curb and whip, in their rough power
Have unchecked theft.

The sweet degrees that this brief world affords,
To such as may the passive drugs of it Freely command."—Timon of Athens.

On the day and at the hour fixed for the interview with the stranger who had visited Mr. Beaufort, Lord Lilburne was seated in the library of his brother-in-law; and before the elbow-chair, in which he lolled carelessly, stood our old friend Mr. Sharp, of Bow-street notability.

"Mr. Sharp," said the peer, "I have sent for you to do me a little favour. I expect a man here who professes to give Mr. Beaufort, my brother-in-law, some information about a lawsuit. It is necessary to know the exact value of his evidence. I wish you to ascertain all particulars about him. Be so good as to seat yourself in the porter's chair in the hall; note him when he enters, unobserved yourself; but, as he is probably a stranger to you, note him still more when he leaves the house; follow him at a distance; find out where he lives, whom he associates with, where he visits, their names and directions, what his character and calling are—in a word, everything you can, and report to me each evening. Dog him well—never lose sight of him—you will be handsomely paid. You understand."

"Ah!" said Mr. Sharp, "leave me alone, my lord. Been employed before by your lordship's brother-in-law. We knows what's what."

"I don't doubt it. To your post. I expect him every moment."

And, in fact, Mr. Sharp had only just ensconced himself in the porter's chair when the stranger knocked at the door; in another moment he was shown in to Lord Lilburne.

"Sir," said his lordship, without rising, "be so good as to take a chair. Mr. Beaufort is obliged to leave town; he has asked me to see you; I am one of his family—his wife is my sister; you may be as frank with me as with him—more so, perhaps."

"I beg the favour of your name, sir," said the stranger, adjusting his collar.

"Yours first—business is business."

"Well, then, Captain Smith."

"Of what regiment?"

"Half-pay."

"I am Lord Lilburne. Your name is Smith—humph!" added the peer, looking over some notes before him. "I see it is also the name of the witness appealed to by Mrs. Morton—humph!"

At this remark, and still more at the look which accompanied it, the countenance, before impudent and complacent, of Captain Smith fell into visible embarrassment; he cleared his throat, and said, with a little hesitation,

"My lord, that witness is living!"

"No doubt of it; witnesses are never wanting where property is concerned and imposture intended."

At this moment the servant entered, and placed a little note, quaintly folded, before Lord Lilburne. He glanced at it in surprise; opened, and read as follows, in pencil:

"My Lord,—I knows the man; take caer of him; he is as big a roge as ever stept; he was transported some three year back, and, unless his time has been shortened by the Home, he's absent without levee. We used to call him Dashing Jerry. That ere youngster we went arter, by Mr. Bofort's wish, was a pal of his. Scuze the liberty I take.
R. SHARP."

While Lord Lilburne held this effusion to the candle and spelled his way through it, Captain Smith, recovering his self-composure, thus proceeded:

"Imposture, my lord! imposture! I really don't understand. Your lordship really seems so suspicious that it is quite uncomfortable. I am sure it is all the same to me; and, if Mr. Beaufort does not think proper to see me himself, why, I'd best make my bow."

And Captain Smith rose.

"Stay a moment, sir. What Mr. Beaufort may yet do, I cannot say; but I know this: you stand charged of a very grave offence; and, if your witness or witnesses—you may have fifty for what I care—are equally guilty, so much the worse for them."

"My lord, I really don't comprehend."

"Then I will be more plain. I accuse you of devising an infamous falsehood for the purpose of extorting money. Let your witnesses appear in court, and I promise that you, they, and the young man, Mr. Morton, whose claim they set up, shall be indicted for conspiracy—conspiracy, if accompanied (as in the case of your witnesses) with perjury, of the blackest die. Mr. Smith, I know you; and, before ten o'clock to-morrow, I shall know also if you had his majesty's leave to quit the colonies! Ah! I am plain enough now, I see."

And Lord Lilburne threw himself back in his chair, and coldly contemplated the white face and dismayed expression of the crestfallen captain. That most worthy person, after a pause of confusion, amaze, and fear, made an involuntary stride, with a menacing gesture, towards Lilburne: the peer quietly placed his hand on the bell.

"One moment more," said the latter; "if I ring this bell, it is to place you in custody. Let Mr. Beaufort but see you here once again—nay, let him but hear another word of this pretended lawsuit, and you return to the colonies. Pshaw! Frown not at me, sir! A Bow-street officer is in the hall. Begone!—no, stop one moment, and take a lesson in life. Never again attempt to threaten people of property and station. Around every rich man is a wall—better not run your head against it."

"But I swear solemnly," cried the knave, with an emphasis so startling that it carried with it the appearance of truth, "that the marriage did take place."

"And I say, no less solemnly, that any one who swears it in a court of law shall be prosecuted for perjury! Bah! you are a sorry rogue! after all!"

And with an air of supreme and half-compassionate contempt, Lord Lilburne turned away and stirred the fire. Captain Smith muttered and fumbled a moment with his gloves, then shrugged his shoulders and sneaked out.

That night Lord Lilburne again received his friends, and among his guests came Vaudemont. Lilburne was one who liked the study of character, especially the character of men wrestling against the world. Wholly free from every species of ambition, he seemed to reconcile himself to his apathy by examining into the disquietude, the mortification, the heart's wear and tear which are the lot of the ambitious. Like the spider in his hole, he watched with a hungry pleasure the flies struggling in the web, through whose slimy labyrinth he walked with an easy safety. Perhaps one reason why he loved gaming was less from the joy of winning than the philosophical complacency with which he feasted on the emotions of those who lost. Always serene, and, except in debauch, always passionless—Magedie, tracing the experiments of science in the agonies of some tortured dog, could not be more rapt in the science, and more indifferent to the dog, than Lord Lilburne, ruining a victim, in the analysis of human passions, and stoical to the writhings of the wretch whom he tranquilly dissected. He wished to win money of Vaudemont—to ruin this man, who presumed to be more generous than other people—to see a bold adventurer submitted to the wheel of the fortune which reigns in a pack of cards; and all, of course, without the least hate to the man whom he then saw for the first time. On the contrary, he felt a respect for Vaudemont. Like most worldly men, Lord Lilburne was prepossessed in favour of those who seek to rise in life; and, like men who have excelled in manly and athletic exercises, he was also prepossessed in favour of those who appeared fitted for the same success.

Liancourt took aside his friend as Lord Lilburne was talking with his other guests:

"I need not caution you, who never play, not to commit yourself to Lord Lilburne's tender mercies."

"Nay," answered Vaudemont, "I want to know this man: I have reasons which alone induce me to enter his house. I can afford to venture something, because I wish to see if I can gain something for one dear to me. And for the rest, I know him too well not to be on my guard." With that he joined Lord Lilburne's group, and accepted the invitation to the card-table. At supper, Vaudemont conversed more than was habitual to him; he especially addressed himself to his host, and listened, with great attention, to Lilburne's caustic comments upon every topic successively started. And whether it was the art of De Vaudemont, or from an interest that Lord Lilburne took in studying what was to him a new character—or whether that, both men excelling peculiarly in all masculine accomplishments, their conversation was of a nature that was more attractive to themselves than to others—it so happened that they were still talking while the daylight already peered through the window-curtains.

"And I have outstayed all your guests," said De Vaudemont, glancing round the emptied room.

"It is the best compliment you could pay me. Another night we can enliven our tête-à-tête with écarté; though at your age, and with your appear-see, I am surprised, Monsieur de Vaudemont, that you are fond of play: I should have thought that it was not in a pack of cards that you looked for hearts. But perhaps you are blasé betimes of the beau sexe."

"Yet your devotion to it is, perhaps, as great now as ever?"

"Mine? No, not as ever. To different ages different degrees. At your age I wooed, at mine purchase—the better plan of the two: it does not take up half so much time."

"Your marriage, I think, Lord Lilburne, was not blessed with children. Perhaps sometimes you feel the want of them?"

"If I did, I could have them by the dozen. Other ladies have been more generous in that department than the Lady Lilburne, Heaven rest her!"

"And," said Vaudemont, fixing his eyes with some earnestness on his host, "if you were really persuaded that you had a child; or perhaps a grandchild—the mother, one whom you loved in your first youth—a child affectionate, beautiful, and especially needing your care and protection, would you not suffer that child, though illegitimate, to supply to you the want of filial affection?"

"Filial affection, mon cher!" repeated Lord Lilburne; "needing my care and protection! Pshaw! In other words, would I give board and lodging to some young vagabond who was good enough to say he was son to Lord Lilburne?"

"But if you were convinced that the claimant were your son, or perhaps your daughter—a tenderer name of the two, and a more helpless claimant?"

"My dear Monsieur de Vaudemont, you are doubtless a man of gallantry and of the world. If the children whom the law forces on one are, nine times out of ten, such damnable plagues, judge if one would father those whom the law permits us to disown. Natural children are the Parias of the world, and I—am one of the Brahmans."

"But," persisted Vaudemont, "if you had loved—if you had wronged the mother; if in the child you saw one who, without your aid, might be exposed to every curse with which the Parias (true, the Parias!) of the world are too often visited, and who, with your aid, might become, as age advanced, your companion, your nurse, your comforter—"

"Tush!" interrupted Lilburne, with some impatience, "I know not how our conversation fell on such a topic: perhaps you know a young lady or gentleman out of a father who wants to get into one; if so, rest assured that I have no mind to engage the applicant—nay, excuse me, I did but jest. But look you, Monsieur de Vaudemont, no man has studied the art of happiness more than I have; and I will tell you the great secret: have as few ties as possible. Nurse! pooh! I could hire one by the week a thousand times more useful and careful than a bore of a child. Comforter! a man of mind never wants comfort. And there is no such thing as sorrow while we have health and money, and don't care a straw for anybody in the world. If you choose to love people, their health and circumstances, if either go wrong, can fret you: that opens many avenues to pain. Never live alone, but always feel alone. You think this unamiable: possibly. I am no hypocrite, and I never affect to be anything but what I am—John Lilburne."

As the peer thus spoke, Vaudemont, leaning against the door, contemplated him with a strange mixture of interest and disgust. "And John Lilburne" was thought a great man, and William Gawtreys was a great rogue. You don't conceal your heart?—no, I understand. Wealth and power have no need of hypocrisy: you are the man of vice, Gawtreys the man of crime. You never sin against the law, he was a felon by his trade. And the felon saved from vice the child, and from want the grandchild (your flesh and blood) whom you disown: which will Heaven consider the worse man? No, poor Fanny! I see I am wrong. If he would own you, I would not give you up to the ice of such a soul: better the blind man than the dead heart!"

"Well, Lord Lilburne," said De Vaudemont, aloud, shaking off his reverie, "I must own that your philosophy seems to me the wisest for yourself. For a poor man it might be different: the poor need affection."

"Certainly," said Lord Lilburne, with an air of patronising candour.

"And I will own farther," continued De Vaudemont, "that I have willingly lost my money in return for the instruction I have received in hearing you converse."

"You are kind: come and take your revenge next Thursday. Adieu."

As Lord Lilburne undressed, and his valet attended him, he said to that worthy functionary,

"So you have not been able to make out the name of the stranger—the new lodger you tell me of?"

"No, my lord. They only say he is a very fine looking man."

"You have not seen him?"

"No, my lord. What do you wish me now to do?"

"Humph! Nothing at this moment! You manage things so badly, you might get me into a scrape. I never do anything the law, or the police, or even the newspapers can take hold of. I must think of some other way, humph! I never give up anything—do I, Dykeman? I never fail in what I undertake! If life had been worth what fools trouble it with—business and ambition—I suppose I should have been a great man with a very bad liver—ha! ha! I alone, of all the world, ever found out what the world was good for! Draw the curtains, Dykeman."

CHAPTER VII.

"Org. Welcome thou ice that sit'st about his heart!
No heat can ever thaw thee!"—Ford: Broken Heart.

"Nearch. Honourable infamy!"—Ibid.

"Aryc. Her tenderness hath yet deserved no rigour,
So to be crossed by Fate!

Aryc. You misapprehend, sir,
With favour let me speak it, what Apollo
Hath clouded in dim sense!"—Ibid.

If Vaudemont had fancied that, considering the age and poverty of Simon, it was his duty to see whether Fanny's not more legal, but more natural, protector were indeed the unredeemed and unmalleable egotist which Gawtreys had painted him, the conversation of one night was sufficient to make him abandon for ever the notion of advancing her claims upon Lord Lilburne. But Philip had another motive in continuing his acquaintance with that personage. The sight of his mother's grave had recalled to him the image of that lost brother over whom he had vowed to watch. And, despite the deep sense of wronged affection with which he yet remembered the cruel letter that had contained the last tidings of Sidney, Philip's heart clung with undying fondness to that fair shape associated with all the happy recollections of childhood; and his conscience as well as his love asked him, each time that he passed the churchyard, "Will you make no effort to obey that last prayer of the mother who consigned her darling to your charge?" Perhaps, had Philip been in want, or had the name he now bore been sullied by his conduct, he might have shrunk from seeking one whom he might injure, but could not serve. But, though not rich, he had more than enough for tastes as hardy and simple as any to which soldier of fortune ever limited his desires. And he thought, with a sentiment of just and noble pride, that the name which Eugenie had forced upon him had been borne spotless as the ermine through the trials and vicissitudes he had passed since he had assumed it. Sidney could give him nothing, and therefore it was his duty to seek Sidney out. Now he had always believed in his heart that the Beauports were acquainted with a secret which he more and more pined to penetrate. He would, for Sidney's sake, smother his hate to the Beauports; he would not reject their acquaintance if thrown in his way; nay, secure by his change of name and his altered features from all suspicion on their part, he would seek that acquaintance in order to find his brother and fulfil Catharine's last commands. His intercourse with Lilburne would necessarily bring him easily into contact with Lilburne's family. And in this thought he did not reject the invitations pressed on him. He felt, too, a dark and absorbing interest in examining a man who was in himself the incarnation of the World—the World of Art—the World as the Preacher paints it—the hollow, sensual, sharp-witted, self-wrapped World—the World that is all for this life, and thinks of no Future and no God!

Lord Lilburne was, indeed, a study for deep contemplation. A study to perplex the ordinary thinker, and task to the utmost the analysis of more profound reflection. William Gawtreys had possessed no common talents; he had discovered that his life had been one mistake: Lord Lilburne's intellect was far keener than Gawtreys's, and he had never made, and, if he had lived to the age of old Parr, never would have made, a similar discovery. He never wrestled against a law, though he slipped through all laws! And he knew no remorse, for he knew no fear. Lord Lilburne had married early, and long survived, a lady of fortune, the daughter of the then premier: the best match, in fact, of his day. And for one very brief period of his life he had suffered himself to enter into the field of politics: the only ambition common with men of equal rank. He showed talents that might have raised one so gifted by circumstance to any height, and then retired at once into his old habits and old system of pleasure. "I wished to try," said he once, "if Fame was worth one headach; and I have convinced myself that the man who can sacrifice the bone in his mouth to the shadow of the bone in the water is a fool." From that time he never once attended the House of Lords, and declared himself of no political opinions one way or the other. Nevertheless, the world had a general belief in his powers, and Vaudemont reluctantly subscribed to the world's verdict. Yet he had done nothing—he had read but little—he laughed at the world to its face; and that was, after all, the main secret of his ascendancy over those who were drawn into his circle. That contempt of the world placed the world at his feet. His sardonic and polished indifference—his professed code that there was no life worth caring for but his own life—his exemption from all cant, prejudice, and disguise—the frigid lubricity with which he glided out of the grasp of the Conventional, whenever it so pleased him, without shocking the Decorums whose sense is in their ear, and who are not roused by the deed, but by the noise—all this had in it the marrow and essence of a system triumphant with the vulgar; for little minds give importance to the man who gives importance to nothing. Lord Lilburne's authority, not in matters of taste alone, but in those which the world calls judgment and common sense, was regarded as an oracle. He cared not a straw for the ordinary bawbles that attract his order; he had refused both a step in the peerage and the garter (both which had at one time been offered him, as inducements to join the administration), and this was often quoted in his honour. But you only try a man's virtue when you offer him something that he covets. The earldom and the garter were to Lord Lilburne no more tempting inducements than a doll or a skipping-rope; had you offered him an infallible cure for the gout, or an antidote against old age, you might have hired him as your lackey on your own terms. Lord Lilburne's next heir was the son of his only brother, a person entirely dependant on his uncle. Lord Lilburne allowed him £1000 a year, and kept him always abroad in a diplomatic situation. He looked upon his successor as a man who wanted power, but not inclination, to become an assassin!

Though he lived sumptuously and grudged himself nothing, Lord Lilburne was far from an extravagant man: he might, indeed, be considered close; for he knew how much of comfort and consideration he owed to his money, and valued it accordingly; he knew the best speculations and the best investments. If he took shares in an American canal, you might be sure that the shares would soon be double in value; if he purchased an estate, you might be certain it was a bargain. This pecuniary tact and success necessarily augmented his fame for wisdom.

He had been, in early life, a successful gambler, and some suspicions of his fair play had been noised abroad; but, as has been recently seen in the instance of a man of rank equal to Lilburne's, though, perhaps, of less acute if more cultivated intellect, it is long before the pigeon will turn round upon a falcon of breed and metal. The rumours, indeed, were so vague as to carry with them no weight. During the middle of his career, when in the full flush of health and fortune, he had renounced the gaming-table. Of late years, as advancing age made time more heavy, he had resumed the resource, and with all his former good luck. The money-market, the table, the sex, constituted the other occupations and amusements with which Lord Lilburne filled up his rosy leisure.

Another way by which this man had acquired reputation for ability was this: he never pretended to any branch of knowledge of which he was ignorant, any more than to any virtue in which he was deficient. Honesty itself was never more free from quackery or deception than was this imbodied and walking Vice. If the world chose to esteem him, he did not buy its opinion by imposture. No man ever saw Lord Lilburne's name in a public subscription, whether for a new church, or a bible society, or a distressed family; no man ever heard of his doing one generous, benevolent, or kindly action; no man was ever startled by one philanthropical, pious, or amiable sentiment from those mocking lips. Yet, in spite of all this, John Lord Lilburne was not only esteemed, but liked by the world, and set up in the chair of its Rhadamanthuses. In a word, he seemed to Vaudemont—and he was so in reality—a brilliant example of the might of Circumstance; an instance of what may be done in the way of reputation and influence by a rich, well-born man, to whom the will a kingdom is. A little of genius, and Lord Lilburne would have made his vices notorious and his deficiencies glaring; a little of heart, and his habits would have led him into countless follies and discreditable scrapes. It was the lead and the stone that, like the lean poet in a gale of wind, he carried about him, that preserved his equilibrium, no matter which way the breeze blew. But all his qualities, positive or negative, would have availed him nothing without that position which enabled him to take his ease in that inn—the world—which presented, to every detection of his want of intrinsic nobleness, the irreproachable respectability of a high name, a splendid mansion, and a rent-roll without a flaw. Vaudemont drew comparisons between Lilburne and Gawtreys, and he comprehended at last why one was a low rascal and the other a great man.

Although it was but a few days after their first introduction to each other, Vaudemont had been twice to Lord Lilburne's, and their acquaintance was already on an easy footing, when one afternoon, as the former was riding through the streets towards H—, he met the peer, mounted on a stout cob, which, from its symmetrical strength, pure English breed, and exquisite grooming, showed something of those sporting tastes for which, in earlier life, Lord Lilburne had been noted.

"Why, Monsieur de Vaudemont, what brings you to this part of the town? Curiosity, and the desire to explore?"

"That might be natural enough in me; but you, who know London so well, rather what brings you here?"

"Why, I am returned from a long ride. I have had symptoms of a fit of the gout, and been trying to keep it off by exercise. I have been to a cottage that belongs to me some miles from town—a pretty place enough, by-the-way—you must come and see me there next month. I shall fill the house for a battue! I have some tolerable covers: you are a good shot, I suppose?"

"I have not practised, except with a rifle, for some years."

"That's a pity; for, as I think a week's shooting once a year quite enough, I fear that your visit to me at Fernside may not be sufficiently long to put your hand in."

"Fernside!"

"Yes; is the name familiar to you?"

"I think I have heard it before. Did your lordship purchase or inherit it?"

"I bought it of my brother-in-law. It belonged to his brother: a gay, wild sort of fellow, who broke his neck over a six-barred gate; through that gate my friend Robert walked the same day into a very fine estate!"

"I have heard so. The late Mr. Beaufort, then, left no children?"

"Yes; two. But they came into the world in the primitive way Mr. Owen wishes us all to come: too naturally for the present state of society; and Mr. Owen's parallelogram was not ready for them. By-the-way, one of them disappeared at Paris: you never met with him, I suppose?"

"Under what name?"

"Morton."

"Morton! hem! What Christian name?"

"Philip."

"Philip! no. But did Mr. Beaufort do nothing for the young men? I think I have heard somewhere that he took compassion on one of them."

"Have you? Ah, my brother-in-law is precisely one of those excellent men of whom the world always speaks well. No; he would very willingly have served either or both the boys, but the mother refused all his overtures and went to law, I fancy. The elder of these bastards turned out a sad fellow; and the younger—I don't know exactly where he is, but no doubt with one of his mother's relations. You seem to interest yourself in natural children, my dear Vaudemont!"

"Perhaps you have heard that people have doubted if I were a natural son?"

"Pardon me, no! But are you going? I was in hopes you would have turned back my way, and—"

"You are very good; but I have a particular appointment, and I am now too late. Good morning, Lord Lilburne."

Sidney with one of his mother's relations! Returned, perhaps, to the Mortons! How had he never before chanced on a conjecture so probable? He would go at once! That very night he would go to the house from which he had taken his brother. At least, and at the worst, they might give him some clew.

Buoyed with this hope and this resolve, he rode hastily to H— to announce to Simon and Fanny that he should not return to them, perhaps, for two or three days. As he entered the suburb, he drew up by the statuary of whom he had purchased his mother's gravestone.

The artist of the melancholy trade was at work in his yard.

"Ho! there!" said Vaudemont, looking over the low railing, "is the tomb I have ordered nearly finished?"

"Why, sir, as you were so anxious for despatch, and as it would take a long time to get a new one ready, I thought of giving you this, which is finished all but the inscription. It was meant for Miss Deborah Primme; but her nephew and heir called on me yesterday to say that, as the poor lady died worth less by £5000 than he had expected, he thought a handsome wooden tomb would do as well, if I could get rid of this for him. It is a beauty, sir. It will look so cheerful—"

"Well, that will do: and you can place it now where I told you?"

"In three days, sir."

"So be it." And he rode on, muttering, "Fanny, your pious wish will be fulfilled. But flowers—will they suit that stone?"

He put up his horse, and walked through the lane to Simon's.

As he approached the house, he saw Fanny's bright eyes at the window. She was watching his return. She hastened to open the door to him, and the world's wanderer felt what music there is in the footstep, what summer there is in the smile, of Welcome!

"My dear Fanny," he said, affected by her joyous greeting, "it makes my heart warm to see you. I have brought you a present from own. When I was a boy, I remember that my poor mother was fond of singing some simple songs, which often, somehow or other, come back to me when I see and hear you. I fancy you would understand and like them as well at least as I do; for, Heaven knows," he added to himself, "my ear is dull enough generally to the single of rhyme." And he placed in her hand a little volume of those exquisite songs in which Nature has set Nature to music.

"Oh! you are so kind, brother," said Fanny, with tears swimming in her eyes; and she kissed him book.

After their simple meal, Vaudemont broke to Fanny and Simon the intelligence of his intended departure for a few days. Simon heard it with the silent apathy into which, except on rare occasions, his life had settled. But Fanny turned away her face and wept.

"It is but for a day or two, Fanny."

"An hour is very, very long sometimes," said the girl, shaking her head mournfully.

"Come, I have a little time left yet, and the air is mild—you have not been out to-day—shall we walk—"

"Hem!" interrupted Simon, clearing his throat and seeming to start into sudden animation; "had not you better settle the board and lodging before you go?"

"Oh, grandfather!" cried Fanny, springing to her feet, with such a blush upon her face.

"Nay, child," said Vaudemont, laughingly, "your grandfather only anticipates me. But do not talk of boarding and lodging; Fanny is as a sister to me, and our purse is in common."

"I should like to feel a sovereign—just to feel it," muttered Simon, in a sort of apologetic tone that was really pathetic; and, as Vaudemont scattered some coins on the table, the old man slaved them up, chuckling and talking to himself; and rising with great alacrity, hobbled out of the room like a raven carrying some cunning theft to its hiding-place.

This was so amusing to Vaudemont, that he burst out fairly into an uncontrollable laughter. Fanny looked at him, humbled and wondering, for some moments; and then creeping to him, put her hand gently on his arm and said,

"Don't laugh—it pains me. It was not nice in grandpapa; but—but—it does not mean any thing. It—it—Don't laugh—Fanny feels so sad!"

"Well, you are right. Come, put on your bonnet; we will go out."

Fanny obeyed, but with less ready delight than usual. And they took their way through lanes over which hung, still in the cool air, the leaves of the yellow autumn.

Fanny was the first to break the silence.

"Do you know," she said, timidly, "that people here think me very silly? Do you think so, too?"

Vaudemont was startled by the simplicity of the question, and hesitated. Fanny looked up in his dark face anxiously and inquiringly.

"Well," she said, "you don't answer?"

"My dear Fanny, there are some things in which I could wish you less child-like, and, perhaps, less charming. These strange snatches of song, for instance—"

"What! do you not like me to sing? It is my way of talking."

"Yes; sing, pretty one! but sing something that we can understand; sing the songs I have given you, if you will. And now, may I ask why you put to me that question?"

"I have forgotten," said Fanny, absently, and looking down.

Now, at that instant, as Philip Vaudemont bent over the exceeding sweetness of that young face, a sudden thrill shot through his heart, and he, too, became silent and lost in thought. Was it possible that there could creep into his breast a milder affection for this creature than that of tenderness and pity? He was startled as the idea crossed him. He shrunk from it as a profanation—as a crime—as a frenzy. He, with his fate so uncertain and checkered—he to link himself with one so helpless—he to debase the very poetry that clung to the mental temperament of this pure being, with the feelings which every fair face can give to every coarse heart—to love Fanny! No, it was impossible! For what could he love in her but beauty, which the very spirit had forgot to guard? And she—could she even know what love was? He despised himself for even admitting such a thought; and, with that iron and hardy vigour which belonged to his mind, resolved to watch closely against every fancy that would pass the fairy boundary which separated Fanny from the world of women.

He was roused from this self-commune by an abrupt exclamation from his companion.

"Oh! I recollect now why I asked you that question. There is one thing that always puzzles me; I want you to explain it. Why does every thing in life depend upon money? You see even my poor grandfather forgot how good you are to us both when—when—Ah! I don't understand—it pains, it puzzles me!"

"Fanny, look there—no, to the left—you see that old woman, in rags, crawling wearily along: turn now to the right—you see that fine house glancing through the trees, with a carriage-and-four at the gates? The difference between that old woman and the owner of that house is—Money; and who shall blame your grandfather for liking money?"

Fanny understood; and, while the wise man thus moralised, the girl, whom his very compassion so haughtily contemned, moved away to the old woman to do her little best to smooth down those disparities from which wisdom and moralising never deduct a grain! Vaudemont felt this as he saw her glide towards the beggar; but, when she came bounding back to him, she had forgotten his dislike to her songs, and was chanting, in the glee of the heart that a kind act had made glad, one of her own impromptu melodies.

Vaudemont turned away. Poor Fanny had unconsciously decided his self-conquest: she guessed not what passed within him, but she suddenly recollected what he had said to her about her songs, and fancied him displeased.

"Ah! I will never do it again. Brother, don't turn away!"

"But we must go home. Hark! the clock strikes seven; I have no time to lose. And you will promise me never to stir out till I return?"

"I shall have no heart to stir out," said Fanny, sadly; and then, in a more cheerful voice, she added, "And I shall sing the songs you like before you come back again!"

CHAPTER VIII.

"Well did they know that service all by rote;

Some singing loud as if they had complained,
Some with their notes another manner feigned."

CHAUCER: The C.ckoo and the Nightingale modernised
by WORDSWORTH—HORN'S Edition.

And once more, sweet Winandermere, we are on the banks of thy happy lake! The softest ray of the soft clear sun of early autumn trembled on the fresh waters, and glanced through the leaves of the limes and willows that were reflected—distinct as a home for the Naiads—beneath the limpid surface. You might hear in the bushes the young blackbirds trilling their first untutored notes. And the graceful dragon-fly, his wings glittering in the translucent sunshine, darted to and fro the reeds gathered here and there in the mimic bays that broke the shelving marge of the grassy shore.

And by that grassy shore, and beneath those shadowy limes, sat the young lovers. It was the very place where young Spencer had first beheld Camilla. And now they were met to say "Farewell!"

"Oh, Camilla!" said he, with great emotion and eyes that swam in tears, "be firm—be true. You know how my whole life is wrapped up in your love. You go amid scenes where all will tempt you to forget me. I linger behind in those which are consecrated by your remembrance, which will speak to me every hour of you. Camilla, since you do love me—you do, do you not?—since you have confessed it—since your parents have consented to our marriage, provided only that your love last (for of mine there can be no doubt) for one year—one terrible year—shall I not trust you as truth itself? And yet how darkly I despair at times!"

Camilla innocently took the hands that, clasped together, were raised to her, as if in supplication, and pressed them kindly between her own.

"Do not doubt me—never doubt my affection. Has not my father consented? Reflect; it is but a year's delay!"

"A year! Can you speak thus of a year—a whole year? Never to see, to hear you for a whole year, except in my dreams! And if, at the end, your parents waver? Your father—I distrust him still. If this delay is but meant to wean you from me—if, at the end, there are new excuses found—if they then, for some cause or other not now foreseen, still refuse their assent—you may—I not still look to you?"

Camilla sighed heavily; and, turning her meek face on her lover, said timidly, "Never think that so short a time can make me unfaithful, and do not suspect that my father will break his promise."

"But if he does, you will still be mine."

"Ah, Charles, how could you esteem me as a wife if I were to tell you I could forget I am a daughter?"

This was said so touchingly, and with so perfect a freedom from all affectation, that her lover could only reply by covering her hand with his kisses. And it was not till after a pause that he continued, passionately.

"You do but show me how much deeper is my love than yours. You can never dream how I love you. But I do not ask you to love me as well: it would be impossible. My life from my earliest childhood has been passed in these solitudes. A happy life, though tranquil and monotonous. You seemed to me the living form of the very poetry I had worshiped; so bright—so heavenly—I loved you from the first moment that we met. I am not like other men of my age. I have no pursuit—no occupation—nothing to abstract me from your thought. And I love you so purely, so devotedly, Camilla. I have never known even a passing fancy for another. You are the first—the only woman—it ever seemed to me possible to love. You are my Eve—your presence my Paradise! Think how sad I shall be when you are gone; how I shall visit every spot your footstep has hallowed; how I shall count every moment till the year is past!”

While he thus spoke, he had risen in that restless movement which belongs to great emotion; and Camilla now rose also, and said, soothingly, as she laid her hand on his shoulder with tender but modest frankness, “And shall I not also think of you? I am sad to feel that you will be so much alone—no sister—no brother!”

“Do not grieve for that. The memory of you will be dearer to me than comfort from all else. And you will be true?”

Camilla made no answer by words, but her eyes and her colour spoke. And in that moment, while plighting eternal truth, they forgot that they were about to part!

Meanwhile, in a room in the house, which, screened by the foliage, was only partially visible where the lovers stood, sat Mr. Robert Beaufort and Mr. Spencer.

“I assure you, sir,” said the former, “that I am not insensible to the merits of your nephew, and to the very handsome proposals you make; still I cannot consent to abridge the time I have named. They are both very young. What is a year?”

“It is a long time, when it is a year of suspense,” said the recluse, shaking his head.

“It is a longer time when it is a year of domestic dissension and repentance. And it is a very true proverb, ‘Marry in haste and repent at leisure.’ No! If, at the end of the year, the young people continue of the same mind, and no unforeseen circumstances occur—”

“No unforeseen circumstances, Mr. Beaufort?—that is a new condition—it is a very vague phrase.”

“My dear sir, it is hard to please you. Unforeseen circumstances,” said the wary father, with a wise look, “means circumstances that we don’t foresee at present. I assure you that I have no intention to trifle with you, and I shall be sincerely happy in so respectable a connection.”

“The young people may write to each other?”

“Why, I’ll consult Mrs. Beaufort. At all events, it must not be very often; and Camilla is well brought up, and will show all the letters to her mother. I don’t much like a correspondence of that nature: it often leads to unpleasant circumstances; if, for instance—”

“If what?”

“Why, if the parties change their minds, and my girl were to marry another. It is not prudent in matters of business, my dear sir, to put down anything on paper that can be avoided.”

Mr. Spencer opened his eyes. “Matters of business, Mr. Beaufort!”

“Well, is not marriage a matter of business, and a very grave matter too? More lawsuits about marriage and settlements, &c., than I like to think of. But to change the subject. You have never heard anything more of those young men, you say?”

“No,” said Mr. Spencer, rather inaudibly, and looking down.

“And it is your firm impression that the elder one, Philip, is dead?”

“I don’t doubt it.”

“That was a very vexatious and improper lawsuit their mother brought against me. Do you know that some wretched impostor, who, it appears, is a convict broke loose before his time, has threatened me with another on the part of one of those young men? You never heard anything of it, eh?”

“Never, upon my honour.”

“And, of course, you would not countenance so villainous an attempt?”

“Because that would break off our contract at once. But you are too much a gentleman and a man of honour. Forgive me so improper a question. As for the younger Mr. Morton, I have no ill feeling against him. But the elder!—oh, a thorough reprobate! a very alarming character! I could have nothing to do with any member of the family while the elder lived; it would only expose me to every species of insult and imposition. And now I think we have left our young friends alone long enough. But stay: to prevent future misunderstanding, I may as well read over again the heads of the arrangement you honour me by proposing. You agree to settle your fortune after your decease, amounting to £23,000, and your house, with twenty-five acres, one rood, and three poles, more or less, upon your nephew and my daughter, jointly—remainder to their children—jointure £500 a year. Certainly, without offence, in a worldly point of view, Camilla might do better; still you are so very respectable, and you speak so handsomely, that I cannot touch upon that point; and I own that, though there is a large nominal rent-roll attached to Beaufort Court (indeed, there is not a finer property in the county), yet there are many encumbrances, and ready money would not be convenient to me. Arthur—poor fellow! a very fine young man, sir—is, as I have told you in perfect confidence, a little imprudent and lavish; in short, your offer to dispense with any dowry is extremely liberal, and proves your nephew is actuated by no mercenary feelings: such conduct prepossesses me highly in your favour, and his too.”

Mr. Spencer bowed, and the great man, rising with a stiff affectation of kindly affability, put his arm into the uncle’s, and strolled with him across the lawn towards the lovers. And such is life: love on the lawn, and settlements in the parlour!

The lover was the first to perceive the approach of the elder parties. And a change came over his face as he saw the dry aspect, and marked the stealthy stride of his future father-in-law; for then there flashed across him a dreary reminiscence of early childhood; the happy evening when, with his joyous father, that grave and ominous aspect was first beheld; and then the dismal burial, the funeral sables, the carriage at the door, and he himself clinging to the cold uncle to ask him to say a word of comfort to the mother who now slept far away.

“Well, my young friend,” said Mr. Beaufort, patronisingly, “your good uncle and myself are quite agreed: a little time for reflection, that’s all. Oh! I don’t think the worse of you for wishing to abridge it. But papas must be papas.”

There was so little jocular about that sedate man, that this attempt at jovial good-humour seemed harsh and grating: the hinges of that wily mouth wanted oil for a hearty laugh.

“Come, don’t be faint-hearted, Mr. Charles. ‘Faint heart’—you know the proverb. You must stay and dine with us. We return to-morrow to town. I should tell you that I received this morning a letter from my son Arthur, announcing his return from Baden; so we must give him the meeting—a very joyful one, you may guess. We have not seen him these three years. Poor fellow! he says he has been very ill, and the waters have ceased to do him any good. But a little quiet and country air at Beaufort Court will set him up, I hope.”

Thus running on about his son, then about his shooting—about Beaufort Court and its splendours—about parliament and its fatigues—about the last French revolution and the last English election—about Mrs. Beaufort, and her good qualities and bad health—about, in short, everything relating to himself, some things relating to the public, and nothing that related to the persons to whom his conversation was directed, Mr. Robert Beaufort wore away half an hour, when the Spencers took their leave, promising to return to dinner.

“Charles,” said Mr. Spencer, as the boat which the young man rowed bounded over the water to their quiet home; “Charles, I dislike these Beauforts!”

“Not the daughter?”

“No, she is beautiful, and seems good: not so handsome as your poor mother, but who ever was?” Here Mr. Spencer sighed, and repeated some lines from Shenstone.

“Do you think Mr. Beaufort suspects in the least who I am?”

“Why, that puzzles me; I rather think he does.”

“And that is the cause of the delay? I knew it.”

“No; on the contrary, I incline to think he has some kindly feeling to you, though not to your brother, and that it is such a feeling that made him consent to your marriage. He sifted me very closely as to what I knew of the young Mortons; observed that you were very handsome, and that he had fancied at first that he had seen you before.”

“Indeed!”

“Yes: and looked hard at me while he spoke; and said more than once, significantly, ‘So his name is Charles?’ He talked about some attempt at imposture and litigation; but that was evidently merely invented to sound me about your brother, whom, of course, he spoke ill of; impressing on me, three or four times, that he would never have any thing to say to any of the family while Philip lived.”

“And you told him,” said the young man, hesitatingly, and with a deep blush of shame over his face, “that you were persuaded—that is, that you believed Philip was—was—”

“Was dead! Yes, and without confusion. For the more I reflect, the more I think he must be dead. At all events, you may be sure that he is dead to us; that we shall never hear more of him.”

“Poor Philip!”

“Your feelings are natural; they are worthy of your excellent heart; but remember what would have become of you if you had stayed with him!”

“True!” said the brother, with a slight shudder; “a career of suffering—crime—perhaps the gibbet! Ah, what do I owe you?”

The dinner party at Mr. Beaufort’s that day was constrained and formal, though the host, in unusual good-humour, sought to make himself agreeable. Mrs. Beaufort, languid and afflicted with the headache, said little. The two Spencers were yet more silent. But the younger sat next to her he loved; and both hearts were full: and in the evening they contrived to creep apart into a corner by the window, through which the starry heavens looked kindly on them. They conversed in whispers, with long pauses between each; and, at times, Camilla's tears flowed silently down her cheeks, and were followed by the false smiles intended to cheer her lover.

Time did not fly, but crept on breathlessly and heavily. And then came the last parting—formal, cold—before witnesses. But the lover could not contain his emotion, and the hard father heard his suppressed sob as he closed the door.

It will now be well to explain the cause of Mr. Beaufort's heightened spirits, and the motives of his conduct with respect to his daughter's suitor.

This, perhaps, can be best done by laying before the reader the following letters that passed between Mr. Beaufort and Lord Lilburne.

From LORD LILBURNE to ROBERT BEAUFORT, Esq., M. P.

"Dear Beaufort,—I think I have settled, pretty satisfactorily, your affair with your unwelcome visitor. The first thing it seemed to me necessary to do was to learn exactly what and who he was, and with what parties that could annoy you he held intercourse. I sent for Sharp, the Bow street officer, and placed him in the hall to mark, and afterward to keep watch and dog your new friend. The moment the latter entered, I saw at once, from his dress and his address, that he was a 'scamp;' and thought it highly inexpedient to place you in his power by any money transactions. While talking with him, Sharp sent in a billet containing his recognition of our gentleman as a transported convict.

"I acted accordingly; soon saw, from the fellow's manner, that he had returned before his time; and sent him away with a promise, which you may be sure he believes will be kept, that if he molest you farther, he shall return to the colonies; and that, if his lawsuit proceed, his witness or witnesses shall be indicted for conspiracy and perjury. Make your mind easy so far. For the rest, I own to you that I think what he says probable enough; but my object in setting Sharp to watch him is to learn what other parties he sees. And if there be really anything formidable in his proofs or witnesses, it is with those other parties I advise you to deal. Never transact business with the go-between if you can with the principal. Remember, the two young men are the persons to arrange with, after all. They must be poor, and, therefore, easily dealt with. For, if poor, they will think a bird in the hand worth two in the bush of a lawsuit.

"If, through Mr. Spencer, you can learn anything of either of the young men, do so; and try and open some channel through which you can always establish a communication with them, if necessary. Perhaps, by learning their early history, you may learn something to put them into your power.

"I have had a twinge of the gout this morning; and am likely, I fear, to be laid up for some weeks.

"Yours truly,

"LILBURNE.

"P.S.—Sharp has just been here. He followed the man who calls himself 'Captain Smith' to a house in Lambeth, where he lodges, and from which he did not stir till midnight, when Sharp ceased his watch. On renewing it this morning, he found that the captain had gone off, to what place Sharp has not yet discovered.

"Burn this immediately."

From ROBERT BEAUFORT, Esq., M. P., to the LORD LILBURNE.

"Dear Lilburne,—Accept my warmest thanks for your kindness: you have done admirably, and I do not see that I have anything farther to apprehend. I suspect that it was an entire fabrication on that man's part, and your firmness has foiled his wicked designs. Only think, I have discovered—I am sure of it—one of the Mortons; and he, too, though the younger, yet, in all probability, the sole pretender the fellow could set up. You remember that the child Sidney had disappeared mysteriously—you remember, also, how much that Mr. Spencer had interested himself in finding out the same Sidney. Well, this gentleman at the Lakes is, as we suspected, the identical Mr. Spencer, and his soi-disant nephew, Camilla's suitor, is assuredly no other than the lost Sidney. The moment I saw the young man I recognised him, for he is very little altered, and has a great look of his mother into the bargain. Concealing my more than suspicions, I, however, took care to sound Mr. Spencer (a very poor soul), and his manner was so embarrassed as to leave no doubt of the matter; but, in asking him what he had heard of the brothers, I had the satisfaction of learning that, in all human probability, the elder is dead: of this Mr. Spencer seems convinced. I also assured myself that neither Spencer nor the young man had the remotest connection with our Captain Smith, nor any idea of litigation. This is very satisfactory, you will allow. And now I hope you will approve of what I have done. I find that young Morton, or Spencer, as he is called, is desperately enamoured of Camilla; he seems a meek, well-conditioned, amiable young man, writes poetry—in short, rather weak than otherwise. I have demanded a year's delay to allow mutual trial and reflection. This gives us the channel for constant information which you advise me to establish, and I shall have the opportunity to learn if the impostor makes any communication to them, or if there be any news of the brother. If by any trick or chicanery (for I will never believe that there was a marriage), a lawsuit that might be critical or hazardous can be cooked up, I can, I am sure, make such terms with Sidney, through his love for my daughter, as would effectively and permanently secure me from all farther trouble and machinations in regard to my property. And if, during the year, we convince ourselves that, after all, there is not a leg of law for any claimant to stand on, I may be guided by other circumstances how far I shall finally accept or reject the suit. That must depend on any other views we may then form for Camilla; and I shall not allow a hint of such an engagement to get abroad. At the worst, as Mr. Spencer's heir, it is not so very bad a match, seeing that they dispense with all marriage portion, &c.: a proof how easily they can be managed. I have not let Mr. Spencer see that I have discovered his secret; I can do that or not, according to circumstances hereafter; neither have I said anything of my discovery to Mrs. B. or Camilla. At present, 'least said soonest mended.' I heard from Arthur to-day. He is on his road home, and we hasten to town, sooner than we expected, to meet him. He complains still of his health. We shall all go down to Beaufort Court. I write this at night, the pretended uncle and sham nephew having just gone. But, though we start to-morrow, you will get this a day or two before we arrive, as Mrs. Beaufort's health renders short stages necessary. I really do hope that Arthur, also, will not be an invalid, poor fellow! one in a family is quite enough; and I find Mrs. Beaufort's delicacy very inconvenient, especially in moving about and in keeping up one's county connections. A young man's health, however, is soon restored. I am very sorry to hear of your gout, except that it carries off all other complaints. I am very well, thank God; indeed, my health has been much better of late years: Beaufort Court agrees with me so well! The more I reflect, the more I am astonished at the monstrous and wicked impudence of that fellow—to defraud a man out of his own property! You are quite right: certainly a conspiracy.

"Yours truly,

"R. B.

"P.S.—I shall keep a constant eye on the Spencers.

"Burn this immediately."

After he had written and sealed this letter, Mr. Beaufort went to bed and slept soundly.

And the next day that place was desolate, and the board on the lawn announced that it was again to be let. But thither daily, in rain or sunshine, came the solitary lover, as a bird that seeks its young in the deserted nest: again and again he haunted the spot where he had strayed with the lost one; and again and again murmured his passionate vows beneath the fast fading limes. Are those vows destined to be ratified or annulled? Will the absent forget, or the lingerer be consoled? Had the characters of that young romance been lightly stamped on the fancy, where, once obliterated, they are erased for ever, or were they graven deep in those tablets where the writing, even when invisible, exists still, and revives, sweet letter by letter, when the light and the warmth borrowed from the one bright presence are applied to the faithful record? There is but one wizard to disclose that secret, as all others: the old grave-digger, whose churchyard is the earth—whose trade is to find burial places for passions that seemed immortal—disinterring the ashes of some long-crumbling memory, to hollow out the dark bed of some new perished hope: He who determines all things, and prophesies none; for his oracles are uncomprehended till the doom is sealed: He who, in the bloom of the fairest affection, detects the hectic that consumes it, and, while the hymn rings at the altar, marks with his joyless eye the grave for the bridal vow. Wherever is the sepulchre, there is thy temple, oh melancholy TIME!

CHAPTER I.

"Per ambages et ministeria deorum."—PETRONIUS.

Mr. Roger Morton was behind his counter one drizzling, melancholy day. Mr. Roger Morton, alderman, and twice mayor of his native town, was a thriving man. He had grown portly and corpulent. 'The nightly potations of brandy and water, continued year after year with mechanical perseverance, had deepened the roses on his cheek. Mr. Roger Morton was never intoxicated; he only "made himself comfortable." His constitution was strong; but, somehow or other, his digestion was not as good as it might be. He was certain that something or other disagreed with him. He left off the joint one day, the pudding another. Now he avoided vegetables as poison, and now he submitted with a sigh to the doctor's interdict of his cigar. Mr. Roger Morton never thought of leaving off the brandy and water; and he would have resented as the height of impertinent insinuation any hint upon that score to a man of so sober and respectable a character.

Mr. Roger Morton was seated; for the last four years, ever since his second mayoralty, he had arrogated to himself the dignity of a chair. He received rather than served his customers. The latter task was left to two of his sons. For Tom, after much cogitation, the profession of an apothecary had been selected. Mrs. Morton observed that it was a genteel business, and Tom had always been a likely lad. And Mr. Roger considered that it would be a great saving to have his medical adviser in his own son.

The two other sons, and the various attendants of the shop, were plying their profitable trade, as customer after customer, with umbrellas and in pattens, dropped into the tempting shelter, when a man, meanly dressed, and who was somewhat past the middle age, with a careworn, hungry face, entered timidly. He waited in patience by the crowded counter, elbowed by sharp-boned and eager spinsters—and how sharp the elbows of spinsters are, no man can tell who has not forced his unwelcome way through the agitated groups of a linen-draper's shop!—the man, I say, waited patiently and sadly, till the smallest of the shopboys turned from a lady, who, after much sorting and shading, had finally decided on two yards of lilach-coloured penny riband, and asked, in an insinuating professional tone,

"What shall I show you, sir?"

"I wish to speak to Mr. Morton. Which is he?"

"Mr. Morton is engaged, sir. I can give you what you want."

"No—it is a matter of business—important business."

The boy eyed the napless and dripping hat, the gloveless hands, and the rusty neckcloth of the speaker; and said, as he passed his fingers through a profusion of light curls,

"Mr. Morton don't attend much to business himself now; but that's he. Any cravats, sir?"

The man made no answer, but moved where, near the window, and chatting with the banker of the town (as the banker tried on a pair of beaver gloves,) sat still—after due apology for sitting—Mr. Roger Morton.

The alderman lowered his spectacles as he glanced grimly at the lean apparition that shaded the spruce banker, and said,

"Do you want me, friend?"

"Yes, sir, if you please;" and the man took off his shabby hat, and bowed low.

"Well, speak out. No begging petition, I hope?"

"No, sir? Your nephews—"

The banker turned round, and in his turn eyed the new-comer. The linen-draper started back.

"Nephews!" he repeated, with a bewildered look. "What does the man mean? Wait a bit."

"Oh, I've done!" said the banker, smiling. "I am glad to find we agree so well upon this question: I knew we should. Our member will never suit us if he goes on in this way. Trade must take care of itself. Good-day to you!"

"Nephews!" repeated Mr. Morton, rising, and beckoning to the man to follow him into the back parlour, where Mrs. Morton sat casting up the washing bills.

"Now," said the husband, closing the door, "what do you mean, my good fellow?"

"Sir, what I wish to ask you is, if you can tell me what has become of—of the young Mr. Beau—that is, of your sister's sons. I understand there were two, and I am told that—that they are both dead. Is it so?"

"What is that to you, friend?"

"An please you, sir, it is a great deal to them!"

"Yes—ha! ha!—it is a great deal to everybody whether they are alive or dead!" Mr. Morton, since he had been mayor, now and then had his joke. "But really—"

"Roger!" said Mrs. Morton, under her breath, "Roger!"

"Yes, my dear."

"Come this way; I want to speak to you about this bill." The husband approached, and bent over his wife. "Who is this man?"

"I don't know."

"Depend on it, he has some claim to make—some bills, or something. Don't commit yourself; the boys are dead for what we know!"

Mr. Morton hemmed, and returned to his visitor.

"To tell you the truth, I am not aware of what has become of the young men."

"Then they are not dead—I thought not!" exclaimed the man, joyously.

"That's more than I can say. It's many years since I lost sight of the only one I ever saw; and they may be both dead for what I know."

"Indeed!" said the man. "Then you can give me no kind of—of—hint like, to find them out?"

"No. Do they owe you anything?"

"It does not signify talking now, sir. I beg your pardon."

"Stay—who are you?"

"I am a very poor man, sir."

Mr. Morton recoiled.

"Poor! Oh, very well—very well. You have done with me now. Good-day—good-day. I'm busy."

The stranger pecked for a moment at his hat, turned the handle of the door, peered under his gray eyebrows at the portly trader, who, with both hands buried in his pockets, his mouth pursed up, like a man about to say "No," fidgeted uneasily behind Mrs. Morton's chair. He sighed, shook his head, and vanished.

Mrs. Morton rang the bell—the maid-servant entered.

"Wipe the carpet, Jenny: dirty feet! Mr. Morton, it's a Brussels!"

"It was not my fault, my dear. I could not talk about family matters before the whole shop. Do you know, I'd quite forgot those poor boys. This unsettles me. Poor Catharine! she was so fond of them. A pretty boy that Sidney, too. What can have become of them! My heart rebukes me. I wish I had asked the man more."

"More! Why, he was just going to beg."

"Beg—yes—very true!" said Mr. Morton, pausing irresolutely; and then, with a hearty tone, he cried out, "and, damme, if he had begged, I could afford him a shilling! I'll go after him." So saying, he hastened back through the shop, but the man was gone—the rain was falling—Mr. Morton had his thin shoes on—he blew his nose, and went back to the counter. But there still rose to his memory the pale face of his dead sister; and a voice murmured in his ear, "Brother, where is my child?"

"Pshaw! it is not my fault if he ran away. Bob, go and get me the county paper."

Mr. Morton had again settled himself, and was deep in a trial for murder, when another stranger strode haughtily into the shop. The new-comer, wrapped in a pelisse of furs, with a thick mustache, and an eye that took in the whole shop, from master to boy, from ceiling to floor, in a glance, had the air at once of a foreigner and a soldier. Every look fastened on him as he paused an instant, and then, walking up to the alderman, said,

"Sir, you are doubtless Mr. Morton?"

"At your commands, sir," said Roger, rising involuntarily.

"A word with you, then, on business."

"Business!" echoed Mr. Morton, turning rather pale, for he began to think himself haunted; "anything in my line, sir? I should be—"

The stranger bent down his tall stature, and hissed in Mr. Morton's foreboding ear,

"Your nephews!"

Mr. Morton was literally dumbstricken. Yes, he certainly was haunted! He stared at this second questioner, and fancied that there was something very supernatural and unearthly about him. He was so tall, and so dark, and so stern, and so strange. Was it the Unspeakable himself come for the linen-draper? Nephews again! The uncle of the babes in the wood could hardly have been more startled by the demand!

"Sir," said Mr. Morton at last, recovering his dignity, and somewhat peevishly, "sir, I don't know why people should meddle with my family affairs. I don't ask other folks about their nephews. I have no nephew that I know of."

"Permit me to speak to you alone for one instant."

Mr. Morton sighed, hitched up his trowsers, and led the way to the parlour, where Mrs. Morton, having finished the washing bills, was now engaged in tying certain pieces of bladders round certain pots of preserves. The eldest Miss Morton, a young woman of five or six and twenty, who was about to be very advantageously married to a young gentleman who dealt in coals and played the violin (for N—— was a very musical town,) had just joined her for the purpose of extorting "The Swiss Boy, with variations," out of a sleepy little piano, that emitted a very painful cry under the awakening fingers of Miss Margaret Morton.

Mr. Morton threw open the door with a grunt, and the stranger pausing at the threshold, the full flood of sound (key C) upon which "The Swiss Boy" was swimming along, "kine" and all, for life and death, came splash upon him.

"Silence! can't you?" cried the father, putting one hand to his ear, while with the other he pointed to a chair; and, as Mrs. Morton looked up from the preserves with that air of indignant suffering with which female meekness upbraids a husband's wanton outrage, Mr. Roger added, shrugging his shoulders,

"My nephews again, Mrs. M.!"

Miss Margaret turned round and dropped a courtesy. Mrs. Morton gently let fall a napkin over the preserves, and muttered a sort of salutation as the stranger, taking off his hat, turned to mother and daughter one of those noble faces in which Nature has written her grant and warranty of the lordship of creation.

"Pardon me," he said, "if I disturb you. But my business will be short. I have come to ask you, sir, frankly, and as one who has a right to ask it, what tidings you can give me of Sidney Morton?"

"Sir, I know nothing whatever about him. He was taken from my house, about twelve years since, by his brother. Myself, and the two Mr. Beauforts, and another friend of the family, went in search of them both. My search failed."

"And theirs?"

"I understood from Mr. Beaufort that they had not been more successful. I have had no communication with those gentlemen since. But that's neither here nor there. In all probability, the elder of the boys, who, I fear, was a sad character, corrupted and ruined his brother; and, by this time, Heaven knows what and where they are."

"And no one has inquired of you since—no one has asked the brother of Catharine Morton—nay, rather, of Catharine Beaufort—where is the child intrusted to your care?"

This question, so exactly similar to that which his superstition had rung on his own ears, perfectly appalled the worthy alderman. He staggered back, stared at the marked and stern face that lowered upon him, and at last cried,

"For pity's sake, sir, be just! What could I do for one who left me of his own accord?"

"The day you had beat him like a dog. You see, Mr. Morton, I know all!"

"And what are you?" said Mr. Morton, recovering his English courage, and feeling himself strangely browbeaten in his own house; "what and who are you, that you thus take the liberty to catechise a man of my character and respectability?"

"Twice mayor—" began Mrs. Morton.

"Hush, mother!" whispered Miss Margaret; "don't work him up."

"I repeat, sir, what are you?"

"What am I? Your nephew! Who am I? Before men, I bear a name that I have assumed and not dishonoured; before Heaven, I am Philip Beaufort!"

Mrs. Morton dropped down upon her stool. Margaret murmured, "My cousin!" in a tone that the ear of the musical coal-merchant might not have greatly relished. And Mr. Morton, after a long pause, came up with a frank and manly expression of joy, and said,

"Then, sir, I thank Heaven, from my heart, that one of my sister's children stands alive before me!"

"And now, again, I—I, whom you accuse of having corrupted and ruined him—him, for whom I toiled and worked—him, who was to me, then, as a last surviving son to some anxious father—I, from whom he was reft and robbed—I ask you again for Sidney—for my brother!"

"And again I say that I have no information to give you—that—stay a moment—stay. You must pardon what I have said of you before you made yourself known. I went but by the accounts I had received from Mr. Beaufort. Let me speak plainly. That gentleman thought, right or wrong, that it would be a great thing to separate your brother from you. He may have found him—it must be so—and kept his name and condition concealed from us all, lest you should detect it. Mrs. M., don't you think so?"

"I'm sure I'm so terrified I don't know what to think," said Mrs. Morton, putting her hand to her forehead, and seesawing herself to and fro upon her stool.

"But since they wronged you—since you— you seem so very—very—"

"Very much the gentleman," suggested Miss Margaret.

"Yes, so much the gentleman—well off, too, I should hope, sir," and the experienced eye of Mr. Morton glanced at the costly sables that lined the pelisse, "there can be no difficulty in your learning from Mr. Beaufort all that you wish to know. And pray, sir, may I ask, did you send any one here to-day to make the very inquiry you have made?"

"I? No. What do you mean?"

"Well, well—sit down—there may be something in all this that you may make out better than I can."

And, as Philip obeyed, Mr. Morton, who was really and honestly rejoiced to see his sister's son alive and apparently thriving, proceeded to relate pretty exactly the conversation he had held with the previous visitor. Philip listened earnestly and with attention. Who could this questioner be? Some one who knew his birth—some one who sought him out—some one who—Good Heavens! could it be the long-lost witness of the marriage?

As soon as that idea struck him, he started from his seat, and entreated Morton to accompany him in search of the stranger. "You know not," he said, in a tone impressed with that energy of will in which lay the talent of his mind, "you know not of what importance this may be to my prospects—to your sister's fair fame. If it should be the witness returned at last! Who else, of the rank you describe, would be interested in such inquiries? Come!"

"What witness?" said Mrs. Morton, fretfully. "You don't mean to come over us with the old story of the marriage?"

"Shall your wife slander your own sister, sir? A marriage there was—God yet will proclaim the right—and the name of Beaufort shall be yet placed on my mother's gravestone. Come?"

"Here are your shoes and umbrella, pa," cried Miss Margaret, inspired by Philip's earnestness.

"My fair cousin, I guess;" and, as the soldier took her hand, he kissed the reluctant cheek, turned to the door, Mr. Morton placed his arm in his, and the next moment they were in the street.

When Catharine, in her meek tones, had said, "Philip Beaufort was my husband," Roger Morton had disbelieved her. And now one word from the son, who could, in comparison, know so little of the matter, had almost sufficed to convert and to convince the skeptic. Why was this? Because—Man believes the Strong!

CHAPTER II.

"Quid Virtus et quid Sapientia pos-sit Utile proposuit nobis exemplar Ulysses."—HOR.

Meanwhile, the object of their search, on quitting Mr. Morton's shop, had walked slowly and sadly on, through the plashing streets, till he came to a public house in the outskirts and on the high road to London. Here he took shelter for a short time, drying himself by the kitchen fire, with the license purchased by four-penny-worth of gin; and having learned that the next coach to London would not pass for some hours, he finally settled himself in the ingle till the guard's horn should arouse him. By the same coach that the night before had conveyed Philip to N—, had the very man he sought been also a passenger!

The poor fellow was sickly and wearied out: he had settled into a doze, when he was suddenly awakened by the wheels of a coach and the trampling of horses. Not knowing how long he had slept, and imagining that the vehicle he had awaited was at the door, he ran out. It was a coach coming from London, and the driver was joking with a pretty barmaid, who, in rather short petticoats, was holding up to him the customary glass. The man, after satisfying himself that his time was not yet come, was turning back to the fire, when a head popped itself out of the window, and a voice cried, "Stars and garters! Will, so that's you!" At the sound of the voice the man halted abruptly, turned very pale, and his limbs trembled. The inside passenger opened the door, jumped out with a little carpet-bag in his hand, took forth a long leathern purse, from which he ostentatiously selected the coins that paid his fare and satisfied the coachman, and then, passing his arm through that of the acquaintance he had discovered, led him back into the house.

"Will, Will," he whispered, "you have been to the Mortons. Never mind, let's hear all. Jenny, or Dolly, or whatever your sweet pretty name is, a private room and a pint of brandy, my dear. Hot water, and lots of the grocery. That's right."

And, as soon as the pair found themselves, with the brandy before them, in a small parlour with a good fire, the last comer went to the door, shut it cautiously, flung his bag under the table, took off his gloves, spread himself wider and wider before the fire, until he had entirely excluded every ray from his friend, and then, suddenly turning, so that the back might enjoy what the front had gained, he exclaimed,

"Damme, Will, you're a pretty sort of a broother to give me the slip in that way. But, in this world, every man for his-self!"

"I tell you," said William, with something like decision in his voice, "that I will not do any wrong to these young men if they live."

"Who asks you to do a wrong to them, booby? Perhaps I may be the best friend they may have yet—ay, or you too, though you're the ungratefulest, whimsicallest sort of a son of a gun that ever I came across. Come, help yourself, and don't roll up your eyes in that way, like a Muggletonian aside of a Fy-Fy!"

Here the speaker paused a moment, and then, with a graver and more natural tone of voice, proceeded,

"So you did not believe me when I told you that these brothers were dead, and you have been to the Mortons to learn more?"

"Yes."

"Well, and what have you learned?"

"Nothing. Morton declares that he does not know that they are alive, but he says also that he does not know that they are dead."

"Indeed!" said the other, listening with great attention; "and you really think that he does not know anything about them?"

"I do, indeed."

"Hum! Is he a sort of man who would post down the rhino to help the search?"

"He looked as if he had the yellow fever when I said I was poor," returned William, turning round, and trying to catch a glimpse of the fire as he gulped his brandy and water.

"Then I'll be d—d if I run the risk of calling. I have done some things in this town by way of business before now; and, though it's a long time ago, yet folks don't forget a handsome man in a hurry, especially if he has done 'em! Now, then, listen to me. You see, I have given this matter all the 'tention in my power. If the lads be dead, said I to you, it is no use burning one's fingers by holding a candle to bones in a coffin. But Mr. Beaufort need not know they are dead, and we'll see what we can get out of him; and if I succeeds, as I think I shall, you and I may hold up our heads for the rest of our life. Accordingly, as I told you, I went to Mr. Beaufort, and—Gad, I thought we had it all our own way. But, since I saw you last, there's been the devil and all. When I called again, Will, I was shown in to an old lord, sharp as a gimlet. Hang me, William, if he did not frighten me out of my seven senses!"

Here Captain Smith (the reader has, no doubt, already discovered that the speaker was no less a personage) took three or four nervous strides across the room, returned to the table, threw himself on a chair, placed one foot on one hob and one on the other, laid his finger on his nose, and, with a significant wink, said in a whisper, "Will, he knew I had been lagged. He not only refused to hear all I had to say, but threatened to prosecute, persecute, hang, draw, and quarter us both if we ever dared to come out with the truth."

"But what's the good of the truth if the boys are dead?" said William, timidly.

The captain, without heeding this question, continued, as he stirred the sugar in his glass, "Well, out I sneaked, and, as soon as I had got to my own door, I turned round, and saw Sharp the runner on the other side of the way: I felt deused queer. However, I went in, sat down, and began to think. I saw that it was up with us so far as the old uns were concerned; and now it might be worth while to find out if the young uns really were dead."

"Then you did not know that, after all! I thought so. Oh, Jerry!"

"Why, look you, man, it was not our interest to take their side if we could make our bargain out of the other. 'Cause why? You are only a witness: you are a good fellow, but poor, and with very shakey nerves, Will. You does not know what them big wigs are when a man's caged in a witness-box; they flank one up and they flank one down, and they bully and bother, till one's like a horse at Astley's dancing on hot iron. If your testimony broke down, why, it would be all up with the case, and what then would become of us? Besides," added the captain, with dignified candour, "I have been lagged, it's no use denying it; I am back before my time. Inquiries about your respectability would soon bring the bulkies about me. And you would not have poor Jerry sent back to that d—d low place on t'other side of the herring pond, would you?"

"Ah, Jerry?" said William, kindly placing his hand in his brother's, "you know how I helped you to escape. I left all to come over with you."

"So you did, and you're a good fellow; though as to leaving all, why, you had got rid of all first.

And when you told me about the marriage, did not I say that I saw our way to a snug thing for life? But to return to my story. 'There is danger in going with the youngsters. But since, Will—since nothing but hard words is to be got on the other side, we'll do our duty, and I'll find them out, and do the best I can for us—that is, if they be yet above ground. And now I'll own to you that I think I knows that the younger one is alive."

"You do?"

"Yes! But as he won't come in for anything unless his brother is dead, we must have a hunt for the heir. Now I told you that, many years ago, there was a lad with me, who, putting all things together—seeing how the Beauforts came after him, and recollecting different things he let out at the time—I feel pretty sure is your old master's Hopeful. I knew that poor Will Gawtreys gave this lad the address of old Gregg, a friend of mine. So, after watching Sharp off the sly, I went that very night, or, rather, at two in the morning, to Gregg's house, and, after brushing up his memory, I found that the lad had been to him, and gone over afterward to Paris in search of Gawtreys, who was then keeping a matrimony shop. As I was not rich enough to go off to Paris in a pleasant, gentlemanlike way, I allowed Gregg to put me up to a noise, quiet little bit of business. Don't shake your head—all safe—a rural affair! That took some days. You see it has helped to new rig me;" and the captain glanced complacently over a very smart suit of clothes. "Well, on my return, I went to call on you, but you were flown. I half suspected you might have gone to the mother's relations here; and I thought, at all events, I could not do better than go myself, and see what they knew of the matter. From what you say, I feel I had better now let that alone, and go over to Paris at once; leave me alone to find out. And, faith, what with Sharp and the old lord, the sooner I quit England, the better."

"And you really think you shall get hold of them after all? Oh, never fear my nerves if I'm once in the right; it's living with you, and seeing you do wrong, and hearing you talk wickedly, that makes me tremble."

"Bother!" said the captain, "you need not crow over me. Stand up, Will; there, now, look at us two in the glass! Why, I look ten years younger than you do, in spite of all my troubles. I dress like a gentleman, as I am; I have money in my pocket; I put money in yours; without me you'd starve. Look you, you carried over a little fortune to Australia—you married—you farmed—lived honestly—and yet that d—d shilly-shally disposition of yours, 'ticed into one speculation to-day, and scared out of another to-morrow, ruined you!"

"Jerry! Jerry!" cried William, writhing; "don't—don't."

"But it's all true, and I wants to cure you of preaching. And then, when you were nearly run out, instead of putting a bold face on it, and setting your shoulder to the wheel, you gives it up—you sells what you have—you bolts over, wife and all, to Boston, because some one tells you you can do better in America—you are out of the way when a search is made for you—years ago, when you could have benefited yourself and your master's family without any danger to you or me, nobody can find you; 'cause why, you could not bear that your old friends in England, or in the colony either, should know that you were turned a slave-driver in Kentucky. You kick up a mutiny among the niggers by moaning over them instead of keeping 'em to it—you get kicked out yourself—you wife begs you to go back to Australia, where her relations will do something for you—you work your passage out, looking as ragged as a colt from grass—wife's uncle don't like ragged nephews-in-law—wife dies broken-hearted—and you might be breaking stones on the road with the convicts, if I, myself a convict, had not taken compassion on you. Don't cry, Will, it is all for your own good: I hates cant! Whereas I, my own master from eighteen, never stooped to serve any other—have dressed like a gentleman—kissed the pretty girls—drove my pheasant—been in all the papers as 'the celebrated Dashing Jerry'—never wanted a guinea in my pocket—and, even when lagged at last, had a pretty little sum in the colonial bank to lighten my misfortunes. I escape—I bring you over—and here I am, supporting you, and, in all probability, the only one on whom depends the fate of one of the first families in the country. And you preaches at me, do you? Look you, Will, in this world honesty's nothing without force of character! And so your health!"

Here the captain emptied the rest of the brandy into his glass, drained it at a draught, and, while poor William was wiping his eyes with a ragged blue pocket-handkerchief, rang the bell, and asked what coaches would pass on the way to—, a seaport town at some distance. On hearing that there was one at six o'clock, the captain ordered the best dinner the larder would afford to be got ready as soon as possible; and, when they were again alone, thus accosted his brother:

"Now you go back to town: here are four shiners for you. Keep quiet—don't speak to a soul—don't put your foot in it, that's all I beg, and I'll find out whatever there is to be found. It is damnably out of my way embarking at—, but I had best keep clear of Lunnon. And I tell you what, if these youngsters have hopped the twig, there's another bird on the bough that may prove a goldfinch after all: young Arthur Beaufort. I hear he is a wild, expensive chap, and one who can't live without lots of money. Now it's easy to frighten a man of that sort, and I sha'n't have the old lord at his elbow."

"But I tell you that I only care for my poor master's children."

"Yes; but if they are dead, and, by saying they are alive, one can make old age comfortable, there's no harm in it, eh?"

"I don't know," said William, irresolutely. "But certainly it is a hard thing to be so poor at my time of life; and so honest and painstaking as I've been, too!"

And there was a touch of envy in the glance that the helpless Honesty cast on the careless face and sturdy form of the strong-willed Knavery.

CHAPTER III.

"Mitis. This Macilente, signior, begins to be more sociable on a sudden.—Every Man out of his Humour.

"Pant. Signior, you are sufficiently instructed.
Fal. Who? I, sir?"—Ibid.

After spending the greater part of the day in vain inquiries and a vain search, Philip and Morton returned to the house of the latter.

"And now," said Philip, "all that remains to be done is this: first, give to the police of the town a detailed description of the man; and, secondly, let us put an advertisement both in the county journal and in some of the London papers, to the effect, that if the person who called on you will take the trouble to apply again, either personally or by letter, he may obtain the information sought for. In case he does, I will trouble you to direct to—yes—to Monsieur de Vaudemont, according to this address."

"Not to you, then?"

"It is the same thing," replied Philip, drily. "You have confirmed my suspicions that the Beauforts know something of my brother. What did you say of some other friend of the family who assisted in the search?"

"Oh—a Mr. Spencer! an old acquaintance of your mother's. Here Morton smiled; but, not being encouraged in a joke, went on, "However, that's neither here nor there; he certainly never found out your brother; for I have had several letters from him at different times, asking if any news had been heard of either of you."

And, indeed, Spencer had taken particular pains to deceive the Mortons, whose interposition he feared little less than that of the Beauforts.

"Then it can be of no use to apply to him," said Philip, carelessly, not having any recollection of the name of Spencer, and therefore, attaching little importance to the mention of him.

"Certainly I should think not. Depend on it, Mr. Beaufort must know."

"True," said Philip. "And I have only to thank you for your kindness, and return to town."

"But stay with us this day—do—let me feel that we are friends. I assure you that poor Sidney's fate has been a load on my mind ever since he left. You shall have the bed he slept in, and over which your mother bent when she left him and me for the last time."

These words were said with so much feeling, that the adventurer wrung his uncle's hand, and said, "Forgive me—I wronged you—I will be your guest."

Mrs. Morton, strange to say, evinced no symptoms of ill-humour at the news of the proffered hospitality. In fact, Miss Margaret had been so eloquent in Philip's praise during his absence, that she suffered herself to be favourably impressed. Her daughter, indeed, had obtained a sort of ascendancy over Mrs. M. and the whole house ever since she had received so respectable an offer. And, moreover, some people are like dogs: they snarl on the ragged, and fawn on the well-dressed. Mrs. Morton did not object to a nephew de facto; she only objected to a nephew in forma pauperis. The evening, therefore, passed more cheerfully than might have been anticipated, though Philip found some difficulty in parrying the many questions put to him on the past. He contented himself with saying, as briefly as possible, that he had served in a foreign service, and acquired what sufficed him for an independence; and then, with the ease which a man picks up in the great world, turned the conversation to the prospects of the family whose guest he was. Having listened with due attention to Mrs. Morton's eulogies on Tom, who had been sent for, and who drank the praises on his own gentility into a very large pair of blushing ears—also, to her self-felicitations on Miss Margaret's marriage; item, on the service rendered to the town by Mr. Roger, who had repaired the town-hall in his first mayoralty at his own expense; item, to a long chronicle of her own genealogy: how she had one cousin a clergyman, and how her great-grandfather had been knighted; item, to the domestic virtues of all her children; item, to a confused explanation of the chastisement inflicted on Sidney, which Philip cut short in the middle—he asked, with a smile, what had become of the Plaskwiths. "Oh!" said Mrs. Morton, "my brother Kit has retired from business. His son-in-law, Mr. Plimmins, has succeeded."

"Oh, then Plimmins married one of the young ladies?"

"Yes, Jane: she had a sad squint?—Tom, there is nothing to laugh at! we are all as God made us; 'Handsome is as handsome does.' She has had three little uns!"

"Do they squint too?" asked Philip; and Miss Margaret giggled, and Tom roared, and the other young men roared too. Philip had certainly said something very witty.

This time Mrs. Morton administered no reproof, but replied, pensively,

"Natur is vere mysterious: they all squint!"

Mr. Morton conducted Philip to his chamber. There it was, fresh, clean, unaltered; the same white curtains, the same honeysuckle paper, as when Catharine had crept across the threshold.

"Did Sidney ever tell you that his mother placed a ring round his neck that night?" asked Mr. Morton.

"Yes; and the dear boy wept when he said that he had slept too soundly to know that she was by his side that last, last time. 'The ring—oh, how well I remember it!—she never put it off till then; and often in the fields—for we were wild wanderers together in that day—often, when his head lay on my shoulder, I felt that ring still resting on his heart, and fancied it was a talisman—a blessing. Well, well—good night to you!' And he shut the door on his uncle, and was alone."

CHAPTER IV.

"The man of law
And a great suit is like to be between them."
BEN JOHNSON: Staple of News.

On arriving in London, Philip went first to the lodging he still kept there, and to which his letters were directed; and, among some communications from Paris, full of the politics and the hopes of the Carlists, he found the following note from Lord Lilburne.

"Dear Sir,—When I met you the other day, I told you I had been threatened with the gout. The enemy has now taken possession of the field. I am sentenced to regimen and the sofa. But as it is my rule in life to make afflictions as light as possible, so I have asked a few friends to take compassion on me, and help me 'to shuffle off this mortal coil,' by dealing me, if they can, four by honours. Any time between nine and twelve to-night, or to-morrow night, you will find me at home; and if you are not better engaged, suppose you dine with me to-day—or, rather, dine opposite to me—and excuse my Spartan broth. You will meet (besides any two or three friends whom an impromptu invitation may find disengaged) my sister, with Beaufort and their daughter; they only arrived in town this morning, and are kind enough 'to nurse me,' as they call it; that is to say, their cook is taken ill!"
Yours, LILBURNE.

"Park Lane, Sept. —"

"The Beauforts! Fate favours me—I will go. The date is for to-day."

He sent off a hasty line to accept the invitation, and, finding he had a few hours yet to spare, he resolved to employ them in consultation with some lawyer as to the chances of regaining his inheritance—a hope which, however wild, he had, since his return to his native shore, and especially since he had heard of the strange visit made to Roger Morton, permitted himself to indulge. With this idea he sallied out, meaning to consult Liancourt, who, having a large acquaintance among the English, seemed the best person to advise him as to the choice of a lawyer at once active and honest, when he suddenly chanced on that gentleman himself.

"This is lucky, my dear Liancourt. I was just going to your lodgings."

"And I was coming to yours, to know if you dine with Lord Lilburne. He told me he had asked you. I have just left him. And by the sofa of Mephistopheles there was the prettiest Margaret you ever beheld."

"Indeed! Who?"

"He called her his niece; but I should doubt if he had any relation on this side the Styx so human as a niece."

"You seem to have no great predilection for our host."

"My dear Vaudemont, between our blunt, soldierly natures, and those wily, icy, sneering intellects, there is the antipathy of the dog to the cat."

"Perhaps so on our side, not on his; or why does he invite us?"

"London is empty: there is no one else to ask. We are new faces, new minds to him. We amuse him more than the hackneyed comrades he has worn out. Besides, he plays—and you too. Fly on you!"

"Liancourt, I had two objects in knowing that man, and I pay the toll for the bridge. When I cease to want the passage I shall cease to pay the toll."

"But the bridge may be a drawbridge, and the moat is devilish deep below. Without metaphor, that man may ruin you before you know where you are."

"Bah! I have my eyes open. I know how much to spend on the rogue whose service I hire as a lackey's, and I know also where to stop. Liancourt," he added, after a short pause, and in a tone deep with suppressed passion, "when I first saw that man, I thought of appealing to his heart for one who has a claim on it. That was a vain hope. And then there came upon me a sterner and deadlier thought: the scheme of the Avenger! This Lilburne—this rogue, whom the world sets up to worship—ruined, body and soul, ruined—one whose name the world gibbets with its scorn! Well; I thought to avenge that man. In his own house, amid ye all, I thought to detect the sharper and brand the cheat!"

"You startle me! It has been whispered, indeed, that Lord Lilburne is dangerous—but skill is dangerous. To cheat!—an English gentleman! a nobleman!—impossible!"

"Whether he do or not," returned Vaudemont, in a calmer tone, "I have foregone the vengeance, because he is—"

"Is what?"

"No matter," said Vaudemont, aloud, while he added to himself, "Because he is the grandfather of Fanny!"

"You are very enigmatical to-day."

"Patience, Liancourt; I may solve all the riddles that make up my life yet. Bear with me a little longer. And now can you help me to a lawyer? a man experienced, indeed, and of repute, but young, active, not overlaid with business; I want his zeal and his time, for a hazard that your monopolists of clients may not deem worth their devotion."

"I can recommend you, then, the very man you require. I had a suit some years ago at Paris, for which English witnesses were necessary. My avocat employed a solicitor here, whose activity in collecting my evidence gained my cause. I will answer for his diligence and his honesty."

"His address?"

"Mr. Barlow—somewhere by the Strand—let me see—Essex—yes, Essex-street."

"Then good-bye to you for the present. You dine at Lord Lilburne's too?"

"Yes. Adieu till then."

Vaudemont was not long before he arrived at Mr. Barlow's: a brass plate announced to him the house. He was shown at once into a parlour, where he saw a man whom lawyers would call young, and spinsters middle-aged, viz., about two-and-forty; with a bold, resolute, intelligent countenance, and that steady, calm, sagacious eye which inspires at once confidence and esteem.

Vaudemont scanned him with the look of one who has been accustomed to judge mankind, as a scholar does books, with rapidity because with practice. He had at first resolved to submit to him the heads of his case without mentioning names, and, in fact, he so commenced his narrative: but, by degrees, as he perceived how much his own earnestness arrested and engrossed the interest of his listener, he warmed into fuller confidence, and ended by a full disclosure, and a caution as to the profoundest secrecy, in case, if there were no hope to recover his rightful name, he might yet wish to retain, unannoyed by curiosity or suspicion, that by which he was not discreditably known.

"Sir," said Mr. Barlow, after assuring him of the most scrupulous discretion, "sir, I have some recollection of the trial instituted by your mother, Mrs. Beaufort;" and the slight emphasis he laid on that name was the most grateful compliment he could have paid to the truth of Philip's recital. "My impression is, that it was managed in a very slovenly manner by her lawyer, and some of his oversights we may repair in a suit instituted by yourself. But it would be absurd to conceal from you the great difficulties that beset us; your mother's suit, designed to establish her own rights, was far easier than that which you must commence, viz., an action for ejectment against a man who has been some years in undisturbed possession. Of course, until the missing witness is found out, it would be madness to commence litigation. And the question then will be, how far that witness will suffice? It is true, that one witness of a marriage, if the others are dead, is held sufficient by law. But I need not add that that witness must be thoroughly credible. In suits for real property, very little documentary or secondary evidence is admitted. I doubt even whether the certificate of the marriage on which—in the loss or destruction of the register—you lay so much stress, would be available in itself. But if an examined copy, it becomes of the last importance, for it will then inform us of the name of the person who extracted and examined it. Heaven grant it may not have been the clergyman himself who performed the ceremony, and who, you say, is dead; if some one else, we should then have a second no doubt credible and most valuable witness. The document would thus become available as proof, and I think that we should not fail to establish our case."

"But this certificate, how is it ever to be found? I told you that we had searched every where in vain."

"True; but you say that your mother always said that the late Mr. Beaufort had so solemnly assured her, even just prior to his decease, that it was in existence, that I have no doubt as to the fact. It may be possible, but it is a terrible insinuation to make, that if Mr. Robert Beaufort, in examining the papers of the deceased, chanced upon a document so important to him, he abstracted or destroyed it. But to return. If this should not have been the case (and Mr. Robert Beaufort's moral character is unspotted—and we have no right to suppose it,) the probability is, either that it was entrusted to some third person, or placed in some hidden drawer or deposite, the secret of which your father never disclosed. Who has purchased the house you lived in?"

"Fernside? Lord Lilburne, Mrs. Robert Beaufort's brother."

"Humph! probably, then, he took the furniture and all. Sir, this is a matter that requires some time for close consideration. With your leave, I will not only insert in the London papers an advertisement to the effect that you suggested to Mr. Roger Morton (in case you should have made a right conjecture as to the object of the man who applied to him,) but I will also advertise for the witness himself. William Smith you say his name is. Did the lawyer employed by Mrs. Beaufort send to inquire for him in the colony?"

"No; I fear there could not have been time for that. My mother was so anxious and eager, and so convinced of the justice of her case—"

"That's a pity; her lawyer must have been a sad driveller."

"Besides, now I remember, inquiry was made of his relations in England. His father, a farmer, was then alive; the answer was that he had certainly left Australia. His last letter, written two years before that date, which had contained a request for money, which the father, himself made a bankrupt by reverses, could not give, had stated that he was about to seek his fortune elsewhere; since then they had heard nothing of him."

"Ahem! Well, you will perhaps let me know where any relations of his are yet to be found, and I will look up the former suit, and go into the whole case without delay. In the mean time, you do right, sir—if you will allow me to say it—not to disclose either your own identity or a hint of your intentions. It is no use putting suspicion on its guard. And my search for this certificate must be managed with the greatest address. But, by the way, speaking of identity, there can be no difficulty, I hope, in proving yours?"

Philip was startled. "Why, I am greatly altered."

"But probably your beard and mustache may contribute to that change; and, doubtless, in the village where you lived, there would be many with whom you were in sufficient intercourse, and on whose recollection, by recalling little anecdotes and circumstances with which no one but yourself could be acquainted, your features would force themselves along with the moral conviction that the man who spoke to them could be no other but Philip Morton—or, rather, Beaufort."

"You are right; there must be many such. There was not a cottage in the place where I and my dogs were not familiar and half domesticated."

"All's right so far, then. But, I repeat, we must not be too sanguine. Law is not justice—"

"But God is," said Philip; and he left the room.

CHAPTER V.

"Folpout. A little in a mist, but not dejected; Never—but still myself."

Ben Jonson: Folpout.

"P. egrine. Am I enough disguised?"

M. Ay, I warrant you.

P. Have you, fair lady.—Ibid.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. The ill wind that had blown gout to Lord Lilburne had blown Lord Lilburne away from the injury he had meditated against what he called "the object of his attachment." How completely and entirely, indeed, the state of Lord Lilburne's feelings depended on the state of his health, may be seen in the answer he gave to his valet, when, the morning after his first attack of the gout, that worthy person, by way of cheering his master, proposed to ascertain something as to the movements of one with whom Lord Lilburne professed to be so violently in love; "Confound you, Dykeman!" exclaimed the invalid, "why do you trouble me about women when I'm in this condition? I don't care if they were all at the bottom of the sea! Reach me the colic-cum; I must keep my mind calm."

Whenever tolerably well, Lord Lilburne was careless of his health; the moment he was ill, Lord Lilburne paid himself the greatest possible attention. Though a man of firm nerves, in youth of remarkable daring, and still, though no longer rash, of sufficient personal courage, he was by no means fond of the thought of death—that is, of his own death. Not that he was tormented by any religious apprehensions of the Dread Unknown, but simply because the only life of which he had any experience seemed to him a peculiarly pleasant thing. He had a sort of instinctive persuasion that John Lord Lilburne would not be better off anywhere else. Always disliking solitude, he disliked it more than ever when he was ill, and he therefore welcomed the visit of his sister and the gentle hand of his pretty niece. As for Beaufort, he bored the sufferer; and when that gentleman on his arrival, shutting out his wife and daughter, whispered to Lilburne, "Any more news of that impostor?" Lilburne answered peevishly, "I never talk about business when I have the gout! I have set Sharp to keep a look-out for him, but he has learned nothing as yet: and now go to your club. You are a worthy creature, but too solemn for my spirits just at this moment. I have a few people coming to dine with me; your wife will do the honours, and—you can come in the evening."

Though Mr. Robert Beaufort's sense of importance swelled and chafed at this very unceremonious congé, he forced a smile and said,

"Well, it is no wonder you are a little fretful with the gout. I have plenty to do in town, and Mrs. Beaufort and Camilla can come back without waiting for me."

"Why, as your cook is ill, and they can't dine at a club, you may as well leave them here till I am a little better; not that I care, for I can hire a better nurse than either of them."

"My dear Lilburne, don't talk of hiring nurses; certainly I am too happy if they can be of comfort to you."

turtle and venison. After turning over in his mind the space to be measured between a dry crust and three courses and a dessert; after examining with a most curious eye the turnpike roads which lead to the temple of Fortune, such as industry, talent, and so forth, Jonathan decided upon attempting the by-path of Plausibility; and as coachmen diminish the steepness of a hill by a zigzag course, began to insinuate himself up the steep ascent by a serpentine career, bowing and smiling on either side, as the sinuosities of his pathway seemed to justify. Jonathan was mild in his demeanour; gentle, patient, unpretending. Although he preached, when preaching was the order of the day, his homilies were couched in Chesterfieldian phrase.

He never mentioned hell to ears polite, but persuaded the good that they had regenerated him; the bad, that they had corrupted; and both, that it was their business to take care of their own. He became confidential man to every body having confidence; that is money, to dispose of: and with the money of the few soon commanded the respect of the many. Jonathan has now a mansion in Portland-place, a villa at Tottenham, and more turtle and venison than he can devour. He has acted as churchwarden, he has officiated as sheriff—he might be in parliament if he chose—but according to the argument of the Danish sailors, who would not send Hamlet into England because “all the men there were as mad as he,” Jonathan Wilson shirks an assemblage so eminently remarkable for its plausibility.

Has not this man speculated cunningly upon the gullibility of the world? Yet, Jonathan Wilson is a drop in the ocean of Plausible People.

KENSALL GREEN.

We may become too familiar with the charnel-house and its contents; and too much familiarity, says the proverb, breeds contempt. A want of respect for the dead is apt to induce a want of reverence for death; and the grim King of Terrors himself, when men's feet are kicking about his trophies, stands in danger of becoming a mere subject for idle gossip, or coarse and ribald jesting. This is not as it should be; yet this, as it seems to me, the confined and crammed burial grounds, which one sees in many parts of London, must inevitably, in some degree, tend to produce.

I strolled the other morning, having nothing better to do, to the new General Cemetery at Kensall Green; I believe the first of the dozen or more, which, after its example, have started into existence in the suburban districts. These cemeteries stand in much the same relation to the London churchyards and burial-grounds, as the Canadas, or New Zealand, to the mother country. They are the points of emigration for the dead; and, as such, they contribute in some degree towards correcting the evil of an over crowded city graveyard. They do something; but they cannot, nor indeed do I see clearly what can, do all. The very poor, who swarm and cluster together so densely in many quarters of the metropolis, can neither carry out their dead so far, nor pay the fees demanded for admission to these more undisturbed resting places. They must still go on in the old way, and lie huddled together in death as closely as they have been wont to do in life. But to return to Kensall Green.

It is a wholesome thing to pay a visit to such a place as this. We are too apt to pass mere ordinary churchyards, poor portions and fragments of the spoils of Death, without being awakened to a due sense of his power, and experiencing only a sort of mournful secure pity, as though the few who slumber beneath its surface form the exception and not the rule. But here, where the eye cannot at one glance take in the whole extent of his territories, we recognise at once the full sweep of his tremendous arm: here we are compelled to acknowledge that beneath that arm we ourselves must bow: and “peep about” us, as it were involuntarily, for some unoccupied nook, in whose shade, when the hour has actually arrived, we may moulder to our primal dust.

It is a fine, large, open space, this cemetery, with its smooth shaven turf, its broad graveled walks sloping gently upwards to the west, and, on the brow of the ascent, its small simple chapel, silent to all the services of our church save one—the most solemn and the most beautiful—most sorrowful and yet most cheering. As a whole, however, the place at present lacks solemnity. It wants more of those trees which universal and immemorial usage has appropriated to such melancholy localities—the fir, and the yew, and the “sad cypress;” and those which it already possesses require yet a few years to bring them to maturity. The long lines of white tombstones, on either side of the boundary path, stand sadly in need of relief.

Among the multitude of monuments which have already been erected here, there are, of course, designs of all sorts, good, bad, and indifferent—the latter forming a considerable majority. Turning into the right hand path as you enter the consecrated portion of the ground, there stands a neat obelisk to the memory of Scipio Ciliat, inscribed simply with a cross, the name and a date. I think it is Byron who somewhere, in one of his letters or journals, says that a name and a date are all that are required above one's grave. Whoever it was, I fully agree with him. A bad or a mediocre epitaph is sufficient to mar the effect of the noblest tomb. One seldom meets with a decent inscription, even in prose; and as for the attempts of the kind in metre, they are enough to drive all Parnassus crazy. Our very jest-books are full of ridiculous effusions of this nature. A traveller, condemned, by some “accident of flood or field,” to tarry for an afternoon in a remote country village, strolls into the churchyard to read the epitaphs, with the same confident anticipation of amusement that he would feel in opening an album of H. B.'s caricatures, or the third series of Sam Slick, did the humble parlour table of the hostelry present such an unlooked for resource. But there is a large class of well-meaning people, who seem to think a gravestone without an epitaph a mere wilful waste of so much good stone; and that with one, or rather by one, the claims of the departed to the consideration of the public are mightily strengthened—that a plain tombstone is considerably more respectable than a simple raised turf—but that a tombstone, with an epitaph to boot, is positively and indisputably genteel. Therefore it is that, as observes the cosmopolite Lieou Chi Altangi, “when the person is buried, the next care is to make his epitaph.” Somewhere or other one must be discovered, and the surviving poets of the family set to work with all their might to supply the desideratum, much to their own satisfaction, and still more to the public amusement. The very stonemason's journeyman, as he chisels the doggerel, must laugh at its absurdity.

Perhaps I am over fastidious—but many of the tombs here are too pretty to please my taste. I like to see a grave kept with neatness and simplicity; the turf cannot be too green, the weeds cannot be too carefully removed; but, were I constituted censor of such matters, I am inclined to think I should publish an edict against anything beyond. There are several graves here which are positive garden plots, with the mould carefully raked and watered, and little painted wooden or iron trellis-work running round the edges, paling in roses, and violets, and hearts-ease, and fifty other small flowers, which have in them no touch of sadness. One would fancy that the surviving relatives really did come there, as somebody has in a most Juvenal-like line expressed it, to “botanise upon their mother's grave.” This is adopting the affectation, as well as the utility, of the foreign cemetery system. Were it not for the sake of the burial service, these floricultural mourners might as well have buried their dead in their own summer-bowers, or in the borders beneath their own parlour windows. But these are not the only specimens of amateur grave-making, if I may so call it, to be found here. There is one thing—for monument it is not—composed of literally nothing but wire trellis-work, and in shape and structure for all the world like a huge and extremely elaborate bird-cage; or still more, perhaps, like one of those magnificent barley-sugar pavilions, which stand in pastrycooks' shop windows to make the eyes and mouths of little boys and girls of all descriptions stare, and gape, and water, for wonderment. The good, honest, solid gravestones round about ought to rise en masse, and vent their indignation at such a pitiful piece of nimity-pimityism, by throwing themselves flat upon it, and crushing it to atoms. Happily for the reputation of the inventor, it bears no name or syllable of any kind by which he may be even guessed at.

The “westend” of this Necropolis is, as an Irishman would say, in the middle, where the tombs stand more dispersedly among the evergreens than in the other parts of the ground, and present, therefore, a far more picturesque appearance to the eye. Among these are two or three handsome coroneted monuments, besides several covering the remains of officers of rank, and various well known public characters. I believe many of the aristocracy lie in the catacombs below, but I did not descend into these. Vis-a-vis to the monument of St. John Long, stands the family tomb of no less a personage than Andrew Ducrow, of amphitheatrical notoriety—to my thinking a structure in very vile taste; but, while I was contemplating it, there came up a couple of rather dingy individuals, presenting the appearance of journeymen tailors out for a holyday, the one of whom remarked to the other, as he passed, “Well! I'm blessed if this ain't the best tomb here, after all;” and, as his companion replied by an acquiescent grunt, my opinion on the matter must not be implicitly relied on. It is a square massive piece of workmanship, garnished with a begging dog, in bronze, on either side the entrance, with Egyptian columns, sphinxes, urns, and flower-pots, all of the same hue; and some angels with wreaths, and some horses with wings in relief; the last mentioned animals being (the wings always excepted) the only ornament for which I could perceive any reason. The only present occupant of the interior is the late Mrs. Ducrow, whose worth is commemorated in an ungrammatical and particularly ill-written inscription. For the “horse-taming Andrew” himself, long may it be ere the ring at Astley's knows him no more; for most assuredly, till the end of time, “Within that circle none shall ride as he”

There is a tomb, not far removed from this, which few will pass without a sigh. It bears no laboured eulogy; but, to the great majority of those whose sorrows and sympathies are worth the waking, it tells an ample tale. Its simple inscription is—

ANNE SCOTT,
Daughter of Sir Walter Scott, of Abbotsford, Baronet,
Died June the 25th, 1833,
In her 31st year.

Somewhere here, too, stands, above the grave of one untimely cut off, a handsome broken column, (of which, by the way, there are several in the cemetery,) but it wastes its poetry sadly. I heard a respectable looking man and woman gravely deploring its maimed condition, and innocently speculating whether the misfortune arose from mischief or high winds.

It is by no means the least striking feature of this cemetery, that it is closely neighboured on either side by one of those gigantic achievements of modern science—a railway. Singular enough it is, to stand on the terrace of the little chapel, and contrast an approaching funeral procession—the steps of the mourners heavy and slow—the laboured progress of the plumed hearse, with the momentary meteor-like glimpses of a passing train; the oppressive stillness and silence of death, with the noise, and the hurry, and the whirl of life! and to think that the most impatient traveller of all those who shot by not a moment ago must ere long be content to journey at the snail-like pace of the melancholy pageant before us. If the Kensall Green cemetery sends us home pondering well on these things, it will have preached a homily on mortality beyond the pulpit—a homily, moreover, of which we happily cannot lose the spirit, by setting ourselves to work after the most approved modern fashion to criticise the language.—Blackwood.

THE REVELS OF THE INNS OF COURT.

The Revels or solemn dances which used formerly to take place at the Inns of Court, are a very perplexing subject of speculation. That the grave ministers and professors of the law should have conceived it to be consistent with their dignity to exhibit their persons in the mazes of a dance, seems altogether inexplicable. Let us just suppose that, under "The Mirror of Fashion," in the Morning Chronicle, we read the following paragraph:—"Yesterday, being the Feast of St. Erkenwald, the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple gave their usual entertainment. After dinner the Solemn Revels commenced, by the Lord Chancellor walking a minuet with Mr. Justice Gaselee, as the youngest Judge. A quadrille succeeded, in which the Judges of the King's Bench and Common Pleas were to have taken part, but, as Lord Chief Justice Best was severely afflicted with the gout, and as Mr. Justice Littledale was not yet perfect in the figure of the dance, their places were supplied from amongst the King's Counsel, Mr. Marryat and Mr. Hart being selected for that purpose. 'The Lancers' succeeded; the Justices of the C. P. (with the exception of the C. J.) and the Barons of the Exchequer making up the set. We were sorry to observe that Mr. Baron Graham seemed fatigued with the exertion. Some waltzing now took place, the couples being led by Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor. The grace and vigour displayed by Sir Charles Wetherell in this dance excited universal admiration. The Chancellor observed that he had seen nothing like it since Dunning's time. The Sergeants next advanced and danced several Scotch reels. Mr. Sergeant Vaughan distinguished himself particularly. The Solemn Revels being concluded, a gentleman of the Outer Bar (Mr. Charles Philips) was called upon for a song. He gave the favourite Air 'Oh I am the Boy for bewitching them,' with great effect. The Judges and Benchers being now seated, the Post Revels commenced with a country dance in which all the utter Barristers took part. Mr. Rose of the Chancery Bar observed that learned gentlemen seemed particularly expert at one part of the figure—change sides and back again. The whole concluded with a Pas de deux between the Vice Chancellor and Lord Stowell."

The professors of Divinity and Medicine do not appear to have indulged at any period in these salutary recreations. The solemnity of the College of Physicians was never disturbed by a Coranto. It is possible that the practice may have crept into our Inns of Court from the circumstance of their being formerly a sort of University for the education of our young nobility, with whom the art of dancing was an essential accomplishment. Fortescue tells us that in the Inns of Court the Students were taught.

LINES

On Scott's Mental Decay, (written July, 1832.)

BY MRS. CRAWFORD.

Oh, this dire eclipse, of a glorious sun,
Making both heaven and earth in darkness one;
This total blindness from excess of light,
This utter feebleness from mental might.
Dear bard! our sorrow now, so late our pride,
To highest genius, highest worth allied;
The Christian poet, and the Attic sage,
The mentor, patriot, wonder of the age,
Like a proud monarch driven from his land,
The golden sceptre wrested from his hand;
Changing his Tyrian robes and jewell'd crown,
For the base weeds of some unseemly clown;
And all his own sad act, that tax'd too high
The proud prerogative of sovereignty;
Till reason rose rebellious at the wrong,
And careless nature ruled the kingly throng.
O, what a lesson for the gifted mind
In his deep darkness, what a light we find,
To beacon others, that might haply stray
Beyond the bounds of man's appointed way.

Behold our mental Danite! shorn at length
Of those bright locks, his beauty and his strength,
Of which each separate hair were fit to string
Apollo's lyre, to strains that angels sing.
That mine-like mind, too prodigal, is now
A captive debtor for that wreathed brow;
That shows like garland on some trophied tomb,
Mocking the dead cold dust with living bloom.
O God! the giver of all gifts that be,
That givest reason's light to lead to Thee;
Look down in mercy on this son of wo!
Oh! shrine his tears in thine eternal bow,
That brilliant covenant that hangs above,
Cradling the rays of thy returning love.
Save him, dear Lord! whom none beside can save,
Lift up his spirit from its living grave;
Open his prison-doors, and set him free,
Whose reason ever led him first to Thee:
And still would lead him, with returning grace,
To sun his soul in thy resplendent face!

All over doth this outer earth
An inner earth infold,
And sounds may reach us of its mirth,
Over its pales of gold.
There, spirits live, unwedded all
From the shades and shapes they wore,
Though still their printless footsteps fall
By the hearths they loved before.
We know them not, nor hear the sound
They make in threading all around:
Their office sweet and mighty prayer
Float without echo through the air.
Yet sometimes in unworldly places,
Soft sorrow's twilight vales,
We meet them with uncovered faces,
Outside their golden pales,
Though dim, as they must ever be,
Like ships far-off and out at sea,
With the sun upon their sails.

W. F. FABER.

SONNET.

On visiting the House at Boulogne on which is inscribed
"Ici est l'Auteur de Gil Blas."

"Ici est mort Le Sage." But what hath died!
I would say, what hath perished! Not Gil Blas!
He lives as heretofore; the ruthless law
Of change affects him not; he will abide
From age to age; all countries are his own.
What, then, hath perished? That corporeal mould,
Which, like a minstrel's harp, grown frail and old,
No longer could respond in wonted tone
Unto the master's touch! But did the mind
That framed the melody, and woke the strings,
Or did the song itself, destruction find
With that old harp? Oh, vain imaginings!
The mind and music live (though cast aside
The broken harp.) Le Sage hath never died!

Fraser's Magazine.

The principal end of reading is to enrich the mind;
the next to improve the pen and tongue. It is much more genteel and suitable, when they shall appear all of a price. Doubtless that is the best work, where the Graces and the Muses meet.—Felltham.

NEW BOOKS.

Tweedie's Library of Medicine.

The Third Volume of this valuable series of medical works, to which we have already referred, is just published by Messrs. Lea and Blanchard. It contains Dissertations on Diseases of the Digestive, Urinary and Uterine Organs, by Doctors W. Bruce Jay, J. A. Symonds, George Budd, William Thomson, Robert Christison, Robert Ferguson, &c.; with Notes by Dr. Gerhard.

To members of the medical profession the value of Dr. Tweedie's Library of Medicine is perfectly well known—a fact which is sufficiently evinced by the numbers of each volume which they purchase; its value is not less obvious to the general reader and to those who desire a convenient book of reference for use in families, on plantations, on ship-board, or in factories or forts where a physician is not always at hand, and a treatise, or rather a library of first rate authority is required for reference. The classification of the Treatises composing Dr. Tweedie's Library is so systematic and convenient that it is equivalent to a Medical Dictionary for instant use; while the completeness of each treatise gives it great advantages over any dictionary or abbreviated compend of theory and practice. Each of the volumes contains a class of treatises on kindred subjects, and is complete in itself, while the whole work, (five 8vo. volumes) will comprise a perfect library of the Theory and Practice of Medicine.

Macauley's Miscellanies.

One is sometimes tempted to wish that he had a spare hundred dollars to lay out in a copy of the Edinburgh Review. But Messrs. Carey & Hart have hit upon a contrivance which will save poor devil authors, critics, &c., the trouble of entertaining any more vain wishes on the subject. They have commenced the publishing of the Miscellaneous Works of all the best writers in the Edinburgh Review—in short, all the articles which gave weight to the opinions of the celebrated journal, and rendered its numbers readable and popular. Mr. Macauley has been for several years the Magnus Apollo of the Review, having succeeded the Rev. Sydney Smith, its former leader, and, in fact, its founder. Messrs. Carey & Hart have just published the "Miscellanies" of Macauley, including all his famous articles which have been the admiration of Europe for the last fifteen years; and they have in press the Works of the Rev. Sydney Smith, which will include all his contributions. The articles contributed by Sir Walter Scott are contained in Carey & Hart's complete edition of that illustrious author's works. They have only to publish the Miscellanies of Sir Francis Jeffrey and two or three more of the contributors, and they will leave the general reader little more to desire in a complete set of the Edinburgh Review.

The other papers of Macauley, included in the three volumes before us, are marked by the same vigorous style, richness of illustration and felicity of allusion which characterise the famous articles on the civil war. The Dialogue between Milton and Cowley would inevitably be identified in any situation as the work of Macauley by these marks.

PAUL DE KOCK.

It is not alone to the external manifestations of life and character that the novelist, the only moralist of the present day, should turn for subjects. He must, in truth, look rather to the development of the world within, and watch his own motives, tendencies, and passions, long, close, and continually, before he can attempt to scrutinise the feelings of others as developed in their conduct. It is not, as is generally supposed, by intuition of other minds, nor even a searching observation of others' conduct down to the very minutiae of their existence, that he can obtain this faculty; his spirit might be a glass reflecting each form perfectly and to the life, yet it would, like that, lose every trace as soon as the original had vanished, if, like that also, it possessed nothing beyond a surface. It is only in the power of sympathy, residing, indeed, more or less in every breast, but cultivated alone by the man of genius, to go far beyond the outward forms and shapes of passing objects. It is by frequent solitude, by constant self-observation, and by ceaseless comparison of the acts of other men with the feelings of his own bosom, that he can hope to attain that facility of searching the human heart and laying bare its workings which has formed the renown in our day of Scott, Dickens, and De Kock; for Cooper, whose genius for the descriptions of nature at least equals the first of these, has nothing of the power even of the last to scan the workings of the secret spirit—and Sue, and Heine, &c. exaggerate them even to mockery.

It is in truth the remarkable characteristic of Paul de Kock that with all his relish for individuality, with all his care to mark the idiosyncracies of his personages, and his unsurpassable felicity in observing and adhering to them throughout the whole conduct of his very numerous tales, often as he wakes by a touch the very sources of the loftiest emotions, he seems never able, or willing, to dwell upon them. Whether this great writer fears that concentration of his powers would operate materially to diminish their variety;—whether he has been, by temperament and love of society, little disposed to meditate severely and long upon his own sensations;—or whether, as Barante observed of Voltaire, what he sees is at a glance, and the faculty of deep careful thought seems denied him,—we cannot assume to decide: but it is certain that whenever roused to a scene of deep and solemn tone, such as could scarcely fail to be effective in any hands, and least of all in those of the contriver, he is content to strike it off with a single stroke of his pencil, disappointing the reader, and depreciating his own powers. His works consequently are not finished pictures, but moving panoramas; but as such pregnant with nature and truth.

The following lively sketch of the popularity of this author is from a work lately published.

"Paul de Kock has enjoyed, and still enjoys, more celebrity than any living writer; that is to say, if the extent of a man's reputation be judged by the number of his readers. From the highest lady in her luxurious boudoir, to the poorest grisette in her miserable attic,—from the lordly paladin in his spacious library, to the obsequious porter in his narrow lodge,—from the statesman who mounts the tribune in the Chamber of Deputies, to the copying clerk in the attorney's office,—from the colonel of the regiment, to the private sentinel in the ranks,—all have perused the novels of this distinguished writer,—all classes have pored over those pages which teem with gaiety and mirth, relieved by the finest touches of pathos and feeling—all have felt the magic charm of this great enchanter! A new novel by Paul de Kock creates a more powerful sensation than the speech of the king himself; and on the day of publication, not a diligence, not a mail, not a public conveyance leaves the French metropolis without bearing to the country librarians of all parts a package of the anxiously-awaited volumes. There is not a circulating library throughout France that does not possess one or more complete sets of his works: there is not a news-room where, amongst the few dozens of standard books which grace the little shelf in the corner, the novels of Paul de Kock are not to be found. His popularity extends to the meanest and most distant cottage in the empire: there exists not a labourer who tills the land in the remotest province, that has not heard of Paul de Kock, and laughed at some village pedant's recital of the best episode in his last work.

"Mount the imperial of the diligence, and the Conducteur will talk to you of Paul de Kock. Converse with the fille du comptoir in a café, and she will ask you to lend her his lately published novel. Hire a cabriolet de place, and the driver will tell you that he has just perused Paul de Kock's new work. Chatter with your porter's wife, when she brings you your newspaper in the morning, and she will call your attention to the critique of Paul de Kock's book in the Feuilleton. Speak to your cook relative to your dinner having been late the day before, and she will throw the blame upon Paul de Kock. Ask your friend why he broke his appointment, and his reply will be the same. In fine, M. Charles Paul de Kock engrosses public attention as much as the prices of the funds, the measures of the ministers, or the war in Spain. He is a Monsieur Tanson whose existence is interminable.

"Nor is his popularity alone confined to France: it extends to every corner of Europe where books are read. In religious—in strict—in domestic communities, are his works devoured with as much enthusiasm as they are by the indolent and luxurious Parisians.

"But let it not be supposed that Paul de Kock can write nothing save humorous tales. His sentiment will frequently wring tears from the eyes. No one can peruse passages of Sœur Anne, Frère Jacques, or La Laitière de Montfermeil, without experiencing the most tender emotions; but no lasting impression is made upon the mind by the scenes which M. de Kock thus envelopes in pathos and melancholy, because the almost immediate occurrence of something excessively ludicrous effaces the reminiscence of the sentimental episode."

A passage from Barbier de Paris.

THE BOASTER.

"The person who now entered Maître Touquet's house was a man of four-and-thirty, but who seemed at least five-and-forty—so wizened was his face, and so hollow his cheeks: his sallow complexion was only relieved by two small scarlet circles upon his cheek-bones, the brilliancy of which betrayed their origin. His eyes were small but rather lively, and Monsieur Chaudoreille kept them constantly rolling about, never fixing them on the person he addressed: his short pug-nose formed a striking contrast with the immensity of his mouth, which was surmounted by an outrageous mustache, red like his hair, while beneath his under lip flourished an imperial, terminating in a point on his chin.

"The Chevalier's stature was barely five feet, and the meagreness of his body was the more apparent from the threadbare close coat which enclosed it. The buttons of his doublet had disappeared in several places, and a variety of botched darns and mendings seemed on the point of breaking out into holes again. On the other hand, his breeches, far too wide, gave an immense size to the upper part of the leg, which made the shrunk shanks, which issued from them a little above the knees, appear still more slender than they really were, for the funnel boots which he wore, falling as they did on the ankle, did not hide the absence of a calf. These boots, of a deep yellow colour, had heels two inches high, and were always provided with spurs: the doublet and breeches were of faded pink, and were accompanied by a little cloak of the same hue, which barely descended to his waist: add to these a very high ruff, a little hat surmounted by an old red feather, and cocked on one side; an old green silk belt; a sword much longer than was usually worn, whose hilt in fact rose to his chest, and you will have a faithful portrait of the individual who styled himself the Chevalier de Chaudoreille, whose slight Gascon accent denoted his origin. He walked with his head in the air, his nose stuck up, his hand on his hip, his leg stretched out, as if about to put himself on his guard, and apparently disposed to defy all who passed by him.

"On entering the shop, Chaudoreille threw himself on a bench, as if overwhelmed with fatigue, and placed his hat beside him, exclaiming,

"Let me rest myself a moment. Sandis! I well deserve it!—Ouf!—what a night! Gad, what a night!"

"And what the devil has been doing to-night, to tire thee so much?"

"Ah! nothing very extraordinary for me, 'tis true; beaten three or four great fellows, who wanted to stop a countess's sedan; wounded two pages who were insulting a girl; gave a few inches of my sword to a student who was about to enter the window of a house; delivered over to the watch four thieves who were about to rifle a poor gentleman;—that is about what I did last night."

"Peste!" said Touquet, as a sneering smile escaped him, "dost thou know, Chaudoreille, thou alone art worth at least three patrols of the watch? It seems to me that the king, or monsieur the cardinal, ought to compensate such fine conduct, by naming thee to some high post in the police of this town, instead of leaving such a brave and useful personage to run about all day from one gambling house to another, trying to borrow a crown."

"Yes," said Chaudoreille, affecting not to have heard the latter portion of what the barber had said, "I admit that I am very brave, and that my sword has often been of service to the state; that is to say—to the oppressed; but I have ever acted disinterestedly; I yield to the impulses of my heart: 'tis in the blood. Cadédis! Honour above all things!—and in these times we are not given to trifling!—I am what they call at court 'the very punctilio of honour.' A disrespectful glance—a cold look—a cloak brushing against mine—presto!—the sword's in my hand; that's my only argument; I would fight with a child of five years old if he were disrespectful!"

"I know we live in times when people measure swords about nothing; but I never heard that thy duels had made much noise."

"I dare say not, my dear Touquet! dead men don't speak, and those who have to do with me never get out of the scrape. Thou hast heard of the renowned Balagni, surnamed the brave, who was killed in a duel fifteen years ago. Well, my friend, I am his pupil and successor."

"It is unfortunate for thee that thou wast not brought into the world two centuries earlier. Tournaments are getting out of fashion, and the knights who redressed wrongs, and split giants in two, are no longer seen—except in picture galleries."

"It is certain that, if I had lived in the time of the Crusades, I should have brought back from Palestine two thousand Saracen ears; but, my dear Rolanda was there. This redoubted sword, which I inherit from an ancestor who had it direct from Orlando Furioso—hath sent a devilish lot of people to the other world."

"I'm always afraid of its throwing thee down, it seems too long for thee."

"And yet its worn an inch shorter since I had it; if I go on in this way, it will become a mere stiletto."

A passage from the touching story of Zinzinette.

M. Guerreville is a widower, who has lost his daughter; and to relieve his melancholy he one day takes to hunting out lodgings;—in a house in a very humble street,

"A little girl of six was mounting to the fourth story just as M. Guerreville put his foot on the first step to descend. The child was poorly and thinly dressed for the season; a cap of brown cloth covered her head; a gown patched in many parts; an old black apron, composed all her dress; and her tiny feet were already inclosed in wooden shoes. She carried under her arm a round 4 lb. loaf, a burden that must have been heavy for her; yet she appeared proud of carrying it, and looked at it with great triumph. Arrived at the landing, she held down her head on seeing strangers, and directed her steps towards another little dark staircase, much like the ladder of a mill, and in a corner of the roof. Fourré (the porter) stopped the child, saying—'Ah, young one, tell your father the landlord wants his money. What the devil! Jerome laughs at us!—Because he is ill he thinks we shall forget the rent he owes; but his goods will be sold if he does not pay—tell him that from me.' The child looked at the porter with a small countenance of mingled fear and shame; then quickly climbed the ladder and disappeared. M. Guerreville, who at first paid no attention to the child, turned as the porter spoke to her; he examined that little face, so pale, so thin: the features so small and delicate, surrounded by curls of bright chestnut hair; and he was surprised at the thoughtful expression of that very young countenance."

"This little girl had neither regular features nor rosy cheeks; it was not one of those fat, puffy cherubs, of whom it is customary to say 'what a fine child!' nor one of those perfect heads which painters love to put in their pictures; it was a slight, pale, delicate, serious girl, whom many persons would not have remarked, and others would have thought plain; but who possessed a charm for those who could read the expression of her countenance."

A parent's love had consecrated one spot—

"M. Guerreville had followed the porter and penetrated into a miserable room, whose wretched appearance wrung his heart. There was no paper to hide the walls and the beams which formed the ceiling; no curtains to the sloping window that admitted the light; a poor stump bedstead, a table, a few chairs, a little buffet of white wood which had been slightly varnished,—this was all the furniture of the room; but in a corner, a few boards had been fixed up to make a separation, which formed a sort of closet. There was placed a little child's bed; this bed was of walnut tree, very clean and bright, surmounted by a rod in form of an arrow, and on it were thrown curtains of green, which could surround the bed of the little girl, and screen her from the light which fell perpendicularly into this gloomy retreat."

"Having opened the door, the little girl went back and seated herself close to the sick man's bed, whose hand she took within her own; trying to read in his eyes the impression made upon him by this unexpected visit."

"Ah, yes—this is money well employed!" said the porter, taking a pinch of snuff with great importance. "To buy dolls and little furniture for this little brat; how can any one be so silly! besides they are not cheap playthings you buy, but handsome dolls, two francs a-piece."

"Ah,—but listen to me, Monsieur Fourré! it is because I think nothing too good for my Zinzinette—my little girl—my little angel—and now my little nurse. Ah! I should have liked to buy much handsomer things for her."

"Without appearing even to hear what the porter was saying, M. Guerreville put his hand on the cheek of the little girl; and while caressing her, said to the Auvergnat, 'Is it your only child?' 'Yes, sir.' 'And you love her much, do you not?' 'Do I love her!—Oh, she is my little treasure. Poor child! since I have been ill she has taken care of me, relieved my thirst, gone out to fetch bread and every thing I bid her. She is very young—only six and a half, but yet there is in that little head more thought and sense than in many older ones.' M. Guerreville made him no answer, he was again lost in thought, his head sunk upon his breast, and deep grief painted on all his features."

"Is it possible to stint oneself thus for a child?" cried M. Fourré, putting out his head from behind the boards. 'Here are three good mattresses on the bed of this little one, and yet her father lies upon a hard palliasse.'

"If that pleases me, Mr. Porter," said Jerome, impatiently, 'I think I have a right to sleep as I like; and for me, who am neither delicate nor difficult, it does very well; but this little pet, Oh! she must be treated tenderly, you see, she is so delicate, so fragile; the least thing would hurt her.'

"Would not one think she was the child of a prince! I love my children, but certainly I could not deprive myself of comforts for them—Ah, well, sir, you have had time to look at this room, I must go down—if it suits you for 50 francs, you shall have it, and I'll take the beans elsewhere."

"On concluding these words the Auvergnat drew the little girl to his bed, and embraced her tenderly; 'And I am blamed,' he added, 'for buying her fine dolls. Oh, but I let the world talk and do as I like, don't I, Zinzinette?'

"The child smiled and said, 'Oh, I take great care of my dolly; she sleeps with me, and I'll make her a frock, for a lady in the house has promised me some very handsome pieces.'

"Yes, yes; you are a good contriver, and everybody in the house loves you, except the porter, who never speaks to you but to say something harsh; but he sha'n't abuse you neither, for I will break my pails over his back."

M. Guerreville takes his leave of the house, giving all the money he had about him to the child, and goes down stairs, where the porter waited his descent."

"And the hand of the porter was still held out before M. Guerreville, but he, after trying his pockets, where he found nothing, put aside the arm which barred his passage, and quitted the house, saying,—'Ah, I am sorry, but I have nothing about me.' M. Fourré remained an instant stupefied with anger; at length he stuck his cap with his hand crying, 'I am robbed, as in a wood; was ever heard such meanness! a well dressed man dare tell me he has no money. Fie, it is disgraceful!—Now that man,—after all, I believe he is an informer—a spy.'"

STORY OF LADY RUSSELL.

Lady Russell would have made a good chapter in the Roman history, at the side of Aria and Portia. What tenderness! What fortitude! What conjugal devotion!—Her picture should be framed, and gilt, and hung up in the memory of every married lady—particularly if she has a husband as amiable and affectionate as my said Lord Russell.

"My best life! how long the time has seemed since last I saw you! I am too happy when I am with you to know my happiness: 'tis at these times when I feel so desolate a creature, that I wake up to a deep sense of my happiness. It delights me to find you feel such a love to poor Stratton. May you live to do so for fifty years to come! and, if God pleases, I shall be glad I may keep your company most of those years, unless you were to wish otherwise at any time: when I think I could willingly leave all in the world, knowing you would take care of our children."

"Pardon, my dear love, (as you have a thousand other failings,) all the nonsense of this, and think me to be, as I am, your ever obedient and affectionate wife,

"R. RUSSELL."

"For the Lord Russell,
"At Southampton House,
"London."

"If we have as pleasant weather next year as we have had all this autumn, I shall enjoy sweet Stratton still more: for you will be here with us more than of late, will you not, dearest?—and we will return early in the summer."

They never returned together: on the 25th of

"No! on second thoughts, you may take back your wife—she's always talking of her own complaints—and leave me Camilla; you can't wait her for a few days."

"Just as you like. And you really think I have managed as well as I could about this young man, eh?"

"Yes—yes! And so you go to Beaufort Court in a few days?"

"I propose doing so. I wish you were well enough to come."

"Um! Chambers says that it would be a very good air for me—better than Fernside; and as to my castle in the north, I would as soon go to Siberia. Why, if I am better, I will pay you a visit, only you always have such a stupid set of respectable people about you. I shock them, and they oppress me."

"Why, as I hope soon to see Arthur, I shall make it as agreeable to him as I can, and I shall be very much obliged to you if you would invite a few of your own friends."

"Well, you are a good fellow, Beaufort, and I will take you at your word; and, since one good turn deserves another, I have now no scruple in telling you that I feel quite sure that you will have no farther annoyance from this troublesome witness-monger."

"In that case," said Beaufort, "I may pick up a better match for Camilla! Good-bye, my dear Lilburne."

"Form and ceremony of the world!" snarled the peer, as the door closed on his brother-in-law, "ye make little men very moral, and not a bit the better for being so!"

It so happened that Vaudemont arrived before any of the other guests that day, and during the half hour which Dr. Chambers assigned to his illustrious patient, so that, when he entered, there were only Mrs. Beaufort and Camilla in the drawing-room.

Vaudemont drew back involuntarily as he recognised in the faded countenance of the elder lady features associated with one of the dark passages in his earlier life; but Mrs. Beaufort's gracious smile, and urbane, though languid welcome, sufficed to assure him that the recognition was not mutual. He advanced, and again stopped short as his eye fell upon that fair and still childlike form, which had once knelt by his side, and pleaded with the orphan for his brother. While he spoke to her, many recollections, some dark and stern—but those, at least, connected with Camilla, soft and gentle—thrilled through his heart. Occupied as her own thoughts and feelings necessarily were with Sidney, there was something in Vaudemont's appearance—his manner—his voice—which forced upon Camilla a strange and undefined interest; and even Mrs. Beaufort was roused from her customary apathy as she glanced to that dark and commanding face with something between admiration and fear. Vaudemont had scarcely, however, spoken ten words, when some other guests were announced, and Lord Lilburne was wheeled in upon his sofa shortly afterward. Vaudemont continued, however, seated next to Camilla, and the embarrassment he had at first felt disappeared. He possessed, when he pleased it, that kind of eloquence which belongs to men who have seen much and felt deeply, and whose talk has not been frittered down to the commonplace jargon of the world. His very phraseology was distinct and peculiar, and he had that rarest of all charms in polished life, originality both of thought and of manner. Camilla blushed when she found at dinner that he had placed himself by her side. That evening De Vaudemont excused himself from playing; but the table was easily made without him, and still he continued to converse with the daughter of the man whom he held as his worst foe. By degrees, he turned the conversation into a channel that might lead him to the knowledge he sought.

"It was my fate," said he, "once to become acquainted with an intimate friend of the late Mr. Beaufort. Will you pardon me if I venture to fulfil a promise I made to him, and ask you to inform me what has become of a—a—that is, of Sidney Morton?"

"Sidney Morton! I don't even remember the name. Oh, yes! I have heard it," added Camilla, innocently, and with a candour that showed how little she knew of the secrets of the family; "he was one of two poor boys in whom my brother felt a deep interest—some relations to my uncle. Yes—yes! I remember now. I never knew Sidney, but I once did see his brother."

"Indeed! and you remember—"

"Yes! I was very young then. I scarcely recollect what passed, it was all so confused and strange; but I know that I made papa very angry, and I was told never to mention the name of Morton again. I believe they behaved very ill to papa."

"And you never learned—never!—the fate of either—of Sidney?"

"Never!"

"But your father must know?"

"I think not; but tell me," said Camilla, with girlish and unaffected innocence, "I have always felt anxious to know—what and who were those poor boys?"

What and who were they? So deep, then, was the stain upon their name, that the modest mother and the decorous father had never even said to that young girl, "They are your cousins: the children of the man in whose gold we revel!"

Philip bit his lip, and the spell of Camilla's presence seemed vanished. He muttered some inaudible answer, turned away to the card-table, and Liancourt took the chair he had left vacant.

"And how does Miss Beaufort like my friend Vaudemont? I assure you that I have seldom seen him so alive to the fascination of female beauty."

"Oh!" said Camilla, with her silver laugh, "your nation spoils us for our own countrymen. You forget how little we are accustomed to flattery."

"Flattery! What truth could flatter on the lips of an exile? But you don't answer my question: what think you of Vaudemont? Few are more admired. He is handsome!"

"Is he?" said Camilla; and she glanced at Vaudemont as he stood at a little distance, thoughtful and abstracted. Every girl forms to herself some untold dream of that which she considers fairest. And Vaudemont had not the delicate and faultless beauty of Sidney. There was nothing that corresponded to her ideal in his marked features and lordly shape! But she owned, reluctantly to herself, that she had seldom seen, among the trim gallants of every-day life, a form so striking and impressive. The air, indeed, was professional: the most careless glance could detect the soldier; but it seemed the soldier of an elder age or a wilder clime. He recalled to her those heads which she had seen in the Beaufort gallery and other collections yet more celebrated—portraits by Titian of those warrior statesmen who lived in the old republics of Italy in a perpetual struggle with their kind—images of dark, resolute, earnest men. Even whatever was intellectual in his countenance spoke, as in those portraits, of a mind sharpened rather in active than in studious life; intellectual, not from the pale hues, the worn exhaustion, and the sunken cheek of the bookman and dreamer, but from its collected and sterner repose, the calm depth that lay beneath the fire of the eyes, and the strong will that spoke in the close, full lips, and the high but not cloudless forehead.

And, as she gazed, Vaudemont turned round; her eyes fell beneath his, and she felt angry with herself that she blushed. Vaudemont saw the downcast eye, he saw the blush, and the attraction of Camilla's presence was restored. He would have approached her, but at that moment Mr. Beaufort himself entered, and his thoughts went again into a darker channel.

"Yes," said Liancourt, "you must allow Vaudemont looks what he is—a noble fellow and a gallant soldier. Did you never hear of his battle with the tigress? It made a noise in India. I must tell it you as I have heard it."

And, while Liancourt was narrating the adventure, whatever it was, to which he referred, the card-table was broken up, and Lord Lilburne, still reclining on his sofa, lazily introduced his brother-in-law to such of the guests as were strangers to him—Vaudemont among the rest. Mr. Beaufort had never seen Philip Morton more than three times; once at Fernside, and the other times by an imperfect light, and when his features were convulsed by passion, and his form disfigured by his dress. Certainly, therefore, had Robert Beaufort even possessed that faculty of memory which is supposed to belong peculiarly to kings and princes, and which recalls every face once seen, it might have tasked the gift to the utmost to have detected in the bronzed and decorated foreigner to whom he was now presented the features of the wild and long-lost boy. But still some dim and uneasy presentiment, or some struggling and painful effect of recollection, was in his mind as he spoke to Vaudemont, and listened to the cold, calm tone of his reply.

"Who do you say that Frenchman is?" he whispered to his brother-in-law, as Vaudemont turned away.

"Oh! a cleverish sort of adventurer—a gentleman; he plays—he has seen a good deal of the world—he rather amuses me—different from other people. I think of asking him to join our circle at Beaufort Court."

Mr. Beaufort coughed huskily; but, not seeing any reasonable objection to the proposal, and afraid of rousing the sleeping hyæna of Lord Lilburne's sarcasm, he merely said,

"Any one you please:" and, looking round for some one on whom to vent his displeasure, perceived Camilla still listening to Liancourt. He stalked up to her, and, as Liancourt, seeing her rise, rose also and moved away, he said peevishly, "You will never learn to conduct yourself properly; you are to be left here to nurse and comfort your uncle, and not to listen to the gibberish of every French adventurer. Well, Heaven be praised I have a son! girls are a great plague!"

"So they are, Mr. Beaufort," sighed his wife, who had just joined him, and who was jealous of the preference Lilburne had given to her daughter.

"And so selfish!" added Mrs. Beaufort; "they only care for their own amusements, and never mind how uncomfortable their parents are for want of them."

"Oh! dear mamma, don't say so! Let me go home with you: I'll speak to my uncle!"

"Nonsense, child! Come along, Mr. Beaufort;" and the affectionate parents went out arm in arm. They did not perceive that Vaudemont had been standing close behind them; but Camilla, now looking up with tears in her eyes, again caught his gaze: he had heard all.

"And they ill-treat her," he muttered: "that divides her from them!—she will be left here—I shall see her again."

As he turned to depart, Lilburne beckoned to him.

"You do not mean to desert our table?"

"No; but I am not very well to-night; to-morrow, if you will allow me."

"Ay, to-morrow; and if you can spare an hour in the morning, it will be a charity. You see," he added, in a whisper, "I have a nurse, though I have no children. D'ye think that's love? Bah! sir—a legacy! Good night!"

"No—no—no!" said Vaudemont to himself, as he walked through the moonlighted streets, "No! though my heart burns—poor murdered felon!—to avenge thy wrongs and thy crimes, revenge cannot come from me; he is Fanny's grandfather and—Camilla's uncle!"

And Camilla, when that uncle had dismissed her for the night, sat down thoughtfully in her own room. The dark eyes of Vaudemont seemed still to shine on her; his voice yet rung in her ear: the wild tales of daring and danger with which Liancourt had associated his name yet haunted her bewildered fancy; she started, frightened at her own thoughts. She took from her bosom some lines that Sidney had addressed to her, and, as she read and re-read them, her spirit became calmed to its wonted and faithful melancholy. Vaudemont was forgotten, and the name of Sidney yet murmured on her lips when sleep came to renew the image of the absent one, and paint in dreams the fairy-land of a happy future!

CHAPTER V.

"Ring on, ye bells, most pleasant is your chime!"
Wilson: Isle of Palma.

Vaudemont remained six days in London without going to H—, and each of those days he paid a visit to Lord Lilburne. On the seventh day, the invalid being much better, though still unable to leave his room, Camilla returned to Berkeley square. On the same day Vaudemont went once more to see Simon and poor Fanny.

As he approached the door, he heard from the window, partially opened, for the day was clear and fine, Fanny's sweet voice. She was chanting one of the simple songs she had promised to learn by heart; and Vaudemont, though but a poor judge of the art, was struck and affected by the music of the voice and the earnest depth of the feeling. He paused opposite the window and called her by her name. Fanny looked forth joyously, and ran, as usual, to open the door to him.

"Oh! you have been so long away; but I know so many of the songs: they say so much that I always wanted to say!"

Vaudemont smiled but languidly.

"How strange it is," said Fanny, musingly,

"that there should be so much in a piece of paper! for, after all," pointing to the open page of her book, "this is but a piece of paper—only there is life in it!"

"Ay," said Vaudemont, gloomily, and far from seizing the subtle delicacy of Fanny's thought—her mind dwelling upon poetry and his upon law; "ay; and do you know that upon a mere scrap of paper—yes, a mere scrap of paper, if I could but find it, may depend my whole fortune, my whole happiness, all that I care for in life?"

"Upon a scrap of paper! Oh! how I wish I could find it! Ah! you look as if you thought I should never be wise enough for that!"

Vaudemont, not listening to her, uttered a deep sigh. Fanny approached him timidly.

"Do not sigh, brother—I can't bear to hear you sigh. You are changed. Have you, too, not been happy?"

"Happy, Fanny! Yes, lately, very happy—too happy!"

"Happy, have you? and I—" the girl stopped short; her tone had been that of sadness and reproach, and she stopped—why! she knew not, but she felt her heart sink within her. Fanny suffered him to pass her, and he went straight to his own room. Her eyes followed him wistfully; it was not his habit to leave her thus abruptly. The family meal of the day was over, and it was an hour before Vaudemont descended to the parlour. Fanny had put aside the songs: she had no heart to recommence those gentle studies that had been so sweet: they had drawn no pleasure, no praise from him. She was seated idly and listlessly beside the silent old man, who every day grew more and more silent still. She turned her head as Vaudemont entered, and her pretty lip pouted as that of a neglected child. But he did not heed it, and the pout vanished, and tears rushed to her eyes.

Vaudemont was changed. His countenance was thoughtful and overcast, his manner abstracted. He addressed a few words to Simon, and then, seating himself by the window, leaned his cheek on his hand, and was soon lost in revery. Fanny, finding that he did not speak, and after stealing many a long and earnest glance at his motionless attitude and gloomy brow, rose gently, and gliding to him with her light step, said, in a trembling voice,

"Are you in pain, brother?"

"No, pretty one!"

"Then why won't you speak to Fanny? Will you not walk with her? Perhaps my grandfather will come too."

"Not this evening. I shall go out, but it will be alone."

"Where? Has not Fanny been good? I have not been out since you left us. And the grave, brother! I sent Sarah with the flowers; but—"

Vaudemont rose abruptly. The mention of the grave brought back his thoughts from the dreaming channel into which they had flowed. Fanny, whose very childishness had once so soothed him, now disturbed; he felt the want of that complete solitude which makes the atmosphere of growing passion; he muttered some scarcely audible excuse, and quitted the room. Fanny saw him no more that evening. He did not return till midnight. But Fanny did not sleep till she heard his step on the stairs and his chamber-door close; and, when she did sleep, her dreams were disturbed and painful. The next morning, when they met at breakfast (for Vaudemont did not return to London), her eyes were red and heavy, and her cheek pale. And, still buried in meditation, Vaudemont's eye, usually so kind and watchful, did not detect those signs of a grief that Fanny could not have explained. After breakfast, however, he asked her to walk out; and her face brightened as she hastened to put on her bonnet and take her little basket full of fresh flowers, which she had already sent Sarah forth to purchase.

"Fanny!" said Vaudemont, as, leaving the house, he saw the basket on her arm, "to-day you may place some of those flowers on another tombstone! Poor child, what natural goodness there is in that heart! what pity that—"

He paused. Fanny looked delightedly in his face.

"You were praising me—you! And what is a pity, brother?"

While she spoke, the sound of joy-bells was heard near at hand.

"Hark!" said Vaudemont, forgetting her question, and almost gaily, "hark! I accept the omen. It is a marriage peal!"

He quickened his steps, and they reached the churchyard.

There was a crowd already assembled, and Vaudemont and Fanny paused; and, leaning over the little gate, looked on.

"Why are these people here, and why does the bell ring so merrily?"

"There is to be a wedding, Fanny."

"I have heard of a wedding very often," said Fanny, with a pretty look of puzzlement and doubt, "but I don't know exactly what it means. Will you tell me? And the bells, too?"

"Yes, Fanny; those bells toll but three times for man! The first time, when he comes into the world; the last time, when he leaves it; the time between, when he takes to his side a partner in all the sorrows, in all the joys that yet remain to him; and who, even when the last bell announces his death to this earth, may yet, for ever and for ever, be his partner in that world to come, that heaven, where they who are as innocent as you, Fanny, may hope to live and to love each other in a land where there are no graves!"

"And this bell?"

"Tolls for that partnership—for the wedding!"

"I think I understand you; and they who are to be wed are happy?"

"Happy, Fanny, if they love, and their love continue. Oh! conceive the happiness to know some one person dearer to you than your own self—some one breast into which you can pour every thought, every grief, every joy! One person, who, if all the rest of the world were to calumniate or forsake you, would never wrong you by a harsh thought or an unjust word; who would cling to you the closer in sickness, in poverty, in care; who would sacrifice all things to you, and for whom you would sacrifice all; from whom, except by death, night nor day, can you ever be divided; whose smile is ever at your hearth; who has no tears while you are well and happy, and your love the same. Fanny, such is marriage, if they who marry have hearts and souls to feel that there is no bond on earth so tender and so sublime. There is an opposite picture; I will not draw that! And as it is, Fanny, you cannot understand me!"

He turned away; and Fanny's tears were falling like rain upon the grass below: he did not see them! He entered the churchyard, for the bell now ceased. The ceremony was to begin. He followed the bridal party into the church, and Fanny, lowering her veil, crept after him, awed and trembling.

They stood at a little distance and heard the service.

The betrothed were of the middle class of life, young, both comely; and their behaviour was such as suited the reverence and sanctity of the rite. Vaudemont stood, looking on intently, with his arms folded on his breast. Fanny leaned behind him, and apart from all, against one of the pews. And still in her hand, while the priest was solemnising Marriage, she held the flowers intended for the grave. Even to that MORNING—hushed, calm, earnest, with her mysterious and un conjectured heart—her shape brought a thought of NIGHT!

When the ceremony was over—when the bride fell on her mother's breast and wept; and then, when turning thence, her eyes met the bridegroom's, and the tears were all smiled away—when, in that one rapid interchange of looks, spoke all that holy love can speak to love, and with timid frankness she placed her hand in his to whom she had just vowed her life—a thrill went through the hearts of those present, Vaudemont sighed heavily. He heard his sigh echoed, but by one that had in its sound no breath of pain: he turned; Fanny had raised her veil; her eyes met his, moistened, but bright, soft, and her cheeks were rosy red. Vaudemont recoiled before that gaze, and turned from the church. The crowd dispersed. The persons interested retired to the vestry to sign their names in the registry, and Vaudemont and Fanny stood alone in the burial-ground.

"Look, Fanny," said the former, pointing to a tomb that stood far from his mother's (for those ashes were too hallowed for such a neighbourhood). "Look yonder; it is a new tomb, Fanny; let us approach it. Can you read what is there inscribed?"

The inscription was simply this:

To W—— G——.

MAN SEES THE DEED—OOD THE CIRCUMSTANCE.

JUDGE NOT, THAT YE BE NOT JUDGED.

"Fanny, this tomb fulfils your pious wish: it is to the memory of him whom you called your father. Whatever was his life here—whatever sentence it hath received, Heaven, at least, will not condemn your piety if you honour one who was good to you, and place flowers, however idle, even over that grave."

"It is his—my father's; and you have thought of this for me," said Fanny, taking his hand and sobbing. "And I have been thinking that you were not so kind to me as you were!"

"Have I not? Nay, forgive me, I am not happy."

"Not? You said yesterday you had been too happy."

"To remember happiness is not to be happy, Fanny."

"That's true: and—"

Fanny stopped; and, as she bent over the tomb, musing, Vaudemont, willing to leave her undisturbed, and feeling bitterly how little his conscience could vindicate, though it might find palliation for, the dark man who slept not there, retired a few paces.

At this time the new-married pair, with their witnesses, the clergyman, &c., came from the vestry and crossed the path. Fanny, as she turned from the tomb, saw them, and stood still, looking earnestly at the bride.

"What a lovely face!" said the mother; "is it—yes, it is—the poor idiot girl."

"Ah!" said the bridegroom, tenderly, "and she, Mary, beautiful as she is, she can never make another as happy as you have made me."

Vaudemont heard, and his heart felt sad. "Poor Fanny! And yet, but for that affliction, I might have loved her ere I met the fatal face of the daughter of my foe!" And with a deep compassion, an inexpressible and holy fondness, he moved to Fanny.

"Come, my child, now let us go home."

"Stay," said Fanny, "you forget." And she went to strew the flowers still left over Catharine's grave.

"Will my mother," thought Vaudemont, "forgive me if I have other thoughts than hate and vengeance for that house which builds its greatness over her slandered name?" He groaned: and that grave had lost its melancholy charm.

CHAPTER VII.

"Of all men I say,
That dare, for 'tis a desperate adventure,
Wear on their free necks the yoke of women,
Give me a soldier."—Knight of Malta.

"So lightly doth this little boat
Upon the scarce-touch'd billows float;
So careless doth she seem to be,
Thus left by herself on the homeless sea,
To 'ay there with her cheerful sail,
Till Heaven shall send some gracious gale."
WILSON: Isle of Palms.

Vaudemont returned that evening to London, and found at his lodgings a note from Lord Lilburne, stating that, as his gout was now somewhat mitigated, his physician had recommended him to try change of air—that Beaufort Court was in one of the western counties, in a genial climate—that he was therefore going thither the next day for a short time—that he had asked some of Monsieur de Vaudemont's countrymen, and a few other friends, to enliven the circle of a dull country-house—that Mr. and Mrs. Beaufort would be delighted to see Monsieur de Vaudemont also—and that his compliance with their invitation would be a charity to Monsieur de Vaudemont's faithful and obliged

LILBURNE.

The first sensation of Vaudemont on reading this effusion was delight. "I shall see her," he cried; "I shall be under the same roof!" But the glow faded at once from his cheek. The roof—what roof? Be the guest where he held himself the lord! Be the guest of Robert Beaufort! Was that all? Did he not meditate the deadliest war which civilised society admits of—the War of Law—war for name, property, that very hearth, with its household gods, against this man? Could he receive his hospitality? "And what then!" he exclaimed, as he paced to and fro the room; "because her father wronged me, and because I would claim mine own, must I therefore exclude from my thoughts, from my sight, an image so fair and gentle; the one who knelt by my side, an infant, to that hard man? Is Hate so noble a passion that it is not to admit one glimpse of Love? Love! what word is that? Let me beware in time!" He paused in fierce self-contest, and, throwing open the window, gasped for air. The street in which he lodged was in the neighbourhood of St. James's; and, at that very moment, as if to defeat all opposition and to close the struggle, Mrs. Beaufort's barouche drove by, Camilla at her side. Mrs. Beaufort, glancing up, languidly bowed; and Camilla herself perceived him, and he saw her change colour as she inclined her head. He gazed after them, almost breathless, till the carriage disappeared; and then, reclosing the window, he sat down to collect his thoughts, and again to reason with himself. But still, as he reasoned, he saw ever before him that blush and that smile. At last he sprang up, and a noble and bright expression elevated the character of his face: "Yes; if I enter that house, if I eat that man's bread, and drink of his cup, I must forego, not justice—not what is due to my mother's name—but whatever belongs to hate and vengeance. If I enter that house, and if Providence permit me the means whereby to regain my rights, why, she—the innocent one—she may be the means of saving her father from ruin, and stand like an angel by that boundary where justice runs into revenge! Besides, is it not my duty to discover Sidney? Here is the only clew I shall obtain." With these thoughts he hesitated no more—he decided; he would not reject this hospitality, since it might be in his power to pay it back ten thousand-fold. "And who knows," he murmured again, "if Heaven, in throwing this sweet being in my way, might not have designed to subdue and chasten in me the angry passions I have so long fed on? I have seen her: can I now hate her father?"

He sent off his note accepting the invitation. When he had done so, was he satisfied? He had taken as noble and as large a view of the duties thereby imposed on him as he well could take; but something whispered at his heart, "There is weakness in thy generosity. Darest thou love the daughter of Robert Beaufort!" And his heart had no answer to this voice.

The rapidity with which love is ripened depends less upon the actual number of years that have passed over the soil in which the seed is cast, than upon the freshness of the soil itself. A young man who lives the ordinary life of the world, and who fritters away, rather than exhausts, his feelings upon a variety of quick succeeding subjects—the Cynthias of the minute—is not apt to form a real passion at the first sight. Youth is not inflammable unless the heart is young.

There are certain times of life when, in either sex, the affections are prepared, as it were, to be impressed with the first fair face that attracts the fancy and delights the eye. Such times are when the heart has been long solitary, and when some interval of idleness and rest succeeds to periods of harsher and more turbulent excitement. This was precisely such a period in the life of Vaudemont. Although his ambition had been for many years his dream, and his sword his mistress, yet, naturally affectionate, and susceptible of strong emotion, he had often repined at his lonely lot. By degrees, the boy's fantasy and reverence, which had wound themselves round the image of Eugenie, subsided into that gentle and tender melancholy, which, perhaps, by weakening the strength of the sterner thoughts, leaves us inclined rather to receive than to resist a new attachment; and on the verge of the sweet Memory trembles the sweet Hope. The suspension of his profession, his schemes, his struggles, his career, left his passions unemployed. Vaudemont was thus unconsciously prepared to love. As we have seen, his first and earliest feelings directed themselves to Fanny. But he had so immediately detected the danger, and so immediately recoiled from nursing those thoughts and fancies, without which love dies for want of food, for a person to whom he ascribed the affliction of an imbecility which would give such a sentiment—all the attributes either of the weakest rashness or of dishonour approaching to sacrilege—that the wings of the deity were scared away the instant their very shadow fell upon his mind. And thus, when Camilla rose upon him, his heart was free to receive her image. Her graces, her accomplishments, a certain nameless charm that invested her, pleased him even more than her beauty; the recollections connected with that first time he had ever beheld her were also grateful and endearing; the harshness with which her parents spoke to her moved his compassion, and addressed itself to a temper peculiarly alive to the generosity that leans towards the weak and the wronged; the engaging mixture of mildness and gaiety with which she tended her peevish and sneering uncle, convinced him of her better and more enduring qualities of disposition and womanly heart. And even—so strange and contradictory are our feelings—the very remembrance that she was connected with a family so hateful to him made her own image the more bright from the darkness that surrounded it. For was it not with the daughter of his foe that the lover of Verona fell in love at first sight? And is not that a common type of us all—as if Passion delighted in contradictions? As the diver, in Schiller's exquisite ballad, fastened, in the midst of the gloomy sea, upon the rock of coral, so we cling the more gratefully to whatever of fair thought and gentle shelter smiles out to us in the depths of Hate and Strife.

But perhaps Vaudemont would not so suddenly and so utterly have rendered himself to a passion that began, already, completely to master his strong spirit, if he had not, from Camilla's embarrassment, her timidity, her blushes, intoxicated himself with the belief that his feelings were not unshared. And who knows not that such a belief, once cherished, ripens our own love to a development in which hours are as years?

It was, then, with such emotions as made him almost blind to every thought but the luxury of breathing the same air as his cousin, which swept from his mind the Past, the Future, leaving nothing but a joyous, a breathless PRESENT on the face of Time, that he repaired to Beaufort Court. He did not return to H— before he went, but he wrote to Fanny a short and hurried line to explain that he might be absent for some days at least, and promised to write again if he should be detained longer than he anticipated.

In the mean while, one of those successive revolutions which had marked the eras in Fanny's moral existence, took its date from that last time they had walked and conversed together.

The very evening of that day, some hours after Philip was gone, and after Simon had retired to rest, Fanny was sitting before the dying fire in the little parlour in an attitude of deep and pensive reverie. The old woman-servant, Sarah, who, very different from Mrs. Boxer, loved Fanny with her whole heart, came into the room, as was her wont, before going to bed, to see that the fire was duly out and all safe; and, as she approached the hearth, she started to see Fanny still up.

"Dear heart-alive!" she said; "why, Miss Fanny, you will catch your death of cold: what are you thinking about?"

"Sit down, Sarah; I want to speak to you."

Now, though Fanny was exceedingly kind and attached to Sarah, she was seldom communicative to her, or, indeed, to any one. It was usually in its own silence and darkness that that lovely mind worked out its own doubts.

"Do you, my sweet young lady? I'm sure anything I can do—" and Sarah seated herself in her master's great chair, and drew it close to Fanny. There was no light in her room but the expiring fire, and it threw upward a pale glimmer on the two faces bending over it, the one so beautiful, so smooth, so blooming, so exquisite in its youth and innocence, the other withered, wrinkled, meager, and astute. It was like the Fairy and the Witch together.

"Well, miss," said the crone, observing that, after a considerable pause, Fanny was still silent; "well—"

"Sarah, I have seen a wedding!"

"Have you?" and the old woman laughed. "Oh! I heard it was to be to-day!—young Waldron's wedding! Yes, they have been long sweethearts."

"Were you ever married, Sarah?"

"Lord bless you, yes! and a very good husband I had, poor man! But he's dead these many years; and, if you had not taken me, I must have gone to the workhouse."

"He is dead! Wasn't it very hard to live after that, Sarah?"

"The Lord strengthens the hearts of widders!" observed Sarah, sanctimoniously.

"Did you marry your brother, Sarah?" said Fanny, playing with the corner of her apron.

"My brother!" exclaimed the old woman, aghast. "La! miss, you must not talk in that way: it's quite wicked and heathenish! One must not marry one's brother!"

"No!" said Fanny, tremblingly, and turning very pale, even by that light. "No! Are you sure of that?"

"It is the wickedest thing even to talk about, my dear young mistress; but you're like a babby unborn!"

Fanny was silent for some moments. At length she said, unconscious that she was speaking aloud, "But he is not my brother, after all!"

"Oh, miss, fy! Are you letting your pretty head run on the handsome gentleman? You, too—dear, dear! I see we're all alike, we poor felow creturs! You! who'd have thought it? Oh, Miss Fanny! you'll break your heart if you goes for to fancy any such thing."

"Any what thing?"

"Why, that that gentleman will marry you! I'm sure, tho' he's so simple like, he's some great gentleman! They say his hoss is worth a hundred pounds! Dear, dear! why didn't I ever think of this before? He must be a very wicked man. I see, now, why he comes here. I'll speak to him, that I will!—a very wicked man!"

Sarah was startled from her indignation by Fanny's rising suddenly, and standing before her in the flickering twilight, almost like a shape transformed, so tall did she seem, so stately, so dignified.

"Is it of him that you are speaking?" said she, in a voice of calm but deep resentment: "of him! If so, Sarah, we two can live no more in the same house."

And these words were said with a propriety and collectedness that even, through all her terror, showed at once to Sarah how much they now wronged Fanny who had suffered their lips to repeat the parrot-cry of the "idiot girl!"

"Oh! gracious me! miss—ma'am—I am so sorry—I'd rather bite out my tongue than say a word to offend you; it was only my love for you, dear innocent creature that you are!" and the honest woman sobbed with real passion as she clasped Fanny's hand. "There have been so many young persons, good and harmless, yes, even as you are, ruined. But you don't understand me. Miss Fanny! hear me: I must try and say what I would say. That man—that gentleman—so proud, so well-dressed, so grand-like—will never marry you, never—never. And if ever he says he does love you, and you say you loves him, and you two don't marry, you will be ruined and wicked, and die—die of a broken heart!"

The earnestness of Sarah's manner subdued and almost awed Fanny. She sunk down again in her chair, and suffered the old woman to caress and weep over her hand for some moments, in a silence that concealed the darkest and most agitated feelings Fanny's life had hitherto known. At length she said,

"Why may he not marry me if he loves me! He is not my brother, indeed he is not! I'd never call him so again."

"He cannot marry you," said Sarah, resolved, with a sort of rude nobleness, to persevere in what she felt to be a duty; "I don't say anything about money, because that does not always signify. But he cannot marry you, because—because people who are dedicated one way never marry those who are dedicated and brought up in another. A gentleman of that kind requires a wife to know—oh—to know ever so much; and you—"

"Sarah," interrupted Fanny, rising again, but this time with a smile on her face, "don't say anything more about it; I forgive you, if you promise never to speak unkindly of him again—never—never—never, Sarah!"

"But I may just tell him that—that—"

"That what?"

"That you are so young and innocent, and so protector like; and that, if you were to love him, it would be a shame in him—that it would!"

And then (oh! no, Fanny, there was nothing clouded now in your reason!)—and then the woman's alarm, the modesty, the instinct, the terror, came upon her.

"Never! never! I will not love him—I do not love him, indeed, Sarah. If you speak to him, I will never look you in the face again. It is all past—all, dear Sarah!"

She kissed the old woman; and Sarah, fancying that her sagacity and counsel had prevailed, promised all she was asked; so they went up stairs together—friends.

CHAPTER VIII.

"As the wind
Sole, an uncertain sweetness comes from out
The orange trees.

Rise up, Olympia. She sleeps soundly. Ho!
Stirring at last! —BARRY CORNWALL.

The next day Fanny was seen by Sarah counting the little hoard that she had so long and so painfully saved for her benefactor's tomb. The money was no longer wanted for that object—Fanny had found another; she said nothing to Sarah or to Simon. But there was a strange, complacent smile upon her lip as she busied herself in her work that puzzled the old woman. Late at noon came the postman's unwonted knock at the door. A letter! a letter for Miss Fanny. A letter! the first she had ever received in her life. And it was from him! and it began with "Dear Fanny." Vaudemont had called her "dear Fanny" a hundred times, and the expression had become a matter of course. But "Dear Fanny" seemed so very different when it was written. The letter could not well be shorter, nor, all things considered, colder. But the girl found no fault with it. It began with "Dear Fanny," and it ended with "Yours truly." "Yours truly—mine truly—and how kind to write at all!" Now it so happened that Vaudemont, having never merged the art of the penman into that rapid scrawl into which people who are compelled to write hurriedly and constantly degenerate, wrote a remarkably good hand—bold, clear, symmetrical—almost too good a hand for one who was not to make money by caligraphy. And, after Fanny had got the words by heart, she stole gently to a cupboard, and took forth some specimens of her own hand, in the shape of house and work memoranda, and extracts which, the better to help her memory, she had made from the poem book Vaudemont had given her. She gravely laid his letter by the side of these specimens, and blushed at the contrast: yet, after all, her own writing, though trembling and irresolute was far from a bad or vulgar hand. But emulation was now fairly roused within her. Vaudemont, preoccupied by more engrossing thoughts, and, indeed, forgetting a danger which had seemed so thoroughly to have passed away, did not, in his letter, caution Fanny against going out alone. She remarked this; and, having completely recovered her own alarm at the attempt that had been made on her liberty, she thought she was now released from her promise to guard against a past and imaginary peril. So after dinner she slipped out alone, and went to the mistress of the school where she had received her elementary education. She had ever since continued her acquaintance with that lady, who, kind-hearted, and touched by her situation, often employed her industry, and was far from blind to the improvement that had for some time been silently working in the mind of her old pupil.

Fanny had a long conversation with this lady, and she brought back a bundle of books. The light might have been seen that night, and many nights after, burning long and late from her little window. And, having recovered her old freedom of habits, which Simon, poor man, did not notice, and which Sarah, thinking that anything was better than moping at home, did not remonstrate against, Fanny went out regularly for two hours, or sometimes for even a longer period, every evening, after old Simon had composed himself to the nap that filled up the interval between dinner and tea.

In a very short time—a time that, with ordinary stimulants, would have seemed marvellously short—Fanny's handwriting was not the same thing; her manner of talking became different; she no longer called herself "Fanny" when she spoke; the music of her voice was not quiet and settled; her sweet expression of face was more thoughtful; the eyes seemed to have deepened in their very colour; she was no longer heard chanting to herself as she tripped along. The books that she nightly fed on had passed into her mind; the poetry that had ever unconsciously sported round her young years began now to create poetry in herself. Nay, it might almost have seemed as if that restless disorder of the intellect, which the dullards had called Idiotcy, had been the wild efforts, not of Folly, but of GENIUS seeking to find its path and outlet from the cold and dreary solitude to which the circumstances of her early life had compelled it.

Days, even weeks passed: she never spoke of Vaudemont. And once, when Sarah, astonished and bewildered by the change in her young mistress, asked,

"When does the gentleman come back?"

Fanny answered, with a mysterious smile, "Not yet, I hope—not quite yet."

CHAPTER IX.

"Thi. I do begin
To feel an alteration in my nature,
And in his full-smiled confidence a shower
Of gentle rain, that, falling on the fire,
Hath quenched it.

How is my heart divided Between the duty of a son and love!"
BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER: Thierry and Theodoret.

Vaudemont had now been a month at Beaufort Court. The scene of a country house, with the sports that enliven it and the accomplishments it calls forth, was one in which he was well fitted to shine. He had been an excellent shot as a boy; and, though long unused to the fowling-piece, had in India acquired a deadly precision with the rifle; so that a very few days of practice in the stubbles and covers of Beaufort Court made his skill the theme of the guests and the admiration of the keepers. Hunting began, and—this pursuit, always so strong a passion in the active man, and which, to the turbulence and agitation of his half-tamed breast, now excited by a kind of frenzy of hope and fear, gave a vent and release—was a sport in which he was yet more fitted to excel. His horsemanship, his daring, the stone walls he leaped, and the floods through which he dashed, furnished his companions with wondering tale and comment on their return home. Mr. Marsden, who, with some other of Arthur's early friends, had been invited to Beaufort Court in order to welcome its expected heir, and who, retaining all the prudence which had distinguished him of yore, when, having ridden over old Simon, he dismounted to examine the knees of his horse—Mr. Marsden, a skilful huntsman, who rode the most experienced horses in the world, and who generally contrived to be in at the death, without having leaped over anything higher than a hurdle, suffering the bolder quadruped (in case what is called the "knowledge of the country"—that is, the knowledge of gaps and gates—failed him) to perform the more dangerous feats alone, as he quietly scrambled over, or scrambled through, upon foot, and remounted the well-taught animal when it halted after the exploit, safe and sound—Mr. Marsden declared that he never saw a rider with so little judgment as Monsieur Vaudemont, and that the devil was certainly in him.

This sort of reputation, common-place and merely physical as it was in itself, had a certain effect upon Camilla: it might be an effect of fear. I do not say, for I do not know, what her feelings towards Vaudemont exactly were. As the calmest natures are often those the most hurried away by their contraries, so perhaps he awed and dazzled rather than pleased her; at least, he certainly forced himself on her interest. Still she would have started in terror if any one had said to her, "Do you love your betrothed less than when you met by the happy lake?" and her heart would have indignantly rebuked the questioner. The letters of her lover were still long and frequent; hers were briefer and more subdued. But then there was constraint in the correspondence: it was submitted to her mother.

Whatever might be Vaudemont's manner to Camilla whenever occasion threw them alone together, he certainly did not make his attentions glaring enough to be remarked. His eye watched her rather than his lip addressed; he kept as much aloof as possible from the rest of her family, and his customary bearing was silent even to gloom. But there were moments when he indulged in a fitful exuberance of spirits, which had something strained and unnatural. He had outlived Lord Lilburne's short liking; for, since he had resolved no longer to keep watch on that noble gamester's method of play, he played but little himself; and Lord Lilburne saw that he had no chance of ruining him: there was, therefore, no longer any reason to like him. But this was not all: when Vaudemont had been at the house somewhat more than two weeks, Lilburne, petulant and impatient, whether at his refusals to join the card-table, or at the moderation with which, when he did, he confined his ill-luck to petty losses, one day hobbled up to him as he stood at the embrasure of the window, gazing on the wide lands beyond, and said,

"Vaudemont, you are bolder in hunting, they tell me, than you are at whist."

"Honours don't tell against one—over a hedge!"

"What do you mean?" said Lilburne, rather haughtily.

Vaudemont was at that moment in one of those bitter moods when the sense of his situation—the sight of the usurper in his home—often swept away the gentler thoughts inspired by his fatal passion. And the tone of Lord Lilburne, and his loathing to the man, were too much for his temper.

"Lord Lilburne," he said, and his lips curled, "if you had been born poor, you would have made a great fortune: you play luckily!"

"How am I to take this, sir?"

"As you please," answered Vaudemont, calmly, but with an eye of fire. And he turned away.

Lilburne remained on the spot very thoughtful. "Hum! he suspects me. I cannot quarrel on such ground—the suspicion itself dishonours me—I must seek another."

The next day, Lilburne, who was familiar with Mr. Marsden (though the latter gentleman never played at the same table), asked that prudent person, after breakfast, if he happened to have his pistols with him.

"Yes; I always take them into the country; one may as well practise when one has the opportunity. Besides, sportsmen are often quarrelsome; and if it is known that one shoots well, it keeps one out of quarrels!"

"Very true," said Lilburne, rather admiringly; "I have made the same remark myself when I was younger. I have not shot with a pistol for some years. I am well enough now to walk out with the help of a stick. Suppose we practise for half an hour or so."

"With all my heart," said Mr. Marsden.

The pistols were brought, and they strolled forth; Lord Lilburne found his hand out.

"As I never hunt now," said the peer, and he gnashed his teeth and glanced at his maimed limb; "(for, though lameness would not prevent my keeping my seat, violent exercise hurts my leg; and Brodie says any fresh accident might bring on tic douloureux), and as my gout does not permit me to join the shooting parties, it would be a kindness in you to lend me your pistols—it would while away an hour or so—though, thank heaven, my duelling days are over!”

“Certainly,” said Mr. Marsden; and the pistols were consigned to Lord Lilburne.

Four days from that date, as Mr. Marsden, Vaudemont, and some other gentlemen, were making for the covers, they came upon Lord Lilburne, who, in a part of the park not in sight or sound of the house, was amusing himself with Mr. Marsden's pistols, which Dykeman was at hand to load for him. He turned round, not at all disconcerted by the interruption.

“You have no idea how I've improved, Marsden; just see!” and he pointed to a glove nailed to a tree. “I've hit that mark twice in five times; and every time I have gone straight enough along the line to have killed my man.”

“Ay, the mark itself does not so much signify,” said Mr. Marsden; “at least, not in actual duelling; the great thing is to be in the line.”

While he spoke, Lord Lilburne's ball went a third time through the glove. His cold bright eye turned on Vaudemont as he said, with a smile,

“They tell me you shoot well with a fowling-piece, my dear Vaudemont—are you equally adroit with the pistol?”

“You may see, if you like; but you take aim, Lord Lilburne; that would be of no use in English duelling. Permit me.”

He walked to the glove, and tore from it one of the fingers, which he fastened separately to the tree, took the pistol from Dykeman as he walked past him, gained the spot whence to fire, turned at once round, without apparent aim, and the finger fell to the ground.

Lilburne stood aghast.

“That's wonderful!” said Marsden, “quite wonderful. Where the devil did you get such a knack? for it's only knack, after all!”

“I lived for many years in a country where the practice was constant—where all that belongs to rifle-shooting was a necessary accomplishment: a country in which man had often to contend against the wild beast. In civilised states, man himself supplies the place of the wild beast—but we don't hunt him! Lord Lilburne” (and this was added with a smiling and disdainful whisper), “you must practise a little more.”

But, disregarding the advice, from that day Lord Lilburne's morning occupation was gone. He thought no more of a duel with Vaudemont. As soon as the sportsmen had left him, he bade Dykeman take up the pistols, and walked straight home into the library, where Robert Beaufort, who was no sportsman, generally spent his mornings.

He flung himself down on an armchair, and said, as he stirred the fire with unusual vehemence.

“Beaufort, I'm very sorry I asked you to invite Vaudemont. He's a very ill-bred, disagreeable fellow!”

Beaufort threw down his steward's account-book on which he was employed, and replied, “Lilburne, I have never had an easy moment since that man has been in the house. As he was your guest, I did not like to speak before; but don't you observe—you must observe—how like he is to the old family portraits? The more I have examined him, the more another resemblance grows upon me. In a word,” said Robert, pausing and breathing hard, “if his name were not Vaudemont—if his history were not, apparently, so well known, I should say—I should swear that it is Philip Morton who sleeps under this roof!”

“Ha!” said Lilburne, with an earnestness that surprised Beaufort, who expected to have heard his brother-in-law's sneering sarcasm at his fears, “the likeness you speak of to the old portraits did strike me; it struck Marsden, too, the other day, as we were passing through the picture-gallery; and Marsden remarked it aloud to Vaudemont. I remember now that he changed countenance, and made no answer. Hush! hush! hold your tongue; let me think—let me think. This Philip—yes—yes—I and Arthur saw him with—with—Gawtreys—in Paris—”

“Gawtreys! Was that the name of the rogue he was said to—”

“Yes—yes—yes. Ah! now I guess the meaning of those looks—those words,” muttered Lilburne, between his teeth. “This pretension to the name of Vaudemont was always apocryphal—the story always but half believed—the invention of a woman in love with him. The claim on your property is made at the very time he appears in England. Ha! have you a newspaper there? Give it me. No! it's not in this paper. Ring the bell for the file!”

“Why! have you not seen an advertisement repeated several times within the last month?”

“I never read advertisements, except in the county paper, if land is to be sold.”

“Nor I often; but this caught my eye. John (here the servant entered), bring the file of the newspapers. The name of the witness whom Mrs. Morton appealed to was Smith, the same name as the captain: what was the Christian name?”

“I don't remember.”

“Here are the papers—shut the door—and here is the advertisement: ‘If Mr. William Smith, son of Jeremiah Smith, who formerly rented the farm of Shipdale-Bury, under the late Right Hon. Charles Leopold Beaufort (that's your uncle), and who emigrated in the year 18— to Australia, will apply to Mr. Barlow, Solicitor, Essex street, Strand, he will hear of something to his advantage.’”

“Good heavens! why did you not mention this to me before?”

“Because I did not think it of any importance. In the first place, there might be some legacy left to the man, quite distinct from your business. Indeed, that was the probable supposition: or, even if connected with the claim, such an advertisement might be but a despicable attempt to frighten you. Never mind—don't look so pale—after all, this is a proof that the witness is not found; that Captain Smith is neither the Smith, nor has discovered where the Smith is?”

“True!” observed Mr. Beaufort: “true—very true!”

“Humph!” said Lord Lilburne, who was still rapidly glancing over the file, “here is another advertisement which I never saw before: this looks suspicious. ‘If the person who called, on the — of September, on Mr. Morton, linen draper, &c., of N—, will renew his application personally or by letter, he may now obtain the information he sought for.’”

“Morton! the woman's brother! their uncle! it is too clear!”

“But what brings this man—if he be really Philip Morton, what brings him here?—to spy or to threaten?”

“I will get him out of the house this day.”

“No—no; turn the watch upon himself. I see, now; he is attracted by your daughter; sound her quietly; don't tell her to discourage his confidences; find out if he ever speaks of these Mortons. Ha! I recollect—he has spoken to me of the Mortons, but vaguely—I forget what. Humph! this is a man of spirit and daring; watch him, I say—watch him! When does Arthur come back?”

“He has been traveling so slowly, for he still complains of his health, and has had relapses; but he ought to be in Paris this week; perhaps he is there now. Good heavens! he must not meet this man!”

“Do what I tell you! Get out all from your daughter. Never fear: he can do nothing against you except by law. But if he really like Camilla—”

“He! Philip Morton—the adventurer—the—”

“He is the eldest son; remember, you thought even of accepting the second. He may find the witness—he may win his suit; if he like Camilla, there may be a compromise.”

Mr. Beaufort felt as if turned to ice.

“You think him likely to win this infamous suit, then?” he faltered.

“Did you not guard against the possibility by securing the brother? More worth while to do it with this man. Hark ye! the politics of private are like those of public life: when the state cannot crush a demagogue, it should entice him over. If you can ruin this dog” (and Lilburne stamped his foot fiercely, forgetful of the gout), “ruin him! hang him! If you can't” (and here, with a wry face, he caressed the injured foot), “if you can't ('sdeath, what a twinge!), and he can ruin you, bring him into the family, and make his secrets ours! I must go and lie down—I have over-excited myself.”

In great perplexity Beaufort repaired at once to Camilla. His nervous agitation betrayed itself, though he smiled a ghastly smile, and intended to be exceedingly cool and collected. His questions, which confused and alarmed her, soon drew out the fact, that the very first time Vaudemont had been introduced to her, he had spoken of the Mortons; and that he had often afterward alluded to the subject, and seemed at first strongly impressed with the notion that the younger brother was under Beaufort's protection, though at last he appeared reluctantly convinced of the contrary. Robert, however agitated, preserved at least enough of his natural slyness not to let out that he suspected Vaudemont to be Philip Morton himself, for he feared lest his daughter should betray that suspicion to its object.

“But,” said he, with a look meant to win confidence, “I dare say he knows these young men. I should like to know myself more about them. Learn all you can, and tell me; and, I say—I say, Camilla—he! he! he!—you have made a conquest, you little flirt you! Did he, this Vaudemont, ever say how much he admired you?”

“He! Never!” said Camilla, blushing, and then turning pale.

“But he looks it. Ah! you say nothing, then. Well, well, don't discourage him—that is to say—yes, don't discourage him. Talk to him as much as you can; ask him about his own early life. I've a particular wish to know—it's of great importance to me.”

“But my dear father,” said Camilla, trembling, and thoroughly bewildered, "I fear this man—I fear—I fear—"

"Was she going to add, 'I fear myself?'" I know not; but she stopped short, and burst into tears.

"Hang these girls!" muttered Mr. Beaufort, "always crying when they ought to be of use to one. Go down—dry your eyes—do as I tell you—get all you can from him. Fear him! Yes, I dare say she does!" muttered the poor man, as he closed the door.

From that time, what wonder that Camilla's manner to Vaudemont was yet more embarrassed than ever? what wonder that he put his own heart's interpretation on that confusion? Beaufort took care to thrust her more often than before in his way; he suddenly affected a creeping, fawning civility to Vaudemont; he was sure he was fond of music: what did he think of that new air Camilla was so fond of? He must be a judge of scenery, he who had seen so much: there were beautiful landscapes in the neighbourhood, and, if he would forego his sports, Camilla drew prettily, had an eye for that sort of thing, and was so fond of riding.

Vaudemont was astonished at this change, but his delight was greater than the astonishment. He began to perceive that his identity was suspected: perhaps Beaufort, more generous than he had deemed him, meant to repay every early wrong or harshness by that one inestimable blessing. The generous interpret motives in extremes, ever too enthusiastic or too severe. Vaudemont felt as if he had wronged the wronger; he began to conquer even his dislike to Robert Beaufort. For some days he was thus thrown much with Camilla: the questions her father forced her to put to him, uttered tremulously and fearfully, seemed to him proofs of her interest in his fate. His feelings to Camilla, so sudden in their growth, so ripened and so favoured by the sub-ruler of the world—CIRCUMSTANCE—might not, perhaps, have the depth and the calm completeness of that one true love, of which there are many counterfeits, and which, in man at least, possibly requires the touch and mellowness, if not of time, at least of many memories—of perfect and tried conviction of the faith, the worth, the value, and the beauty of the heart to which it clings; but those feelings were nevertheless strong, ardent, and intense. He believed himself beloved, he was in Elysium. But he did not yet declare the passion that beamed in his eyes. No! he would not yet claim the hand of Camilla Beaufort, for he imagined the time would soon come when he could claim it, not as the inferior or the suppliant, but as the lord of her father's fate.

CHAPTER X.

"Here's something got among us!"—Knight of Malta.

Two or three nights after his memorable conversation with Robert Beaufort, as Lord Lilburne was undressing he said to his valet,

"Dykeman, I am getting well."

"Indeed, my lord, I never saw your lordship look better."

"There you lie. I looked better last year—I looked better the year before—and I looked better and better every year back to the age of twenty-one! But I'm not talking of looks—no man with money wants looks—I am talking of feelings. I feel better. The gout is almost gone. I have been quiet now for a month; that's a long time—time wasted when, at my age, I have so little time to waste. Besides, as you know, I am very much in love!"

"In love, my lord? I thought that you told me never to speak of—"

"Blockhead! what the deuce was the good of speaking about it when I was wrapped in flannels? I am never in love when I am ill—who is? I am well now, or nearly so; and I've had things to vex me—things to make this place very disagreeable; I shall go to town, and before this day week I shall have that pretty little girl to enliven the solitude of Fernside. I shall look to it myself now. I see you're going to say something: spare yourself the trouble! Nothing ever goes wrong if I myself take it in hand."

The next day Lord Lilburne, who, in truth, felt himself uncomfortable and gene in the presence of Vaudemont, who had won as much as the guests at Beaufort Court seemed inclined to lose, and who made it the rule of his life to consult his own pleasure and amusement before anything else, sent for his post-horses, and informed his brother-in-law of his departure.

"And you leave me alone with this man just when I am convinced that he is the person we suspected! My dear Lilburne, do stay till he goes."

"Impossible! I am between fifty and sixty: every moment is precious at that time of life. Besides, I've said all I can say; rest quiet—act on the defensive—entangle this cursed Vaudemont, or Morton, or whoever he be, in the mesh of your daughter's charms, and then get rid of him, not before. This can do no harm, let the matter turn out how it will. Read the papers, and send for Blackwell if you want advice on any new advertisements. I don't see that anything more is to be done at present. You can write to me: I shall be at Park Lane or Fernside. Take care of yourself. You're a lucky fellow—you never have the gout! Good-bye!"

And in half an hour Lord Lilburne was on the road to London.

The departure of Lilburne was a signal to many others, especially and naturally to those he himself had invited. He had not announced to such visitors his intention of going till his carriage was at the door. This might be delicacy or carelessness, just as people chose to take it: and how they did take it, Lord Lilburne, much too selfish to be well-bred, did not care a rush. The next day, half at least of the guests were gone; and even Mr. Marsden, who had been specially invited on Arthur's account, announced that he should go after dinner: he always travelled by night—he slept well on the road—a day was not lost by it.

"And it is so long since you saw Arthur!" said Mr. Beaufort, in remonstrance, "and I expect him every day."

"Very sorry—best fellow in the world—but the fact is, that I am not very well myself. I want a little sea air; I shall go to Dover or Brighton. But I suppose you will have the house full again about Christmas; in that case, I shall be delighted to repeat my visit."

The fact was, that Mr. Marsden, without Lilburne's intellect on the one hand, or vices on the other, was, like that noble sensualist, one of the broken pieces of the great looking glass "SELF." He was noticed in society as always haunting the places where Lilburne played at cards, carefully choosing some other table, and as carefully betting upon Lilburne's side. The card-tables were now broken up; Vaudemont's superiority in shooting, and the manner in which he engrossed the talk of the sportsmen, displeased him. He was bored—he wanted to be off—and off he went. Vaudemont felt that the time was come for him to depart too; but Robert Beaufort—who felt in his society the painful fascination of the bird with the boa—who hated to see him there, and dreaded to see him depart—who had not yet extracted all the confirmation of his persuasions that he required, for Vaudemont easily enough parried the artless questions of Camilla—pressed him to stay with so eager an hospitality, and made Camilla herself falter out against her will, and even against her remonstrances (she never before had dared to remonstrate with either father or mother), "Could not you stay a few days longer?" that Vaudemont was too contented to yield to his own inclinations; and so, for some little time longer, he continued to move before the eyes of Mr. Beaufort—stern, sinister, silent, mysterious—like one of the family pictures stepped down from its frame. Vaudemont wrote, however, to Fanny, to excuse his delay; and, anxious to hear from her as to her own and Simon's health, bade her direct her letter to his lodging in London (of which he gave her the address), whence, if he still continued to defer his departure, it would be forwarded to him. He did not do this, however, till he had been at Beaufort Court several days after Lilburne's departure, and till, in fact, two days before the eventful one which closed his visit.

The party, now greatly diminished, were at breakfast when the servant entered, as usual, with the letter-bag. Mr. Beaufort, who was always important and pompous in the small ceremonials of life, unlocked the precious deposite with slow dignity, drew forth the newspapers, which he threw on the table, and which the gentlemen of the party eagerly seized; then, diving out one by one, jerked first a letter to Camilla, next a letter to Vaudemont, and thirdly, seized a letter for himself.

"I beg that there may be no ceremony, Monsieur de Vaudemont. Pray excuse me, and follow my example: I see this letter is from my son;" and he broke the seal.

The letter ran thus:

"My Dear Father,—Almost as soon as you receive this, I shall be with you. Ill as I am, I can have no peace till I see and consult you. The most startling—the most painful intelligence has just been conveyed to me. It is like a dream! It is of a nature not to bear any but personal communication.

"Your affectionate son,

"ARTHUR BEAUFORT.

"Boulogne.

"P.S.—This will go by the same packet boat that I shall take myself, and can only reach you a few hours before I arrive."

Mr. Beaufort's trembling hand dropped the letter; he grasped the elbow of the chair to save him from falling. It was clear the same visitor who had persecuted himself had now sought his son. He grew sick; his son might have heard the witness—might be convinced. His son himself now appeared to him as a foe; for the father dreaded the son's honour! He glanced furtively round the table, till his eye rested on Vaudemont, and his terror was redoubled, for Vaudemont's face, usually so calm, was animated to an extraordinary degree as he now lifted it from the letter he had just read. Their eyes met. Robert Beaufort looked on him as a prisoner at the bar looks on the accusing counsel when he first commences his harangue.

"Mr. Beaufort," said the guest, "the letter you have given me summons me to London on important business, and immediately. Suffer me to send for horses at your earliest convenience."

"What's the matter?" said the feeble and seldom heard voice of Mrs. Beaufort. "What's the matter, Robert? Is Arthur coming?"

"He comes to-day," said the father, with a deep sigh; and Vaudemont, at that moment rising from his half-finished breakfast, with a bow that included the group, and with a glance that lingered on Camilla as she bent over her own unopened letter (a letter from Winandermere, the seal of which she dared not yet break), quitted the room. He hastened to his own chamber, and strode to and fro with a stately step—the step of the master; then taking forth the letter, he again hurried over its contents. They ran thus:

"Dear Sir,—At last the missing witness has applied to me. He proves to be, as you conjectured, the same person who called on Mr. Roger Morton; but, as there are some circumstances on which I wish to take your instructions without a moment's delay, I shall leave London by the mail, and wait you at D— (at the principal inn), which is, I understand, twenty miles on the high road from Beaufort Court.

"I have the honour to be, sir, yours, &c.,

"JOHN BARLOW.

"Essex street."

Vaudemont was yet lost in the emotions that this letter aroused, when they came to announce that his chaise was arrived. As he went down the stairs he met Camilla, who was on the way to her own room.

"Miss Beaufort," said he, in a low and tremulous voice, "in wishing you farewell I may not now say more. I leave you, and, strange to say, I do not regret it, for I go upon an errand that may entitle me to return again, and speak those thoughts which are uppermost in my soul even at this moment."

He raised her hand to his lips as he spoke, and at that moment Mr. Beaufort looked from the door of his own room, and cried "Camilla." She was too glad to escape. Philip gazed after her light form for an instant, and then hurried down the stairs.

CHAPTER XI.

"Longueville. What! are you married, Beaufort?"

Beaufort. Ay, as fast
As words, and hands, and hearts, and priest
Could make us."

BEAUFORT AND FLETCHER: Noble Gentleman.

In the parlour of the inn at D— sat Mr. John Barlow. He had just finished his breakfast, and was writing letters and looking over papers connected with his various business, between the intervals in his progress through a pint of sherry, when the door was thrown open, and a gentleman entered abruptly.

"Mr. Beaufort," said the lawyer, rising, "Mr. Philip Beaufort—for such I now feel you are by right, though," he added, with his usual formal and quiet smile, "not yet by law; and much, very much, remains to be done to make the law and the right the same—I congratulate you on having something at last to work on. I had begun to despair of finding up our witness after a month's advertising, and had commenced other investigations, of which I will speak to you presently, when yesterday, on my return to town from an errand on your business, I had the pleasure of a visit from William Smith himself. My dear sir, do not yet be too sanguine. It seems that this poor fellow, having known misfortune, was in America when the first fruitless inquiries were made. Long after this he returned to the colony, and there met with a brother, who, as I drew from him, was a convict. He helped the brother to escape. They both came to England. William learned from a distant relation, who lent him some little money, of the inquiry that had been set on foot for him; consulted his brother, who desired him to leave all to his management. The brother afterward assured him that you and Mr. Sidney were both dead; and it seems (for the witness is simple enough to allow me to extort all) he then went to Mr. Beaufort, to hold out the threat of a lawsuit, and to offer the sale of the evidence yet existing—"

"And Mr. Beaufort—"

"I am happy to say, seems to have spurned the offer. Meanwhile William, incredulous of his brother's report, proceeded to N—, learned nothing from Mr. Morton, met his brother again, and the brother (confessing that he had deceived him in the assertion that you and your brother were dead) told him that he had known you in earlier life, and set out to Paris to seek you—"

"Known me? To Paris?"

"More of this presently, William returned to town, living hardly and penuriously on the little his brother bestowed on him, too melancholy and too poor for the luxury of a newspaper, and never saw our advertisement, till, as luck would have it, his money was out; he had heard nothing farther of his brother, and he went for new assistance to the same relation who had before aided him. This relation to his surprise, received the poor man very kindly, lent him what he wanted, and then asked him if he had not seen our advertisement. The newspaper shown him contained both the advertisements; that relating to Mr. Morton's visitor, that containing his own name. He coupled them both together, and called on me at once. I was from town on your business. He returned to his own home. The next morning (yesterday morning) came a letter from his brother, which I obtained from him at last, and with promises that no harm should happen to the writer on account of it."

Vaudemont took the letter and read as follows:

"Dear William,—No go about the youngster I went after: all researches in vane. Paris devilish expensive. Never mind, I have sene the other—the young B—; different sort of fellow from his father—very ill—frightened out of his wits—will go off to the governor—take me with him as far as Bullone. I think we shall settel it now. Mind, as I saide before, don't put your foot in it. I send you a Nap in the sele—all I can spare.

"Yours,

"JEREMIAH SMITH.

"Direct to me, Monsieur Smith—always a safe name—Ship Inn, Bullone."

"Jeremiah—Smith—Jeremiah!"

"Do you know the name, then?" said Mr. Barlow. "Well, the poor man owns that he was frightened at his brother—that he wished to do what is right—that he feared his brother would not let him—that your father was very kind to him—and so he came off at once to me, and I was very luckily at home to assure him that the heir was alive and prepared to assert his rights. Now, then, Mr. Beaufort, we have the witness, but will that suffice us? I fear not. Will the jury believe him with no other testimony at his back? Consider! When he was gone, I put myself in communication with some officers at Bow-street about this brother of his: a most notorious character, commonly called in the police slang Dashing Jerry—"

"Ah! Well, proceed!"

"Your one witness, then, is a very poor, peniless man; his brother a rogue, a convict: this witness, too, is the most timid, fluctuating, irresolute fellow I ever saw: I should tremble for his testimony against a sharp, bullying lawyer. And that, sir, is all at present we have to look to."

"I see—I see. It is dangerous, it is hazardous. But truth is truth; justice—justice! I will run the risk."

"Pardon me if I ask, Did you ever know this brother? Were you ever absolutely acquainted with him? in the same house?"

"Many years since—years of early hardship and trial—I was acquainted with him: what then?"

"I am sorry to hear it;" and the lawyer looked grave. "Do you not see that if this witness is browbeat—is disbelieved, and if it can be shown that you, the claimant, was—forgive my saying it—intimate with a brother of such a character, why, the whole thing might be made to look like perjury and conspiracy. If we stop here, it is an ugly business!"

"And is this all you have to say to me? The witness is found—the only surviving witness—the only proof I ever shall or ever can obtain, and you seek to terrify me—me, too—from using the means for redress Providence itself vouchsafes me. Sir, I will not hear you!"

"Mr. Beaufort, you are impatient: it is natural. But if we go to law—that is, should I have anything to do with it, wait—wait till your case is good. And hear me yet. This is not the only proof—this is not the only witness: you forget that there was an examined copy of the register; we may yet find that copy, and the person who copied it may yet be alive to attest it. Occupied with this thought, and weary of waiting the result of our advertisement, I resolved to go into the neighbourhood of Fernside. Luckily, there was a gentleman's seat to be sold in the village. I made the survey of this place my apparent business. After going over the house, I appeared anxious to see how far some alterations could be made—alterations to render it more like Lord Lilburne's villa. This led me to request a sight of that villa: a crown to the housekeeper got me admittance. The housekeeper had lived with your father, and been retained by his lordship. I soon, therefore, knew which were the rooms the late Mr. Beaufort had principally occupied; shown into his study, where it was probable he would keep his papers; I inquired if it were the same furniture (which seemed likely enough, from its age and fashion) as in your father's time: it was so; Lord Lilburne had bought the house just as it stood, and, save a few additions in the drawing-room, the general equipment of the villa remained unaltered. You look impatient! I'm coming to the point. My eye fell upon an old-fashioned bureau—"

"But we searched every drawer in that bureau!"

"Any secret drawers?"

"Secret drawers! No! there were no secret drawers that I ever heard of!"

Mr. Barlow rubbed his hands, and finished his pint before he proceeded:

"I was struck with that bureau, for my father had had one like it. It is not English—it is of Dutch manufacture."

"Yes, I have heard that my father bought it at a sale three or four years after his marriage."

"I heard this from the housekeeper, who was flattered by my admiring it. I could not find out from her at what sale it had been purchased, but it was in the neighbourhood, she was sure. I had now a date to go upon; I learned, by careful inquiries, what sales near Fernside had taken place in a certain year. A gentleman had died at that date whose furniture was sold by auction. With great difficulty, I found that his widow was still alive, living far up the country: I paid her a visit; and, not to fatigue you with too long an account, I have only to say that she not only assured me that she perfectly remembered the bureau, but that it had secret drawers and wells very curiously contrived; nay, she showed me the very catalogue in which the said receptacles are noticed in capitals, to arrest the eye of the bidder, and increase the price of the bidding. That your father should never have revealed where he stowed this document is natural enough during the life of his uncle; his own life was not spared long enough to give him much opportunity to explain afterward; and I feel perfectly persuaded in my own mind, that, unless Mr. Robert Beaufort discovered that paper among the others he examined, in one of those drawers will be found all we want to substantiate your claims. This is the more likely from your father never mentioning, even to your mother, apparently, the secret receptacles in the bureau. Why else such mystery? The probability is, that he received the document either just before or at the time he purchased the bureau, or that he bought it for that very purpose; and, having once deposited the paper in a place he deemed secure from curiosity—accident, carelessness, policy, perhaps rather shame itself (pardon me) for the doubt of your mother's discretion that his secrecy seemed to imply, kept him from ever alluding to the circumstance, even when the intimacy of after years made him more assured of your mother's self-sacrificing devotion to his interests. At his uncle's death he thought to repair all!"

"And how, if that be true—if that Heaven which has delivered me hitherto from so many dangers, has, in the very secrecy of my poor father, saved my birthright from the gripe of the usurper—how, I say, is—"

"The bureau to pass into our possession? That is the difficulty. But we must contrive it somehow, if all else fail us; meanwhile, as I now feel sure that there has been a copy of that register made, I wish to know whether I should not immediately cross the country into Wales, and see if I can find any person in the neighbourhood of A who did examine the copy taken; for, mark you, the said copy is only of importance as leading us to the testimony of the actual witness who took it."

"Sir," said Vaudemont, heartily shaking Mr. Barlow by the hand, "forgive my first petulance. I see in you the very man I desired and wanted; your acuteness surprises and encourages me. Go to Wales, and God speed you!"

"Very well! in five minutes I shall be off. Meanwhile, see the witness yourself; the sight of his benefactor's son will do more to keep him steady than anything else. There's his address, and take care not to give him money. And now I will order my chaise; the matter begins to look worth expense. Oh! I forgot to say that Monsieur Liancourt called on me yesterday about his own affairs. He wishes much to consult you. I told him you would probably be this evening in town, and he said he would wait you at your lodging."

"Yes; I will not lose a moment in going to London and visiting our witness. And he saw my mother at the altar! My poor mother!—ah, how could my father have doubted her!" and, as he spoke, he blushed for the first time with shame at that father's memory. He could not yet conceive that one so frank, one usually so bold and open, could for years have preserved from the woman who had sacrificed all to him, a secret to her so important! That was, in fact, the only blot on his father's honour: a foul and grave blot it was. Heavily had the punishment fallen on those whom the father had loved best. Alas! Philip had not yet learned what terrible corrupters are the hope and the fear of immense wealth—ay, even in men reputed the most honourable, if they have been reared and pampered in the belief that wealth is the arch blessing of life! Rightly considered, in Philip Beaufort's solitary meanness lay the vast moral of this world's darkest truth!

Mr. Barlow was gone. Philip was about to enter his own chaise, when a dormeuse and four drove up to the inn door to change horses. A young man was reclining at his length in the carriage, wrapped in cloaks, and with a ghastly paleness—the paleness of long and deep disease—upon his cheeks. He turned his dim eye with, perhaps, a glance of the sick man's envy on that strong and athletic form, majestic with health and vigour, as it stood beside the more humble vehicle. Philip did not, however, notice the new arrival; he sprang into the chaise, it rattled on, and thus, unconsciously, Arthur Beaufort and his cousin had again met! To which was now the Night—to which the Morning?

CHAPTER XII.

"Bakem. Let my men guard the walls Syana. And mine the temple."—The Island Princess.

While thus eventfully the days and the weeks had passed for Philip, no less eventfully, so far as the inner life is concerned, had they glided away for Fanny. She had feasted in quiet and delightful thought on the consciousness that she was improving—that she was growing worthier of him—that he would perceive it on his return. Her manner was more thoughtful, more collected—less childish, in short, than it had been. And yet, with all the stir and flutter of the aroused intellect, the charm of her strange innocence was not scared away. She rejoiced in the ancient liberty she had regained of going out and coming back when she pleased; and, as the weather was too cold ever to tempt Simon from his fireside, except, perhaps, for half an hour in the forenoon, so, the hours of dusk, when he least missed her, were those which she chiefly appropriated for stealing away to the good schoolmistress, and growing wiser and wiser every day in the ways of God and the learning of his creatures. The schoolmistress was not a brilliant woman; nor was it accomplishments of which Fanny stood in need, so much as the opening of her thoughts and mind by profitable books and rational conversation. Beautiful as were all her natural feelings, the schoolmistress had now little difficulty in educating feelings up to the dignity of principles.

At last, hitherto patient under the absence of one never absent from her heart, Fanny received from him the letter he had addressed to her two days before he quitted Beaufort Court; another letter—a second letter—a letter to excuse himself for not coming before—a letter that gave her an address, that asked for a reply. It was a morning of unequalled delight approaching to transport. And then the excitement of answering it—the pride of showing how she was improved—what an excellent hand she now wrote! She shut herself up in her room: she did not go out that day. She placed the paper before her, and, to her astonishment, all that she had to say vanished from her mind at once. How was she even to begin? She had always hitherto called him "Brother." Ever since her conversation with Sarah, she felt that she could not call him that name again for the world—no, never! But what should she call him, what could she call him? He signed himself "Philip." She knew that was his name. She thought it a musical name to utter, but to write it! No! some instinct she could not account for seemed to whisper that it was improper—presumptuous to call him "Dear Philip." Had Burns's songs—the songs that unthinkingly he had put into her hand, and told her to read—songs that comprise the most beautiful love-poems in the world—had they helped to teach her some of the secrets of her own heart? And had timidity come with knowledge? Who shall say, who guess what passed within her? Nor did Fanny herself, perhaps, know her own feelings: but write the words "Dear Philip" she could not. And the whole of that day, though she thought of nothing else, she could not even get through the first line to her satisfaction. The next morning she sat down again. It would be so unkind if she did not answer immediately: she must answer. She placed his letter before her—she resolutely began; but copy after copy was made and torn. And Simon wanted her—and Sarah wanted her—and there were bills to be paid; and dinner was over before her task was really begun. But after dinner she began in good earnest.

"How kind in you to write to me" (the difficulty of any name was dispensed with by adopting none), "and to wish to know about my dear grandfather! He is much the same, but hardly ever walks out now, and I have had a good deal of time to myself. I think something will surprise you, and make you smile, as you used to do at first, when you come back. You must not be angry with me that I have gone out by myself very often—every day, indeed. I have been so safe. Nobody has ever offered to be rude again to Fanny" (the word "Fanny" was here carefully scratched out with a penknife, and me substituted.) "But you shall know all when you come. And are you sure you are well; quite—quite well? Do you never have the headaches you complained of sometimes? Do say this! Do you walk out—every day? Is there any pretty charchyard near you now? Whom do you walk with?"

"I have been so happy in putting the flowers on the two graves. But I still give yours the prettiest, though the other is so dear to me. I feel sad when I come to the last, but not when I look at the one I have looked at so long. Oh, how good you were! But you don't like me to thank you."

"This is very stupid!" cried Fanny, suddenly throwing down her pen, "and I don't think I am improved at all;" and she half cried with vexation. Suddenly a bright idea crossed her. In the little parlour where the schoolmistress privately received her, she had seen among the books, and thought, at the time, how useful it might be to her if ever she had to write to Philip, a little volume entitled "The Complete Letter-writer." She knew by the title-page that it contained models for every description of letter: no doubt it would contain the precise thing that would suit the present occasion. She started up at the notion. She would go—she could be back to finish the letter (if she paid sixpence for it) before post-time. She put on her bonnet; left the letter, in her haste, open on the table; and, just looking into the parlour in her way to the street-door, to convince herself that Simon was asleep and the wire-guard was on the fire, she hurried to the kind schoolmistress.

One of the fogs that in the autumn gather sullenly over London and its suburbs covered the declining day with premature dimness. It grew darker and darker as she proceeded, but she reached the house in safety. She spent a quarter of an hour in timidly consulting her friend about all kind of letters except the identical one that she intended to write; and, having had it strongly impressed on her mind that, if the letter was to a gentleman at all genteel, she ought to begin "Dear Sir," and end with, "I have the honour to remain," and that he would be everlastingly offended if she did not in the address affix "Esquire" to his name (that was a great discovery,) she carried off the precious volume and quitted the house. There was a wall that, bounding the demesnes of the school, ran for some short distance into the main street. The increasing fog here faintly struggled against the glimmer of a single lamp at some little distance. Just in this spot her eye was caught by a dark object in the road, which she could scarcely perceive to be a carriage, when her hand was seized, and a voice said in her ear,

"Ah! you will not be so cruel to me, I hope, as you were to my messenger! I have come myself for you."

She turned in great alarm, but the darkness prevented her recognising the face of him who thus accosted her.

"Let me go!" she cried; "let me go!"

"Hush! hush! No—no! Come with me. You shall have a house—carriage—servants! You shall wear silk gowns and jewels! You shall be a great lady!"

As these various temptations succeeded in rapid course each new struggle of Fanny, a voice from the coach-box said, in a low tone,

"Take care, my lord, I see somebody coming—perhaps the policeman!"

Fanny heard the caution, and screamed for rescue.

"Is it so?" muttered the molester. And suddenly Fanny felt her voice checked, her head mantled, her light form lifted from the ground. She clung—she struggled: it was in vain. It was the affair of a moment: she felt herself borne into the carriage—the door closed—the stranger was by her side, and his voice said,

"Drive on, Dykeman. Fast! fast!"

Two or three minutes, which seemed to her terror as ages, elapsed, when the gag and the mantle were gently removed, and the same voice (she still could not see her companion) said, in a very mild tone,

"Do not alarm yourself; there is no cause—indeed there is not. I would not have adopted this plan had there been any other—any gentler one. But I could not call at your own house; I knew no other where to meet you. This was the only course left to me—indeed it was. I made myself acquainted with your movements. Do not blame me, then, for prying into your footsteps. I watched for you all last night: you did not come out. I was in despair. At last I find you. Do not be so terrified: I will not even touch your hand if you do not wish it."

As he spoke, however, he attempted to touch it, and was repulsed with an energy that rather disconcerted him. The poor girl recoiled from him into the farthest corner of that prison in speechless horror—in the darkest confusion of ideas. She did not weep, she did not sob, but her trembling seemed to shake the very carriage. The man continued to address, to expostulate, to pray, to soothe. His manner was respectful: his protestations that he would not harm her for the world were endless.

"Only just see the home I can give you—for two days—for one day. Only just hear how rich I can make you and your grandfather, and, then, if you wish to leave me, you shall."

More—much more to this effect did he continue to pour forth, without extracting any sound from Fanny but gasps as for breath, and now and then a low murmur:

"Let me go—let me go! My grandfather—my blind grandfather!"

And finally tears came to her relief, and she sobbed with a passion that alarmed, and, perhaps, even touched her companion, cynical and icy as he was. Meanwhile the carriage seemed to fly. Fast as two horses, thorough-bred and almost at full speed, could go, they were whirled along, till about an hour, or even less, from the time in which she had been thus captured, the carriage stopped.

"Are we here already?" said the man, putting his head out of the window. "Do, then, as I told you. Not to the front door—to my study."

In two minutes more the carriage halted again before a building which looked white and ghost-like through the mist. The driver dismounted—opened with a latchkey a window door—entered for a moment to light the candles in a solitary room from a fire that blazed on the hearth—reappeared, and opened the carriage-door. It was with a difficulty for which they were scarcely prepared that they were enabled to get Fanny from the carriage. No soft words, no whispered prayers could draw her forth; and it was with no trifling address—for her companion sought to be as gentle as the force necessary to employ would allow—that he disengaged her hands from the window-frame—the lining—the cushions—to which they clung, and at last bore her into the house. The driver closed the window again as he retreated, and they were alone. Fanny then cast a wild, scarce conscious glance over the apartment. It was small and simply furnished. Opposite to her was an old-fashioned bureau, over which was the portrait of a female in the bloom of life; a face so fair, a brow so candid, an eye so pure, a lip so rich in youth and joy, that Fanny felt comforted—felt as if some living protectress were there as her gaze rested on the features. The walls were hung with prints of horses and hunts, and the draperies were of a gay and lively, but somewhat faded chints. The fire burned bright and merrily; a table, spread as for dinner, was drawn near it. To any other eye but hers the place would have seemed a picture of English comfort. At last her looks rested on her companion. He had thrown himself, with a long sigh, partly of fatigue, partly of satisfaction, on one of the chairs, and was contemplating her, as she thus stood and gazed, with an expression of mingled curiosity and admiration: she recognised at once her first, her only persecutor. She recoiled, and covered her face with her hands. The man approached her:

"Do not hate me, Fanny—do not turn away. Believe me, though I have acted thus violently, here all violence will cease. I love you, but I will not be satisfied till you love me in return. I am not young, and I am not handsome; but I am rich and great, and I can make those whom I love happy—so happy, Fanny!"

But Fanny had turned away, and was now busily employed in trying to reopen the door at which she had entered. Failing in this, she suddenly darted away, opened the inner door, and rushed into the passage with a loud cry. Her persecutor stifled an oath, and sprung after and arrested her. He now spoke sternly, and with a smile and a frown at once:

"This is folly; come back, or you will repent it! I have promised you, as a gentleman—as a nobleman, if you know what that is—to respect you. But neither will I myself be trifled with nor insulted. There must be no screams!"

His look and his voice awed Fanny in spite of her bewilderment and her loathing, and she suffered herself passively to be drawn into the room. He closed and bolted the door. She threw herself on the ground in one corner, and moaned low, but piteously. He looked at her musingly for some moments as he stood by the fire, and at last went to the door, opened it and called "Harriet" in a low voice. Presently a young woman of about thirty appeared, neatly but plainly dressed, and of a countenance that, if not very winning, might certainly be called very handsome. He drew her aside for a few moments, and a whispered conference was exchanged. He then walked gravely up to Fanny:

"My young friend," said he, "I see my presence is too much for you this evening. This young woman will attend you—will get you all you want. She can tell you, too, that I am not the terrible sort of person you seem to suppose. I shall see you to-morrow." So saying, he turned on his heel and walked out.

Fanny felt something like liberty—something like joy again. She rose, and looked so pleadingly, so earnestly, so intently into the woman's face, that Harriet turned away her bold eyes abashed; and at this moment Dykeman himself looked into the room.

"You are to bring us in dinner here yourself, uncle, and then go to my lord in the drawing-room."

Dykeman looked pleased, and vanished. Then Harriet came up and took Fanny's hand, and said kindly,

"Don't be frightened. I assure you, half the girls in London would give I don't know what to be in your place. My lord never will force you to do anything you don't like: it's not his way; and he's the kindest and best man, and so rich he does not know what to do with his money!"

To all this Fanny made but one answer; she threw herself suddenly upon the woman's breast, and sobbed out,

"My grandfather is blind—he cannot do without me—he will die—die. Have you nobody you love too? Let me go—let me out! What can they want with me? I never did harm to any one."

"And no one will harm you: I swear it!" said Harriet, earnestly. "I see you don't know my lord. But here's the dinner, come and take a bit of something, and a glass of wine. Now go, uncle; we don't want you."

Fanny could not touch anything except a glass of water, and that nearly choked her. But at last, as she recovered her senses, the absence of her tormentor—the presence of a woman—the solemn assurances of Harriet that, if she did not like to stay there after a day or two, she should go back, tranquillised her in some measure. She did not heed the artful and lengthened eulogiums that the she-tempter then proceeded to pour forth upon the virtues, and the love, and the generosity, and, above all, the money, of my lord. She only kept repeating to herself, "I shall go back in a day or two." At length Harriet, having ate and drank as much as she could by her single self, and growing wearied with efforts from which so little resulted, proposed to Fanny to retire to rest. She opened a door to the right of the fireplace, and lighted her up a winding staircase to a pretty and comfortable chamber, where she offered to help her to undress. Fanny's complete innocence, and her utter ignorance of the precise nature of the danger that awaited her, though she fancied it must be very great and very awful, prevented her quite comprehending all that Harriet meant to convey by her solemn assurances that she should not be disturbed. But she understood, at least, that she was not to see her hateful jailer till the next morning; and when Harriet, wishing her "good-night," showed her a bolt to the door, she was less terrified at the thought of being alone in that strange place. She listened till Harriet's footsteps had died away, and then, with a beating heart, tried to open the door: it was locked from without. She sighed heavily. The window? Alas! when she had removed the shutter, there was another one barred from without, which precluded all hope there; she had no help for it but to bolt her door, stand forlorn and amazed at her own condition, and, at last, falling on her knees to pray, in her own simple fashion, which, since her recent visits to the schoolmistress, had become more intelligent and earnest, to Him from whom no bolts and no bars can exclude the voice of the human heart.

CHAPTER XIII.

"In te omnis domus inclinata recumbit."—VIRGIL.

Lord Lilburne, seated before a tray in the drawing-room, was finishing his own solitary dinner, and Dykeman was standing close behind, nervous and agitated. The confidence of many years between the master and the servant—the peculiar mind of Lilburne, which excluded him from all friendship with his own equals—had established between the two the kind of intimacy so common with the noble and the valet of the old French régime: and, indeed, in much, Lilburne more resembled the men of that day and land than he did the nobler and statelier being that belongs to our own. But to the end of time, whatever is at once vicious, polished, and intellectual, will have a common likeness.

"But, my lord," said Dykeman, "just reflect.

This girl is so well known in the place, she will be sure to be missed; and if any violence is done to her, it's a capital crime, my lord—a capital crime. I know they can't hang a great lord like you, but all concerned in it may—"

"Dykeman," said he, "though you're an ass and a coward, and you don't deserve that I should be so condescending, I will relieve your fears at once. I know the law better than you can; for my whole life has been spent in doing exactly as I please, without ever putting myself in the power of LAW, which interferes with the pleasures of other men. You are right in saying violence would be a capital crime. Now, the difference between vice and crime is this: Vice is what parsons write sermons against, Crime is what we make laws against. I never committed a crime in all my life; at an age between fifty and sixty I am not going to begin. Vices are safe things—I may have my vices like other men—but crimes are dangerous things—illegal things—things to be carefully avoided. Look you" (and here the speaker, fixing his puzzled listener with his eye, broke into a grim of sublime mockery,) "let me suppose you to be the World—that cringing valet of valets the WORLD! I should say to you this: 'My dear World, you and I understand each other well; we are made for each other; I never come in your way, nor you in mine. If I get drunk every day in my own room, that's vice—you can't touch me; if I take an extra glass for the first time in my life, and knock down the watchman, that's a crime, which, if I am rich, costs me one pound—perhaps five pounds; if I am poor, sends me to the treadmill. If I break the hearts of five hundred old fathers, by buying with gold or flattery the embraces of five hundred young daughters, that's vice—your servant, Mr. World! If one termagant wench scratches my face, make a noise, and goes brazen-faced to the Old Bailey to swear to her shame, why, that's crime, and my friend, Mr. World, pulls a hemp-rope out of his pocket.' Now do you understand? Yes, I repeat," he added, with a change of voice, "I never committed a crime in my life; I have never even been accused of one; never had an action of crim. con.—of seduction, even, against me. I know how to manage such matters better. I was forced to carry off this girl, because I had no other means of courting her. To court her is all I mean to do now. I am perfectly aware that an action for violence, as you call it, would be the more disagreeable, because of the very weakness of intellect which the girl is said to possess, and of which report I don't believe a word. I shall most certainly avoid every the remotest appearance that could be so construed. It is for that reason that no one in the house shall attend the girl except yourself and your niece. Your niece I can depend on, I know: I have been kind to her; I have got her a good husband; I shall get her husband a good place; I shall be godfather to her first child. To be sure, the other servants will know there's a lady in the house, but to that they are accustomed: I don't set up for a Joseph. They need know no more unless you choose to blab it out. Well, then, supposing that at the end of a few days, more or less, without any rudeness on my part, a young woman, after seeing a few jewels, and fine dresses, and a pretty house, and being made very comfortable, and being convinced that her grandfather shall be taken care of without her slaving herself to death, chooses of her own accord to live with me, where's the crime, and who can interfere with it?"

"Certainly, my lord, that alters the case," said Dykeman, considerably relieved. "But still," he added, anxiously, "if the inquiry is made—if, before all this is settled, it is found out where she is?"

"Why, then, no harm will be done, no violence will be committed. Her grandfather—drivelling and a miser, you say—can be appeased by a little money, and it will be nobody's business, and no case can be made of it. Tush, man! I always look before I leap! People in this world are not so charitable as you suppose. What more natural than that a poor and pretty girl—not as wise as Queen Elizabeth—should be tempted to pay a visit to a rich lover! All they can say of the lover is, that he is a very gay man or a very bad man, and that's saying nothing new of me. But I don't think it will be found out. Just get me that stool: this has been a very troublesome piece of business—rather tired me—I am not so young as I was. Yes, Dykeman, something which that Frenchman Vaude-mont, or Vaut-rien, or whatever his name is, said to me once, has a certain degree of truth. I felt it in the last fit of the gout, when my pretty niece was smoothing my pillows. A nurse, as we grow older, may be of use to one. I wish to make this girl like me or be grateful to me. I am meditating a longer and more serious attachment than usual—a companion!"

"A companion, my lord, in that poor creature! so ignorant, so uneducated!"

"So much the better. This world palls upon me," said Lilburne, almost gloomily. "I grow sick of the miserable quackeries—of the piteous conceits that men, women, and children call 'knowledge.' I wish to catch a glimpse of nature before I die. This creature interests me, and that is something in this life. Clear those things away, and leave me."

"Ay!" muttered Lilburne, as he bent over the fire alone, "when I first heard that that girl was the grand-daughter of Simon Gawtreys—and, therefore, the child of the man whom I am to thank that I am a cripple—I felt as if love to her were a part of that hate which I owe to him; a segment in the circle of my vengeance. But now, poor child! I forget all this. I feel for her, not passion, but what I never felt before—affection. I feel that if I had such a child, I could understand what men mean when they talk of the tenderness of a father. I have not one impure thought for that girl—not one. But I would give thousands if she could love me. Strange! strange! in all this I do not recognise myself!"

Lord Lilburne retired to rest betimes that night; he slept sound; rose refreshed at an earlier hour than usual; and what he considered as a fit of vapours of the previous night was passed away. He looked with eagerness to an interview with Fanny. Proud of his intellect, pleased in any of those sinister exercises of it which the code and habits of his life so long permitted to him, he regarded the conquest of his fair adversary with the interest of a scientific game. Harriet went to Fanny's room to prepare her to receive her host; and Lord Lilburne now resolved to make his own visit the less unwelcome, by reserving for his especial gift some showy, if not valuable trinkets, which, for similar purposes, never failed the depositories of the villa he had purchased for his pleasures. He recollected that these gewgaws were placed in the bureau in the study; in which, as having a lock of foreign and intricate workmanship, he usually kept whatever might tempt cupidity in those frequent absences when the house was left guarded but by two women servants. Finding that Fanny had not yet quitted her own chamber, while Harriet went up to attend and reason with her, he himself limped into the study below, unlocked the bureau, and was searching in the drawers, when he heard the voice of Fanny above, raised a little, as if in remonstrance or entreaty, and he paused to listen. He could not, however, distinguish what was said; and, in the mean while, without attending much to what he was about, his hands were still employed in opening and shutting the drawers, passing through the pigeon-holes, and feeling for a topaz brooch, which he thought could not fail of pleasing the unsophisticated eyes of Fanny. One of the recesses was deeper than the rest; he thought the brooch was there; he stretched his hand into the recess; and, as the room was partially darkened by the lower shutters from without being still unclosed to prevent any attempted escape of his captive, he had only the sense of touch to depend on; not finding the brooch, he stretched on till he came to the extremity of the recess, and was suddenly sensible of a sharp pain; the flesh seemed caught, as in a trap; he drew back his finger with sudden force and a half-suppressed exclamation, and he perceived the bottom or floor of the pigeon-hole recede, as if sliding back. His curiosity was aroused; he again felt, warily and cautiously, and discovered a very slight inequality and roughness at the extremity of the recess. He was aware instantly that there was some secret spring; he pressed with some force on the spot, and he felt the board give way; he pushed it back towards him, and it slid suddenly with a whirring noise, and left a cavity below exposed to his sight. He peered in, and drew forth a paper; he opened it at first carelessly, for he was still trying to listen to Fanny. His eye ran rapidly over a few preliminary lines, till it rested on what follows:

"No. 83, page 21.

"Philip Beaufort, of this parish of A—, and Catharine Morton, of the parish of Botolph, Aldgate, London, were married in this church by banns, this 12th day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and —, by me.

CALEB PRICE, Vicar.

"This marriage was solemnised between us,
PHILIP BEAUFORT.
CATHARINE MORTON.

"In the presence of DAVID APFRECE.
WILLIAM SMITH.

"The above is a true copy, taken from the registry of marriages in A— parish, this 19th day of March, 18—, by me, MORGAN JONES, Curate of C—."

Lord Lilburne again cast his eye over the lines prefixed to this startling document, which, being those written, at Caleb's desire, by Mr. Jones to

Philip Beaufort, we need not here transcribe to the reader. At that instant Harriet descended the stairs and came into the room; she crept up on tiptoe to Lilburne, and whispered,

"She is coming down, I think; she does not know you are here."

"Very well—go," said Lord Lilburne. And scarce had Harriet left the room, when a carriage drove furiously to the door, and Robert Beaufort rushed into the study.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Gone, and none know it.

How now? What news what hopes and steps discovered?"
BEAUFORT AND FLUTCHER. The Pilgrim.

When Philip arrived at his lodgings in town it was very late, but he still found Liancourt waiting the chance of his arrival. The Frenchman was full of his own schemes and projects. He was a man of high repute and connections; negotiations for his recall to Paris had been entered into; he was divided between a Quixotic loyalty and a rational prudence; he brought his doubts to Vaudemont. Occupied as he was with thoughts of so important and personal a nature, Philip could yet listen patiently to his friend, and weigh with him the pros and cons. And, after having mutually agreed that loyalty and prudence would both be best consulted by waiting a little, to see if the nation, as the Carlists yet fondly trusted, would soon, after its first fever, offer once more the throne and the purple to the descendant of St. Louis, Liancourt, as he lighted his cigar to walk home, said, "A thousand thanks to you, my dear friend; and how have you enjoyed yourself in your visit? I am not surprised nor jealous that Lilburne did not invite me, as I do not play at cards, and as I have said some sharp things to him."

"I fancy I shall have the same disqualifications for another invitation," said Vaudemont, with a severe smile. "I may have much to disclose to you in a few days. At present my news is still unripe. And have you seen anything of Lilburne? He left us some days since. Is he in London?"

"Yes; I was riding with our friend Henri, who wished to try a new horse off the stones, a little way into the country yesterday. We went through  and H—. Pretty places, those. Do you know them?"

"Yes, I know H—."

"And just at dusk, as we were spurring back to town, whom should I see walking on the path of the high road but Lord Lilburne himself! I could hardly believe my eyes. I stopped, and, after asking him about you, I could not help expressing my surprise to see him on foot at such a place. You know the man's sneer. 'A Frenchman so gallant as Monsieur de Liancourt,' said he, 'need not be surprised at much greater miracles; the iron moves to the magnet: I have a little adventure here. Pardon me if I ask you to ride on.' Of course I wished him good-day; and, a little farther up the road, I saw a dark, plain chariot—no coronet—no arms—no footman—only the man on the box; but the beauty of the horses assured me it must belong to Lilburne. Can you conceive such absurdity in a man of that age—and a very clever fellow too? Yet how is it that one does not ridicule it in Lilburne as one would in another man between fifty and sixty?"

"Because one does not ridicule—one loathes him."

"No, that's not it. The fact is, that one can't fancy Lilburne old. His manner is young, his eye is young. I never saw any one with so much vitality. 'The bad heart and the good digestion:' the twin secrets for wearing well, eh?"

"Where did you meet him? not near H—?"

"Yes, close by. Why? Have you any adventure there too? Nay, forgive me, it was but a jest. Good-night!"

Vaudemont fell into an uneasy reverie; he could not divine exactly why he should be alarmed, but he was alarmed at Lilburne being in the neighbourhood of H—. It was the foot of the profane violating the sanctuary. An undefined thrill shot through him as his mind coupled together the associations of Lilburne and Fanny; but there was no ground for forebodings. Fanny did not stir out alone. An adventure, too—pooh! Lord Lilburne must be awaiting a willing and voluntary appointment, most probably from some one of the fair but decorous frailties in London. Lord Lilburne's more recent conquests were said to be among those of his own rank: suburbs are useless for such assignments. Any other thought was too horrible to be contemplated. He glanced to the clock; it was three in the morning. He would go to H— early—even before he sought out Mr. William Smith. With that resolution, and even his hardy frame worn out by the excitement of the day, he threw himself on his bed and fell asleep.

He did not wake till near nine; and had just dressed and hurried over his abstemious breakfast, when the servant of the house came to tell him that an old woman, apparently in great agitation, wished to see him. His head was still full of witnesses and lawsuits, and he was vaguely expecting some visitor connected with his primary objects, when Sarah broke into the room. She cast a hurried, suspicious look round her, and then, throwing herself on her knees to him, "Oh!" she cried, "if you have taken that poor young thing away, God forgive you. Let her come back again. It shall be all hushed up. Don't ruin her! don't! that's a dear, good gentleman!"

"Speak plainly, woman; what do you mean?" cried Philip, turning pale.

A very few words sufficed for explanation: Fanny's disappearance the previous night—the alarm of Sarah at her non-return—the apathy of old Simon, who did not comprehend what had happened, and quietly went to bed—the search Sarah had made during half the night—the intelligence she had picked up, that the policeman, going his rounds, had heard a female shriek near the school, but that all he could perceive through the mist was a carriage driving rapidly past him—Sarah's suspicions of Vaudemont confirmed in the morning, when, entering Fanny's room, she perceived the poor girl's unfinished letter with his own—the clew to his address that the letter gave her—all this, ere she well understood what she herself was talking about, his alarm seized, the reflection of a moment construed: the carriage—Lilburne seen lurking in the neighbourhood the previous day—the former attempt—all flashed on him with an intolerable glare. While Sarah was yet speaking, he rushed from the house—he flew to Lord Lilburne's, in Park Lane—he composed his manner—he inquired calmly. His lordship had slept from home; he was, they believed, at Fernside. Fernside!

WALDIE & CO. No. 43 CARPENTER STREET, PHILADELPHIA. $5 for 60 numbers, payable in advance.

June, 1683, the year after the above letter is dated, the Lady Russell came to her husband, who was sitting in the library. She was pale and agitated. "Forgive my breaking thus upon your studies," she said, in a hurried voice, and, having closed the door, he advanced to the writing-table at which her husband was sitting: placing her hand upon it as if to steady her trembling frame, she looked him in the face with an expression of anxious and tender inquiry—"Can you give a reason, dear husband, where your household and your wife give nought but agree surmises? There is a fellow pacing before the outer gate. He has been there this hour and more; and Watkins, and others of the servants, know him to be a messenger from the Council."

"The reason, my sweet anxious wife," replied Lord Russell, laying aside his pen and looking up with a quiet smile; "the reason seems to me one easily discovered if your words bear reference to all men, for, at this present time, all men seem to be suspected; but the reason I cannot so easily explain with reference to myself in particular. I cannot tell why I should be marked and singled out as an enemy to the state. However, you must not be thus agitated, thus easily alarmed, my wife, my own sweet bosom friend," he added, tenderly pressing the hand still resting on the table: "this little hand is tell-tale to a fearful, fluttering heart, and there is still too much anxiety in those dear eyes."

"Well, I will not tremble," replied his lady, "I will not be thus foolishly anxious. I disturb you, and might unfit myself for being of use. Those are but sorry wives who only weep and complain."

She sat down, and leaning her cheek upon her hand, sunk all unconsciously into a reverie of pleasant recollections; while her husband, who had made no answer, gazed upon her fair and modest face, and sighed to think that the time was, perhaps at hand, when their sweet domestic life would meet with unusual interruptions.

"We have been so happy!" she said, and the words stole like a gentle murmur from her lips. "Would we were safely back at Stratton! dear peaceful Stratton! But I am breaking my resolutions ere they are scarcely formed. I had forgotten myself and wandered back in pleasant day-dreams to our happy home at Stratton. I dreamed of our quiet mornings in the library, or under the old spreading trees, where we have read together, and together held such sweet converse, the children at our feet or in our arms—where we have drunk such draughts of deep and innocent delight. Alas these forebodings! I wonder that till now I never felt them. Will you not send for the man who is thus placed as sentinel at our gates? Will you not question him?"

"No," replied Lord Russell; "were I to speak with him, it might appear that I had feared myself an object of suspicion: nor will I seek to pass him, and go forth, as I would willingly, among my friends, to ask if they know any thing I do not know?—if they would have me prepared to meet this danger?"

"This danger!" interrupted his lady; "dear husband, what danger? You speak as if you knew of some positive danger, of calamity already falling."

"Nay, my Rachael, I speak as one perhaps too well acquainted with men and things at this present time. I repeat that there is nothing that I ought to fear; and yet there now are many things that all must fear. But you shall satisfy yourself and me, if you will undertake to go forthwith to some of my tried friends, and tell them of my plight, and bring me back whatever news you hear."

"O, I will go at once," returned the lady. "How kind to take me at my word, and make me useful! How kind to treat me with such confidence! I will go at once; but—" She paused—looked very thoughtful—"You will be here," she continued gravely; "you will not be gone when I return, unless you leave the house by the back gates, where there is no spy to watch your movements. It suddenly occurs to me, that there may be a friendly warning intended by the Council. It may be they would apprise you of some danger by sending thus a show of hostile feeling; but, at the same time, leaving open an avenue of escape."

"Let the intentions of others be what they may,"

the words still ring in our ears, nor do the mental images of the scene ever fade from the eye of any body suspected him of any design against his person; but that he had good evidence of his being in design against his government."

From whence they committed him a close prisoner to the Tower, and his trial soon followed.

"It cannot be," said the Lady Russell to herself, that they will condemn him to death; and yet there is such a settled resignation, such a calm sadness in his look and manner, that he himself seems to forbid all hope." A thrill of anguish ran through the whole assembly, when the Lady Russell rose up at the commencement of her husband's trial; it being signified to him that he might have a servant to write for him, and take notes of his trial. "My wife is here to do it," were Lord Russell's words. She took her seat at once, firm, modest, and self-collected; and nothing was so remarkable about her demeanour, during those hours when a thousand words were spoken to agitate and to afflict her, as her quiet, unremitting attention; nay, the devotedness of that attention, not it seemed to her husband, certainly not to her own feelings, but to the quiet duties of the office she had undertaken: she scarcely trusted herself to raise her eyes even to her husband's countenance; but a close observer might have seen that not a word escaped her. Now and then a crimson blush suffused her face—nay, spread to her brow; and when the news was suddenly brought into court, that the Lord Essex had been found that morning, it was supposed self-murdered in the Tower, the tears fell fast and heavily from her downcast eyes upon the paper.

Almost mechanically she continued writing, with a diligent attention that suffered nothing to escape. At last her task was finished: quietly she laid down her pen; her eyes and her hand were weary, and her heart was sick almost unto death: she had heard the conviction, and the condemnation of her husband; but not a sob, not a sound had escaped her lips: she had come prepared to hear, and, with God's help, to sustain the worst, without uttering a word that might agitate her beloved husband, or shake his grave and manly composure. When she rose up to accompany him from the court, every eye was turned towards them; and several of the kind and compassionate wept aloud: but the Lady Russell was enabled to depart with the same sweet and modest self-possession; still her husband's nearest, dearest companion. When they reached his prison, she gave way to no wild and passionate bursts of grief; but, repressing every murmur, she sat down, and began to discuss with him all, and every possible means of honourably saving his life. He had a settled conviction that every exertion would be made in vain, and secretly gave himself to prepare for inevitable death; but, to please and satisfy her, he entered into all her plans; at least consulted with her upon them; and, at her request particularly, drew up a petition to the Duke of York; which, however, proved utterly fruitless: the Duke of York being his determined and relentless enemy.

Still the Lady Russell was unwearied, and resolved

cater for the capricious appetite of the town, he either escapes by miracle, or breaks down that way, amidst the shout of the multitude and the condolence of friends, to see the idol of the moment pushed from its pedestal, and reduced to its proper level. There is only one living writer who can pass through this ordeal; and if he had barely written half what he has done, his reputation would have been none the less. His inexhaustible facility makes the willing world believe there is not much in it. Still, there is no alternative. Popularity, like one of the Danaides, imposes impossible tasks on her votary,—to pour water into sieves, to reap the wind. If he does nothing, he is forgotten; if he attempts more than he can perform, he gets laughed at for his pains. He is impelled by circumstances to fresh sacrifices of time, of labour, and of self-respect; parts with well-earned fame for a newspaper puff, and sells his birth-right for a mess of pottage. In the meanwhile, the public wonder why an author writes so badly and so much. With all his efforts, he builds no house, leaves no inheritance, lives from hand to mouth, and though condemned to daily drudgery for a precarious subsistence, is expected to produce none but works of first-rate genius. No; learning unincorporated, unendowed, is no match for the importunate demands and thoughtless ingratitude of the reading public.

Mr. Godwin, we suspect, regards his Political Justice as his great work—his passport to immortality; or perhaps he balances between this and Caleb Williams. Now, it is something for a man to have two works of so opposite a kind about which he and his admirers can be at a loss to say, in which he has done best. We never heard his title to originality in either of these performances called in question: yet they are as distinct, as to style and subject-matter, as if two different persons wrote them. No one in reading the philosophical treatise would suspect the embryo romance: those who personally know Mr. Godwin would as little anticipate either. The man differs from the author, at least as much as the author in this case apparently did from himself. It is as if a magician had produced some mighty feat of his art never failed the depositories of the villa he had purchased for his pleasures. He recollected that these gewgaws were placed in the bureau in the study; in which, as having a lock of foreign and intricate workmanship, he usually kept whatever might tempt cupidity in those frequent absences when the house was left guarded but by two women servants. Finding that Fanny had not yet quitted her own chamber, while Harriet went up to attend and reason with her, he himself limped into the study below, unlocked the bureau, and was searching in the drawers, when he heard the voice of Fanny above, raised a little, as if in remonstrance or entreaty, and he paused to listen. He could not, however, distinguish what was said; and, in the mean while, without attending much to what he was about, his hands were still employed in opening and shutting the drawers, passing through the pigeon-holes, and feeling for a topaz brooch, which he thought could not fail of pleasing the unsophisticated eyes of Fanny. One of the recesses was deeper than the rest; he thought the brooch was there; he stretched his hand into the recess; and, as the room was partially darkened by the lower shutters from without being still unclosed to prevent any attempted escape of his captive, he had only the sense of touch to depend on; not finding the brooch, he stretched on till he came to the extremity of the recess, and was suddenly sensible of a sharp pain; the flesh seemed caught, as in a trap; he drew back his finger with sudden force and a half-suppressed exclamation, and he perceived the bottom or floor of the pigeon-hole recede, as if sliding back. His curiosity was aroused; he again felt, warily and cautiously, and discovered a very slight inequality and roughness at the extremity of the recess. He was aware instantly that there was some secret spring; he pressed with some force on the spot, and he felt the board give way; he pushed it back towards him, and it slid suddenly with a whirring noise, and left a cavity below exposed to his sight. He peered in, and drew forth a paper; he opened it at first carelessly, for he was still trying to listen to Fanny. His eye ran rapidly over a few preliminary lines, till it rested on what follows:

"No. 83, page 21.

Lord Lilburne again cast his eye over the lines prefixed to this startling document, which, being those written, at Caleb's desire, by Mr. Jones to

Philip Beaufort, we need not here transcribe to the reader. At that instant Harriet descended the stairs and came into the room; she crept up on tiptoe to Lilburne, and whispered,

"She is coming down, I think; she does not know you are here."

"Very well—go," said Lord Lilburne. And scarce had Harriet left the room, when a carriage drove furiously to the door, and Robert Beaufort rushed into the study.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE LEARNED.

Among the Jesuits it was a standing rule of the order, that after an application to study for two hours, the mind of the student should be unbent by some relaxation however trifling. When Petavius was employed in his Dogmata Theologica, a work of the most profound and extensive erudition, the great recreation of the learned father was at the end of every second hour to twirl his chair for five minutes. After protracted studies Spinoza would mix with the family party where he lodged, and join in the most trivial conversations, or unbend his mind by setting spiders to fight each other; he observed their combats with so much interest that he was often seized with immoderate fits of laughter. A continuity of labour deadens the soul, observes Seneca, in closing his treatise on "The Tranquility of the Soul," and the mind must unbend itself by certain amusements. Socrates did not blush to play with children; Cato, over his bottle, found an alleviation from the fatigues of government; a circumstance, he says in his manner, which rather gives honour to this defect, than the defect dishonours Cato. Some men of letters portioned out their day between repose and labour. Asinius Pollio would not suffer any business to occupy him beyond a stated hour; after that time he would not allow any letter to be opened during his hours of relaxation, that they might not be interrupted by unforeseen labours. In the senate, after the tenth hour, it was not allowed to make any new motion.

Tycho Brahe diverted himself with polishing glasses for all kinds of spectacles, and making mathematical instruments; an amusement too closely connected with his studies to be deemed as one.

D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, after seven or eight hours of study every day, amused himself in cultivating trees; Barclay, the author of the Argenis, in his leisure hours was a florist; Balsac amused himself with a collection of crayon portraits; Peiresc found his amusement amongst his medals and antiquarian curiosities; the Abbe de Maroles with his prints; and Politian in singing airs to his lute. Descartes passed his afternoons in the conversation of a few friends, and in cultivating a little garden; in the morning, occupied by the system of the world, he relaxed his profound speculations by rearing delicate flowers.

Conrad ab Uffenbach, a learned German, recreated his mind, after severe studies, with a collection of prints of eminent persons, methodically arranged; he retained this ardour of the Grangerite to his last days.—D'Israeli.

NEW BOOK.

The Philosophy of History; in a course of Lectures.

By Frederick Von Schlegel, with a memoir of the author. By James Burton Robertson, Esq. New York, D. Appleton & Co., 1841.

Frederick Von Schlegel, is the brother of Augustus, who wrote the famous Lectures on Dramatic Literature, and contributed so largely, in concert with Madame de Stael, to bring the romantic school of dramatic writing into vogue in France. The work by which Frederick is best known in this country, is a Course of Lectures on the History of Literature, published in this city about twenty years since. In Germany the Schlegels have long been revered for genius and profound learning.

The work before us, written in the full maturity of the author's genius, is probably his best. Forming as it does a most able philosophical commentary upon all history, it will attract universal attention and find its way into every well selected library.

The memoir of the author adds greatly to the value of the work. It will be read with interest, and treasured up as a valuable addition to the stores of literary history.

JEFFERSON MEDICAL COLLEGE.—REORGANISATION. —It is with the greatest gratification that we announce the reorganisation of this college, with a corps of professors whose names and professional acquirements are known over every portion of this country. At a late meeting of the board of trustees, the following professors were unanimously appointed to the respective branches:

Dr. Dunglison, Institutes of Medicine and Medical Jurisprudence.

Dr. Huston, Materia Medica and General Therapeutics.

Dr. Pancoast, General, Descriptive, and Surgical Anatomy.

Dr. J. K. Mitchell, Practice of Medicine.

Dr. Randolph, Practice of Surgery.

Dr. Mütter, Institutes of Surgery.

Dr. Meigs, Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children.

Dr. Franklin Bache, Chemistry.

Of these gentlemen Drs. Dunglison, Huston and Pancoast are medical officers of the Philadelphia Hospital; Drs. Randolph and Meigs, of the Pennsylvania Hospital; and Dr. Mütter is surgeon to the Philadelphia Dispensary.

With the college thus fully organised, the effect must be to render Philadelphia still more the centre of medical education in the Union. The higher the reputation of the schools, and the more harmonious their co-operation in the great work of medical instruction, the more certainly must this result be accomplished. Unworthy rivalry should be abolished, but an honourable competition as to which institution can be most extensively useful to the profession and the public should endure.

NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

We have often been astonished at the quantity of talent—of invention, observation, and knowledge of character, as well as of spirited and graceful composition, that may be found in those works of fiction in our language, which are generally regarded as among the lower productions of our literature,—upon which no great pains is understood to be bestowed, and which are seldom regarded as the titles of a permanent reputation. If novels, however, are not fated to last as long as epic poems, they are at least a great deal more popular in their season; and, slight as their structure, and imperfect as their finishing may often be thought in comparison, we have no hesitation in saying, that the better specimens of the art are incomparably more entertaining, and considerably more instructive. The great objection to them, indeed, is, that they are too entertaining—and are so pleasant in the reading, as to be apt to produce a disrelish for other kinds of reading which may be more necessary, and can in no way be made so agreeable. Neither science, nor authentic history, nor political nor professional instruction, can be conveyed in a pleasant tale; and, therefore, all these things are in danger of appearing dull and uninteresting to the votaries of those more seductive studies.—Ed. Review.

GODWIN.

Either we are changed or Mr. Godwin is changed since he wrote his masterly performance of Caleb Williams. We remember the first time of reading it well, though now long ago. In addition to the singularity and surprise occasioned by seeking a romance written by a philosopher and politician, what a quickening of the pulse,—what an interest in the progress of the story,—what an eager curiosity in divining the future,—what an individuality and contrast in the characters,—what an elevation and what a fall was that of Falkland;—how we felt for his blighted hopes, his remorse, and despair, and took part with Caleb Williams as his ordinary and unformed sentiments are brought out, and rendered more and more acute by the force of circumstances, till hurried on by an increasing and uncontrollable impulse, he turns upon his proud benefactor and unrelenting persecutor, and in a mortal struggle overthrows him on the vantage-ground of humanity and justice! There is not a moment's pause in the action or sentiments: the breath is suspended, the faculties wound up to the highest pitch, as we read. Page after page is greedily devoured. There is no laying down the book till we come to the end; and even then the words still ring in our ears, nor do the mental apparitions ever pass away from the eye of memory. Few books have made a greater impression than Caleb Williams on its first appearance. It was read, admired, parodied, dramatised. All parties joined in its praise.

Mr. Godwin was thought a man of very powerful and versatile genius; and in him the understanding and the imagination reflected a mutual and dazzling light upon each other. His St. Leon did not lessen the wonder, nor the public admiration of him, or rather "seemed like another morn risen on mid-noon." But from that time he has done nothing of superlative merit.

Had Mr. Godwin been bred a monk, and lived in the good old times, he would assuredly either have been burnt as a freethinker, or have been rewarded with a mitre, for a tenth part of the learning and talent he has displayed. He might have reposed on a rich benefice, and the reputation he had earned, enjoying the otium cum dignitate, or at most relieving his official cares by revising successive editions of his former productions, and enshrining them in cases of sandalwood and crimson velvet in some cloistered hall or princely library. He might then have courted —"retired leisure,

That in trim gardens takes its pleasure,"— have seen his peaches ripen in the sun; and smiling secure on fortune and on fame, have repeated with complacency the motto—Horas non numero nisi serenas! But an author by profession knows nothing of all this. His is only "the iron rod, the torturing hour." He lies "stretched upon the rack of restless ecstasy;" he runs the everlasting gauntlet of public opinion. He must write on, and if he had the strength of Hercules and the wit of Mercury, he must in the end write himself down.

"And like a gallant horse, fallen in first rank,
Lies there for pavement to the abject rear,
O'er run and trampled on."

He cannot let well done alone. He cannot take his stand on what he has already achieved, and say, Let it be a durable monument to me and mine, and a covenant between me and the world for ever! He is called upon for perpetual new exertions, and urged forward by ever-craving necessities. The wolf must be kept from the door; the printer's devil must not go empty-handed away. He makes a second attempt, and though equal perhaps to the first, because it does not excite the same surprise, it falls tame and flat on the public mind. If he pursues the real bent of his genius, he is thought to grow dull and monotonous; or if he varies his style, and tries to cater for the capricious appetite of the town, he either escapes by miracle, or breaks down that way, amidst the shout of the multitude and the condolence of friends, to see the idol of the moment pushed from its pedestal, and reduced to its proper level. There is only one living writer who can pass through this ordeal; and if he had barely written half what he has done, his reputation would have been none the less. Mr. Godwin, we suspect, regards his Political Justice as his great work—his passport to immortality; or perhaps he balances between this and Caleb Williams. Now, it is something for a man to have two works of so opposite a kind about which he and his admirers can be at a loss to say, in which he has done best. We never heard his title to originality in either of these performances called in question: yet they are as distinct, as to style and subject-matter, as if two different persons wrote them. No one in reading the philosophical treatise would suspect the embryo romance: those who personally know Mr. Godwin would as little anticipate either. The man differs from the author, at least as much as the author in this case apparently did from himself. It is as if a magician had produced some mighty feat of his art without warning. He is not deeply learned; nor is he much beholden to a knowledge of the world: he has no passion but a love of fame, or we may add to this another, the love of truth, for he has never betrayed his cause or swerved from his principles, to gratify a little temporary vanity: his senses are not acute: but it cannot be denied that he is a man of great capacity and of uncommon genius. How is this seeming contradiction to be reconciled? Mr. Godwin is by way of distinction and emphasis an author; he is so not only by habit, but by nature, and by the whole turn of his mind. To make a book is with him the prime end and use of creation. His is the scholastic character handed down in its integrity to the present day. If he had cultivated a more extensive intercourse with the world, with nature, or even with books, he would not have been what he is—he could not have done what he has done. Mr. Godwin in society is nothing; but shut him up by himself, set him down to write a book,—it is then that the electric spark begins to unfold itself,—to expand, to kindle, to illumine, to melt, or shatter all in its way.

His Caleb Williams is the illustration of a single passion: his Political Justice is the single proposition or view of a subject. In both, there is the same pertinacity and unity of design, the same agglomeration of objects round a centre, the same aggrandisement of some one thing at the expense of every other, the same sagacity in discovering what makes for its purpose, and blindness to every thing but that. His genius is not dramatic; but it has something of an heroic cast; he gains new trophies in intellect, as the conqueror overruns new provinces and kingdoms, by patience and boldness: and he is great because he wills to be so.

Not contented with his ethical honours (for no work of the kind could produce a stronger sensation, or gain more converts than this did at the time), he determined to enter upon a new career, and fling him into the arena once more; thus challenging public opinion with singular magnanimity and confidence in himself. He did not stand "shivering on the brink" of his just-acquired reputation, and fear to tempt the perilous stream of popular favour again. The success of Caleb Williams justified the experiment. There was the same hardihood and gallantry of appeal in both. In the former case, the author had screwed himself up to the most rigid logic; in the latter, he gave unbounded scope to the suggestions of fancy. It cannot be denied that Mr. Godwin is, in the pugilistic phrase, an out-and-outer. He does not stop till he "reaches the verge of all we hate:" it is to be wondered if he sometimes falls over? He certainly did not do this in Caleb Williams or St. Leon. Both were eminently successful; and both, as we conceive, treated of subjects congenial to Mr. Godwin's mind. The one, in the character of Falkland, embodies that love of fame and respect for intellectual excellence, which is a cherished inmate of the author's bosom; (the desire of undying renown breathes through every page and line of the story, and sheds its lurid light over the close, as it has been said that the genius of war blazes through the Iliad;)—in the hero of the other, St. Leon, Mr. Godwin has depicted, as well he might, the feelings and habits of a solitary recluse, placed in new and imaginary situations: but from the philosophical to the romantic visionary, there was perhaps but one step. We give the decided preference to Caleb Williams over St. Leon; but if it is more original and interesting, the other is more imposing and eloquent. In the suffering and dying Falkland, we feel the heart-strings of our human being break; in the other work, we are transported to a state of fabulous existence, but unfolded with ample and gorgeous circumstances. The palm-tree waves over the untrodden path of luxuriant fiction; we tread with tip-toe elevation and throbbing heart to high hill-tops of boundless existence; and the dawn of hope and renovated life makes strange music in our breast, like the strings of Memnon's harp, touched by the morning's sun. After these two works he fell off; he could not sustain himself at that height by the force of genius alone, and Mr. Godwin has unfortunately no resources but his genius.

It is worth knowing (in order to trace the history and progress of the intellectual character) that the author of Political Justice and Caleb Williams commenced his career as a dissenting clergyman; and the book-stalls sometimes present a volume of Sermons by him, and, we believe, an English Grammar.—Ed. Review.

STORY OF LADY RUSSELL.

The Lady Russell had heard all that had been spoken, had hung breathless on every word; and her heart had sunk within her, when she found how firmly the king seemed opposed to showing any mercy to her husband. She had blessed the woman whose voice pleaded so kindly for her, though she guessed, and guessed rightly, that she was blessing the frail Louise de Querouaille, then Duchess of Portsmouth.

She heard the receding steps of the lord in waiting, and felt that in another moment her opportunity would be gone. She did not stop to think or hesitate, but threw open the door, and advanced quietly and meekly to the very centre of the chamber.

The room which Lady Russell entered, was of large dimensions, and furnished rather with splendid luxuriance than elegance. The windows opened into a balcony, filled with orange trees in full blossom, and the atmosphere of the chamber was richly scented with the delicious perfume of the flowers: the walls were hung alternately with some of Lely's beautiful but wanton portraits, and with broad pier glasses; and the profusion of gilding with which the sculptured frames and cornices, the tables, the couches and seats of various descriptions, were enriched, dazzled and fatigued the gaze. Upon and underneath one table, amid piles of music, lay several kinds of lutes and other instrument of music. On another an ivory casket of jewels stood open, glowing and blazing in a flood of sunshine. Before a broad slab of the richest green marble, opposite one of the looking-glasses, sat Louise de Querouaille, on a low ottoman. She had been reading aloud to the idle monarch; and her book, a light, loose French romance, lay upon the table, the place kept open by a bracelet of large pearls. Very near her the king was carelessly reclining upon a sofa covered with cushions of Genoa velvet. Into this chamber a pure and modest matron had entered to plead for the life of one of the most noble and upright gentlemen of the land; had she much chance of success with such a ruler?

"I am prepared," said the Lady Russell, as she knelt before the king, "to bear, though not to brave, your majesty's just anger. My coming thus uncalled into your presence is an intrusion, an impertinence, which the king may not perchance forgive; but I make my appeal, not to the king, but to the gentleman before whom I kneel." Charles, who had sat astonished rather than angry at the unexpected appearance of the lady, rose up at these words, and, tenderly raising her, led her to a seat with that gallant courteousness in which he was excelled by no one in his day. "My boldness is very great," she continued, "but grief makes me forget all difference of station: I am alive only to the power conferred upon your majesty's high station by the almighty and most merciful of kings. Forgive a wife, once a very happy wife, if she implores you to use that power in its most blessed exercise of mercy.

"Think that on the breath of your lips it depends whether the whole future course of a life, long so supremely happy, shall be gloom and wretchedness to the grave. But let me not take so selfish a part as to plead only for my own happiness. Do justice to an upright, honest subject; or, if you deem him faulty, (and who is not?) do not visit a fault with that dreadful doom that you would give to crime and wickedness. Nay, for yourself, for your own good interest, do not let them rob you of a servant whose fellow may not easily be found, one who shall serve your majesty with more true faithfulness than many that have been more forward in their words."

The king listened with attention, with well-bred and courteous attention; and then expressed with soft and well-bred excuses his deep regret that it was impossible, beyond his power, as one bound to consider the welfare of the state, to accede to her entreaties: and, as he spoke, the Lady Russell could not help contrasting the artful softness of his voice and manner with the rough but far more honest refusal she had heard, when waiting in the ante-room.

Charles ceased speaking; and the Lady Russell, who had continued seated all the time she spoke, and who had spoken with a modest and reverent dignity of manner, still sat calm, sad, and motionless, perplexed and silenced by his cold, easy self-possession.

"There is, then, no hope," she exclaimed, at length. The king met the melancholy gaze of her soft eyes as she asked the hopeless question, and the few words in which he replied were intended to destroy all hope. Yet they were spoken in the same smooth, courteous tone.

She rose up, but she did not go: still she remained standing where she rose up, calm, bewildered, her lips unclosed, her eyes cast down as if unwilling to depart, yet too stupefied by grief and disappointment to know what to say, too abashed, indeed, by his polite indifference to know how to act. At last she roused herself; and, as she lifted up her head, a clearness and brightness came into her eyes, and over her brow, and over her whole countenance.

"I must not, will not go abashed and confounded," she thought within herself; "I must not lose this last, this very last opportunity I can ever have of saving him."

"Bear with my importunity," she said, with a feminine sweetness, which, notwithstanding the deep dejection that hung on every look and every word, was inexpressibly fascinating: "Bear with me, and do not bid me rise, till I have been heard:" and she again threw herself at the feet of the king. "At least let me speak in my own name, let me urge my own claims to your gracious mercy. As the daughter of Thomas Wriothesley, your long-tried servant, your royal father's faithful and favoured friend, I humbly ask for pity and for mercy; your friend and your father's friend forget not. Alas, sire, you are not one to whom affliction is unknown; your heart is not hardened, I am sure it cannot be, against such calamities as mine are likely to be very soon. You have known," she added, raising at the same time her clasped hand, and her meek and innocent face, over which the tears flowed fast; "you have known one, whose loved and honoured head was cruelly laid low; you have seen something of what a widow and a mother suffers in such a desolate estate as mine will be, I fear, too soon. No, no! you do not misunderstand me—you know well of whom I speak. Imagine what your royal mother would have felt, had she knelt, as I do now, to one who could have saved the life of her beloved and noble husband; and pity—pray, pray pity me! What! not a word, not one kind pitying word!" She turned her eyes, as one who looks for help, on either side; and her glance fell upon the frail, but kind-hearted Louise de Querouaille, who sat weeping and sobbing with unaffected feeling.

I—was on the direct way to that villa! scarcely ten minutes had elapsed since he heard the story, ere he was on the road, with such speed as the promise of a guinea a mile could extract from the spurs of a young postboy applied to the flanks of London posthorses.

CHAPTER XV.

"Ex humili magna ad fastigia rerum Extol. it."—JUVENAL.

When Harriet had quitted Fanny, the waiting-woman, craftily wishing to lure her into Lilburne's presence, had told her that the room below was empty, and the captive's mind naturally and instantly seized on the thought of escape. After a brief breathing pause, she crept noiselessly down the stairs and gently opened her door; and, at the very instant she did so, Robert Beaufort entered from the other door; she drew back in terror, when, what was her astonishment in hearing a name uttered that spellbound her; the last name she could have expected to hear; for Lilburne, the instant he saw Beaufort, pale, haggard, agitated, rush into the room and bang the door after him, could only suppose that something of extraordinary moment had occurred with regard to the dreaded guest, and cried, "You come about Vaudemont! Something has happened about Vaudemont! about Philip! What is it? Calm yourself!"

Fanny, as the name was thus abruptly uttered, actually thrust her face through the door; but, at the sight of a stranger, she drew back, and, all her senses preternaturally quickened at that name, while she held the door almost closed, listened with her whole soul in her ears.

The faces of both the men were turned from her, and her partial entry had not been perceived.

"Yes," said Robert Beaufort, leaning his weight, as if ready to sink to the ground, upon Lilburne's shoulder, "yes; Vaudemont, or Philip, for they are one—yes, it is about that man I have come to consult you. Arthur has arrived."

"Well?"

"And Arthur has seen the wretch who visited us; and the rascal's manner has so imposed on him, so convinced him that Philip is the heir to all our property, that he has come over—ill—ill—I fear" (added Beaufort, in a hollow voice), "dying, to—to—"

"To guard against their machinations?"

"No, no, no; to say that, if such be the case, neither honour nor conscience will allow us to resist his rights. He is so obstinate in this matter—his nerves so ill bear reasoning and contradiction, that I know not what to do—"

"Take breath—go on."

"Well, it seems that this man found out Arthur almost as soon as my son arrived at Paris; that he has persuaded Arthur that he has it in his power to prove the marriage; that he pretended to be very impatient for a decision; that Arthur, in order to gain time to see me, affected irresolution; took him to Boulogne—for the rascal does not dare to return to England—left him there; and now comes back, my own son my worst enemy, to conspire against me for my property! I could not keep my temper if I had stayed. But that's not all—that's not the worst: Vaudemont left me suddenly in the morning on the receipt of a letter. In taking leave of Camilla, he let fall hints which fill me with fear. Well, I inquired his movements as I came along:

he had stopped at D—, been closeted for above an hour with a man whose name the landlord of the inn knew, for it was on his carpet-bag: the name was Barlow! You remember the advertisement! Good heavens! what is to be done? I would not do anything unhandsome or dishonest. But there never was a marriage. I never will believe there was a marriage—never!"

"There was a marriage, Robert Beaufort," said Lord Lilburne, almost enjoying the torture he was about to inflict; "and I hold here a paper that Philip Vaudemont—for so we will yet call him—would give his right hand to clutch for a moment. I have but just found it in a secret cavity in that bureau. Robert, on this paper may depend the fate, the fortune, the prosperity, the greatness of Philip Vaudemont; or his poverty, his exile, his ruin. See!"

Robert Beaufort glanced over the paper held out to him, dropped it on the floor, and staggered to a seat. Lilburne coolly replaced the document in the bureau, and, limping to his brother-in-law, said, with a smile,

"But the paper is in my possession: I will not destroy it. No, I have no right to destroy it. Besides, it would be a crime; but if I give it to you, you can do with it as you please."

"Oh, Lilburne, spare me, spare me. I meant to be an honest man. I—I—" And Robert Beaufort sobbed.

Lilburne looked at him in scornful surprise.

"Do not fear that I shall ever think worse of you: and who else will know it? Do not fear me. No; I too have reasons to hate and to fear this Philip Vaudemont; for Vaudemont shall be his name, and not Beaufort, in spite of fifty such scraps of paper! He has known a man—my worst foe; he has secrets of mine—of my past—perhaps of my present; but I laugh at his knowledge while he is a wandering adventurer; I should tremble at that knowledge, if he could thunder it out to the world as Philip Beaufort, of Beaufort Court! There, I am candid with you. Now hear my plan. Prove to Arthur that his visitor is a convicted felon, by sending the officers of justice after him instantly; off with him again to the settlements; defy a single witness; entrap Vaudemont back to France, and prove him (I think I will prove him such—I think so—with a little money and a little pains)—prove him the accomplice of William Gawtreys, a coiner and a murderer! Pshaw! take yon paper. Do with it as you will—keep it—give it to Arthur—let Philip Vaudemont have it, and Philip Vaudemont will be rich and great, the happiest man between earth and Paradise! On the other hand, come and tell me that you have lost it, or that I never gave you such a paper, or that no such paper ever existed, and Philip Vaudemont may live a pauper, and die, perhaps, a slave at the galleys! Lose it, I say—lose it—and advise with me upon the rest."

Horror-struck, bewildered, the weak man gazed upon the calm face of the master-villain as the scholar of the old fables might have gazed on the fiend who put before him worldly prosperity here and the loss of his soul hereafter. He had never hitherto regarded Lilburne in his true light. He was appalled by the black heart that lay bare before him.

"I can't destroy it—I can't," he faltered out; "and if I did, out of love for Arthur, don't talk of galleys—of vengeance; I—I—"

"The arrears of the rents you have enjoyed, will send you to jail for your life. No, no, don't destroy the paper!"

Beaufort rose with a desperate effort; he moved to the bureau. Fanny's heart was in her lips; of this long conference she had understood only the one broad point on which Lilburne had insisted with an emphasis that could have enlightened an infant—and he looked on Beaufort as an infant then—On that paper rested Philip Vaudemont's fate: happiness if saved, ruin if destroyed; Philip—her Philip! And Philip himself had said to her once—when had she ever forgotten his words? and now, how those words flashed across her—Philip himself had said to her once, "Upon a scrap of paper, if I could but find it, may depend my whole fortune, my whole happiness, all that I care for in life." Robert Beaufort moved to the bureau, seized the document, looked over it again hurriedly, and, ere Lilburne, who by no means wished to have it destroyed in his own presence, was aware of his intention, he hastened with tottering steps to the hearth, averted his eyes, and cast it on the fire. At that instant, something white—he scarce knew what: it seemed to him as a spirit, as a ghost—darted by him, and snatched the paper from the embers! There was a pause for the hundredth part of a moment—a gurgling sound of astonishment and horror from Beaufort—an exclamation from Lilburne—a laugh from Fanny, as, her eyes flashing light, with a proud dilation of stature, with the paper clasped tightly to her bosom, she turned her looks of triumph from one to the other. The two men were both too amazed at the instant for rapid measures. But Lilburne, recovering himself first, hastened to her; she eluded his grasp; she made towards the door to the passage; when Lilburne, seriously alarmed, seized her arm.

"Foolish child! give me that paper!"

"Never, but with my life!" And Fanny's cry for help rang through the house.

"Then—" the speech died on his lips, for at that instant a rapid stride was heard without—a momentary scuffle—voices in altercation—the door gave way, as if a battering-ram had forced it—not so much thrown forward as actually hurled into the room, the body of Dykeman fell heavily, like a dead man's, at the very feet of Lord Lilburne—and Philip Vaudemont stood in the doorway!

The grasp of Lilburne on Fanny's arm relaxed, and the girl, with one bound, sprung to Philip's breast. "Here, here!" she cried; "take it—take it!" and she thrust the paper into his hand. "Don't let them have it—read it—see it—never mind me!" But Philip, though his hand unconsciously closed on the precious document, did mind Fanny; and in that moment her cause was the only one in the world to him.

"Foul villain!" he said, as he strode to Lilburne, while Fanny still clung to his breast: "speak! speak! Is she—is she—man, man, speak! you know what I would say! She is the child of your own daughter—the grandchild of that Mary whom you dishonoured—the child of the woman whom William Gawtreys saved from pollution! Before he died Gawtreys commended her to my care! Oh God of Heaven!—speak!—I am not too late!"

The manner—the words—the face of Philip left Lilburne struck, and (for after all he was human) terror-struck with conviction. But the man's crafty ability, debased as it was, triumphed even over remorse for the dread guilt meditated—over gratitude for the dread guilt spared. He glanced at Beaufort, at Dykeman—who now, slowly recovering, gazed at him with eyes that seemed starting from their sockets—and, lastly, fixed his look on Philip himself. There were three witnesses: presence of mind was his great attribute!

"And if, Monsieur de Vaudemont, I knew, or, at least, had the firmest persuasion that Fanny was my grandchild, what then? Why else should she be here? Pooh, sir! I am an old man."

Philip recoiled a step in wonder; his plain sense was baffled by the calm lie. He looked down at Fanny, who, comprehending nothing of what was spoken—for all her faculties, even her very sense of sight and hearing, were absorbed in her impatient anxiety for him—cried out,

"No harm has come to Fanny—none: only frightened. Read! read! Save that paper! You know what you once said about a mere scrap of paper! Come away! Come!"

He did now cast his eyes on the paper he held. That was an awful moment for Robert Beaufort—even for Lilburne! To snatch the fatal document from that gripe! they would as soon have snatched it from a tiger! He lifted his eyes: they rested on his mother's picture! Her lips smiled on him! He turned to Beaufort in a state of emotion too exulting, too blessed for vulgar vengeance—for vulgar triumph—almost for words.

"Look yonder, Robert Beaufort, look!" (and he pointed to the picture). "Her name is spotless. I stand again beneath my father's roof, the heir of Beaufort! We shall meet before the justice of our country. For you, Lord Lilburne, I will believe you: it is too horrible to doubt even your intentions. If wrong had chanced to her, I would have rent you where you stand, limb from limb. And thank her" (for Lilburne recovered, at this language, the daring of his youth, before calculation, indolence, and excess had dulled the edge of his nerves; and, unawed by the height, and manhood, and strength of his menacer, stalked haughtily up to him)—"and thank your relationship to her," said Philip, sinking his voice into a whisper, "that I do not brand you as a pilferer and a cheat! Hush, knave! Hush, pupil of George Gawtreys! There are no duels for me but with men of honour!"

Lilburne now turned white, and the big word stuck in his throat. In another instant Fanny and her guardian had quitted the house.

"Dykeman," said Lord Lilburne, after a long silence, "I shall ask you another time how you came to admit that impertinent person; at present, go and order breakfast for Mr. Beaufort."

As soon as Dykeman, more astounded, perhaps, by his lord's coolness than even by the preceding circumstances, had left the study, Lilburne came up to Beaufort, who seemed absolutely struck as if by palsy, and, touching him impatiently and rudely, said,

"Sdeath, man! rouse yourself! There is not a moment to be lost! I have already decided on what you are to do. This paper is not worth a rush, unless the curate who examined it will depose to that fact. He is a curate—a Welsh curate; you are yet Mr. Beaufort, a rich and a great man. The curate, properly managed, may depose to the contrary; and then we'll endite them all for forgery and conspiracy. At the worst, you can, no doubt, get the parson to forget all about it—to stay away. His address was on the certificate, C—. Go yourself into Wales without an instant's delay. Then, having arranged with Mr. Jones, hurry back; cross to Boulogne, and buy this convict and his witness

—yes, buy them! That, now, is the only thing. Quick! quick! quick! Zounds, man! if it were my affair, my estate, I would not care a pin for that fragment of paper; I should rather rejoice at it. I see how it could be turned against them! Go!"

"No, no, I am not equal to it. Will you manage it? will you? Half my estate! all! Take it; but save—"

"Tut!" interrupted Lord Lilburne in great disdain. "I am as rich as I want to be. Money does not bribe me. I manage this! I! Lord Lilburne! I! Why, if found out, it is subornation of witnesses—it is exposure—it is dishonour—it is ruin. What then? You should take the risk, for you must meet ruin if you do not. I cannot. I have nothing to gain!"

"I dare not! I dare not!" murmured Beaufort, quite spirit-broken. "Subornation—dishonour—exposure! And I, so respectable—my character! And my son against me, too! my son, in whom I lived again! No, no, let them take it! Ha! ha! let them take it! Good day to you."

"Where are you going?"

"I shall consult Mr. Blackwell, and I'll let you know."

And Beaufort walked tremulously back to his carriage.

"Go to his lawyer!" growled Lilburne. "Yes, if his lawyer can help him to defraud men lawfully, he'll defraud them fast enough. That will be the respectable way of doing it! Um! this may be an ugly business for me—the paper found here—if the girl can depose to what she heard, and she must have heard something. No, I think the laws of real property will hardly allow her evidence; and if they do—Um!—My granddaughter! Is it possible! And Gawtreys rescued her mother, my child, from her own mother's vices! I thought my liking to that girl different from any other I have ever felt: it was pure—it was!—it was pity—affection. And I must never see her again! must forget the whole thing! And I am growing old—and I am childless—and alone!" He paused, almost with a groan: and then, the expression of his face changing to rage, he cried out, "The man threatened me,—and I was a coward! What to do? Nothing! The defensive is my line. I shall play no more. I attack no one. Who will accuse Lord Lilburne? Still, Robert is a fool. I must not leave him to himself. Ho, there! Dykeman! the carriage! I shall go to London."

Fortunate no doubt it was for Philip that Mr. Beaufort was not Lord Lilburne. For all history teaches us—public and private history—conquerors—statesmen—sharp hypocrites and brave designers—yes, they all teach us how mighty one man of great intellect and no scruple is against the justice of millions! The One Man moves, the Mass is inert. Justice sits on a throne—Roguerie never rests—Activity is the lever of Archimedes.

CHAPTER XVI.

"Quam multa injusta ac prava sunt moribus."—TULL.

"Volat ambigua Mobilis aile Hora."—SENeca.

Mr. Robert Beaufort sought Mr. Blackwell, and long, rambling, and disjointed was his narrative. Mr. Blackwell, after some consideration, proposed to set about doing the very things that Lilburne had proposed at once to do. But the lawyer expressed himself legally and covertly, so that it did not seem to the sober sense of Mr. Beaufort at all the same plan. He was not the least alarmed at what Mr. Blackwell proposed, though so shocked at what Lilburne dictated. Blackwell would go the next day into Wales—he would find out Mr. Jones—he would sound him! Nothing was more common, with people of the nicest honour, than just to get a witness out of the way! Done in election petitions, for instance, every day.

"True," said Mr. Beaufort, much relieved.

Then, after having done that, Mr. Blackwell would return to town, and cross over to Boulogne to see this very impudent person whom Arthur (young men are so apt to be taken in!) had actually believed. He had no doubt he could settle it all. Robert Beaufort returned to Berkley Square actually in spirits.

There he found Lilburne, who, on reflection, seeing that Blackwell was at all events more up to the business than his brother, assented to the propriety of the arrangement.

Mr. Blackwell accordingly did set off the next day. That next day, perhaps, made all the difference. Within two hours from his gaining the document so important, Philip, without any subtler exertion of intellect than the decision of a plain, bold sense, had already forestalled both the peer and the lawyer. He had sent down Mr. Barlow's head clerk into Wales with the document, and a short account of the manner in which it had been discovered. And fortunate, indeed, was it that that copy had been found; for all the inquiries of Mr. Barlow at A— had failed, and probably would have failed, without such a clew, in fastening upon any one probable person to have officiated as Caleb Price's amanuensis. The sixteen hours' start Mr. Barlow gained over Blackwell enabled the former to see Mr. Jones—to show him his own handwriting—to get a written and witnessed attestation, from which the curate, however poor, and however tempted, could never well have escaped (even had he been dishonest, which he was not), of his perfect recollection of the fact of making an extract from the registry at Caleb's desire, though he owned he had quite forgotten the names he extracted till they were again placed before him. Barlow took care to arouse Mr. Jones's interest in the case—quitted Wales—hastened over to Boulogne—saw Captain Smith, and, without bribes, without threats, but by plainly proving to that worthy person that he could not return to England nor see his brother without being immediately arrested—that his brother's evidence was already pledged on the side of truth—and that, by the acquisition of new testimony, there could be no doubt that the suit would be successful, he scared the captain from all disposition towards perfidy, convinced him on which side his interest lay, and saw him return to Paris, where, very shortly afterward, he disappeared for ever from this world, being forced into a duel, much against his will, with a Frenchman whom he had attempted to defraud, and shot through the lungs: thus verifying a favourite maxim of Lord Lilburne's, viz., that it does not do, on the long run, for little men to play the great game!

On the same day that Blackwell returned, frustrated in his half-and-half attempts to corrupt Mr. Jones, and not having been able to discover Mr. Smith, Mr. Robert Beaufort received notice of an ejectment to be brought by Philip Beaufort at the next assizes. And, to add to his afflictions, Arthur, whom he had hitherto endeavoured to amuse by a sort of ambiguous shilly-shally correspondence, became so alarmingly worse that his mother brought him up to town for advice. Lord Lilburne was, of course, sent for; and, on learning all, his counsel was prompt.

"I told you before that this man loves your daughter. See if you can effect a compromise. The lawsuit will be ugly, and probably ruinous. He has a right to claim six years arrears; that is, above £100,000. Make yourself his father-in-law, and me his uncle-in-law; and, since we can't kill the wasp, we may at least soften the venom of his sting."

Beaufort, still perplexed, irresolute, sought his son; and, for the first time, spoke to him frankly—that is, frankly for Robert Beaufort! He owned that the copy of the register had been found by Lilburne in a secret drawer. He made the best of the story Lilburne himself furnished him with (adhering, of course, to the assertion uttered or insinuated to Philip) in regard to Fanny's abduction or interposition; he said nothing of his attempt to destroy the paper. Why should he? By admitting the copy in court—if so advised—he could get rid of Fanny's evidence altogether; even without such concession her evidence might possibly be objected to or eluded. He confessed that he feared the witness who copied the register, and the witness to the marriage, were alive. And then he talked pathetically of his desire to do what was right, his dread of slander and misinterpretation. He said nothing of Sidney, and his belief that Sidney and Charles Spencer were the same; because, if his daughter were to be made the instrument for effecting a compromise, it was clear that her engagement with Spencer must be cancelled and concealed. And, luckily, Arthur's illness and Camilla's timidity, joined now to her father's injunctions not to excite Arthur in his present state with any additional causes of anxiety, prevented the confidence that might otherwise have ensued between the brother and sister. And Camilla, indeed, had no heart for such a conference. How, when she looked on Arthur's glassy eye, and listened to his hectic cough, could she talk to him of love and marriage? As to the automaton Mrs. Beaufort, Robert made sure of her discretion.

Arthur listened attentively to his father's communication, and the result of that interview was the following letter from Arthur to his cousin:

"I write to you without fear of misconstruction, for I write to you unknown to all my family; and I am the only one who can have no interest in the struggle about to take place between my father and yourself. Before the law can decide between you I shall be in my grave. I write this from the bed of death. Philip, I write this—I, who stood beside a deathbed more sacred to you than mine—I, who received your mother's last sigh. And with that sigh there was a smile that lasted when the sigh was gone: for I promised to befriend her children. Heaven knows how anxiously I sought to fulfil that solemn vow! Feeble and sick myself, I followed you and your brother with no aim, no prayer but this: to embrace you and say, 'Accept a new brother in me.' I spare you the humiliation—for it is yours, not mine—of recalling what passed between us when at last we met. Yet I still sought to save at least Sidney, more especially confided to my care by his dying mother. He mysteriously eluded our search; but we had reason, by a letter received from some unknown hand, to believe him saved and provided for. Again I met you at Paris. I saw you were poor. Judging from your associate, I might with justice think you depraved. Mindful of your declaration never to accept bounty from a Beaufort, and remembering with natural resentment the outrage I had before received from you, I judged it vain to seek and remonstrate with you; but I did not judge it vain to aid. I sent you, anonymously, what at least would suffice, if absolute poverty had subjected you to evil courses, to rescue you from them if your heart were so disposed. Perhaps that sum, trifling as it was, may have smoothed your path and assisted your career. And why tell you all this now? To dissuade you from asserting rights you conceive to be just? Heaven forbid! If justice is with you, so also is the duty due to your mother's name. But simply for this: That, in asserting such rights, you content yourself with justice, not revenge; that, in righting yourself, you do not wrong others. If the law should decide for you, the arrears you could demand would leave my parents and my sister beggars. 'This may be law—it would not be justice; for my father solemnly believed himself, and had every apparent probability in his favour, the true heir of the wealth that devolved upon him. This is not all. There may be circumstances connected with the discovery of a certain document, that, if authentic—and I do not presume to question it—may decide the contest so far as it rests on truth: circumstances which might seem to bear hard upon my father's good name and faith. I do not know sufficiently of law to say how far these could be publicly urged, or, if urged, exaggerated and tortured by an advocate's calumnious ingenuity. But again I say, justice and not revenge! And with this I conclude, enclosing to you these lines, written in your own hand, and leaving you the arbiter of their value.

"ARTHUR BEAUFORT."

The lines enclosed were these, a second time placed before the reader:

"I cannot guess who you are: they say that you call yourself a relation; that must be some mistake. I knew not that my poor mother had relations so kind. But, whoever you be, you soothed her last hours—she died in your arms; and if ever—years, long years hence—we should chance to meet, and I can do anything to aid another, my blood, and my life, and my heart, and my soul, all are slaves to your will. If you be really of her kindred, I commend to you my brother; he is at — with Mr. Morton. If you can serve him, my mother's soul will watch over you as a guardian angel. As for me, I ask no help from any one: I go into the world, and will carve out my own way. So much do I shrink from the thought of charity from others, that I do not believe I could bless you as I do now if your kindness to me did not close with the stone upon my mother's grave.

PHILIP."

This letter was sent to the only address of Monsieur de Vaudemont which the Beauforts knew, viz., his apartments in town, and he did not receive it the day it was sent.

Meanwhile Arthur Beaufort's malady continued to gain ground rapidly. His father, absorbed in his own more selfish fears (though, at the first sight of Arthur, overcome by the alteration of his appearance), had ceased to consider his illness fatal. In fact, his affection for Arthur was rather one of pride than love: long absence had weakened the ties of early custom. He prized him as an heir rather than treasured him as a son. It almost seemed that, as the heritage was in danger, so the heir became less dear: this was only because he was less thought of. Poor Mrs. Beaufort, yet but partially acquainted with the terrors of her husband, still clung to hope for Arthur. Her affection for him brought out from the depths of her cold and insignificant character qualities that had never before been apparent. She watched, she nursed, she tended him. The fine lady was gone; nothing but the mother was left behind.

With a delicate constitution, and with an easy temper which yielded to the influence of companions inferior to himself except in bodily vigour and more sturdy will, Arthur Beaufort had been ruined by prosperity. His talents and acquirements, if not first-rate, at least far above mediocrity, had only served to refine his tastes, not to strengthen his mind. His amiable impulses, his charming disposition, and sweet temper, had only served to make him the dupe of the parasites that feasted on the lavish heir. His heart, frittered away in the usual round of light intrigues and hollow pleasures, had become too sated and exhausted for the redeeming blessings of a deep and a noble love. He had so lived for Pleasure that he had never known Happiness. His frame broken by excesses in which his better nature never took delight, he came home—to hear of ruin and to die!

It was evening in the sick-room. Arthur had risen from the bed to which, for some days, he had voluntarily taken, and was stretched on the sofa before the fire. Camilla was leaning over him, keeping in the shade, that he might not see the tears which she could not suppress. His mother had been endeavouring to amuse him, as she would have amused herself, by reading aloud one of the light novels of the hour: novels that paint the life of the higher classes as one gorgeous holyday.

"My dear mother," said the patient, querulously, "I have no interest in these false descriptions of the life I have led. I know that life's worth—ah! had I been trained to some employment, some profession; had I—well, it is weak to repine. Mother, tell me—you have seen Monsieur de Vaudemont—is he strong and healthy?"

"Yes; too much so. He has not your elegance, dear Arthur."

"And do you admire him, Camilla? Has no other caught your heart or your fancy?"

"My dear Arthur," interrupted Mrs. Beaufort, "you forget that Camilla is scarcely out; and, of course, a young girl's affections, if she's well brought up, are regulated by the experience of her parents. It is time to take the medicine; it certainly agrees with you; you have more colour to-day, my dear, dear son."

While Mrs. Beaufort was pouring out the medicine, the door gently opened, and Mr. Robert Beaufort appeared; behind him there rose a taller and a statelier form, but one which seemed more bent, more humbled, more agitated. Beaufort advanced. Camilla looked up and turned pale. The visitor escaped from Mr. Beaufort's grasp on his arm; he came forward, trembling; he fell on his knees beside Arthur, and seizing his hand, bent over it in silence; but silence so stormy! silence more impressive than all words; his breast heaved, his whole frame shook. Arthur guessed at once whom he saw, and bent down gently, as if to raise his visitor.

"Oh! Arthur, Arthur!" then cried Philip, "forgive me! My mother's comforter—my cousin—my brother! Oh! brother, forgive me!"

And, as he half rose, Arthur stretched out his arms, and Philip clasped him to his breast.

It is in vain to describe the different feelings that agitated those who beheld: the selfish congratulations of Robert, mingled with a better and purer feeling—the stupor of the mother—the emotions, that she herself could not unravel, which rooted Camilla to the spot.

"You own me, then—you own me!" cried Philip. "You accept the brotherhood that my mad passions once rejected! And you too—you, Camilla—you, who once knelt by my side under this very roof—do you remember me now? Oh, Arthur! that letter, that letter! Yes, indeed; that aid which I ascribed to any one—to felons and to malefactors rather than to you, made the date of a fairer fortune. I might owe to that aid the very fate that has preserved me till now—the very name which I have not discredited. No, no, do not think you can ask me a favour; you can but claim your due. Brother! my dear brother!"

CHAPTER VII.

"Warwick. Exceeding well, his cares are now all over."
Henry IV.

The excitement of this interview soon overpowering Arthur, Philip, in quitting the room with Mr. Beaufort, asked a conference with that gentleman, and they went into the very parlour from which the rich man had once threatened to expel the haggard suppliant. Philip glanced round the room, and the whole scene came again before him. He motioned Beaufort to seat himself, and, after a pause, thus began:

"Mr. Beaufort, let the past be forgotten. We may have need of mutual forgiveness: and I, who have so wronged your noble son, am willing to suppose that I misjudged you. I cannot, it is true, forego this lawsuit."

Mr. Beaufort's face fell.

"I have no right to do so. I am the trustee of my father's honour and my mother's name: I must vindicate both: I cannot forego this lawsuit. But when I once bowed myself to enter your house—then only with a hope, where now I have the certainty, of obtaining my heritage—it was with the resolve to bury in oblivion every sentiment that would transgress the most temperate justice. Now I will do more. If the law decide against me, we are as we were; if with me—listen: I will leave you the lands of Beaufort for your life and your son's. I ask but for me and for mine such a deduction from your wealth as will enable me, should my brother be yet living, to provide for him; and (if you approve the choice that out of all earth I would desire to make) to give whatever belongs to more refined or graceful existence than I care for, to her whom I would call my wife. Robert Beaufort, in this room I once asked you to restore to me the only being I then loved: I am now again your suppliant, and this time you have it in your power to grant my prayer. Let Arthur be in truth my brother: give me, if I prove myself, as I feel assured, entitled to hold the name my father bore, give me your daughter as my wife; give me Camilla, and I will not envy the lands I am willing for myself to resign; and if they pass to my children, those children will be your daughter's!"

The first impulse of Mr. Beaufort was to grasp the hand held out to him—to pour forth an incoherent torrent of praise and protestation, as assurances that he could not hear of such generosity—that what was right was right—that he should be proud of such a son-in-law, and much more to the same key. And in the midst of this, it suddenly occurred to Mr. Beaufort that, if Philip's case were really as good as he said it was, he could not talk so coolly of resigning the property it would secure him for the term of a life (Mr. Beaufort thought of his own) so uncommonly good, to say nothing of Arthur's. At this notion he thought it best not to commit himself too far; drew in as artfully as he could, until he could consult Lord Lilburne and his lawyer; and, recollecting also that he had a great deal to manage with respect to Camilla and her prior attachment, he began to talk of his distress for Arthur; of the necessity of waiting a little before Camilla was spoken to, while so agitated about her brother; of the exceedingly strong case which his lawyer advised him he possessed—not but what he would rather rest the matter on justice than law—and that, if the law should be with him, he would not the less (provided he did not force his daughter's inclinations, of which, indeed, he had no fear) be most happy to bestow her hand on his brother's son, with such a portion as would be most handsome to all parties.

It often happens to us in this world, that when we come with our heart in our hands to some person or other—when we pour out some generous burst of feeling so enthusiastic and self-sacrificing that a by-stander would call us fool and Quixote—it often, I say, happens to us to find our warm self suddenly thrown back upon our cold self; to discover that we are utterly uncomprehended; and that the swine who would have munched up the acorn does not know what to make of the pearl. That sudden ice which then freezes over us—that supreme disgust and despair almost of the whole world, which, for the moment, we confound with the one worldling—they who have felt may reasonably ascribe to Philip. He listened to Mr. Beaufort in utter and contemptuous silence, and then replied only,

"Sir, at all events, this is a question for law to decide. If it decide as you think, it is for you to act; if as I think, it is for me. Till then, I will speak to you no more of your daughter or my intentions. Meanwhile, all I ask is the liberty to visit your son. I would not be banished from his sick-room!"

"My dear nephew!" cried Mr. Beaufort, again alarmed, "consider this house as your home."

Philip bowed and retreated to the door, followed obsequiously by his uncle.

It chanced that both Lord Lilburne and Mr. Blackwell were of the same mind as to the course advisable for Mr. Beaufort now to pursue. Lord Lilburne was not only anxious to exchange a hostile litigation for an amicable lawsuit, but he was really eager to put the seal of relationship upon any secret with regard to himself that a man who might inherit £20,000 a year—a dead shot and a bold tongue—might think fit to disclose. This made him more earnest than he otherwise might have been in advice as to other people's affairs. He spoke to Beaufort as a man of the world, to Blackwell as a lawyer.

"Pin the man down to his generosity," said Lilburne, "before he gets the property. Possession makes a great change in man's value of money. After all, you can't enjoy the property when you're dead: he gives it next to Arthur, who is not married; and if anything happen to Arthur, poor fellow! why, in returning to your daughter's husband and children, it goes in the right line. Pin him down at once: get credit with the world for the most noble and disinterested conduct, by letting your counsel state that, the instant you discovered the lost document, you wished to throw no obstacle in the way of proving the marriage, and that the only thing to consider is, if the marriage be proved; if so, you will be the first to rejoice, &c. &c. You know all that sort of humbug as well as any man."

Mr. Blackwell suggesting the same counsel, though in different words, proposed that, as an intermediate step, the examination of the facts should be submitted to the private arbitration of some three of the most eminent lawyers, according to whose verdict the defence should be fought gallantly or waived nobly. This idea Beaufort caught at. The arbitration was suggested to Philip; agreed to, with some hesitation, by Mr. Barlow. The arbiters were selected, and they soon came to a unanimous opinion that the marriage could be proved, and Philip Beaufort establish his claims.

As soon as this report was made, Mr. Beaufort saw Philip. It was settled that the lawsuit, though equally necessary, should be merely formal, so far as the defendant was concerned; and, in short, he let Philip understand that he was sensible of his generosity, and not unwilling to profit by it.

While this went on, Arthur continued gradually to decline. Philip was with him always. The sufferer took a strange liking to the long-dreaded relation, this man of iron frame and thews. In Philip there was so much of life, that Arthur almost felt as if in his presence itself there was antagonism to death. And Camilla saw thus her cousin, day by day, hour by hour, in that sick chamber, lending himself, with the gentle tenderness of a woman, to soften the pang, to arouse the weariness, to cheer the dejection. Philip never spoke to her of love; in such a scene that had been impossible. She overcame, in their mutual cares, the embarrassment she had before felt in his presence; whatever her other feelings, she could not, at least, but be grateful to one so tender to her brother. Three letters of Charles Spencer's had been, in the afflictions of the house, only answered by a brief line. She now took the occasion of a momentary and delusive amelioration in Arthur's disease to write to him more at length. She was carrying, as usual, the letter to her mother, when Mr. Beaufort met her and took the letter from her hand. He looked embarrassed for a moment, and bade her follow him into his study. It was then that Camilla learned, for the first time distinctly, the claims and rights of her cousin; then she learned, also, at what price the more valuable part of those rights was to be sacrificed. Mr. Beaufort naturally put the case before her in the strongest point of the dilemma. He was to be ruined, utterly ruined; a pauper, a beggar, if Camilla did not save him. The master of his fate demanded his daughter's hand. Naturally subservient to every whim of her parents, this intelligence—the entreaty—the command with which it was accompanied—overwhelmed her. She answered but by tears; and Mr. Beaufort, assured of her submission, left her, to consider of the tone of the letter he himself should write to Mr. Spencer. He had sat down to this very ask, when he was summoned to Arthur's room. His son was suddenly taken worse: spasms, that threatened immediate danger, convulsed and exhausted him; and, when these were allayed, he continued for three days so feeble, that Mr. Beaufort, his eyes now thoroughly open to the loss that awaited him, had no thoughts even for worldly interests.

On the night of the third day, Philip, Robert Beaufort, his wife, his daughter, were grouped round the deathbed of Arthur. He had just awakened from a sleep, and he motioned to Philip to raise him. Mr. Beaufort started as by the dim light he saw his son in the arms of Catharine's! and another Chamber of Death seemed, shadow-like, to replace the one before him. Words, long since uttered, knelled in his ear: "There shall be a deathbed yet in which you shall see the spectre of her, now so calm, rising for retribution from the grave!" His blood froze—his hair stood erect—he cast a hurried, shrinking glance round the twilight of the darkened room; and, with a feeble cry, covered his white face with his trembling hands! But on Arthur's lips there was a serene smile; he turned his eyes from Philip to Camilla, and murmured, "She will repay you!" A pause, and the mother's shriek ran through the room. Robert Beaufort raised his face from his hands: his son was dead!

CHAPTER XVIII.

"But what reward do you propose? It must be my love."—The Double Marriage.

While these events—dark, hurried, and stormy—had befallen the family of his betrothed, Sidney Beaufort (as we are now entitled to call him) had continued his calm life by the banks of the lovely lake. After a few weeks, his confidence in Camilla's fidelity overbore all his apprehensions and forebodings. Her letters, though constrained by the inspection to which they were submitted, gave him inexpressible consolation and delight. He began, however, early to fancy that there was a change in their tone. The letters were of the same length, but they seemed to shun the one subject to which all others were as naught; they turned rather upon the guests assembled at Beaufort Court; and why I know not—for there was nothing in them to arouse jealousy—the brief words devoted to Monsieur de Vaudemont filled him with uneasy and terrible suspicion. He gave vent to these feelings as fully as he dared do, under the knowledge that his letter would be seen; and Camilla never again even mentioned the name of Vaudemont. Then there was a long pause—then her brother's arrival and illness were announced—then, at intervals, but a few hurried lines—then a complete, long, dreadful silence—and, lastly, with a deep black border, and a solemn black seal, came the following letter from Mr. Beaufort:—

"My dear Sir,—I have the unutterable grief to announce to you and your worthy uncle the irreparable loss I have sustained in the death of my only son. It is a month to-day since he departed this life. He died, sir, as a Christian should die—humbly, penitently; exaggerating the few faults of his short life, but—" (and here the writer's hypocrisy, though so natural to him—was it that he knew not that he was hypocritical?—fairly gave way before the real and human anguish for which there is no dictionary!)—"but I cannot pursue this theme!

"Slowly now awakening to the duties yet left me to discharge, I cannot but be sensible of the material difference in the prospects of my remaining child. Miss Beaufort is now the heiress to an ancient name and a large fortune. She subscribes with me to the necessity of consulting those new considerations which so melancholy an event forces upon her mind. The little fancy or liking (the acquaintance was too short for more) that might naturally spring up between two amiable young persons thrown together in the country, must be banished from our thoughts. As a friend, I shall be always happy to hear of your welfare; and should you ever think of a profession in which I can serve you, you may command my utmost interest and exertions. I know, my young friend, what you will feel at first, and how apt you will be to call me mercenary and selfish. Heaven knows if that be really my character! But at your age impressions are easily effaced; and any experienced friend of the world will assure you, that in the altered circumstances of the case I have no option. All intercourse and correspondence, of course, cease with this letter, until, at least, we may all meet with no sentiments but those of friendship and esteem. I desire my compliments to your worthy uncle, in which Mrs. and Miss Beaufort join; and I am sure you will be happy to hear that my wife and daughter, though still in great affliction, have suffered less in health than I could have ventured to anticipate.

"Believe me, dear sir,

"Yours sincerely,

"ROBERT BEAUFORT."

"To C. SPENCER, Esq., Junr."

When Sidney received this letter, he was with Mr. Spencer, and the latter read it over the young man's shoulder, on which he leaned affectionately. When they came to the concluding words, Sidney turned round with a vacant look and a hollow smile. "You see, sir," he said, "you see—"

"My boy—my son—you bear this as you ought. Contempt will soon efface—"

Sidney started to his feet, and his whole countenance was changed.

"Contempt! Yes, for him! But for her—she knows it not—she is no party to this—I cannot believe it—I will not! I—I—" and he rushed out of the room. He was absent till nightfall, and when he returned he endeavoured to appear calm, but it was in vain.

The next day brought him a letter from Camilla, written unknown to her parents; short, it is true (confirming the sentence of separation contained in her father's), and imploring him not to reply to it, but still so full of gentle and of sorrowful feeling, so evidently worded in the wish to soften the anguish she inflicted, that it did more than soothe—it even administered hope.

Now, when Mr. Robert Beaufort had recovered the ordinary tone of his mind sufficiently to indite the letter Sidney had just read, he had become fully sensible of the necessity of concluding the marriage between Philip and Camilla before the publicity of the lawsuit. The action for the ejectment could not take place before the ensuing March or April. He would waive the ordinary etiquette of time and mourning to arrange all before. In the first place, he could thus, by means of settlements, at once secure all the conditions most to his advantage; and, secondly, he lived in hourly fear lest Philip should discover that he had a rival in his brother, and break off the marriage with its contingent advantages. The first announcement of such a suit in the newspapers might reach the Spencers; and if the young man were, as he doubted not, Sidney Beaufort, would necessarily bring him forward, and ensure the dreaded explanation. Thus apprehensive and ever scheming, Robert Beaufort spoke to Philip so much, and with such apparent feeling, of his wish to gratify, at the earliest possible period, the last wish of his son in the union now arranged—he spoke with such seeming consideration and good sense of the avoidance of all scandal and misinterpretation in the suit itself, which suit a previous marriage between the claimant and his daughter would show at once to be of so amicable a nature—that Philip, ardently in love as he was, could not but assent to any hastening of his expected happiness compatible with decorum. As to any previous publicity by way of newspaper comment, he agreed with Mr. Beaufort in deprecating it. But then came the question, What name was he to bear in the interval?

"As to that," said Philip, somewhat proudly, "when, after my mother's suit in her own behalf, I persuaded her not to bear the name of Beaufort, though her due—and, for my own part, I prized her own modest name, which, under such dark appearances, was in reality spotless—as much as the loftier one which you bear and my father bore, so I shall not resume the name the law denies me till the law restores it to me. Law alone can efface the wrong which law has done me."

Mr. Beaufort was pleased with this reasoning (erroneous though it was), and he now hoped that all would be safely arranged.

That a girl so situated as Camilla, and of a character not energetic or profound, but submissive, dutiful, and timid, should yield to the arguments of her father, the desire of her dying brother—that she should not dare to refuse to become the instrument of peace to a divided family, the saving sacrifice to her father's endangered fortunes—that, in fine, when, nearly a month after Arthur's death, her father, leading her into the room where Philip waited her footstep with a beating heart, placed her hand in his, and Philip, falling on his knees, said, "May I hope to retain this hand for life?" she should falter out such words as he might construe into not reluctant acquiescence—that all this should happen, is so natural that the reader is already prepared for it. But still she thought with bitter and remorseful feelings of him thus deliberately and faithlessly renounced. She felt how deeply he had loved her, she knew how fearful would be his grief. She looked sad and thoughtful; but her brother's death was sufficient, in Philip's eyes, to account for that. The praises and gratitude of her father, to whom she suddenly seemed to become an object of even greater pride and affection than ever Arthur had been—the comfort of a generous heart, that takes pleasure in the very sacrifice it makes: the acquittal of her conscience as to the motives of her conduct—began, however, to produce their effect. Nor, as she had lately seen more of Philip, could she be insensible of his attachment—of his many noble qualities—of the pride which most women might have felt in his addresses when his rank was once made clear; and, as she had ever been of a character more regulated by duty than passion, so one who could have seen what was passing in her mind, would have had little fear for Philip's future happiness in her keeping; little fear but that, when once married to him, her affections would have gone along with her duties; and that, if the first love were yet recalled, it would be with a sigh due rather to some romantic recollection than some continued regret. Few of either sex are ever united to their first love; yet married people jog on, and call each other "my dear" and "my darling" all the same! It might be, it is true, that Philip would be scarcely loved with the intenseness with which he loved; but if Camilla's feelings were capable of corresponding to the ardent and impassioned ones of that strong and vehement nature—such feelings were not yet developed in her: the heart of the woman might still be half concealed in the veil of the virgin innocence—Philip himself was satisfied; he believed that he was beloved; for it is the property of love, in a large and noble heart, to reflect itself, and to set its own image in the eyes on which it looks. As the poet gives ideal beauty and excellence to some ordinary child of Eve, worshipping less the being that is than the being it images and conceives, so Love, which makes us all poets for a while, throws its own divine light over a heart perhaps really cold, and becomes dazzled into the joy of a false belief by the very lustre with which it surrounds its object.

The more, however, Camilla saw of Philip, the more (gradually overcoming her former mysterious and superstitious awe of him) she grew familiarised to his peculiar cast of character and thought, so the more she began to distrust her father's assertion that he had insisted on her hand as a price—a bargain—an equivalent for the sacrifice of a dire revenge. And with this thought came another. Was she worthy of this man? Was she not deceiving him? Ought she not to say, at least, that she had known a previous attachment, however determined she might be to subdue it? Often the desire for this just and honourable confession trembled on her lips, and as often was it checked by some chance circumstance or some maiden fear. Despite their connection, there was not yet between them that delicious intimacy which ought to accompany the affianced of two hearts and souls. The gloom of the house—the restraint on the very language of love which a death so recent and so deplored imposed, accounted in much for this reserve. And for the rest, Robert Beaufort left them very few and very brief opportunities to be alone.

In the mean time, Philip (now persuaded that the Beauforts were ignorant of his brother's fate) had set Mr. Barlow's activity in search of Sidney; and his painful anxiety to discover one so dear and so mysteriously lost, was the only cause of uneasiness which the brightening future appeared likely to bestow. While these researches, hitherto fruitless, were being made, it so happened, as London began now to refill and gossip to revive, that a report got abroad, no one knew how (probably from the servants), that Monsieur de Vaudemont, a distinguished French officer, was shortly to lead the daughter and sole heiress of Robert Beaufort, Esq., M. P., to the hymeneal altar; and that report very quickly found its way into the London papers; from the London papers it spread to the Provincial; it reached the eyes of Sidney in his now gloomy and despairing solitude. The day that he read it he disappeared.

CHAPTER XIX.

"Jul. Good lady, love him!
You have a noble and an honest gentleman.
I ever found him so.
Love him no less than I have done, and serve him,
And Heaven shall bless you—you shall bless my ashes."
The Double Marriage.

We have been too long absent from Fanny: it is time to return to her. The delight she experienced when Philip made her understand all the benefits, the blessings that her courage, nay, her intellect had bestowed upon him—the blushing ecstasy with which she heard (as they returned to H—, the eventful morning of her deliverance, side by side, her hand clasped in his, and often pressed to his grateful lips) his praises, his thanks, his fear for her safety, his joy at regaining her—all this amounted to a bliss which, till then, she could not have conceived that life was capable of bestowing. And when he left her at H— to hurry to his lawyer's with the recovered document, it was but for an hour. He returned, and left her not for several days. And in that time he became sensible of her astonishing, and to him, it seemed, miraculous improvement in all that renders mind the equal to mind: miraculous, for he guessed not the influence that makes miracles its commonplace. And now he listened attentively to her when she conversed; he read with her (though reading was never much in his vocation;) his unfastidious ear was charmed with her voice when it sang those simple songs; and his manner (impressed alike by gratitude for the signal service rendered to him, and by the discovery that Fanny was no longer a child, whether in mind or years,) though not less gentle than before, was less familiar, less superior, more respectful, and more earnest. It was a change which raised her in her own self-esteem. Ah, those were rosy days for Fanny!

A less sagacious judge of character than Lilburne would have formed doubts, perhaps, of the nature of Philip's interest in Fanny. But he comprehended at once the fraternal interest which a man like Philip might well take in a creature like Fanny, if commended to his care by a protector whose doom was so awful as that which had engulfed the life of William Gawtreys. Lilburne had some thoughts at first of claiming her; but, as he had no power to compel her residence with him, he did not wish, on consideration, to come again in contact with Philip on ground so full of humbling recollections as that still overshadowed by the images of Gawtreys and Mary. He contented himself with writing an artful letter to Simon, stating that, from Fanny's residence with Mr. Gawtreys, and from her likeness to her mother, whom he had only seen as a child, he had conjectured the relationship she bore to himself; and, having obtained other evidence of that fact (he did not say what or where,) he had not scrupled to remove her to his roof, meaning to explain all to Mr. Gawtreys the next day. This letter was accompanied by one from a lawyer, informing Simon Gawtreys that Lord Lilburne would pay £200 a year, in quarterly payments, to his order; and that he was requested to add, that when the young lady he had so benevolently reared came of age, or married, an adequate provision would be made for her. Simon's eyes blazed up at this last intelligence, when read to him, though he neither comprehended nor sought to know why Lord Lilburne should be so generous, or what that noble person's letter to himself was intended to convey. For two days he seemed restored to vigorous sense; but, when he had once clutched the first payment made in advance, the touch of the money seemed to numb him back to his lethargy; the excitement of desire died in the feeling of possession.

And just at that time Fanny's happiness came to a close. Philip received Arthur Beaufort's letter; and now ensued long and frequent absences; and on his return, for about an hour or so at a time, he spoke of sorrow and death; and the books were closed, and the songs silenced. All fear for Fanny's safety was of course over—all necessity for her work—their little establishment was increased. She never stirred out without Sarah; yet she would rather that there had been some danger on her account for him to guard against, or some trial that his smile might soothe. His prolonged absences began to prey upon her—the books ceased to interest—no study filled up the dreary gap—her step grew listless—her cheek pale—she was sensible, at last, that his presence had become necessary to her very life. One day he came to the house earlier than usual, and with a much happier and serenest expression of countenance than he had worn of late.

Simon was dozing in his chair, with his old dog, now scarce vigorous enough to bark, curled up at his feet. Neither man nor dog was more as a witness to what was spoken than the leather chair or the hearth rug on which they severally reposed.

There was something which, in actual life, greatly contributed to the interest of Fanny's strange lot, but which in narration, I feel I cannot make sufficiently clear to the reader. And this was her connection and residence with that old man. Her character forming, as his was completely gone; here the blank becoming filled, there the page fading to a blank. It was the utter, total deathliness in life of Simon that, while so impressive to see, renders it impossible to bring him before the reader in his full force of contrast to the young Psyche. He seldom spoke—often not from morning till night—he now seldom stirred. It is in vain to describe the indescribable: let the reader draw the picture for himself. And whenever (as I sometimes think he will, after he has closed this book) he conjures up the idea he attaches to the name of its heroine, let him see before her, as she glides through the humble room—as she listens to the voice of him she loves—as she sits musing by the window, with the church spire just visible—as, day by day, the soul brightens and expands within her—still let the reader see within the same walls—gray-haired, blind, dull to all feeling, frozen to all life—that stony image of Time and Death! Perhaps then he may understand why they who beheld the real and the living Fanny blooming under that chill and mass of shadow, felt that her grace, her simplicity, her charming beauty were raised by the contrast, till they grew associated with thoughts and images, mysterious and profound, belonging not more to the lovely than to the sublime.

So there sat the old man; and Philip, though aware of his presence, speaking as if he were alone with Fanny, after touching on more casual topics, thus addressed her:

"My true and my dear friend, it is to you that I shall owe, not only my rights and fortune, but the vindication of my mother's memory. You have not only placed flowers upon that gravestone, but it is from you, under Providence, that it will be inscribed at last with the name which refutes all calumny. Young and innocent as you now are, my gentle and beloved benefactress, you cannot as yet know what a blessing it will be to me to engrave that name upon that simple stone. Hereafter, when you yourself are a wife, a mother, you will comprehend the service you have rendered to the living and the dead!"

He stopped, struggling with the rush of emotions that overflowed his heart. Alas! THE DEAD! what service can we render to them? What availed it now, either to the dust below or to the immortality above, that the fools and knaves of this world should mention Catharine whose life was gone, whose ears were deaf, with more or less respect? There is in calumny that poison that, even when the character throws off the slander, the heart remains diseased beneath the effect. They say that truth comes sooner or later; but it seldom comes before the soul, passing from agony to contempt, has grown callous to men's judgments. Calumniate a human being in youth, adulate that being in age: what has been the interval? Will the adulation atone either for the torture, or the hardness which the torture leaves at last? And if, as in Catharine's case (a case how common!) the truth came too late—if the tomb is closed—if the heart you have wrung can be wrung no more—why, the truth is as valueless as the epitaph on a forgotten name! Some such conviction of the hollowness of his own words, when he spoke of service to the dead, smote upon Philip's heart, and stopped the flow of his words.

Fanny, conscious only of his praise, his thanks, and the tender affection of his voice, stood still silent, her eyes downcast, her breast heaving.

Philip resumed:

"And now, Fanny, my honoured sister, I would thank you for more, were it possible, even than this. I shall owe to you not only name and fortune, but happiness. It is from the rights to which you have assisted me, and which will shortly be made clear, that I am enabled to demand a hand I have long coveted: the hand of one as dear to me as you are. In a word, the time has this day been fixed when I shall have a home to offer to you and to this old man; when I can present to you a sister who will prize you as I do; for I love you so dearly, I owe you so much, that even that home would lose half its smiles if you were not there. Do you understand me, Fanny? The sister I speak of will be my wife!"

The poor girl who heard this speech of most cruel tenderness did not fall, or faint, or evince any outward emotion except in a deadly paleness. She seemed like one turned to a stone. Her very breath forsook her for some moments, and then came back with a long deep sigh. She laid her hand lightly upon his arm, and said calmly,

"Yes, I understand. We once saw a wedding. You are to be married: I shall see yours."

"You shall; and later, perhaps, I may see your own. I have a brother—ah! if I could but find him—younger than I am, beautiful almost as you!"

"You will be happy," said Fanny, still calmly.

"I have long placed my hopes of happiness in such a union! Stay! where are you going?"

"To pray for you!" said Fanny, with a smile in which there was something of the old vacancy; and she walked gently from the room. Philip followed her with moistened eyes. He had no suspicion of her secret, and her manner now might have deceived one more vain. He soon after quitted the house and returned to town.

Three hours after, Sarah found Fanny stretched on the floor of her own room, so still, so white, that, for some moments, the old woman thought life was gone. She recovered, however, by degrees; and, after putting her hands to her eyes, and muttering some moments, seemed much as usual, except that she was more silent, and that her lips remained colourless, and her hands cold like stone.

CHAPTER XX.

Voc. Ye see what follows.

Drake. O, gentle sir! this shape again!"—The Chances.

That evening Sidney Beaufort arrived in London. It is the nature of solitude to make the passions calm on the surface, agitated in the deeps. Sidney had placed his whole existence in one object. When the letter arrived that told him to hope no more, he was at first rather sensible of the terrible and dismal blank—the "void abyss"—to which all his future was suddenly changed, than roused to vehement and turbulent emotion. But Camilla's letter had, as we have seen, raised his courage and animated his heart. To the idea of her faith he still clung with the instinct of hope in the midst of despair. The tidings that she was absolutely betrothed to another, and in so short a time since her rejection of him, let loose from all restraint his darker and more impetuous passions. In a state of mind bordering on phrensy, he hurried to London to seek her, to see her; with what intent, what hope, if hope there were, he himself could scarcely tell. But what man who has loved with fervour and trust will be contented to receive the sentence of eternal separation except from the very lips of the one thus worshipped and thus forsworn?

The day had been intensely cold. Towards evening, the snow fell fast and heavily. Sidney had not, since a child, been before in London; and the immense city, covered with a wintry and icy mist, through which the hurrying passengers and the slow-moving vehicles passed, spectre-like, along the dismal and slippery streets, opened to the stranger no hospitable arms. He knew not a step of the way—he was pushed to and fro—his scarce intelligible questions impatiently answered—the snow covered him—the frost pierced to his veins. At length a man, more kindly than the rest, and seeing that he was a stranger to London, procured him a hackney-coach, and directed the driver to the distant quarter of Berkeley Square. The snow balled under the hoofs of the horses; the groaning vehicle proceeded at the pace of a hearse. At length, and after a period of such suspense and such emotion as Sidney never in after-life could recall without a shudder, the coach stopped, the benumbed driver heavily descended, the sound of the knocker knelled loud through the muffled air, and the light from Mr. Beaufort's hall glared full upon the dizzy eyes of the visiter. He pushed aside the porter, and sprang into the hall. Luckily, one of the footmen who had attended Mrs. Beaufort to the lakes recognised him; and, in answer to his breathless inquiry, said,

"Why, indeed, Mr. Spencer, Miss Beaufort is at home—up stairs in the drawing-room, with master and mistress, and Monsieur de Vaudemont; but—"

Sidney waited no more. He bounded up the stairs; he opened the first door that presented itself to him, and burst, unannounced and unlooked for, upon the eyes of the group seated within. He saw not the terrified start of Mr.

Robert Beaufort; he heeded not the faint, nervous exclamation of the mother; he caught not the dark and wondering glance of the stranger seated beside Camilla; he saw but Camilla herself, and in a moment he was at her feet.

"Camilla, I am here! I, who love you so; I, who have nothing in the world but you!—I am here, to hear from you, and you alone, if I am indeed abandoned—if you are indeed to be another's!"

He had dashed his hat from his brow as he sprang forward; his long, fair hair, damp with the snows, fell disordered over his forehead; his eyes were fixed, as for life and death, upon the pale face and trembling lips of Camilla. Robert Beaufort, in great alarm, and well aware of the fierce temper of Philip, anticipative of some rash and violent impulse, turned his glance upon his destined son-in-law. But there was no angry pride in the countenance he there beheld. Philip had risen, but his frame was bent, his knees knocked together, his lips were parted, his eyes were staring full upon the face of the kneeling man.

Suddenly Camilla, sharing her father's fear, herself half arose, and, with an unconscious pathos, stretched one hand, as if to shelter, over Sidney's head, and looked to Philip. Sidney's eyes followed hers. He sprang to his feet.

"What, then, it is true! And this is the man for whom I am abandoned! But, unless you—you, with your own lips—tell me that you love me no more—that you love another, I will not yield you up but with life."

He stalked sternly and impetuously up to Philip, who recoiled as his rival advanced. The characters of the two men seemed suddenly changed. The timid dreamer seemed dilated into the fearless soldier. The soldier seemed shrinking—quailing—into nameless terror. Sidney grasped that strong arm, as Philip still retreated, with his slight and delicate fingers; grasped it with violence and menace; and, frowning into the face from which the swarthy blood was scared away, said, in a hollow whisper,

"Do you hear me? Do you comprehend me? I say that she shall not be forced into a marriage at which, I yet believe, her heart rebels. My claim is holier than yours. Renounce her, or win her but with my blood."

Philip did not apparently hear the words thus addressed to him. His whole senses seemed absorbed in the one sense of sight. He continued to gaze upon the speaker, till his eye dropped on the hand that yet gripped his arm. And as he thus looked he uttered an inarticulate cry. He caught the hand in his own, and pointed to a ring on the finger, but remained speechless. Mr. Beaufort approached, and began some stammered words of soothing to Sidney; but Philip motioned him to be silent; and at last, as if by a violent effort, said, not to Sidney, but to Beaufort,

"His name? his name?"

"It is Mr. Spencer—Mr. Charles Spencer," cried Beaufort. "Listen to me; I will explain all; I—I—"

"Hush! hush!" cried Philip; and, turning to Sidney, he put his hand on his shoulder, and, looking him full in the face, said,

"Have not you known another name? Are you not—yes, it is so—it is—it is! Follow me, follow!"

And still retaining his grasp, and leading Sidney, who was now subdued, awed, and a prey to new and wild suspicions, he moved on gently, stride by stride, his eyes fixed on that fair face, his lips muttering, till the closing door shut both forms from the eyes of the three there left—in what state of presentiment, or conjecture, or fear, the reader can imagine better than I describe.

It was the adjoining room into which Philip led his rival. It was lit but by a small reading-lamp, and the bright, steady blaze of the fire; and by this light they both continued to gaze on each other, as if spellbound, in complete silence. At last Philip, by an irresistible impulse, fell upon Sidney's bosom, and, clasping him with convulsive energy, gasped out,

"Sidney! Sidney! my mother's son!"

"What!" exclaimed Sidney, struggling from the embrace, and at last freeing himself; "it is you, then! you—my own brother! You, who have been hitherto the thorn in my path, the cloud in my fate! You, who are now come to make me a wretch for life! I love that woman, and you tear her from me! You, who subjected my infancy to hardship, and, but for Providence, might have degraded my youth, by your example, into shame and guilt!"

"Forbear! Forbear!" cried Philip with a voice so shrill in its agony that it smote the hearts of those in the adjoining chamber like the shriek of some despairing soul. They looked at each other, but not one had the courage to break upon the interview.

Sidney himself was appalled by the sound. He threw himself on a seat, and, overcome by passions so new to him, by excitement so strange, hid his face, and sobbed as a child.

Philip walked rapidly to and fro the room for some moments; at length he paused opposite to Sidney and said, with the deep calmness of a wronged and goaded spirit,

"Sidney Beaufort, hear me! When my mother died, she confided you to my care, my love, and my protection. In the last lines that her hand traced, she bade me think less of myself than of you, be to you as a father as well as brother. The hour that I read that letter, I fell on my knees and vowed that I would fulfil that injunction—that I would sacrifice my very self, if I could give fortune or happiness to you. And this not for your sake alone, Sidney; no! but as my mother—our wronged, our belied, our broken-hearted mother—oh Sidney, Sidney! have you no tears for her too?" He passed his hand over his own eyes for a moment, and resumed: "But as our mother, in that last letter, said to me, 'Let my love pass into your breast for him, so, Sidney, so, in all that I could do for you, I fancied that my mother's smile looked down upon me, and that, in serving you, it was my mother whom I obeyed. Perhaps hereafter, Sidney, when we talk over that period of my earlier life when I worked for you—when the degradation you speak of (there was no crime in it!) was borne cheerfully for your sake, and yours the holyday, though mine the task—perhaps hereafter you will do me more justice. You left me or were reft me, and I gave all the little fortune that my mother had bequeathed us to get some tidings from you. I received your letter—that bitter letter—and I cared not then that I was a beggar, since I was alone. You talk of what I have cost you—you talk!—and you now ask me to—to—merciful Heaven! let me understand you. Do you love Camilla? Does she love you? Speak—speak—explain; what new agony awaits me?"

It was then that Sidney, affected and humbled, amid all his more selfish sorrows, by his brother's language and manner, related, as succinctly as he could, the history of his affection for Camilla, the circumstances of their engagement, and ended by placing before him the letter he had received from Mr. Beaufort.

In spite of all his efforts for self-control, Philip's anguish was so great, so visible, that Sidney, after looking at his working features, his trembling hands for a moment, felt all the earlier parts of his nature melt in a flow of generous sympathy and remorse. He flung himself on the breast from which he had shrunk before, and cried,

"Brother, brother! forgive me. I see how I have wronged you. If she has forgotten me—if she love you, take her and be happy!"

Philip returned his embrace, but without warmth, and then moved away; and again, in great disorder, paced the room. His brother only heard disjointed exclamations that seemed to escape unawares: "They said she loved me! Heaven give me strength! Mother, mother! let me fulfil my vow! Oh, that I had died ere this!" He stopped at last, and the large dewdrops rolled down his forehead.

"Sidney!" said he, "there is mystery here that I comprehend not. But my mind now is very confused. If she loves you—if! Is it possible for a woman to love two? Well, well, I go to solve the riddle: wait here!"

He vanished into the next room, and for nearly half an hour Sidney was alone. He heard through the partition murmured voices; he caught more clearly the sound of Camilla's sobs. The particulars of that interview between Philip and Camilla, alone at first (afterward Mr. Robert Beaufort was re-admitted), Philip never disclosed, nor could Sidney himself ever obtain a clear account from Camilla, who could not recall it, even years after, without great emotion. But at last the door was opened, and Philip entered leading Camilla by the hand. His face was calm, and there was a smile on his lips; a greater dignity than even that habitual to him was diffused over his whole person. Camilla was holding her handkerchief to her eyes, and weeping passionately. Mr. Beaufort followed them with a mortified and slinking air.

"Sidney," said Philip, "it is past. All is arranged. I yield to your earlier, and, therefore, better claim. Mr. Beaufort consents to your union. He will tell you, at some fitter time, that our birthright is at last made clear, and that there is no blot on the name we shall hereafter bear. Sidney, embrace your bride!"

Amazed, delighted, and still half incredulous, Sidney seized and kissed the hand of Camilla; and as he then drew her to his breast, she said, as she pointed to Philip,

"Oh! if you do love me as you say, see in him the generous, the noble—" Fresh sobs broke off her speech; but, as Sidney sought again to take her hand, she whispered, with a touching and a womanly sentiment, "Ah! respect him: see!" and Sidney, looking then at his brother, saw that, though he still attempted to smile, his lip writhed, and his features were drawn together, as one whose frame is wrung by torture, but who struggles not to groan.

He flew to Philip, who, grasping his hand, held him back and said,

"I have fulfilled my vow! I have given you up the only blessing my life has known. Enough! you are happy; and I shall be so too, when God pleases to soften this blow. And now you must not wonder or blame me if, though so lately found, I leave you a while. Do me one kindness—you, Sidney—you, Mr. Beaufort. Let the marriage take place at H—, in the village church by which my mother sleeps; let it be delayed till the suit is terminated; by that time I shall hope to meet you all—to meet you, Camilla, as I ought to meet my brother's wife: till then, my presence will not sadden your happiness. Do not seek to see me, do not expect to hear from me. Hush! be silent, all of you; my heart is yet bruised and sore. Oh Thou," and here, deepening in his voice, he raised his arms, "Thou, who hast preserved my youth from such snares and such peril—who hast guided my steps from the abyss to which they wandered, and beneath whose hand I now bow, grateful if chastened—receive this offering and bless that union! Fare ye well."

CHAPTER XXI.

"Heaven's airs amid the harpstrings dwell;
And we wish they ne'er may fade;
They cease; and the soul is a silent cell,
Where music never played.
Dream follows dream through the long night-hours"
WILSON: The Past, a poem.

The self-command which Philip had obtained for a while deserted him when he was without the house. His mind felt broken up into chaos; he hurried on, mechanically, on foot; he passed street upon street, now solitary and deserted, as the lamps gleamed upon the thick snow. The city was left behind him. He paused not, till, breathless, and exhausted in spirit if not in frame, he reached the churchyard where Catharine's dust reposed. The snow had ceased to fall, but it lay deep over the graves. The yew-trees, clad in their white shrouds, gleamed ghostlike through the dimness. Upon the rail that fenced the tomb yet hung a wreath that Fanny's hand had placed there; but the flowers were hid; it was a wreath of snow! Through the intervals of the huge and still clouds there gleamed a few melancholy stars. The very calm of the holy spot seemed unutterably sad. The death of the year overhung the death of man. And, as Philip bent over the tomb, within and without all was Ice and Night!

How long he remained on that spot, what were his emotions or his prayers, he himself never afterward could recall. Long past midnight Fanny heard his step on the stairs, and the door of his chamber close with unwonted violence. She heard, too, for some hours, his heavy tread on the floor, till suddenly all was silent. The next morning, when, at the usual hour, Sarah entered to uncloset the shutters and light the fire, she was startled by wild exclamations and wilder laughter. The fever had mounted to the brain: he was delirious.

For several weeks Philip Beaufort was in imminent danger; for a considerable part of that time he was unconscious; and, when the peril was past, his recovery was slow and gradual. It was the only illness to which his vigorous frame had ever been subjected; and the fever had perhaps exhausted him more than it might have done one in whose constitution the disease had encountered less resistance. His brother, imagining he had gone abroad, was unacquainted with his danger. None tended his sickbed save the hireling nurse, the fee'd physician, and the unpurchaseable rank of the heir of Beaufort Court were as nothing. Here was reserved for him Fate's crowning lesson, in the vanity of those human wishes which anchor in gold and power. For how many years had the exile and the outcast pined indignantly for his birthright! Lo! it was won, and with it came the crushed heart and the smitten frame. As he slowly recovered sense and reasoning, these thoughts struck him forcibly. He felt as if he were rightly punished in having disdained, during his earlier youth, the enjoyments within his reach. Was there nothing in the glorious health—the unconquerable hope—the heart, if wrung, and chafed, and sorely tried, free at least from the direst anguish of the passions, disappointed and jealous love? Though certain, if spared to the future, to be rich, powerful, righted in name and honour, might he not, from that sickbed, envy his earlier past? even when with his brother-orphan he wandered through the solitary fields, and felt with what energies we are gifted when we have something to protect; or when, loving and beloved, he saw life smile out to him in the eyes of Eugenie; or when, after that melancholy loss, he wrestled boldly, and breast to breast, with Fortune, in a far land, for honour and independence? There is something in severe illness, especially if it be in violent contrast to the usual strength of the body, which has often the most salutary effect upon the mind—which often, by the affliction of the frame, roughly wins us from the too morbid pains of the heart—which makes us feel that, in mere life, enjoyed as the robust enjoy it, God's great principle of good breathes and moves. We rise, thus, from the sickbed softened and humbled, and more disposed to look around us for such blessings as we may yet command.

The return of Philip, his danger, the necessity of exertion, of tending him, had roused Fanny from a state which might otherwise have been permanently dangerous to the intellect so lately ripened within her. With what patience, with what fortitude, with what unutterable thought and devotion she fulfilled that best and holiest woman's duty, let the man whose struggle with life and death has been blessed with the vigil that wakes and saves imagine to himself. And in all her anxiety and terror she had glimpses of a happiness which it seemed to her almost criminal to acknowledge. For, even in his delirium, her voice seemed to have some soothing influence over him, and he was calmer when she was by. And when at last he was conscious, her face was the first he saw, and her name the first which his lips uttered. As then he grew gradually stronger, and the bed was deserted for the sofa, he took more than the old pleasure in hearing her read to him, which she did with a feeling that lecturers cannot teach. And once, in a pause from this occupation, he spoke to her frankly; he sketched his past history—his last sacrifice. And Fanny, as she wept, learned that he was no more another's!

It has been said that this man, naturally of an active and impatient temperament, had been little accustomed to seek those resources which are found in books. But somehow, in that sick chamber, it was Fanny's voice—the voice of her over whose mind he had once so haughtily lamented—that taught him how much of aid and solace the herd of men derive from the everlasting genius of the few.

Gradually, and interval by interval, moment by moment, thus drawn together, all thought beyond shut out (for, however crushing for the time the blow that had stricken Philip from health and reason, he was not that slave to a guilty fancy that he could voluntarily indulge—that he would not earnestly seek to shun all sentiments that yet turned with unholy yearning towards the betrothed of his brother)—gradually,

I say, and slowly, came those progressive and delicious epochs which mark a revolution in the affections: unspeakable gratitude, brotherly tenderness, the united strength of compassion and respect that he had felt for Fanny, seemed, as he gained health, to mellow into feelings yet more exquisite and deep. He could no longer delude himself with a vain and imperious belief that it was a defective mind that his heart protected; he began again to be sensible to the rare beauty of that tender face: more lovely, perhaps, for the paleness that had replaced its bloom. The fancy that he had so imperiously checked before—before he saw Camilla, returned to him, and neither pride nor honour had now the right to chase the soft wings away. One evening, fancying himself alone, he fell into a profound reverie; he awoke with a start, and the exclamation, "Was it true love that I ever felt for Camilla, or a passion—a phrensy—a delusion?"

His exclamation was answered by a sound that seemed both of joy and grief. He looked up, and saw Fanny before him; the light of the moon, just risen, fell full on her form, but her hands were clasped before her face; he heard her sob.

"Fanny, dear Fanny," he cried, and sought to throw himself from the sofa to her feet. But she drew herself away, and fled from the chamber as a dream.

Philip rose, and, for the first time since his illness, walked, but with feeble steps, to and fro the room. With what different emotions from those in which last, in fierce and intolerable agony, he had paced that narrow boundary! Returning health crept through his veins; a serene, a kindly, a celestial joy circumfused his heart. Had the time yet come when the old Florimel had melted into snow; when the new and the true one, with its warm life, its tender beauty, its maiden wealth of love, had risen before his hopes? He paused before the window; the spot within seemed so confined, the night without so calm and lovely, that he forgot his still-clinging malady, and unclosed the casement: the air came soft and fresh upon his temples, and the church tower and spire, for the first time, did not seem to him to rise in gloom against the heavens. Even the grave-stone of Catharine, half in moonlight, half in shadow, appeared to him to wear a smile. His mother's memory was become linked with the living Fanny.

"Thou art vindicated—thy Sidney is happy," he murmured: "to her the thanks!"

Fair hopes and soft thoughts busy within him, he remained at the casement till the increasing chill warned him of the danger he incurred.

The next day, when the physician visited him, he found the fever had returned. For many days Philip was again in danger—dull, unconscious even of the step and voice of Fanny.

He woke at last as from a long and profound sleep; woke so refreshed, so revived, that he felt at once that some great crisis had been passed, and that, at length, he had struggled back to the sunny shores of Life.

By his bedside sat Liancourt, who, long alarmed at his disappearance, had at last contrived, with the help of Mr. Barlow, to trace him to Gawtreys house, and had for several days taken share in the vigils of poor Fanny.

While he was yet explaining all this to Philip, and congratulating him on his evident recovery, the physician entered to confirm the congratulation. In a few days the invalid was able to quit his room, and nothing but change of air seemed necessary for his convalescence. It was then that Liancourt, who had for two days seemed impatient to unburden himself of some communication, thus addressed him:

"My dear friend, I have learned, now, your story from Barlow, who called several times during your relapse, and who is the more anxious about you, as the time for the decision of your case now draws near. The sooner you quit this house the better."

"Quit this house? and why? Is there not one in this house to whom I owe my fortune and my life?"

"Yes; and for that reason I say, Go hence: it is the only return you can make her."

"Pshaw! speak intelligibly."

"I will," said Liancourt, gravely. "I have been a watcher with her by your sickbed, and I know what you must feel already; nay, I must confess that even the old servant has ventured to speak to me. You have inspired that poor girl with feelings dangerous to her peace."

"Ha!" cried Philip, with such joy that Liancourt frowned and said, "Hitherto I have been too honourable to—"

"So you think she loves me?" interrupted Philip.

"Yes; what then? You, the heir of Beaufort Court—of a rental of £20,000 a year—of an historical name—you cannot marry this poor girl!"

"Well! I will consider what you say; and, at all events, I will leave the house to attend the result of the trial. Let us talk no more on the subject now."

Philip had the penetration to perceive that Liancourt, who was greatly moved by the beauty, the innocence, and unprotected position of Fanny, had not confined caution to himself; that, with his characteristic, well-meaning bluntness, and with the license of a man somewhat advanced in years, he had spoken to Fanny herself: for Fanny now seemed to shun him; her eyes were heavy, her manner was embarrassed. He saw the change, but it did not grieve him; he hailed the omens which he drew from it.

And at last he and Liancourt went. He was absent three weeks, during which time the formality of the friendly lawsuit was decided, and the public were in ecstasies at the noble and sublime conduct of Mr. Robert Beaufort; who, the moment he had discovered a document which he might so easily have buried for ever in oblivion, voluntarily agreed to dispossess himself of estates he had so long enjoyed, preferring conscience to lucre. Some persons observed that it was reported that Mr. Philip Beaufort had also been generous; that he had agreed to give up the estates for his uncle's life, and was only, in the meanwhile, to receive a fourth of the revenues. But the universal comment was, "He could not have done less!" Mr. Robert Beaufort was, as Lord Lilburne had once observed, a man who was born, made, and reared to be spoken well of by the world; and it was a comfort to him now, poor man! to feel that his character was so highly estimated. If Philip should live to the age of one hundred, he will never become so respectable and popular a man with the crowd as his worthy uncle. But does it much matter?

Philip returned to H—the eve before the day fixed for the marriage of his brother and Camilla.

CHAPTER XXII.

"From Night, Sunshine and Day arose!"—Hes.

The sun of early May shone cheerfully over the quiet suburb of H—. In the thoroughfares life was astir. It was the hour of noon, the hour at which commerce is busy and streets are full. The old retired trader, eyeing wistfully the rolling coach or the oft-pausing omnibus, was breathing the fresh and scented air in the broadest and most crowded road, from which, afar in the distance, rose the spires of the metropolis. The boy let loose from the day-school was hurrying home to dinner, his satchel on his back; the ballad-singer was sending her cracked whine through the obscurer alleys, where the baker's boy, with puddings on his tray, and the smart maid-servant, despatched for porter, paused to listen. And round the shops where cheap shawls and cottons tempted the female eye, many a loitering girl detained her impatient mother, and eyed the tickets and calculated her hard-gained savings for the Sunday gear. And in the corners of the streets steamed the itinerant kitchens of the piemen, and rose the sharp cry, "All hot! all hot!" in the ear of infant and ragged Hunger. And amid them all rolled on some lazy coach of ancient merchant or withered maiden, unconscious of any life but that creeping through their own dull-rivered veins. And before the house in which Catharine died there loitered many stragglers, gossips of the hamlet, subscribers to the news-room hard by, to guess, and speculate, and wonder why, from the church behind, there rose the merry peal of the marriage bell!

At length, along the broad road leading from the great city, there were seen rapidly advancing three carriages of a different fashion from those familiar to the suburb. On they came; swiftly they whirled round the angle that conducted to the church, the hoofs of the gay steeds ringing cheerily on the ground, the white favours of the servants gleaming in the sun. Happy is the bride the sun shines on! And when the carriages had thus vanished, the scattered groups melted into one crowd, and took their way to the church. They stood idling without in the burial-ground, many of them round the fence that guarded from their footsteps Catharine's lonely grave. All in nature was glad, exhilarating, and yet serene; a genial freshness breathed through the soft air; not a cloud was to be seen in the smiling azure; even the old dark yews seemed happy in their everlasting verdure. The bell ceased, and then even the crowd grew silent; and not a sound was heard in that solemn spot to whose demesnes are consecrated alike the Birth, the Marriage, and the Death.

At length there came forth from the church-door the goodly form of a rosy beadle. Approaching the groups, he whispered the better-dressed, and commanded the ragged; remonstrated with the old, and lifted his cane to the young; and the result of all was, that the churchyard, not without many a murmur and expostulation, was cleared, and the crowd fell back in the space behind the gates of the principal entrance, where they swayed, and gaped, and chattered round the carriages which were to bear away the bridal party.

Within the church, as the ceremony was now concluded, Philip Beaufort conducted, hand-in-hand, silently along the aisle, his brother's wife.

Leaning on his stick, his cold sneer upon his thin lip, Lord Lilburne limped, step by step, with the pair, though a little apart from them, glancing from moment to moment at the face of Philip Beaufort, where he had hoped to read a grief that he could not detect. Lord Lilburne had carefully refrained from an interview with Philip till that day, and he now only came to the wedding, as a surgeon goes to an hospital to examine a wound which he had been told would be great and sore: he was disappointed. Close behind followed Sidney, radiant with joy, and bloom, and beauty; and his kind guardian, the tears rolling down his eyes, murmured blessings as he looked upon him. Mrs. Beaufort had declined attending the ceremony: her nerves were too weak; but behind, at a long interval, came Robert Beaufort, sober, staid, collected as ever to outward seeming; but a close observer might have seen that his eye had lost its habitual complacent cunning, that his step was more heavy, his stoop more joyless. About his air there was something crestfallen. The consciousness of acres had passed away from his portly presence; he was no longer a possessor, but a pensioner. The rich man, who had decided as he pleased on the happiness of others, was a cipher: he had ceased to have an interest in anything. What to him the marriage of his daughter now? Her children would not be the heirs of Beaufort. As Camilla kindly turned round, and, through happy tears, waited for his approach to clasp his hand, he forced a smile, but it was sickly and piteous. He longed to creep away and be alone.

"My father!" said Camilla, in her sweet, low voice; and she extricated herself from Philip and threw herself on his breast.

"She is a good child," said Robert Beaufort, vacantly; and, turning his dry eyes to the group, he caught instinctively at his customary common-places; "and a good child, Mr. Sidney, makes a good wife!"

The clergyman bowed as if the compliment were addressed to himself; he was the only man there whom Robert Beaufort could now deceive.

"My sister," said Philip Beaufort, as, once more leaning on his arm, they passed before the church-door, "may Sidney love and prize you—as I would have done; and believe me, both of you, I have no regret, no memory that wounds me now."

He dropped her hand, and motioned to her father to lead her to the carriage. Then winding his arm into Sidney's, he said,

"Wait till they are gone: I have one word yet with you. Go on, gentlemen."

The clergyman bowed, and walked through the churchyard. But Lilburne, pausing and surveying Philip Beaufort, said to him whisperingly,

"And so much for feeling—the folly! So much for generosity—the delusion! Happy man!"

"I am thoroughly happy, Lord Lilburne."

"Are you? Then it was neither feeling nor generosity; and we were taken in! Good-day." With that he limped slowly to the gate.

Philip answered not the sarcasm even by a look, for at that moment a loud shout was set up by the mob without: they had caught a glimpse of the bride.

"Come, Sidney, this way," said he; "I must not detain you long."

Arm in arm they passed out of the church, and turned to the spot hard by where the flowers smiled up to them from the stone on their mother's grave.

The old inscription had been effaced, and the name of CATHARINE BEAUFORT was placed upon the stone.

"Brother," said Philip, "do not forget this grave: years hence, when children play around your own hearth. Observe, the name of Catharine Beaufort is fresher on the stone than the dates of birth and death; the name was only inscribed there to day—your wedding day! Brother, by this grave we are now indeed united."

"Oh, Philip!" cried Sidney, in deep emotion, clasping the hand stretched out to him, "I feel, I feel how noble, how great you are; that you have sacrificed more than I dreamed of—"

"Hush!" said Philip, with a smile; "no talk of this. I am happier than you deem me. Go in; she waits you."

"And you! Leave you alone!"

"Not alone," said Philip, pointing to the grave.

Scarce had he spoken when from the gate came the shrill, clear voice of Lord Lilburne.

"We wait for Mr. Sidney Beaufort."

Sidney passed his hand over his eyes, wrung his brother's hand once more, and in a moment was by Camilla's side.

Another shout—the whirl of the wheels—the tramping of feet—the distant hum and murmur—and all was still.

The clerk returned to lock up the church—he did not observe where Philip stood in the shadow of the wall—and went home to talk of the gay wedding, and inquire at what hour the funeral of a young woman, his next-door neighbour, would take place the next day.

It might be a quarter of an hour after Philip was thus left—nor had he moved from the spot—when he felt his sleeve pulled gently. He turned round and saw before him the wistful face of Fanny!

"So you would not come to the wedding?" said he.

"No. But I fancied you might be here alone—and sad."

"And you will not even wear the dress I gave you?"

"Another time. Tell me, are you unhappy?"

"Unhappy, Fanny! No; look around. The very burial-ground has a smile. See the laburnums clustering over the wall; listen to the birds on the dark yews above; and yonder, see, even the butterfly has settled upon a grave! I am not unhappy." As he thus spoke he looked at her earnestly, and, taking both her hands in his, drew her gently towards him, and continued: "Fanny, do you remember that, leaning over that gate, I once spoke to you of the happiness of marriage where two hearts are united. Nay, Fanny, nay, I must go on. It was here in this spot—it was here that I first saw you on my return to England. I came to seek the dead, and I have thought since it was my mother's guardian spirit that drew me hither to find you—the living! And often afterward, Fanny, you would come with me here, when, blinded and dull as I was, I came to brood and repine, insensible of the treasures even then, perhaps, within my reach. But best as it was; the ordeal through which I have passed has made me more grateful for the prize I now dare to hope for. On this grave your hand daily renewed the flowers. By this grave, the link between the Time and the Eternity, whose lessons we have read together, will you consent to record our vows? Fanny—dearest, fairest, tenderest, best—I love you, and at last as alone you should be loved! I woo you as my wife! Mine, not for a season, but for ever: for ever, even when these graves are opened, and the World shrivels like a scroll. Do you understand me?"

Do you heed me? Or have I dreamed that that—"

He stopped short: a dismay seized him at her silence. Had he been mistaken in his divine belief? The fear was momentary: for Fanny, who had recoiled as he spoke, now placing her hands to her temples, gazing on him, breathless, and with lips apart, as if, indeed, with great effort and struggle, her modest spirit conceived the possibility of the happiness that broke upon it, advanced timidly, her face suffused in blushes; and, looking into his eyes as if she would read into his very soul, said, with an accent, the intensity of which showed that her whole fate hung on his answer,

"But this is pity! They have told you that I—in short, you are generous—you—you—Oh, deceive me not! Do you love her still? Can you—do you love the humble, foolish Fanny?"

"As God shall judge me, sweet one, I am sincere! I have survived a passion, never so sweet, so tender, so entire as that I now feel for you! And oh, Fanny, hear this true confession! It was you—you to whom my heart turned before I saw Camilla! Against that impulse I struggled in the blindness of a haughty error!"

Fanny uttered a low and suppressed cry of delight and rapture. Philip passionately continued:

"Fanny, make blessed the life you have saved. Fate destined us for each other. Fate for me has ripened your sweet mind: Fate for you has softened this rugged heart. We may have yet much to bear and much to learn. We will console and teach each other!"

He drew her to his breast as he spoke; drew her trembling, blushing, confused, but no more reluctant; and there, by the GRAVE that had been so memorable a scene in their common history, were murmured those vows in which all this world knows of human happiness is treasured and recorded: love that takes the sting from grief, and faith that gives eternity to love. All silent, yet all serene around them! Above, the heaven; at their feet, the grave. For the love, the grave! for the faith, the heaven!

CHAPTER THE LAST.

"A labore reclinat otium."—HORAT.

I feel that there is some justice in the affection the general reader entertains for the old-fashioned, and now somewhat obsolete, custom of giving to him, at the close of a work, the latest news of those who sought his acquaintance through its progress.

The weak but well-meaning Smith, no more oppressed by the evil influence of his brother, has continued to pass his days in comfort and respectability on the income settled on him by Philip Beaufort. Mr. and Mrs. Roger Morton still live, and have just resigned their business to their eldest son, retiring themselves to a small villa adjoining the town in which they had made their fortune. Mrs. Morton is very apt, when she goes out to tea, to talk of her dear deceased sister-in-law, the late Mrs. Beaufort, and of her own remarkable kindness to her nephew when a little boy. She observes that, in fact, the young men owe every thing to Mr. Roger and herself; and, indeed, though Sidney was never a grateful disposition, and has not been near her since, yet the elder brother, the Mr. Beaufort, always evinces his respect to them by the yearly present of a fat buck. She then comments on the ups and downs of life; and observes that it is a pity that her son Tom preferred the medical profession to the Church; their cousin, Mr. Beaufort, has two livings. To all this Mr. Roger says nothing, except an occasional "Thank Heaven, I want no man's help! I am as well to do as my neighbours. But that's neither here nor there."

There are some readers—they who do not thoroughly consider the truths of this life—who will yet ask, "But how is Lord Lilburne punished?" Punished: ay and indeed, how? The world, and not the poet, must answer that question. Crime is punished from without. If Vice is punished, it must be within. The Lilburnes of this hollow world are not to be pelted with the soft roses of poetical justice. They who ask why he is not punished, may be the first to doff the hat to the equipage in which he lolls through the streets! The only offence he habitually committed of a nature to bring the penalties of detection, he renounced the moment he perceived there was danger of discovery; he gambled no more after Philip's hint. He was one of those, some years after, most bitter upon a certain nobleman charged with unfair play; one of those who took the accusation as proved, and whose authority settled all disputes thereon.

But, if no thunderbolt falls on Lord Lilburne's head—if he is fated still to eat, and drink, and die on his bed, he may yet taste the ashes of the Dead Sea fruit which his hands have gathered. He is grown old. His infirmities increase upon him. His sole resources of pleasure—the senses—are dried up. For him there is no longer savour in the viands or sparkle in the wine: inan delights him not, nor woman either. He is alone with Old Age, and in sight of Death.

With the exception of Simon, who died in his chair not many days after Sidney's marriage, Robert Beaufort is the only one among the more important agents left at the last scene of this history who has passed from our mortal stage. After the marriage of his daughter, he moped and drooped. He was wont to say—for what he said was always amiable—that he missed his dear child, especially now he had no son. But what he did miss, was the heritage of Beaufort Court. The last straw to which he had clung—the hope that Camilla would marry the elder brother, and thus that his grandchildren would reign in his stead—once swept away, he sank deeper and deeper into the despondent sense of his own nothingness. What though he still possessed the mansion and the main property for his life, he was there but a guest on sufferance. Where was that respectable, comforting, complacent feeling of rights in se—of possession—of property? He walked joylessly round the park, and rode listlessly round the farms, and sat silently in the halls: he was but the tenant of another.

Thus gradually and insensibly he pined away from want—moral want, in the midst of actual wealth, luxury, and plenty! There was no visible disease which the doctors could cope with. They could not put the acres into pills that he might swallow, nor melt the woods into decoctions that he might drink and be well. Camilla, hearing that he was ill and that her presence might restore him, flew to his side. But it was evident then that she was nothing in his thoughts; and even when her first son was born, and crowded in his arms, he looked at it vacantly, "My grandchild! Yes, and his uncle has provided for him, and for you too, handsomely: I don't deny it, but my grandchild will never be member for the county!" Still he did not complain, and still he caught at sentiments that did him honour: "He never desired anything but what was just; he might have resisted the lawsuit, but he never thought of such a thing. Mr. Philip was a very fine young man, and, he was happy to say, appreciated his motives. He had never cared overmuch for money. Thank Heaven! covetousness was not his fault." And so—he died!

Mrs. Beaufort, after his death, established herself in London, and could never be persuaded to visit Beaufort Court. She took a companion, who more than replaced, in her eyes, the absence of Camilla.

And Camilla—Spencer—Sidney. They live still by the gentle lake, happy in their own serene joys and graceful leisure; shunning alike ambition and its trials, action and its sharp vicissitudes; envying no one, covetous of nothing; making around them, in the working world, something of the old pastoral and golden holiday. If Camilla had at one time wavered in her allegiance to Sidney, her good and simple heart has long since been entirely regained by his devotion; and, as might be expected from her disposition, she loved him better after marriage than before.

Philip had gone through severer trials than Sidney. But, had their earlier fates been reversed, and that spirit, in youth so haughty and self-willed, been lapped in ease and luxury, would Philip now be a better or a happier man? Perhaps, too, for a less tranquil existence than his brother, Philip yet may be reserved; but in proportion to the uses of our destiny do we repose or toil. He who never knows pain knows but the half of pleasure. The lot of whatever is most noble on the earth below falls not amid the rosy gardens of the Epicurean. We may envy the man who enjoys and rests, but the smile of Heaven settles rather on the front of him who labours and aspires!

And did Philip ever regret the circumstances that had given him Fanny as the partner of his life? To some, who take their notions of the ideal from the conventional rules of romance rather than from their own perceptions of what is fine, this narrative would have been more pleasing had Philip never loved but Fanny; but all that had led to that love at last had only served to render it more enduring and concentrated. Man's strongest and worthiest affection is his last—is the one that unites and embodies all his past dreams of what is excellent—the one from which Hope springs out, the brighter from former disappointments—the one in which the MEMORIES are the most tender and abundant—the one which, replacing all others, nothing hereafter can replace.

And now, ere the scene closes, and the audience, whom, perhaps, the actors may have interested for a while, disperse, to forget, amid the pursuits of actual life, the shadows that have amused an hour or beguiled a care, let the curtain fall on one happy picture:

It is some few years after the marriage of Philip and Fanny: years spent chiefly abroad. It is a summer's morning. In a small, old-fashioned room at Beaufort Court, with its casements open, to the gardens, stood Philip, having just entered; and near the window sat Fanny, his boy by her side. She was at the mother's hardest task, the first lessons to the firstborn child; and, as the boy looked up at her sweet, earnest face with a smile of intelligence on his own, you might have seen at a glance how well understood were the teacher and the pupil. Yes; whatever might have been wanting in the virgin to the full development of mind, the cares of the mother had supplied. When a being was born to lean on her alone—dependent on her providence for life—then, hour after hour, step after step in the progress of infant destinies, had the reason of the mother grown in the child's growth, adapting itself to each want that it must foresee, and taking its perfectness and completion from the breath of the New Love!

The child caught sight of Philip, and rushed to embrace him.

"See!" whispered Fanny, as she also hung upon him, and strange recollections of her own mysterious childhood crowded upon her, "see," whispered she, with a blush half of shame and half of pride, "the poor idiot girl is the teacher of your child!"

"And," answered Philip, "whether for child or mother, what teacher is like Love?"

Thus saying, he took the boy into his arms; and, as he bent over those rosy cheeks, Fanny saw, from the movement of his lips and the moisture in his eyes, that he blessed God. He looked upon the mother's face, he glanced round on the flowers and foliage of the luxurious summer, and again he blessed God; and, without and within, it was Light and MORNING!

THE END.

MISCELLANEOUS POETRY.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

WISHES.

Now, give me but a cot that's good,
In some great town's neighbourhood:
A garden, where the winds may play
Fresh from the blue hills far away,
And wanton with such trees as bear
Their loads of green through all the year,
Laurel, and ducky juniper
So may some friends, whose social talk
I love, there taking their evening walk
And spend a frequent holiday.

And may I own a quiet room,
Where the morning sun may come,
Stored with books of poesy,
Tale, science, old morality,
Fable and divine history,
Ranged in separate cases round,
Each with lying marble crown'd.
Here should Apollo stand, and there
Isis, with her sweeping hair:
Here Phidian Jove, or the face of thought
Of Pallas, or Laocoon,
Or Adrian's boy Antinous,
Or the winged Mercurius,
Or some that conquest lately brought
From the land Italian.

And one I'd have whose heaving breast
Should rock me nightly to my rest,
By holy chains bound fast to me,
Faster by love's sweet sorcery.
I would not have my beauty as Juno or Paphian Venus was,
Or Dian with her crested moon
(Else, haply, she might change as soon),
Or Portia, that high Roman dame,
Or she who set the world on flame,
Spartan Helen, who did leave
Her husband-king to grieve,

And fled with Priam's shepherd boy,
And caused the mighty tale of Troy.
She should be a woman who (Graceful without much endeavour)
Could praise or excuse all I do,
And love me ever.
I'd have her thoughts fair, and her skin
White as the white soul within;
And her fringed eyes of darkest blue,
Which the great soul looketh through,
Like heaven's own gates cerulean:
And these I'd gaze and gaze upon,
As did of old Pygmalion.

A FRESH MORNING.

It is a noisy morning: yet the sky
Looks down as bright as on a summer's day.
The ocean curling as in wanton play,
Doth bare her bosom to Apollo's eye,
And every whispering wind that flutters by
Seems like a spirit charged to greet the day,
And duly hurries tow'rd the East—away:
For there the sun, seen o'er the mountain high,
Comes smiling on the world. The fruit, the flower,
Earth, heaven, the sea, and oh! the heart of man,
And all that came within his mighty plan
Fling back the glance in joy: and from her bower
The spirit of MEDITATION comes, to see
All nature join in social jubilee.

THE LAST SONG.

Must it be!—Then farewell,
Thou whom my woman's heart cherished so long:
Farewell, and be this song
The last, wherein I say "I loved thee well."

Many a weary strain
(Never yet heard by thee) hath this poor breath
Uttered, of love and death,
And maiden grief, hidden and chid in vain.

Oh! if in after years
The tale that I am dead shall touch thy heart,
Bid not the pain depart;
But shed, over my grave, a few sad tears.

Think of me—still so young,
Silent, though fond, who cast my life away,
Daring to disobey
The passionate spirit that around me clung.

Farewell again; and yet,
Must it indeed be so—and on this shore
Shall you and I no more
Together see the sun of Summer set?

For me, my days are gone:
No more shall I, in vintage times, prepare
Chaplets to bind my hair,
As I was wont: oh 'twas for you alone.

But on my bier I'll lay
Me down in frozen beauty, pale and wan,
Martyr of love to man,
And, like a broken flower, gently decay.

STANZAS.

Farewell!—You have banished me then
From my home, and the language of men
Must come foreign and chill to my heart!—
But you scorn'd—and 'twas time to depart.

I go, like the shadow that flies,
When night and her darknesses rise,
And there is not a star in the sky,
To light me on—even to die.

You have slighted me, cruel! and yet
I cannot disdain or forget,
For in hate you still keep your control,
And it lies like a chain on my soul.

And now for the storm and the breeze,
And the music that lives on the seas,
And the ever-green valleys that lie
(Midst the Alps) in the smile of the sky!

I shall stand on the mountain, and shout
To the stars as they wander about,
And perhaps they may stop at my call—
But thou wilt be brighter than all.

Oh, then why do I strive to remove Thee? I lived on the thought of thy love
Once, and never must think ('tis my fate)
Of thee—though I think of thy hate.

Farewell! Thou hast struck in thy pride
A heart that for thee would have died!
Yet I bear the reproach, as I go,
Of filling thy bosom with woe.

No matter! I have, and 'tis well,
A spirit that nothing shall quell!
And I know that, whatever my doom,
The laurel must spring from my tomb.

SONG.

My love is a lady of gentle line,
Tow'rd some like the cedar bending,
Tow'rd me she flies—like a shape divine
From heaven to earth descending.

Her very look is life to me,
Her smile like the clear moon rising,
And her kiss is as sweet as the honey'd bee,
And more and more enticing.

Mild is my love as the summer air,
And her cheek (her eyes half closing)
Now rests on her full-blown bosom fair,
Like languor on love reposing.

NIGHT.

Now, to thy silent presence, Night!
Is this, my young song offer'd; Oh! to thee,
Down-looking with thy thousand eyes of light—
To thee, and thy stary nobility,
That float, with a delicious murmuring
(Though unheard here) about thy forehead blue:
And as they ride along, in order due,
Circling the round globe in their wandering,
To thee, their ancient queen, and mother, sing.

Mother of beauty! veiled queen!
Fear'd and sought, and never seen
Without a heart-imposing feeling,
Whither art thou gently stealing?
In thy smiling presence I
Kneel in star-struck idolatry,
And turn me to thine eye (the moon),
Fretting that it must change so soon,
Toying with this idle rhyme,
I scorn that bearded villain, Time,
Thine old remorseless enemy,
And build my linked verse to thee.

Not dull and cold and dark art thou:
Who that beholds thy clearer brow,
Endiadem'd with the gentlest streaks
Of fleecy-silver'd cloud, adorning
Thee, fair as when the young Sun wakes
And from his cloudy bondage breaks,
And lights upon the breast of morning,
But must feel thy powers—
Mightier than the storm that lowers,
Fairer than the virgin Hours,
That smile when Titan's daughter scatters
Her rose-leaves on the valleys low,
And bids her servant breezes blow.

Not Apollo when he dies
In the wild October skies,
Red and stormy; nor when he
In his meridian beauty rides
Over the bosom of the waters,
And turns the blue and burning tides
To silver, is a peer for thee,
In thy full regality.

The Lady Russell rose from her knees, and went to her;—"Madam," she said entreatingly, "they say you have much influence with the king: I am sure you have a kind heart; come and beg that for pity's sake he will hear me." The Duchess of Portsmouth did not refuse,—she came forward. Just then a side door was opened gently, and the Duke of York entered the apartment. He stopped and stared at all present with a look of apparent astonishment: for a moment his eye met that of the king; but he said not a word, walked to the farther end of the room, laid on a table a packet of papers which he carried in his hand, and seemed to occupy himself busily with them.

The Lady Russell felt, that if ever there had been a hope of success for her, there was now none. The king was still as courteous, and as smooth in speech, as before, though a little more commanding in his manner. The Duchess of Portsmouth was still careless to hide her weeping, and, kneeling in her tears before the king, she implored for Lord Russell's pardon; and she herself, the wretched heart-stricken wife, redoubled her entreaties; nay, at last she ceased to ask for pardon, (seeing that her prayer was utterly in vain,) and begged, if but for a respite of six weeks for her condemned husband. She turned to the Duke of York:—coldly and civilly he begged to decline offering any interference. The only words he spoke were those by which he replied to the Lady Russell; and he would have seemed to her entirely occupied with his papers, had she not once or twice observed his eye fixed with a calm and penetrating glance upon his royal brother. At last the king grew weary, his dark brow lowered heavily, and his strongly marked and saturnine features assumed an expression not commonly harsh and unpleasant—"What!" said he, angrily, and almost brutally, "shall I grant that man six weeks, who, if it had been in his power, would not have granted me six hours?"

The poor insulted lady spoke not another word of entreaty: she rose at once, and with a grave, meek sorrow, at once dignified and sweetly humble, she departed.

The Lady Russell went forth from the palace, convinced in her own mind that her husband's life would not be spared; and, more at peace than she had been for many days, she could scarcely understand how with such a settled conviction she could be calm. But she began to see the gracious design of Him to whom she prayed so constantly, to prepare her Himself, by the strong supports and consolations of His grace, for her heaviest trial.

She entered her husband's cell with a firm step and an untrodden countenance, and told him herself, and at once, with a voice that faltered only as she began to speak, that, according to his expectation, her errand to Whitehall had been utterly useless.

Still no possible and honourable way of saving him was left untried by her, and by their families and friends. Applications were again made, but made in vain, to those who possessed, humanly speaking, the power of life and death. The Earl of Bedford was said to have offered a hundred thousand pounds, through the Duchess of Portsmouth, for his son's life; but the unjust and cruel government had determined that he should be sacrificed. No words can describe, like those of Burnet, the tender love of Lord Russell to his wife, and the high and grateful estimation in which he held her.

"Lord Russell expressed great joy in that magnanimity of spirit he saw in his wife, and said, the parting with her was the hardest thing he had to do, for he was afraid she would be hardly able to bear it: the concern about preserving him, he said, filled her mind so now, that it in some measure supported her; but when that would be over, he feared the quickness of her spirits would work all within her."

"The morning before he suffered, he said he wished his wife would give over beating every bush, and running so about for his preservation: (she was then making an attempt to gain a respite from Saturday till Monday, and that little favour was denied her:) but when he considered that it would be some mitigation of her sorrow afterwards, that she had left nothing undone that could have given any probable hope, he acquiesced; and, indeed, I never saw his heart so near failing, as when he spake of her. Sometimes I saw a tear in his eye, and he would turn about and presently change the discourse.

He suffered his children, that were very young, and some few of his friends, to take leave of him; in which he maintained his constancy of temper, though he was a very fond father. At eleven o'clock on Friday evening, my lady left him: he kissed her four or five times; and she kept her sorrow so within herself, that she gave him no disturbance at their parting. She suffered neither sob nor tear to escape her, but quietly, silently departed. After she was gone, he said, 'Now the bitterness of death was passed,' and ran out into a long discourse concerning her; how great a blessing she had been to him; and said what a misery it would have been, if she had not had that magnanimity of spirit, joined to her tenderness, as never to have desired him to do a base thing for the saving of his life."

Soon after her husband's shameful execution, the Lady Russell was called to take her place as comforter, at the bedside of the venerated Countess of Bedford, the once lovely Lady Anne Carr; who died of a broken heart at the death of her son, the Lord Russell.

ABSTRACTION OF MIND.

Some have exercised this power of abstraction to a degree that appears marvellous to volatile spirits, and puny thinkers.

To this patient habit, Newton is indebted for many of his great discoveries; an apple falls upon him in his orchard,—and the system of attraction succeeds in his mind! he observes boys blowing soap bubbles, and the properties of light display themselves! Of Socrates, it is said, that he would frequently remain an entire day and night in the same attitude, absorbed in meditation; and why shall we doubt this, when we know that La Fontaine and Thomson, Descartes and Newton, experienced the same abstraction? Mercator, the celebrated geographer, found such delight in the ceaseless progression of his studies, that he would never willingly quit his maps to take the necessary refreshments of life. In Cicero's Treatise on Old age, Cato applauds Gallus, who, when he sat down to write in the morning, was surprised by the evening: and when he took up his pen in the evening, was surprised by the appearance of morning. Buffon once described these delicious moments with his accustomed eloquence.—"Invention depends on patience; contemplate your subject long; it will gradually unfold, till a sort of electric spark convulses for a moment the brain, and spreads down to the very heart a glow of irritation. Then come the luxuries of genius! the true hours for production and composition: hours so delightful that I have spent twelve and fourteen successively at my writing-desk, and still been in a state of pleasure." It is probable that the anecdote related of Marini, the Italian poet, is true; that he was once so absorbed in revising his Adonis, that he suffered his leg to be burnt for some time, without any sensibility.

Abstraction of this sublime kind is the first step to that noble enthusiasm which accompanies Genius: it produces those raptures and that intense delight, which some curious facts will explain to us.

Poggius relates of Dante, that he indulged his meditations more strongly than any man he knew; whenever he read, he was only alive to what was passing in his mind, to all human concerns, he was, as if they had not been! Dante went one day to a great public procession; he entered the shop of a bookseller to be a spectator of the passing show. He found a book which greatly interested him; he devoured it in silence, and plunged into an abyss of thought.—On his return he declared that he had neither seen, nor heard, the slightest occurrence of the public exhibition which passed before him. This enthusiasm renders every thing surrounding us as distant as if an immense interval separated us from the scene. A modern astronomer, one summer night, withdrew to his chamber; the brightness of the heaven showed a phenomenon. He passed the whole night in observing it, and when they came to him early in the morning, and found him in the same attitude, he said, like one who had been recollecting his thoughts for a few moments, "It must be thus; but I'll go to bed before 'tis late." He had gazed the entire night in meditation, and did not know it.

This intense abstraction operates visibly: this perturbation of the faculties, as might be supposed, affects persons of genius physically. What a forcible description the late Madam Roland, who certainly was a woman of the first genius, gives of herself on her first reading of Telemachus and Tasso. "My respiration rose: I felt a rapid fire colouring my face, and my voice changing, had betrayed my agitation; I was Eucharis for Telemachus, and Erminia for Tancréd: however during this perfect transformation, I did not yet think that I myself was any thing, for any one. The whole had no connection with myself, I sought for nothing around me; I was them, I saw only the objects which existed for them; it was a dream, without being awakened."—Metastasio describes a similar situation. "When I apply with a little attention, the nerves of my sensorium are put into a violent tumult. I grow as red in the face as a drunkard, and am obliged to quit my work." When Malebranche first took up Descartes on Man, the germ and origin of his philosophy, he was obliged frequently to interrupt his reading by a violent palpitation of the heart. When the first idea of the Essay on the Arts and Sciences rushed on the mind of Rousseau, it occasioned such a feverish agitation that it approached to a delirium.

This delicious inebriation of the imagination occasioned the ancients, who sometimes perceived the effects, to believe it was not short of divine inspiration. Fielding says, "I do not doubt but that the most pathetic and affecting scenes have been writ with tears. He perhaps would have been pleased to have confirmed his observation by the following circumstances. The tremors of Dryden, after having written an Ode, a circumstance tradition has accidentally handed down, were not unusual with him; in the preface to his Tales he tells us, that, in translating Homer he found greater pleasure than in Virgil; but it was not a pleasure without pain; the continual agitation of the spirits must needs be a weakener to any constitution, especially in age, and many pauses are required for refreshment betwixt the heats." In writing the ninth scene of the second act of the Olympiad, Metastasio found himself in tears; an effect which afterwards, says Dr. Burney, proved very contagious. It was on this occasion that that tender poet commemorated the circumstance in the following interesting sonnet:

"In 1773, the author composing his Olympiad, felt himself suddenly moved, even to tears, in expressing the separation of two tender lovers. Surprised that a fictitious grief, invented too by himself, could raise so true a passion, he reflected how little reasonable and solid a foundation the others had, which so frequently agitated us in this state of our existence.

"SONNET.—IMITATED.

"Fables and dreams I feign; yet though but verse
The dreams and fables that adorn this scroll,
Fond fool, I rave, and grieve as I rehearse;
While genuine tears, for fancied sorrows roll.
Perhaps the dear delusion of my art
Is wisdom; and the agitated mind,
As still responding to each plaintive part,
With love and rage, a tranquil hour can find.
Ah! not alone the tender rhymes I give
Are fictions; but my fears and hopes I deem
Are fables all; deliciously I live,
And life's whole course is one protracted dream.
Eternal power! when shall I wake to rest
This wearied brain on Truth's immortal breast?"

TIME FOR MATRIMONY.

The most proper age for entering the holy bands of matrimony has been much discussed, but never settled. I am entitled to my opinion; and although

I cannot here give the grounds on which it rests, the reader may take it for granted that I could adduce, were this the proper place, a great number of weighty reasons, both moral and physical, for the dogma which I am going to propound. The maxim, then, which I would inculcate is this—that matrimony should not be contracted before the first year of the Fourth Septenniad, on the part of the female, nor before the last year of the same in the case of the male. In other words, the female should be at least twenty-one years of age, and the male twenty-eight years. That there should be seven years difference between the ages of the sexes, at whatever period of life the solemn contract is entered upon, need not be urged, as it is universally admitted. There is a difference of seven years, not in the actual duration of life, in the two sexes, but in the stamina of the constitution, the symmetry of the form, and the lineaments of the face. The wear and tear of bringing up a family might alone account for this inequality; but there are other causes inherent in the constitution and independent of matrimony or celibacy.

In respect to early marriage, as far as it concerns the softer sex, I have to observe, that for every year at which the hymeneal knot is tied below the age of twenty-one, there will be on an average three years of premature decay of the corporeal fabric, and a considerable abbreviation of the usual range of human existence. It is in vain to point out instances that seem to nullify this calculation. There will be individual exceptions to all general rules. The above will be found a fair average estimate.

On the moral consequences of too early marriages, it is not my intention to dilate; though I could adduce many strong arguments against, and very few in favour of the practice. It has been said that "matrimony may have miseries, but celibacy has no pleasures." As far as too early marriage is concerned, the adage ought to run thus—"marriage must have miseries, though celibacy may have no pleasures."

The choice of a wife or a husband is rather foreign to my subject, and has occupied much abler pens than mine to little advantage. My own opinion is, that were the whole of the adult population registered as they come of age, and each person male and female, drew a name out of the urn, and thus rendered matrimony a complete lottery, the sum total of happiness, misery, or content, would be nearly, if not exactly the same, as upon the present principle of selection. This, at first sight, will appear a most startling proposition; but the closer we examine it, the less extravagant it will be found.—Economy of Health.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE LEARNED.

Rohault wandered from shop to shop to observe the mechanics labour; Count Caylus passed his mornings in the studios of artists, and his evenings in writing his numerous works on art. This was the true life of an amateur.

Granville Sharp, amidst the severities of his studies, found a social relaxation in the amusement of a barge on the Thames, which was well known to the circle of his friends; there was festive hospitality with musical delight. It was resorted to by men of the most eminent talents and rank. His little voyages to Putney, to Kew, and to Richmond, and the literary intercourse they produced, were singularly happy ones. "The history of his amusements cannot be told without adding to the dignity of his character," observes Mr. Prince Hoare, in the very curious life of this great philanthropist.

Some have found amusement in composing treatises on odd subjects. Seneca wrote a burlesque narrative of Claudian's death. Pterius Valerianus has written an eulogium on beards; and we have had a learned one recently, with due gravity and pleasantry, entitled "Eloge de Perruques."

Holstein has written an eulogium on the North Wind; Heinsius, on "the Aas;" Menage, "the Transmigration of the Parasitical Pedant to a Parrot;" and also the "Petition of the Dictionaries."

Erasmus composed, to amuse himself when travelling in a post-chaise, his panegyric on Moria, or Folly; which, authorised by the pun, he dedicated to Sir Thomas More.

Sallengre, who would amuse himself like Erasmus, wrote, in imitation of his work, a panegyric on Ebriety. He says, that he is willing to be thought as drunken a man as Erasmus was a foolish one. Synesius composed a Greek panegyric on balldness; these burlesques were brought into great vogue by Erasmus's Mora Encomium.

It seems, Johnson observes in his life of Sir Thomas Browne, to have been in all ages the pride of art to show how it could exalt the low and amplify the little. To this ambition perhaps we owe the frogs of Homer; the gnat and the bees of Virgil; the butterfly of Spenser; the shadows of Wowerus; and the quincunx of Browne.

Cardinal de Richelieu, amongst all his great occupations, found a recreation in violent exercises; and he was once discovered jumping with his servant, to try who could reach the highest side of a wall. De Grammont, observing the cardinal to be jealous of his powers, offered to jump with him; and in the true spirit of a courtier, having made some efforts which nearly reached the cardinal's, confessed the cardinal surpassed him. This was jumping like a politician; and by this means he is said to have ingratiated himself with the minister.

The great Samuel Clarke was fond of robust exercise; and this profound logician has been found leaping over tables and chairs: once perceiving a pedantic fellow, he said, "Now we must desist, for a fool is coming in."

What ridiculous amusements passed between Dean Swift and his friends, in Ireland, some of his prodigal editors have revealed to the public. He seems to have outlived the relish of fame, when he could level his mind to such perpetual trifles.

An eminent French lawyer, confined by his business to a Parisian life, amused himself with collecting from the classics all the passages which relate to a country life. The collection was published after his death.

Contemplative men seem to be fond of amusements which accord with their habits. The thoughtful game of chess, and the tranquil delight of angling, have been favourite recreations with the studious. Paley had himself painted with a rod and line in his hand; a strange characteristic for the author of "Natural Theology." Sir Henry Wotton called angling "idle time not idle spent;" we may suppose that his meditations and his amusements were carried on at the same moment.

The amusements of the great Daguesseau, chancellor of France, consisted in an interchange of studies: his relaxations were all the varieties of literature. "Le changement de l'étude est mon seul delassement," said this great man; and Thomas observes, "that in the age of the passions, his only passion was study."

Seneca has observed on amusements proper for literary men, in regard to robust exercises, that these are a folly, and indecency to see a man of letters exult in the strength of his arm, or the breadth of his back! such amusements diminish the activity of the mind. Too much fatigue exhausts the animal spirits, as too much food blunts the finer faculties; but elsewhere he allows his philosopher an occasional slight inebriation; an amusement which was very prevalent among our poets formerly, when they exclaimed,

Fetch me Ben Jonson's skull, and fil't with sack,
Rich as the same he drank, when the whole pack
Of jolly sisters pledged, and did agree
It was no sin to be as drunk as he!

Seneca concludes admirably, "whatever be the amusements you choose, return not slowly from those of the body to the mind; exercise the latter night and day. The mind is nourished at a cheap rate; neither cold nor heat, nor age itself can interrupt this exercise; give therefore all your cares to a possession which ameliorates even in its old age!"

An ingenious writer has observed, that "a garden just accommodates itself to the perambulations of a scholar, who would perhaps rather wish his walks abridged than extended." There is a good characteristic account of the mode in which the literati take exercise in Pope's letters. "I, like a poor squirrel, am continually in motion indeed, but it is about a cage of three foot; my little excursions are like those of a shopkeeper, who walks every day a mile or two before his own door, but minds his business all the while." A turn or two in a garden will often very happily close a fine period, mature an unripened thought, and raise up fresh associations, when the mind like the body becomes rigid by preserving the same posture. Buffon often quitted the apartment he studied in, which was placed in the midst of his garden, for a walk in it; Evelyn loved "books and a garden."

MELANCHOLY.

"Hence all ye vain delights
As short as are the nights,
Wherein you spend your folly
There's nought in this life so sweet,
If man were wise to see't,
But only melancholy.
Oh! sweet melancholy.
Welcome folded arms and fixed eyes,
A sigh that piercing mortifies;
A look that's fastened to the ground,
A tongue chained up without a sound,
Fountain heads and pathless groves.
Places which pale passion loves,
Moonlight walks when all the fowls
Are safely housed, save bats and owls,
A midnight bell, a parting groan,
These are sounds we feed upon;
Then stretch our bones in a still gloomy valley,
Nothing so dainty sweet as melancholy."

NEW BOOKS.

Sutton on the Sacrament.

This is another of the series of devotional books published by Messrs. D. Appleton, & Co. to which we have already referred. It is published in the same elegant style as the preceding volumes. The printing, binding, paper and embellishments, are every way suitable to a work which on account of its intrinsic value, is likely to be kept and read and re-read many times.

The Looking Glass of the Mind.

This is the name of a juvenile book just published by Messrs. D. Appleton, & Co. New York. It consists of translations from Berquin's works. Of course its moral tone and tendency are unexceptionable. The embellishments are some forty or fifty wood cuts done in England in a very highly finished style. This will be a very popular little book.

WALDIE'S SELECT CIRCULATING LIBRARY,

AND
JOURNAL OF POLITE LITERATURE
TERMS.

1. The Library is published on a double royal sheet, sixteen pages quarto each, on new type, and printed in the best style of book work. The weekly Journal of Belles Lettres will be contained on the two outer leaves of the number. To compensate for this arrangement, five numbers will be published monthly.

2. Price FIVE DOLLARS a year, if paid at, or remitted to, the office. SIX DOLLARS if collected by an agent from this office.

3. Subscriptions commence with January, and no subscriptions taken for less than a year. Letters must be all post-paid. Postmasters are allowed by law to forward subscriptions free. As postage has been a very heavy item of expense, we urgently request subscribers' attention to this.

Premiums.—As we have some extra copies for 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839, we offer two of these years' Library and the new year for Ten Dollars. At the same rate to old subscribers, who wish to complete sets.

MR. COMBE'S NOTES ON THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Our readers, we presume, are by this time satiated with the agreeable fictions of Mr. Bulwer. For their relief we have selected the new work of Mr. Combe upon the United States. We look upon novels as the pepper and salt of literature, to be used only as seasoning—as an elixir to provoke appetite by an agreeable vellication of the nerves, and not to be made a common article of food. The choice we have made of Combe's book, we flatter ourselves, will be generally approved. It relates immediately to ourselves; is written by an author of celebrity, and we are happily enabled to serve it up in the freshness of its novelty.

There is one quality of human nature greatly in favour of these travellers; it is our curiosity of knowing what others may be pleased to say of us—an active, stirring quality, which even makes some people listen at the keyhole. We read page after page, and though we may learn nothing, still are we entertained; as the huntsman, though catching no game, has yet the pleasurable excitement of the chase.

Travellers, more than other writers, are allowed to be talkative and digressive; and Mr. Combe ventures often to the utmost stretch of his privilege. He would have made no kind of figure at Sparta. A good portion of his work is composed without the least wear and tear of brains—this to be set to the account of book-making. But there is much also that is instructive and entertaining, and the whole is written in the liberal spirit of one desiring the welfare of all mankind, and in good faith; and there is no malice intermixed—for which abstinence he deserves a special commendation; for when was an Englishman ever known to be tolerant of any thing not English?—with any thing out of the atmosphere of his own whims!—This author we perceive was quite a pet during his sojourn in our cities, which also places him in favourable contrast with the other English tourists, who, some how or other, contrived to make themselves supremely disagreeable.

No complaint will be made of Mr. Combe on the score of variety. He is indeed quite dithyrambic in some of his movements; giving us the pigs and the pretty women on Chestnut street, socially at the side of each other, on the same page with "Human responsibility," and the thermometer 90°.

This book is in one respect a literary curiosity. Suppose it to fall under the eye of any one unacquainted with the phrenological doctrines of the author, and desirous of seeing a description of our great men. Mr. Clay—"the anterior lobe of average size,—coronal region large,—temperament sanguine—Lymphatic."—This he must accept as the character, moral and intellectual, of Mr. Clay.—Should phrenology ever attain the perfection anticipated by its votaries, what improvement in the conveniences of travellers, especially of English, so coy of familiarities. Think of being able to ascertain the merits and demerits of foreign people, without incurring any loss of respectability by making their acquaintance! And this is not all; you scarce can conceive a question of metaphysics that may not be solved, or dissent of opinion that may not be reconciled by the phrenological didactics of this writer. If for example, Mr. Channing is abused by Mr. Hazlit and Lord Brougham in the Edinburgh, it is because his lordship and Mr. Hazlit, as Mr. C. tells us, are deficient in a bump necessary to an apprehension of Mr. Channing's merits. If we are daily becoming more fitted to our republican institutions, it is because soon after the revolution our people yet retained some of the organs of their aristocratic progenitors; but this generation, Mr. Combe alleges, having "died out," our bump of veneration has been gradually reduced down to a smooth, democratic flatness. Thus in spite of the many predictions of our political ruin,—though we have had a war, a pestilence, a paper currency, and have been abused by Mrs. Trollope, yet the republic endures,—on, on, on goes the current, and our steamboats are booming their way through the solitudes of the Mississippi.

But Mr. C.'s visit has not been exclusively phrenological. He has overrun a great portion of the country, and has described its scenery, and descanted freely, but liberally, upon its customs, manners, and institutions, and take him altogether he deserves a first place (no very great praise) amongst the best of the English tourists.

We take the liberty of omitting those parts of his work, designed only for the instruction of his English readers.

THE MUSIC OF NATURE AND ART.

FROM GARDENER.

The author mentions the following curious anecdotes of cuckoos and parrots.

"This noted bird is a foreign musician, and, like many others, remarkable for his cunning as well as his song. They lay their eggs in the nests of other birds, which are no sooner hatched and fed than the young cuckoo, with lawless strength, bundles out his brother nestlings, and takes complete possession. Thus obtaining bed and board at other's cost, he stays and sings; and having passed the summer with us, bids John Bull adieu, and goes abroad.

"Parrots, like cuckoos, form their notes deep in the throat, and show great aptitude in imitating the human voice. A most remarkable instance I met with at Mr. Braham's villa in Brompton. A lady who had great admiration for his talents, presented him with a parrot, on which she had bestowed great pains in teaching it to talk. After dinner, during a pause in the conversation, I was startled by a voice from one corner of the room calling out, in a strong hearty manner, 'Come, Braham, give us a song!' Nothing could exceed the surprise and admiration of the company. The request being repeated and not answered, the parrot struck up the first verse of 'God save the King,' in a clear warbling tone, aiming at the style of the singer, and sang it through. The ease with which this bird was taught was equally surprising with the performance. The same lady prepared him to accost Catalini, when dining with Mr. Braham, which so alarmed Madame that she nearly fell from her chair. Upon his commencing 'Rule Britannia,' in a loud and intrepid tone, the chauntress fell on her knees before the bird, exclaiming in terms of delight her admiration of its talents.

"This parrot has only been exceeded by Lord Kelly's, who, upon being asked to sing, replied—'I never sing on a Sunday.' 'Never mind that, Poll, come, give us a song.' 'No, excuse me, I've got a cold—don't you hear how hoarse I am?' This extraordinary creature performed the three verses entire of 'God save the King,' words and music, without hesitation from the beginning to the end."

Mr. Gardener's chapter on bells convinces us of the truth of a remark which we have often made to musicians, that too little use is made of that instrument in the composition and performance of pieces intended to be heard by large audiences. We fully coincide in his opinion, that by the hand of a composer they might be so constructed, as instead of the senseless jargon which we so often hear, to yield the most varied and agreeable melodies. It is calculated that eight bells of different notes would furnish forty thousand three hundred and twenty different passages. Without going further than this, we see here at once an inexhaustible source of melody, which musicians still permit to remain comparatively uncultivated. In listening to the sound of bells in the open air, one is often surprised to hear them on the right hand side, when in fact they are rung on the left hand side. This curious phenomenon is the result of the power of echo, upon which the author makes some interesting observations.

"In the whole hemisphere of sounds there is no circumstance more strikingly curious than that of an echo. To hear one's own voice returned as if it were the voice of another, is perhaps more surprising than the reflection of one's self in a glass. Indeed there is so close a resemblance between the effects of light and sound, that we might almost suppose them governed by the same laws. Sound is not only reflected in the same way, but it may also be converged into a point like light. An imperfect experiment of this kind may be tried upon Westminster bridge in the night time. If a person whisper in one of the alcoves (the form of which produces the effect) he will be distinctly heard in the opposite one though at so great a distance; but a still more striking instance of a similar kind takes place in the whispering gallery that encircles the inside of the dome of St. Paul's.

"Echoes are produced by the voice falling upon a reflecting body—as a house, a hill, or a wood. These objects at seventy feet distance from the speaker, will distinctly return a monosyllable, and for every forty feet farther from the reflecting body, a syllable more. In Italy, where the atmosphere and the country are so favourable to echoes, you meet with many of extraordinary duration. Some repeat whole strains of music, which have given rise to those puerile repetitions or symphonies to be met with in early writers of that country. So perfect is the echo, that the ear is often deceived in not distinguishing the reflected sounds from those which are direct. In listening to the ringing of bells, when an object so intervenes as to cut off the direct rays, we hear the sounds as if they came from the other side of the street, and imagine the church to be in an opposite quarter. In whistling or calling to a dog, you find him so deceived by this circumstance as sometimes to run away from you. It is this reflex of sound that contributes so much to the musical excellence of a well constructed room; and it is a mistaken notion that curvatures, circular walls, or arched roofs, add to its perfection. On the contrary, they injure the general effect by converging the rays of sound into large portions, and throwing them into particular parts of the room. The best figure for a concert room is a parallelogram or long square, in which the sounds are equally diffused. Our cathedrals partake of this form, and are the finest buildings in the country for the display of musical effects."

In his remarks upon the various instruments which musicians use, the author gives the preference, as who would not?—to the organ.

"Of all instruments this is the most noble, possessing powers of the greatest extent and variety. How the sober dignity of its tones harmonises with the dark massive pile which we walk around and view with wonder! while gazing on the heavy towers on high, its hollow tones within speak of mass and veipers, long gone by, and all the train of superstitious chivalry. And as we pace the long drawn aisles of light and shade, where the glowing beams of tinted windows fall on the youthful fair, kneeling to ask heaven's grace, so beautifully expressed by the poet,—

Rose bloom fell on her hands together prest,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory like a saint.

"How the heavenly tones in solemn grandeur roll along! It is only upon the continent that we can enjoy these sublime sensations. Holland, the Low Countries, and Germany, are spread over with these majestic instruments in profuse variety. At Haarlem there is one of stupendous size: the effect of

* The writer was admitted to the rehearsal of the first grand performance in York Cathedral, 1823, composed of six hundred performers, when only five auditors were present. Upon the first burst of the voices and instruments on the words "Gloria be to God," the effect was more than the senses could bear, so much was the sound augmented by the vast space of this noble building; nor was it till those overpowering concussions ceased that the imagination could recover itself, when the retiring of the sounds could only be compared to the distant roll and convulsion of nature."

which surpasses every thing the mind can conceive. They are sounds which seem to roll from the skies into the deep abyss of harmony. In the puritanical service of the Dutch, nothing but psalmody is ever performed. For the purpose of leading their immense congregations, of not less than three thousand voices singing in unison, these organs are furnished with an enormous pipe called the vox humana, which so predominates over the rolling thunder of the double diapasons, that you might conceive it to be the voice of a monster, concealed in this mountain of sounds. The grandeur of this organ is much augmented by the vastness of the church in which it stands. Higher than Westminster Abbey—it fills up the end of the large aisle, reaching from the ground to the roof, and from one side to the other, the pipes having the appearance of vast columns of silver. The extempore flourishes which the organist introduces between the lines of the psalm can only be compared to a commotion of the elements, or the rolling of the surges upon the shore. The largest organs in England are but mere toys compared to this magnificent instrument, which strikes the senses with awe and wonder. The writer, on Whitsunday, 1824, was in the organ loft at Westminster Abbey, when the king and queen of Owhyee, Sandwich Isles, were introduced by the dean, and placed near himself in the choir. The king, a vulgar looking man, perfectly black, dressed in a black coat, white waistcoat, and pea-green gloves, which were not long enough to conceal his sooty wrists, stood up the whole time of the service gazing with amazement at the roof. The queen, a tall, fine, masculine figure, was so struck upon the first burst of the organs, as to be thrown into extreme agitation, so much so, that she would have leaped out of the stall in which she was placed, had not her maid of honour (an English lady) prevented her by laying hands upon her. Every time the organ recommenced with its full volume of sound, this phrensy returned, and caused much confusion. During the sermon she settled down into something like composure, and at the conclusion was led out by the dean and other dignitaries to view the edifice. Habited in a fashionable morning dress, her majesty was only distinguishable from her attendants by her gaunt and gigantic figure, and the sudden ejaculation of surprise which she was constantly making. The king, however, lost in mute attention, never lowered his eyes from the roof, but kept staggering about the church till he made his exit at the door."

It is supposed that one of the most perfect organs in this country, for equality of tone and richness of combination, is that of St. Martin's church, Leicester; it is the work of Snetzler, a German, who constructed a similar instrument for Halifax. The clarionet was formerly so difficult an instrument, that few persons could master it in less than twenty years, and even then only by incessant practice of at least six hours a day. Most of the difficulties are, however, now removed by having clarionets made in different keys. The trombone is the sackbut of the Scriptures. One of these instruments was discovered in Herculaneum, where it had lain for nearly two thousand years under the ashes; the lower part of it was made with bronze, and the upper with the mouth piece of gold. It was presented by the King of Naples to George III., and from that model the modern trombone, used with so much effect in military bands, has been fashioned. The trumpet has been carried to the greatest perfection in Russia.

"There is a species of horn or trumpet music in Russia that surpasses every thing of its kind, and which can only be heard in the palace of the emperor at Moscow. A friend of the writer, M. Baillot, when at that court, was conducted by Prince Potemkin into a long dark gallery, where, at a distance, was stationed this extraordinary band. The composer listened with astonishment, and was asked by the prince what he thought of it. 'All that I know,' replied the musician, 'is, that it is like nothing on this earth. It is the music of another world, and I am utterly at a loss even to guess how it is produced.' Lights were instantly brought, and there appeared two hundred soldiers, each with a trumpet or horn in his hand, varying in length from the size of an extinguisher—which they much resembled, to twenty feet in length. And what is most extraordinary, each performer upon his instrument made but a single note, all of which fell in succession so aptly, that the two hundred tones, in performing a symphony of Haydn's, had the effect of one grand instrument. The power of accent thus exerted by every person upon his individual note, gave a series of effects to the performance unattainable in any other way, and as endless as they were surprising."

The drum is also now used with great effect in concerted pieces. It was probably introduced for the first time at Leicester, in 1774, at the first grand musical festival that ever took place in England. On that occasion the drum attracted great attention, not only from its novel effect, but from its having been beaten by the Earl of Sandwich, by whom, in conjunction with Mr. Cradock of Gumley, the assemblage was convened. His lordship was so enamoured of drums, that he had one side of his music room at Hinchinbrook strained with parchment, for one of the oratorios which were performed there: but such was the effect of the parchment when first suddenly struck, that the company were dreadfully alarmed, and several ladies went into fits. When played in pianissimo, the sound of the drum is peculiarly grateful, as it resembles a distant echo, and fills the mind with an idea of vastness. It is upon this principle that we feel excited by the sound of storms.

"Who has not felt the charms of a winter's evening, the cheerful fire, and warm hearth rug, with curtains falling in ample draperies upon the floor, when the storm has been raging without? The whirling trees, the cries of the blast through the crannies of the hall, as if benighted wretches were imploring shelter? These are the sounds that touch the musician's ear. Sounds still more awful are the hollow murmurs of earthquakes, the thunder of volcanoes, and the roar of hurricanes. Happily we are not visited with these tremendous convulsions: yet we have them upon a smaller scale, sufficient to raise the sublimest sensations. Lying as we do in the midst of waters, the grandest exhibition with us is the sea in a storm. When at rest, like a monster asleep, it strikes us with awe by its vastness; but when roused into tempestuous fury, and swelling waves threaten to overwhelm the land, we may truly say, that in Britain, Neptune has fixed his throne. Winstanley, in his description of the Eddystone lighthouse, has represented the sea as dashing a hundred feet above the top of that perilous structure. But the furious commotion of the northern sea far surpasses this in grandeur. A friend of the writer who was employed upon the trigonometrical survey in the Orkney Isles, describes the waves in that region during a storm to be of the most frightful vastness, striking the granite face of the perpendicular rocks with a force so tremendous as to carry the spray over the island for thirty miles, destroying the crops in the whole of the distance. It is this scenery in nature's theatre, accompanied by the roar of the elements, that so appeals us, that we involuntarily turn away from the stupendous sight.

"In the storms on land trees are the grand instruments which augment the mighty roar. Their yells mixed up with the blast send forth the most terrible harmonies. Those who have traversed the black forests in Germany can have some idea of the horrid din of those domains. The common people hide themselves from the spirit of the woods, little reflecting that it is the lashing winds against the giant trunks of the forest which causes the dreadful howling they hear! Sir Thomas Lauder has given us some idea of these effects in the hurricanes of Scotland, 1829, when he describes the flood of Moray. There was something inexpressibly fearful and sublime in the roar of the torrents which filled the valley, and the fitful gusts of the north wind that groaned among the woods. The tall ornamental trees, one by one, had begun to yield; the noise was a distinct combination of two kinds of sound; one a uniform continued roar, the other like rapid discharges of many cannons at once. The first proceeded from the violence of the water; the other, which was heard through it, and as it were muffled by it, came from the enormous stones which the stream was hurling

ON THE

United States of North America,

DURING

A PHRENOLOGICAL VISIT IN 1838-9-40.

BY GEORGE COMBE.

INTRODUCTION.

A few observations are necessary to inform the reader of the circumstances under which the following work has been prepared, and of the objects aimed at by the author.

In 1832, Dr. Spurzheim proceeded to the United States of America, with a view of diffusing a knowledge of Phrenology by public lectures. He had not completed his first course in Boston, when he was taken ill; and he died on the 10th November in the same year. Brief as was the space during which he was permitted to labour, his expositions of this science had excited great and extensive interest, not in Boston only, but in many other parts of the Union. After his death, numerous invitations were sent to me by the friends of Phrenology to repair to the United States, and to follow up the work which he had so successfully begun. For several years this was not in my power; but at last, in 1838, circumstances permitted me to obey the call, and I sailed for New York in September, and commenced a course of lectures in Boston, in October of that year. I continued in the United States till 1st June, 1840; and during the whole period was incessantly engaged—in the winter and spring, in lecturing on Phrenology in the cities; and in summer—in preparing a work on Moral Philosophy for the American press, and in making excursions into the interior of the country for necessary recreation. These occupations were not favourable for a minute study of the social and political institutions of America and its society; nor, in going to that country, had I any intention of writing a work in relation to them. From my first arrival, however, I kept a note-book, in which I entered, from day to day, such observations as were suggested by the objects and circumstances around me. At first, the novelty of aspect under which even commonplace objects occasionally presented themselves, imparted to many of them an interest which they did not intrinsically possess. But as, at that time, my journal was written solely for private use, I felt no scruple in recording on its pages many observations and impressions which would never have found a place in it, had it been composed originally with a view to publication. In proportion, however, as the country and its affairs were displayed to me in more familiar intercourse, higher objects excited attention, and many passing events, institutions, and social arrangements, suggested reflections which, judging from my own experience, seemed calculated to interest the British public. It was thus only at a late period that the idea of publishing my observations presented itself, and that the considerations to be afterwards mentioned, gradually led to its being realised.

Such being the origin of the present work, it will not surprise any reflecting reader to find, especially in the beginning, many notices of comparatively trivial objects and occurrences, to which novelty had lent an exaggerated importance. But, although fully sensible of the existence of these and other imperfections in the materials of the work (a discovery which presented itself most forcibly after the book was printed, and when time and distance from the scene of observation had blunted many impressions), there are reasons which have induced me to hazard its publication. Some of these are the following:—

First, I regard it as impossible for any individual accurately to describe a great nation. The objects and interests are so vast, compared with the capacity of one mind, that a whole life would not suffice to attain to truth in all points of detail and to logical soundness in all inferences. A certain extent of error, therefore, is unavoidable on the part of all observers who attempt to delineate so extensive a field. The only method by which philosophic minds can arrive at truth in regard to national character and institutions, is to analyse and compare the reports of numerous observers; each individual author being regarded as a single witness in a vast and complicated cause. The value of the testimony of each will depend more on the purity of his motives, and the sincerity of his narrative, than upon an abstract freedom from mistake, which is not to be expected from even the most gifted and accomplished men.

I regard the works of all the authors who have written on the United States as valuable in this view; and their value is increased by the difference in the minds, circumstances, and education of the individuals who produced them. Mrs. Trollope, Mrs. Butler, and Miss Martineau, for example, each possessed a peculiar combination of faculties, moved in a different sphere, and were interested by different objects. When, therefore, they gave to the public the impressions which the United States had made on their mind, their works were not without interest, although they might contain errors, and embody false inferences. Each was a faithful witness to her own impressions, and a philosophic reader could draw instruction from them all. In like manner, Stuart, Hall, Hamilton, and Marryat, without, in all instances, relating absolute truth, or the whole truth, may each have evolved some portion of fact and of just inference, by means of which the public may be instructed. It is simply in the character of another witness in the great investigation that I present these notes. And there are some circumstances, besides those already stated, which, on reflection, have appeared to my own mind to justify this step.

My pursuits and studies, previously to my visit to the United States, had been widely different from those of all the authors, except perhaps Mr. Stuart, who had written recently on the subject, and my circle of interests during my stay was also different. Captain Marryat, for example, the latest writer, mentions the American habit of drinking and forming social acquaintances at the bars of the American hotels and taverns—and says—"I was always willing to accommodate the Americans in this particular as far as I could, (there, at least, they will do me justice); that at times I drank much more than I wished, is certain, yet still I gave most serious offence, especially in the west, because I would not drink early in the morning or before dinner, which is a general custom in the states, although more prevalent in the south and west, where it is literally, 'Stranger, will you drink or fight?'" This spirit of accommodation must have opened up to Captain Marryat a large field of observation, and enabled him successfully to describe one portion of American life and manners. But during my whole residence in the states, I never drank, and never was even once asked to drink, at the bar of any hotel. This is only one among many circumstances which indicate that my sphere of observation may have been widely different from his. I may, therefore, be viewed as a witness, testifying to some points different from those reported on by him.

The necessity for the labours of numerous observers to elucidate so vast a subject will be readily recognised, when we consider a few of the difficulties that obstruct the path of each in his search after truth.

In America, as in other countries, the vast majority even of educated and intelligent people, are conversant chiefly with their own localities and circles, and entertain some ideas regarding other places and interests which an intelligent stranger soon perceives to be erroneous. Persons are to be found in Boston, for example, who express not only imperfect, but occasionally prejudiced and erroneous views of the people and condition of many things in Philadelphia, and vice versa: just as many of the inhabitants of Edinburgh and Glasgow, who, although living only forty-two miles apart, and under the same laws and institutions, are by no means (speaking even of the enlightened class) well acquainted with each other's mental characteristics and social habits. An intelligent American, a stranger to both, who should live three months in each of these Scottish cities, would therefore be, in some respects, better qualified to present a picture of their minds, manners, and state of civilisation, than nineteen out of twenty of the inhabitants of either city themselves, even although he should fall into some mistakes which a resident native would have avoided. His views would probably differ from those entertained of themselves and of each other, by the mass of the inhabitants of both towns; but they might nevertheless contain much truth, which might have escaped their own notice. Even such observations, however, must also be imperfect; for the stranger represents only an individual mind, with natural aptitudes, biases, and deficiencies of his own; and all that he can legitimately achieve, is to give a candid statement of the impressions made on his own faculties by the objects to which they were directed.

In the United States, the difficulties of attaining to truth in delineating the incidents of travel, are increased by the feelings which the remarks of British authors have excited in some circles of society. Their pictures of American manners have been resented, and this resentment has shown itself on the part of individuals in attempts to mystify and mislead British travellers who are suspected of the intention of writing a book on the United States. In Boston, I was told that a certain person boasts of having given Miss Martineau erroneous information for the purpose of leading her into mistakes; and another in Philadelphia assures his friends, that he "crammed" Captain Marryat with old "Joe Millers," that is to say, jokes and fictions, which the captain embodied into his books as facts illustrative of American manners. I am not aware of having been practised upon with similar intentions; but this may have happened unconsciously to myself; as it is said to have done in the case of my predecessors; and in this way I may unsuspectingly have been led to record error. But again, my apology is, that each writer is a single witness; that the truth will be evolved by multiplying their number; and that those features of American character respecting which all or most of the descriptions concur, may be viewed as correctly drawn; while those about which extensive differences exist, must be regarded as requiring farther elucidation.

I am sensible of the deficiency of system or connection in the work, and of its embracing topics that to many readers will present no interest. My apology for these imperfections is, that the pressing nature of my proper occupations deprived me of leisure either to acquire or to digest systematic views while I was in the country, and that after my return, although I had provided myself with books and printed documents containing a large extent of general information, I experienced an impossibility in applying them. In a systematic work, one important error may vitiate the whole superstructure; and I found that, in the absence of all the persons, objects, and institutions, by reference to which my inferences from these materials might be checked and corrected, I could not feel secure in my premises. The only alternatives presented to me, therefore, were to publish my notes, imperfect as they might be, or to publish nothing.

In farther apology for the apparently trifling nature of some of the incidents recorded, I may observe that the American Democracy is a phenomenon which has scarcely had a parallel in the world. It is, therefore, full of interest in all its features. From the vast political and social power wielded even by the meanest of the people, from their being, not in name only but in fact, the sovereigns of the nation, their manners, habits, opinions, and social condition are far more interesting than those of the same classes in a European kingdom. If Mrs. Trollope, or any other traveller, has described the puerile love of titles, the ungainly habits, or the peculiar manner of some American citizens; or if, in the following pages, I have introduced the gossip of wayfaring people, or anecdotes of the obscurest of men, they really do not appear trivial to my mind: because, to these very people the most profound and enlightened statesmen, the most learned lawyers, and the most accomplished divines, must address themselves; they must guide their understanding, and direct their passions, or allow their country to be ruined. In the election which took place in Massachusetts in November 1839, Mr. Edward Everett, a man of great talents and accomplishments, was ejected from office as governor of the state by a majority of one vote. The man who gave that vote may have been the most odd or illiterate person described in the following pages; and the knowledge that such individuals are invested with influence on the destinies of their country, gives to every feature of their character a deep interest. If they are vain, the politician leads them by their vanity; if they are absorbed in the pursuit of gain, he presents to them a golden bait; if they are self-confident and half-informed, he leads them by encomiums and plausibilities; and hence their faults, foibles, and imperfections, as well as their virtues and attainments, become efficient causes of bad or good government, and constitute fundamental elements in speculating on the future destinies of the nation. Innumerable remarks, therefore, which to my readers on both sides of the Atlantic, who do not take this view, may appear puerile, are in my eyes invested with a philosophical importance; and I do not believe that a correct view of the practical effect of the American institutions can be presented without introducing these apparently trifling elucidations. I have endeavoured to appreciate these details, according to their real importance, and to seize the principles upon which their interest depends; but these, without the substratum of facts, although evolved occasionally in trivial and ludicrous anecdotes, would, in my opinion be abstractions little instructive to any reader.

A portion of the "notes" consists of notices of remarks which were made to me by various persons, or of information drawn from individuals by direct inquiries. The value of these remarks must necessarily depend on the knowledge, judgment, and honesty of the persons from whom they were derived, as well as upon the accuracy with which they have been reported. I found no cause of inquiry so instructive in the United States as conversations with persons of different professions, such as proprietors of land, merchants, lawyers, bankers, ministers of the Gospel, teachers, doctors in medicine, and men of science, as well as common working men; and by no other means could I give such a correct and vivid picture of the American mind as by reporting these, only suppressing names, places, and dates, so that there should be no key to the discovery of the individuals, so to implicate them in any possible error; and I have pursued this course. The conversations introduced are generally transposed in time and place, in order to avoid personal reference. It may reasonably be remarked, that, without the names, no one can know whether the individuals were the representatives of classes, or isolated persons uttering merely their own impressions. In reply, I observe, that the interest of these conversations consists in the thoughts which they embody, and that this is altogether independent of the individuals. I endeavoured to practise discrimination in judging what remarks I should record. On the inherent weight of the ideas, and on this discretion their value rests. It would have been easy to give forth as my own, numerous remarks and suggestions which I derived from such sources; but this would not have rendered them more worthy of acceptance, while it would have implied that I pretended to possess an extent of information and depth of sagacity to which I had no legitimate claim.

In the course of my progress in the United States, I saw many things in a more advanced condition than similar objects were in my own country, and, therefore, concluded that a notice of them would be both useful and interesting. The common school system, for example, the houses of refuge, the prisons, the lunatic asylums, and the voluntary church system, are objects that in Britain are engaging a large portion of general or local attention. It was not in my power to write systematic treatises on these subjects, but, by collecting and publishing such cursory remarks as were within my reach, I hoped to convey some useful information that might benefit the laborers in the same enterprises at home. To my American readers nothing may appear more jejune than quotations from their own common school journals, acts establishing houses of refuge, or slight notices of their asylums and prisons; yet, on submitting these to persons of intelligence in Scotland before publishing them, I am assured that they are calculated to be useful in my own country.

Again, the Americans will probably be struck with the frequent notices of sermons introduced into the work; but the object of alluding to these was not trivial. An intense interest exists in Britain, and especially in Scotland, on the subject of a voluntary or an endowed church, and the most contradictory reports of the operation of the voluntary system in the United States have been published by British authors; and consequently, at the present time, no element of information concerning the United States is calculated to excite more general interest than one regarding the state of religion in that country.

Some persons may probably be offended at the frequency and freedom with which religious opinions are introduced and commented on. My apology is, that I was struck with the far greater frequency with which questions on religious topics were put to me when lecturing in the United States than when lecturing in Britain. This was an important feature in the mental condition of the people; and by making such notes of these questions as I was able to write down, I considered that I was preserving evidence of this important fact itself, even allowing many errors on my part to have been unintentionally committed in representing the views and motives of the parties who put them. My situation as a lecturer on the philosophy of mind exposed me to such questions, and I regarded them as among the most interesting incidents of my experience. In this way I have occasionally made remarks on the spirit displayed by different sects; these are open to the approval or condemnation of every reader according to his own judgment; but if the religion of a country be an important element in its civilisation, there can be no impropriety in freely introducing such remarks on its peculiarities as these naturally suggested.

Again, my frequent and slight notices of banks and stocks may appear to many persons unnecessary, unsatisfactory, or unphilosophical. On this point, I would observe, that a strong tendency exists at present in Britain towards multiplying banks; and the popular illustrations given in the following pages of some of the evils attending excessive issues of paper money, may instruct many whom a scientific work would never reach. Farther, a considerable number of my own countrymen are interested in American stocks, having invested, or proposing to invest in them. They may peruse with interest the cursory notices which occur in these pages, and may be thereby induced to make more extensive and satisfactory inquiries for their own safety.

To some readers, also, the frequent repetition of dates, and of the state of the thermometer, may appear unmeaning pedantry; but when I contemplated proceeding to the United States, no subject was more interesting to me than to ascertain facts concerning the temperature; for on them depended not only the provision which we should make in regard to clothing, but also against the peculiarities of the climate. In scientific works, tables of the thermometer in certain localities might be found; but I could not discover the precise temperature in the streets in towns; that temperature, in short, which would affect our feelings and health most directly. I therefore noted the temperature of the external air in the shade between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning, in the various hotels and other residences which we occupied. These may not correspond with the scientific reports of the same districts, in open and exposed situations, but they will supply to future visitors, information which it would have benefited us considerably to have attained, before our departure for the American continent.

To many of my readers the introduction of Phenology in so many forms and places may appear tedious and uninteresting; but Phrenology was the great object of my visit and my occupation while in the United States. It gave origin to the work itself; and to have passed it over in silence, would have been like acting the tragedy of Hamlet, omitting the character of that name. I proceeded thither with the impression that this science would contribute powerfully to the advancement of civilisation in that country; and I returned, not only with the impression converted to conviction, but further persuaded, that in the United States, probably earlier than in any other country, will Phrenology be applied to practical and important purposes. To save my readers on both sides of the ocean, however, from unnecessary alarm on this head I may here mention, that I do not consider that the generation is yet born which is destined to carry this science into practical effect in public affairs; but I entertain the conviction that, within a century from this time, Phrenology will be so applied in the United States. This idea is participated in by those who, from their acquaintance with Phrenology and experience of mankind, are best qualified to judge, and for them this portion of the work is composed.

I may remark, that the Americans in reading a work on the United States written by a foreigner, judge of it, almost uniformly, as a book composed not only about, but exclusively for themselves. If it contain statements and descriptions which lie on the surface of their country and social habits, they regard it as twaddle and gossip; but this book is written for the readers of the English language on this side of the Atlantic; and the Americans, with all deference to their superior knowledge of their own affairs, are not better judges than we are, concerning what will interest our own people. I have read the tours of Americans in Great Britain, and in proportion to the faithfulness of their representations, did they appear to me to be trite and commonplace; but this was an unfair criterion of their merits. This very fidelity, which deprived them of interest to a Briton, invested them with it to the American who had never visited the British shores. May I not hope that the candid among my American readers will allow me the benefit of the same rule of judging?

CHAPTER I.

On the 8th of September, 1838, we sailed from the wharf at Bristol in the Cambrian steamboat, and found ourselves amid an immense multitude of men, women, and children, dogs, bales, bags, porters, and musicians. We were cheered by the strains—not very dulcet, of a harp and a violin, as we descended the stream of the muddy yet romantic Avon. In sailing down the river, we saw two persons shoot across the gulf, of which it forms the narrow bottom, in a car, slung on an iron bar 785 feet in length, and 170 feet above our heads. It is used by the workmen now engaged in constructing a suspension-bridge from cliff to cliff across the stream.

In an hour and a half we were on board of the Great Western, lying at anchor in King-Road. Her first appearance disappointed us; for we had heard much of her great dimensions. When compared with the vessels lying near her, she was seen to be very long, but neither remarkably broad nor high. She was launched on 19th July, 1837, and sailed on her first voyage to New York on 2d April, 1838.

The passengers were gay; and, although many of us looked wistfully at the receding shores of England, there was no possibility of indulging in sentiment in such a scene of bustle. On entering the ship, every thing seemed confusion doubly confounded. The middle portion of the after-deck was occupied by a suite of new state-rooms, erected on it since her first voyage, directly above the great skylight of the saloon; and a space of only a few feet was left on each side, between them and the bulwarks of the vessel. These narrow paths were literally blocked up with people and luggage.

On descending, the saloon appeared long, narrow, high in the ceiling for a ship, and very tastefully ornamented, but dark and gloomy. On repairing to our state-room (Nos. 19 and 20), we found it nearly the worst in the main-cabin; almost at the stern of the vessel, and the lower bed so narrow, owing to the bend in the timbers, that it admitted the occupant to lie on his side, but not on his back, if his shoulders were of any approach to Herculean dimensions. Early in July we had obtained the services of a friend in Bristol, well acquainted with the vessel, to secure berths for us; and these were the best that he could find then disengaged. We now learned the cause of our bad fortune. The board of directors in Bristol, with a surprising self-denial, allotted certain berths to London and certain berths to Liverpool, which can be engaged in these cities only, and these are the best in the saloon; they reserve the worst for Bristol. Thus, although we went early to the fountain-head, as we thought, we were not so successful as some who had used less foresight.

As many travellers now cross the Atlantic, it may interest those who are meditating a voyage, to learn the nature and extent of the accommodations provided for them. We paid eighty guineas for the fare of two persons, and had a state-room six feet square, with a window five or six inches in diameter, opening, close on the upper bed, to the sea. This left our apartment still dusky. We had two beds, three small drawers, two basins and stands, a shelf, water-bottles, and a few large pegs for hanging clothes on. We set busily to work to arrange our luggage. The trunks not required during the voyage were placed "below" in the hold, and order was soon produced in our little world. It was wonderful how soon order arose also in the ship, by each passenger having his effects quietly conveyed to his own state-room.

At five o'clock P. M. all friends left the vessel, and we sailed. Tears streamed from many a glistening eye; but when the pang of parting was over, we received three hearty cheers from several steamboats, crowded with company, who had come to see us off. The promontories, and rising grounds of the shore, also, were crowded with people, who cheered us as we passed down the Severn.

Half-past 7 P. M.—Wind northeast; sails set full on the two front masts (for the ship has four masts altogether); and we move gloriously down the channel. Already, however, owing to our inexperience, a disagreeable incident has occurred to us. The door of our state-room opens directly on one of the dining-tables. At tea, we naturally seated ourselves there; but were soon displaced. We were then first informed, that it has long been a practice in the New York sailing-packets, for passengers to choose their places at table at the first meal, and to keep them during the voyage. No previous notice of this rule was given to the passengers. The first meal on this occasion, was a cold collation, at which we and our friends all seemed to us to sit promiscuously. Some experienced gentleman, however, whose berths were in the lower regions, familiarly named the "catacombs," had taken possession of the seats opposite our state-room, and we found all the places at table already appropriated, except those in the least accessible and least comfortable part of the saloon. Two of these we were obliged to occupy during the voyage.

This custom is not convenient in steam-ships. In the sailing packets there are no berths on the lower or upper decks: all enter directly from the saloon. There is, therefore, no inducement to any person to seat himself opposite the door of his neighbour's state-room; but in the steam-ships, half of the passengers sleep below or above the saloon. The proper seats for them at table would be those on the inner sides, leaving those opposite the saloon state-rooms for the occupants of these apartments. To ladies this makes a great difference. There are many days when they could venture to come to table if one step sufficed to carry them into their berths when uncomfortable, although they could not encounter a walk of thirty or forty yards down one side and up another of a very long table, staggering against waiters, in a rolling sea, as we had to do on this occasion.

Sunday, "Sept. 9.—Noon, wind westerly; Lat. 51° 3', Long. 6° 52'; distance run 150 miles; weather moderate, cloudy."

Such is the official report of the ship's log, which is consulted every day with intense interest by the passengers shortly after noon. The sea was smooth all night, and most of us rose in excellent health. The rules of the ship were now produced. Nothing is said in them about taking seats for the voyage. All lights in the saloon must be extinguished at half past eleven, and in the state-rooms at twelve. This leaves us in profound darkness when many need assistance; but the danger of fire has rendered this rule necessary. In some steam-ships, however, a wick floating in oil in a glass cup, burns all night, to the great comfort of the sick, while it is so constructed that fire from it seems nearly impossible. Thermometer 62°. Saw several ships, but no land.

We were called to prayers in the saloon, and a sermon on the evidences of Christianity was preached by a clergyman, one of the passengers. He introduced very appropriately Dr. Beattie's illustration to his son, of the existence of God, called forth by sowing seed in a plot of ground in the form of the letters of the child's name. When the boy saw the letters, he called his father to observe the wonder. His father asked what was wonderful? Some one must have done it, said the child. Why, may not the seed have grown into those forms by chance? asked the father. Impossible, said the child; and on this admission, he founded his argument in demonstration of the being of a God. This was new to most of the children on board, and produced a strong impression on the more intelligent among them.

The tables in the saloon are fixed to the floor, and it is impossible to walk in it. As we have scarcely any space on deck for locomotion, we feel as if imprisoned.

Monday.—The wind has blown strongly from the north all night, and the distress of the passengers has been horrible. The attendance on the sufferers has been very deficient. In the afternoon, we passed several ships, and saw abundance of stormy petrels. It is evident that the children on board suffer much less from sea-sickness than the adults.

Tuesday.—This day the wind is strong from the southwest, and a heavy sea is running. Still we carry sail and advance. The passengers complain not a little of inattention in the servants, and of bad arrangements.

Wednesday.—A heavy sea is rolling, and many of the passengers are again ill. Others, however, have recovered, and their enjoyments aggravate the sufferings of the sick. There are on board 142 passengers, of all ages and both sexes. The saloon accommodates about 120 at dinner. Champagne, hock, claret, port, sherry, madeira, brandy, porter, ale, and soda-water, are served out to all at their pleasure. Apparently, some of the individuals on board have not been accustomed to the use of these wines ad libitum, and as they have paid a large sum for their passage, they seem resolved to "take it out," as some of them express it, in wine. While most of the ladies lie sick in bed and suffering severely, separated from the saloon only by a half inch board, these jolly companions pass the afternoon in deep potations, with the usual tavern accompaniments of singing (often not the most choice songs,) rapping on the table, delivering speeches, and cheering. The very smell of their orgies penetrates into the berths of the sick; and the loud, crapulous, everlasting laugh, at nothing, which distinguishes a certain state of cerebral excitement, rings in the ears of the ladies hour after hour. One of them compares her own sufferings to those of Pandemonium, and wishes for a Dante to describe the scene. Some of the sailing packet-ships have reduced their charge, and omitted wine and spirits in their bill of fare; leaving each passenger to call and pay for whatever portion of these he chooses. This rule renders those individuals the most temperate who, under the present system, are the most intemperate. It is because they are not in the habit of using such wine when they have to pay for it, that they indulge so largely, when it is presented to them at their pleasure.

Thursday.—I have seen as heavy seas in the passage between Leith and London as any we have yet encountered, and am rather disappointed with the great Atlantic. We were told before sailing that this ship is so long that she extends over two waves at a time, and does not pitch and roll so much as smaller vessels. She, however, pitches and rolls abundantly; yet she is very staunch, and her engines work with admirable regularity. This evening we had no attendance at our part of the table. The servant assigned to it was drunk and off duty. I am not surprised at this: the gentlemen drink so deeply, and wine and spirits are in such unceasing circulation, that the servants rather deserve praise for the degree of sobriety which they in general exhibit.

Friday.—The weather is very disagreeable, and as there is a great want of room, a good deal of discomfort is felt. We have on board Mr. Wilson and Miss Sherriff, the celebrated vocalists. Mr. Wilson most obligingly favours us occasionally with one of his exquisite songs. To-day at noon we were 120 miles short of the distance which the ship had reached at the end of the same time in her last voyage. Many passengers are still unwell. Large waves, occasionally a passing vessel, and tumbling porpoises, are the only objects which greet our eyes when we look beyond the deck. Bottles, glasses, and plates are precipitated into the laps of the passengers at every lurch. There are no guards on the table; every object directly obeys the law of gravitation, and the destruction by breakage is prodigious. To-day a brig, close-reefed, has passed our vessel, and stormy petrels or Mother Carey's Chickens fly thick around us. The sailors tell landmen that these birds are never seen at rest, on land or at sea, but sleep and hatch their eggs on the wing!

Saturday.—Dreary and uncomfortable.

Sunday.—The ship rolls and pitches much; but, nevertheless, we have had prayers and sermon in the saloon from an American divine. The passengers mustered pretty numerously. He prayed for the President of the United States, and Victoria, Queen of England. There is a coloured family on board who are rich, and the young lady is well educated. So far as I could observe, there was only one gentleman in the ship who addressed them; and he, to the honour of his country, was an Irishman. The father is a merchant at —, and one of his own ships waits for him at New York. We are told that, on account of their colour, this family will find it difficult to obtain apartments in any good hotel in that city.

Monday.—To-day the sun shines, and although the ship rolls considerably, we are now accustomed to the motion, and are nearly all on deck and gay. The narrow space between the deck state-rooms and the bulwarks is so crowded that it is impossible to walk; but to breathe the fresh air, and bask in the sun, is a luxury. We spoke the "St. Lawrence" on her voyage westward. She sailed from Liverpool on the 27th August. We left Bristol twelve days later, and have overtaken her. The waves of the Atlantic are a deep blue; those of the British seas green. This is the chief difference that I perceive between them.

Tuesday.—Last night it blew hard from the west, with a heavy head sea. The engineer put out two of his furnaces, and slackened his speed to five miles an hour. He wastes coals, and gains no compensating advantage, by steaming hard against a head-wind and sea. The engine was reduced to eight strokes in the minute; it is capable of performing sixteen, and in this voyage has pretty generally done twelve.

A lottery of sixty tickets, at a sovereign each, has been set on foot, the prizes in which are to be decided by the hour at which the New York pilot shall board the vessel. Each ticket bears one hour, commencing at 6 P. M. ship's time, on Sunday, 23d September, and they extend over the subsequent sixty hours. They are all put into a hat, and the subscribers draw one for each sovereign which they deposit. There are five prizes, and the holder of the ticket bearing the hour at which the pilot boards us, gets the highest, and the holder of each of the next four hours receives one of the minor prizes. The parties to the lottery present three tickets to the mates and ship's pilot.

One of the ladies complained to-day that the passengers in the state-rooms adjoining hers, carried wine or stronger liquors into their berths, and continued their bacchanalian orgies and singing till half past twelve, much to her annoyance. There is a great deal of card-playing and heavy betting on board.

About 3 P. M. the wind changed to the east, and the sea became smooth. The square sails were set, and the engine was put at full speed. At 10 P. M. we were going at the rate of twelve miles an hour.

Wednesday.—We are now on the great Bank of Newfoundland, and have dense fog and rain. This is the constant weather here. The soundings give from 28 to 40 and 50 fathoms. The waves are now green. The great depth of the ocean gave them their blue colour.

Thursday.—I very reverently beg pardon of the Atlantic for any disrespectful terms used in describing its appearance in the previous page; to-day it has come forth in all its glory. Very early this morning a regular equinoctial gale from the northwest sprang up, and blew with great violence all day; yet the sky was clear, and the sun shone brilliantly. Wave after wave, as high as the top of our huge paddle-boxes, came rolling on, and our gallant ship rose majestically over them. All sickness was now past, and, seated on the highest part of the deck, near the steerman, I saw the sublime moving masses of water rolling slowly yet irresistibly on, embodying the very spirit of gigantic power. My whole frame thrilled with pleasing excitement. The wall of dark blue water (for we had now passed the bank) appeared far above the bow of the vessel, as the wave approached us. In a few moments she breasted it, and rode triumphantly over its crest. With the speed of lightning, she rushed down the watery steep; and anon, the wave, foaming with her pressure, rolled high above the stern, and showed her track far in the wake. The spray flew from stem to stern, but she shipped no heavy seas. She felt firm as a rock, and neither quivered nor quailed beneath the giant blows of the mighty element. The captain Hoskins, stood for hours beside the steersman, and gave the word how to direct her to the gale, and his eye beamed and his countenance was lighted up with joy, as he contemplated her admirable performance. When in the hollow waves, we seemed as if sunk in an abyss of water. When we rose on their crests, the commotion of the sea all around was magnificent. Looking at the horizon, where the heavens seemed to touch the water, even at that vast distance, the swell and fall were distinguishable. Every billow wore a crest of snow-white foam, which added life and grace to its stately mass. The engine laboured a little when the paddles were immersed deeply in the wave; but never was for a moment arrested. The performance of the ship and machinery were admirable, and no sentiment of danger presented itself, even to the imagination.

After enjoying the sublime scene for several hours, and desiring much to have seen from the deck of another vessel, our own noble ship rushing onward against the gale and the sea, a spectacle of power that does honour to human art, I continued my position, and, holding on by a rope attached to the hind mast, read the opening scene of the Talisman, in Sir Walter Scott's Tales of the Crusaders. The imagination was transported in an instant to the calm, sultry, desert regions of the Dead Sea, while the reader was careering amidst the wild Atlantic billows, and fanned by an equinoctial gale! The enjoyment was exquisite.

The scene in the saloon was not so sublimely captivating. There all was confusion. Chairs, dishes, wine-glasses, and decanters, men and children, rolled on the floor, as they were shaken from the table and the seats. The sufferings of sickness with many of the ladies were renewed. C—— was in her berth, unable to lift her head.

and on the little window being opened for one moment for air, the sea rushed in in a fearful torrent, and inundated her clothes. She quietly observed, that she had almost rivalled the celebrated Mrs. Partington, for she had mopped the Atlantic out of her bed!

The gale continued the whole day, and about 6 P. M. the fore-yard gave way. The foresail was the only one set, and had steadied us a little. The spar was replaced with sailor-like celerity.

A gentleman on board told me that he saw this ship when building, and that her timbers are exceedingly strong, and so close that it is impossible to insert the edge of the hand between her ribs. The engine rests on a vast frame, the beams of which extend to, and press equally on, every part of her bottom, so that there is no accumulation of pressure on the middle of her keel, as many landmen believe. Her performance to-day accords with this description.

Amidst this sea, the cooking went on without interruption; and a sumptuous breakfast, dinner, and tea, that would have done no discredit to a London tavern, were placed on the table. There, however, many of the viands remained only while they were held by the hands of the servants or guests. About seven tenths of our whole complement of passengers mustered at dinner, and there was great mirth at the many ludicrous incidents that occurred in such a scene.

Friday. To-day the sun shines clear and benignant, over a comparatively calm sea. The passengers are all on deck, gay and full of hope of a speedy termination to the voyage. At 8 A. M. the thermometer stood at 67° in the shade.

No circumstance connected with this voyage has been so little anticipated by me as the rapid rate at which, if I may use such an expression, we run away from time. It is only thirteen days since we left Bristol, and already the sun is four hours later than my watch, which still shows the London hours. We have in this brief period sailed over an extent of the earth's surface, equal to that accomplished in four hours by the globe turning on its axis. Of course, every child who has been instructed in the rudiments of geography has learned that it must be so, as we have now run 60 degrees of longitude; but the actual perception of a phenomenon like this, strikes the mind more forcibly than the mere knowledge of it. I never before had so strong an impression of the diminutive size of the globe which we inhabit.

Saturday. This has been a deliciously calm day. A light wind has blown from the south, and the thermometer has stood at 67°. We have carried sail on all our four masts. The engine has performed fifteen and sixteen strokes per minute, its greatest available speed, and our actual progression has been from eleven to twelve miles an hour.

To-day, the passengers formed themselves into a court of Criminal Sessions, to try one of their own number for disturbing the public peace. He was arraigned under the name of Jingle Jingle, Esq., and his offence was disturbing the company in the fore-cabin, by rising and making sundry noises at half-past five o'clock in the morning. The ex-Governor of the state of — was appointed judge; Mr. A —, clerk of court; Mr. B —, constable; Professor —, attorney-general; and Messrs. — and —, defendant's counsel. A huge hand-spike served as the mace of court. A jury was empanelled; and a most impartial trial was granted. The speeches of the learned gentlemen, who conducted the prosecution and defence, would have done honour to Westminster Hall. The jury found the panel guilty, and the judge, in consideration of its being his first offence, sentenced him only to eat his soup with a fork, and to have no grog till he arrived at New York.

At half-past three o'clock P. M., we bore down and spoke the ship "Bazaar," out thirty-five days from Liverpool, and bound for Boston. It was a beautiful sight. She had all sails set, yet we passed her like an arrow.

After dinner, Mr. Wilson and Miss Sherriff favoured us with a duet. We then had "God save the Queen," from Mr. Wilson, the company joining in the chorus; "La Parisienne," from a party of Frenchmen; and the "Star-Spangled Banner," from an American gentleman. This was a lively and interesting scene; it was gratifying to hear the sons of these rival, and too long hostile, nations, cordially joining in the choruses of each other's songs.

Sunday. We are now on St. George's Bank, and enveloped in a dense fog, accompanied with a high temperature and much damp. A huge horn, like a coachman's, has been blown all night, to warn ships of our approach. We had prayers and a sermon in the saloon.

Monday. At two P. M. the welcome sound of "land in sight," was transmitted with the rapidity of an electric spark, through the ship. We saw Long Island, and coasted it for several hours. Those to whom the sight was new, watched its hills and trees with deep interest.

Ten minutes to seven, P. M. We have had a glorious sunset. The pilot has just come on board. There is a great excitement, as the prizes in the lottery are decided. So high has the spirit of gambling now risen, that, before he entered the ship, bets were offered and taken on the colour of his eyes and whiskers, his stature, and even whether he were right or left handed. He was so closely scrutinised by those whose sovereigns were depending on his appearance, that his temper was at first a little ruffled; but when he was told the object of the survey, he submitted to it with much good humour. The passengers passed a vote of thanks to the captain and ship's officers, and resolutions in commendation of the ship.

Sandy Hook is a promontory of sand, in the form which its name indicates, running into the sea at the entrance of the Bay of New York. Its light-house is full twenty miles from the city, the approach to which is by a winding channel. As soon as we were fairly in the bay, we fired three guns, and burnt three blue lights. Several news boats were speedily on board of us; and at eleven, P. M., we cast anchor in the Quarantine roadstead, close to Staten Island, and within sight of the lights of New York, distant six or seven miles. Many of the passengers proceeded directly to the city; but we being strangers to the new world, felt no such overpowering impatience, and therefore slept on board.*

Tuesday, Sept. 25. At day-break the anchor was weighed, and we sailed towards the city. It was a splendid autumnal morning; the air was clear, fresh, and bracing, and the sun brilliant. The waters were smooth, and all around was land, beautiful in its outlines, and studded with houses, white as snow, and embosomed among trees. The earth, however, looked parched, after a summer of excessive heat, forming a striking contrast to that which we had just left in Scotland. We had suffered under a cold sky and constant rain; while here life was rendered nearly intolerable by a temperature almost unprecedentedly high. The bay was covered with ships, whose sails shone in the sun with unsullied whiteness, rarely seen in England. The Americans bleach their canvass, and their harbours are not blackened by coal-smoke, as in the country of their forefathers. Steamboats darted out from every point of the land, and rushed along with astonishing speed. They were crowded with passengers, and forcibly recalled the remarks which we had read of the locomotive propensity of the American people.

* I have heard that, since this voyage, the Great Western has undergone great improvements, both in the arrangement of the berths on deck, and in the servants' department, and that she is now a comfortable and well managed ship.

At 8 A. M. we were safely moored opposite the quay in the East River, as the sound between Long Island and Manhattan Island, on the latter of which New York stands, is somewhat improperly named. The first aspect of the city, on the side of the East River, strikingly resembles that of Amsterdam. High, irregular, red brick fabrics, with innumerable masts, extending over a space of two miles in length, and half shading the houses from the eye, characterise both. The custom-house officers came immediately on board, and a new scene of bustle and confusion commenced. The prodigious quantity of luggage belonging to our very numerous passengers, blocked up every foot of our narrow decks, and made it difficult to move. The search against contraband goods commenced, and nothing could be more reasonable and gentlemanly than the conduct of the officers. About twelve o'clock, a general permission from the custom-house arrived, and we and our effects were allowed to land. The confusion was now redoubled. Porters, carters, hackey-coachmen, friends of passengers, loungers, "loafers," and pick-pockets, rushed on deck up the single narrow gangway, while down it, at the same time, poured passengers, trunks, bags, and baggage, in an equally rapid current. We sat quietly and saw the stream flow on for two hours, before we attempted to mingle in it. To add to the interest of the scene, some of the servants of the ship were carrying out the live geese which had not been required during the passage, while others were hoisting out the swine, by tackle attached to their feet, and both birds and beasts were rending the air with their screams, occasioned by the rough treatment which they experienced. At length, at 2 P. M., we landed, and drove to the Carlton House Hotel, in Broadway, kept by an Englishman, but in the American style.

CHAPTER II.

The American Hotels have often been described. They are very large; all the guests breakfast, dine, and drink tea at a public table, and each has a small bed-room. During the interval between meals, such of the gentlemen as are not engaged in business abroad, smoke, drink, talk politics, or traffic in the bar-room, or reading-room; and the fair sex gossip, flirt, or "rock" in a handsome apartment named the ladies' parlour. It generally contains a pianoforte, and they may be seen playing, and heard singing, with the same self-possession amidst crowds of visitors, as if they were in their own sanctuaries at home. Custom renders this mode of life agreeable to many of them. Few indulge in private parlours, both on account of the expense, and because they prefer the busy throng.

The first impression made on us by New York was not pleasing. Its character necessarily partakes of that of all sea-port towns. In the lower part of the city, next the rivers, the streets are narrow, dirty, and adorned by large fat swine, enjoying the same freedom of locomotion which the United States grant to the natives of every clime who seek their shores. The pavement is rough, and much of it in bad condition. The houses are irregular; and the suspicion at once arises that there is no efficient police attending to the general welfare of the town. At 8 P. M., I walked to the Post-office, and found the streets dark, large portions of them having unlighted lamps. I soon learned that they were dark because the moon was in her first quarter, and was expected to shine. In the United States, this expectation is more reasonable than in Britain; but on this evening clouds obscured her rays, and this great city appeared to the eye of a foreigner, who had been accustomed to Edinburgh and London, both dismal and unsafe.

25th Sept. The great topic of conversation here is Lord Brougham's attack on Lord Durham, for banishing the Canadian patriots, as they call themselves, or rebels, as the English style them, to Bermuda, beyond the limits of his jurisdiction. Lord Brougham's conduct is strongly condemned.

The great fire.—We visited the scene of the great fire in New York in December in 1835. Every trace of it is now obliterated, and many proprietors have received a larger sum for the ground on which their former warehouses stood, than the whole fabrics, including the site, would have brought before the conflagration. The commercial community is rapidly recovering from the embarrassments of 1837, when the banks suspended specie payments; and the quays and streets indicate great activity in trade.

The rate of Exchange between London and New York, has been for some months against England; and our London banker advised us to carry sovereigns instead of banker's bills. They were received by a bank in New York at four dollars and eighty-five cents each; which is the par value at which they are current in the United States.

Exchange Offices.—A stranger is much surprised on seeing the great number of Exchange offices in New York, bearing an intimation that current and uncurrent bank-notes are there bought, sold, and exchanged. Since President Jackson refused to sign the "Bill" rechartering the National Bank of the United States, the Union has been inundated by bank-notes of the value of a dollar and upwards, without any efficient machinery for regulating the exchange of them; and as New York is the centre of a vast commerce, notes of banks in every degree of credit, and whose head-quarters, where alone the notes are payable, lie at every degree of distance within the Union, are in circulation. The profession of bank-bill brokers has, in consequence, sprung up to meet the wants of society, and it appears to be at once an extensive and a lucrative one. Pamphlets are published, containing lists of all banks in the Union and in Canada, and stating the value of their notes; and columns nearly a yard long and in small type, may be seen in some of the New York newspapers, embodying the same information. In short, it has become a science nearly as extensive and difficult as Entomology or Conchology, to know the value of the currency of this great country.

Difference between New York and English Towns.—The effect on the mind after a few days' residence in this city is singular. The time since we left Bristol appears to be so short, and the dress, manners, and language of the better classes are so similar to those of the same rank in England, that it is difficult to "realise," as the Americans express it, the idea of being so far from home; yet, in reading the newspapers, and listening to conversation, we soon discover that we are in an entirely different moral world. Here the newspaper columns glow with the most energetic discussions concerning the merits of William H. Seward, Esq. and Luther Bradish, Esq., who have just been proposed by the Whigs at a convention held at Utica, as the candidates for the offices of Governor and Lieutenant-governor of the state; and innumerable other topics, all new to a stranger. As the stranger is cool in proportion to his ignorance and want of interest in the subjects, he receives a lively impression of the activity and intensity of the minds of the people.

The upper parts of this city present streets, houses, and squares of a handsome description. Many of the houses, although of brick, are said to have cost $30,000, and are let at $5000 or $6000 per annum. Even here, however, swine are seen roaming at large. Broadway is the great thoroughfare of the city. It extends fully two miles from north to south, and is as broad as Regent street, London; but its architecture presents every variety of elevation, from the wooden frame-houses of two stories, to that of the ample residence of the rich merchant; and these are, in a few instances, standing side by side. The foot-pavement is, in many places, rough and dilapidated, and the coup d'œil of the whole is injured by heavy wooden posts rising on the outer margin of the pavement, and used for stretching canvass to shade the shops from the sun.

Sept. 27. Theatres.—New York is celebrated for the number of its theatres. The condition of the population is precisely that in which places of public amusement may be expected to be most successful. The city, at all times, contains a large number of strangers, whose evenings are at their own disposal; of young men engaged in trade, who live in boarding-houses and hotels, who have plenty of money, and no domestic ties; and of rich merchants and their families, whose tastes are, to a certain extent, intellectual, but whose mental resources are not very extensive; and these form a solid phalanx of play-going people. Even with all these advantages, however, Mr. Simpson, the manager of the Park Theatre, has not been fortunate. This evening he receives a benefit, the tickets at the rate of three dollars (12s. 6d.) for each person, to all parts of the house, to enable him to surmount his difficulties. A friend kindly presented us with tickets; but our engagements prevented us from accepting them. We learned, however, that the house was crowded in every quarter. The attractions were great; for Madame Vestris, Charles Mathews, Mademoiselle Celeste, and Miss Ellen Tree, were all announced to appear in the entertainments.

Phrenology.—I was waited on this evening by a number of medical and other gentlemen, to concert measures about my giving a course of lectures on phrenology in New York. I stated to them the rule which I had followed in my own country, namely, not to lecture out of Edinburgh, unless on an invitation accompanied by a guaranty of a class, and that it was my intention to adhere to it in the United States. Phrenology, I remarked, was a disputed subject; it appeared to myself to be true and highly important, and I was therefore willing to teach it to those who desired to hear it explained; but as there were many excellent persons who regarded it as unfounded, others who viewed it as dangerous, and still more who cared nothing about it, I had no wish to obtrude it upon any of these, and should, therefore, not present myself in the attitude of a solicitor for an audience. They engaged to muster a class, and I agreed to give a course of sixteen lectures, of two hours each, at the rate of three in the week, in the Clinton Hall, belonging to the Mercantile Library Association, situated close to the Park, to the public offices, and the great hotels, and, consequently, in the part of the city devoted to public business. A few gentlemen kindly interested themselves as a committee, and Dr. Brigham superintended all preliminary arrangements. The lectures are to commence on the 19th of November next. We have secured apartments in the Carlton House from 16th November to 1st January, 1839.

CHAPTER III.

SEPT. 28. Voyage to Albany.—We embarked this morning at seven o'clock on board of the Champlain steamboat for Albany. The boat sailed punctually at the hour, and we found ourselves rushing up the majestic Hudson at the rate of twelve miles an hour. A thick mist, however, almost immediately enveloped us, and our speed was lowered to avoid accidents. No smoking is allowed except in the fore-part of the main-deck. A few passengers, obviously belonging to the less polished class, spat plentifully on the deck; but one of the servants of the ship constantly employed a mop in cleansing the defiled places. The upper, or hurricane deck, was strewn with charcoal, being the lighter embers of the fuel, which are carried up the funnels of the engines by the powerful draught, and which fall, often red-hot, and burn the clothes of the passengers. We now saw the first specimens of American despatch. The steamboat took in and let out passengers at several stations on the river, and the operation was admirably managed. A few minutes before arriving at a town, a man went round the boat ringing a bell, and calling on the passengers who meant to land there, to prepare their luggage. It was sought out and carried to the gangway of the ship; and, in a very few minutes, six or eight passengers, with all their effects, were transferred into the small boat which was lowered to receive them. They were rowed ashore; landed; the small boat returned and was hauled up to the ship's side, and we were again under weigh. All was accomplished without noise or bustle, and without any loud commands or harsh talking.

We could see nothing for two hours; afterwards the fog cleared away, and all the rest of the river to Albany appeared in its glory as we glided along. It is lively, picturesque, and considerably varied in its aspects; now a river of a quarter of a mile in breadth, then expanding into a lake of two miles wide, and again contracting into a river. It merits all the encomiums bestowed on it. The number of schooners and sloops that navigate it is very great, and the whiteness of the sails, and elegance of the forms of the vessels, render them beautiful objects in the scene. At 8 P. M. we landed, in moonlight, at Albany, where our relatives waited for us, and gave us a cordial welcome.

Saturday, 29th Sept.—Albany is the political capital of the state of New York, and stands on the right bank of the Hudson, on ground sloping rapidly to the river. It commands a view of a beautiful country, abounding in water, wood, mountains, fertile fields, and thriving towns and villages. It was founded by the Dutch in the year 1612, and many of the descendants of the first settlers are still its principal citizens, and understand Dutch. It presents striking contrasts in its architecture. The public buildings having been recently erected by the state, are massive, and in good taste. They are grouped together in an oblong open space, and form an imposing coup d'œil. The churches also and other public buildings are numerous and handsome. Some of the private dwellings harmonise with these objects, but contiguous to them are ill paved streets, over which dirty swine are roaming at large, and where also wooden huts and irregular brick houses abound. The general impression produced is, that the town is only in its infancy, that much of it has been reared in haste, and stands only till its inhabitants shall have time to build edifices more worthy of themselves and their public institutions.

Why many objects in America appear unfinished.—The impression of newness and incompleteness, is forced on the mind in this country by most of the objects surveyed. Even the grounds and fences around the mansions of the rich are deficient in that finish and high order which distinguish similar objects in England; and a moment's reflection enables one to discover a reason why this should be the case. Let us suppose a gentleman in each country, whose income is 5000*l.* a year, to expend 20,000*l.* in erecting a mansion-house and laying out grounds; the Englishman sacrifices only 700*l.* per annum of income, estimating the interest of the sum expended at 3½ per cent. per annum; the American sinks 1400*l.* per annum of income, for in the state of New York, the legal rate of interest is 7 per cent. Again, suppose the labour of five men to be necessary under a head gardener, to keep the garden and pleasure-grounds in perfect condition. In England, labourers may be hired at 12*s.* each per week; which is 156*l.* per annum for the five. In America, the most untutored Irishman working with a spade, receives 4*s.* 2*d.* a day, or 25*s.* a week of wages. So that the five American labourers will cost 325*l.* per annum. The result is that the American's residence will cost him 1725*l.* per annum, and the Englishman's only 856*l.* Besides, in America, both capital and labour are so much in demand for productive employment, and yield such large returns, that a reflecting mind soon becomes reconciled to the rough and unfinished appearance which so many objects present; it being obvious, that they have been fabricated with the least expenditure of these two elements of wealth which would suffice to render them capable of supplying the immediate wants of the people. This state of things is not unattended with evils. In some houses in Albany, rented as high as 40*l.* a year, there is not a single "wall-press" for holding cups and other small articles in constant use in a family; and many other conveniences of English houses are wanting. Economy of capital, and not want of taste and discernment, is the cause of the omission.

Sunday, 30th Sept.—The Church.—Thermometer in the shade 68°. This has been a glorious day of clear, calm, bright sunshine. We attended divine service in the Baptist chapel, and heard Dr. ——— preach. The church was large and handsome, and the congregation numerous and highly respectable in their appearance. Indeed, I already perceive, that that squalid poverty which is at once the affliction and disgrace of the British Isles, is here nearly unknown, except in the persons of a few European emigrants, whose intemperate habits keep them in the same state of degradation in which they existed at home. The discourse was sternly Calvinistic, and the preacher sent Heathens, Mahometans, Catholics, Deists, and Atheists to eternal perdition, with as much zest and self-assurance as could have been exhibited by the most orthodox divine in Scotland. The churches are numerous, and many of them ornamental buildings, and nothing could exceed the propriety of deportment which reigned in the town all day. The morning service commences at 10, and terminates at 12. Dinner is served in the hotels at 1; the afternoon service commences at 3 and ends at 5; and there is evening service at 7.

An English lady who came a passenger in the Great Western, has been taken ill at the hotel here. She has no friends in the city; but nothing can exceed the kind and assiduous attention with which she is waited on by the American female servants.

Brightness of the Sky.—The moon is now nearly full, and shone this evening with such extraordinary brilliancy, compared with its rays in Britain, that it seemed as if it were much nearer to us, and looked as if protruded from the sky. The heavens are of a dark deep blue, and the stars shine with increased brilliancy; the consequence of the pure, dry atmosphere, which we are now breathing. From the combustion of wood and anthracite coal, the only kinds of fuel used here, no dense smoke is produced.

Oct. 1.—Saratoga.—By means of a railroad, we visited Saratoga, the great watering-place of the state of New York; and found it a large straggling village, lying in a sandy plain, and consisting of vast hotels, and a few shops. We dined in the Union Hotel, with a small number of lingering visitors; the chief part of the company having left the village about a month ago. We tasted the water of the several springs, enjoyed the fine weather, and returned to Albany in the evening. I had a warm bath, costing half a dollar, at the "Temperance House;" that is, a hotel in which abstinence from spirituous and fermented liquors is the rule. These liquors are not sold, or permitted to be used, in the house, except when prescribed by a physician as medicine. The hotel belongs to Mr. Delavan, who so energetically advocated the cause of temperance in Albany, that the brewers conceived that in one of his speeches he had degenerated into a libel against them, and they are now prosecuting him for damages.

How to know the Americans.—A Scotsman, with whom, at a later period of our residence in the United States, we became acquainted, and who is settled in a fertile district as proprietor and farmer of a beautiful piece of land, remarked to me that the only way to know the Americans thoroughly is to "count siller" with them, anglicè, to deal with them. Fortified by this wise remark, I shall record my first transaction with them. We wished to hire a private carriage and pair of horses to carry us through part of New England to Worcester, within forty miles of Boston. The fare demanded by all the post-masters was $7 a-day, including every expense for carriage, coachman, and horses, on the road, except tolls; but one of them stipulated for five days' hire for going, and as many for returning, making $70; another asked payment for five days going and four returning or $63; and a third offered to go in four days and return in three, equal to a charge of $49. The owner of the best carriage ultimately agreed to accept of $56, and allow us five days to go.

Oct. 2.—Road from Albany to New Lebanon.—We left Albany this morning in our hired carriage for Worcester. It is an open landau, but differs considerably from the vehicle of the same name in England. The wheels are wide apart, but slight and narrow in the rim. The body is hung on old fashioned steel upright springs, with leathern straps. It has no windows, but the sides are not pannelled, but covered by leathern curtains which let up and down at pleasure. It has no pockets; another example of the curtailment which springs from economy. We found it safe, comfortable, and exceedingly well adapted to the roads on which we travelled.

The morning was misty in the city; but on crossing the Hudson and ascending its left bank, we emerged into a clear sunshine. We now entered on a beautiful undulating country, and were delighted with the loveliness of the prospects on either hand, but annoyed by the badness of the road. We paid toll-duties, but the road itself was nearly in a state of nature. There is a complete roof across the road at the turnpike gate, so that in stopping to pay, the traveller is sheltered from the sun or the rain. American coachmen are renowned for their enterprise and skill. The youth who drove us ascended the numerous hills which we traversed very leisurely, but dashed down the other side with extraordinary rapidity. We allowed him to take his own way, judging that he and his horses best knew the practices of their own country; and we were not disappointed. They were steady and safe.

The old forest has disappeared, but every where new wood in single trees and in groups abounds, and adorns the landscape. The fences, however, are generally of paling or of stones without mortar. In the former instances the timber lies horizontally, one portion obliquely advancing, and the rest obliquely receding from the road, and constitutes what is called a snake-rail, or worm-fence. On some farms, the roots of the trees of the ancient forest have been torn up, and are now ranged side by side on edge along the margin of the field, the flat bottom of the root is turned to the road, and the stump inwards, the whole presenting a gigantic and picturesque fence. In other fields, the old roots have been left in the ground, and are seen in all stages of decay. The wheat, oats, and barley, have long since been reaped and stored in the barns, but the Indian corn is still in the field, with huge rich golden pumpkins growing in the intervals between the stalks.

New Lebanon.—Our post-boy drove to New Lebanon, a distance of twenty-five miles, without feeding his horses; having stopped only twice to give them water. This village lies in a paradise of beauty, on the side of a hill, sloping to the south, and looks down on a basin completely shut in by rising grounds, and embosomed in wood. The foliage now wears the deep, rich-toned variegated livery of autumn, to convey an adequate idea of which surpasses the powers equally of the pencil and pen. The houses are chiefly of wood, painted pure white; they are unpretending, yet not inelegant in architecture, and well kept. This village is also a watering place, and there are several stupendous hotels to receive the visitors in summer. Three miles distant, on the slope of the hill which forms the eastern side of the valley, there is a large establishment of Shakers. It is said to be exceedingly prosperous, but we did not visit it. We dined here by ourselves, in the Columbian hotel, as all the guests had left it except two, whose meal was finished before we arrived.

We next ascended a steep hill from which many enchanting views were obtained of the scenery below, glowing gorgeously in the golden rays of a declining autumn sun. The country became barren as we ascended, but we speedily again attained a lower level, and at 6 P. M. arrived at Pittsfield.

Pittsfield.—This is a beautiful village containing 3570 inhabitants, and we found a good inn. The moon was full, and we walked in the blaze of its light among lovely cottages, shaded by trees, and surrounded by grass and garden plots. In the middle of the village is a large open square, the centre of which is planted with shrubs; and from the midst of them an old and massive tree spreads high his ample boughs;—a tree of the ancient forest spared to tell what his forefathers had been. The graceful spire of a church adorns one side of the square. A medical school is established here, and one of the professors, known to me by correspondence, was politely attentive to us. He gives two lectures a-day, and finishes his course in eight weeks.

Oct. 3.—Peru.—This morning, at 8 o'clock, we left Pittsfield in the midst of a heavy rain, the thermometer standing at 56°. The road ascended for eight miles, until we arrived at Peru, on the summit of the Peru mountains. The scenery was much less interesting than that which we enjoyed yesterday. The soil is a light and sandy clay, with numerous rocks and stones protruding above the surface. Large tracts of the primitive forest remain uncleared, and innumerable stumps stand in the fields, indicating that the axe of the settler is here busily at work.

In New England two causes of bad health have been avoided in the villages. The houses are not crowded together, but most of them stand apart, and the width of the streets is ample; the burying-grounds, also, are not beside the churches, but at solitary spots along the sides of the highway. They are rudely enclosed, and present a melancholy spectacle of pale white tombstones standing forth alone on the bosom of a wild and stony country.

Causes of Bad Roads.—We dined at Worthington, a very small village twenty-one miles from Pittsfield, and as the day has been wet, and the road bad, the drive has been dreary. On talking with a gentleman whom we met about the bad state of the roads, he remarked, "that they, like every thing else in this country, are under the direct control of the people. The people are chiefly farmers who own their own land, and they have a great aversion to part with their money for any object which is not calculated to give them individually a return of profit." "But," said I, "good roads would benefit them all by raising the value of their property." "In winter," replied he, "the roads are covered with snow, and sleighing is then good; in summer they are dry and hard; it is only in spring and fall that they are soft and bad. The farmers find the summer and winter the most convenient seasons for transporting their produce to market; and, besides, they can sell the most of their crops at their own doors, or at the nearest villages, and care very little for the means of transportation." "There is still much ground to be cleared here," said I. "Yes, sir, a great deal, and I think that the farmers would do better to cultivate more perfectly what they have cleared, than to proceed as they do. No man thinks himself a farmer here unless he owns 800 acres.* He must be able to pasture as well as to sow; and as soon as he cuts and burns the trees, he can put cattle and sheep on the ground without any cultivation."

Chesterfield.—The next village was Chesterfield, nine miles distant from Worthington. It stands on the summit of the hill, which forms the west boundary of the valley of the Connecticut River, above Northampton, and the view from it is extensive and glorious. We stopped only to give water to the horses, and our bold coachman rattled down a precipitous road of thirteen miles, and set us safely down at the Mansion-house hotel in Northampton, at half past five o'clock, having travelled forty-three miles over a hilly country and bad roads since eight o'clock in the morning, with a halt of only one hour and twenty minutes at Worthington. Masses of loose earth, from eight to twelve inches deep, are placed across the road at intervals, in the deepest declivities. They serve to arrest the too precipitous progress of descending vehicles, and afford resting stations to those which ascend. Our post-boy drove so rapidly down hill, that at each of these mounds he was nearly shaken from the box, while we felt as if again tossed in the Great Western.

We passed several portions of the forest only recently cleared; many fine old trees were lying rotting in the sun, while some were standing huge, tall, and gaunt, bearing the marks of fire which had been applied in vain to consume their stubborn strength. Apple-trees every where abound, and are loaded with that superior fruit which is imported into England, excelling in richness of flavour the best produce of the British orchards. It is so abundant, and grows so completely exposed on the road side, that the way-faring traveller may supply himself at this season without purchase, and with scarcely an infraction of justice, as it seems, by its situation, to be presented to his use.

Oct. 4. We have found the Mansion-house hotel at Northampton excellent, and resolved to stop here a day and enjoy the beauty of the scenery, which is justly celebrated. This morning is bright and clear, but the thermometer has fallen to 45° in the air just before sunrise.

American Servants.—We have found the servants and landlords in the inns of New England cold and reserved in their manners. There is no greeting of welcome on arriving, and no thanking you and wishing you good-bye at leaving a hotel. The servants speak, move, and look like pieces of animated mechanism. At the public tables nearly universal silence reigns, broken only by the clattering of knives and forks. When one asks a question, a brief but clear answer is given and the conversation goes no farther. The tones of the voice are solemn, and indicate self-esteem more active than love of approbation. No one asked us any questions, and no one volunteered to communicate any information to us as strangers, all which was different from what we expected. The busy season, however, is past, and probably we saw the people in the first state of mental collapse after months of great fatigue and excitement. They were, however, essentially amiable. All our reasonable wishes were gratified, although formally and solemnly; all our questions were civilly answered, although in the fewest words; and from what we saw at Albany, as well as from what we have since experienced, I am satisfied that in case of sickness or distress we should have experienced the kindest and most unwearied attention. The early settlers of New England were religious men who fled from persecution; and their characters and conduct indicate powerful religious sentiments, with great self-esteem and firmness, which produce the love of independence and hatred of power when harshly wielded by other men. Judging from the manners and natural language of their posterity, those qualities seem to have descended to the present generation.

* There was some mistake in this conversation. There is scarcely a farmer in Massachusetts who owns 800 acres; 100 or at farthest 200 acres are considered a medium farm; and in some parts of the state a large one.

Here, and about New Lebanon, the farmers are attempting to raise Swedish turnips, and great advantage is said to result from the practice.

Northampton was settled in 1654. It lies a mile and a half west of the Connecticut River, and is surrounded by highly picturesque hills. It contains 3613 inhabitants, and consists of only one street of continuous houses, chiefly occupied as stores or shops, and a great many tasteful single houses, standing in the midst of grass and garden grounds. Some of the houses are large and elegant, indicating taste and affluence in their possessors. "Round Hill" is a gentle eminence, which rises in the centre of the village. It is regular in its form, and the summit bears a lovely grove. On the slope next the village a number of handsome residences look down on the Connecticut valley, and in front of them, at a few miles distance, stands Mount Holyoke, clothed with trees to the summit, and at this season a perfect gem of beauty. The Farmington Canal runs from the village to New Haven, on Long Island Sound, distant eighty miles, and canal boats of a commodious form run daily. They travel night and day, take twenty hours to the voyage, and have beds.

Mount Holyoke.—We ascended Mount Holyoke, which rises to the height of 830 feet, and from its summit enjoyed a prospect of the noblest scenery. Towards the south, the rich valley of the Connecticut stretched to the verge of the horizon. The river gleamed from point to point, as its winding turns brought it within the line of the solar rays, while around, to the north and west, hills, rich in their autumnal livery, closed in the scene. The ascent to the summit is little more than a mile in length, from the left bank of the river, and is attended with little difficulty. A road had been made for carriages to within a quarter of a mile of the top, but, owing to the misconduct of visitors, the proprietor has shut it up, by felling a large tree, and causing it to fall across the way. Two sheds have been erected at the point where the best view is obtained, in which refreshments are sold during the summer months to the crowds of visitors who come to enjoy this lovely spot. The prospect reminded is of that from Moncrieff Hill in Perthshire; but that from Mount Holyoke is in some points the superior of the two. We crossed the river in a boat, the construction of which presented some features that were new to me. It was impelled by two horses, one on each side of the boat. Each horse pulled at a bar fixed by chains to two immovable posts, rising from the hull of the boat; and by the pressure of his feet, caused a wooden circular frame, which served him for a road, to revolve in the direction opposite to that in which he walked. He must have appeared to himself to be pulling and walking in his usual manner ashore, but instead of the ground serving as a fulcrum to enable him to drag forward his load, he fixed bar at which he pulled presented a resisting body that enabled him to push the road backward from under his feet. The pathway, in its revolutions, turned a paddle-wheel at each side. We afterwards saw numbers of these boats in the United States. On the deck the horses occupy only the space on which they stand, and all the machinery is below.

Cause of Taciturnity at the Public Tables.

—In conversation to-day, the following statements were made to us. As they interested us at the time, I present them to the reader. "One cause," we were told, "of the taciturnity which we have remarked at the public tables in New England, is the fear of inferior people intruding themselves and fixing an acquaintanceship on persons of superior condition and attainments. All persons are pushing upwards in this country, and as there is no artificial rank, every one guards his own station with extraordinary jealousy."*

The absence of artificial rank does not satisfactorily explain these peculiarities. In England artificial rank abounds, and yet the same jealousy of intrusion is there equally conspicuous. In Germany there is also artificial rank, while the intercourse between the different classes of society is much more cordial and unrestrained. The real cause seems to me to lie in the cerebral organisation of the people. The English are remarkable for the large development of the organ of Self-Esteem, which, when not directed by high moral and intellectual qualities, engenders pride and exclusiveness. The New Englanders inherit the organisation and its effects from their forefathers. Their republican institutions have not altered their nature. Self-Esteem is not so predominant in the Teutonic brain.

Banks of Issue, and mania for Speculation.

—Our friend continued to say, that after General Jackson refused to sanction the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank, and distributed large sums of the accumulated public revenue on deposit-accounts, among the different banks of the Union, without any efficient machinery for controlling the operations of the banks by a prompt exchange of their paper, the issue of bank notes all over the Union became excessive, and new banks sprang up almost in every village, and sent paper afloat. The Americans, are, at all times, highly speculative, but this supply of currency rendered them nearly mad. Manhattan Island, fifteen miles long, and from one to three broad, on which New York was built, was all surveyed, delineated on a plan, and divided into lots. In 1836, these lots, among innumerable other objects, became subjects of speculation. They were bought and sold, and re-sold, again and again, always rising in price, till people thought they could never have enough of them. If two persons were seen conversing in the street in New York, and you had approached them, in nineteen instances out of twenty, you would have overheard "lois," and "thousands of dollars," as the sole topics of their discourse. Very general bankruptcy followed this mania.

This description, which I subsequently ascertained to be correct, forcibly reminded me of the almost insane excitement of the propensity for wealth which afflicted Britain in 1824 and 1825. In Edinburgh, a city little engaged in trade or speculation, joint-stock companies were created by the hour, and fortunes were supposed to have been made in a day by buying and selling the shares of their stock. Lots of ground were bought at prices, or "feued" for payment of ground-rents, of the most extravagant amount; as if the world were suddenly become too small to contain the cities which were about to be reared. Upwards of 340,000*l.* were invested in new houses in Edinburgh in one year, and universal prosperity was supposed to have at length descended on a happy land. But in 1826, the bubble burst, and, up to this hour, the Scottish capital has scarcely recovered from the losses and misery which these wild schemes engendered. In England, the mania was as severely felt. If the cautious Scots could go so far wrong, we may condemn and lament the infatuation of the Americans, but, unfortunately, we are not pure enough to throw the first stone.

Friday, 5th Oct.—Thermometer 58° at half-past 7 A. M.

Road to Worcester.—This morning is still beautifully fine, and agreeably warm. We started at half-past 8, and crossed the Connecticut on a long and handsome wooden bridge, completely inclosed on the sides and covered on the top, like the bridges in Switzerland. This is the only well-finished bridge which we have seen.* All the others which we have passed over, have been temporary-looking erections, consisting of beams stretching across the river from pier to pier, or from post to post, with deals laid loosely across them, starting and clattering under the wheels and the horses' feet, and without ledges.

We stopped at Ware, a thriving village containing two cotton and two woollen manufactories, the machinery of which is driven by water. The intermediate country is undulating and picturesque, but the soil is poor, in some places wet, and generally rocky and covered with large loose stones. A few fields of young wheat look fresh and healthy. We arrived at one o'clock, and found that dinner at the public table had been served at twelve, and was long since finished. Dinner was served to us in a private parlour without difficulty or delay.

After dinner we proceeded on our journey, and at 4 P. M. arrived at Brookfield, where we found an excellent inn. Half a mile south of the village, we saw workmen employed in constructing a railroad to run between Worcester and Springfield, part of the great line which is destined to connect Albany with Boston. The rapid progress of railways in the United States was mentioned to us as one reason of the neglect of common roads. The people expect the latter to be soon superseded by the former on the great thoroughfares through the Union.

* I regretted to observe that it was greatly injured, and part of it carried off by the ice in the spring of 1840. There was a large bend in the river commencing immediately below the bridge, and many efforts had been made to get a cut made across an isthmus, to save four miles of river navigation! This flood excavated a channel through the neck of land, and accomplished the object in one night.

The people of the village had long been Calvinists, but, about six years ago, part of them became Unitarians; and a new church was built. Both congregations were small, for there is also a Baptist meeting-house in the village. The separation was attended with great animosity among the people at the time of its occurrence, but the angry passions have now subsided, and the usual intercourse of good will is re-established among them. The law acknowledges no superiority in one sect over another, and hence the disputes that occur are merely natural ebullitions of the mind, which subside with their causes: The institutions of the country furnish no artificial fuel to give permanence to their existence.

Saturday, 6th Oct.—We set off this morning at 8 o'clock, and, after a pleasant drive, arrived at Worcester, from which there is a railroad to Boston. We have passed through several villages containing woollen manufactories, situated on the banks of a small stream in a country like that in which Stroud stands in the west of England. To-day, we have met with many wagons conveying goods to and from these manufactories; so that the resemblance between Old and New England is increasing as we proceed; but still the contrast in the condition of the labouring people is greatly to the advantage of America.

Our coachman left us at Worcester, and demanded no fees nor compensation of any kind. He was a young man, active, intelligent, and obliging, without obsequiousness, pretensions, or plausibilities. I may say the same of all the servants in the inns.

Worcester is a beautiful and thriving village, containing 7117 inhabitants. The surface of the country around it is undulating, and affords many delightful prospects. A gentle eminence rising to the west of the main street is studded with handsome wooden residences painted white, and shining in all the purity of virgin snow, from among trees, and shrubs, and flowers.

State Lunatic Hospital.—We presented letters of introduction to Dr. Samuel B. Woodward, Superintendent and Physician to the Lunatic Asylum. This monument of charity of the state of Massachusetts is situated on a beautiful eminence eastward of the town. The buildings of the west front, erected in 1831, consist of a centre, 76 feet long, 40 wide, and four stories high, projecting 22 feet forward of the wings. These extend to the north and south 90 feet each on the front, and 100 feet in the rear, and are 36 feet wide, and three stories high. This arrangement was adopted to secure free communication with the central structure, occupied by the superintendent, steward, attendants, and domestics, and to permit the ventilation and lighting of the long halls, or corridors, extending through the wings. The apartments for the insane, 8 feet by 10, have each a window, with the upper sash of cast iron and lower of wood, both glazed; on the exterior of the wooden sash is a false sash of iron, corresponding to it in its appearance and dimensions, but firmly set into the frame of the window, giving the reality of a grating without its gloomy aspect. In 1835, a building 134 feet in length, and 34 feet in width, was attached to the southern extremity of the hospital, of equal height, and extending eastward at right angles with the front; in 1836, another edifice of the same magnitude was erected at the north end.

* The only cause of taciturnity at our public tables, is the haste with which the meals are eaten, and the consequent lack of time for conversation.

Three sides of a great square are now enclosed by these extensive structures of brick.

The grants by the state for erecting the asylum were the following:—

1830. March 20.	There was granted	$30,000
1832. March 24.	Ditto, - - -	20,000
1835. April 7.	Ditto, - - -	25,000
— — —	Ditto for a chapel,	3,000
— — —	Ditto for the purchase of additional land,	7,000
Total,		$85,000

The hospital was opened on the 12th January, 1833, and has since been admirably managed, and the treatment of the patients attended with great success.

This structure combines the improvements which have recently been introduced into hospitals for the insane. It commands a cheerful and even beautiful prospect, from every window occupied by the patients. The ventilation and heating of the rooms are accomplished by warm air introduced into the galleries, and from them into each cell, by means of an oblong opening above the door. The pipes conveying hot air open near the ceilings of the galleries, and some advantages attend this arrangement. If the pipe opens at the floor, the stream of warm air does not diffuse itself over the apartment, as is generally supposed, but ascends in a direct column to the ceiling, and is only there broken and dispersed. It descends only after it has filled the upper spaces of the galleries. By introducing it at once at the top, these spaces are filled before much of the heat has been lost, and a warmer air descends, and enters the several rooms by the apertures above the doors. In the wall of each room is an opening about five inches square, into an air-chimney, calculated to maintain a constant circulation. These air-chimneys open into a vast garret, directly under the roof of the building, which contains numerous windows for letting off the noxious air into the atmosphere. This arrangement is attended by one considerable advantage. When the air-chimneys open directly into the external atmosphere, their action is violently affected by the state of the wind; and in cold weather, they bring down cold instead of carrying up heated and exhausted air. When they open into the garret, they are altogether protected from the wind; and by opening a fewer or a greater number of the garret windows in winter, effectual security is obtained against the descent of cold air. Dr. Woodward assured me that these chimnies are effectual; that in the morning, the rooms are pure to the senses, while the garret furnishes abundant evidence that it has received the effluvia of the night.

At the ends of the galleries, there are two large corner apartments, two sides of each of which are composed entirely of cast iron sashes, one for the women with the interstices glazed; the other for the men, without glass. The object of these is to afford air and exercise to the patients in severe weather, when they cannot go abroad, or when their state of health renders complete exposure inexpedient. There is abundance of ground attached to the hospital, in which the patients labour, and there is a chapel in which divine worship is performed every Sunday. A neat carriage, drawn by two horses, belongs to the establishment, and is constantly employed in carrying the patients on little excursions into the country to amuse them. The purity and order of the apartments are complete.

Dr. Woodward, physically and mentally, is admirably adapted for his situation. He is in the prime of life, and has large limbs, a large abdomen, large lungs, and a large head. His temperament is sanguine nervous-bilious, with a little of the lymphatic. The organs of the propensities are well developed, but those of the moral sentiments and intellect decidedly predominate. This combination produces a powerful and commanding person, characterised at once by vivacity, energy, and softness; and a mind in which intellectual power is chastened by the most kind and cheerful moral dispositions. I regard these qualities as of great importance in the superintendent of a Lunatic Asylum. If that well-spring of spontaneous vivacity which accompanies large lungs and a large brain be wanting, the individual will be more apt to sink under the depressing influence which the diseased minds of his patients will exert over his own, than to excite their faculties to more healthy and agreeable action. If he be deficient in the moral organs of the brain, he will want sympathy, softness of expression, and justness of feeling; while if he be deficient in the reflecting intellectual organs, he will want sagacity to trace effects to their causes, and to discriminate character; or if the deficiency be in the observing organs, he will lack the power of attention to incidents and details. At a subsequent time I shall revert to the management of this hospital; remarking at present, that it is a noble monument of enlightened philanthropy and of excellent administration.

Railroad to Boston.—At 4 P. M., we left Worcester by the railroad for Boston. The car in which we traveled held twenty-six persons. It was comfortable, and our journey would have been agreeable, except for the annoyance of constant showers of tobacco saliva squirted on the floor at our feet.*

The railroad from Worcester to Boston consists of a single track of rails, and the trains are arranged so as to pass each other at stations, where a portion of a double track is laid for the purpose. It runs in part on a line with the great railway between Boston and Albany. The state of Massachusetts has taken shares in the latter to the amount of $2,000,000, and the remainder of the funds is subscribed by private individuals. The state's share of the money is borrowed on state bonds, chiefly in England, and the interest is paid out of the revenue.

Tax on Bank Capital.—One source of revenue in this state is a tax of one per cent. on all bank capital. Great difference of opinion is entertained as to the policy of this tax. Some persons say that, from its productiveness, it tempts the state to charter too many banks; others affirm that the tax is so severely felt by the banks, that it forces them to engage in hazardous speculations to pay it, and, at the same time, to realise a dividend equal to the average rate of profit in the state, and hence to endanger their stability; while other persons assure us that, by diminishing their profits, it renders the banks cautious, and leads them to avoid rash enterprises and engagements; and that, altogether, it exerts a salutary influence over their transactions. One thing is certain, that the Massachusetts banks are the most stable in the Union; but it does not necessarily follow that the tax is the cause of their high character. We arrived at Boston at 7 P. M.

* We were shocked at this uncleanly practice when it was new to us, and the experience of twenty months never abated the disagreeable feelings which it excited. In traveling in the public conveyances, and in most of the hotels, it was a never-ceasing source of discomfort. It is only justice to the Americans, however, to observe, that, in this abominable habit, they are kept in countenance by the Germans and the French, who, in their own country, commit the same nuisance, although England is happily free from it.

Sunday, Oct. 7. Boston.—Thermometer, at sunrise, 58°. This morning it rained heavily. We went to the Baptist Chapel, and heard Dr. — preach a sermon on the nature of regeneration. He brought out his ideas with extraordinary clearness and precision; and although much that he taught was at variance with facts established by the physiology of the brain, it was impossible not to admire the talents of the preacher. Mrs. Trollope and Mrs. Butler have both adverted to the American custom of gentlemen sitting with their feet elevated. In the pew before us in church to-day, a gentleman sat with his feet on the top of the board which holds the psalm-books. It was not a desk near the top of the seat, as in Scotland, but a receptacle for books about two thirds up the front of the pew.

Oct. 8. The Custom House.—This morning I went to the custom-house to procure five large packages of skulls, casts, and drawings, which I had shipped from the Clyde on the 15th of August. They had just arrived. Mr. Capen, of the firm of Messrs. Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb, from whom I received many civilities, introduced me to George Bancroft, Esq., the collector, and I enumerated to him the contents of the boxes. He said that by law they are entitled to be landed free of duty, as articles of science, and orders were given accordingly. I mention this circumstance because the law is liberal, and in itself obviously advantageous to the United States, and because I have seen such articles adverted to, in works on America, as if the duty had been dispensed with as a special act of favour, or of honour conferred on the individual traveller. Nothing could exceed the civility of all the official persons through whose departments the necessary entries were made. While the details of the entries were in progress, Mr. Bancroft entered into conversation with me on the philosophy of Kant, Locke, and David Stewart, and pointed out the coincidence between some of the categories of Kant, and the faculties admitted by phrenologists. He quoted Locke with such readiness, that one might have supposed him to be a professor of metaphysics. He is the author of what is generally acknowledged to be the best history of the United States. During our conversation, subordinate officers were frequently entering for instructions, or for his signature to documents. He attended to them with great urbanity of manner, and then resumed the conversation, as if business and abstract philosophy were equally agreeable to his taste, and equally within the range of his faculties. He is a powerful supporter of the democratic party, and received his appointment a few months ago from Mr. Van Buren.

The Institution for the Blind.—We attended the half-yearly examination of the blind in their institution in Pearl street, and were much gratified by their appearance and performances. The large house which they occupy, was a gift from T. H. Perkins, Esq., who still lives to witness the benefits flowing from his bounty. The institution was chartered in 1829, opened in September, 1832, and is vested in trustees. It is supported chiefly by appropriations from the state. It is managed by Dr. Samuel George Howe, in a manner that commands at once the love and respect of the pupils, and the high approbation of the public. This gentleman, impelled by youthful enthusiasm and a generous love of the oppressed, went as a volunteer medical officer to aid the Greeks, at the time when Lord Byron joined their cause. Dr. Howe passed several years in their service, and published a very interesting account of their affairs. The romance of youth has left him, while the glowing philanthropy which first directed his steps to Greece, burns with undiminished vivacity, and he now expends the energies of a powerful and cultivated mind in teaching, training, and administering to the happiness of the blind.

The pupils showed great intelligence in reading, both in English and French, and some of them in the simpler elements of mathematics. The elder scholars defined, with promptitude and accuracy, many abstract terms relating to mind and general science, such as attention, abstraction, perception, genus, species, variety, &c. They have a full band of musical instruments, on which their performances were of a superior character. The delight of the little boys in using the drum and triangles at intervals, were strongly depicted on their countenances, while a pleasing excitement evidently pervaded both performers and auditors.

They have printed in this institution several books for the blind, and Dr. Howe exhibited specimens of their typography. The forms of the letters are slightly triangular, and differ little from those of the common alphabet. Dr. Howe mentioned that neither highly raised letters, nor very peculiar forms, are necessary. He had discovered that only the tops of the highly raised letters are soiled by the fingers, a proof that the touch is light. Experience has shown that a variety of type is as easily mastered by the finger as by the eye. Persons who see, soon learn to read with equal facility printed works in Roman, Italic, and capital letters; even the German type presents few difficulties, after the first three lessons, to foreigners who study that language. The same faculties of the mind which take cognisance of the forms of the letters through the eye, recognise them through the medium of touch. The chief difference between the two senses is, that the eye receives an impression through the medium of light, without contact with the object, while this is indispensable to the operation of the other sense. This fact supersedes much of the importance which persons who see have attached to the invention of peculiar forms of letters for the use of the blind.

Dr. Howe has presented his pupils with books printed in all the varieties of form which he could procure, and they have learned to read them with ease. This has led to a very obvious and beneficial proposal on the part of the trustees of this institution to the managers of all other asylums for the blind, namely, that they should cease to reprint each of them the same books, which to some extent they have hitherto done, and also to dispute about the superiority of the forms of their letters; that they should circulate among each other, lists of all their printed works, and that each should give previous notice before it commences printing a new book; that they should, as much as possible, each of them print different books, and then exchange their works. The advantages of this mode of proceeding would be an increase in the number and variety of books which each institution would possess; a saving of expense; and an augmentation not only of instruction, but of pleasure to the blind in reading, arising from the very variety of type which would be presented to them. Dr. Howe mentioned that his proposal has met with little encouragement from other institutions, which is much to be regretted; and I hope that if these remarks shall be perused by any of the directors of institutions for the blind, they will give them due consideration.

Madame Caradori Allan and Mr. James Silk Buckingham, were both present at the examination; and at its close the former sang several songs, which greatly gratified the pupils. I saw tears dropping from the eyes of several of them, touched by the melody and pathos of her notes.

Oct. 9. Thermometer 37°—Education—A Common School Convention.—This morning the air has felt very cold, but the weather continues clear and dry. Winter-cloaks and great-coats are appearing. We proceeded this afternoon by railway to Taunton, a village of 6045 inhabitants, to attend a common school convention. The Hon. Horace Mann, Secretary to the Board of Education for the State, and his Excellency Edward Everett, Governor of Massachusetts, invited us to take places in the car with them. We arrived at 5 P. M. Next morning we walked through the village, which is handsome, but a portion of it lay in ruins, having been burnt to the ground sixteen days before.

Oct. 10. We went to the Unitarian church, a large, elegant stone building, at 10 o'clock, A. M., when, in American phraseology, the meeting was "called to order" by the appointment of a chairman. Persons of both sexes, and of all the religious denominations of the village and neighbourhood, attended. A prayer was offered up, some routine business transacted, and then Mr. Mann, in his official capacity of Secretary to the Board, read an address to the people, showing the necessity of education for improving the human mind, and its nature and objects. The delivery of the address occupied an hour and a half, and I never listened to a more sound, philosophical, comprehensive, practical, eloquent, and felicitous composition. It was heard with profound attention by a numerous audience; but no expression of approbation was given, the custom of this country being to receive in silence all grave discourses, without testifying either approval or disapproval. At a quarter before one o'clock, the meeting adjourned. The Rev. Andrew Bigelow invited us to dine at his house with the governor, his "aid," Colonel Clifford, and a number of clergymen, and we were sumptuously entertained.

At 2 P. M. the meeting resumed business, and we heard the governor deliver an address in seconding a resolution in support of the cause of education. His speech was distinguished for excellence, equally in matter and manner. His style is rich, yet classical and chaste, his action is graceful, and his utterance fluent. He placed the question of education on its true basis. The constitution of the state, he said, called on the people to judge of the most momentous questions affecting their own welfare and that of posterity; such as the currency, the powers which shall be wielded by every officer of the state, and the connection of this state with all the other states of the Union: it entrusted them, as jurymen, with the lives and property of their fellow-citizens; it gave them the election of the individuals who should exercise legislative authority over them, and it imposed on them a variety of important duties affecting the well-being of their own locality; the due performance of all of which offices was incompatible with ignorance. It put arms into every man's hands, and entrusted to him the defence of his own and his country's rights; and the alliance between arms and ignorance was terrific. He touched with great felicity, and with powerful effect, on a variety of other topics, urging the people to second the efforts of the state, and the teachers, to improve the education of the district.

This meeting afforded me high gratification. Mr. Everett is the chief magistrate of a state which would constitute a respectable German kingdom. He traveled with the people, and entered the church as one of the people; he had no insignia of office, and his "aid" was not distinguishable in the crowd. He addressed the people as one of themselves, but all speedily felt that he possessed that real superiority which knowledge, morality, and intellectual power, when directed to a noble end, never fail to confer; and he was treated with marked courtesy and respect. It is scarcely necessary to add, that the audience, although composed of persons in every variety of pecuniary circumstances, appeared, to the eye of a stranger, nearly all equal; they were well dressed, and none ostentatiously attired.

From the earliest settlement of this state, great attention has been bestowed on education. In the Massachusetts Colony Laws, 1646, chap. viii, § 13, it is enacted, "That if any child or children above sixteen years old, and of sufficient understanding, shall curse or smite their natural father, he or they shall be put to death, unless it can be sufficiently testified, that the parents have been very unchristianly negligent in the education of such children."

This enactment was obviously dictated by the Mosaic law, which declares the acts of cursing and smiting a parent to be punishable with death, but which omits the qualification that proof of a neglected education shall be received as a valid defence against the charge. The modern legislators of the commonwealth have wisely repealed this and many other barbarous and bloody laws for punishing offences, and have adopted the more Christian and the more effectual method of endeavouring to prevent crimes by the universal instruction of the people.

Constitution of the Board of Education.—By the act of 20th April, 1837, the power of nominating the Board of Education, consisting of eight persons, was committed to the governor and his council. The governor, Mr. Everett, and his council were all whigs, and the governor, moreover, was a unitarian. How did they exercise the discretionary powers intrusted to them? They selected men distinguished for philanthropy and talent, from the different sections of the state, living nearly equidistant from each other, and, as nearly as possible, representing equal portions of territory and population. "They were not selected from one political party, or denomination, but from both political parties (whigs and democrats), and from all the leading religious denominations in the state." (Common School Journal, vol. ii, p. 70.)

The Board of Education possesses no power to control the schools, or to interfere with their management; this is left in the hands of the people themselves. The duty of the board is, to collect and diffuse information, to suggest, to advise, and to assist, and thus to enable the schools to improve themselves. In short, they are authorised to exercise a moral and intellectual influence over the people and their schools, but to wield no other power.

The efficacy of such a Board, must in a great degree depend on the character of their secretary; for where the members live at so great a distance from each other, unity of action must be communicated to it chiefly by him. The individual appointed to this important office, was the Honourable Horace Mann. He had practised for a considerable period of time as a lawyer, at the bar of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and with such success that, after rising through various grades of public office, he was elected President of the Senate, over which he presided for two years. The Senate holds the same rank in the legislature of the state that the House of Lords does in England, and performs essentially the same functions. Such was his legal reputation also, that, on 3d November, 1835, he and the Honourable Theron Metcalf were appointed commissioners by the legislature, with directions personally to superintend the revision and codification of the laws of the state which appeared in 1836. The whole statute law is thus revised; all statutes that had been repealed are omitted; all that have been altered or amended, are reprinted in their improved form; while all inconsistent enactments are repealed or altered into harmony with the rest. The whole statutes thus revised are enacted anew, and form a code of laws. The discharge of such a duty requires extensive legal knowledge; great powers of discrimination; a capacity for details, joined with a talent for generalisation; and the whole crowned by habits of indefatigable industry. Such was the Honourable Horace Mann when he was elected Secretary to the Board of Education, and he at once directed all the energies and attainments of his powerful and experienced mind to the improvement of the education of his native state.

Common School Libraries.—The state having made provision for the formation of libraries for the schools, the Board of Education early projected the preparation of a library of books suitable for children and youth. "The plan contemplated two series, of fifty volumes of each; one, of the 18mo size, adapted for children, the other, of the duodecimo size, intended for youth. The Board proceeded to make proposals to various publishers, to undertake the work. The leading propositions were, that the enterprise should be undertaken wholly at the publisher's risk, neither the Board nor the state having any pecuniary interest in it; that the work should be executed according to sample; that it should be offered to all the public schools in Massachusetts, who might wish to purchase, at a sum never to exceed the stipulated amount; that the whole should be executed in the most durable and workmanlike manner, and in such style, as to type, paper, binding, &c., as the Board should direct; that no work should be included in the series, which had not received the unanimous approval of the Board; and that, on their part, in consideration of such undertaking, the Board would examine a sufficient number of works to complete the proposed series, and give to the publishers whatever benefit they could derive from an announcement to the public, that the work had the unanimous sanction or approbation of their body. The Board were to decide upon the books, as a jury decide upon a cause in court, each member having a veto upon all the rest.

"The firm of Messrs. Marsh, Capen & Lyon (to which the name of Dr. Webb has since been added,) tendered propositions very much more favourable than any received from any other quarter, and an arrangement was forthwith concluded with them."

On a careful and thorough examination, it was soon found that there were very few books extant suitable in all respects for children. Measures were adopted for the improvement of existing books, and for the preparation of new ones. For these purposes, the publishers obtained the services of the most popular and talented authors in the country, either to edit existing works, or to prepare new ones. "The most eminent literary men have been, or now are, engaged in the execution of the plan. The names of Washington Irving, Dr. Wayland, the two Everetts, Greenwood, Bigelow, Rantoul, Silliman, Judge Story, Professors Lieber, Potter, Stowe, Edwards, Olmsted, Alden, Tucker, Judge Porter, &c. &c., are a pledge to the public that nothing has been omitted which can give the value of adaptation and fitness to the series. It is not too much to say, that no work has ever issued from the press in this country, to the preparation of which, one half so much knowledge and ability has been devoted." (Common School Journal.)

The grand objection to the formation of a library for schools was the want of some sufficient guard or security against the introduction of partisan or sectarian books. The revised statutes declare, "That the school committee shall never direct to be purchased or used, in any of the town schools, any school-books which are calculated to favour the tenets of any particular sect of Christians." The Scriptures were used in almost all the schools, either as a devotional or as a reading book; but there was a great want of religious works expository of the doctrines of revealed religion, and "also free from such advocacy of the 'tenets' of particular sects of Christians, as brought them within the scope of the legal prohibition." "This difficulty has been directly met, and entirely removed. Not enough of it is left to serve as a pretence for sophistry." "There is not a man belonging to either of the great political or religious portions, into which the community is unhappily divided, but will find, in the list of names of the members of the Board of Education, a watchful sentinel, to guard his social and spiritual rights against aggression. Suppose I am a member of the Calvinistic or orthodox congregational denomination, and I deem it a paramount duty to avert from the eyes and the ears of my children, the peculiar views of the Baptists, Unitarians, or Universalists, I see in the list the name of the Rev. Emerson Davis, of Westfield—an orthodox congregational clergyman, known to his brethren throughout the state as a man of sound judgment, of excellent feelings, of firm and undoubted steadfastness of faith. Further down, in the list, I see the name of the Rev. Dr. Robbins, of Rochester, a venerable gentleman and most learned scholar, who, for more than a quarter of a century, has been the pastor of an orthodox church and society, and upon whose soundness in the faith no suspicion has ever been cast. Without mentioning any other names, or making further inquiry, can I ask for any higher assurance, that the books examined and sanctioned by these gentlemen, will be found to contain nothing at which any orthodox man can justly take offence? Suppose I am a Baptist, and though anxious for a library, would not accept one, on the condition that my own peculiar denominational views were to be impugned by it; when I see that the Hon. George N. Briggs—for many years a member of a Baptist church in the town where he resides—has given his approval to the books, can I, with decency, any longer retain my suspicions—if suspicions I ever had! That gentleman for many years past has been a representative in the Congress of the United States, and surely it would be arrogant in me to say that he was not as capable as myself of detecting whatever is objectionable in them. Or suppose I dissent from the Trinitarian faith, in any of the modifications in which it is held, and enrol myself either with the Unitarians, or with the Universalists; are there not Mr. Putnam and Mr. Hudson, both clergymen, who will, respectively, guard every point, and see that the dissimulative views, neither of Calvin nor of Hopkins, shall find their way to the children's minds through these neutral and impartial pages? But I need not dwell longer on this point. All will perceive, that every pledge for fairness, every security against proselytism, has been given. Should any glimmer, any effluvium, or infinitesimal particle of doctrines adverse to mine, permeate through all these guards, and become just perceptible or discoverable, in the books, to the keenest sight or scent, I cannot surely have any great faith, even in my own faith, if I am filled with dread lest its foundations should be subverted or unsettled by them. And so as regards political views—are not the names of Governor Everett and Mr. Rantoul a sufficient pledge that the library is tainted by no false doctrines or sub-treasures or banks?" (Common School Journal.)

Normal Schools.—The Board of Education had proceeded only a short way in the discharge of its duties, when it became apparent to them (and it was no new discovery to the friends of education in the state), that a grand impediment to the improvement of schools consisted in the want of properly qualified teachers. "It was stated publicly, by a member of the school committee of a town containing thirty or more school districts, that one half at least of the teachers appointed by them would be rejected, only that it would be vain to expect better teachers for the present remuneration." The salaries of male teachers throughout the state, inclusive of board, was $25 44 cents per month, and to female teachers, $11 38 cents. It is supposed that $2 50 cents a week, for males, and $1 50 cents a week for females, would be a very low estimate for the average price of their board, respectively, throughout the state. On this basis of computation, the wages of male teachers, exclusive of board, were, on an average, $15 44 cents per month, or at the rate of $185 28 cents by the year; and the average wages of female teachers, exclusive of board, was $5 38 cents a month, or at the rate of $64 56 cents per annum. The wages of a labourer are $1 a day, or $300 a year, excluding Sundays and holidays.

More than five sixths of the children in the state are dependent on the common schools for instruction, while less than one sixth are educated in private schools and academies. The valuation of the state in 1830, was $208,360,407 54 cents, and in 1837, it was estimated to amount to three hundred millions of dollars. The sum raised by taxes in the year 1837, for the support of common schools, in so far as reported to the secretary, over its rocky bed. Above all this was heard the fiend like shriek of the wind, yelling as if the demon of desolation had been riding upon its blast. The whole scene had an air of unreality about it that bewildered the senses. It was like some of those wild dramatic exhibitions where nature's operations are out-heroded by the mechanist of the theatre, where mountains are thrown down by artificial storms. Never did the unsubstantiality of all earthly things come so perfectly home to my conviction. The hand of God appeared to be at work, and I felt that had he only pronounced his dread fiat, millions of such worlds as that we inhabit would cease to exist! It is only in situations like these, where the sounds are reflected by surrounding hills, that we can at all feel a storm. In the polar regions, where no traces of vegetation appear upon that glassy surface, there is a complete absence of sound: as on the highest point of the Alps, a 'solemn silence reigns.' But as the avalanches descend, their thunders roll through the valleys in awful grandeur.

"Perhaps of all noises which are augmented by continued reverberations, none are more appalling than the experiment of rolling a portion of rock into Heldon Hole, in Derbyshire. To stand on the brink of this fathomless gulf, and to hear the thundering mass fall from cavern to cavern, wakening the frightful echoes in the vast chambers below, fills the mind with terror and dismay. This noise, more terrible than the whirlpool of Charybdis, is, in some degree, imitated by Haydn, in a chorus in Judah, at the words 'the Lord devoureth them all.' The sounds sinking into an abyss of harmony, are penned with an effect worthy of the great Beethoven himself."

To the wind we are indebted for the pleasing sounds of the Eolian harp, and even for the invention of the stringed harp played by the fingers. On the banks of the Nile a dead tortoise was found, of which nothing remained but the shell, and some dried sinews that were stretched across. The wind breathing over them drew forth sounds which a traveller, fabled to be Apollo, noticed, and for many ages afterwards the shell was deemed an essential part of the lyre. It was the original sounding board, for which we have substituted a more convenient material. The twang of the hunter's bow is said to have suggested the improvement of the string stretched over a larger space, and also to have suggested the form of the primitive harp. Nature has still many instruments of her own, the rocks, the trees, the waves of the ocean, from which she frequently elicits sounds, that, while they delight the well informed, terrify the ignorant.

"Sailors are a most superstitious race, and have a secret dread of remarkable sounds heard at sea. At the Land's End, it is not uncommon to hear a mysterious sound off the coast previous to a storm, which fishermen are not willing to attribute to natural causes, but believe it to come from the spirit of the deep. This effect is obviously occasioned by the coming storm whistling through the crevices of the rocks that stand in the sea, and which skirt the Cornish coast; so much do the people consider this as ominous of shipwreck, that no one can be persuaded to venture out to sea while this warning voice is heard. In the northern seas, our sailors are alarmed by a singular musical effect, which is now well understood to proceed from the whale inhaling his breath. Similar sounds probably may be uttered by other monsters of the deep, upon which the ancients fallaciously founded their notions of sea nymphs and sirens.

The peasantry may be classed with the sailors; they have not yet lost their faith in witchcraft and supernatural agency: yet such is the advance of knowledge in the manufacturing districts, where science is blended with every operation and every art, that these traits of ignorance no longer exist. The idea that fairies dance in the meadows on warm summer nights to sweet music, no doubt has arisen from the sound ascribed to the midnight dances of the ephemera, noticed at the 247th page; but to see these green little figures fitting to and fro, is a stretch of imagination that can only result from a state of fear and trepidation. Great stress is laid by the country people upon sounds heard in the night time, such as the croaking of the raven, or the thrilling note of the screech owl. These are always considered as bad omens, and a certain presage of disaster and death.

"The power of the imagination to reproduce sounds, when in a state between sleeping and waking, is a fact that no one can doubt. Who has not found himself suddenly aroused by a sound, or startled out of sleep by a well-known voice, when it is certain no sound had been uttered? These effects, like our dreams, are excited by causes extremely slight. By the lower order these sounds are considered as calls or warnings from invisible spirits."

THE FOUR HENRYS.

TRANSLATED FROM PAUL DE KOCK.

It was on a gloomy, dismal evening, the rain falling in torrents, that an old woman, who passed in the neighbourhood for a sorceress, and who inhabited a poor cottage in the forest of Saint-Germain, heard some one knocking at her door; she opened it, and saw a gentleman who demanded her hospitality; she placed his horse in a stable, and made him enter. By the light of a smoky lamp, she saw that he was a young man, whose habit bespoke his quality. The old woman lighted a fire and demanded if he desired something to eat. A stomach of sixteen years, like a heart of the same age, is very eager and not very choice. The young man accepted her offer. A scrap of cheese and a piece of brown bread were brought from the closet. It was all the provision she possessed.

"I have nothing more," said she to the young man; "the tithes, taxes, and excises disable me from offering any thing else to travellers: besides the rustics of the neighbourhood call me sorceress, and devote me to the devil, in order to deprive me, without injury to their consciences, of the products of my poor field."

"Pardieu!" exclaimed the gentleman; "if I should ever become king of France, I would suppress the impost, and cause the people to be instructed."

"May God help you!" said the old woman.

At these words the young gentleman approached the table to eat; but at the same moment a new knock at the door stopped him. The woman opened the door and saw another gentleman, pierced through with the rain, who demanded shelter. This being granted him, he entered, and sat down.

"Is it you, Henry?" said the one?

"Yes, Henry," replied the other.

Both were called Henry. The old woman learnt by their conversation, that they belonged to a numerous hunting party, conducted by Charles IX. which had been dispersed by the storm.

"Have you nothing else to give us?" demanded the second comer.

"Nothing," replied she.

"In that case," said he, "let us share it."

The first Henry made a grimace; but, in regarding the resolute eye and determined bearing of the second Henry, he said in a voice of chagrin:

"Let us share it, then."

This thought arose in his mind, though he did not dare to express it; "Let us share it, for fear he will take all."

They now seated themselves opposite one another, and already one of them was about to cut the bread with his dagger, when a third knock was heard at the door. The rencontre was singular: this was also a young gentleman, and also a Henry. The old woman began to consider them with surprise. The first wished to conceal the bread and cheese; the second replaced them upon the table, and placed his sword by their side. The third Henry smiled.

"You do not wish to give me any of your supper," said he; "I can wait, for I have a good stomach."

"The supper," said the first Henry, "belongs of right to the first occupant."

"The supper," said the second, "belongs to him who best knows how to defend it."

The third Henry became red with anger, and said haughtily:

"Perhaps it belongs to him who knows best how to conquer it."

These words were hardly spoken when the first Henry drew his dagger, and the other two their swords. As they were on the point of beginning a combat, a fourth knock was heard at the door, a fourth young man, a fourth gentleman, a fourth Henry was introduced. At the sight of the naked swords, he draws his, places himself by the side of the most feeble, and heedlessly begins the attack. The old woman conceals herself in terror, and the swords destroy every thing with which they come in contact. The lamp falls, is extinguished, and each strikes in the dark. The noise of the swords lasts for some time, then gradually diminishes, and finally ceases altogether. The woman then leaves her hiding place, lights her lamp, and sees the four men extended on the floor, each with a wound. She examines them: fatigue had disabled them more than the loss of blood. They rose one after the other, and, ashamed of what had just happened, they began to laugh and exclaimed:

"Come, let us sup in friendship without bearing resentment."

But when they went to look for their supper, they found it on the floor, trodden under foot, and covered with blood. As coarse as it was, they greatly regretted it. On the other side, the cottage was devastated, and the old woman, seated in a corner, fixed her dark eyes upon the four young men.

"Why do you look at us so?" demanded the first Henry, who felt troubled at her glance.

"I am reading your destinies written upon your foreheads," replied the old woman.

The second Henry commanded her harshly to reveal to them what she saw; the two last began laughing.

The old woman replied:

"As you four have been reunited in this cottage, so you will all four be reunited in the same destiny. As you have trodden under foot and soiled with blood the bread that hospitality has offered you, so will you trample under foot and soil with blood the power that you will hereafter share; as you have devastated and impoverished this chamber, so will you devastate and impoverish France; as you have all four been wounded in the dark, you will all four perish by treason and by a violent death."

The four young gentlemen could not prevent themselves from laughing at the prediction of the old woman.

These four gentlemen were the four heroes of the league; two as its chiefs, two as its enemies.

Henry of Condé, poisoned at Saint-Jean-d'Angely by his wife.

Henry of Guise, assassinated at Blois by the forty-five.

Henry of Valois (Henry III.), assassinated by Jacques Clement at Saint-Cloud.

Henry of Bourbon (Henry IV.), assassinated at Paris by Ravallac.

Passages from Mr. Torrens's translation of Arabian manuscripts—which show very plainly we have not all the cake-shops, pretty women, and pleasant entertainments to ourselves in Chesnut street—the scene, Bagdad.

"So he lifted the hamper and followed her until she stopped at the shop of a sweetmeat-seller, and she bought an earthen dish, and laid on it of all that was in his shop, either cross barred, or cake sweetmeats, scented with musk, and soapcakes, (!) and lemon drops, and ladies' kisses, and Zeenab's combs, and ladies' fingers, and of the large sweetmeats called the kaze's mouthfuls, and took of all sorts of sweetmeats, on the dish."

"Then looked the porter for her who opened the gate to the damsel, and lo! she was in stature just five cubits, of prominent and fleshy figure, a very queen of beauty and of elegance, of fairness, and of perfection, and she had hit the very mean of beauty:

her forehead glossy, and her face of ruddy hue, and her eyes like to those of the wild cow and the ghuzul, and her eyebrows like the bow of the first day's moon of the month Shubân, and her cheeks like anemones, and her mouth small as the ring of Sooleiman, and her lips red as coral, and her teeth like stringed pearls and the white camomile, and her throat like the antelope's, and her bosom sloping as a penthouse, and her breast like two unripe pomegranates, and her body decked in damask silk."

A third lady is thus described.

"And there appeared at their entry a damsel of beaming countenance, and gentle cheerful beauty, and tutored manners, with moon-formed shape, and eyes fraught as with Babylonian witchcraft, and the bows of the eyebrows like the bend of a river, and her stature straight as the letter Alif, and the odour of her breathing as ambergris, and her lips cornelian coloured, sugar sweet, and her face fit to shame the light of the bright sun, and she was even as one of the constellations from on high, or a dome worked with gold, or a bride dressed for her bridegroom, or an Arab maiden not twenty years of age, as the poet sung of her when he said:—

'Or well strung pearls, or frost-white hail, or blossoms of the camomile
Are what, for so indeed they seem, she shows us in her smile;
The tressed ringlets of her hair hang down her shoulders dark as night,
And the glad radiance of her charms might shame the morning light.'

A pleasant company:—

"Then the damsel took the cup, and drank it off, and sat down with her sisters, and they ceased not drinking, and the porter in the midst of them; and they kept on with dance and laugh, and songs and verses, and jingling anagrams; and the porter was going on with them, with quips, and kisses, and cranks, and tricks, and pinches, and girls' play, and romping; this one giving him a dainty mouthful, and that one thumping him, and that one slapping his cheeks, and this serving perfumes to him; and he was with them in the height of joy, even as if he were sitting in the seventh heaven among the hours of paradise; and they stayed not doing after this manner, until the wines played in their heads and in their senses. Now when the wine got the better of them, the portress stood up, and took off some of her upper clothes, and she was unveiled, and she let flow a tress about her, as it were a garment, and she threw herself into the tank, and played with the water, and dived, and jumped up, and took the water in her mouth, and spirted it at the porter."

"So she bathed, and washed herself, and then came out of the water, and sat by the side of the porter, and said, 'Now, my master, now my fine fellow;' and she asked him a riddle. So the porter said this, and that, and answered impudently, and she said, 'Hallo! are you not ashamed?' And she seized him by the neck, and beat him heartily."

"Then the (second) damsel took off her upper clothes, and cast herself into the tank, and dived and sported about, and bathed: then looked the porter upon her unveiled, as if she were a fragment of the moon, her face like the moon when at the full, and like the dawn when at the brightest: and he looked on her fair stature, and her shape, and he began to address her extemporaneously:—

'If I thy beauteous form, my fair,
Should to the date-tree bough compare,
Sure envious spite, 'gainst charms so rare
Would o'er my heart prevail;
The date-tree bough is fairest seen,
Enveloped in its leafy screen,
But thou art fairest far, I ween,
When seen without a veil.'

"Then the cup passed round among them a full hour, until the porter stood up, and went down into the tank; and they looked at him, swimming in the water, and he bathed in like manner as they did. Then he came up and threw himself among them, and said, 'Now my mistresses;' and asked them a riddle: and they all laughed at his riddle, till their heads fell on their shoulders; and one said, This, and the other, That, and he said 'No,' and took forfeits from each one of them for their foolish answers."

THE WORTH OF BOOKS.

The effect of any writing on the public mind is mathematically measurable by its depth of thought. How much water does it draw? If it awakes you to think; if it lifts you from your feet with the great voice of eloquence; then the effect is to be wide, slow, permanent, over the minds of men; if the pages instruct you not, they will die like flies in the hour. The way to speak and write what shall not go out of fashion, is, to speak and write sincerely. The argument which has not power to reach my own practice, I may well doubt, will fail to reach yours. But take Sidney's maxim: "Look in thy heart, and write." He that writes to himself, writes to an eternal public. That statement only is fit to be made public which you have come at in attempting to satisfy your own curiosity. The writer who takes his subject from his ear and not from his heart, should know that he has lost as much as he seems to have gained, and when the empty book has gathered all its praise, and half the people say—"what poetry! what genius!" it still needs fuel to make fire. That only profits which is profitable. Life alone can impart life; and though we should burst, we can only be valued as we make ourselves valuable. There is no luck in literary reputation. They who make up the final verdict upon every book, are not the partial and noisy readers of the hour when it appears; but a court as of angels, a public not to be bribed, not to be entreated, and not to be overawed, decides upon every man's title to fame. Only those books come down which deserve to last. All the gilt edges and vellum and morocco, all the presentation copies to all the libraries will not preserve a book in circulation beyond its intrinsic date. It must go with all Walpole's noble and royal authors to its fate. Blackmore, Kotzebue, or Pollok may endure for a night, but Moses and Homer stand for ever. There are not in the world at any one time more than a dozen persons who read and understand Plato:—never enough to pay for an edition of his works; yet to every generation these come duly down, for the sake of these few persons, as if God brought them in his hand. "No book," said Bentley, "was ever written down by any but itself." The permanence of all books is fixed by no effort friendly or hostile, but by their own specific gravity, or the intrinsic importance of their contents to the constant mind of man. "Do not trouble yourself too much about the light on your statue," said Michael Angelo to the young sculptor; "the light of the public square will test its value."—Emerson's Essays.

MELANCHOLY.

There is a mighty spirit known on earth
By many names, though one alone becomes
Its mystery, its beauty, and its power.
It is not Fear—'tis not the passive fear
That sinks before the future, nor the dark
Despondency that hangs upon the past;
Not the soft spirit that doth bow to pain,
Nor that which dreads itself, or slowly eats
Like a dull canker till the heart decays.
But in the meditative mind it lives,
Shelter'd, caress'd, and yields a great return.
And in the deep silent communion
Which it holds over the poet's soul,
Temper, and doth befit him to obey
High inspiration. To the storm and winds
It giveth answer in as proud a tone;
Or on its seat, the heart of man receives
The gentler tidings of the elements.
I—often home returning from a spot
Holy to me from many wanderings,
Of fancy, or in fact, have felt the power
Of MELANCHOLY stealing on my soul

Mingling with pleasant images, and from Sorrow dividing joy; until the shape
Of each did gather to a diviner hue,
And shone unclouded by a thought of pain.
Grief may sublime itself, and pluck the sting
From out its breast, and muse until it seem Ethereal, starry, speculative, wise.
But then it is that melancholy comes,
Out-charming grief—(as the gray morning stills
The tempest off) and from its fretful fire
Draws a pale light, by which we see ourselves,
The present, and the future, and the past.

NEW BOOKS.

Carleton. A Tale of Seventeen Hundred and Seventy
Sir. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1841.

Our readers are well aware of the partiality we entertain for national novels—those which are framed from home materials and illustrate glorious epochs in the history of our country. This is a merit, but by no means the sole merit in the book before us. The style is easy, unambitious and unaffected; the story is told in that straight forward, business like manner which exactly suits our taste, and which constitutes the charm that so attaches us to James, the best of living novelists. The interest of the story, the scene of which is laid chiefly in New York, is greatly enhanced by its connection with the political and military history of the memorable year 1776. The author has made the best use of his materials, and has furnished a story which will be read with undiminished interest so long as Americans shall continue to look back with pleasure on the most heroic era in the national annals.

Corse de Leon: The Brigand. By the author of Richelieu, &c. New York, Harper & Brother, 1841.

This is a historical tale of the period of Henry II. of France. Some of the most interesting parts of the story consist of facts, drawn from ancient chronicles, and but slightly varied in their outline and colouring by the novelist. Corse de Leon himself is a very well drawn character; so are Brissac, Bernard de Rohan, and Isabel de Brienne. But our favourite, among all the personages, is the honest priest, father Willard. The reader may always count on good sport, whenever he makes his appearance on the stage of action.

There are, as usual in James's novels, many brilliant passages—models in descriptive and reflective writing, some of which we shall hereafter copy for the entertainment of our readers.

SPIRIT OF SOCIETY IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The great distinction of fashion in France, as it was—and in England, as it is—we consider to be this. In the former country the natural advantages were affected, in the latter we covet the acquired. There the aspirants to fashion pretend to wit—here they pretend to wealth. In this country, from causes sufficiently obvious, social reputation has long been measured by the extent of a rent-roll; respectability has been another word for money; and the point on which competitors have been the most anxious to vie with each other has been that exact point in which personal merit can have the least possible weight in the competition. The ambition of the French gallant, if devoted to a frivolous object, was at least more calculated to impress society with a graceful and gay tone than the inactive and unrelieved ostentation of the English pretender. And those circles to which a bon mot was the passport, could scarcely fail to be more agreeable than circles in which, to be the most courted, it is sufficient to be the first-born. A Frenchman had, at least, one intellectual incentive to his social ambition;—to obtain access to the most fashionable, was to obtain access to the most pleasant, the most witty circles in his capital. But to enjoy the most difficult society of London is to partake of the insipidity of a decorated and silent crowd, of the mere sensual gratification of a costly dinner.

To give acerbity to the tone of our fashion—while it is far from increasing its refinement—there is a sort of negative opposition made by the titled aristocrats to that order, from which it must be allowed the majority have sprung themselves. Descended, for the most part, from the unpedigreed rich, they affect to preserve from that class circles exclusive and impassable. Fashion to their heaven is like the lotus to Mahomet's; it is at once the ornament and the barrier. To the opulent, who command power, they pretend, while worshipping opulence, to deny ton: a generation passes, and the proscribed class have become the exclusive. "Si le financier manque son coup, les courtisans disent de lui,—c'est un bourgeois, un homme de rien, un malotru: s'il réussit, ils, lui demandent sa fille." This mock contest, in which riches ultimately triumph, encourages the rich to a field in which they are ridiculous till they conquer; and makes the one race servile, that the race succeeding may earn the privilege to be insolent. If the merchant or the banker has the sense to prefer the station in which he is respectable, to attempting success in one that destroys his real eminence, while it apes a shadowy distinction, his wife, his daughters, his son in the guards, are not often so wise. If one class of the great remain aloof, another class are sought, partly to defy, and partly to decoy;—and ruinous entertainments are given, not for the sake of pleasure, but with a prospective yearning to the columns of the Morning Post. They do not relieve dulness, but they render it pompous; and instead of suffering wealth to be the commander of enjoyment, they render it the slave to a vanity, that, of all the species of that unquiet passion, is the most susceptible to pain. Circles there are in London, in which to be admitted is to be pleased and to admire; but those circles are composed of persons above the fashion or aloof from it. Of those where that tawdry deity presides, would it be extravagant to say that existence is a course of strife, subserviency, hypocrisy, meanness, ingratitude, insolence, and mortification; and that to judge of the motives which urge to such a life, we have only to imagine the wish to be every where in the pursuit of nothings?

Fashion in this country is also distinguished from her sister in France, by our want of social enthusiasm for genius. It showed, not the power of appreciating his talents, but a capacity for admiring the more exalted order of talents (which we will take leave to say is far from a ridiculous trait in the national character), that the silent and inelegant Hume was yet in high request in the brilliant coteries of Paris. In England, the enthusiasm is for distinction of a more sounding kind. Were a great author to arrive in London, he might certainly be neglected; but a petty prince could not fail of being eagerly courted. A man of that species of genius which amuses—not exalts—might indeed create a momentary sensation. The oracle of science—the discoverer of truth, might be occasionally asked to the soirees of some noble Mæcenas; but every drawing-room, for one season at least, would be thrown open to the new actress or the imported musician. Such is the natural order of things in our wealthy aristocracy, among whom there can be as little sympathy with those who instruct, as there must be gratitude to those who entertain, till the entertainment has become the prey of satiety, and the hobbyhorse of the new season replaces the rattle of the last.

Here, we cannot but feel the necessity of subjecting our gallantry to our reason, and enquiring how far the indifference to what is great, and the passion for what is frivolous, may be occasioned by the present tone of that influence which women necessarily exercise in this country, as in all modern civilised communities. Whoever is disposed to give accurate attention to the constitution of fashion (which fashion in the higher classes, is, in other words, the spirit of society,) must at once perceive how largely that fashion is formed, and how absolutely it is governed, by the gender sex. Our fashion may indeed be considered the aggregate of the opinions of our women. In order to account for the tone that fashion receives, we have but to inquire into the education bestowed upon women. Have we, then, instilled into them those public principles (as well as private accomplishments) which are calculated to ennoble opinion, and to furnish their own peculiar inducements of reward to a solid and lofty merit in the opposite sex? Our women are divided into classes—the domestic and the dissipated. The latter employ their lives in the pettiest intrigues, or, at best, in a round of vanities that usurp the name of amusements. Women of the highest rank alone take much immediate share in politics; and that share, it must be confessed, brings any thing but advantage to the state. No one will assert that these soft aspirants have any ardour for the public—any sympathy with measures that are pure and unselfish. No one will deny that they are the first to laugh at principles, which it is but justice to say, the education we have given them precludes them from comprehending,—and to excite the parental emotions of the husband, by reminding him that the advancement of his sons requires interest with the minister. The domestic class of women are not now, we suspect, so numerous as they have been estimated by speculators on our national character. We grant their merits at once; and we inquire if the essence of these merits be not made to consist in the very refraining from an attempt to influence public opinion,—in the very ignorance of all virtues connected with the community;—if we shall not be told that the proper sphere of woman is private life, and the proper limit to her virtues, the private affections. Now, were it true that women did not influence public opinion, we should be silent on the subject, and subscribe to all those charming commonplaces on retiring modesty and household attractions that we have so long been accustomed to read and hear. But we hold that feminine influence, however secret, is unavoidably great; and owing to this lauded ignorance of public matters, we hold it also to be unavoidably corrupt. It is clear that women of the class we speak of attaching an implied blame to the exercise of the reasoning faculty, are necessarily the reservoir of unexamined opinions and established prejudices,—that those opinions and prejudices colour the education they give to their children, and the advice they bestow upon their husbands. We allow them to be the soothing companion and the tender nurse—(these are admirable merits—these are all their own)—but, in an hour of wavering between principle and interest, on which side would their interest lie?—would they inculcate the shame of a pension, or the glory of a sacrifice to the public interest? On the contrary, how often has the worldly tenderness of the mother been the secret cause of the tarnished character and venal vote of the husband; or, to come to a pettier source of emotion, how often has a wound, or an artificial pampering to some feminine vanity, led to the renunciation of one party advocating honest measures, or to the adherence to another subsisting upon courtly intrigues! In more limited circles, how vast that influence in forming the national character, which you would deny because it is secret!—how evident a proof of the influence of those whose minds you will not enlarge, in that living which exceeds means,—so pre-eminently English—so wretched in its consequences,—so paltry in its object! Who shall say that the whole comfortless, senseless, heartless system of ostentation which pervades society has no cause—not in women, if you like,—but in the education we give them?

We are far from wishing that women, of what rank soever, should intermeddle with party politics, or covet the feverish notoriety of state intrigues, any more than we wish they should possess the universal genius ascribed to Lady Anne Clifford by Dr. Donne, and be able to argue on all subjects “from predestination to slea silk.” We are far from desiring them to neglect one domestic duty, or one household tie; but we say—for women as for men—there is no sound or true morality where there is no knowledge of—no devotion to—public virtue. In the education women receive, we would enlarge their ideas to the comprehension of political integrity; and in the variety of events with which life tries the honesty of men, we would leave to those principles we have inculcated—unpolluted as they would be by the close contagion of party—undisturbed by the heat and riot of action—that calm influence, which would then scarcely fail to be as felicitous and just as we deem it now not unoften unhappy and dishonouring. But of all the inducements to female artifice and ambition, our peculiar custom of selling our daughters to the best advantage is the most universal. We are a match-making nation. The system in France, and formerly existent in this country, of betrothing children, had at least with us one good effect among many bad. If unfriendly to chastity in France, it does not appear to have produced so pernicious an effect in England; but while it did not impair the endearments of domestic life, it rendered women less professionally hollow and designing at that period of life when love ceases to encourage deceit; it did not absorb their acutest faculties in a game in which there is no less hypocrisy requisite than in the amours of a Dorimont or a Belinda—but without the excuse of the affections. While this custom increases the insincerity of our social life, it is obvious that it must react also on its dulness; for wealth and rank being the objects sought, are the objects courted; and thus, another reason is given for crowding our circles with important stolidity, and weeding them of persons poor enough to be agreeable—and because agreeable—dangerous and unwelcome.

Would we wish, then, the influence to be less? We will evade the insidious question. We wish it to be differently directed. By contracting their minds, we weaken ourselves; by cramping their morality, we ruin our own; as we ennoble their motives, society will rise to a loftier tone—and even Fashion herself may be made to reward glory as well as frivolity. Nay, we shall not even be astonished if it ultimately encourages, with some portion of celebrity and enthusiasm, the man who has refused a bribe, or conferred some great benefit on his country, as well as the idol of Crockford's or the heir to a dukedom.

A STORY OF TEXAS.

The following from a new book called “Texas and the Texans,” is an interesting story of real life—if the reader will make some allowance for the epic style in which it is written.

In the spring of eighteen hundred and fifteen, there dwelt near the city of Natchez, a juvenile belle of great vivacity and loveliness, whose wit and beauty were heightened by the refinement of her manners and the purity of her sentiments. Though young in years, she was not a minor in mental accomplishments; and attracting the admiration of all, she was wooed unwon by suitors of the highest renown. She was now arrived at that age when the laws of Mississippi require a parentless child to choose a guardian. Accident led to the choice which she made; and whether it was a prudent and judicious one, the reader must determine when he hears the sequel.

Tying a sun-bonnet of green silk under her fair round chin, and slinging her satchel on her arm, she was about to obey the summons of the academy bell, when she was suddenly stopped by a little negro girl, who announced in a joyous mood, that a stranger had just gone into the sick man's room. “And what is that to me?” said the youthful beauty, “do his friends not call upon him every day?” “But this is the handsomest man in the world,” replied the unsophisticated servant, “and I want you to see him before you go to school.” Now the handsomest man in the world was certainly a sight worth seeing, for which a belle in her teens might very well afford to lose an afternoon's recitation. Accordingly she doffed her bonnet and threw aside her books, with a determination to take a peep at this fair Adonis. Whether this was done with the usual negligence of juvenility, or whether she stole a glance at the mirror to adjust her shining ringlets, is a matter of which fame reporteth not; but it is said of her, however, that she never looked more lovely in her life, nor glowed her cheeks with a deeper crimson than when the unexpected visitor—leaving the room of his patient—entered the parlour sans ceremonie, without the formalities of an introduction, but with a dignity and ease that bespoke the gentleman and the man of breeding. His personal appearance came up fully to her excited expectations; and although he was not the handsomest man in the world, he nevertheless possessed a very commanding figure—tall, active and erect, with a fiery eye and a martial tread, the very hero for a tale of love and war. His name and the purpose of his visit, were mysteries soon explained. He was a surgeon in the army, and had come to administer to one of his companions in arms who was then experiencing the hospitality of the family.

It is unnecessary to tell the reader, for he has guessed already, that our youthful heroine experienced the fate of Dido. She saw and was subdued. But more fortunate than Dido, her partiality was met by a generous requital. The heart of our hero bowed to the domination of beauty. Indeed, for him to have gazed unmoved and passionless upon a flower of such unrivalled sweetness would have argued a want of that ardour and enthusiasm which are considered essential to the character of a soldier. In a few minutes, the happy couple, mutually pleased, found themselves seated by the window, contending with each other in a game of draughts. The lady of course was victor, and won of her antagonist a pair of gloves. The payment of this debt formed a fair pretext for our hero to renew his visit on the succeeding day. “I come,” said he, “to settle accounts; for debts of honour must be punctually paid.” The lady, however, declined receiving the gloves, on the ground that she had played for amusement only, with no view of exacting the forfeiture. “Then,” said the gentleman, “if you will not take them as you due, you must at least accept of them as a present.” To this the lady could not politely demur; and as she put forth her snowy fingers to receive the gloves, the happy donor, in a tone betwixt jocularly and earnest, expressed a wish that the hand that gave might go with the gift. This was enough. The lady understood the hint, and was pleased to see how the wind was blowing. In a short time they were open and avowed lovers. But it is known that the course of true love never did run smooth. The friends of the lady objected to the union on the very good grounds of the youth and inexperience of the parties; and for a good while the uncompromising character of the opposition seemed in a fair way to defeat the wishes of the sighing couple. Chance and courage however decided the matter.

We have already told that our young heroine would shortly have to choose her guardian. The time for making this selection was now arrived; and being called upon to name the individual of her choice, she turned and pointed to her lover. An objection was made. “I will name no other,” said the thwarted damsel; “you force me to choose, and he is my choice.” Her friends remonstrated—she was obstinate—they scolded—she persisted—and at length when it became obvious that she really intended what she said, all further hostility ceased, and it was many days before the delighted lover was hailed as the family in the double capacity of guardian and husband. They were married on the fourteenth of May, eighteen hundred and fifteen, the bride being in her fourteenth year, and the bridegroom in his twentieth. And ask ye who were the parties! The lady's maiden name was Jane H. Wilkinson, the niece of General Wilkinson. She was born in Charles county, Maryland; and losing her father at an early age, removed with her mother to the state of Mississippi in eighteen hundred and eleven. The hero of the story is no other than the chivalrous General Long.

James Long was born in Virginia, and at an early age removed to Kentucky, and thence to Tennessee. He was a merchant at fifteen; but being ill qualified for such pursuits, soon failed in business, and then acted as clerk in his father's store for two years, during which time he saved by great economy six hundred dollars, with which he educated himself, and afterward studied medicine under Dr. Holland, of Tennessee. From the shop he entered the army; was a great favourite of General Jackson, who used to call him his young lion. He was attached to the medical staff of Carroll's brigade, and distinguished himself in the battle of New Orleans. After this memorable victory, Carroll and Coffee being ordered to Natchez, Long accompanied them in his official character; and it was whilst he was at this place in attendance upon an invalid soldier at Mr. Calvert's, that he fell under the observation of the negro girl whose favourable report of his personal appearance had led to such an unexpected and happy result. On the third day after his marriage, having first resigned his station in the medical staff, he left Natchez on a traveling excursion; and after the lapse of two months, settled at Fort Gibson,* pursuing his profession for a short time, when at the earnest entreaties of his wife, he abandoned the practice of medicine altogether, and purchased a plantation near the Walnut Hills, in Warren county. He subsequently owned the tract on which the city of Vicksburg is located. He soon however disposed of his farm and commenced merchandising in Natchez, where he continued in business for two years, when he was called was $465,228 4 cents, which, if we assume the correctness of the above estimate, is less than one mill and six tenths of a mill on each dollar comprising the capital, real and personal, of the state!

When it was maintained as a reason against augmenting the salaries of the teachers, that the state could not afford any increase of its annual appropriations for schools, the question was put in derision, "Whether something more than one six-hundredth part of its welfare might not come from the enlightenment of its intellect and the soundness of its morals?"

So strong, however, was the aversion of the people to submit to additional taxation, that the Board did not propose any specific measures for improving the instruction of teachers, until in March 1838, Edmund Dwight, Esq. of Boston, a member of the Board, authorised the secretary to offer to the legislature the sum of $10,000, to be expended in the qualification of teachers of common schools, on condition that the legislature should place in the hands of the Board an equal sum to be appropriated to the same purpose. A committee of the legislature reported strongly in favour of accepting of the offer, and a resolution to do so passed both branches almost unanimously, and on the 19th of April was approved of by the governor.

The Board was now possessed of the sum of $20,000 applicable to the instruction of 2370 male, and 3591 female teachers, being the total numbers employed in the public schools! but how was so small a sum to be most beneficially expended to promote the object in view? "The Board caused due notice to be given to the friends of education in all parts of the commonwealth, that, until the whole fund in their hands should become pledged, they would undertake to establish, in any place unobjectionable in point of locality, a school for the qualification of teachers, and would sustain the same for the space of three years, provided that suitable buildings, fixtures, and furniture, together with the means of carrying on such a school (exclusive of the compensation of the teachers of the school,) could be obtained from private liberality and placed under the control of the Board. In the course of the last season, offers substantially complying with this proposition, were made to the Board from seven different towns in the state. Other towns also made generous propositions to the Board, with a view to become partakers of the bounty which public and private liberality had placed at its control."

After an anxious comparison of all practicable plans, the towns of Lexington and Barre were selected for the location of two of the Normal schools, and the location of the third was undecided on in February 1839.

I shall have occasion, at a subsequent period, to advert to the condition and operation of this legal machinery for the support of education in Massachusetts. The two Normal schools were a successful action when I left the United States in 1840.

CHAPTER IV.

BOSTON.

Phrenology.—Dr. Spurzheim.—On the 20th of June 1832, Dr. Spurzheim sailed from Havre for the United States, and arrived at New York on the 4th of August. On the 17th of September.

ber, he commenced a course of eighteen lectures at the Athenæum Hall, in Boston, and, soon after, another course at the University, Cambridge, three miles distant. He delivered, besides, in the afternoon of every alternate day, a course of five lectures before the Medical Faculty, and other professional gentlemen of Boston, on the anatomy of the brain. "His lectures, both in Boston and at the University, excited great and lively interest: they attracted alike the fashionable and the learned, the gay and the grave, the aged and the young, the sceptic and the Christian. Our most eminent men, as well as humble citizens, were early at the hall to secure eligible seats; and they were alike profoundly silent and attentive to the eloquence and philosophy of the lecturer."

The climate of the United States is felt by most British travellers to be highly stimulating. The air is drier, and it appears to me more highly charged with electricity than that of Britain. The habitual state of the American people, also, is one of much higher mental excitement than that of the inhabitants of Britain. Dr. Spurzheim speedily fell a victim to these combined influences. In addition to the labours of lecturing here enumerated, he was engaged during the day, in visiting the various institutions of the city of Boston, and in the vicinity. "His time and presence were in constant demand. There was hardly an hour in the day after nine o'clock, A. M., during which he was not engaged either in receiving company or making visits. This was not all. The little time which he had after the close of his lectures, of almost every evening in the week, was claimed, and he too often yielded to the invitations of his numerous friends."

Dr. Spurzheim was a tall and strongly constituted man. His lungs and brain were both amply developed, which gave him a love at once of mental and of muscular activity. He was the most temperate of men in diet, and scarcely tasted wine. When ill, he generally took no medicine, but limited the quantity of his food, and said, "the natural laws have been violated, and I must suffer the penalty; I must live simply, and nature will correct the evil." During the progress of his lectures, he manifested symptoms of disease, but believing that nature would restore him, he declined to take repose, or to resort to medical advice. "His lectures were nearly finished, and he had a most ardent desire to close them before he rested." His audience increased so much in numbers, that he had found it necessary to remove from the Hall of the Athenæum to that of the Masonic Temple, for the two concluding lectures of his course, which were on the subject of education. On the evening of his first lecture in that place, it was very apparent that his illness had increased. "He greatly exerted himself to edify his hearers, but they seemed to be more concerned for his health than interested in his subject. They rather sympathised with the sick man, than listened to the philosopher. It was ascertained, at the close of the lecture, that the hall in the Temple could not be had for the next evening, and he, wishing to consult the convenience of his audience, asked with one of his benignant smiles, 'In what place shall we meet next time?'" He never met them again! He returned to his lodgings which he never left, and died on the 10th of November 1832. He received the greatest possible attention from the medical gentlemen of Boston during his illness. Night and day they, in succession, attended him, and their highest skill was applied, but in vain, for his restoration. Dr. Jackson, in an instructive report of the progress of his disease, says, "It is interesting to many persons to learn the exact name of his disease. It may be called a continued fever, in which the nervous symptoms were predominant. There were no symptoms of putrescency, and no strong inflammatory symptoms. If it were called a pure typhus, the name would mislead many. It may rather be called a synochus, though not without dispute. Those who are accustomed to my teaching on this subject, know that I do not place a value on these names, not believing that nature recognises the specific distinctions which they are intended to designate. To those persons I should describe Dr. Spurzheim's disease thus: It was continued fever, in which the symptoms of the access came on insidiously, and were alone for many days; the symptoms of the other stages never became very prominent; those of a crisis never appeared. There was not evidence of inflammation in any organ of the body. If inflammation did exist, it must be called latent. At this time, October 30, he was really in the third week of fever, though he had not been confined to the house so much as one week. The disease was fastened on him. I was convinced that it was too far advanced to be removed by medicine. Dr. S. avowed to me his strong aversion to medicine," and Dr. Jackson directed the treatment according to these principles till his death.

A deep sensation was produced in Boston by Dr. Spurzheim's death. A public funeral was awarded to his remains, and a handsome monument was erected to his memory.

Social Customs in Boston.—The fate of Dr. Spurzheim served as an instructive lesson to myself. I speedily became acquainted by experience with some of the causes which had occasioned his death. From the first day that my arrival in Boston was announced in the newspapers, I was waited upon at every hour between 8 A. M. and 10 P. M. by a succession of visitors, many of whom called without introductions, and kept me in a state of constant and fatiguing cerebral excitement; and this continued for day after day. Many of these visits were most gratifying to me, but some of them were made by individuals impelled chiefly by curiosity, who put a succession of commonplace questions, received equally commonplace answers, and retired, leaving scarcely an interval between their departure and the renewal of the interrogatories by a succeeding visitor. I seriously thought of getting the questions and answers printed and posted up in some conspicuous part of the room, where they might be read, while I might sit quietly and be looked at. This custom of introducing one's self is peculiar to America, so far as I have learned of the etiquette of other countries, and is meant as a remark of respect. The evil is aggravated by there being no hours of respite from it. If it were confined to the day, between 12 and 6 P. M., the evenings and mornings would be left for repose; but here it never ceased while the novelty and curiosity lasted. A phrenologist is more exposed to this infiction than ordinary strangers. There is so much of the wonderful supposed to be connected with phrenology, that my presence excited the men of strange minds, the lovers of the fanciful and extravagant, and sent an undue proportion of them to do me spontaneous honour by an interchange of ideas. Knowing that these visits were kindly meant, I submitted to them in patience, and received the visitors with all the courtesy that I could command; but I soon felt that my organisation could not sustain the excitement which was in preparation for me. I therefore laid down a rule, from which I did not deviate six times during my whole residence in the United States, namely, to give only three lectures a week; never to accept of an invitation for the day on which I lectured; and never to remain in company later than ten o'clock in the evening. By a nearly inflexible adherence to this resolution, and by strict temperance, I withstood all the influences of the climate and the labours of my vocation, without suffering one hour's illness during my stay.

Lectures on Phrenology.—My full courses in Edinburgh generally extended to nearly fifty lectures of one hour each. It was not to be expected that the busy citizens of Boston would devote so much time to the study, and it was impossible to do the subject justice in much less. As a compromise between difficulties, I gave sixteen lectures, of two hours each, on three nights a week. The first lecture was delivered on the 10th of October, at 7 P. M., in the Masonic Temple. I was received in profound silence, and listened to in silence. This would have struck me as cold, had I not observed that Mr. Mann and Governor Everett, who are both highly popular, and much esteemed, have been received in precisely the same manner when they delivered addresses at Taunton, and I was told that such is the custom in Boston. Far from feeling any disappointment at the absence of a noisy greeting, I was pleased; for in all my lecturing I have considered profound and sustained attention as the highest compliment which an audience can bestow. Audiences in Edinburgh are much given to this mode of testifying their interest in a subject; but in some instances it is felt to be inconvenient. The late Mrs. Siddons, although she appreciated the delicacy of sentiment, and the deep intellectual discernment, which induced her audiences in that city to observe a profound silence at the climax of her most impassioned scenes, when the London public used to shake the theatre with applause, yet suffered severely from the want of that rest from exertion which the applause, often prolonged into three rounds, afforded her. A lecturer does not strain his powers to such an extent as this.

A sermon of an hour's duration appears very long, and a lecture of two hours wears a still more formidable and forbidding aspect. Aware of this, I delivered, at the end of the first hour, a brief address, by way of episode, to the audience, mentioning that phrenology taught us that the mind thinks by means of the brain, just as we walk by means of the legs; that the brain is liable to become fatigued by too long attention as the locomotive muscles are by too much walking; and I therefore, proposed to them to take a brief rest. I requested them to stand up in order to vary their position, also to converse freely with each other for the sake of relaxation, the more merrily the better, for cheerfulness circulates the blood; and I called their attention also to the absence of all means of ventilating the hall, remarking that, as we had already breathed the air which it contained for a full hour, it must have lost much of its vital properties, and needed to be renewed. I requested the gentlemen to put on their hats, and the ladies their shawls, to avoid catching cold, and then had the windows widely opened. This proceeding caused some astonishment and alarm at first; for the Americans generally have a dread of cold air, amounting almost to an aerophobia. I assured them that they would suffer no inconvenience, and they submitted to the experiment. The interval allowed was only five minutes, at the end of which I resumed the lecture; but so refreshing were the effects of the brief rest, of the change of position, and, above all, the admission of pure air, that during the second hour the attention was as completely sustained as during the first. The same practice was continued every evening through the whole course, and with the same success. Many individuals expressed their gratification at having discovered such simple means of relieving the tedium of a long discourse; and as my audiences continued to increase, after the length of the lectures was generally known, it became evident that the two hours' application, when thus arranged, was not felt as an unbearable affliction. I concluded the lecture also in silence.

In Edinburgh, the late Mr. Robert Johnston, long distinguished for his philanthropy, requested that several inmates of the asylum for the blind might be permitted to attend my lectures on phrenology; they did so, and were interested. I gave a general invitation to the pupils of the institution for the blind in Boston to attend, and about twenty honoured me with their presence every evening. On a subsequent visit to the asylum, I found that they had profited by the instruction, and that phrenology was used by them as the philosophy of mind, and applied with skill and success in analysing character, both historical and personal. They have been assisted in their studies by an outline of Phrenology prepared by Dr. Howe, and printed in raised type for their use, of which he presented me with a copy.

October 11. Thermometer 51°. Temperance.—I have read in the Boston Evening Mercantile Journal, a notice that the inhabitants of Providence, the capital of the state of Rhode Island, assembled in a town meeting, had instructed the magistrates to grant no licenses for retailing any fermented liquors in quantities less than ten gallons; that a wine-merchant had sold a case of one dozen of champagne, as imported from France, and had been fined for infringing the law; that the case had been appealed to the Court of Review, and that the decision is now confirmed.

Fifteen Gallon License Law.—In Massachusetts the temperance cause had made such great advances, that, in April, 1838, an act was passed by both houses of the legislature, and approved of by the governor, which ordained, "that no licensed inholder, retailer, common victualler, or other person, except as herein provided, shall sell any brandy, rum, or other spirituous liquors, or any mixed liquor, part of which is spirituous, in a less quantity than fifteen gallons, and that delivered and carried away all at one time, on pain of forfeiting not more than twenty dollars, nor less than ten dollars, for each offence." The exception is, that "the county commissioners in the several counties, may license, for their respective towns, as many apothecaries or practising physicians, as they may deem necessary, to be retailers of spirituous liquors, to be used in the arts, or for medicinal purposes only." The same power is given to the mayor and aldermen of the cities. All licenses to be granted subsequently to the passing of the act, are to be restricted in accordance with its terms. It came into effect on the 1st of July, 1838.

Both political parties concurred in the enactment of this law, and it was passed in consequence of a strong expression of public sentiment in its favour. Already, however, agitation is rife against it, and strong efforts are making by those whose interests it affects to defeat its provisions. Among other devices to evade it, one ingenious Yankee advertised a wonderful striped pig as a show. The price of admission was equal to that of a glass of rum; and each person who entered found a glass of this beverage standing on a table, placed there by unseen hands; he drank it while admiring the beauties of the pig, deposited the empty glass on the table, and retired; having held converse with no one except the rum and the pig. Not only were the rum-makers and the rum-drinkers dissatisfied with the law, but some of the most enlightened men of the state considered that it was erroneous in principle: they regarded moral suasion, and not legal pains and penalties, as the only true foundation of virtuous habits: other excellent persons, true friends to temperance, considered that it had gone too far, for it prevented the great body of the people, who could not afford to purchase a stock of fifteen gallons at a time, from obtaining spirituous liquors of any kind even for the most temperate use in their families, while it left the rich in possession of the power of indulging their appetites unrestrained.*

Grievances converted into "Political Capital."—One evil attending democratic institutions and universal suffrage, while the mass of the people are imperfectly educated and untrained to the guidance of reason, is the tendency to convert all questions into subjects of party contention. Although both parties in this state concurred in the license law, the democrats, discerning the rising discontent, are already preparing to turn it to their own account, or, in American phraseology, "to make political capital" of it. This phrase is so pithy, so expressive, and every way so excellent that it should be transferred into the English language, more especially as we have the thing which it signifies in perfection, and want an adequate name for it. Its meaning is this: when a party perceives a strong feeling in the public either arising, or capable of being excited, for or against any particular measure, they become the headlong advocates of the popular side, and charge the support of the opposite opinions on their opponents, altogether regardless of the real merits of the question, of moral rectitude, or of the ultimate welfare of the people. The popularity which they gain by this conduct, is called "political capital," because it carries so many votes to their own side, not only on the specific question, but in the general politics of the state. Among us, the devoted and vociferous champions of the throne and the altar, who in their speeches vilify the queen, and in their lives set at defiance the pure precepts of Christianity, are manufacturers of "political capital." They know that the people are loyal and religious, and endeavor to catch their votes by pretending a loyal and religious zeal, which has a political foundation and no other.

In the United States, whenever party spirit is strongly excited, the intrinsic merits of a measure, whether in morality or utility, are subordinate considerations; a despotism of party is engendered and wielded without compunction or control. A higher moral, intellectual, and political education of the whole people, appears to me to be the only remedy for this evil, which is yearly on the increase.

* It is by this odd kind of professing temperance, which advocates temperate liquor drinking, that drunkards are made, and drunkenness is rendered incurable.

Oct. 12. Mount Auburn.—A friend drove us to-day to visit Harvard University, at Cambridge, three miles from Boston, and its president, Mr. Josiah Quincy. We were kindly received by Mr. Quincy and his family, and much interested in the institution over which he presides. As, however, it has often been described by English travellers, I proceed to mention Mount Auburn, the celebrated cemetery which lies in its vicinity. The ground includes about one hundred acres, and was purchased by the Massachusetts Horticultural Society in 1831. A portion of it, lying next the road, is used as an Experimental Garden, and the remainder was consecrated on the 24th of September that year as a cemetery. The tract is beautifully undulating in its surface, containing a number of bold eminences, steep acclivities, and deep shadowy valleys. The principal eminence, called Mount Auburn, is 125 feet above the level of Charles River, and commands from its summit an extensive and lovely prospect. The grounds are covered with forest trees, of every variety common in the country, and some of them of large dimensions. The surface has been laid out with intersecting avenues, so as to render every part of the wood accessible. Lots of ground, containing each three hundred square feet, are set off as family burial places. About two hundred of these have been sold at $60 each, and, in some instances, even an additional sum has been received in premiums for the right of choice. The whole is inclosed by a substantial fence, seven feet high, with a gateway, finished in the Egyptian style, for its principal entrance. The gateway is handsome and massive, and is a successful imitation of granite.

On entering the gateway, and passing up the central avenue, the first object that presents itself, placed on a gentle eminence, is a beautiful sarcophagus of marble resting on a pedestal of granite, and surrounded by a handsome oval iron rail. It bears the inscription, "SPURZHEIM, 1832."

I beheld this monument with the most vivid interest. When I last parted from Dr. Spurzheim in Edinburgh, no conception could be farther from the mind of either of us, than that I should ever heave a sigh over his monument in Massachusetts! Neither of us had then contemplated crossing the Atlantic. He was my master and my friend; and, in having taught me Phrenology, I regard him as my greatest earthly benefactor. The sarcophagus is said to be a copy of that of Scipio. Be it so; it is beautiful and simple, and to me it was full of pathos with its single word, "SPURZHEIM."

13th Oct. Ther. 44°. Lowell.—We visited Lowell this day. The town is situated twenty miles north of Boston, and is connected with it both by an excellent railroad and by a canal. It is built on a neck of land where the Concord River falls into the Merrimack, and commands powerful and copious waterfalls. The war with England in 1813, gave origin to the town, as a manufacturing station, and it has increased with astonishing rapidity. It now contains above 20,000 inhabitants, and already looks like a younger Manchester. On 1st January, 1838, there were ten large manufactories for spinning and weaving cotton and carpets, for dyeing and printing cotton, making machinery, &c. No young children are employed in the mills. The female operatives are mostly young women, daughters of farmers and the village inhabitants of New England, who come from a distance, and work in the manufactories, not for life, but for a few years only, till they have saved, respectively, a sum of $200 to $400, and even $500, when they marry, or leave the mills and go home. They generally visit their relations twice a year. In one of the mills, an account was kept of the distance to which each traveled to reach home, and the average of the whole was eighty-four miles. They work twelve hours a day, by their own choice, as they are paid by the piece. They are respectable in character, and appeared healthy. The articles manufactured in cotton are all of the common and cheap kinds, but handsome in pattern, and substantial in fabric. The southern slave states afford the great market for the manufactures of New England. The churches are numerous and belong to every sect, Episcopal, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Universalist, Unitarian, and Roman Catholic. All subsist in peace, because all are equal in power and privileges, and each pays for that religious instruction which his conscience considers to be right, and he is not taxed for any other.

Oct. 14.—Sunday in Massachusetts.—We went to the church in Federal street, of which the celebrated Dr. W. E. Channing is the pastor; but he did not preach, not having yet returned to Boston from Rhode Island, where he generally passes the summer. We heard an elegant, sensible, and pleasing discourse on the loss of children, by his colleague, the Rev. Mr. Gannett. The church is large, and handsomely fitted up. The passages between the pews are carpeted, and the pews are both carpeted and cushioned. The music and singing by a choir were remarkably good. I mention these particulars, because I was struck by the superior elegance and comfort of the voluntary churches of America generally, compared with the condition of the established churches of Scotland. The congregation were genteel in their appearance, but not numerous.

In the New Testament, no express injunction is laid on Christians to observe the first day of the week in the same manner that the Jews were commanded, in the Old Testament, to observe the last of the week, or Sabbath. In point of fact, there is no explicit prescription in the New Testament, of any particular mode of observing the first day of the week. While, therefore, all Christian nations have agreed in considering themselves not bound by the fourth commandment, to observe the seventh day, or Jewish Sabbath, they have differed in regard to the mode of observing the first day of the week; and as the Scripture prescribes no definite rule, each nation has adopted such forms of observance as appeared to itself to be most accordant with the general spirit of Christianity. Thus, in Catholic countries, amusements are permitted on Sundays, after divine service; in Scotland, amusements and labour, except works of necessity and mercy, are prohibited. In Scotland, also, Sunday commences at twelve o'clock on Saturday night, and ends at twelve o'clock on Sunday night. In Massachusetts, on the other hand, different views are entertained. While chap. 50, sects. 1st, 2d, and 3d, of the Revised Statutes, prohibits all persons from doing any work, and from traveling on "the Lord's day," sect. 4th declares that day, for the purposes of these sections, "to include the time between the midnight preceding and the sunset of the said day." According to the Scottish law, therefore, Sunday consists of twenty-four hours, at all seasons of the year; while, according to the "Revised Statutes of Massachusetts," it consists only of sixteen and a half hours on the 22d of December, and stretches out as the days lengthen, but never exceeds nineteen and a half hours at any period. Hence, in Scotland, a person would be fined or imprisoned for doing acts after sunset, on the Sunday evening, which in Massachusetts are entirely lawful. Again: in the Revised Statutes of this commonwealth, it is declared, by sect. 5, that "no person shall be present at any game, sport, play, or public diversion, except concerts of sacred music, upon the evening next preceding or following the Lord's day," under the penalty of paying a fine of five dollars. In Edinburgh, the best plays and public entertainments are brought forth on the "evening next preceding the Lord's day," or Saturday evening—and are then most numerous and attended: so that in Boston a Christian is fined in five dollars for doing, on that evening, what a Christian in Edinburgh is permitted to do, without any penalty whatever.

It has frequently been remarked that the theatre in Boston is unsuccessful; but this state of the law may be one cause of its failure. Sunday is observed with the greatest decorum in this city, and although the law declares it to terminate at sunset, the only relaxation of observance which I remarked was, that political meetings were held on Sunday evenings, and that ladies played on the pianoforte, sang, knitted, or engaged in any light employment, without any sense of sin. Many of the churches, however, were open for worship in the evening.

Oct. 15.—The Hon. Daniel Webster.—To-day I met Mr. Webster in company. The published bust of him, which is a correct delineation of his head, shows a voluminous anterior lobe of the brain, indicating very powerful intellectual faculties. Individuality, which gives the capacity for details, is deficient, but comparison and causality are broad, prominent, and massive. Benevolence is the largest among the moral organs, and the base of the brain is large. The temperament is bilious, with a portion of the sanguine, and lymphatic. He is a lawyer by profession, and at the bar and in the United States' Senate, is recognised as a man of gigantic intellect. His style in conversation is clear, simple, deliberate, and forcible, occasionally humorous and playful. The talent of the New Englanders in bargain-making is proverbial in America, and the inhabitants of the little barren island of Nantucket, if we were to judge from the following anecdote, would seem to carry off the palm from all others in this accomplishment. One of the party at table, alluding to an illustration of this characteristic of the Nantucket population, which, according to Sam Slick, had occurred in the professional practice of Mr. Webster, asked him whether it was true. He said it was essentially correct, and proceeded to state the real incidents as follows. A Nantucket client had asked him to go to that island,* to plead a cause for him. Mr. Webster, after mentioning the distance, the loss of time, and the interruption to his other practice, said that he could not go unless he received a fee of a thousand dollars. The client objected to paying so large a sum for pleading one cause. Mr. Webster replied, that the fatigue and loss of time in traveling to Nantucket, and remaining there probably during the whole circuit, amounted to as a great a sacrifice on his part, as if he pleaded in every cause on the roll. "Well, then," said his client, "come, and I will pay you the thousand dollars; but you shall be at my disposal for the whole sittings, and I shall let you out, if I can." Mr. Webster went, and was sublet by his client, who drew the fees to relieve his own loss. Judge Story, who was present, remarked, that he had often heard the anecdote mentioned, but never before heard it authenticated. He added, "the current edition proceeds to tell that your client let you out for eleven hundred dollars, saved his own pocket entirely, and gained ten per cent. on his speculation." Mr. Webster stated with great good humour, that, as his client had not reported the amount of the sub-fees which he drew, he could not tell whether this addition was correct or not. Sam Slick's report of this occurrence is not entirely accurate.

October 16.—Mr. Catlin's Indian Gallery.—To-day we visited Mr. Catlin's Indian Gallery in Faneuil Hall, generally mentioned as the cradle of American Independence, because here were held the public meetings of the citizens of Boston at which resistance against the duty on tea was first resolved upon. The great hall in which the Indian curiosities are exhibited, is 76 feet square, and 28 feet high. Mr. Catlin has resided for several years among the native Indians settled west of the Mississippi, on the Missouri, and in other districts; he painted portraits of the men and women, on the spot, as he saw them; painted their country in numerous landscapes; represented their dances, superstitions, ceremonies, and hunting parties, and also their villages and tents; in short, their actions and modes of life. He has purchased one of their tents, composed of the skins of buffaloes ingeniously dressed and ornamented; their garments, ornaments, arms, and articles of luxury and amusement; and he exhibits the whole in this large gallery. He describes them also in lectures, in a very interesting manner. He admires the Indians and speaks of their high qualities, and of the cruel injustice with which they have been treated by the Americans. His representations and descriptions of their country, and especially of their boundless prairies, covered with the richest green turf, and diversified with hills, named by the Americans bluffs, varying in height from one hundred to seven or eight hundred feet, make one long to visit them; yet, the horrible scenes of cruelty and superstitions which he has represented contrast strangely with the virtues which he ascribes to them. The pictures, as works of art, are deficient in drawing, perspective, and finish: but they convey a vivid impression of the objects, and impress the mind of the spectator with a conviction of their fidelity to nature, which gives them an inexpressible charm. In the portraits, a few of the men are represented with tolerably good intellectual organs, and some of the women with a fair average development of the moral organs. The best, Mr. Catlin suspected to be half-breeds; but the great mass of pure Indians present the deficient anterior lobe, the deficient coronal region, and the predominating base of the brain, by which savages in general are characterised.

Oct. 17.—Manners in New England.—I conversed to-day with a gentleman of great acuteness and experience, who has observed the progress of manners in New England, for upwards of half a century. He mentioned, that within that time there has been a great diminution in convivial drinking among the higher classes, independently of the influence of temperance societies, and that at dinner, the gentlemen drink much less wine. I have already had occasion to remark the exemplary temperance in this respect of the gentlemen in the first class of society here. Dinner is served at three o'clock, a few glasses of wine are taken, conversation proceeds with spirit, and the entertainment terminates by a cup of coffee brought to the table about six o'clock. In many instances, the gentlemen retire to the drawing room, and join the ladies an hour earlier. Some families, who have been much in Europe, dine at 6 o'clock, and entertain in the English style; but this is by no means common.

The Church.—My friend continued to say, that their Voluntary Church system has led to the multiplication of churches even to excess, and to inadequate provision for the ministers, and has also, in some instances, occasioned animosities among the people. The dependence of the clergy on their hearers, has led some of them to study their humours, and to preach fanatical doctrines for the sake of excitement, rather than to follow the dictates of their own understandings. He has observed, however, that from there being among the sects no artificial distinctions created by the law, these animosities speedily subside, and that there is a constant tendency in the public mind to correct its own errors. The usual time now occupied by divine service in Boston, is an hour or an hour and a quarter. The morning service begins at half-past ten, and ends at a quarter before twelve. The afternoon service begins at three. The time employed in public worship has been much shortened within his recollection. There is a growing disposition in the people to subject religion to the examination of reason; and opinion is, in some instances, passing even beyond Unitarianism. Still Calvinism, in its purest forms, is extensively professed by the people.

Oct. 19. Thermometer 45°.—Medical Jurisprudence.—Moral Insanity.—To-day I read, in the American Jurist, No. 38, a very able review of "A Treatise on the Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity, by J. Ray, M.D., 8vo, pp. 476. Boston, 1838." It is dedicated, "To the Hon. Horace Mann, to whose persevering exertions our country is mainly indebted for one of its noblest institutions, [the Lunatic Hospital at Worcester,] for ameliorating the condition of the Insane." It is recommended by the reviewer to public attention, on account of the talent which it displays, and also because it treats of insanity on phrenological principles, and embodies the views of the most recent French, British, and American authorities on the subject.

I have since consulted the work itself, and find it to contain much excellent matter. In an able Essay prefixed to the volume, the contradictions, errors, and inhumanity of the doctrines on insanity, delivered, up to a very recent period, by the lawyers of England, are ably stated and commented on. Nor does Scotland escape the searching scrutiny of the author. "The doctrine," says he, "of moral insanity has been as yet unfavourably received by judicial authorities, not certainly for want of sufficient facts to support it, but probably from that common tendency of the mind, to resist innovations upon old and generally received views. If, a quarter of a century ago, one of the highest law-officers of Great Britain pronounced the manifestation of 'systematic correctness' of an action, a proof of sanity sufficient to render all others unnecessary, it is not surprising, that the idea of moral insanity has been considered by the legal profession, as having sprung from the teeming brains of medical theorists. In the fulness of this spirit, Mr. Chitty declares, that 'unless a jury should be satisfied that the mental faculties have been perverted, or at least the faculties of reason and judgment, it is believed that the party subject to such a moral insanity, as it is termed, would not be protected from criminal punishment;' and, in the trial of Howison for the murder of the widow Geddes, at King's Cramond, Scotland, two or three years since, moral insanity, which was pleaded in his defence, was declared by the Court to be a 'groundless theory.' Such opinions, from quarters where a modest teachableness would have been more becoming than an arrogant contempt for the results of other men's inquiries, involuntarily suggest to the mind a comparison of their authors with the saintly persecutors of Galileo, who resolved, by solemn statutes, that nature always had operated, and always should operate, in accordance with their views of propriety and truth." P. 50.

Dr. Ray adverts to the indecent haste with which the trial, sentence, and execution of John Bellingham, for shooting Mr. Perceval in 1812, were hurried over, and remarks, that few, at this period, "will read the report of the trial, without being forced to the conclusion, that he was really mad," or, at the very least, that his case should have been deliberately investigated. He adds, in reference again to Howison's case, "that application was made to the secretary of state, by Howison's law-agent, for time to obtain further evidence of his insanity, but without success," although "several post-judicial facts were added" that left no doubt that the unhappy man was a fit subject for punishment. This is all true; and the most striking of these facts, with which Dr. Ray probably was not acquainted, is, that, in the night preceding the morning of his execution, Howison made a confession of a number of murders, which he stated that he had committed, and of which he specified the times, places, and circumstances, evidently believing them to be real, but which, on inquiry, turned out, one and all of them, to be mere phantoms of his own diseased mind. The organs of Destructiveness appear, in him, to have been liable to states of diseased excitement, giving rise to destructive monomania, and, while labouring under one of these paroxysms, which misled his own judgment and memory, and prompted him to clothe his suggestions with the attributes of reality, he was led forth to the gallows and executed! The evidence adduced at his trial, and subsequently obtained, appeared to me to prove that he committed the homicide, for which he suffered, in a similar state of mind, without provocation, and without any motive discernible by a sane understanding.

American Inns.—We met to-day with a young physician whom we had visited last year in Germany, and with whom we renewed our acquaintance with much pleasure. We compared our respective observations and experience in travelling in the United States, and while we stated our satisfaction, he, being a single gentleman, and having had a more extensive experience than we, gave a different account. In travelling to Niagara, he had been put into a room with six beds, and in the Tremont Hotel, in Boston, he had been ushered into an apartment containing three beds, one of which was allotted to him. On one occasion he actually found another person sleeping in his bed. He resisted this treatment, and afterwards procured a bed-room to himself. I mention these facts, because we have met with nothing like them in the older parts of the United States, and because this instance serves to show how different travelers may give widely different representations of the customs of the same country, and yet both may relate facts.

October 19.—Ventilation.—An incident occurred at my lecture-room this evening, which, although trivial in itself, is illustrative of an error which is not uncommon in the United States; I mean the unskilful or inattentive management of stoves. A large stove had been lighted in the private room at the Masonic Temple, adjoining the hall, and the coals had burned into a bright red heat just before I entered. I chanced to look at the construction of the stove, which was large, wide and open in front, and I could discover no aperture for allowing the smoke to escape. I asked my assistant, a young gentleman of Boston, if he could explain how it was disposed of. He turned a small iron projection in the side, and instantly a damper revolved and presented an aperture for its escape. It appeared to me that this damper had been deliberately closed by a very sensible man who had charge of the temple, after the fire had come to a red heat, under the notion that there was no longer any smoke, and that the use of this contrivance was to prevent the heat from escaping up the chimney. The fire was burning vividly, and pouring into the room streams of heated air charged to the maximum with carbonic acid gas! Some portion of the bad health which is complained of in America arises from imperfect ventilation, and occasionally, perhaps, from such practices as this.

Oct. 20.—Statue of General Washington.—We visited the State House built in 1795, and enjoyed a noble prospect from the top of the dome. It stands on the summit of what was Beacon Hill, and the dome is 230 feet above the level of the sea. Here, for the first time, the exact location of Boston, almost entirely surrounded by the sea, became intelligible. In the outer hall is a statue of Washington executed by Chantry. It is highly expressive of moral and intellectual greatness, although Washington is, perhaps, more poetical in this marble than he was in nature; but "such things must always be" in painting and statuary. It is gratifying to observe the profound respect with which the memories of Washington and Benjamin Franklin are regarded in Boston. Their figures appear on signboards, in printshops, and in private houses; some few busts may be seen in private houses in marble or bronze, hundreds in stucco, and innumerable multitudes of portraits in engraving and lithography.

Benjamin Franklin.—In America, Franklin holds the same rank in public estimation that Saint John of Nepomuc does in Bohemia; he is their saint and prophet; and it is no disparagement to their taste and judgment that he should maintain this rank. There was a deep sagacity and comprehensive power of intellect, a calm and persevering activity, a generous philanthropy, and an inflexible integrity in Franklin, that placed him in the first rank of great and useful men. I have heard it remarked, however, that some of his modern admirers practise his lessons of thrift much more rigidly than his maxims of justice, and that, in this respect, his writings and example are not purely beneficial. There may be truth in this observation, for circumstances have greatly changed since he wrote his lessons of economy in the character of Poor Richard. Then, capital was extremely scarce, the field of mercantile operations was limited, and banks were nearly unknown. A rigid economy was, therefore, indispensable to success in business, and saving was the only certain road to independence. In the present day, an extensive commerce and abundance of capital, supplied by banks so numerous and active that they inundate the country with their currency, render extreme thrift less necessary and meritorious.

Franklin in his will left 1000*l.* sterling to the inhabitants of the town of Boston, to be managed by the select men, united with the ministers of the oldest Episcopalian, Congregational, and Presbyterian churches, and to be lent out in sums not less than 15*l.* and not exceeding 60*l.*, upon interest at 5 per cent. per annum, to such young married artificers, under the age of twenty-five years, as have served an apprenticeship in the town, have a good moral character, and can obtain at least two respectable citizens to be sureties for them for the repayment of the sum lent, with interest. Franklin anticipated that at the end of a hundred years, this legacy would accumulate to 130,000*l.*, and he ordered 100,000*l.* of it to be then applied to the construction of public works, and the remaining 30,000*l.* to be lent out, as before directed, for another hundred years, at the end of which period he calculated that the accumulated fund, "if no unforeseen accident has prevented the operation," would amount to four millions and sixty-one thousand pounds, of which he left 1,061,000*l.* to the disposition of the inhabitants of Boston, and 2,000,000*l.* to the disposition of the government of the state, "not presuming to carry my views farther."

I was desirous of discovering how far Dr. Franklin's intentions and expectations had been realised, and by the kindness of a friend I obtained a copy of the following authentic report on the subject:—

"JOHN THOMSON, Esq., Philadelphia.

"BOSTON, Dec. 23, 1836.

"Sir,—Your letter to Mr. Lyman, late mayor of this city, has been handed to me as treasurer of the Franklin Fund, with a request that I should answer it, which I proceed to do.

"The whole number of loans from this fund, from May, 1791, to this time, has been 255, in sums varying from $70 to $266, up to the year 1800, since which they have usually been $200. From July, 1811, to the present time, the number of loans has been 91, of which 50 at least have been repaid in whole or in part by sureties, and in four of these are balances which cannot be collected, both principals and sureties being insolvent.

"Dr. Franklin's donation was 1000*l.*, and the present value of the fund is as follows:—

"Estimate of thirteen bonds, considered good,	$1,428 68
"Amount deposited in office of Massachusetts Hosp. Life Insurance Company,	22,739 00
"Cash in hands of the treasurer,	158 15
	$24,325 83

"It is apparent from these facts, that the benevolent intentions of the donor have not been realised, and that in the present condition of our country it is not advantageous to married men of twenty-four to borrow money to be repaid in easy instalments at a low rate of interest, and the improvidence of early marriages among that class may fairly be inferred.

"The great number of instances in which sureties have been obliged to pay the loans, has rendered it not so easy as formerly for applicants to obtain the required security. This is proved by the present small number of loans from the fund, averaging for the last ten years not more than one a year.

"Until within the last twenty years, no great care was given to accumulating the fund. It is now carefully attended to, and the money not required for actual use is placed in the Life Office, where it increases at the rate of about 5½ per cent. a year.

"The loans are made at the rate of 5 per cent., but on instalments past due, 6 per cent. interest is charged from the time they become payable, and the bonds of delinquents are put in suit after reasonable notice.

"Two sureties, at least, are required on each bond.

"Yours respectfully,

"(Signed) Wm. MINOT.

Another sum of 1000*l.* sterling was bequeathed by Dr. Franklin to the city of Philadelphia, under similar conditions, and at the present time (1838) it is said to amount to only about $14,000. Franklin had calculated that these legacies would at this period amount to $50,000 each!

The legal rate of interest in Massachusetts is 6 per cent., and any respectable person can obtain money from the banks at this rate, on giving such security as Dr. Franklin required. There is, however, this advantage in applying for a loan to his trustees in preference to a bank, that the trustees lend at 5 per cent., and the banks at 6; but on the opposite side must be placed the conditions, that the borrower from them must have served an apprenticeship, and must be married, and under twenty-five years of age, and that the sum which can be lent to him must not exceed 60*l.* sterling, all of which operate as disadvantages. These circumstances, which Franklin could not foresee, account for the limited success of his benevolent bequest.

Fantastical Bequest to the city of Boston.—My inquiries about Dr. Franklin's legacy, brought to my knowledge another bequest (apparently suggested by his example), which was lately made to the mayor and aldermen of Boston. The testator was Ambrose S. Courtis, of Boston, who died in Nauplia, in Greece, on the 27th of August, 1836. By his will, dated the 2d of July, 1834, the sum of $5000 is given to the city, from which it is to derive no benefit till it has accumulated to the amount of $3,000,000, and then it is to be devoted to the erection of an exchange, with shops and stores; the like sum of $5000 is given, burthened with an annuity consuming the whole income for three lives, and after that, the income is to be devoted to the purchase of books and stationary for poor children in the public schools; the sum of $2000 is given to accumulate to $200,000, and then to be used for the establishment of a school to teach navigation to sailors; and another sum of $2000 to accumulate to $200,000, and then to be spent in the erection of public stone baths.

The mayor and aldermen, on the report of a committee, declined to accept of the legacies under these conditions, and the money devolved on the testator's legal representatives. "There are many considerations," say the committee, "which would go far to convince those who reflect on the subject, that such a prolonged accumulation is neither probable nor possible. In a world, of which the most prominent characteristic is mutability, where nothing but a few great features remain for any considerable period unchanged, and where every thing which depends on human agency is subject to the combined chances of change, arising from the ordinary laws of God's providence, and the imperfection, ignorance, and volatility of man, (who, to some extent, is allowed to pursue the course his judgment or his passions may dictate), it seems nothing short of a wild presumption to attempt to chain down the force of action for successive generations, and to require this or that to be done by our successors, of whose character, condition, wants, and wishes, we know, and can know, absolutely nothing. And all experience confirms this view of things. It is not the first time that the attempt has been made, but in every instance known to the committee, the failure of such prospective arrangements has been signal and entire. Perhaps the two most remarkable instances are those of Franklin and Thelluson, well known cases, which will naturally occur to all, as warnings rather than examples." The committee also regarded the testator as insane.

Oct. 20, Sunday. To-day we went to the "King's Chapel," so named from its having been the government church before the Revolution. A reformed prayer-book of the Episcopal church is used. The choir and organ are excellent. Mr. Greenwood preached on the text, "Grieve not the spirit of God," which he interpreted to mean that we should not act against God's law of purity and peace, to our own injury and vexation. The whole service was exceedingly refined. The church was cushioned and carpeted, the temperature was agreeable, and the audience very attentive. In our Scottish churches, especially in winter, there is a great deal of coughing when the congregation first meet for the morning service. I have observed that there is much less of this in the American churches. Near the door were two excellent seats, each inscribed "Strangers' Pew." There has been no collection of money in any of the Boston churches which we have yet visited.

Educational Meeting.—In the evening, we accompanied two friends to Brighton, a village five miles from Boston, to hear Mr. Mann deliver an address to the people assembled in the church, on the improvement of their schools. We were introduced to a family in the village, who kindly invited us to partake of their evening meal; tea we should call it in England; they, I believe, name it supper. It consisted of tea, coffee, bread, butter, cold meat, preserves, squash pie, and cranberry tart. Before we commenced, our host said grace, in the course of which he introduced a petition for a blessing on Mr. Mann and his efforts to improve the schools of the people, and also on the "strangers who had crossed the mighty deep to communicate their stores of knowledge to the people of this land." The sentiments and language were equally beautiful, and there was no appearance of preparation or ostentation of literary attainments in the prayer. In passing the window of the house, I saw a young woman, apparently about sixteen, with a music-book in her hand, leading a little band of children and servants in singing their evening hymns. The church was well filled, and the people listened with profound interest to one of Mr. Mann's eloquent and excellent discourses, which equally instructed and delighted his hearers. We returned to Boston at 10 P. M.

This was an instance of the advantage attending the law of Massachusetts which makes Sunday terminate at sunset. The people were at leisure, and well dressed, and their minds had been awakened to serious considerations by the previous exercises of the day. They were, therefore, in the best condition for meeting together, and listening with advantage to such a discourse as was delivered to them. If any philanthropist had proposed such a benevolent act on the Sunday evening in Edinburgh, he would have been denounced as a Sabbath-breaker, if not fined by the police-magistrate. In Britain, we have an indescribable extent of lee-way to make up in the instruction of the people, and as they have no leisure day except Sunday, and many of them either go to no place of worship, or consider the forenoon and afternoon service sufficient for their spiritual edification, would it not be well to permit those who are inclined to receive secular instruction on the evening of that day, to obtain it, without offering any impediment to others assembling themselves together for religious worship?

Oct. 22. Thermometer 42°. Ships of War.—We visited a friend who resides at Charlestown, a village across the bay, and connected by a long bridge with Boston, and were introduced to Commodore Downes, the superintendent of the United States' Navy-Yard. He was polite and attentive, and showed us the rope-spinning machinery, which is said to be new, and the invention of a mechanic of the United States. It appeared, to an unskilled judgment, to be ingenious and to work well. The apparatus for tarring the ropes was also simple and efficient. The machinery untwists the yarn, when it dips it in the tar, and retwists it when it takes it out. The hull of a new frigate was nearly completed, and that of a new 74, to be named the "Vermont," was apparently finished. We saw large stores of "live oak," a tree found chiefly in Florida. Its specific gravity exceeds that of water, and it was sunk in the salt-water to prepare it for use. It is tough and enduring in an extraordinary degree, yet, when perforated by a ball, it breaks sharp off, without scattering splinters. The knees of a new sloop of war were lying blocked out of this timber, and were of great strength and thickness. The new ships are not planked in the inner surface; but the timbers are so close together for a considerable height above the keel, that the keel might be knocked off, and still the ship would not leak until the timbers were chafed through or broken. We visited also the Columbus, a three-decker, which lies at the wharf as a receiving-ship. I felt an involuntary horror in walking along the decks of this great ship, and contemplating her fearful batteries of 32 pounders, prepared for the destruction of human life. There are a strength, solidity, and adaptation about a ship of war, that constitute it truly the triumph of human power; but it is painful to reflect, that this magnificent display of mind is still devoted to the service of the most mischievous of our animal propensities—Destructiveness.

CHAPTER V.

Life Insurance.—In the course of conversation, it was mentioned to me that there is only one Life Insurance Company in Boston, one in

New York, and one very recently established in Philadelphia; but no other in the United States, so far as my informant knew. I asked the reason of this, seeing that these companies are very numerous and useful in Britain. One gentleman said, that early marriages, which greatly increase the chances of the parents living to rear their own children, and also the great facility with which children can provide for themselves in America, render the people less anxious about insuring their lives than they are in old countries where the circumstances are different. Another friend remarked that capital here is so productive, that many persons believe that they can do better for their families by employing it in trade, than by paying it in premiums to insurance offices; while a third hinted that there is also an impatience in the people for immediate returns, which renders them averse to an expenditure, however small, that is to yield its fruits only at a distant period, and after their own death; and finally, that suspicions have been entertained of the stability of insurance offices in this country.

Phrenology.—I continue to receive invitations to deliver single lectures, or short courses of three, four, or six lectures on phrenology, from various towns. Almost every village appears to have its lyceum, in which two or three lectures on a particular subject are delivered, and then the lecturer moves onward to another village, and is succeeded by another teacher. This scatters knowledge, but I fear to the winds, rather than upon the minds of the people. They generally offer me $25 for each lecture. As the progress of phrenology has been much impeded by its teachers giving only brief and unsatisfactory expositions of its doctrines, I am under the necessity of declining these invitations.

Popular Lectures.—I find that the same system of desultory lecturing prevails in Boston. Lectures are delivered almost every night in the week in one institution or another, which are attended by audiences numbering from five to fifteen hundred persons of both sexes; but entertainment and excitement, as much as instruction, are the objects of these discourses. In general, there is a new subject and a new lecturer every night; and three lectures on one topic are regarded as a very full exposition of it. The lecturers are men of talents and education in every profession of life, who desire to instruct the people or to render their own attainments known. The most distinguished divines, scientists, physicians, lawyers, and merchants appear before the people as lecturers. Among these, the Rev. Dr. W. E. Channing and Mr. John Quincy Adams, ex-president of the United States, may be named. These voluntary teachers generally lecture without fees: but if a minister, a lawyer, or a physician, have a large family and a small income, and also talents for public instruction, it is no disparagement to his reputation, but the contrary, if he prepare two or three lectures and receive fees for their delivery. He will deliver them first in each of the public institutions for popular lectures in Boston, then in Roxbury and Charlestown, suburbs of Boston; he will next visit Salem, Lowell, Worcester, and Providence, by rail-roads, and by the close of the season, will have realised three or four hundred dollars, without having seriously interrupted his professional pursuits. Some lecturers of high reputation receive forty or fifty dollars for each lecture in the large cities. The instruction conveyed by this method is comparatively small.

it it cultivates intellectual tastes among the people; and it binds the higher and lower minds together by reciprocation of sentiment. To one accustomed to contemplate the indifference with which many of the aristocracy of Britain regard the masses of their countrymen, this effect of democratic institutions is highly pleasing. In Britain, Lord Brougham and Sir G. S. Macenzie have delivered lectures to the people, but have never observed the names of other individuals of the same rank mentioned as having done so.

Oct. 23. Ther. 37°. Pictures.—We have seen some excellent pictures in private collections in Boston, by Allston, Stuart, and New-own. Allston's pictures are painted in the deep-shaded colours of the old Italian masters. He has produced both landscapes and figures. There appeared to me to be depth of mind in both, but in his landscapes there is a want of harmony in the colouring. We saw a large picture of Jeremiah dictating to an amanuensis the inspirations of the Holy Spirit. The eyes express the activity of the sentiment of the supernatural (the excitement of the organ of Wonder), but the figure is colossal and the attitude is firm and upright, expressive of the natural language of Firmness, Conscientiousness, and Self-esteem, as if he were about to defy a tyrant, rather than indite an inspired message. The eyebrows are horizontal, the forehead is calm, the muscles of the mouth express mental power, but without any peculiar character of emotion. With a slight change in the expression of the eyes, the picture might be called Cato addressing the Roman Senate, and the whole figure would be in harmony with the design. There is great talent, however, in the picture. There is power, depth, and also softness in the expression and colouring. The figure of the scribe is well executed.

Use of Phrenology to Artists.—Phrenology is calculated to be useful to artists in teaching them the principles and readier discrimination of natural language. Every faculty, when roused into predominant activity, stamps on the eyes and features a mental expression peculiar to itself, and it produces also peculiar attitudes of the body. When several faculties are strongly excited at the same time, the expression and attitude are of a mixed character, but the peculiar influence of each faculty is still clearly discernible. There is nothing arbitrary or contradictory in the results. Artists who do not know these expressions individually, are liable to misunderstand their combinations. The sentiment of Wonder, for instance, when strongly excited, rises into a feeling of the supernatural, and this is intended to be the predominant emotion in Jeremiah, in the picture now described. It is accordingly accurately portrayed in the eyes; but the forehead, and mouth, and attitude, do not express it; yet, in nature, they would have been modified into harmony with it. The eyebrows would have been arched upwards, the mouth would have been open, and the head raised gently upwards and to the side, in the direction of the organ of Wonder.

We saw a picture by Newton, of Don Quixote with Amadis de Gaul lying on the table beside him. It is a work of great merit. The figure is, of course, tall, gaunt and lean, and the countenance long and sharp. But the artist has given him a high and narrow forehead, surmounted by an enormous organ of wonder, and he has blended the whole expression of the attitude and face into harmony with this combination. The eyes are turned up in the direction of the organ of "Wonder," and innumerable wrinkles, caused by its activity, and expressive of its quality, furrow the brow.

October 24. Thermometer 44°.—Practical Phrenology.—There are great numbers of "practical phrenologists" in the United States, and there are several now in Boston, men who examine heads and predicate characters for fees, and who are pretty extensively consulted. This practice, which in the eyes of the uninitiated resembles palmistry and fortune-telling, is said to have created a strong feeling of disgust against Phrenology itself, in the minds of men of science and education. This is unquestionably an evil; but on the other hand I have found here a phalanx of very superior persons, belonging, most of them, to the learned professions, who are excellent phrenologists, so far as the philosophy of mind is implied in the study, but who are very little acquainted with that department of it which embraces the organs and their combinations in different relative proportions. They are theorists, while the former are altogether practical. The temperaments also are very little understood by my present audience.

The Temperaments.—We held a meeting in the lecture-room to-day, at ten o'clock, A. M., for the purpose of practical illustration. I exhibited four large drawings, representing respectively, the Nervous, Bilious, Sanguine and Lymphatic Temperaments, and described the effects of them on the general activity of the brain; and I added Dr. Thomas's theory of their formation as the best which has been offered. The persons who attended amounted to about sixty, three fifths of whom were gentlemen, and two-fifths ladies. I first requested the company to tell my own temperament and its effects. This they readily did. The gentlemen were next requested to come to the platform, one at a time, and the company pronounced an opinion on their temperaments. At first, there was considerable discrepancy in the views stated; and in these cases, the expression of opinion was allowed to proceed, until some one announced the temperament, or combination of temperaments, which appeared to me to be correct. Among ten of the gentlemen, six presented the combination of the nervous and bilious temperaments; two or three presented the nervous, sanguine, and bilious; and scarcely in one was any trace of the lymphatic to be found.

The correspondence between these combinations, and the great activity by which the New Englanders are distinguished, was readily recognised.

The ladies next stood up, six or seven at a time, and their temperaments were predicated by the company. The combinations were essentially the same as those in the gentlemen, with a slight infusion of the lymphatic temperament, which is generally found to some extent in the female sex, and which gives to their figures that roundness of form which is so essential an element in beauty. In them, also, the temperaments are less strongly marked than in men.

These exercises excited much interest, and afforded a good deal of amusement. They served to convey a conviction of the truth and practical importance of the doctrine of the temperaments, which no extent of mere reading could have produced. They afforded an opportunity, also, of showing the palpable absurdity of a statement which has made a great figure in the writings of the anti-phrenologists, namely, that the temperaments afford a back-door for escape when the phrenologist is pressed by a difficulty. I called their attention to the simple proposition, that in the same individual all the organs are under the influence of the same temperament, and that, therefore, the size of the organ determines their natural relative power. For instance: in one gentleman in whom the nervous temperament predominated, the observing organs were large, and those of reflection small; the high temperament rendered both sets of organs active, but the knowing organs were the more powerful, because they preponderated in size. In another, in whom the lymphatic temperament prevailed, the organs of Benevolence and Conscientiousness were large, and those of Veneration small. The low temperament rendered the whole brain inactive, but the feelings of Benevolence and Justice were more powerful than that of Veneration. The nervous temperament determines constitutional mental activity; the sanguine, constitutional mental and muscular activity combined; the bilious, constitutional capacity for sustained action; and the lymphatic, constitutional inactivity, both bodily and mental; but the temperaments afford no indication of the predominance of certain cerebral organs in the persons in whom they are found, which alone gives origin to distinctive natural mental qualities.

After practising for nearly an hour and a half, in discriminating the temperaments, almost every person present became capable of distinguishing them easily, and we proceeded to the examination of skulls and busts. I pointed out the method of distinguishing the relative proportions of the regions of the brain devoted to the animal propensities, to the moral sentiments, and to the intellectual faculties, and the company selected skulls and casts ad libitum, examined them, and pronounced an opinion on the relative dimensions of these parts. They were surprised at the extent of the differences, and at the facility with which they could be distinguished. These exercises continued till half-past twelve, and the interest never flagged.

Development of the brain in the inhabitants of Boston.—New England was peopled chiefly by individuals who left their native homes for the sake of enjoying religious liberty in their new abodes; and the cerebral organisation which such dispositions imply, appears to have descended to their posterity. In all countries which I have visited I have remarked that the female head, although less in size, is more fully developed in the region of the moral sentiments, in proportion to the other regions, than that of the male; and Boston presents no exception to the rule. Here the female head is in general beautifully developed in the moral and intellectual departments, and the natural language of the countenance is soft, affectionate, and rational. In the men, also, large moral and intellectual organs are very general; but Benevolence and Veneration are more frequently large than Conscientiousness. The cerebral organisation of this people, taking them all in all, appears really to have been enlarged in the moral and intellectual regions by long cultivation, added to the influence of a favourable stock.

On making this remark, however, to a friend, I was told that the persons who composed my class were the élite of the city, and above the average in attainments and talents. By going to a concert given by Madame Caradori Allen, to the theatre, to the courts of justice, to the churches, and other places of public resort, I became satisfied of the correctness of my friend's observation; but still I found a considerable predominance of the moral and intellectual regions, combined with the active temperaments already described, pervading the whole masses, and I consider this people naturally capable of rising to a high degree of civilisation.

Police of Boston.—The economy of the citizens of Boston is perceptible in the imperfect lighting of the town. The public lamps were not lighted this evening till the moon set; and as many of the streets are narrow, and the houses high, and the moon was only seven or eight days old, dark shadows obscured the way, and produced a melancholy gloom.

In the newspapers to-day, it is reported that yesterday evening, between 5 and 6 o'clock, a South Carolinian gentleman had some altercation with a gentleman of New York in the entry to this hotel (the Tremont House,) and fired a pistol at him. The ball missed, and the offender was immediately apprehended and carried to the Police Court. We were in the hotel at the time, and at six o'clock sat down to tea at the table of the "ladies' ordinary," yet we never heard a word of the occurrence! It is said that a ball was found on the floor, but apparently it had dropped out of the pistol, for there was no mark on the wall, or any appearance of its having struck any object when fired. The offender is reported to be insane. He was admitted to bail on a recognisance of $500, to take his trial at the next term of the Municipal Court, and for want of it, was committed.

The Voluntary Church.—On the 4th of August 1838, Lord Brougham is reported to have stated, in his place in parliament, that the Voluntary Church system has not answered in America. I have endeavoured, by inquiries made of persons whom I conceived likely to be well-informed, to discover what inconveniences have attended it. The following circumstances have been mentioned to me as evils. The congregations, it is said, are adopting the practice of engaging their ministers for only three, five, or seven years, and then turning them adrift, if they are not satisfied. In the villages, also, there are so many churches that some of them languish.

I asked, whether the congregations act capriciously in dismissing their pastor, at the end of the stipulated engagement; and have been told, that they do not intentionally act capriciously; but that as the minister with whose services they have dispensed is occasionally found to be highly acceptable to a different congregation, this charge is made against them with a show of reason by those who differ from them in opinion.

It appears to me that this system of change, if generally adopted, would be attended with advantages, especially in the present condition of clerical instruction. Within less than seven years, most clergymen have exhausted their whole stock of ideas in preaching and ministering to their people, and although they continue their labours for forty years longer, they do not communicate a new view. By changing pastors, fresh minds would be brought to operate on the flocks, and a greater degree of energy would pervade the service. If rotation in churches prevailed, no minister of talent and industry would lack employment; for the vacancy made by the removal of one would be supplied by the call of another to fill his place.

In regard to the multiplication of churches, I remarked, that one of Dr. Chalmers's arguments in favour of an Establishment is, that men have no appetite for religion, and that, if left to themselves, they will neither build churches, nor endow pastors, but prefer remaining in heathenism. Here, however, we are assured, that, under the Voluntary system, "church extension" goes on too rapidly, and that pastors and churches are more numerous than flocks!

One instance, however, was mentioned to me of a clergyman suffering annoyance from a fearless discharge of his duty. The Rev. John Pierpont, a Unitarian pastor, a man of great talent, and of the purest morals, has preached too strongly against intemperance, and taken too active a part in the temperance cause, to suit the taste of his congregation, a large proportion of whom are distillers and retailers of spirituous liquors. These have taken offence, and on a recent vote to decide whether his letter in explanation of his conduct was satisfactory or not, fifty-eight proprietors of pews voted "yea," and forty-four "nay." This vote is an approval by a majority, and he continues his ministerial functions. This case shows, however, that under the Voluntary system a minister is not necessarily the slave of his congregation, and that if instances to the contrary occur, the cause of them must be sought in the weakness of the individual who yields because he does not feel that self-sustaining power and independence which high endowments confer.

In answering my inquiries into their church affairs, some of my Boston friends asked me what objections were urged in Britain against the system of legal establishments for the support of religion. I mentioned a few: The established clergy in England and Scotland support unalterable articles of faith declared by ancient acts of parliament to be true interpretations of the will of God, and important to salvation: They expel from their livings every one of their own number who presumes to express doubts of the infallible truths of any of these doctrines: They invite their flocks to search the Scriptures, to try all things, and to hold fast that which is good; but if, in following this advice, the flocks chance to arrive at conclusions different from those sanctioned by act of parliament, they are charged with heresy, denied church privileges, and in private are stigmatised as "bad men." These articles and "Confessions of Faith," moreover, were framed at the very dawn of civilisation, when the arts and sciences, and the philosophy of the human mind, scarcely existed. Consequently some of the doctrines contained in them stand in direct contradiction to natural truth, while the entire scheme of theology which they propound is widely different from that which an extensive knowledge of mental and physical science applied to the interpretation of Scripture in the present day would probably dictate. The professors of these doctrines have the command of the parish schools, and of the universities, and to the extent of their ability they infuse their opinions into each generation as it comes on the stage: But mind cannot be arrested in its progress. Providence bestows on some individuals superior endowments of the moral and intellectual faculties, which lead their possessors into doubt on some points in spite of themselves. But those who are thus gifted have a choice only between two evils; either to renounce their livings and depart into the wilderness of voluntaryism, as outcasts from the fold of the faithful, or to practise hypocrisy. The latter is sometimes preferred, although not without inward struggles. Some of these individuals may be heard praying publicly against "a wicked spirit of unbelief," which is constantly besetting them, and which is probably nothing but the natural operation of their own superior faculties spontaneously suggesting truth, and quietly whispering that some of the dogmas they teach are erroneous. Other individuals, in whom secretiveness is large, and conscientiousness deficient, feel quite at home in the regions of hypocrisy, and enjoy their legal salaries undisturbed by inward visitations. Far from being the advocates of natural science and liberal education, many of the clergy oppose both, and insist that their peculiar articles of faith shall be combined with all public instruction at the expense of the state. They are placed in a false position, also, in relation to the enlightened portion of the laity, who while they ostensibly adhere to the parliamentary articles of faith, privately disbelieve them, and, in consequence, while they accord an outward homage to the church, never lose an opportunity to thwart the schemes and defeat the views of the clergy. Conventional hypocrisy, likewise, is the refuge of the philosophers under the dominion of an established church. There is a tacit convention of mutual forbearance between them and the clergy: The clergy make no inquiry into their orthodoxy, and, in return, they leave the clergy to guide the masses in their own paths. The general effect of the system is to chain up the intellect, and paralyse the moral sentiments of the best minds in the highest department of human thought—theological and moral science.

It is objected also to legal establishments for the support of religion, that their natural tendency is to render the clergy indolent and negligent. The churches of England and Ireland present numerous examples of clergymen, who, although enjoying rich endowments, are never seen by their flocks. Indifference in the pastors is the parent of indifference and formality in the people. The "pride, pomp, and circumstance" of a state-establishment produce supercilious feelings in the favoured clergy towards the pastors of all other sects; and the possession of legal power incites them to outrage the rights of conscience, by levying taxes from dissenters for the support of opinions which they disavow.

In the foregoing remarks on the voluntary and the legal systems, the abuses or worst features of both are stated and compared; while in the discussions which generally take place on these topics, all that is good in the one is contrasted with all that is bad in the other, a very unfair mode of treating the merits of either. There is much of good found in both. In point of fact, an able and conscientious minister in the voluntary church, unless in very peculiar circumstances, like those of Mr. Pierpont, soon rivets himself in the esteem and affections of his people, and is cherished by them for life; while a clergyman of the same character in the established church is equally beloved and respected by his flock. Good, able, and active men are safe and independent in both, in so far as mere emolument is concerned; but the establishment is a paradise, while the voluntary church is a howling wilderness, for incapacity, indolence, folly, dishonesty, and the minor vices. The chief difference in the case of good and able men is, that, under the voluntary system, an individual of superior piety, talents, and attainments has it in his power to carry forward his flock to higher and purer views of Christianity, in proportion as these open up to his own mind (and he often does so in the United States;) while his equal in the established church is tied down by the parliamentary articles of belief; he is the slave of them, and of his weaker brethren, who are ever ready to defend the bulwarks of ignorance and indolence under the guise of maintaining the purity of the faith, and to enforce the law of expulsion against any more gifted member, who would venture to remove one stone of the legal edifice. In America, as I formerly mentioned, the statute law of a state is occasionally revised; obsolete and repealed acts are omitted; altered statutes are remodeled into a connected and consistent form, and the whole laws are brought to harmonise, as much as possible, with the existing condition of the people: but the principles of infallibility and immutability are inherent in the nature of an established church. The state of human knowledge may change; opinion may change; political institutions may change; and generation may give way to generation, but the articles of faith, ratified and approved of by act of parliament, never vary!

Oct. 26. Thermometer 38½°. National Skulls.—To-day I visited Dr. Warren's collection of skulls in the medical college. It is large and valuable, embracing many specimens of crania of different nations; and these I found to correspond in their general forms and dimensions with the skulls of the same nations in the phrenological collection of Edinburgh. Dr. Warren showed me three skulls of an extinct people, picked up in the valley of the Mississippi. They strikingly resemble the Chinese skulls in the Edinburgh collection. The Rev. Dr. J. D. Lang, who has investigated the subject, considers it clear that America was peopled from the South Sea Islands; while Dr. Morton regards the native American Indians as a distinct family of the human race, not referrible for their origin to any of the commonly acknowledged varieties. If numerous ancient skulls resembling these three should ultimately be found, they would strongly corroborate Dr. Lang's opinion; but the skulls of the existing tribes favour Dr. Morton's views.

Dr. Warren possesses also several casts of skulls said to belong to a race of ancient Peruvians who preceded the present Inca family. They are exceedingly narrow and depressed in the forehead, and extend to an extraordinary length backward from the ear. In strange discord with this organisation, we are told that this people manifested high intellectual qualities; that they were civilised, powerful, and the authors of magnificent architectural works, the ruins of which still attest their greatness. The question has often been asked how phrenologists reconcile these facts with their doctrines. At present we can give no answer on the facts as stated, except that we doubt their accuracy. Great ruins, and some extraordinary skulls have been found in the same locality, and it has been assumed that these skulls, of which few have reached us, are fair average specimens of the crania of the builders of these works; and it is thence argued that phrenology cannot be true. The number of skulls hitherto exhibited, however, is so small, that it may be quite possible that they are abnormal specimens selected as curiosities on account of their odd appearance; and even if such skulls abound, how can we be certain that any of them belonged to the men who planned and superintended the execution of the works? An inferior and enslaved race may have laboured under the direction of powerful minds.

It is a rule equally sound in philosophy as in law, that we should always obtain the best evidence possible of facts, before we form our judgment on the inferences to be deduced from them.

On the one hand, then, we find that in all countries hitherto explored, a living head of which the circumference, taken a little higher than the orbit, does not exceed thirteen inches, while the distance from the top of the nose backwards, over the top of the head to the occipital bone, is less than nine inches, is, in the existing races of mankind, invariably accompanied by idiocy; that the skulls of the ancient Egyptians discovered in their tombs amidst the proud monuments of their greatness, belong to the Caucasian variety of mankind, and exhibit the same development of the intellectual organs which is found in the civilised Europeans of the present age who rival them in art; that in the ancient Greeks and Romans, whose histories are authentic, and whose busts and statues remain, intellectual greatness was concomitant with large dimensions in the forehead; that in modern Europeans the same concomitance is still observable; that the existing races of native American Indians show skulls inferior in their moral and intellectual development to those of the Anglo-Saxon race, and that, morally and intellectually, these Indians are inferior to their Anglo-Saxon invaders, and have receded before them. These facts are tangible and authentic, they all harmonise, and go to support one conclusion, namely, that diminutive size in the anterior lobe of the brain is concomitant with feeble, and large size with great intellectual powers.

If we place this evidence on the one hand, and the alleged facts concerning the ancient Peruvians on the other, only one of two conclusions can be logically adopted—either that the latter facts are erroneously or imperfectly observed; or that, in the case of the ancient Peruvians, nature has not followed the same law which she has adhered to in all other instances in which her operations have been most rigidly scrutinised. In the present state of our knowledge, I embrace the former opinion. The real value of the evidence afforded by these ancient Peruvian skulls will be best estimated by supposing the phrenological proposition of size being a measure of power, to be reversed, and that we had, on the strength of these skulls, maintained that deficiency in the anterior lobe is the cause and sign of mental superiority. How triumphantly would our opponents have cited existing facts in refutation of our theory, and pitied us for our imbecility in building our doctrines on such a defective basis!

One observation, however it is important to keep in view, namely, that if these skulls have been artificially compressed, it may be possible that the intellectual organs existed in medium size in the brain, and were only displaced; just as the spine exists and performs its functions in persons afflicted with curvature, although part of it is out of its usual line. But this point cannot be determined without inspecting brains.

Oct. 27. Thermometer 41°. Servants in New England.—An American tourist relates the story of a domestic servant, who rose to be colonel of a militia regiment, and in this capacity entertained his own master as a guest at a public dinner given by the regiment. I have heard the tourist blamed for publishing this anecdote, as the parties are still alive, but am assured that it is perfectly authentic, and that the servant, after entertaining, in his capacity of colonel, his master and other gentlemen at table, descended to his station without having felt either elated or depressed, honoured or degraded. He knew that such things result from the constitution of his country. Much has been said against the character of servants in the United States. We already perceive that a large proportion of the domestic "helps," as they are called, are Irish, or negroes; the number of Anglo-Americans employed in this capacity is small. So far as we can discover, there are several reasons for this fact. Service is not esteemed honourable among the Americans, and it is ill paid. The young women engaged at the cotton-mills in Lowell earn larger wages, after paying for their board and lodging, than the female domestic servants of Boston. They prefer also working for twelve hours, and then being free from all restraint during the other twelve hours and on Sundays, to undergoing that constant superintendence which is inevitable in family service. But there are instances of American servants, both male and female, remaining in the same family for thirty or forty years, and making excellent "helps." They must be well paid, and treated with consideration. If a master or mistress be selfish, unreasonable, and unmannerly, their domestics refuse to bear with their humours and leave them.

Future prospects of the United States.—It has been my object, in meeting men of enlarged knowledge, experience, and understanding, to discover the views entertained by them regarding the prospects of the United States. It is only by hearing and comparing opinions, and the reasons of them, that a stranger can obtain elements for forming judgments of his own on a country which he visits. I am informed, then, that the political changes in England are studied here with great interest, and that the intimate connection between the prosperity of the two countries is well understood by all classes of the people of New England. The late conflicts between the dissenters and the established church in Britain, have attracted attention. One highly intelligent friend expressed his expectation that the Church of England would fall in five years: I allowed fifty years for the accomplishment of his hopes. The opinion is pretty general that the future seat of government of the United States must be in the west, and that the future destinies of the Union will depend on the degree in which moral and intellectual shall keep pace with physical development. The facilities of realising wealth in the countries watered by the Ohio and Mississippi are so great, that there is danger that a sordid spirit of money-getting may take possession of the people to such an extent as to render wealth the sole criterion of consideration, to the neglect of mental culture; and in such an event, that inequality of fortune with which England is afflicted, would arise, and a depressed common people would be called into existence. If this were to be the case, and if these degraded beings were left in possession of political power (which could not be prevented), intestine commotions, quarrels between the states, disunion, and ruin, would be the probable fate of America. The best minds have confidence in the natural harmony between the interests of all the states, when justice pervades the councils of all; and also reliance on the power of their republican institutions, if aided by education, to preserve the mass of the people in virtue and comfortable circumstances, if they can only succeed in making instruction keep pace with wealth and numbers. Even the rich men here speak with approbation of the law which distributes the paternal property equally among the children. They say that it presents a powerful obstacle to the overgrowth of families, and that they do not know any family that has continued in possession of extraordinary wealth for three generations. The very principle of division reduces the largest fortunes when twenty or thirty grandchildren come to inherit them. The same law renders it more easy for men of superior moral and intellectual qualities to emerge from poverty to wealth. Several such have been pointed out to me, who, having distinguished themselves by their virtues and talents, have married daughters of rich families, and eventually risen to the first stations in the commonwealth. Several clergymen are in excellent circumstances by this means. In Britain, the parents of these young ladies would have watched for the hand of some younger son of a noble or aristocratic family, whose poverty needed their fortunes, and who gave them rank in exchange for wealth. In America, nature's nobility is preferred, and amidst the trials and vicissitudes of life, high mental qualities are found a surer stay for happiness than artificial rank. The prospects of the family also are superior. Natural gifts, if possessed by both parents, descend to posterity; artificial rank vanishes in descendants, and leaves no substitute in its place.

Aristocracy in America and England.—It has frequently been stated as a charge against the Americans, that they recognise no aristocracy except that of wealth. I find that here, as well as in other countries, men possessed of great wealth, and those who have a strong desire for it, without being able to boast of any superior moral or intellectual qualities or attainments, estimate their neighbours by the extent of their possessions; and they assure me that this is the only criterion of superiority acknowledged by society—that dollars are indispensable to the acquisition of influence or consideration. But, on the other hand, I perceive that those individuals who are endowed with high moral and intellectual faculties, extensively cultivated, estimate their fellow-citizens by the degree in which they possess these attributes, and some men are spoken of with the highest love and admiration, whose greatness is mental, and not pecuniary. Mr. Daniel Webster, the greatest political character of Massachusetts, is not rich.

British travellers who blame the Americans for worshipping an aristocracy of wealth, appear to me to forget the practice at home. In Britain all the aristocracy who are worshipped by the inferior ranks are rich, most of them very rich; and to the best of my observation, when a noble family has sunk into poverty, the members of it receive less respect from their own rank, and certainly far less homage from their inferiors, than are offered to those whose possessions are large. In regard to the untitled aristocracy of Britain, their station and influence depend almost entirely on their wealth. When they become poor, they sink at once into obscurity. Thomas Moore, the poet, a man of genius, and of great refinement of taste and manners, who has associated much with the aristocracy of England, observes (if I recollect rightly), in his Life of Sheridan, that the possession of political power alone forms a passport to men of plebeian birth into the ranks of the high aristocracy, on a footing of equality; and that, although men of talent in other departments of life may be admitted to associate among them, they are never permitted to become as one of them, or words to this effect. When I read this observation many years ago, I considered the fact to be degrading to genius and virtue, and whatever faults may be chargeable against the Americans in this respect, I cannot perceive that we have much reason to boast of superiority at home.

Elections.—So far as I can learn, candidates for offices in the state do not travel from door to door and canvass for votes in Massachusetts, as I have seen them do in Scotland. They are here on the eve of an annual election, and ward meetings have been called by each of the political parties in the city; these choose delegates to represent them, and the delegates from all the wards assemble and prepare a list of candidates to be proposed to their party, as proper persons to fill the vacant offices. These lists are named "tickets." The whig ticket and the democratic ticket are announced in the newspapers of the respective parties, and the one is supported and the other depreciated, by all the facts, arguments, and wit, and I fear also by all the inventions, falsehoods, and calumnies, which the talents and industry of each party can bring to bear on the merits of their own candidates, and the demerits of those on the other side. We may regret the departures from truth, courtesy, and honour, which these contests often evoke in the public press, but all who have mingled in public life must be well aware that similar practices disgrace the press of Britain in no limited degree. The voters are registered, and the city and counties are divided into districts of convenient dimensions, in each of which a polling place is fixed and publicly announced. The voters repair to these stations on the day of election; each announces his name to the officer in charge of the register; if it is found there, the voter passes to the ballot box, in which he deposits his printed list or "ticket," and retires. Numerous partisans of each side attend, who check any attempts at voting under false names. No man can vote twice, because he is checked off in the register when he first appears. The "ticket" is not subscribed by the voter, because this would betray the secret of his vote; but his hand is pretty strictly looked at to see that he does not deposit two or more "tickets" in the box. At the close of the election, the tickets are examined, and a statement of the votes made up by officers appointed for the purpose, and those candidates are chosen who have a majority of all the voters in their favour. If an individual voter is not satisfied with the "ticket" of his party, he may erase any names from it he pleases, and add others. As there is generally no concert among those who make these alterations, they very rarely elect their own candidates. The only effect of their proceeding is to weaken the vote of their party. These votes are regarded as thrown away, and technically are said to be "scattered." Occasionally there are three or more "tickets," each containing a different list of candidates; and if each of these lists is presented in nearly equal numbers, the result will be no election. Each list will be supported by only one third or less of the voters; and as by law a majority of the whole is essential to an election, none of the candidates will be elected. A new election on a future day is in these cases announced. I am assured that "intimidation" of voters in the English sense of the word is unknown, and would, if attempted, be deeply resented and successfully resisted. The vote of every man is known to his party, and although every individual has it in his power to conceal it, few or none have any desire to do so. There is no commotion or hostile excitement at the elections.

October 28. Thermometer 44°. The Sailors' Church.—This day I went to hear the Rev. Mr.

Taylor of the Sailors' Church preach. He had a numerous audience of sailors of various nations, and also a portion of the ordinary citizens of Boston. The seamen occupy the pews in the middle of the area of the church, which are all free. The citizens occupy the side pews. His text was in Romans x. 1, "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved." His temperament is bilious-nervous; the anterior lobe of his brain is long and high, but not broad. Eventuality, Comparison, and Causality, are large. Benevolence, Imitation, and Firmness, are large. He was a seaman himself, and has not received a regular theological education; but there is genius in him. He is a bold, upright, shrewd, and sensible man; indefatigable in exertion, and generally beloved. He produces a powerful impression in preaching, by his originality, good sense, earnestness, and eloquence. His oratory is of a peculiar character; it is full of imagery of the boldest description, drawn chiefly from nautical affairs; and it makes a deep impression on the sailors. They sat with ears, eyes, and mouths open, as if spell-bound, in listening to him. I wrote down the following passages of his discourse from memory immediately on going home. They are inferior to the originals, but are not caricatured, or intentionally coloured in any respect. He described "a ship at sea, bound for the Port of Heaven, when the man at the lead sung out 'rocks a head.' 'Port the helm,' cried the mate. 'Aye, aye, sir,' was the answer; the ship obeyed and stood upon a tack. But in two minutes more the lead indicated a shoal. The man on the look-out sung out 'Sand-banks and breakers a head.' The captain was now called and the mate gave his opinion, but, sail where they could, the lead and the eye showed nothing but dangers all round; sand-banks, coral reef, sunken rocks, and dangerous coasts. The chart showed them clearly enough where the Port of Heaven lay; there was no doubt about its latitude and longitude; but they all sung out that it was impossible to reach it: there was no fair way to get to it. My friends, it was the devil who blew up that sand-bank, and sunk these rocks, and set the coral insects to work; his object was to prevent that ship from ever getting to heaven, to wreck it on its way, and to make prize of the whole crew for slaves for ever. But just as every soul was seized with consternation, and almost in despair, a tight little schooner hove in sight; she was cruising about with one Jesus, a pilot, on board. The captain hailed him, and he answered that he knew a fair way to the port in question. He pointed out to them an opening in the rocks, which the largest ship might beat through, with a channel so deep that the lead could never reach the bottom, and the passage was land-locked the whole way, so that the wind might veer round to every point in the compass, and blow hurricanes from them all, and yet it could never raise a dangerous sea in that channel! What did the crew of that distressed ship do, when Jesus showed them his chart, and gave them all the bearings? They laughed at him, and threw his chart back in his face. 'He find a channel, where they could not! Impossible!'—and on they sailed in their own course; and every soul of them perished!" He told them that when men offer wholesome advice to others, and try to save them from their sins, they are constantly maltreated for their pains. "This same Paul (who wrote the Epistle to the Romans)," said he, "found the people of Ephesus worshipping a piece of silver which they called the goddess Diana, and he told them that it was a mere graven image. What did they do? Why, there was among them a fellow named Demetrius, whose trade was to make shrines for that image, and he said to Paul, 'Paul you shall hold your tongue. We know well enough that Diana is a great goddess, and if you don't go about your own business, we will do for you.' Paul said, that 'he did not care; he would tell them the truth, as it was his duty to do, and they might do as they pleased.' They soon showed him what they would do. They mobbed him! and if he had stayed much longer within their reach, they would have lynched him. This is always the way men act towards those who would turn them from their sins."

Popular Lectures.—There is no class of idle men in the United States, and I am assured that there is scarcely an example in Boston, of one individual in possession of wealth who is idle. The men who have realised an independence, either continue in trade or devote themselves to public business. It is calculated that six thousand persons attend lectures in Boston every winter, and, as formerly mentioned, men of talent of all ranks and professions appear before the people as lecturers. The subscription for a gentleman and two ladies to a lecture once a week, from October to April, delivered at the Odeon, formerly the theatre, under the patronage of the directors of the lyceum, is $2; and generally 1500 persons attend. The Franklin Society gives a lecture once a week during the winter season, and the subscription is half a dollar each person for the whole. Dr. W. E. Channing gives the first lecture this season for this society, and I have agreed to deliver the second. Mr. J. S. Buckingham has promised the third. In Salem, a town of 16,000 inhabitants, about 13 miles from Boston, there are 1200 subscribers to the lyceum lectures at $2 each for the season. Mr. Catlin lectures to them this week on his Indian Gallery. His audience is so large, that he repeats each lecture; the lecture-room being capable of accommodating only one half of them at a time.

October 29.—Thermometer 32°.—Temperance.—The License-law.—The Temperance question is keenly debated here at present, and already it has assumed a political form. The staunch opponents of the license-law refuse to vote for any representative to the legislature, unless he pledge himself to endeavour to get that law repealed. There are many of these among the Whig party. The friends of temperance do not, in general, carry their principles so far. They do not all refuse to vote for a representative although hostile to the law, if he be, in other respects, well qualified for his duties as a legislator. This has made a split in the ranks of both of the political parties. There are Whig license-law men, and anti-license law men, and the same among the Democrats. Public meetings are held almost every evening in the churches, at which the merits of the license-law, and whole question of temperance, are debated with great energy and talent, before large audiences. Each party is heard in turn, and perfect order is preserved.

October 30. Thermometer 30°.—Phrenology.—This morning at ten o'clock, I met my class, and gave them practical instructions in observing the relative size of the organs in busts and skulls. Several busts and skulls having the organs marked were presented to them. They formed themselves into parties of three or four, and took a skull or bust from the collection, examined each organ in succession, and wrote down their opinions of its size. These were revised by me, and corrected, if they appeared to be erroneous. About seventy individuals attended, and engaged in this exercise, and after attentive observation, accompanied by a real desire to discern, they were gratified to find that it is quite possible to distinguish, not only the situation of the organs, but the relative dimensions of many of them, on ordinary skulls. In the few introductory remarks which I made, I reminded them that they find no difficulty in distinguishing between a comma and a period; between the point and the head of a pin, and between the eye and the solid part of a needle, and that the superficies of the smallest phrenological organ in an ordinary head, is equal to that of at least five hundred of these minute objects. I also presented to them several casts of the heads of idiots, requested them to measure them, and remarked, that in the lowest class of idiots, in whom the intellectual manifestations are nil, the horizontal circumference, taken a little higher than the orbit, varies from 11 to 13 inches, while the distance from the root of the nose backwards, over the top of the head, to the occipital spine, is only between 8 and 9 inches. Finally, I instructed them how to distinguish the size of the regions of the animal propensities, of the moral sentiments, and of the intellect, and presented casts of the heads of virtuous men, which they contrasted according to these rules, with those of executed criminals. The practising lasted for three hours, and was conducted with much interest by the class.

If Phrenology be a delusion, as some men are still pleased to maintain it to be, it must be a strange one; for we afford our opponents the best means of refuting us, by publicly teaching them our art of observation, by furnishing them with hundreds of specimens, and bringing them into contact with Nature herself! On the 16th of February, 1838, the Rev. James Walker, D. D., delivered a lecture on Phrenology, before the Boston Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, in which he brought forward many objections against it, and in which, as I am informed, he uttered a whole series of mistakes. But this gentleman did not avail himself of this opportunity of learning how to refute it in the best manner, by a direct appeal to facts. He has since been elected Professor of Moral Philosophy in the Harvard University at Cambridge.

Oct. 31. Thermometer 34°.—The Supreme Court.—It snowed all this morning, but the snow melted as it fell. I attended in the United States' Supreme Court, Judge Story on the bench, to hear Mr. Webster address a jury in a case of marine insurance, but he and the other counsel were engaged all day in examining witnesses and discussing points of law. Neither the judge nor counsel wear gowns, wigs, or any other insignia of office; yet they are treated with as much respect as if they were clothed in horse-hair and ermine. The same individuals act both as solicitors and as barristers; but when a man shows distinguished talents for the department of pleading, he generally assumes a partner, who devotes himself to the proper business of a solicitor. Mr. Webster, for instance, practises in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, at Washington, as a senior counsel does at the Scottish Bar in Edinburgh, and in the House of Lords in London, as a court of appeal. Here the witnesses are allowed to remain in court, and to listen not only to the pleadings of the counsel, but to the examination of the other witnesses, and even to discussions between the counsel and the bench as to the competency of putting certain questions to themselves. For cause shown, the judge will remove them from the court, if required by either party to do so; but the general practice is to allow them to hear all the proceedings. In Scotland, witnesses are provided with a separate room, in which they remain till called for to undergo examination themselves, that each may be unbiassed by any thing that may have occurred in court. Another object of isolating them is, to prevent collusion among them. As no one has heard what the others have said, each gives his independent testimony, and if they concur, the conviction of the truth of their statements becomes the stronger. If they differ widely, the court and the counsel, who have heard all that has been testified, enjoy advantages for testing their veracity by putting searching questions. I saw a ludicrous example of the effect of allowing witnesses to be present in court before they are themselves examined. An Irish sailor was called up, who had listened attentively to the opening speeches of the counsel, and to the examination of several witnesses on the opposite side. He had construed every word that had been uttered, both in the speeches and in the evidence, as so many attacks against his side, and he set himself fairly to the duty of answering them. When placed in the witnesses' box and sworn, and asked a question, he did not answer it directly, but launched out into bold declarations that such a statement, made by such a witness, was false, and that another had uttered a misrepresentation, and then began to tell his own story, and to enforce his own views of the facts by declamation. The counsel of both sides interrupted him, and the judge explained his duty; but after the next question that was put to him, he started off again in the same career. He had a rich Irish brogue, and great volubility of speech, and withal was acute and naïf. He convulsed the spectators with laughter, and at length fairly upset the gravity of lawyers, judge, and every one in court. Judge Story did his best to recover his gravity, and addressed first the spectators, informing them that there was a native eccentricity about the Irish in expressing their ideas, which every one was aware of, and that it was unbecoming to disturb a court of justice by laughing at the witness's mode of delivering his testimony, and then he explained to the witness himself, that his duty was to confine himself to direct answers to the questions asked. Another attempt was made to proceed with his examination, but still with imperfect success. At length a discussion arose about the competency of some question. I heard Mr. Webster state his views, but as the court was excessively crowded, highly heated with stoves, and destitute of ventilation, I was forced, by the unpleasant state of the atmosphere, to retire before the examination was resumed. Mr. Webster's mind is profound and powerful, and a great subject is necessary to rouse him to show his might. The discussions in the present cause were not of this description.

November 1. Therm. 24°. The Weather.—Winter has now fairly commenced, but we are assured that it is six weeks earlier than usual, and that we may still enjoy what is called the Indian summer, or calm, mild, dry weather, in which the sun shines without clouds the whole day, but in which a gentle haze pervades the sky, from the very stillness of the atmosphere. This is said to be the most delicious season of the year in the United States.

Boston Common Schools.—I visited several of the common schools to-day. In the Appendix to this volume, and the preceding chapters, I have explained the educational machinery of this commonwealth. Its plan and general structure are excellent; but it is capable of much improvement. Its present condition, compared with that which it is susceptible of attaining, is like that of a wooden clock contrasted with a chronometer. The schools are supported by assessment, and are free to every white child who chooses to attend. The coloured children are educated separately. The school-houses consist of several floors. The head-master, who superintends the whole, receives a salary of $1500 per annum; there is a male assistant for each floor, who receives $600 per annum; and a female assistant, who receives $250. The children between four and seven years of age, form the lowest class, and they are taught by a female. Wilderspin's system of infant education is not practised, and the instructions given to these children is chiefly in spelling, reading, and reciting. At seven, the child is admitted to a higher class, where grammar, a little geography, writing, and arithmetic, are taught. Singing has been recently introduced, and with much advantage. It relieves the monotony of the other studies, affords gratification to the children, and serves to cultivate a taste for refined and innocent pleasure. In one school, the children were requested to sing and to select their own song. They chose "I love my native land," and sang it with great zest, and good execution. The sentiments savoured a good deal of Self-Esteem, like the patriotic songs of old England. I was glad to observe, however, sentiments of Benevolence and Justice towards other nations introduced into the last verse.

Mrs. Minot, a lady of Boston, distinguished for her enlightened zeal in education, is endeavouring to introduce drawing into these schools. She attends an hour a week in one of them, and gives lessons in drawing to the children. They are delighted with the exercise, and it is to be hoped that her success will induce the committees who manage these seminaries to make it a part of the general system of instruction.

There is also an English High School, in which grammar, history, book-keeping, and the elements of some of the physical sciences, are taught, and a Latin Grammar School, which, in 1836, was attended by 250 scholars. These schools are also free.

Many of the school-rooms are deficient in ventilation, the consequences of which are headache, loss of appetite, and irritability in such of the teachers as do not enjoy exceedingly robust constitutions; and drowsiness in the children, in the latter portion of each meeting, when the air is particularly foul. In the morning, when the children come fresh to school, they look healthy, cheerful, and well dressed; but "words" form the staple of the instruction, to the too great neglect of objects. Improvement in the things taught, as well as in the modes of teaching, advances slowly, not through want of good intention in the members of the school committees, but from attachment to old customs, and lack of knowledge of better modes than those now existing.

The power of the people exceeds their educational attainments.—The institutions and actual condition of the people of the United States exhibit at present a heterogeneous aspect to a reflecting mind. The institutions are democratic in a high degree, for, with a few exceptions, political power is placed in the hands of every man above twenty-one years of age, except he be absolutely insane, a pauper or a convicted felon, without regard to his wealth, character, or mental attainments. This is not merely a theoretical arrangement on paper, but a practically working system. In point of fact, the masses make and unmake the laws, and every interest of the state is placed at their discretion. One ignorant man is not a fit ruler for a great nation; nor are ten ignorant men, or a thousand, or ten millions of ignorant men, more fit to wield successfully the destinies of a great people than one. Numbers do not increase their knowledge, while they add to their confidence and power. Moreover, numbers increase their capacity for evil, and diminish it for good, because they keep each other's ignorance and presumption in countenance. The people become formidable, also, in the fierceness and energy of their passions, in proportion to their numbers, when one common impulse moves them.

These points are so plain, that it is almost unnecessary to state them. Nevertheless, I daily meet with excellent persons here, who seem not to perceive their consequences. Education, history, and habit, and, above all, the daily example of Europe, have filled their minds with the idea of a labouring-class, for whom instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, with moral and religious training, are all that is necessary, and a dominant class whose education should be more extensive, to fit them for higher duties; overlooking the palpable fact, that in Europe the better educated class rules the less instructed, while in the United States the more ignorant governs the more enlightened.

I have seen men of sense and understanding here regard my views as obviously Utopian and absurd, when I ventured to express the opinion that both the quantity and quality of instruction communicated in the common schools of the United States, and even in Boston, is fitted much more for a government like that of Austria, than for that of the United States! The Austrian government does not object to its subjects being taught reading, writing, arithmetic and geography, because these are only the elements of knowledge, and do not necessarily imply any practical results in action.

The democratic institutions of the United States are only now beginning to develop themselves. The generation of 1775 was trained under a monarchy, and they had the feelings and habits of Englishmen. When their independence was achieved, their mental condition was not instantly changed. Their deference for rank and for judicial and legislative authority, continued nearly unimpaired; George Washington took the place of George the Third, and the public authorities elected by themselves, came as objects of respect, in place of those named by the English governors. The leading men of each state suggested or proposed candidates for public offices, and the people, as a general rule, adopted them. In this state of things the best educated class continued to rule. But the condition of affairs is now changed. The generation trained to obedience under monarchical institutions is extinct; a race occupies the field which has been reared under the full influence of democracy. The people worship themselves, as the fountains equally of wisdom and of power. They bend all institutions in subservience to their views and feelings. They are no longer led by, but they often dictate to, the wealthy and highly educated. Their own education, however, remains essentially unchanged; reading, writing, and arithmetic are its staple, as in the days of yore!

This is an error of the most portentous magnitude, and it is astonishing how so many persons remain blind to it. There are still living a few remnants of the old federalists, who desire to see the people happy and contented as labourers, but who are as averse to their thorough education as an English Tory would be in similar circumstances. These worthy men forget that their dreams of popular felicity combined with ignorance can never be realised in this country, for the people have obtained power, and they love to wield it. The education provided for them, therefore, in their common schools, should be the most instructive and practical that human wisdom can devise; for here the masses need every possible light to enable them to discern their true interests in the management of the state. Their governors and legislators are their deputies, and must obey them. Men of great minds may no doubt lead the masses, although ignorant, to good; but in proportion to that ignorance is the risk that bad men of powerful talents will lead them to evil.

It is gratifying, however, to perceive that a large number of enlightened individuals are deeply imbued with these convictions, and are labouring to render them general. Still they have a mighty task to accomplish, before they prevail in reducing them to practice. It is an unpalatable statement to thousands in Boston, that their common schools are far below what their institutions require, and that in many parts of the country the condition of the seminaries is still more defective; but the truth, however disagreeable, must be proclaimed.

Tremont Theatre.—We went to the theatre in the evening, to attend Mr. J. Wallack's benefit. The house is large in proportion to the population of Boston. It is elegant and convenient in form, quite modern, and handsomely fitted up. The pit is occupied entirely by males; the ladies resort exclusively to the boxes. The house was filled and the acting good. The theatre is not successful here. The law prohibits performances on the Saturday evenings; and between lectures and churches, the public are provided with cheap excitement on the other days of the week, so that with many the inducement to attend the theatre is much diminished. Religious scruples also prevent many persons from frequenting it. Mr. J. S. Buckingham has been lecturing on Palestine and Egypt in Boston, to an audience said to amount to 800. I see, however, that the newspapers report the attendance at my own lectures to be at least double the truth, and probably his numbers also are exaggerated; but I hear that his audience is large, and that his lectures have excited much interest.

Nov. 3. Therm. 38°.—Charlestown Lunatic Asylum.—To-day I visited this asylum, which is under the superintendence of Dr. Luther V. Bell. The situation, on a gentle eminence, with a fine open prospect, is excellent. The ventilation is perfect. There are apertures above the doors of the patients' rooms, and also ventilating chimneys for each room. The order and cleanliness could not be surpassed, but there appeared to me to be too little provision for labour in the open air. I examined the heads of some of the patients. In several who laboured under disease to other objects more congenial to his enterprising and martial feelings. Long was by nature a soldier, and had always sighed after a proper field for the indulgence of his military spirit.

From the disastrous overthrow of the Patriot army at the battle of Medina in 1813, the revolutionary spirit in Texas had pretty well subsided. The insurgents seemed effectually quelled, and but for the valour of Anglo-Americans, they would have long groaned under the yoke of Spanish cruelty and despotism. The reign of tyranny, however, was not permitted to continue undisturbed. The citizens of Natchez, with a noble enthusiasm, resolved to make one more effort in behalf of the liberties of that oppressed and bleeding province. A meeting was accordingly held by the inhabitants of that place, and arrangements entered into for an immediate and vigorous assault upon the country. General Adair, of Kentucky, was to have been the leader of the expedition; but from some cause unknown to us, he declined the proffered honour, and the command was tendered to General Long, who, nothing intimidated by the misfortunes of his gallant predecessors, who had figured so heroically but unavailingly in the cause of Texan independence, accepted the responsibility with pride and pleasure, and entered at once upon the duties of the station with his characteristic energy and enthusiasm. His activity and zeal, as well as his acknowledged military talents, soon rendered the project quite popular. He pledged the whole of his private fortune in the enterprise; in which he was joined by some of the choicest spirits of the day. With the best wishes for his welfare, he left Natchez with about seventy-five of the most hardy and intrepid followers, on the 17th of June, 1819. As he pushed from the shore, a shot from the cannon was fired to his success. It was evident, however, that an expedition so publicly gotten up and openly conducted, could not be permitted to pass off without the notice of the government. Attempts were accordingly made by the proper authorities to arrest the leader; but the officers not being over active and vigilant, their efforts were easily eluded, and General Long moved off in triumph with his Spartan band, awakening the spirit of war in his march, and gathering strength as he moved along. He pushed for Natchitoches, where he had means of his own, and many friends; thence to the Sabine and on to Nacogdoches, where in a short time after his arrival he was able to muster about three hundred strong.

It is certainly a matter of much regret that there are so few objects upon which the minds of human beings can harmonise and act in concert. The most laudable and exalted purposes seem fated to breed a diversity of sentiment, and that diversity to engender passion. But if there is any one point upon which a whole community might think and feel and act together with unity and pleasure, we should suppose it would be just such an expedition as that on which our hero has embarked. Yet this, like many other of the noblest efforts in the cause of freedom, was doomed to encounter the opposition of the ignorant and the malice of the vicious, notwithstanding the purity of the motives that prompted it, and the glorious ends to which it was directed. Long's designs were by many either misunderstood or misrepresented. Even some of his own followers looked upon the project as one which was entered upon merely because of its perils, and the individual glory to which it might lead. But such a view is not only unjust to the intellect and principles of the gallant leader, but it reflects discredit upon some of the purest and most distinguished citizens of Louisiana and Mississippi. The expedition was founded in neither private speculation nor a desire of personal aggrandisement. It was known to the intelligent portion of the people both of Natchez and New Orleans, that its sole design and intention were to get possession of the country, to rescue it from the grasp of tyranny, and, by establishing good government, order and security, to invite to its settlement by North Americans.

In a few days after his departure, his wife became the mother of her second child. This materially increased the pang of separation; which soon became so intense and insupportable, that she resolved, when her infant as yet was not a fortnight old, to follow her husband and share his destiny, in despite of her feeble condition, and the most solemn entreaties of her friends. He was in a foreign country; in the midst of peril—with no home but the camp and no safety but his sword. To follow him under such circumstances, and in her situation, looked like self-immolation—a holy sacrifice of life at the shrine of affection—and to attempt such a journey, through a wilderness of savages in a distant land, with her two little children and no human assistance except a small negro girl, displays a resolution and fortitude unrivalled in romance, and which nothing but the tenderest and deepest feelings of the human heart could inspire. She started on the twenty-eighth of June. Mr. James Rowan, the friend of her husband and a wealthy merchant of the place, hearing that she was about to embark, came to the river bank to see her off and bid her farewell. He found her in tears. And well might she weep, for she was not only leaving the home of her happier days, but she was going, she knew not where, on a long journey in a strange land, with ruined health, almost destitute of means, and without a friendly hand to aid her on her way. These things pressed upon the heart; but the hurthen was quickly lightened by the generous Rowan. It was impossible for this excellent man to see the dews of affliction in the eye of beauty without wiping them away. Unprepared as he was for such a trip, he nevertheless stepped into the boat, and with those elevated principles of benevolence and generosity which belong only to the virtuous and brave, he proffered to see her on her journey as far as her sister Calvert's, in Alexandria, where suitable arrangements could be made to convey her with comfort and safety to her husband. In a few minutes they were gliding down the river. The journey to Alexandria was protracted and distressing. The weather was bad; accommodations worse; and the boat finally stopping on the route, a messenger had to be despatched to Alexandria for means of conveyance. After much delay, a courier made his appearance with a couple of horses. Mrs. Long and her servant girl mounted one of the animals, and Mr. Rowan the other, with the little daughter Ann, behind him, and the infant in his arms. They completed the balance of the route, exhausted with fatigue and drenched with rain. Having remained with her sister a sufficient time for repose, she resumed her journey, and after extraordinary fatigue, reached Nacogdoches, where she experienced the kind welcome of her husband, which her affectionate devotion merited—to her a compensation for all past toils and sufferings.

• But the rainbow is not always the signal of serene hours. Though it often span the retiring clouds, it sometimes sits upon the brow of a gathering storm: and such proved the light that illumined the countenance of our happy heroine on meeting with her husband—it was but a rainbow joy upon a cloud of sorrow. She arrived upon the very eve of calamity.

[Here follows a narrative of the sack of towns and almost incredible sufferings of this unhappy couple, which we pass over and come at once to the closing scene of the tragedy.]

Providing vessels at Galveston for the transportation of his troops, Gen. Long proceeded to the mouth of San Antonio river, where he landed, and marched without delay to Goliad, or Labahia, of which he took easy possession. This post was occupied by the Patriot forces under his command until intelligence was received of the proclamation of the Plan of Iguala, by Iturbide, the complete success of the second revolution in Mexico, and the entire overthrow of Spanish authority. A short period only intervened before he was courteously invited by the new government to visit the Capital of the Republic, that he might receive appropriate honours as one of the champions of civil liberty. Such an invitation could not well be declined, and he accordingly proceeded to the capital with a suitable escort. But unfortunate was it for General Long that he did not act upon the principle of timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes; for he had not been in the city more than a few days, before he became an object of peculiar suspicion to Iturbide and his minions, who recognised in him a man whose Cato-like devotion to principle would never allow him to become a base auxiliary of this bastard Cæsar in those schemes of usurpation which his selfish cunning was then devising. Secret orders for his assassination are supposed to have been issued; and it is believed, upon satisfactory testimony, that General Long lost his life in the following manner: Being on a visit to some officer of the government one day, he had occasion to pass a small squad of the military on guard; and whilst drawing his passport from his pocket, he was shot by a soldier from an adjoining piazza, and instantly died.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE STATE OF ARTS IN ITALY.

Read before the Society of Arts, by Charles H. Wilson, Esq. Architect, Edinburgh.

I shall commence with a brief notice of the art of painting in Italy. This fine art has gradually declined, and there seems to be no indication at present of its recovery. It is trammelled by academic system. The Roman school is distinguished by a cold affectation of classic purity, and a want of energy and nature in all its productions; but, whilst we avoid the errors into which it has fallen, we should not allow these, and the difference of its practice from our own, to blind us to its good qualities. Many Roman artists draw exceedingly well, and they evince this power in the large and fine cartoons which they are in the habit of executing before commencing a picture. But if the student in this country does not draw long enough, which I think is the case, the Italian student, in acquiring his mastery of the crayon, seems to forget that he is ever to use the brush; and the Italian artists rarely prove even tolerable colourists, whilst their prejudices as to the adoption of many necessary processes in painting, and which were unquestionably in use amongst their great predecessors, are invincible. This was illustrated in an amusing manner one day in the Florence Gallery. An Italian artist was busy copying a Venetian picture, and my late friend Mr. James Irvine, happening to look at his work, remarked to him that he never could hope to imitate the brilliancy of the original without glazing. "I know that," said the Italian, "but I won't glaze."

At Florence, painting is in much the same state as at Rome: of late some artists have endeavoured to add richness in colour to the correctness of their drawing; but they have only succeeded in arranging on their pictures in brilliant juxtaposition rainbow colours, without attaining that harmonious effect which marks the works of their great predecessors. At Naples, painting is at a low ebb; at Genoa, lower still; at Venice, it is little better; but at Milan it reckons amongst its professors clever men in some departments of the art.

Fresco painting is still pursued in Italy, but with most success by the Germans. I wish to avail myself of this occasion to do homage to the extraordinary merits of the masters of this distinguished school: in looking on their works, we cannot but regret that greater encouragement is not given to the highest department of painting in this country; in those which are encouraged, our artists excel; and we may, I think, therefore justly conclude that ability would soon be found to execute works of the noblest description.

Engraving may appropriately be considered after painting. You are all doubtless well acquainted with the great names which have lately marked the progress of this art in Italy: most of these distinguished artists are now dead. Several of Raphael Morghen's pupils are much esteemed, the best of whom are established at Milan: many very fine and important works have been lately finished or are now in progress. Messrs. Ludwig Gruner and Rusweigh, both Italianised Germans, promise to revive the style of Marc Antonio with success.

The Italian engravers are most successful in their works from historical pictures; but a practice which they follow is, in my opinion, calculated to prevent their imitating with fidelity the style and feeling of the artist whose production they copy. They engrave from highly finished chalk drawings copied from pictures by artists who devote themselves to this branch: however faithfully these may apparently copy, it is certain that their drawings will, to a certain extent, exhibit their peculiarities of mind and feeling, and as the engraving must likewise so far be marked by the style of its author, the process is not favourable to the production of engravings of a faithful character.

It is but fair to mention that this practice is forced upon the Italian engraver, as he can neither transport gallery pictures nor frescoes to his study.

The landscape engravers of Italy are not successful. Frigid imitators of Woollet, in general their works are far inferior to those of that admirable master.

Sculpture is certainly the art which stands highest in Italy. Canova rescued it from the infamy into which it had sunk, and his genius at once raised it to excellence. If I say that that immortal artist has worthy successors amongst his countrymen, I express as strongly as possible a favourable opinion of the state of the art. If we are to term that the Roman school of sculpture which reckons amongst its professors all the great sculptors of various nations who make the Eternal City their fixed place of residence, then we must, I think, hold that it is the first school existing. England is worthily represented in that united school. I shall not venture upon any comparison between it and our present British school; but it is an important fact, and to its honour, that before Canova resuscitated sculpture in Italy, England could boast a succession of very eminent sculptors. I may mention the estimation in which our great Flaxman is held in Italy. "Flaxman," said a distinguished artist to me on one occasion, "was the greatest sculptor the world has known since the time of the Greeks;" and this opinion is very general in Italy. I touched shortly on the state of painting in the different Italian capitals. I shall pursue the same course with sculpture, but more briefly still, merely remarking that, with one or two exceptions, there are no Italian sculptors of eminence out of Rome.

In connection with the arts of painting and sculpture, we may now consider mosaic work and cameo cutting as practised in Rome. The art of mosaic work has been known in Rome since the days of the republic. The severe rulers of that period forbade the introduction of foreign marbles, and the republican mosaics are all in black and white. Under the empire the art was greatly improved, and not merely by the introduction of marbles of various colours, but by the invention of artificial stones, termed by the Italians smalti, which can be made of every variety of tint.

This art was never entirely lost. On the introduction of pictures into Christian temples, they were first made of mosaic; remaining specimens of these are rude, but profoundly interesting in a historical point of view. When art was restored in Italy, mosaic also was improved, but it attained its greatest perfection in the last and present century. Roman mosaic, as now practised, may be described as being the production of pictures by connecting together numerous minute pieces of coloured marble or artificial stones; these are attached to a ground of copper by means of a strong cement of gum mastic and other materials, and are afterwards ground and polished as a stone would be to a perfectly level surface; by this art not only are ornaments made on a small scale, but pictures of the largest size are copied. In former times the largest cupolas of churches, and not unfrequently the entire walls, were incrustated with mosaic. The most remarkable modern works are the copies which have been executed of some of the most important works of the great masters for the altars in St. Peter's. These are in every respect perfect imitations of the originals; and when the originals, in spite of every care, must change and perish, these mosaics will still convey to distant ages a perfect idea of the triumphs of art achieved in the 15th century. The government manufactory in Rome occupies the apartments in the Vatican which were used as offices of the Inquisition. No copies are now made, but cases of smalti are shown, containing, it is said, 18,000 different tints. Twenty years were employed in making one of the copies I have mentioned. The pieces of mosaic vary in size from an eighth to a sixteenth of an inch, and eleven men were employed for that time on each picture.

A great improvement was introduced into the art in 1775, by the Signor Raffaelli, who thought of preparing the smalti in what may be termed fine threads. The pastes or smalti are manufactured at Venice in the shape of crayons, or like sticks of sealing-wax, and are afterwards drawn out by the workman at a blow pipe into the thickness he requires, often almost to a hair, and now seldom thicker than the finest grass stalk. For tables and large articles, of course, the pieces are thicker; but the beauty of the workmanship, the soft gradation of the tints, and the cost, depend upon the minuteness of the pieces, and the skill displayed by the artist. A ruin, a group of flowers or figures, will employ a good artist about two months when only two inches square, and a specimen of such a description costs from £5 to £20, according to the execution; a landscape, 6 inches by 4, would require eighteen months, and would cost from £40 to £50. This will strike you as no adequate remuneration for the time bestowed. The finest ornaments for a lady, consisting of necklace, earrings, and brooch, cost £40. For a picture of Paestum, 8 feet long and 20 inches broad, on which four men were occupied for three years, £1000 sterling was asked.

SONNETS.

By Barry Cornwall.

WINTER.

I love to listen when the year grows old,
And noisy: like some weak life-wrinkled thing,
That vents his splenetic humours, murmuring
At ill he shares in common with the bold.
Then from my quiet room the Winter cold
Is barr'd out like a thief: but should one bring
A frozen hand, the which December's wing
Hath struck so fiercely, that he scarce can hold
The stiffen'd finger toward the grate, I lend
A double welcome to the victim, who Comes shivering, with pale looks, and lips of blue,
And through the snow and splashin' rain could walk,
For some few hours of kind and social talk:
And deem him, more than ever, now—my friend.

A STORMY NIGHT.

It is a stormy night, and the wild sea
That sounds for ever, now upon the beach
Is pouring all its power. Each after each
The hurrying waves cry out rejoicingly,
And crowding onwards, seem as they would reach
The height I tread upon. The winds are high,
And the quick lightnings shoot along the sky,
At intervals. It is an hour to teach
Vain man his insignificance; and yet,
Though all the elements in their might have met,
At every pause comes ringing on my ear
A sterner murmur, and I seem to hear
The voice of Silence sounding from her throne
Of darkness mightier than all—but all alone.

NEW BOOKS.

Wilberforce's Correspondence.

Mr. Henry Perkins, of this city, has just published "The Correspondence of William Wilberforce," edited by his sons, in two volumes, with a splendid portrait. This is a publication of much interest. It commences as far back as the year 1783, and takes the reader through a rapid and sketchy view of politics and public characters in England for the last half century. It is a most agreeable mode of refreshing one's recollections of such matters to read the letters of Pitt, Fox, Grenville, Canning, Eldon, Wellesley, Brougham and Wilberforce. The vivid delineations of persons and events which a correspondence of this kind affords, is an effective filling up of the outline presented by general history—a clothing of the skeleton with flesh and blood, colour and expression. The subjects of the letters are uniformly interesting; and they appear to have been selected from the immense mass of Mr. Wilberforce's papers with much discrimination.

Foot's Texas and the Texans.

Messrs. Thomas, Cowperthwaite & Co. have just published a work which will attract an unusual share of attention. It is entitled "Texas and the Texans, or Advance of the Anglo-Americans to the Southwest; including a history of leading events in Mexico, from the conquest by Fernando Cortes, to the termination of the Texan Revolution. By Henry Stuart Foote." Undoubtedly this book belongs to that class of works termed "moot-histories;" for if we understand the author's design, it is to establish a certain point, viz.: that Mexico ought to be liberated and enlightened by the Anglo-Americans. The work, therefore, is not only a history, but a historical argument; and it will be universally admitted by those competent to pronounce a judgment in the case, that the argument is very ably sustained. The author writes with great vigour, earnestness and eloquence. In the opening chapters the style is a little too ambitious; but as he advances and warms with his subject, the cumbrous ornaments of style, with which he was at first embarrassed, are gracefully thrown off; and the diction becomes in a high degree unaffected, free and nervous. His history is evidently founded on ample and authentic materials. It supplies a great desideratum to the general reader, viz.: a well written and respectable history of a neighbouring nation, hitherto little regarded, but destined to exert an important influence on the whole policy of the western world. Moreover, from the circumstance of its proceeding from one high in the confidence of the existing government of Texas, must unquestionably be considered as a development of the political views and declared policy of that government. Its importance in this point of view will be duly appreciated in various quarters, from Mexico to Vienna.

We have inserted an extract in this day's Journal, which is a fair specimen of the author's style.

WALDIE'S SELECT CIRCULATING LIBRARY, AND JOURNAL OF POLITE LITERATURE TERMS.

1. The Library is published on a double royal sheet, sixteen pages quarto each, on new type, and printed in the best style of book work. The weekly Journal of Belles Lettres will be contained on the two outer leaves of the number. To compensate for this arrangement, five numbers will be published monthly.

2. Price FIVE DOLLARS a year, if paid at, or remitted to, the office. SIX DOLLARS if collected by an agent from this office.

3. Subscriptions commence with January, and all subscriptions taken for less than a year. Letters must be all post-paid. Postmasters are allowed by law to forward subscriptions free. As postage has been a very heavy item of expense, we urgently request subscribers' attention to this.

Premiums.—As we have some extra copies for 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839, we offer two of these years' Library and the new year for Ten Dollars. At the same rate to old subscribers, who wish to complete sets.

TRAVELLERS IN AMERICA.

It behoves us to make some profitable use of these travellers. Philip said he had infinite obligations to the orators of Athens; for in striving by his words and actions to refute their reproaches, he became every day better. Plato having heard that malicious persons were saying injurious things of him, replied, "I will behave in such a way that no one will believe them." Who, unless it be enemies or strangers, will take the pains to tell us our faults? It is in this respect our enemies become our friends. And we should construe, too, on the side of mercy what they say spitefully and petulantly. Travellers are discontented beings, for the very reason they are travellers—being forced into strange habits, and cut off from the comforts and affections of home. Lafontaine tells us of a personage, not to be named to polite ears, who made a terrestrial tour; met every where bad treatment, became discontented, homesick, got the blue devils, and went back. Madam de Stael, who ought to know, says, you must not expect to be happy and pleased with a foreign country till it has become your home; which requires time and acquaintance, some tender attachment, social affections, and even familiarity with inanimate objects. Moreover, we do not admit that one nation abusing another a little is any sure evidence of dislike. Why should it not be in patriotism, as they say it is in love?

"Philis dit le diable de moi,
De son amour et de sa foi,
Une preuve assez nouvelle—
Mais, que me fait croire pourtant
Qu'elle m'aime effectivement,
C'est que je dis le diable d'elle
Et que je l'aime eperduement."

With these indulgent principles we set out to make a running commentary upon some remarks of Mr. Combe's book. An evil which attended Mr. Combe during the whole of his stay in this country was a want of fresh air. In our rooms, both private and public, he was suffocated,—asphyxiated—as Englishman has not been since the reign of Hyder Ally. He says (and we are half inclined to believe two thirds of what he says) that three fourths of the consumptions and colds, so prevalent in this country, are to be ascribed to our neglect of ventilation. The Americans he says, enclose themselves hermetically in their rail cars and lecture-rooms, as they do quinces, to preserve the flavour. There the victim sits till the air is disoxygenated, his pulse rises, he is feverish, palpitating, breathing short, and feeling something like one of those French geese which are stewed alive for the enlargement of their livers, when a window opens, and all the winds of heaven are let in upon him, shaking asthmas, catarrhs, and bronchites from their fluttering wings. He conceives the pure atmosphere to be wholesome only when inhaled regularly, and not in these fits of occasional or sudden deglutition. We once heard of a child brought suddenly from St. Giles into Regent's Park, which died of fresh air, not being used to it; as a fish brought into the atmosphere from its denser medium. We chance to know a lady, also, of once delicate habits, nervous at the rustling of her mother's silk gown, and taking cold from every little hurricane that accidentally broke in through the key-hole, in Chestnut street, who by a change of circumstances, has been compelled to lodge al fresco in the country, the cold north whistling through the crannies of her hut, badly shut out with her petticoat, and sometimes, she declares, blowing off her night-cap in bed—and she has grown into a rosy health, and exquisite beauty, which she does not think dearly purchased at the price of city air and splenetic gentility. "I met," says Mr. Combe, "a married lady, in one of the American cities, whose florid and healthy colour attracted my attention, and on my remarking it, she mentioned that in all seasons she slept with her bed-room windows partially open." Why, ladies, be wan and melancholic, when you may buy health at so cheap a rate and economise paint?

"When American cities," says Mr. C. "become dense and confined, they will be scourged with epidemics, and bitter regrets will be felt, when it is too late, that means were not adopted in time to preserve the health of the poorer classes, by providing them space for fresh air and recreation. If the American press would present its readers with faithful descriptions of the evils, which the English, Scottish and Irish large towns are suffering from neglect of this element of health, and call upon them to take warning in time, they would discharge an important public duty. Posterity will deeply lament the spirit which caused it to be neglected."

William Penn had a pleasant garden at Stoke for his private use, but would not spare a hundred acres from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for his whole community of Quakers. He has left a few spots not so large as Dido would have covered with a bull's hide; and for miles around the city the same spirit is at work to cumber the ground with dwellings, wharfs, store-houses and beggar's nests; so that posterity will not have a spot to fly a kite in; and if it wants gardens, it will build them, as Nebuchadnezzar did, in the air. Had William Penn, instead of Nimrod, founded Babylon, where had its kings broused, or its prophets hung their harps? Thanks to Stephen Girard, he has preserved a score or two of acres from the dominion of brick and mortar—at a distance, indeed, from town, but the town will come to it—where the orphan, if he is to receive no other benefit, may at least (not being a clergyman) gulp a mouthful of fresh air, and repair his sickly frame from the effluvia of suffocated streets and alleys, and he will be grateful to Providence that it has not placed the rays and winds of heaven under the direction of a city council.

Beyond the college and Girard grounds, was, five years ago, a luxuriant garden, gay with lemons, oranges, palmettos, and all the Indies; and woodlands, shading the dimpled hills, stood proudly, unviolated by the axe. The eye of heaven has rarely visited a spot more delightfully romantic.

—— "delicati colli Chiare aque, ambrose ripe, et pratti molli."

—— "Nature here
Wanton'd as in her prime and play'd at will
Her virgin fancies."

Sweet Lemon Hill! we knew thee in thy palmy days—in early spring when Flora unbuttoned her fairest flowers—in the scorching canicule when sweetbriar, ivy and honeysuckle crept around the cottage windows—in the hazy skies of Indian summer, when the sere leaf, loosened from its branch, fell fluttering leisurely to the ground—we have brushed the silvery dew of morning from the mullen's velvet leaf; from the marigold, that closes its flower with the day, and turning, the long night, its face to the east, smiles and dallies with the rising sun. In the cool shade we have wandered or reposed under shelter from the "Syrian heats," and from a loophole looked out upon the low and skulking city; or sat at eve on the rocky bank, the moon falling upon the lonely Schuylkill, and listened to the roaring cataract beneath, while the owl hooted over head, and the wild and wailing whip-poor-will brought on the night. Lemon Hill! thou art bare and desolate, and not a leaf covers thy nakedness; thy lemons and palmettos have fallen under the hammer of the auctioneer, and thy soil under the clutches of a joint-stock company. Thy old castle stands by itself, a bleak tenement; and the giant oak stretches forth its arms, a leafless skeleton. Gold, thou art the only god, and there is no god but thee! He is fit for any other havoc who, with dry eyes, could decree the destruction of this enchanting scene. Nature has not put a grain of ideality into his bumptious occiput.

Why do men leave their native homes—the soft and balmy breath of Chio and Mytilene, for the inky skies and the mud and slough of the French capital, but for its delicious gardens? The Tuilleries, the Luxembourg, Garden of Plants and Champs Elysées have each their hundred acres and more; and these spread out in the districts the most crowded with population. No American returns from Paris to Philadelphia who does not feel mortified and indignant at the shabby utilitarian spirit which has deprived us of this inappreciable benefit. Question men individually—there is no one who does not acknowledge that pleasure is one of the necessities of human nature, and to wean men away from debasing pleasures that we must open to them sources of innocent and rational amusement; and no one doubts that a judicious, well concerted scheme of public pleasures might be made more instrumental in the preservation of public morals than any other influence by which society is maintained. The French, before their revolution, were debased by a tyrannical government, next corrupted by a reckless republican anarchy, and finally, by a military despotism—sapping entirely their religious and moral principles; yet all authorities admit there is a neatness of dress and refinement of manners amongst the lower orders of the French to be seen in no other country of Europe. A patch of withered sod, of two or three acres, and somewhat greenish after a rain, they call in New York, “the Park.” Two or three scraggy elms stand drooping their shriveled branches imploringly; upon which labels are put up with admonishments not to injure the shrubbery. Strangers arriving there about August, when the caterpillars (ignorant of the park laws) have consumed the last leaf, take the prohibition to be ironical, the name itself facetious. They are mistaken; for one lodges in the rooms of the Astor House, overlooking “the Park,” at a higher rent. Our little squares of Philadelphia have their little advantages; but from want of extent are not susceptible of any elegant improvement. They do not furnish a promiscuous multitude the necessary accommodations, and therefore lose their rank, become unfashionable, and are deserted. All together they are of less dimensions than the Tuilleries alone.

Gardens afford the purest pleasures of all classes; they are the luxury of the rich and the resting place of the disconsolate. They induce out-door exercises: thereby promoting health and physical development; they aid in keeping up the energy of a nation, which city life, in depriving women of air and exercise, tends perpetually to destroy. A delicate lady will walk five miles with alacrity in a garden, who, with no one to please but her husband, would think it an insupportable fatigue to walk from the back parlour to the front. Besides, a lady without a fashionable promenade, where her amiable vanities may be paraded and encouraged, will not even acquire a graceful air and gait in the walk; and in no other state can a woman be seen in the triumph and plenitude of her charms—to what else does the belle of the Tuilleries or the Prado owe her superiority—her amenity of movement, her lightness and springiness of tread, that scarce makes “a dint upon the down?”—To children, also, gardens give not only habits of health, cheerfulness and gracefulness, but an emulation of neatness and good manners, which they would assuredly not acquire under the sober stimulus of home and the nursery.

Utility often miscalculates its own advantages.

Gardens give additional and equivalent value to other parts of a city, and with other such advantages, induce wealthy strangers to reside there. Fifty thousand English are now resident in Paris, spending half a million of pounds sterling annually. Rightly estimated, it will perhaps be found that no property pays so abundant a revenue to a city as its gardens.

But our best instruction on this subject is the example of the English capital, where the commercial influence has shut out the poor from all refined enjoyments as effectually as the authority of a despot. Its public galleries are inferior to those of any second rate state of Europe; and even these profess only to be public; the museum being the only place of free access in London, and this but in some of its apartments. As for gardens, why waste the city upon the nobodies who stay in town during the dog-days? Southwark, with its 300,000 inhabitants, does not enjoy an open space wider than the street; and the East End is an immense waste, without a green spot. Districts are spread out here larger than our American cities; and living in a poverty to which rags are a decoration, with no other place of exercise or recreation but only Smithfield, where the hangman takes his airings. The poor man may, indeed, upon a holiday, reach St. James' Park, but here are no parades, no display, no music, no signs of gaiety or gentility. Even the poor will not frequent a garden that is despised by their betters, and that poor devils only visit; they are flattered to be seen in good company, and are encouraged to appear there with becoming decency. But it is not to be expected that the poor man will walk five miles to gulp a little unfashionable air, when he has the gin-shop next door. A country which thus suffers its poor to be degraded, must expect the sure penalty laid upon all violations of those general laws upon which it has pleased Providence to establish the government of the world.

Other strictures of Mr. Combe, closely connected with this subject, are also worthy of a serious attention. The American ladies, he observes, usually ascribe their maladies to the variability of climate. “Their own habits appear to me to contribute to them much more. Besides sleeping in ill-aired apartments, they rarely walk abroad for the sake of fresh air and exercise, or take these exercises irregularly. They do not vary sufficiently their occupations, or lighten them with cheerful amusements; their duties press constantly on their minds. Pies, pastry, and animal food are consumed in quantities too abundant for a sedentary life; and baths and ablutions are too rarely used. Most of the houses have baths, but many of the ladies either do not use them, or from some misapprehension of their influence, do not remain long enough in them to enjoy their full benefit.”

These are grave accusations, and if true, the evil should be speedily corrected; if untrue, it is to be hoped our ladies will behave in such a way that no one will believe them. As for bathing and eating, the French, and not the English, are the best models. In Paris bathing is a necessity; in London, a luxury. Within every quarter of a mile of Paris you have public baths; and such as Swaim's, of Philadelphia, at no dearer rate than an American shilling. A bath on the bill of a London hotel is marked six shillings sterling, and public baths, difficult to be found, are never less than two and sixpence. Before William the Conqueror came over, it is reported in authentic English history, that a cold water bath was inflicted in penitentiary offences, and the law is not yet obsolete of punishing a scold by ducking. The French women eat two meals only in the day, and nothing in the intervals. If you ask French women to take some refreshments in the cake-shops, they reply, c'est pour les Anglais, or vous allez gater votre dinner, and invariably refuse—and health, as far as women are concerned, is on the side of the French. As for cheerful amusements, M. de Beaumont goes still farther than Mr. Combe, and says, “he never saw even the schoolboys play at any game.”—We have occasionally seen the wildest of them play at marbles.

Translated from one of the French journals received at this office.

A POLITICAL FUNERAL.

“Augustine!”

“Madame!”

“I want you to wake me to-morrow at eight.”

“What dress shall I get ready? they have sent your new pink one home.”

“No, I don't like to wear a pink dress at a funeral, bring me my lilac.”

“Ah, if madame would only allow me to go with my husband to see it, they say it is to be very pretty.”

“Yes, if you will be back at one o'clock.”

The next morning, according to her determination, our heroine was up at eight; this extraordinary feat was accomplished in order to be dressed by eleven; for on such an occasion it would not do at all not to look one's best. Indeed these “political funerals” are the favourite fêtes now in France; all Paris is at the windows or out of doors.—“How fortunate,” exclaimed a country gentleman, “how very fortunate that I happen to be in Paris at this time. If General R. had died two days later, I should have been on my way back, and have missed it all. Really it was very amiable in him.”

“Edgar, Léon, come to breakfast, won't you, I am ready.”

“So soon! it is only two hours since you began your toilette,” said her husband, laughing; “really this General R. has a great influence over you ladies, even after he is dead; you look very pretty this morning.”

“But!” exclaimed Edgar, (Pauline's brother,) “it is not at all a laughing matter, but a great public calamity, and we should share in the national grief. Besides, the dead are always to be respected.”

Pauline had soon finished her breakfast; she had not omitted a single pin in the adjustment of her dress, but a cup of tea more or less was of very little consequence on such a day.

“Make haste, Pauline,” said her brother, “we shall miss the ‘prologue,’ and the sarcophagus will have passed by.”

After giving the servants a few orders, Pauline gaily left the house with her husband and brother.

“You are going with us, Léon?”

“No; I have business elsewhere; but perhaps I will join you before it is over.”

Taking Edgar's arm, the lively Pauline hastened onwards—she was beautifully dressed in a lilac “jaconet,” with a little straw bonnet—at the corner of the street they met a female friend.

“Has it passed?” eagerly demanded Pauline.

“Not yet; where do you go to see it?”

“On the Boulevard, with the crowd.”

“Oh, don't go there, come with me to my aunt's, it is close by here, and her windows look directly out upon the procession.”

“I don't like to go there; the last time I paid her a visit was the day of General Lamarque's funeral: she will say I never come but on such occasions for my own convenience.”

“Well, no matter, she knows she is tiresome: come.”

And the two friends, with Edgar turned their steps towards the dwelling of the old baroness.

The old lady received them politely, but at the chiefly of a single faculty (monomaniacs,) the organ which corresponded with their hallucinations or impulsive tendencies, was found to be large; but in others this was not the case. This is exactly what had been previously observed and published in phrenological works. Large organs, ceteris paribus, act with more energy than small organs. They are more liable, from their large size, to pass beyond the normal state, and enter into a state of functional excitement; but small organs also may become diseased from other causes, and may give the character to the monomania.

The Elections.—I have repeatedly made inquiries about the private machinery put in operation previously to the elections, and am informed that it is the following. The towns and counties are divided into districts; each political party appoints a committee for each district to canvass the voters. They converse with them about the merits of the candidates presented on their "ticket," and persuade them to come to the poll and vote on their side. Money is subscribed by the wealthy members of each party to defray the expense of printing addresses, advertisements, rooms for meetings, and even for carriages to convey the infirm to the poll, at each election. The numbers who vote are about one half or two thirds of all who are entitled to claim to come to the poll, unless on some exciting occasions, when almost every individual can be brought forward. The lawyers take a great lead in politics; but the clergy and the medical men generally take no active part. Individuals among them may do so; but they are exceptions to the general rule. Those who know the movements of political machinery in Britain, will acknowledge that there is much resemblance in this respect between it and the United States. I am assured that the ballot, in this country, affords no protection to the voter. It is perfectly well known how every man votes; and there is no intimidation, because any man threatening another with any injurious consequences for not voting as he wished him, would be publicly disgraced. The politicians consider that we attach too much importance to the ballot in Britain, and assure me that it would not screen the voter, as we expect. They, however, do not know the condition of abject dependence of many of the British voters, nor the violence that is practised on their consciences; and overlook the indulgence with which intimidators are regarded in Britain.

CHAPTER VI.

Nov. 4. Thermometer 53°. Mr. Pierpont's Church.—We went this afternoon to the Rev. Mr. Pierpont's church, and heard him preach an excellent sermon. The dissatisfaction of part of his congregation with his exertions in the temperance cause, has diminished the number who attend his ministrations. It also rained horribly, which in Boston thins all audiences.

Home Education.—In visiting a friend this evening, an influential man, we found that he entertains very enlightened views regarding what constitutes education, and what is necessary to be done in improving it, for the true interest of the United States. He advances the instruction of his sons in a way at once simple, agreeable, and efficacious. In the evening, after tea, when the family are enjoying the quiet comfort of the winter fireside, he desires one of his sons to read from the daily newspaper the list of ships which have arrived in the port of Boston; it specifies the places from which they have come, and the nature of the cargo. He then asks one to point out the place in the map, and to tell the latitude and longitude; another is requested to assign a reason why it brings that particular cargo from that port. This leads to an explanation of the climate, soil, and natural productions of that part of the globe; this is often followed up by details concerning the religion, government, manners and customs of the people. They learn a great deal of useful and interesting information in these conversations, which also give them a perception of the real value of their geographical and historical studies at school.

November 5. Ther. 57°. Common Schools.—I visited a common school to-day, and found it like the others which I had seen. A book of mechanical and natural philosophy is used in these schools, embracing Astronomy, Pneumatics, Electricity, and Optics; but the children are taught from this book without any previous instruction in chemistry or natural history, and besides, the school committees do not furnish the teachers with an efficient apparatus for illustrating the subjects of which it treats. I found the children all in one room, and every variety of lessons proceeding at the same moment. The children were requested to sing a song of their own selection, and again they favoured us with "I love my native land the best."

Juvenile Association for the Suppression of Profanity.—I visited also the "Hawes Common School" in South Boston, and found one peculiar institution. The children have been formed into "An Association for the Suppression of Profanity," which the teacher said had been eminently successful in banishing not only oaths, but rude language and violence, from the school. The organisation of the association is very similar to that of a temperance society. It has a president, vice-president, secretary, and a standing committee, elected every three months. The teacher kindly presented me with a printed copy of "an Address," delivered by one of the boys, George A. Stevens, at the public annual exhibition of the male department of the school, on 23d August, 1837. It is highly creditable to the young gentleman's talents. "The members of the society," he says, "wish to begin life with fair prospects. We believe it to be important to gain the mastery over our tongues; and to aid us in so doing, to excite us to watchfulness, we have formed this association." "The society has a pledge which its members sign, and a constitution by which all its proceedings are regulated."

Article 5 of the constitution provides, that "any member who shall be known to be guilty of profanity, may be indicted by the standing committee, and expelled or suspended, or otherwise punished, at the discretion of the society."

Article 6. "Profane swearing shall be divided into two classes. In the first class there shall be comprehended the use of the name of 'God,' or the 'Saviour,' together with that of 'damn,' or its compounds, and 'hell' and its compounds. In the second shall be included all other words which may indirectly come under the title of profane; such as 'curse,' 'devil,' and their compounds, of which the society shall judge."

The form of initiation is not published.

This society, in addition to its moral influence, trains children to the practice of public business, an object of importance in a country where every man, after attaining twenty-one years of age, becomes an influential member of the social body.

House of Refuge for Juvenile Offenders.—We next visited this institution in South Boston. Every person who has attended to criminal legislation in Britain, must have remarked, that the law inquires only into the facts, "whether a crime has been committed, and to what extent;" and then assigns a punishment intended to bear a proportion to the magnitude of the offence; but that no investigation takes place into the particulars—What was the cause of the crime? What effect will the punishment produce on the offender? What influence will it exercise on society? If a child commit a petty theft, the law awards confinement in prison for twenty or thirty days; the effects of which are to destroy the character of the culprit, to blunt his feelings, and to remove from his mind all terror of the law, by rendering him thus early familiar with its power; and as if to school him into crime, it deals gently with him at first, giving him only a delicate experience of its lash, and often, by placing him in the society of more accomplished rogues, educates him to more extensive depredations. The want of houses of refuge for such offenders has been generally experienced; and in several cities such institutions have been instituted and supported by charitable donations. The state of the criminal law, however, has presented great obstacles to their success; for as it awards confinement in prison for a definite number of days as a punishment, and makes no adequate provision for the reformation of its victims, it leaves these houses of refuge without legal power, or means, to correct offenders, or to prevent them from falling again into crime. In Boston this branch of public police stands on a better foundation.

Here the principle of vengeance, or punitive justice, as it is more politely called, which is the mainspring of British criminal law, is abandoned. Juvenile offenders are regarded as erring and unfortunate beings, for whom the law prescribes a mode of treatment at once humane and beneficial towards them and society. In Britain, the laws are enacted by the aristocracy: in Massachusetts, by the people, through their representatives. In Britain, the lawgivers are far removed from personal contact with the poor, the vicious, and the ignorant, and they think only of punishing them when they do wrong. In Massachusetts, the lawgivers live and move in daily communication with the mass of the people, and are dependent on their will for their functions; they become acquainted with the causes of crimes and the effects of punishment, and they treat offenders with humanity and justice. In Scotland, juvenile offenders, after being committed two or three times to Bridewell for sixty days, or less, for petty offences, are at last transported to New South Wales. In Boston, their first offence would conduct them to this house of refuge, from which they would not be liberated until they were reformed, provided for by their friends, or had attained to the age of twenty-one if males, or eighteen if females, by which time reason might be better able to govern their actions. This institution is managed by directors, at all times amenable to public opinion; it is open to public inspection; the inmates are not regarded as undergoing punishment, but reformation; there is neither desire nor interest in any one to detain them one day longer than is necessary for their own welfare, and the directors are always happy to liberate them whenever, by the interference of their friends, or by other means, they can be adequately provided for. The expenses of the establishment are most properly provided for by public assessment. There is no reason why the benevolent members of society alone should be burdened with the support of such an institution. In Britain, we are still so deeply immersed in the barbarism of the dark ages, that the maxim is very generally admitted to be sound, that society has no right to compel its members to pay money for benevolent objects. It is regarded as a legitimate exercise of legislative power, to levy taxes to maintain prisons and penal colonies for punishing offenders, but quite illegitimate to exact money to rescue the young from the temptations that lead to crime; it is legitimate to levy taxes to maintain fleets and armies for the purpose of fighting the people of other states; but illegitimate to raise money to be applied in national education, which, by rendering our own people just, might avert the necessity for fighting altogether!

The children were busily employed when we visited the institution. They are taught a trade, and receive instruction in the common branches of learning, and in morals and religion. A chapel forms part of the buildings.

I examined the heads of several of the children, and found in one of them the moral and intellectual organs favourably developed in proportion to those of the animal propensities; this child is naturally capable of much improvement. In another, the moral and intellectual organs were very deficient in proportion to the animal organs; and, in my opinion, he is a moral patient, who should be superintended for life; but the great majority presented that nearly equal balance between the higher and lower organs which renders the individual the victim of external influences. This combination very generally prevails among criminals, and institutions such as this, which remove temptations from their propensities, and supply stimulants to their moral and intellectual faculties, are calculated to establish the habitual ascendancy of their higher powers, if any human means will do so. It must be added, that the extent of moral and intellectual cultivation which is supplied in this institution, is by far too limited. Much more is necessary to be done, to establish such characters permanently in virtue.

Nov. 6. Therm. 50°. Phrenology.—To-day I gave another practical lesson to my class on phrenology, in the forenoon. The interest and attendance increase.

Lecture by Dr. W. E. Channing.—In the evening, we heard Dr. Channing deliver the introductory lecture to the Franklin Society, an association formed for the purpose of furnishing weekly lectures to the labouring men and women of Boston, at half a dollar each for the season. The lecturers are gentlemen who give their services gratuitously, and as each chooses his own subject, the instruction is of a very desultory nature. Dr. Channing's address was "On the Elevation of the Labouring portion of the Community." The sentiments were noble and pure, the language classical, occasionally poetical and touching, and sound sense pervaded the whole. A few of the propositions probably would not stand the test of a rigid analysis on the principles of phrenology and the natural laws; but these were not important in themselves. The hall of the Masonic Temple was crowded, and the dress and appearance of the labouring people, were so respectable that I could scarcely distinguish between them and the wealthier classes, many of whom were present. He adverted to the abolition of slavery, and elicited applause by his remarks. He was received in silence, as usual, without any demonstration of welcome, but occasionally his sentiments drew forth expressions of approbation as he proceeded.

Dr. Channing is in stature below the middle size, he is slender, pale, sensitive, and fragile in his aspect. His nervous system seems to have preyed on all the other portions of his frame. The anterior lobe of his brain is well developed, the lower region predominating; Ideality is prominently conspicuous, and the organs of all the moral sentiments are large. His hair is brown, profuse, and hangs loosely over the forehead, hiding its expanse from the eye of the phrenologist. The lower part of his face is small, and expresses great delicacy of feeling, gentleness, and benevolence. His voice is feeble, but soft, clear, and distinct.

Nov. 7. Therm. 38°. North American Indians.—This morning at nine o'clock, Dr. J. T. V. Smith, health officer of Boston, and Captain Sturgis, of the revenue service, with a six-oared boat, took me four or five miles down Boston Bay, to "Pulling Point," in the township of Chelsea, where we dug for Indian skulls. In digging the foundations of a Methodist meeting-house here, an Indian skull had been disinterred, which had been presented to Dr. Smith, and from the number of bones discovered, there was reason to conclude, that this had been an Indian burial-place. Our six sailors, and some carpenters who were erecting a house close by, dug around the meeting-house, and they speedily uncovered the skeleton, the skull of which had been presented to Dr. Smith. It lay north and south, and had been doubled up, with the knees touching the sternum, and the legs parallel to the thighs, the elbows close to the sides, the forearms folded up parallel to the humerus, and the hands resting on the breast. The head lay to the south. We continued to dig in the same direction, and found another adult skeleton entire, lying exactly in the same attitude, the skull in its place, and entire. We found close by this skeleton, another of a young person; but the skull had been flattened, the occipital bone being forced into contact with the frontal bone, and the temporal bones separated and spread out.

There could be no doubt of these skeletons being Indian. The attitude in which the bodies lay, corresponds with that of other bodies found in other Indian burying-places. In the American Family Magazine (Vol. iv. No. ii. p. 66), an account is given, accompanied by a figure of an Indian skeleton, the position of which was similar; but it possessed a brass breastplate and brass belt. It was found in the town of Fall River, Bristol county, Massachusetts, in July, 1836. The skeletons which we discovered were only about twelve inches below the surface, and are supposed to have been in the ground more than two hundred years. The soil was gravel, intermingled with a yellowish clay and sand.

The gentlemen kindly presented me with the skull, and Dr. Smith added the one which had been previously given to him. Both skulls presented a large base of the brain, a sloping and narrow coronal region, deficient in Conscientiousness, Benevolence, and Ideality, with a moderate anterior lobe. The sutures are moderately serrated. This combination is the general accompaniment of the savage character.

The day was splendidly clear and calm. The six young sailors who manned the boat were beautifully clean and healthy in their appearance. Captain Sturgis allows no spirituous liquors in his cutter, and uses no punishment. He never uses harsh or profane language, nor permits his crew to use such towards each other. He treats them with kindness, does not pay them their wages on stated days, but gives them money to buy necessities when asked for it, and when balance has accumulated, he pays it, and induces the sailor to carry it directly to the Savings Bank. If any of them behave ill, he is dismissed.

Nov. 8. Thermometer 53°. State Prison.—I visited the state prison in Charlestown. It contains about three hundred male convicts. None are sent hither who are not sentenced to imprisonment for one year and upwards. The prison dress is made of coarse woollen cloth, the left side blue, and the right red. The prison is conducted on the Auburn system. Each prisoner is looked up in a separate cell when not at work. The cells, judging by the eye, seem to be about seven feet long, five broad, and seven in height. The upper half of the door of each cell is grated for the admission of light and air. A ventilating hole about four inches square, left in a corner at the top of the wall, opens into a large air chimney. The light enters through windows in the external walls, and the cells are built facing these windows, with a passage of eight or ten feet in breadth between them and the outer walls. At night lamps are hung on these walls, which send rays through the gratings into the cells. There are four or five floors of cells, one above another. In the morning the convicts are marched in solemn silence into large workshops, in which they labour at various trades, stone-dressing, smith work, carpentry, upholstery, and shoe-making. If the room is small, a superintendent sits and overlooks the whole workmen, preventing them from speaking, holding communication with each other, or being idle. If the workshop is large, several superintendants are employed. In every other respect the prisoners appear like tradesmen in a well-regulated manufactory, busily engaged in work. They are instructed after the hours of labour, and also on Sundays, in their cells.

I examined the heads of eight or nine of the criminals, and found the animal organs large in proportion to those of the moral sentiments and intellect; but, on the whole, the moral region was less deficient in these individuals than in the average of criminals whose heads I have examined in Britain. Several whose brains indicated very low dispositions, were mentioned as being well conducted in prison, a strong testimony to the efficiency of the discipline.

I could learn very little about the dispositions which they had manifested when free members of society. The statistics of crime will never be satisfactory until the history of the external circumstances of the criminal, and also his development of brain and temperament, are recorded.

I was informed that when Dr. Spurzheim visited this prison in 1832, he stated that a particular prisoner's head was so well developed in the moral and intellectual, and so little in the animal regions, that he could not conceive how he came to be under sentence for a crime. Afterwards it was discovered that he was not guilty. He was liberated, and is since married, and is now a respectable citizen. He all along denied his guilt.

After I left the prison, several of the prisoners whose heads I had examined wrote accounts of their own dispositions, which were sent for my information. Most of them represented themselves as amiable and unfortunate men, either wrongfully condemned, or so full of penitence, that it was cruel to continue their confinement. If these autobiographies are true, phrenology is false; but, unfortunately for the veracity of the narrators, their vicious actions form a striking contrast to their professed virtuous dispositions.

Mr. Webster.—On my return from Charlestown, I visited the court house, and heard Mr. Webster address a jury in a suit about paying a contractor for making a road. His manner of speaking is calm, deliberate, clear, and forcible.

The Legal Profession in Britain and Massachusetts.—I have had several conversations with gentlemen of the law in Boston, regarding the combination of the functions of solicitor and counsel in the same individual in their courts. They stated that the impediment which it might be supposed to present to men of great talent in rising into the higher walks of the profession, is removed by the practice of adopting junior partners; while it is attended with some advantages, one of which is, that it checks that tendency to falsehood and exaggeration in the pleadings of counsel which sometimes disgrace the English and Scottish bar. In the great majority of lawsuits, both litigants are seeking to obtain only what they sincerely believe to be justice; but there are instances of unprincipled and vindictive clients, who resort to the law as an engine of extortion or oppression. The division of the offices of solicitor and counsel aids such persons in pursuing their nefarious objects. In London or Edinburgh an unprincipled client will find out a solicitor as dishonest as himself, and communicate to him a whole tissue of untruths. The solicitor, when he is not called on to do more than convey them to counsel, sets them forth as he received them, or perhaps colours them a little to add to their effect. The barrister believes in his brief as he does in his Bible, and adding a little more colouring to the facts, and much eloquence to the expression of them, presents to the judge and jury a tissue which very much resembles the wrong side of the web of truth. All the parties who weave this tissue affect to be honourable men. The client is merely misled by his own egotism, and the solicitor and counsel are not bound to know that he falsifies. If the client be rich—the greater the falsehoods, the higher in rank is the counsel selected to give them weight and respectability. In such cases the most eminent, and sometimes the most evangelical, men are employed to state the most desperate calumnies and untruths, a duty from which, if the fee be large, they rarely shrink. I am informed that in Massachusetts every counsel is presumed to know the facts from the investigations which it is his duty to make into the evidence in preparing his case; and that extravagant departures from truth, which ordinary sagacity might have avoided, injure his personal reputation.

Sir Walter Scott and the Ballantynes.—The "Refutation of the Misstatements and Calumnies contained in Mr. Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott, Bart., respecting the Messrs. Ballantyne," by Mr. James Ballantyne's representatives, has recently been republished here, and is exciting much interest. In society the questions are very often put to me: Do you know Mr. Lockhart? What is the development of his organ of Conscientiousness? Did you know the Ballantynes? What is the truth about them and Sir Walter Scott? My answer to these questions has been: That I had seen Mr. Lockhart, but had no personal acquaintance with him, and that I declined giving opinions about the heads of living men, unless they had permitted authentic casts or busts of themselves to be published, which he, to the best of my knowledge, had not done. I asked why they put this question. "Because," said they, "there seems to be a defect in his moral perceptions. He obviously means well by the reputation of Sir Walter Scott, but he has unnecessarily published matters which detract from the respectability of Sir Walter's character, apparently without being at all conscious that they have this tendency." I remarked that probably Mr. Lockhart wished to do justice to the public as well as to Sir Walter, by telling the whole truth, and leaving the world to form its own judgments on his merits. "But has he told the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in regard to the Ballantynes?" My reply was: that after Constable's failure, which drew along with it that of Sir Walter Scott and James Ballantyne (John having died in 1821), the affairs of all the three parties had been placed by their creditors in the hands of professional men for investigation, and that the general result of this scrutiny was the understanding among the creditors that James Ballantyne had been ruined by his connection with Sir Walter Scott; and they acted on this belief by treating him with great kindness: They allowed him to retain his household furniture, and also the wines which Mr. Lockhart says so much about, and they continued him in the management of his printing business with a large salary. No creditors ever troubled him personally, even when carrying on business, undischarged, after the bankruptcy, for he was not legally discharged till after Sir Walter's death, when his (Sir Walter's) representatives compounded for the debts that then remained due. I should say, that the statements contained in the recent publication by James Ballantyne's heirs coincide with the views formed by the business circles in Edinburgh, after the whole facts of the case had been disclosed.

Nov. 9. Thermometer 52°. Phrenology.—I gave practical lessons to my class, from 10 o'clock till past 1. Sixteen or eighteen children were brought, and the class was formed into parties of three or four, who examined the cerebral development of a child, wrote it down, and brought it to me to be checked. In this day's practising, they had the means of judging whether there is a correspondence between the natural dispositions and the development of the brain in young persons. In almost all the children the anterior lobe was large, indicating great intellectual power. I called the attention of the class to the frontal sinus; showed them specimens of it in skulls, and told them that before the age of twelve it very rarely exists so high as the base of the brain. Here, then, was an opportunity for them of putting the assertions of phrenologists to the test of observation. We maintain that the sinus in adult and aged persons is found chiefly in the situations of Individuality, Size, Weight, and Locality; that these organs are amply developed and also active in children below twelve; that in the children now present these organs appear very different in size, and of course, if Phrenology be true, a difference should be found in the talents related to them: if, for instance, Individuality be large in a child, he should be a great observer and inquirer about things that exist; if in another the organ be small, he should be deficient in this power; and so forth with the other organs. As the sinus does not exist in early life, it presents no obstacle to our ascertaining the functions of these organs by observing the heads and talents of children. This was an appeal to facts, worth a thousand arguments; and neither at the time of the examination, nor afterwards, did any one of the class communicate to me discrepancies between the development of these organs and the manifestations of the children.

I observed that in these children, the cerebellum was generally largely developed for their years: Cautiousness was not so large as in Scottish children, Acquisitiveness was very generally large; Conscientiousness and Firmness were not in general so large as Benevolence, and Self-Esteem was more frequently larger than Love of Approbation, than it is in Scottish children. I am not certain to which class of society the children belonged. Some of them had the moral and intellectual organs admirably well developed, but with small narrow chests, indicating mental precocity with feeble health. I strongly urged on their parents the necessity of limiting their mental exertions and increasing their bodily activity. My impression is, that many of the children did not belong to persons attending my class, for those whom I have seen in their houses were, on the whole, superior. Some I knew were brought from charity schools; and others were borrowed from persons in the humbler walks of life. In England, parents of the same class with those comprising my class here, eagerly brought their own children to similar examinations.

Nov. 9. Religion in the United States.—Many inquiries are made of me in society, concerning the state of religion in England and Scotland, and of the church in both; the condition of Germany (which I had visited in 1837) moral, educational, and religious; the practice of banking in Scotland; what Lord Jeffrey is doing; who now conducts the Edinburgh Review; and many similar questions, showing a wide range of observation and thinking, and a great desire for information. I mentioned to the inquirers that Evangelical Religion is in the ascendant both in England and Scotland, but that a war is raging against the church as a legal establishment in both parts of the island; that the manner in which the conflict is carried on is curiously indicative of the intellectual difference between the English and Scots. In the former, Individuality and Eventuality (which give a practical tendency to the understanding) predominate; and the English oppose the church by refusing church-rates to maintain the edifices of the state religion, and by every other direct means that the law places in their power. In the latter, Causality predominates (which impresses a speculative tendency on the intellect,) and they write books, deliver lectures, and pour forth a continued fire of argument from a thousand batteries against a state religion, in the full confidence that in the progress of time, reason will triumph, and the Church will fall. The English seek an immediate result; the Scots wait patiently for half a century, or a whole one if necessary, and never relax their cannonade. In Scotland the church is making a vigorous defence with the same arms. Pamphlets, periodicals, speeches, and sermons are constantly pouring forth, charged with vigorous arguments in favour of state-enacted articles of belief, and a state-paid clergy.

Religious Freedom in Prussia.—I added, that northern Germany appeared to me to be rapidly advancing in education, intelligence, and industry, while Austria is nearly stationary; that the Germans are the most simple-minded and kind people among whom I have travelled; that in a residence of nearly five months among them, I was not conscious of being imposed on more than thrice, while I had many opportunities of observing their simplicity, and experiencing their kindness; and that Prussia was the only country which I had visited in which religious freedom seemed to be understood and practically allowed. This last observation led to more particular inquiries, and I added that I considered no country to be entitled to boast of its religious liberty in which public opinion was not so far advanced as to permit every man to follow the dictates of his own understanding in his religious belief, without exposing him to disadvantage on account of his differing from the prevailing sects. "But this is the law here," said several persons. "True, it is the law, but it is not the practice. A man is safe in Massachusetts, if he profess a faith which is already supported by a powerful body of respectable persons; but if his opinions be singular, or not recognised by an influential sect, he is exposed to all minor persecution which operates insidiously and in the dark; To take a strong example, it would obstruct the rise of a young man at the bar, in medicine, or in any employment depending on the people, if he were known to be conscientiously a Jew, however moral and respectable he might be in character." "But would not the same happen in Prussia?" "No." I was told that if a man's personal conduct be irreproachable, it makes no difference in his social estimation in Berlin, what religious faith he professes; that no one is esteemed either more or less for professing publicly a strict religious belief, if he act up to it; but that also no one is disesteemed, although he gives no outward indications of his adherence to any particular creed; that religious belief is viewed as a question between God and every man's own conscience, with which his neighbour has no concern; that the Prussian government employs equally in its civil service—and elects as professors of languages and the natural sciences in its Universities—Protestants, Catholics, Unitarians, Rationalists, and men of every other form of faith, provided they be moral and capable of teaching successfully the branches of science which they follow. In the provinces of Prussia, the same liberality does not exist, and even in Berlin there are evangelical coteries who act in a narrow spirit, but they have very limited power of giving effect to their opinions."

I told my friends that Lord Jeffrey is now a Judge of the Supreme Court of Scotland, that he has retired from the Review, and that he is giving great satisfaction to the country in his judicial capacity. They informed me that the influence of the Review on opinion in the United States was at one time very great, but that it has much declined, and is still declining.

I put questions to them in return, and learned that evangelical doctrines have generally revived in America; but that the evangelical Presbyterian church, whose head-quarters are in Pennsylvania, has divided within itself; that a large minority has renounced the doctrines of original sin, election, imputed righteousness, and some minor articles of faith. Both parties, however, agree in regarding the Unitarians as common enemies, and oppose them. I asked what was the cause of this revival? and the general result of all that I could gather was, that the great mass of the American people cannot boast of a high intellectual education, but have strong impulsive emotions; that the evangelical party address themselves to their feelings, particularly to their sentiments of fear and self-love, representing the faith which they teach as the most momentous of all considerations for the eternal welfare of their souls; that the rational party in religion have abandoned this lever, and preach more to the understanding and the disinterested sentiments of the people; and in consequence fail to satisfy the mass. In New England, there is a superabundance of churches. In one village, containing 1800 souls, there are four congregations, three of which maintain ministers. The churches are unnecessarily multiplied through contention.

I was informed by a gentleman who had paid some attention to the state of religion in France, that in that country, a desire exists for a better form of religion than the Catholic; but that the devotional sentiment is so much stronger than reason, that a ceremonial is regarded as indispensably necessary to the success of a reformed faith, and that the great obstacle to its introduction is the difficulty of inventing a new ceremonial that should not draw down ridicule from the people while it was new.

Election in the State of New York.—This day the news of the election of the members of the legislature, governor of the state, &c. of New York, arrived at Boston. The whig party, or that opposed to M. Van Buren, have triumphed. The whig party here took out to the common two brass field-pieces belonging to the state, and fired a feu de joie. The two guns were loaded and fired so rapidly, that I conceived there was a whole park of artillery on the ground, until I arrived and saw only this number of pieces. I asked how the guns of the state came to be lent to announce a party triumph, and was told that they are equally at the service of the opposite party when they have a victory to celebrate.

Insanity and Criminal Jurisprudence.—Mr. Cushing, the editor of the Law Journal, told me, that at the September term for Merrimack county in 1838, the Honorable Joel Parker, chief justice of the court of common pleas for the state of New Hampshire, had delivered a charge to the grand jury on the subject of insanity, which had embodied the phrenological views of this malady, and which had been published by request. He favoured me with a copy of it. It mentions that, "by returns from 83 towns, made by order of the legislature (of the state of New Hampshire) in 1832, there were within these towns 193 cases of insanity; from 127 towns no report was received. At a similar ratio for all the towns in the state, the number would be about 500. Of those returned 98 were paupers, and 95 not so. From the returns, about half were, or had been in confinement, and probably omissions in that respect gave a less number who had been restrained in this way, than the facts would have warranted. Some were in cages and cells, some in irons and chains, and some in jails."

Extraordinary Talent for Languages.—I was favoured with the perusal of a letter dated Worcester, 6th September 1838, written by Elihu Burrit to William Lincoln, Esq. of that village, afterwards published, in which the writer mentions, that, being one of a large family, and his parents poor, he apprenticed himself, when very young, to a blacksmith, but that he had always had such a taste for reading, that he carried it with him to his trade. He commenced the study of Latin when his indentures were not half expired, and completed reading Virgil in the evenings of one winter. He next studied Greek, and carried the Greek grammar about in his hat, studying it for a few moments while heating some large iron. In the evenings he sat down to Homer's Iliad, and read twenty books of it during the second winter. He next turned to the modern tongues, and went to New Haven, where he recited to native teachers, in French, Spanish, German, and Italian. At the end of two years, he returned to his forge, taking with him such books as he could procure. He next commenced Hebrew, and soon mastered it with ease, reading two chapters in the Bible before breakfast; this, with an hour at noon, being all the time he could spare from work. Being unable to procure such books as he desired, he determined to hire himself to some ship bound to Europe, thinking he could there meet with books at the different ports he would touch at. He travelled more than 100 miles on foot to Boston with this view, but was not able to find what he sought, and, at that period, heard of the American Antiquarian Society at Worcester. Thither he bent his steps, and found a collection of ancient, modern, and Oriental books, such as he "never before imagined to be collected in one place!" He was there kindly allowed to read what books he liked, and has reaped great benefit from this permission. He spends three hours daily in the hall, and has made such good use of these privileges, as to be able to read upwards of fifty languages with greater or less facility.

The following is a specimen of his commonplace book:—"Elihu Burrit in account-cum-with Time. Worcester, June 5, 1838."

"June 5.—50 lines of Hebrew; 37 lines of Celtic; 6 hours of forging."

"June 6.—37 lines of Hebrew; 40 lines of Celtic; 6 hours of forging."

"June 7.—60 lines of Hebrew; 60 lines of Celtic; 54 pages French; 20 names of stars; 5 hours of forging."

"June 8.—51 lines of Hebrew; 75 lines of Celtic; 40 pages of French; 15 names of stars; 8 hours of forging."

"June 9.—68 lines of Hebrew; 50 lines of Celtic; 40 pages of French; 3 hours studying Syriac; 9 hours of forging."

"June 10.—100 lines of Hebrew; 85 pages of French; 4 services at church; Bible-class at noon."

He proceeds to state, that he wrote and delivered a lecture on astronomy. Many days he was unwell, and yet worked hard, sometimes twelve hours a day at his forge.

I was not so fortunate as to see this prodigy of talent, and regret that I cannot report the development of his brain, more especially as there still remains much obscurity concerning the functions of the organ of language, and the precise faculties on which the talent for acquiring foreign languages depends. One thing, however, is pretty obvious, that the necessity for forging saved this student's life. If he had not been forced by necessity to labour, he would, in all probability, have devoted himself so incessantly to his books, that he would have ruined his health, and been carried to a premature grave.

November 10. Therm. 27°. Dr. Spurzheim. This is the anniversary of Dr. Spurzheim's death, and his memory is cherished here with the fondest and most respectful regard. Most of my friends recollect that this is the day, and mention some incident connected with it. The house in which he died at the corner of Pearl street no longer exists. It has been taken down, and new shops and warehouses have been built in its place. Mr. Ward, banker, acted as his executor. Claims by his relations, properly authenticated, came from France, and were allowed by the Consistorial Court of Boston, and Mr. Ward remitted to them the funds which he left. There was a report in England that he had died insolvent; but the circumstances now mentioned by Mr. Ward show that this could not be correct. I was told by Mr. Capon that his property in Boston exceeded $2000.

House-keeping.—We continue to hear manyadies complain of the labours of house-keeping in this country. When one makes a call in a forenoon, the lady of the house is rarely found sitting in her drawing-room, as is the custom in England, but appears to be engaged in some other part of the house. I have already remarked, that one cause of this is the aversion that generally exists to paying for domestic service at the same rate at which other labour is remunerated. Another cause may be found in the prosperous condition of the labouring classes in general, which renders them independent, and produces a dislike to the restraints of domestic service. The inconvenience which the rich suffer from this state of things, appears to me to be far more than counterbalanced by the general happiness, which is among its causes.

November 11. Therm. 26°. Sunday.—I heard the Rev. Mr. Blagden preach an excellent sermon in the Old South Church. He is evangelical and presbyterian, and his congregation was large, and highly respectable in appearance. The more sermons I hear in this country, the more the conviction grows that they are of a higher order in thought, composition, and delivery, than the average of discourses in the Established Church of Scotland, and that the churches are better fitted up, and the people more attentive.

The Museum at Salem.—We visited the museum, containing about five thousand objects of curiosity; it was formed by shipmasters who have doubled Cape Horn, or the Cape of Good Hope. The members have the privilege of giving free admission to any one whom they choose to introduce. It contains many oriental articles of interest and value, particularly full sized figures of individuals of different ranks among the Eastern nations, each in his proper costume.

Unitarian Church.—A new Unitarian stone church has recently been erected here. It cost $35,000. The pews were sold to the subscribers by auction (or "at auction," as it is called here.) They were set up at $300 each pew, and the best brought $700. They are very handsomely furnished.

Nov. 13. Therm. 42°. The House of Correction.—The house of correction in South Boston, in its general economy, resembles the state prison. It is used for the confinement only of persons convicted of the less heinous kinds of offences. No punishment is used to enforce the discipline, except the shower-bath, with abundance of water.

Criminal Jurisprudence.—Judge Thacher of the Municipal Court has attended my whole course of lectures, and he accompanied me to-day to the House of Correction. He told me that he concurs essentially with my views of the mental constitution of criminals; and that many acts indicate that some of them are incapable of resisting the temptations to crime presented to them by the ordinary condition of society. He says, that it has been a great comfort to him, as judge of the city's criminal court, to have the "House of Reformation for Juvenile Offenders" (already described,) and this "House of Correction;" and also a farm school on one of the islands in the bay, to which he can commit different offenders, for indefinite periods, for reformation. They have come to him after their liberation, and thanked him for the beneficial results of a long confinement.

The citizens by whom these houses are inspected, are so constant in their superintendence, and so much publicity pervades the management, that strong checks are interposed to the abuse of this discretionary power. Pious ladies come from the city and instruct the inmates on Sundays; but there is too little of moral and intellectual instruction and training on week days.

Human Responsibility.—I have now delivered my lecture on human responsibility as affected by Phrenology, and it has been well received. In my public discourse, I limited the discussion to the question of the responsibility of offenders to the civil magistrate, but some of my hearers have conversed with me regarding its relation to the prevailing interpretations of Scripture. The view stated to my class was briefly this: Men may be divided into three great classes. The first comprehends those in whom the moral and intellectual organs are large, and the organs of the propensities proportionately moderate in size. This class possesses the highest qualities of sentiment and intellect in ample proportion; they have received the power to know what is right, and to do it; and they are justly liable to be punished by the law, if they do what it proclaims to be wrong. The second class includes those individuals in whom the organs of the animal propensities, moral sentiments, and intellectual faculties are nearly equally balanced, being all large. Such persons experience strong impulses both to good and evil, and their actual conduct is greatly influenced by the circumstances in which they are placed. If uneducated, and exposed to want and vicious society, they may lapse into crime: If well educated, trained to industry, and favoured with the society of the intelligent and good, their higher powers may acquire and retain the ascendancy during life, and they may avoid all serious offences. These men are liable to be influenced by the fear of punishment, and are therefore responsible; but they should be treated with a due reference to their nature; corrected and improved, and not merely tormented. The third class comprehends those in whom the organs of the propensities are large, and the organs of the moral and intellectual faculties very deficient. I stated it to be my conviction, founded on observation, that such individuals are incapable of resisting the temptations to crime presented by ordinary society, that they are moral patients, and should not be punished, but restrained, and employed in useful labour during life, with as much liberty as they can enjoy without abusing it. I mentioned, that, according to my view, a severe responsibility lies on the first class, for on them a bountiful Creator has bestowed his best gifts, and committed their weaker brethren to their care; that hitherto, in most countries, they had thought merely of punishing these feeble minds, and that it would be a just retribution to administer to them, for their harsh and unjust conduct, no small portion of the sufferings which they have inflicted on those whom they should rather have instructed and protected.

Several of my hearers having been led into the same train of thought by the lecture, asked me whether I was certain of the correctness of the facts. I stated, that after an extensive series of observations made in the prisons of England, Ireland, Scotland, and some parts of Germany, I was convinced of their truth; that their own prisons in Boston, which I had visited, presented evidence to the same effect; and that nearly all practical phrenologists were agreed on the subject. They then asked whether the clergy of Scotland had turned their attention to these views of human nature? My reply was, that I believed not. "Are there not clergymen members of the Phrenological Society in Edinburgh?" "Yes." "Does not Dr. David Welsh, who wrote the Life of Dr. Thomas Brown, declare himself in that work to be convinced of the truth of Phrenology?" "Yes, he does." "And is not he now a professor in the University of Edinburgh?" "Yes, of Church History." "How does he reconcile Phrenology with the doctrine of original sin?" "He has never stated, in any public form, his opinions on this subject." "Your description of the men who compose the first class implies that they possess natural qualities that are good, and that they are culpable only if they abuse them—what, then, becomes of the total corruption of human nature, which is the foundation of Calvinism, if this doctrine be true?" "This is a question for those who embrace the doctrine of total corruption. Your countryman, the Rev. Joseph A. Warne, has attempted to answer it, but I am not aware that any of the Scottish divines who believe in Phrenology have published any solution of the difficulty. Here, in Massachusetts, it should form a less formidable obstacle to the reception of Phrenology than in Scotland, because several of your sects have already abandoned the notion of entire corruption." "Yes, we have, and we consider that Phrenology bears us out in doing so. It is a philosophy which harmonises with our views of Scripture."

"But," continued my friends, "the view of human responsibility which you presented to us goes deeper than the question of original sin. According to the common interpretations of Scripture, the individuals included in your third class, the habitual criminals, who do evil continually when left to the suggestions of their own minds, constitute the wicked, for whom the whole terrors of divine wrath are prepared in the world to come, unless they repent, and obtain forgiveness; yet your doctrine represents them as unfortunate rather than criminal: as 'moral patients,' to use your own phrase, rather than fit subjects for punitive justice." "I acknowledge the correctness of the inference, and the only answer that I can give to the objection which is implied in it is, that men must revise their interpretations of Scripture, and bring them into harmony with natural truth." "But does this imply that the Scripture is a convertible standard that may be made to suit any views, and, if so, what is its value?" "The answer to this objection is obvious. The Scripture is made a convertible standard by each sect founding its doctrines on parts of it disjoined from the rest; whereas its true character is to be sought in its general tendency, which is towards justice and mercy; and in this respect phrenology is in accordance with it. In Massachusetts, where you seem to have studied the Scriptures zealously and attentively, each of your sects makes them echo its own doctrines. Your Unitarians deny the divinity of Christ, and your Universalists deny the existence of the devil and of future punishments, and they, as well as your orthodox sects, maintain that their opinions are founded in Scripture. This shows that the Scriptures are treated here as a convertible standard in the sense in which you use this phrase; and as Nature will not bend to erroneous interpretations, it follows that all sects must either interpret in harmony with her dictates, or she will condemn them openly." "You speak of the discrepant interpretations of Scripture by our sects; have you not the same conflicts of opinion in Scotland?" "Not to the same extent. Those who, in Scotland, are popularly called dissenters, are only seceders; they differ from the church in matters of church-government, but all adhere to the Westminster Confession of Faith embraced by the Established Church. The Episcopalians with us are 'dissenters,' but their articles of belief coincide, in all the leading doctrines, with those of the Church of Scotland; hence there is with us scarcely any avowed difference of opinion concerning scriptural interpretations. There are a few Unitarian congregations, which feebly exist; and Scotland, so far as public profession goes, is nearly unanimous in the belief that Calvinism contains the only true interpretations of Scripture. Our people regard you as great backsliders from the true faith." "Fore-sliders we should rather be called; because we once held the same opinions with the Scottish Church, and if some of us have left them, it is because we have advanced in our interpretations of Scripture. We have adopted more sound and consistent views, tried by the whole body of Scripture itself, and views also more in harmony with natural truth: We call this advancing, not backsliding: but this is apart from the subject;—Do not the Scottish clergy perceive that phrenology, if true, contains facts that must force reflecting men to question their interpretations of Scripture? and why do they not show more interest in an inquiry that is destined, sooner or later, to call forth their strongest efforts to maintain their position, or to force them also to advance?" "The number of individuals who have embraced phrenology in Scotland, is small compared with the mass, and the clergy satisfy themselves with denouncing it as untrue and dangerous; this suffices for the day; and they have other enemies to contend with, whom they regard as more formidable and pressing than the adherents of a small philosophical sect."

There is a sharpness of intellect, and a boldness in following up views to their consequences, among the educated men here, that gave rise to numerous conversations such as this now recorded, which is rather an epitome of many, than an exact report of one. Candour and courtesy uniformly prevailed in these discussions.

Affection of the Faculty of Language.—A gentleman attending my lectures, lately favoured me with the following case:—

"To GEORGE COMBE, Esq.

Warren Street, Boston,
October 31, 1838.

"Dear Sir:—The lady whose affection of the organ of Language I mentioned to you last evening, is ———, the wife of Mr. ——— of ——— Mass.

"At the age of two or three years, she was able to repeat long stories that had been related to her word for word. She was also able to spell any word after she had heard some one spell it.

"The power of her verbal memory continued to be remarkable through all her school days.

"A year or two since, she and Mr. ——— were with a few friends one evening. It was proposed to try who could repeat the most of a certain poet's works. A volume of Byron's was taken for the purpose, I think. They opened to a passage. Mrs. ——— repeated page after page. They laughed at her and said she had been reading the piece lately. She denied this, and asked them to turn to any other part of the volume. They opened to another piece. She repeated it as fluently as before.

"During the trial, she shaded the light from her eyes with her hand.

"Before long she fainted, and was carried to her room.

"For nine weeks was not able to call her husband or friends by name. She was at a loss, too, for the names of things. Her faculties were unimpaired in other respects. She occupied herself with calculations in arithmetic—the organ of Number was in extreme activity. After her recovery, she said she had been troubled with pain in the back of her eyes.

"She or her husband would be very happy to give you any farther particulars."

Phrenology.—The last three lectures of my course were devoted to "Physical Education," "Mental Education," and "The application of Phrenology to the present condition and future prospects of the United States." The committee who managed the arrangements for the lectures solicited my permission to invite the mayor and aldermen, and other gentlemen entrusted by law with the management of the common schools of the city, to these lectures, which I granted with great pleasure, and many of them attended. Having observed the unwholesome condition of the class-rooms, court-rooms, and other places of public resort in Boston, for want of ventilation, I called the attention of the audience strongly to the dependence of the mental faculties on the condition of the brain for their power of action; to the dependence of the brain for its vital properties on the condition of the blood; and to the dependence of the blood on the condition of the digestive and respiratory organs; thus pointing out the direct connection between sound digestion, pure air, and mental vigour. I found that even a brief exposition of the structure and functions of the digestive and respiratory organs, and of their connection with the brain, illustrated by large drawings, brought home to the understandings of my audience the importance of digestion and ventilation to mental energy, and gave general satisfaction. The ideas were by no means new to them; but although they had often heard them stated by other lecturers, and had read them in books, it had occurred to few to carry them into practice. I therefore insisted largely on the evils which they inflict on themselves and their children by this neglect. Pulmonary consumption produces a large proportion of all the deaths that occur in New England, and I pointed out to them an obvious train of causes in full operation, which lead to this disease. By breathing hot and vitiated air in ill ventilated apartments, the blood is not properly aerated, the lungs are enfeebled, and the tone of the whole system, mental and bodily, is lowered; nevertheless in this condition they make the most rapid transitions from a temperature of 70° or 75° of Fahrenheit's thermometer, which is common in their houses, churches and lecture rooms, to one of 5° or 10 below the freezing point, in the open air; a change sufficient to injure the respiratory organs in the most robust state of health, and much more so when weakened by this previous injudicious treatment. These remarks, as I afterwards learned, were not without some beneficial influence on a portion of my audience.

In the course of the same lectures, I pointed out the deficiencies which still generally exist both in Britain and Massachusetts in the education of females, and strongly urged the necessity of an improvement in this respect, for the benefit of the rising generation. In the United States, even more than in Britain, it is of great importance not only to families, but to the state, that mothers should be well instructed, because in America the fathers are too busy to devote proper attention to the education of their children, and the formation of early habits and opinions depends to a very great extent on the mothers.

Female Education in Massachusetts.—This subject strongly engages the attention of the enlightened women of Boston themselves. Mrs. Hale edits a work named "The American Ladies' Magazine," now united with "The Ladies' Book," published in Philadelphia, in which some excellent essays on it have appeared. But the state neglects its duty in this respect. No legislative or public provision has been made for female education, except the privilege of attending the common schools. There are in the United States upwards of eighty public colleges, or seminaries, for the instruction of young men in the higher branches of education, many of them richly endowed, and all receiving support to a greater or less extent from public funds; while not a single seminary has been endowed, or permanently established in Massachusetts by legislative liberality, for the education of young women in the superior walks of knowledge.

When I visited Berlin in 1837, I was informed by a gentleman who took a deep interest in public instruction, that an error in the Prussian system had then begun to develop itself, namely, that the education provided for the males, throughout the country, was so superior to that given to the females, that a disparity in point of knowledge and mental attainments had been created between the sexes, in the same rank of life, which was operating injuriously on the domestic happiness of the people; and he was a strenuous advocate for an improvement in the education of the Prussian women. If neglect of the female mind be injurious to society in Prussia, it will prove ten times more so in the United States of America.

November 17. Therm. 46°. Spurzheim's Skull and Brain.—In conversation Dr. Spurzheim more than once said to me, "I hope, that when I am dead they will not bury my skull. I wish it to be preserved as evidence of my natural dispositions. Posterity will judge by it whether I am a quack and a charlatan, as your Edinburgh Reviewer called me." His wish has been fulfilled; the Phrenological Society of Boston has preserved his skull, and his brain also, in alcohol: both are locked up in an iron safe, and form a very interesting addition to their collection of casts and skulls. The safe was opened to-day in presence of a committee of the society, and I inspected its contents. The skull is rather thicker than the average of British healthy skulls; the diploe presents large cells, but the surfaces are dense. It is thickened over Combativeness and Conscientiousness. The superorbital plate of the skull is both broad from side to side, and long from the front backwards, indicating a large anterior lobe of the brain. The convolutions have left strong indentations in the bone, particularly those of the organ of language. Under them the skull is very thin. The skull is thin also at Constructiveness, and there is a considerable sinus at Individuality and Size; but these organs are nevertheless large in the brain. I have heard Dr. Spurzheim converse fluently in German, French, and English, and he wrote these three languages grammatically. I am not certain whether he spoke Italian, but rather infer from some incidental remarks of his that he did. He lectured without notes; and his language was exceedingly appropriate and pregnant with meaning. The brain is in perfect preservation; it is large, and shows a large anterior lobe and large coronal region, the convolutions here being plump and round. The base also is well developed; but as it is floating in alcohol and hermetically sealed, I could examine it only through the glass. I perceived, however, that Colouring is deficient. The convolutions of Language and Form are large. The convolutions of the Love of Life and Destructiveness are large. Those of Alimentiveness are less, and he was extremely temperate in his habits.

He was in his fifty-sixth year at the time of his death, and apparently changes had already begun to take place in his skull. During life he used to complain of his deficiency of Combateness. The rude and illiberal attacks that were made by the press, not only on his opinions, but on his character as a man, roused his Destructiveness and made him angry; but his deficiency in Combateness rendered it extremely disagreeable to him to enter the lists as a combatant, in his own defence. He had a perfect command over his Destructiveness, but he felt its power. I have heard him say, "I am too angry to answer this at present; I must wait till I am cool:" and he would wait for weeks or months, until he could give a calm and philosophical reply.

November 16. Therm. 47°. The Institution for the Blind.—We visited this institution again, and examined it in detail. We were much gratified with its admirable management and complete ventilation, and with the provision for the physical, moral, and intellectual advancement of the pupils, under the enlightened direction of Dr. Howe; but as I surveyed it a third time in 1839, I reserve my remarks till that period. I may here, however, introduce an anecdote which Dr. Howe told me, and which I subsequently used as an illustration in my lectures. It showed the Effects of Exercise in improving the Dispositions.—A boy, who was extremely mischievous, was sent to him as a pupil. He was so full of destructive energy, that he broke the benches, tore the chairs asunder, swung on the doors till he wrenched them off their hinges, and perpetrated all sorts of mischief on frangible objects; while he was so restless, that he was incapable of bending his attention to books. Dr. Howe reasoned with him, appealed to his moral sentiments, and did every thing in his power to improve his habits by means of moral suasion; but with little success. He was satisfied that there must be causes for these dispositions, and endeavoured to discover them. He observed that the boy had large lungs, and a high sanguine temperament which gave him great strength and restless activity; also large organs of Destructiveness, that prompted him to exert those qualities habitually in injuring the objects around him. He thought of providing him with a legitimate field for the exercise of his dispositions. He sent him into the cellar every morning, for three hours together, to saw and split wood for the use of the institution. This exercise had the desired effect. After undergoing it for some time, he became quite willing to sit still in school and receive instruction with the other boys; and the benches and chairs were safe. The boy himself was delighted with the change, and soon sawed and split up all the wood in the cellar. He was then set to running, leaping, climbing poles, and disporting himself in various ways, in the gymnasium of the institution; and Dr. Howe found that so long as a legitimate and adequate vent for his excessive muscular energy was provided, he conducted himself with propriety, and was capable of mental application.

Nov. 16. Journey from Boston to New York.—We left Boston this day at 3 P. M. by the railroad, via Providence, Stonington, and Long Island Sound, for New York. We arrived at Providence between five and six o'clock; here left the cars, and crossed the Providence river in a steamboat. It was dark, and the bustle was great. We started again in railway cars; each containing twenty-four persons and a blazing stove. We arrived at Stonington at 9 P. M., and immediately embarked on board a steamboat. It was very large, and the whole hull was fitted up into two sleeping apartments; five sixths of the length was devoted to the gentlemen, and the remainder to the ladies. The gentlemen's cabins contained one hundred and fifty beds, in three tiers extending along each side. We paid $7 each at Boston for the whole fare, and got a ticket indicating the numbers of our beds. There are large blue curtains hanging in front of the beds, which are let down and run forward on brass rods, about a foot from the beds, so as to screen the passengers when undressing, and to produce a sort of privacy. The benefits of fresh air, however, are excluded. There is no provision for ventilation. At one o'clock A. M. I awakened with a painful sense of suffocation, and rose. I found all the windows closed, the cabin doors shut, two great stoves, at least twenty argand lamps, and more than one hundred pairs of lungs, all consuming air, without one aperture intentionally provided to allow it to enter! I found all the passengers and servants asleep, proceeded quietly up the cabin stairs, opened and fastened back two doors to admit fresh air, took a walk on the upper deck, enjoyed the clear bright starlight, and then descended and slept soundly, without having undressed.

Nov. 17. Long Island Sound and the East River.—We should have reached New York this morning at six, but the boiler of one of the steam-engines became unserviceable, and it was nine before we arrived. The day was beautifully clear and frosty. The sail in Long Island Sound must be lovely in summer, for even now it is interesting. About fifteen or twenty miles from New York, the Sound, which has run northeast and southwest, suddenly narrows and turns to the south. At this point, the United States are erecting an enormous battery to stop the approach of an enemy to New York in this direction. On the east lies Long Island; and on the west, Manhattan Island, on which New York stands. The narrow channel between them, although a continuation of the Sound, is named East River. The tide rushes through it with great violence. About three miles from New York, we passed Blackwell's Island, which stands in the middle of the stream, having a narrow channel and a rapid current on each side. It is about a mile long, and varies from five hundred to one thousand yards in breadth. It contains one hundred and twenty acres, and was lately purchased by the civic corporation of New York for $32,000. They have erected a prison capable of containing four hundred and eighty individuals at the south end, and a large and handsome lunatic asylum at the north end of it.

I have frequently read in the New York newspapers, letters from American travellers, complaining of the shameless impositions which are practised on them when they first land in Britain. Perhaps they do not know, that the same evil awaits English travellers when they first appear on the American shores. When we landed from the Great Western in September, we allowed a carter to take our baggage from the wharf to the Carlton-House Hotel, without making any previous bargain with him. He charged us 16s. sterling. On the present occasion, we arrived from Boston, and were taken for "Yankees," who have the reputation of being persons whom it is very difficult to cheat. We had all our former and two additional packages. I asked a carter for what sum he would carry the whole to the Carlton House, and his demand was $1 25 cents, or 5s. 3d.! In both instances the distance was nearly the same.

Nov. 19. Thermometer 32°. New York.—Phrenology.—I commenced my course of lectures in the Clinton Hall this evening at 7 o'clock. The arrangements were made by a committee before my arrival, and were essentially the same as at Boston. Each lecture lasted two hours, with an interval of five minutes, and three were delivered in each week. I found the lecture-room provided with a powerful ventilator for introducing warm or cold air as wanted, but without any aperture for permitting the vitiated air to escape. During the interval, I had the doors and windows thrown open, at first to the astonishment, but subsequently to the great satisfaction, of my audience.

New York City.—I have asked several intelligent persons what is the cause of the disorderly condition of the lower portions of this town, and find two reasons assigned for it. First, a large sea-port necessarily draws together a numerous population of inferior habits, and a constant influx and efflux of foreigners and strangers, many of whom are in a state of destitution, and some are the outcasts of European and American society; and, secondly, universal suffrage, without a register of voters, prevails; and not only are the great officers of the state and members of the legislature elected by the people, but in the city all the municipal officers, from the mayor to the constables, are chosen annually in the same manner. The lower classes form the great majority of voters, and any magistrates who should propose either to tax the city for the expense of a proper cleaning establishment, or of a police force sufficient to enforce order, would be deprived of their offices at the end of the first year. In this city, universal suffrage appears in its worst form, and is followed by its worse effects; and I frequently remarked to the higher classes of American citizens, who suffer from and lament these evils, that the United States generally ought not to be regarded as answerable for the condition of New York. It is the refuge of thousands of every grade, flying not only from misfortune, but from the criminal law in all parts of Europe and America.

Calvinism.—We heard Dr. Spring preach a highly orthodox sermon to a numerous and very respectable-looking congregation. I have listened to orthodox sermons in Scotland for upwards of thirty-five years, and have long ceased to hear a new idea from the pulpit. I find Calvinism precisely the same in America as on the other side of the Atlantic; so purely doctrinal, and so little practical; so completely systematic, and bearing so little reference to any particular time, place, or circumstances, that every preacher of it seems to repeat all other preachers.

November 29. Ther. 23°. Thanksgiving Day.—This is "Thanksgiving Day" in New York. Service is performed in all the churches, in which gratitude is expressed to God for his mercies, and the evening is spent in domestic festivities. The governor issues a proclamation recommending (not enjoining) its observance, and all the sects obey. The stores were shut during divine service, but in the evening many were open.

Civic Pauper, Lunatic and Prison Establishments.—I availed myself of the leisure which the day afforded, to visit the Almshouse, Lunatic Asylum, and Penitentiary at Bellevue, about three miles from New York, on the East River; also the Criminal Prison, and the new Lunatic Asylum on Blackwell's Island; and the school for charity orphan and destitute children on Long Island, called the Farm Schools. All these institutions are under the management of the civic corporation of the city. Some of the buildings at Bellevue are old, ill-adapted to their purposes, and crowded, and, in consequence, the inmates are not properly accommodated. The New Prison is occupied, and seems to be well managed, but this was no day of rejoicing for the prisoners. Labour was suspended, and they had remained all day idle, locked up in their solitary sleeping cells. The new Lunatic Asylum is a handsome building, on the moderate plan of such erections; but, strange to say, not the slightest arrangement had been made by the architect for ventilating it. The omission of apertures for the purpose struck one of the civic officers, who has a particular charge of these institutions, as an oversight, and he suggested the remedy of opening spaces between the plaster and the wall, from the bottom to the top of the building, making each room to communicate with them, and thus to carry off the vitiated air; which has been done. The children in the Farm Schools presented a melancholy aspect. The weather was cold, and as the cold had come on suddenly, many of them had not received their winter supply of stockings and shoes. They were crowding round the stoves with an expression of suffering and discomfort, which was distressing to behold. The buildings in which they live are frame or wooden houses, divided into moderate-sized rooms, low in the ceilings, and without any means of ventilation except the doors and the windows. They sleep crowded together in these apartments; the beds stand so close to the windows, and the air is so cold, that they are not open during the night, and the air is excessively vitiated before the morning. The consequences are visible in the appearance of the children; many of them are suffering under ophthalmia, and they present generally that sunken, inanimate, and unhappy aspect which betokens blood in a bad condition from imperfect nutrition and impure air. There is, I believe, no stinting of food; but the digestive functions suffer from the confinement in an unwholesome atmosphere, and hence the nutrition is imperfect.

On my return to the city, I made inquiries of several persons how it happened that these institutions are in a condition so unworthy of a great city, and various reasons were assigned. They lie upwards of three miles from the town, and so many pressing public duties are imposed on the members of the civic council, that they have not adequate time to visit them. One excellent person, whose attention was particularly directed to them, saw and proclaimed their imperfections to the council, but he could not succeed in drawing sufficient attention to their condition. Again: most of the buildings are old, and money is indispensable for their improvement. In New York, the whigs and democrats are nearly equally balanced, and each party makes "political capital" out of every increase of expenditure and taxation proposed by the other, and hence the party which should improve these institutions too rapidly at the expense of the citizens would lose their places. Economy there, as every where else, is the watchword of opposition; and in New York the people are disposed to place the advocates of it in power. Farther: In this city vast improvements, partly for the introduction of water, are actually in progress; many more are wanted; and the rulers are compelled to accomplish those works first which are advocated by the most influential persons. The poor, the insane, and the criminal have few, and these not noisy, advocates, and their interests are postponed. Lastly, it is an unpopular duty to expose the imperfections of any American institutions, and hence the actual condition of some of these establishments is really unknown to the great body of the upper classes of the city, who would otherwise be well disposed towards their improvement.

As some of the civic rulers, and a number of influential citizens, were attending my lectures, and as, in treating of physical education and insanity, I could legitimately introduce remarks on these institutions, I proposed to avail myself of this means of calling public attention, in the most respectful and delicate manner possible, to the condition of the poor children in the Farm Schools especially, but was told that the interference of a foreigner would give offence, and retard instead of advancing the object of improvement. Having more confidence, however, than my advisers, in the good sense and right feeling of my audience, and having no object except doing good in view, I did venture to mention in my lecture on physical education the want of provision for ventilation in the new Lunatic Asylum, and also the crowded and unwholesome condition of the pauper children in the Farm Schools. The remarks appeared in the "Daily Whig" newspaper, which regularly reported all my lectures, and no offence was taken, at least none was expressed to me.

Dec. 2. Thermometer 40°. We heard the Rev. Mr. Dewey preach an excellent practical discourse on the relative duties of parents and children. His composition and delivery are dramatic in effect; he paints his ideas, and places them almost tangibly before the mind, yet his manner is calm and soft, altogether free from theatrical gesticulations. This description may appear to imply a contradiction, yet it is literally correct.

Dec. 4. Ther. 32°. Asylum for the Blind.—We visited the Asylum for the Blind under the charge of Mr. Silas Jones. Mr. Jones has a large head, ample anterior lobe, large Benevolence, and Love of Approbation, with a sanguine nervous-lymphatic temperament, and is the very picture of joyousness and health. He has lectured publicly on Phrenology for a number of years, and published an instructive work on the subject, and has only recently been appointed to this institution. He practises Phrenology in his teaching, and selects his domestics by their heads.* We heard the pupils examined, and were gratified to observe their attainments in education, and the comfort which they enjoyed. They are good musicians, and take great pleasure in playing in concert. They weave rugs and mats, and make baskets and other articles of simple construction.

Phrenology.—One young lad in the asylum has a very large organ of Number, and is a great mental calculator. A little girl is extremely deficient in it, and she could never learn arithmetic. I sympathised with her, as I labour under a similar defect both of the organ and the power. This is a small organ, and from its position, outward from the external angle of the eye, there is difficulty in observing its dimensions accurately except in extreme cases. In these, however, its local situation and its functions are so clearly discernible, as to leave no room for doubt. I confess myself to be so deficient in the power of calculation, and in the development of the organ to such an extent, as to be incapable of learning the multiplication table; and I continue unable to add, subtract, and divide sums, even of a moderate magnitude, correctly, after thirty years' practice. I have observed, on previous occasions, that in the great majority of individuals who are born and continue blind, the organ of colouring presents an obvious deficiency in size, while it is developed to an average extent in those who have become blind only after the period of full growth; and in this asylum the same fact was found to present itself. It shows that an organ habitually deprived of its natural stimulus does not attain its full natural dimensions—an important point in education.

Lunatic Asylum at Bloomingdale.—We next visited this institution, situated six or seven miles north of New York, on the east bank of the Hudson. It is a handsome edifice, containing large and well-kept apartments, and it seems to be humanely managed. There appears, however, to be a defect in not enforcing labour as part of the sanative treatment. There are yards for exercise, and ground in which the patients may work in the proper season, but labour is not part of the discipline of the house. This evil is general in Asylums for the higher classes of patients, who regard labour as a degradation. The inmates pay board according to the accommodation furnished to them. Among the patients is an old soldier of the revolutionary war, who asked us what news there were abroad, and if the war was flourishing? His eye was still sparkling, although its socket was furrowed by a thousand wrinkles. Another patient announced that he had lately made an important discovery—a method of navigating the flames of hell-fire by means of steam!

In the course of conversation, a case was mentioned to me as having occurred in the experience of a highly respectable physician, and which was so fully authenticated, that I entertain no doubt of its truth. The physician alluded to had a patient, a young man, who was almost idiotic from the suppression of all his faculties. He never spoke, and never moved voluntarily, but sat habitually with his hand shading his eyes. The physician sent him to walk as a remedial measure. In the neighbourhood, a beautiful young girl of sixteen lived with her parents, and used to see the young man in his walks and speak kindly to him. For some time he took no notice of her; but after meeting her for several months, he began to look for her, and to feel disappointed if she did not appear. He became so much interested, that he directed his steps voluntarily to her father's cottage, and gave her bouquets of flowers. By degrees he conversed with her through the window. His mental faculties were roused; the dawn of convalescence appeared. The girl was virtuous, intelligent, and lovely, and encouraged his visits when she was told that she was benefiting his mental health. She asked him if he could read and write? He answered no. She wrote some lines to him to induce him to learn. This had the desired effect. He applied himself to study, and soon wrote good and sensible letters to her. He recovered his reason. She was married to a young man from the neighbouring city. Great fears were entertained that this event would undo the good which she had accomplished. The young patient sustained a severe shock, but his mind did not sink under it. He acquiesced in the propriety of her choice; continued to improve, and at last was restored to his family cured. She had a child, and was soon after brought to the same hospital perfectly insane. The young man heard of this event, and was exceedingly anxious to see her; but an interview was denied to him, both on her account and his own. She died: He continued well, and became an active member of society. What a beautiful romance might be founded on this narrative!

December 6. Ther. 42°. Colonel Burr.—I examined an authentic cast from nature, taken after death, of the head of the celebrated Colonel Burr, who killed General Hamilton in a duel, and afterwards attempted to get up an insane expedition from Blennerhasset's Island in the Ohio, the precise object of which is not well ascertained. He died at an advanced age, and the brain may have shrunk: the head at death was of average size; the intellectual region was moderately well developed, the organs of Individuality, Size, and Weight predominating. The organs of Amativeness, Philoprogenitiveness, Combaticiveness, Destructiveness, Secretiveness, Self-esteem, and Firmness, were large. Those of the moral sentiments, particularly Conscientiousness, were remarkably deficient. The moral region was shallow, and also narrow. In short, it was that kind of head which is generally found in criminals. It indicated sensual, fierce, vindictive, cunning, and selfish dispositions, unrestrained by justice or humanity, but combined with great courage, determination, and perseverance. The intellect is acute, but neither profound nor comprehensive. Burr was an infamous and heartless seducer; a vindictive duellist; and an adept in plausibility and falsehood. He enjoyed some degree of intellectual reputation, but his general conduct showed that he was a shallow politician, a nonentity as a statesman, and a third-rate lawyer. He loved his daughter dearly, and this was almost his only virtue.

Martin Van Buren.—On the same occasion,

I saw a cast from nature of the head of Mr. Martin Van Buren, the present President of the United States. The head is large; the anterior lobe is of ample dimensions in both regions. The base of the brain is largely developed; the coronal region is both broad and high. Secretiveness, Cautiousness, and Love of Approbation are very large, and Self-esteem is large. Acquisitiveness and Ideality are fully developed. Benevolence and Veneration are large. Firmness is rather less than Veneration, but not deficient, and Conscientiousness is only rather full, being the smallest of the moral organs. This head indicates power, and on the whole presents many of the elements of an estimable character. The combination of great Cautiousness and Secretiveness, however, with Conscientiousness and Firmness relatively less, will produce a tendency to prefer indirect to direct means of accomplishing an end. In difficult situations dexterity and address will be more relied on than open manly courage, and an apparent expediency will sometimes be preferred to justice. The intellect is capable at once of managing details, and taking in comprehensive views, and if, as is affirmed, appearances of mystification occasionally present themselves in his public conduct, they are not owing to imperfect intellectual perceptions, but are designed to serve a purpose. The combination of the whole organs resembles that which one would expect in a dexterous and successful courtier in an absolute monarchy, rather than in the president of a democracy.

It is impossible at present to obtain an impartial account of Mr. Van Buren's character in America. His political enemies ascribe to him the worst and meanest qualities, while his political friends confer on him every virtue and accomplishment. Judging from his head, I should be inclined to anticipate that posterity will probably not approve of all the means which he may have used to obtain and to preserve power, but that it will recognise him as having been actuated essentially by a love of the real good of his country, and having pursued it, in difficult circumstances, with no mean talent.

Houston Street Public School.—This school-house is a large new building, with a play-ground round it. The basement floor, sunk below the level of the street, is occupied by children from two to five or six years of age. There are nearly 150 of them in one apartment. It is low in the ceiling, and has no means of ventilation except the windows. The children are taught Wilderspin's exercises with the hands, marching and singing, in addition to reading. In the floor immediately above, are about 300 girls in one apartment. They learn reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and, if inclined, drawing. The room is high in the ceiling, and very light; and the girls looked clean, animated, and healthy. They read and spelled exceedingly well; but their book was Lindley Murray's Sequel to the English Grammar, and the part selected was the embassy of Coriolanus's wife and mother to induce him to spare Rome. In looking over the contents of their books, I could not help regretting, that in a country where so many important duties are devolved on women, and where they have so little time, after they leave school, for acquiring useful knowledge, some instruction more directly related to their condition than is contained in these works, should not be presented to them as part of their education. The writing of the girls is excellent. They are taught first on slates.

On the upper floor were about 300 boys, in a large, well lighted apartment, which is also well ventilated by means of large apertures in the ceiling. Their appearance also was pleasing. They recited in geography extremely well; but these children, from the youngest to the oldest, are not taught from objects, or made acquainted with the properties and modes of action of any thing that exists. The boys receive a few lessons in astronomy, but the whole remaining departments of natural science are shut out from them.

Defect in American Institutions.—One defect in the American institutions and social training at present appears to me to be, that they do not sufficiently cultivate habits of deference, prudence, and self-restraint. They powerfully call forth all the faculties that subserve the interests and ambition of the individual; but they leave the higher social qualities imperfectly exercised and ill-directed. There is no training of veneration, except in religious tuition, which is too often confined to vague moral instruction, and to the points of faith regarded as essential to salvation. Making allowance for individual exceptions, it may be stated, that an American young man, in emerging from schools, has scarcely formed a conception that he is subject to any natural laws, which he must obey in every step of his progress in life, or suffer. He has not been taught the laws of health, the laws by which the production and distribution of wealth are regulated, or the laws which determine the progress of society; nor is he trained to subject his own inclinations and will to those or any similar laws as indispensable to his well-being and success. On the contrary, he comes forth a free-born, self-willed, sanguine, confident citizen, of what he considers to be the greatest, the best, and the wisest nation on earth, and he commences his career in life guided chiefly by the inspirations of his own good pleasure. He votes and acts on the destinies of his country in the same condition of mind. In Britain, we cannot boast of much superiority in practical education, but our young men are not ushered into life so early; they are trained by the institutions and circumstances by which they are surrounded, to a greater exercise of prudence and self-restraint, and few of them wield political power.

It was my endeavour to explain to the Americans the importance of the new philosophy to a people in their present condition. Phrenology brings home to every mind capable of ordinary reflection, that all our functions and faculties, bodily and mental, are regulated by the Creator according to fixed laws; that within certain limits they produce enjoyment, and beyond these, misery. By teaching children this view of their own constitution, and also rendering them familiar with the physical, organic and moral laws, instituted by the Creator, and by training them to obey them, that reckless self-confident spirit which now animates many of them in the United States would be supplanted by a disciplined understanding and regulated affections. Their institutions render them indisposed to reverence man, or human wisdom; but still they may venerate God and practically fulfil his laws. Indeed this species of moral and intellectual discipline appears to me to be indispensable to the permanence and success of a democracy. If the Americans do not adopt it, and rely on it as their sheet-anchor, no other means which ordinary sagacity can discover, will lead them safely through the perils that will rise thicker and thicker in their path, in proportion as their population becomes more dense.

The children attending this public school, meet at 9 A. M., and continue in school till 12. They are then sent into the play ground for half an hour, and eat their dinner. They next resume their lessons till 3. They practise various manual exercises and evolutions calculated to circulate the blood and relieve attention; but still, this long period of continuous exertion is too great a draft on their attention. In my lectures I endeavoured to convince my audience that man thinks by his brain, as he walks by his muscles, and that as they would not impose a walk of six hours, with a rest of only half an hour, on young children, it is equally unwise to demand from their immature and still feeble brains that amount of exertion. The evil is both felt and acknowledged, but the reason assigned for the rule is, that if the children are once allowed to leave the school, many of them do not return till the next day; the distance to which they go, their own habits of self-will and self-indulgence, and the aversion of the parents to enforce discipline, combine to render it impossible for the teachers to secure regular attendance. This is a serious evil, and is one form in which the spirit of independence shows itself disadvantageously, even at this early period of life.

Homœopathy.—Dr. William Channing, a physician of talent and respectability, is a great advocate for homœopathy in this city. He has published an able and eloquent exposition of its principles, in a "Discourse on the Reformation of Medical Science;" but it meets with much opposition.

The Press.—I have had one specimen of the freedom which is sometimes used in publishing private remarks in the newspapers. There are in this country a considerable number of "Practical Phrenologists," who travel from place to place, give one, two, or three lectures free, to excite attention, and then examine heads and write characters for fees. When I have been told of the injury which these men do to Phrenology, I have answered that the educated men and philosophers are to blame for the consequences, because they neglect or decline to study and to teach Phrenology as a science; that being a useful and important natural truth, it cannot die; and that if it be refused admission into schools and colleges, it will seek refuge in the lyceums of villages. A friend of one of these "practical men" came to me to have my opinion of him. He, like fifty other persons, introduced himself, began with talking about things in general, and by degrees introduced the name of the individual in question, soliciting my opinion of him, but without giving me the least hint of any object he had in view, or even that he was interested in him. I stated all the good of him I could, and also mentioned several points in regard to which I thought him in the wrong. The friend, without my knowledge, published in one of the newspapers my favourable remarks, omitting the rest. The first notice that I received of the publication, was being asked by a gentleman whether I had "endorsed" all the errors and absurdities of the individual alluded to? I replied, Certainly not, and gave him authority to state that the paragraph in the newspaper had appeared without my knowledge or approbation. This proceeding may have been dictated by good feeling, and it led to no unpleasant results; but the principle of action involved in it is dangerous and improper.

Mercantile Library Association.—This evening I lectured to the Mercantile Library Association, on physical education, and the attendance must have approached to 700 persons. They have an extensive and well selected library, supported by 4000 members, who pay two dollars per annum each for the use of it and the reading-room. They provide lectures on the Tuesday and Friday evenings, during the winter season, for a fee of two dollars each person; and they have classes for particular branches of instruction, the fee to each of which is $8 per annum. The lectures are delivered by the most eminent and talented men of the union, but as each chooses his own subject, they are very desultory. The association pays as high as $50 for a lecture, when the individual and subject are attractive. At the present time it is proposed to engage permanently, four or more competent professors, whose duty it shall be to prepare and deliver, during the greater part of the year, successive and systematic courses of lectures upon the various branches of knowledge, most useful to those who are to be future merchants. These are stated to be, "The Principles of Commerce including Commercial Jurisprudence, and Social and Political Economy," which will form the department of one professor;—"Statistics of Commerce and the Arts, Commercial History and Geography, Agriculture, Mining," &c., to form the department of the second professor;—"Natural Philosophy, including Inorganic and Organic Chemistry, and Natural History in its Commercial Applications," to form the department of the third professor. That of the fourth to include "History, Moral and Intellectual Philosophy, Aesthetics," &c.

In the existing condition of elementary education in the United States, it may be questionable whether continuous and instructive courses of lectures will be well attended in the cities. I fear not; and the desultory system may be naturally the long prelude to higher objects. If the elements of natural science were once introduced into the common schools, so as to open the minds of the young to the deep interest and importance of such studies, the people would demand a higher instruction in lectures. In the mean time, it is consolatory to remark that the extent to which lecturing prevails, is a striking indication of mental activity, and it will, I sincerely trust, ultimately lead to important consequences.

December 8. Thermometer 40°. Public Defaulters.—Ever since we arrived in this country, we have read and heard a great deal about the elopement of Mr. Swartwout, collector of customs at New York, deeply indebted to the public treasury. A verb has been coined from his name, and every person who absconds with his employer's property in his possession is said to "swartwout." The subject has been invested with fresh interest by the sudden disappearance of William M. Price, Esq., district attorney for the southern district of New York, who also, according to the newspapers, is largely indebted to the public. I have learned the following particulars regarding the system pursued in the appointment of public officers.

By law, the public officers of the United States are appointed by the president, and approved of by the senate, and hold their offices during pleasure. Before General Jackson's presidency, the practice was to regard the appointments as virtually made during life and good behaviour, ad vitam aut culpam. It is particularly mentioned that Mr. John Quincy Adams, when president, being strongly urged to dispossess Mr. Thomson from the office of collector of customs for New York, requested the secretary of the treasury to report how long Mr. Thomson had held the office, and what was the state of his accounts. The report bore that Mr. Thomson had discharged the duties of collector for twelve years, had once been in arrear to the extent of sevenpence halfpenny, or some such sum, and had paid up the balance immediately on its existence being certified to him, (for it had arisen from an error in his figures). Mr. Adams said that he saw no reason which could authorise him to remove Mr. Thomson from his office.

Under General Jackson, however, the maxim was announced that "the spoils belong to the victors;" in other words, that the offices of the state belong to the triumphant party; and this principle was then acted on, and has since been pretty extensively followed (I am assured) by both whigs and democrats. Another form of speech for the same idea, is "rotation in office, no monopoly of power." The phrase "the spoils belong to the victors," seems to have been understood literally and acted on by some of the functionaries. I heard it positively asserted in society that General Jackson had been warned, and was offered evidence to show, that Mr. Swartwout was not a man to be trusted in such an office; but nevertheless, as he was a powerful political partisan, and a personal friend, the president appointed him to it. Many persons speak in favour of Mr. Swartwout as having discharged the duties of his office in a liberal and accommodating spirit, and regret that he was so far misled as to believe the public money to be his own legitimate "spoils."

It became the duty of Mr. Price to prosecute Mr. Swartwout, who had retired with the "spoils" to Europe; but instead of doing so, he chose suddenly to follow him into exile. It is stated in the "Daily Whig" newspaper of this date, on the authority of "an eye witness," that "the United States' flag was flying at the peak of the Liverpool steam-ship, and directly under it a blue signal, with a white ball upon it. When all was ready, all the hawsers except one were let go. The signal next dropt to the deck, and three minutes after a carriage drove to the wharf, from which Mr. Price and his son got out, and went on board."

I introduce these instances of malversation in public offices, and shall record others that fall under my observation, for this reason—that corruption in public men is one of the vices constantly urged against monarchical institutions; and it is instructive to observe, whether in a democracy there is that high-minded purity and disinterestedness in official persons which is generally expected, and which, if existing, would shed a moral lustre on the sovereignty of the people. A democracy must expect to be rigidly scrutinised on the subject of its integrity; because justice is its avowed foundation—equal-handed justice to all. If the United States exhibit to Europe the spectacle of public immorality flourishing under popular institutions, how are the friends of mankind to defend the great cause of political freedom?

Dec. 9. Therm. 20°. We attended the Episcopal church in Broadway, of which Dr. Hawkes is pastor. He is highly orthodox, and his congregation is fashionable, and as large as his church can accommodate. Like all the other churches we have visited in this country, it is most commodiously fitted up.

Dec. 11. Therm. 32°. Tobacco Chewing.—A Scotsman who has resided for a good many years in the United States, assured me that the following statement is essentially correct. A few years ago, a convention of clergymen of all denominations was held in New York, to promote Bible, missionary, and other religious societies, as to the utility of which they were all agreed. The inhabitants appointed a committee of themselves, who obtained the address of all the families who were willing to receive clergymen as guests during the convention, and ascertained the numbers each could accommodate. The clergy were distributed in the houses of these benevolent hosts; but the latter soon found their furniture and carpets distressingly damaged by the floods of tobacco juice which the clergy from the country districts poured out remorselessly upon them. At the next convention, very few names were presented to the committee; and, on inquiry, this damage was assigned as the cause. The matter was finally arranged by families sending their offers in these terms:—"Mr. A. B. will accommodate two clergymen, provided they do not chew tobacco." It is probable that this may be called an old "Joe Miller," as the Americans name all well-known disagreeable narratives; but whether it be old or new, I have seen occurrences that render it credible to me as a fact.

Physical Education.—I gave my second lecture on Physical Education to the Mercantile Library Association this evening. A skeleton and a number of anatomical drawings were introduced, and no objections to them were stated by the audience, which consisted of highly respectable persons of both sexes. This fact is mentioned solely on account of the charges of an absurd delicacy, which are sometimes made against the American women, who, it is said, put trousers on the legs even of their pianofortes. The views delivered were simple and elementary, such as are contained in the best works on Hygiene. I had heard so much of the great extent to which the Americans read, that I was afraid that I might appear to my audience as delivering a thrice-told tale; but they were attentive, and I was afterwards informed by a medical friend, that although they hear a good many doctrines about health, they do not generally carry any salutary rules consistently into practice, and that a rational exposition of the principles of Hygiene in lectures is still much wanted.

Dec. 12. Thermometer at 7 A. M. 40°; at 10 P. M. 22°. Morality of New York.—I have already remarked that New York is the rendezvous of the rogues of both Europe and America. A young Scotsman gave me an account of his own experience of the benevolence and honesty of his countrymen when he arrived here. He landed with $700 in his pocket, and soon became acquainted with a gentleman from his native place, who had been settled here for some years. This friend introduced him to another Scotsman, who also was in business in the city. They both overloaded him with civilities, and were extremely anxious to do for him. They soon found an excellent opening for him. They introduced him to a person who carried on a lucrative trade, and just wanted a young active partner, with $700 of capital, to realise a comfortable independence for both. A copartnership was formed, and a legal contract duly executed, by which he obtained a share in all the advantages, and became liable for a proportion of all the debts of the going trade. No sooner was it signed, than his friend, who had discovered the opening, immediately compelled him, as a partner of the firm, to pay him $200, which the senior partner owed him, and to relieve him of an obligation for $500, which he had granted as surety for the same person. In one week his $700 were gone; and in another he was bankrupt and in jail. He then discovered that one of his countrymen who had so ardently interested himself in his welfare, had fled from the criminal law in Scotland, had changed his name, and was now exhibiting an exterior of respectability in New York! This is the story as it was told to me by the sufferer. It may be erroneous, or may have been coloured by him, for his feelings were still strongly excited when I saw him; but it contains so much of the substance of what frequently takes place in this city, that I regard it as an illustrative anecdote, even although the particulars should not bear investigation. When these rascalities are reported in Europe, the Americans are supposed to be guilty of them all, because they are perpetrated in America; but this is not a just inference. The American rogues in this city are both numerous and dexterous; but Great Britain sends to it many who match them.

Dec. 14. Thermometer 42°. American Law of Copyright.—The Americans deny copyright to any author or publisher of a work first published in a foreign country, and suffer some evils themselves in consequence. This state of the law greatly retards the growth of a native literature, because no publisher can afford to pay their own authors adequately, when a more lucrative trade can be driven by the plunder of European literature. It impedes the advance of their own people in those feelings, and in that species of knowledge that is particularly related to their own condition. They devour the miscellaneous productions of European minds, many of them deeply imbued with principles the most hostile to American improvement, while they afford little encouragement to the production of books suited to their own advancement. The Quarterly Review, Blackwood's Magazine, and similar works, are reprinted, and extensively read, and they cultivate and keep alive the principles of aristocracy and toryism among the Americans to a greater extent than is generally believed. These feelings are not publicly avowed, but they nevertheless exist; and if the national mind is left in its present state of imperfect instruction, their influence will extend in proportion as society advances in wealth and condensation. Another evil is, that the Americans must often rest contented with the first edition of an English work, if it has been reprinted by an influential man, long after the work has advanced through many editions, and received great improvement in its native land. The following facts illustrate this point.

Messrs. Harpers, of New York, reprinted and stereotyped Dr. Andrew Combe's work on Physiology applied to Health and Education, immediately after its appearance in England, in 1834, and brought it out as a number of their "Family Library," in which form it was very widely circulated. In Britain, the work went rapidly through several editions, in the course of which it was greatly improved, and much valuable practical matter was added. A request was made to the Messrs. Harpers, that since they had, without any advantage to the author, taken actual possession of his work, they should at least do him and the public the justice to reprint the improved edition, and not continue to circulate one in every way inferior. This request was not complied with, because the first edition was stereotyped, and they did not choose to incur the expense of reprinting another, although by their own account they had already sold many thousand copies of the book. Feeling anxious that the new matter should in some way be rendered accessible to American readers, the author sent out by me a copy of the seventh Edinburgh edition, and on his behalf I offered it for republication to respectable publishers in Boston, and inquired whether they would reprint it, and make him any allowance for it. They expressed their willingness to do so, and pay a fair per centage on the sales, but added that in effect they could not do either; because although by law there is no copyright of British books in the United States, yet there is one by the courtesy of trade; for whoever first reprints an English work, secures the copyright of it to himself, and that as the Messrs. Harpers had obtained the right to this work by priority of publication, they could not interfere, even when the Messrs. Harpers continued to sell an inferior edition; and to this answer they all adhered.

I this day waited on the Messrs. Harpers—told them what I had done in Boston, and the answer I had received, and asked them to republish the book, and also to allow the author some recompense for the new matter, of which they were not in possession. They requested to see the new edition, and to consider of it. I sent for the work to Boston for their use, and meantime told them, that although the author could receive no benefit from the sales, he was so desirous that the American public should have access to the most improved edition, that if they and all other booksellers declined to reprint it, I should do so on his account, and employ the trade to sell the copies. Their answer was clear, and decided. "You may do in this respect as you see proper, but we reserve to ourselves the privilege of retaliating two blows for one on any man who shall republish it: this is our rule." I asked an explanation of this announcement, and was told that the copyright by courtesy is defended in this manner. If any publisher interfere with it, the party aggrieved reprints, in the cheapest form, two of the offender's own English reprints, and floods the market with them at the lowest possible price. The Harpers are rich, have extensive connections, and act so energetically in retaliating two blows for one, that no respectable publisher will interfere with them. I made inquiries at several respectable publishing houses in Boston, Philadelphia, and New York, whether they would sell the work on commission if I reprinted it, and stated in the preface the reason for doing so, namely, that the Messrs. Harpers continued to supply the public with an inferior edition; but no one would undertake even to sell it. They assured me that this branch of trade, viz. selling on commission, so extensively carried on in London, has scarcely an existence in the United States. I asked the cause of this, and was informed that the extreme difficulty and expense of collecting accounts, would swallow up any commission that could be afforded, and that, in point of fact, a large portion of the book trade in the United States is conducted by barter! I shall return to this subject.

CHAPTER IX.

Negro Slavery.—Those who defend slavery deny the right of foreigners to interfere with it; they speak of it as a domestic institution, with which nobody has any concern except the legislatures of the states in which it exists, and on this ground the House of Representatives of the United States, at Washington, on the 11th December current, refused to receive any petitions on the subject. Mr. Atherton, member for New Hampshire, presented a series of five resolutions; the vote was taken on the first resolution, "Resolved, That this government is of limited powers, and that, by the constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the institution of slavery in the several states of the confederacy;" which was carried, "ayes, 198; noes, 6." The practical result of this vote is, that they lay on the table, without reading, all petitions on the subject. The public sentiment is of such overwhelming force in the United States, that this vote indicates a very strong and general opinion among the people at large in accordance with it, so that the nation fairly identifies itself with the cause of slavery.*

Dec. 16. Ther. 32°. Health of the Clergy.—We heard Mr. Dewey preach a sermon on the text, "Love your enemies." In thought, expression, and delicacy, it was excellent. It is certain that a great number of the clergy of this country lose their health, which is generally, and I believe truly, ascribed to their unceasing labours. A very careful preparation is evident in their sermons. They also teach the young and visit their flocks extensively; and they obviously labour under a pretty constant anxiety about supporting their reputation. The Sunday is observed with as strict decorum here as in London.

Dec. 17. Ther. 32°. Religious Liberty.—At Boston, we were asked every Monday morning what church we had attended on Sunday. This question was put not in the spirit of persecution, to force us to attend church, but from a desire to hear our opinions of their churches and ministers. In New York, this question has not been asked; but to-day an Episcopalian clergyman from Virginia waited on me, introduced himself, and said that his rule was to reject all science that was at variance with the Bible; and as he had not time to study science itself, he judged of its accordance with Scripture, by the religious opinions of those who professed it; and if my religious creed was a sound one, (of course the same as his own,) he would be much inclined to believe in phrenology, because he had attended several of my lectures here, and was much interested. He concluded by saying, that there is a large number of religious persons in this country of the same mind with himself in regard to phrenology.

I asked him whether he had read Archbishop Whately's observations on the relation between science and Scripture. He said that he had not. I told him that the archbishop had said that the mode of proceeding which he had now mentioned is erroneous, and injurious equally to religion and philosophy; that there can be no false science, for if any doctrine be not true, it is not science at all; that real science is a mere statement of facts existing in nature and their relations; and that if erroneous representations of these be given, there is an answer to them in nature, which religious, as well as other inquirers are bound to adduce; and I added, that, as I rest my claims to public attention as a phrenologist solely on the accordance of my doctrines with nature, my own religious opinions have no more connection with these facts, than the faith of a professor of mathematics has with the truth of the propositions of Euclid. I requested him to consider what a multitude of powerful sects exist in this country, each differing from the others in their interpretations of Scripture, and in what a strange predicament science would stand, if the members of each of them were to refuse to recognise it, unless its professors agreed with them in their religious belief; that there can be no such thing as Unitarian science, Evangelical science, Universalist science, and so forth; that I came to teach natural truth to all sects, and declined to identify phrenology with any one of them; that my books and my life were before the world, and as a tree is known by its fruits, if any one felt an interest in my own religious opinions as an individual, he could judge of my faith from them. This exposition seemed not at all to meet the views of the reverend gentleman; but he was perfectly courteous and continued to attend the lectures.

The connection between Science and Religion.

—This is a specimen of many conversations which I have been drawn into on the same subject, both at home and abroad, and I have very rarely indeed met with religious inquirers who admitted the possibility of natural science serving them as a means of correcting their own scriptural interpretations. Blind to the fact, that the various sects differ widely in their interpretations of Scripture, and that none of them is entitled to claim the attribute of infallibility to itself, the sincere professor of each doctrine proceeds as if no views except his own could by possibility be true. It is consolatory to observe that some of the higher divines of the Church of England rise above this narrow-minded fanaticism. Archbishop Whately has led the van in defence of science, and the Rev. Baden Powell, Savilian Professor of Geometry in the University of Oxford, has recently followed in his footsteps. In his work on "the connection of Natural and Divine truth," he says, "Physical science is the necessary foundation of natural theology: certain of the truths it discloses are warnings against mistaking the purport of Scripture; and the right use of the caution thus inculcated applies widely in the interpretation of Revelation. Inductive philosophy is subservient both to natural and revealed religion. The investigation of God's works is an essential introduction to the right reception of his word."

If these remarks be well founded when applied to physical science, they are more so when phrenology is the subject of them. This science relates to man's moral and intellectual nature, one of the most important topics to which the Scriptures refer, and it requires only a small measure of reflection to perceive how directly it bears on the subject. If, for example, every faculty has received a special organ by which it manifests itself, it is undeniable that both organ and faculty proceed from the Creator. If each faculty has a legitimate sphere of action, the doctrine of original sin, as taught by some divines, must be founded on erroneous interpretations of Scripture; because man's nature cannot be wholly corrupt, if composed of powers every one of which has a legitimate natural sphere of action. If any faculty is without a legitimate sphere of action, then the Creator has instituted it to do evil, and man is its victim. Again, if individuals are naturally capable of exhibiting the Christian character in proportion, ceteris paribus, to the size of the moral and intellectual organs relatively to those of the animal propensities in their brains, one essential element in human improvement is an increase in the dimensions of the superior organs in relation to the inferior; yet there is no indication that this has ever proclaimed by the first promoters of Christianity. If that class of men in whom the organs of the animal propensities are very large, and those of the moral and intellectual faculties very deficient, be, in truth, morally idiotic, (which I believe them to be,) and if they constitute the great and habitual criminals who infect society—then, instead of being fit subjects for punishment here and hereafter, they are really patients who deserve our sympathy for their misfortunes, and who need our humane guardianship to restrain them from injuring society and themselves. Yet many of the interpretations of Scripture have been made in ignorance of these facts.

It is gratifying to observe that Professor Whewell, in his recent work, entitled "The Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences founded upon their History," has entered fully, and in an excellent spirit, into a consideration of the relation between Science and Scripture. He lays it down as a safe rule, that "so long as the supposed scientific discovery is doubtful, the exposition of the meaning of Scripture given by commentators of established credit is not wanted to be disturbed; but when a scientific theory, irreconcilable with this ancient interpretation, is clearly proved, we must give up the interpretation, and seek some new mode of understanding the passage in question, by means of which it may be consistent with what we know; for if it be not, our conception of the thing described is no longer consistent with itself." "The man of science is concerned, no less than any other person, in the truth and import of the divine dispensation; the religious man, no less than the man of science, is, by the nature of his intellect, incapable of believing two contradictory declarations. Hence they have both alike a need for understanding the Scripture in some way in which it shall be consistent with their understanding of nature. It is for their common advantage to conciliate, as Kepler says, the finger and the tongue of God, his works and his word."

Dec. 18. Ther. 32°. Phrenology.—I delivered my fourth lecture on Mental Education to an overflowing audience of the Mercantile Association, and was told by the secretary that the lectures had given satisfaction, and were calculated to do good.

Dec. 19. Ther. 35°. Painting.—We visited the exhibition of pictures by modern artists in the Stuyvesant Gallery, and were gratified to see so many works indicating talent. The portraits of females were particularly good. In the choice of the subjects the artists had avoided horrors; there were no Judiths and Holoferneses; no Circifications; no Bacchanalian Heathen Deities. A pure taste should no more relish such representations on canvass than in nature; and the rage for them in Europe appears to me to arise from the principle of imitation acting in the absence of judgment. In the fifteenth and sixteen centuries same time said maliciously: "I was sure that you would both seize this occasion to pay me a visit."

* The nation identifies itself with the constitution, which can neither be altered nor nullified by abolition or any other kind of petition; but only in a manner prescribed in one of its own articles. Virginia and the Carolinas might petition Congress to allow them the privilege of collecting the duties on customs for their own special benefit, just as constitutionally as Massachusetts and Connecticut could petition the same body to do away with slavery in the first mentioned states.—Am. Ed.

The two friends looked at each other in confusion, and seated themselves at a distance from the windows, so as to conceal, if possible, the immediate object of their visit.

But the baroness was not to be deceived by their politeness. "Come, mesdames," said she, "you had better take possession of this window before my old friends come; this place I have kept for Frederic," said she, turning to Pauline's friend.

"Aunt," said the child, "will it be a pretty funeral to-day?"

"Yes, my dear."

"Will there be a horse, and plenty of flags and feathers?"

"Wait, and you will see."

"Will there be music?"

"Yes."

Frederic clapped his hands. "Oh, how delightful! And aunt, will there be little tarts to day?"

"No."

"Why not, aunt? we had them at General Lamarque's funeral."

Edgar interrupted him. "What did you say, Frederic? little tarts at General Lamarque's funeral?"

"Yes," replied the baroness, laughing, "we had them in this room, on the table, and we will have some more this morning, if Frederic will promise not to be too greedy."

"Ah, it is that; I understand," said Edgar, "I imagined he alluded to a dish of such things carried perhaps in the procession."

"Hush, Edgar," said Frederic's mother in a low voice, "you will shock my aunt, she is very strict."

At this moment a noise was heard on the boulevards. "There it comes," exclaimed every body.

But, no, it is only an officer of the National.

Edgar leaned out of the window. "Mon Dieu! how many people; and the balconies are crowded with ladies: what a beautiful sight; blondes, brunettes—pink bonnets, white bonnets, blue bonnets, yellow bonnets, and shawls, and mantillas as gay as a rainbow—and on the boulevards brave soldiers drinking."

"Really," said the baroness, "it is much more like a public rejoicing than a lamentation."

And indeed it was. Every window of the high six storied Parisian houses was crowded to overflowing; the dressmaker might be seen with her hair curled, and her silk apron; old men who never went out, brave the damp air of Paris on this occasion; men of business, in the intervals between one letter and another, came to the window, making a pen. No opening in the form of a window is empty; at the fifth story may be seen cooks, chambermaids, scullions, grooms, porters—a numerous assemblage of both sexes, all in their Sunday clothes, together with what we had nearly forgotten to mention, more children together than the imagination could suppose the world to contain. On the boulevards, tables are set out under trees where soldiers, with mechanics, in whole families, are eating cakes, and drinking wine and beer. Even the trees are invaded by adventurous persons determined to have a good view. Men, women and children, of all classes, are mounted on chairs and benches. One fat old man, standing on a very narrow chair, in sneezing, lost his equilibrium, and fell to the ground, an incident which greatly diverted the crowd. At the corner of every street is an agglomeration of carriages, hacks, gigs, omnibusses, carts, wagons; in fact, every imaginable vehicle ever invented by man.

The "l'ortonné" Café presents an interesting scene to the observer; there the deceased is the only subject of conversation; his actions are discussed, his opinions commented upon, anecdotes of his private life related; they speak of his last moments, and are displeased to find that no memorable "last words" can be recorded.

"The devil!" said a young "elegant," helping himself to a bœufsteak de mouton, "this fellow must have said something in his last moments. 'I never heard of such a thing,' said another, (as he lighted his cigar,) "if he said no last words we must make some for him."

All wits now are at work to fabricate some "last words." If the person in question had been a republican, he is made to have predicted liberty; if a philosopher, a joke upon a future state is ascribed to him; if a philanthropist, his last words were those of humanity, dictated by his never ending benevolence; if a man of wit, the task is more difficult. But still, something is at last hit upon. Ten young men in the prime of life and health are at least equal, for such a composition, to the worn out wit on his death-bed. The "last words" are by them industriously circulated in every quarter.

"You heard what his last words were?"

"No."

"They are then repeated with a serious air."

"Oh, beautiful; and so like him."

The last words of the dying general are received every where with avidity; they spread like wild-fire, leap from mouth to mouth, from table to table; from the shopkeeper to the customer, and from the customer again to other shopkeepers;—they run down the broad staircase, penetrate into the boulevards, there divide, multiply, and spread from tree to tree, from chair to chair, from bench to bench.

In the mean time these mischievous authors in the Café Tortonné have thought of something much better, much more appropriate. They are anxious to suppress that which they have already sent forth; but it is too late; it has been already taken up and put into the papers, where it shines with all the lustre shed upon it by the glory of the great departed.

Ah! many amusing things happen on this day of the great funeral; but the most amusing moment of all the day, is that in which the procession begins to move. At this moment the lazy, who had not finished dressing, the indifferent, who did not deign to look on, the religious, who scorned to pollute their eyes with the pestilence of such vanities, suddenly attracted by the music and hurraing, all crowded to the windows; here appeared one just out of bed, there, another, half shaved, with a razor in his hand, another in a nightcap, another with her hair all in papers; some in dressing gowns, some in shirts; servants with brooms in their hands, or some article of furniture they have been washing or dusting. No matter how or what, every one wants to see, and thinks not of being seen; and, in fact, not one in a thousand does see them.

As the procession advances, china and glass shops are shut up.

What for?

Why, at General Lamarque's funeral, the cavalry backed, and backed into our windows, and broke ever so much of our wares.

Ah! it was in their enthusiasm; there was no harm in that.

The funeral car comes slowly on. "Come, Frederic," said the baroness, "look here! you have had pies enough."

Paris now was all silence. One heard nothing but the horses' footsteps.

Next came gentlemen of high rank and importance in the city, slowly marching with heads uncovered.

A young man followed, his head bared, his countenance showing signs of the deepest grief—he was the son of the general.

On the funeral car was a sword, a cross of the Legion of Honour, and a general's epaulettes.

A battle horse followed, caparisoned with black crape. Military music was now heard playing the march of the "Gazza Ladra."

Then the rolling of the heavy muffled drums.

A detachment of the National Guard of Paris.

The companies of the National Guards of the jurisdiction.

Schools with their banners.

Corporations with their banners.

Societies with their banners.

And then a regiment, a company of soldiers or cavalry; in fact, every honour proper to the character of the deceased; and then the carriages containing all those who aspired to the public office held formerly by the deceased.

"Ah, that was beautiful," said Frederic, when it had all passed.

Pauline took out her handkerchief, and dried her tears.

Her friend dried a very small tear with the back of her hand.

Edgar wiped away a great big tear with his glove.

"Why! you are all crying, I do believe," exclaimed the baroness.

"Ah, madame," said Pauline, smiling, "I can never look at a horse covered with black crape, and a sword on a coffin without crying."

"And you, niece?"

"Me, aunt! I can never help crying a little when I hear that beautiful march of the Gazza Ladra."

"And you, Mr. Edgar, you are an officer of cavalry."

"Madame," replied Edgar, with emotion, "two years ago I saw the funeral of my own father."

LIFE IN ITALY.

The London Metropolitan, for March, has an article on "The Baths of Lucca in the Summer of 1840," from which we extract the following account of the condition and character of the common people of that section of Italy:

The common people, especially those on the mountain, generally keep two small cows and a heifer, which they feed on the scarlet clover and lupine, ash leaves, and shrubs, and occasionally turn them out to graze on the patches of rich grass on the mountains. The milk is rich and excellent, and the butter, though white, would be equally well tasted if properly managed; but they do not understand a dairy here, and never wash out the milk sufficiently from the butter, which makes it sour; we tried to explain this, but we find them as conceited as their sisters in Dorsetshire. Beside butter, they make a substance of curds and butter mixed together, called ricotta, resembling the Scottish crowdy, and which they bring to us, neatly put up in baskets made of fern leaves.

The better class are, in general, proprietors of a certain quantity of land, cultivated either as vineyards, if on the sunny side of the hill, or in grain if in the valley; beside which they rent land on lease from the great proprietors or signori, and a pezza, or part of a chestnut wood. The share system is strictly followed, and half of every kind of produce is delivered to the landlords, from wine and fruit down to eggs and butter. They live well, generally having soup and meat daily, especially in winter, cheese, and good home-made brown bread, from the flour of the grano grosso, with wine in abundance. In short, as they say to us, "We have plenty of food, wine and fruit; what we want is money, but that we find it almost impossible to get."

The poor classes, on the contrary, who inhabit the mountain villages, are very ill off. The men come down daily, sometimes four miles, to labour on the roads, &c., for a paul a day. They can rarely buy wheaten bread, still more rarely butcher meat; they chiefly subsist on chestnut meal made into porridge, and thin cakes, called netci, unleavened, and baked like the Scottish barley scone; they have a sweetish taste, and, eaten with fresh butter, are not bad, but are so heavy and indigestible, that one, with a little wine, will support a labouring man for a day. These people are employed to gather the chestnut harvest of the signori, and get two fifths of the produce as payment for their labour. On this they subsist till exhausted, and then they must buy the meal from the fatture of the proprietor, who keeps it in stores for the purpose, and sells it enormously dear to the poor creatures. One day we met a poor old woman, who had come down from one of the highest mountains for the purpose, and was carrying home a few pounds in her bag, and that, she said, was all they had to live upon till their little crop of grano was ripe. The women spin hemp on the distaff, for household linen; work hard at all kinds of field labour, carry enormous loads of hay and straw, on their heads, up the steep mountain paths. Many of them are also engaged as servants during the season, by families at the baths. Every thing is carried on the head here; the women have a padded cushion, or fold a handkerchief into that form, place it on the crown of their head, and put on it whatever they have to carry, even baskets of manure for the fields. We were sitting one evening by the fountain on La Montagna, when two girls came down from the village of La Croce, with large copper pails to draw water. When the pails were filled, each folded her handkerchief, put it on her head, lifted her pail, full to the brim, and then, without assistance, or spilling a drop, placed it on her head, and walked nimbly up the steps, and along the mountain path. I have even seen women, when so laden, spin on their distaffs as they walked along. One would think that this classic mode of carrying their burdens would insure an erect carriage and a graceful step; quite the contrary: the lower class of peasantry are the most ungainly, misshapen figures I ever saw. Constant out-door labour makes their skins shriveled and brown as mahogany, and their features are not in general good; their shoulders are high, and their necks short. The bust is entirely destroyed by the wooden stays which, covered with scarlet cloth, or some other gaudy colour, they constantly wear from childhood. This frightful breast-plate is in two pieces, which fasten under the arm, and are exactly the same behind and before, enclosing the form like a shell-fish, and pressing down and flattening the bosom. Add to this the short thick waist, the tight sleeve of their dress, and the unkempt and staring locks of their coal-black hair, and it may be conceived that one of these poor people possesses few attractions beyond her piercing black eyes. When out of doors, all, even the children, cover the head with a handkerchief, the end hanging down on each side; on week days it is of coloured cotton, but on feasts, of white cotton, or coarse tulle.

Amongst rich peasants there are some very handsome countenances, and not bad figures. They wear the proper French corset, and exceedingly well-fitting gowns, with sleeves as well plaited down, and flounces as numerous as our own. Their hair is neatly plaited, tucked behind their ears, and thrown over their head; they wear an extremely fine embroidered tulle veil, which has a pretty graceful effect. Yesterday we walked behind three of these young peasants; their waists were as well laced in, their bustles as large, their skirts as full, and stiffly starched, and their embroidered muslin canezons as fine as those of the ladies around them; and as they walked along, fanning themselves and conversing gaily, they really made no despicable appearance. Indeed the rich people, of all ages, pay great regard to the fashions. The other day, our landlady, Carlotta, was showing us her silk wedding-dress, and remarking that she had bought some bracie, more than required; she added, that it was very convenient, for "when I was married, flounces were in fashion, and then bias tucks, and then flounces again," and this is a hard-working woman, who washes our clothes, manages a large family of children, and bakes her own bread, though her husband is a road contractor, and proprietor of a nice bit of land in valley and on mountain. The upper class of peasants are in general better looking than the women; we have seen several remarkably fine countenances. On ordinary days they wear caps of round corduroy, or dark velveteen jackets; but on festas there is a great turn-out of broad-cloth and black hats; the cigar is always in use. Most of them can read and write; they are men of excellent industrious habits, and possess considerable wealth.

The poorer peasants, who live by daily labour, seldom, when at work, wear more than a chemise and a pair of short linen drawers; their naked legs and feet are dark brown, and their features coarse. They are extremely industrious, making their boys work as soon as they can carry a burden, and cultivating every little nook or corner near their cottage. All classes are kind-hearted and charitable, patiently supporting their own poverty, and maintaining their destitute relations, without a murmur, even adopting, and rearing amongst their own children, friendless orphans, without any prospect of compensation. The honesty and morality of the Lucchese peasantry are well known, and even the bad example of the profligate couriers, and bad characters that yearly swarm to the baths, have not yet materially injured their good qualities. Either alone, or attended by a country boy, a lady can at all times take the most distant rambles, on horseback and on foot, without fear of receiving even an uncivil word. When thefts are committed, the culprit is always found to be a person from a distance, attracted here by the confluence of rich strangers.

The work which they perform, considering their very inefficient means, is surprising. A new road, with a high embankment and retaining walls, is now making along the Lima, on the Modena road, and a bridge building across the Camajoni to connect it. All the earth which forms the embankment, and the smaller stones, are brought up, from the bed of the river, in little round baskets, on the shoulders of boys from eleven to fourteen years old. The large stones are carried one by one on the shoulders of the men. We tried to explain to the Direttore, who superintends the work, the advantages of wheelbarrow and hand-barrow, but he shook his head, and said that "their own way was the best." The work is really making considerable progress, but a hundred and fifty men are employed, for five or six months, in doing what fifty English labourers, with their appliances, would accomplish in two.

They begin to work before five in the morning, and rest an hour at nine, at noon, and four o'clock, then continue to work till past seven. In place of resting during the hours of relaxation, most of them dance and sing in chorus during the whole time, huzzaing, and making an incredible noise. The other day they procured a violin, and not only danced and sang during the day; but, it being Saturday, when they left off work in the evening, a party of them who belonged to Monabbia, a village on the top of a mountain about four miles off, made the violin accompany them, and danced along the road, through the Ponte and up the mountain, with as much laughter, singing, and shouting, as if they had been on a party of pleasure. And yet these men had been working all day in the sun, when the thermometer stood in the shade at 78° of Fahrenheit. Their dinner consists of black bread, raw onions, and most commonly they drink water, though a few have wine. Sometimes a kind English lady gives them a present of bread and wine, and then the vivas rend the air.

It is somewhat difficult to judge of the state of their religious feeling. The priests force them to keep all the festas, and to attend mass regularly; but, as far as we can judge, they have no great reverence for either. One day (the eve of a festa) we heard them laughing, and saying they must go to mass the next day, they did not know why. And being in the church one festa, while the procession was passing out, an old woman turned round, and gave us a smile of a very equivocal character, just as the cross was passing her. They fast, regularly, however, every Friday and Saturday, and on the eve of many saints' days beside.

NEW BOOKS.

On Heroes, Hero Worship and the Heroic in History. Six lectures. Reported with emendations and additions. By Thomas Carlyle, author of "The French Revolution," "Sartor Resartus," &c. New York, D. Appleton & Co. 1841.

This is the best of Mr. Carlyle's books, and will be by far the most popular. The subjects discussed have more of general interest; the style is more conformable to the common ideas of beauty and propriety; and the work, on the whole, is vastly more readable than any of those which the author has produced since he abandoned his first style, and adopted those peculiarities of diction which constitute his principal charm among his admirers.

The transcendental philosophy of the author's school is quite distinctly put forth in this volume; but it is not rendered so prominent as it was in "Sartor Resartus." Perhaps this may arise from a disposition to conciliate public opinion. It is pretty evident that the transcendental philosophy will not go down in large doses. It must be administered, at first, somewhat after the homeopathic fashion.

Outlines of Geography and History, presenting a Concise View of the World. By Frederick Emerson, author of the North American Arithmetic. Philadelphia, Hogan & Thompson, 1841.

Mr. Emerson is well known to the friends of good education throughout the United States through his excellent work entitled the North American Arithmetic. Since the completion of that work, he has diligently devoted himself to the composition of another, to be comprised in two parts, embracing geography and history in connection, carrying the student through both at the same time. The excellence of this design is such as to need no commenting to those who have reflected on the importance of associating, in the mind, places and the events which give them importance in the world's history. The little volume before us forms the introduction to the more extended work which will appear in 1842. Like the Arithmetic, the first book is prepared on a most judicious plan, and will become exceedingly popular.

Barnaby Rudge.

The third number is now ready. It carries forward the narrative rapidly, and presents us with some striking pictures. The frontispiece is a very fantastical but clever piece of invention. Time's hour glass swallowing up the characters of the old story, is not a bad idea. How old fashions are revived! These pictured allegories adorn some of the earliest books that were printed.

DRAWING BOOKS.

Messrs. Hogan & Thompson (Chesnut street below Fourth) have recently published a very important series of elementary works on the art of drawing. The largest is a reprint of the famous Elementary Drawing Book of J. Rubens Smith, the most complete ever published in this country, including all the different branches of the art, and comprehending many thousand objects. It is unnecessary to characterise a work so well and favourably known as this. The next volume is Mr. J. T. Bowen's United States Drawing Book, which comprehends a treatise on the art and exercises in landscape. The next volume, entitled My Own Sketch Book, is the smallest in size and cheapest in price. It comprises a variety of exercises on miscellaneous objects, landscapes, trees, and the human figure. Any of the works may be had separately.

SPIRIT OF SOCIETY IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

It is somewhat remarkable, that that power of ridicule so generally cultivated as a science in France, has scarcely exercised over the tone of feeling in that country so repressing an influence as it has among ourselves. It never destroyed in the French the love of theatrical effect; and even in the prevalence of those heartless manners formed under the old régime, it never deterred them from avowing romantic feeling, if uttered in courtly language. Nay, it was never quite out of fashion to affect a gallant sentiment or a generous emotion; and the lofty verse of Corneille was echoed with enthusiasm by the courtiers of a Bourbon, and the friends of a Pompadour. But here, a certain measured and cold demeanour has been too often coupled with the disposition to sneer not only at expressions that are exaggerated, but at sentiments that are noble. Profligacy in action surprises, shocks, less than the profession of exalted motives, uttered in conversation, when, as a witty orator observed, "the reporters are shut out, and there is no occasion 'to humbug.'" We confess that we think it a bad sign when lofty notions are readily condemned as bombast, and when a nation not much addicted to levity, or even liveliness, is, above all others, inclined to ridicule the bias to magnify and exalt. A shoeblack of twelve years old, plying his trade by the Champs Elysées, was struck by a shoeblack four years younger. He was about to return the blow—an old fruitwoman arrested his arm, exclaiming—"Have you then no greatness of soul?" Nothing could be more bombastic than the reproof. Granted. But who shall say how far such bombast influenced the magnanimity of the labouring classes in that late event, which was no less a revolution in France, than the triumph of the human species? Exaggeration of sentiment can rarely, as a national trait, be dangerous. With men of sense it unavoidably settles into greatness of mind; but moral debasement—a sneer for what is high,—a disbelief of what is good, is the very worst symptom a people can display.

The influence which it is the natural province of the drama to exert towards exalting the standard of sentiment and opinion is not, at this time, it will readily be allowed, very efficacious in counterbalancing the worldly and vulgar tendency to degrade. Tragedy sleeps side by side with the epic; and the loftier shapes of comedy have dwindled into farce, that most dwarfish imp of all the varieties of dramatic humour.

It would be a matter of speculation deserving a larger notice than we can afford it here, to inquire how far our national literature is influenced by the place which our literary men hold in society. That men of letters do not enjoy in England their legitimate and proper rank is a common and true complaint. There is, doubtless, something equivocal in their station. An English author of but moderate eminence at home, is often astonished at the respect paid to him abroad. Political power—the chief object of desire with us—leaves to that direction of intellect which does not command it but a moderate and lukewarm homage. Fashion may indeed invest the new author with a momentary eclat; but the "lion" loses his novelty, and the author ceases to be courted. We recollect to have heard one of the most brilliant and successful writers of the day exclaim, that he would rather, for the gratification of social vanity, be a dull, but officious member of parliament, than enjoy his own high and popular reputation as an author. The vanity of authors is not, then, confined to their profession, which does not bring them a reward sufficiently palpable and present. Led, like the rest of their countrymen, by the rage of fashion, they long for the reputation of being admitted to brilliant society, rather than the consideration accorded to them in literary circles. One effect, at least, not favourable to the higher and purer branches of composition, is produced by this uneasiness and yearning. Straining for the effect, the glitter or the novelty that will render them "the fashion," they give to literature a feverish and exaggerated cast. They grasp at the humour, sometimes the frivolity, of the moment, and endeavour to hurry the serene and dignified glories of literature into a succession of "lucky hits." Two other effects noticeable, we think, among Englishmen of letters, may be derived from the same cause. First, the want of that social brilliancy which is generally the characteristic of a Frenchman eminent in literature. When one of our most popular moralists observed, "that he never knew a man of sense a general favourite," he uttered a sentiment peculiarly adapted to charm the English. In France every man of sense would have aspired to be a general favourite, and every man of literary distinction might have won easily enough to that ambition. But here intellect alone does not produce fashion, and the author, failing to attain it, affects the privilege of railing, and the right to be disappointed. This dissatisfaction at the place destined to the nature of his exertions—this consciousness of enjoying neither that station of honour, nor that method of being honoured, which he has been taught to covet—is almost necessarily destructive to the self-confidence and self-complacency, without which no man makes a great proficiency in the graces of society, or the courageous profession of a wit. The second effect, produced by the desire to shine in other circles than their own, is, we think, visible in the scattered and desultory manner with which our literary men encounter each other; they do not herd closely together. There is not among them that intimate knot and union which was, and is, characteristic of the authors and beaux esprits of Paris, and produces so remarkable an influence on their works—giving to their philosophy the graces of animated conversation, and colouring their style with that air of life, and fulness of worldly knowledges which, whatever be the changes and caprices of their literature, invariably remain, sometimes the staple, and almost always the predominant characteristic. When Helvetius produced that celebrated work, so rich in anecdote, illustration, and isolated brilliancies of remark, he was accused of merely collecting, and forming into a whole, the opinions current in the circles with which he mixed every day. It would be somewhat difficult for an English philosopher to subject himself, with any semblance of justice, to a similar accusation.

It would be a little unjust to quit our subject without saying any thing upon what we consider improvements in the condition of society; the more especially as some points, that appear to us worthy of praise, have been the subject of vulgar complaint. We hear, for instance, much pathetic lamentation on the decline of country hospitality, at a time when that "first cousin to a virtue" seems more deserving of commendation than at any period referred to by its detractors.

In what did the hospitality of the last century consist? An interchange of dinner visits between country neighbours,—a journey some half a dozen miles over wretched roads, and a return home some eight hours afterwards, with the footman drunk, the coachman more drunk, and the master most drunk. Hospitality, in a word, was a profusion of port wine; and the host welcomed his friends by ruining their constitutions.

Houses, much less conveniently arranged than at present, were not often capable of affording accommodation, for days together, to visitors from a distance. Few, comparatively speaking, were the guests who found their way from the metropolis to these rustic receptacles of Silenus; and the strangers were then stared at for their novelty, or ridiculed for their refinement—oracles to the silly and butts to the brutal. What an improvement in the present tone of country hospitality! Instead of solemn celebrations of inebriety—instead of jolting at one hour through the vilest of lanes, to return at another from the most senseless of revels,—improved roads facilitate the visits of neighbours, improved houses accommodate a greater number of guests, and an improved hospitality gives to both a welcome reception, without endangering their health or making war on their reason. The visitors are more numerous; the victims less. To give a dinner, or to receive a gentleman from London, are not the events in a squire's life that they were in the last century. At stated periods of the year the house is filled with persons who can be cultivated as well as manly; and improvements in opinions are thus circulated throughout the country, as well as improvements in gun-locks.

So far, indeed, from the tone of society in the country being, as formerly, considerably below that in the metropolis, it is now, perhaps more graceful and courteous. The host, dissatisfied with his station in London, beholds his acres and his hall, rises into a great man in his province, and, content with the tokens of his own consequence, naturally grows complaisant to others. The petty vying and the paltry cringing are no longer necessary—the heartburn of fashion ceases—there is no compromise of comfort and nature for the attainment of wearisome and artificial objects; even the coldness, the distraction and the formality incident to London coteries, subside with the causes; and that tone of general equality which the most courtly circles can alone establish in a capital, becomes the easy and natural characteristic of the manners in a country mansion.

Another main feature in the aspect of society is the improvement and multiplicity of clubs. That the luxuries of these houses render husbands less domestic, and impart to sons notions disproportioned to their fortune, have been made very common and vulgar grounds of attack. With regard to the first we will own frankly that that mere animal habit which would confine men to the narrow circle of their firesides, and render it a misdemeanour to seek rational intercourse abroad, might, we think, be lessened, without operating in any way to the disadvantage of society. But, in fact, so rigid a domesticity exists little among the classes for which clubs are as yet chiefly instituted. We fear that at those witching hours of night, in which the gentleman is at his club, the lady and her daughter, so far from deploring his absence at home, are enjoying themselves at the ball or the soirée. The latter charge is equally ridiculous. That all men are not rich enough to enjoy a good house, airy rooms, new publications, the constant society of their acquaintances, and the decent pleasures of the table, is a grievance very much to be lamented; but that when men can obtain these advantages without being rich, there should be any harm in enjoying them, because they are not rich, or that they should be more discontented with a small room, because they have the power of quitting it for a large room whenever they please, are notions in metaphysics with which we cannot agree. Besides, while the principle of a club is economy, its temptations are not those of extravagance; while a young man is enabled by its organisation to save half his income, he meets there little that could allure him to spend the other half. The more attached he becomes to the quiet and orderly habits of a club life, the less he will feel inclined towards the expenses of that dissipation to which the routine of a club life is so opposed. A third objection, sometimes urged against clubs, would be serious indeed, were it generally founded in truth, viz. the custom of gaming. But gaming is not practised in the great majority of clubs, especially those lately established. In the few notorious for the support of that vice, the usual advantages of a club, viz. economy, the facility of intellectual conversation, etc. are not found; they are gaming-houses, in a word, with a more specious name; and we willingly surrender them, without a word of defence, to the indignation of their impugnors.

The increase of clubs we think favourable to the growth of public principle. By the habits of constant intercourse, truths circulate, and prejudices are frittered away. "Nothing," observes that great writer, in whom we scarcely know which to admire the most, the brilliant imagination, or the quiet rationality—"nothing more contributes to maintain our common sense than living in the universal way with multitudes of men;" and, let us add, that it not only maintains our common sense, but diminishes the selfishness of our motives. In the close circle of private life, public matters are rarely and coldly discussed. In public, they form the chief topic; and made interesting, first as the staple of conversation, they assume, at length, an interest and a fascination in themselves.

We cannot quit our subject without adverting to that tone of consideration and respect towards the great bulk of the people, which especially characterises the present time and was almost a stranger to the past. Even in the ancient democracies, in which the flattery of the people was the science of power—even among the later Paladins of Chivalry,—"rough to the haughty, but gentle to the low"—mirrors not less of courtesy than valour—the tone alike of literature and philosophy breathes with a high contempt for the emotions and opinions of the vulgar. Among the Greeks—the crowd—the herd—the people—their fickleness—their violence—their ingratitude, furnished the favourite matter to scornful maxims and lordly apothegms. Taking their follies and their vices as the common subject for notice, where do we find their virtues panegyrised, or their character dispassionately examined? And in the models of chivalry, the "doffing to the low" was but the insult of condescension; the humble were not to be insulted, because they were not to be feared. But the instant the aspirer of plebeian birth attempted to rise against the decrees of fortune, the instant he affected honour or distinction, he was "audacious varlet," and "presuming catiff." The tender and accomplished author of the Arcadia, that noble work in which chivalry appears in its most romantic and lovely shape, evidently esteems it the proof of a thoughtful and lofty mind, to disdain the multitude and rise beyond a regard for their opinion. Were it not something profane to accuse so glorious a benefactor as Shakspeare of any offence, it might, perhaps, be justly observed, that while his works abound with pithy sarcasms on the foibles of the common people, they have never brought into a strong light their nobler qualities; even the virtues accorded them are the mere virtues of servants, and rarely aspire beyond fidelity to a master in misfortune. While, in his mighty page, the just and impartial mirror has been held to almost every human secret of character among the higher and middle classes of life, how little have the motives and conduct of the great mass (beyond what are contemptible) been sifted and examined; how many opportunities of displaying their firmness, their fortitude, their resistance to oppression, of sympathising with their misfortunes and their wrongs, have been passed over in silence, or devoted rather to satire than to praise! But not now, thank God, is it the mode, the cant, to affect a disdain of the vast majority of our fellow creatures,—an unthinking scorn for their opinions or pursuits: the philosophy of past times confused itself with indifference; the philosophy of the present rather seeks to be associated with philanthropy.

We trust that those who have the power to influence the bias of popular sentiment will inculcate what has too long been the subject of jest or incredulity, viz. the glory of promoting public interests; and the necessity, in order to bring virtue from the Hearth to the Forum, of calling forth from their present obscurity and neglect those rewards to exertion, which confer, if they be but rightly considered, a deeper respect than wealth, and an honour more lofty than titles.

From Carlyle's Lectures.

THE HERO AS KING.

CROMWELL, NAPOLEON, MODERN REVOLUTIONISM.

We come now to the last form of Heroism; that which we call Kingship. The Commander over Men; he to whose will our wills are to be subordinated, and loyally surrender themselves, and find their welfare in doing so, may be reckoned the most important of Great Men. He is practically the summary for us of all the various figures of Heroism; Priest, Teacher, whatsoever of earthly or of spiritual dignity we can fancy to reside in a man, embodies itself here, to command over us, furnish us with constant practical teaching, tell us for the day and how what we are to do. He is called Rex, Regulator, Roi: our own name is still better; King, König, which means Gan-ning, Able-man.

Numerous considerations, pointing towards deep, questionable, and, indeed, unfathomable regions, present themselves here: on the most of which we most resolutely, for the present, forbear to speak.

As Burke said that perhaps fair Trial by Jury was the soul of Government, and that all legislation, administration, parliamentary debating, and the rest of it, went on, in order "to bring twelve impartial men into a jury-box;"—so, by much stronger reason, may I say here, that the finding of your Ableman, and getting him invested with the symbols of ability, with dignity, worship (worth-ship), royalty, knighthood, or whatever we call it, so that he may actually have room to guide according to his faculty of doing it,—is the business, well or ill accomplished, of all social procedure whatsoever in this world! Hastings speeches, Parliamentary Motions, Reform Bills, French Revolutions, all mean at heart this; or else nothing. Find in any country the Ablest Man that exists there; raise him to the supreme place, and loyally reverence him: you have a perfect government for that country; no ballot-box, parliamentary eloquence, voting, constitution-building, or other machinery whatsoever can improve it a whit. It is in the perfect state; an ideal country. The Ablest Man; he means also the truest-hearted, justest, the Noblest Man: what he tells us to do, must be precisely the wisest, fittest, that we could any where or any how learn;—the thing which it will in all ways behove us, with right loyal thankfulness, and nothing doubting, to do! Our doing and life were then, so far as government could regulate it, well regulated; that were the ideal of constitutions.

Alas, we know very well that Ideals can never be completely embodied in practice. Ideals must ever lie a very great way off; and we will right thankfully content ourselves with any not intolerable approximation thereto! Let no man, as Schiller says, too querulously "measure by a scale of perfection the meagre product of reality" in this poor world of ours. We will esteem him no wise man; we will esteem him a sickly, discontented, foolish man. And yet, on the other hand, it is never to be the minds of men were essentially barbarous, and they were familiarised with much actual suffering. The torture reigned in every court of justice, and in the Inquisition; the laws were cruel and bloody; and deeds of revengeful murder were daily perpetrated by hired assassins. Many of their painters partook of the coarseness of the age, and lent the inspiration of their genius to realise on canvass scenes of blood and agony corresponding in sentiment with those which were acted on the theatre of life. The genius of the painters consecrated not only the terrible, but the horrible; and acquired for their works a high reputation, which has descended to our days. Modern European artists, captivated by the real merits of these painters, but forgetting the advance of civilisation, have imitated their barbarisms, and not unfrequently omitted their genius. The American public, having rarely seen, have escaped being misled by the productions of the elder school of art; and their own feelings being humane, their artists have selected subjects in harmony with them. Objects related to the higher sentiments of our nature should be at least as fruitful in inspirations to genius as those which owe their existence only to abuses of our propensities; modern artists, besides, should rise to higher excellence when they invent under the impulse of the more generous emotions of their own age, than when they strain their imaginations to embody terrors that are now happily banished from the experience of ordinary life.

Dec. 20. Thermometer 33°. Phrenology.—This morning I gave to my class a practical lesson on the temperaments. The attendance was large, and much interest was taken in the subject.

In the evening we attended a meeting of the Phrenological Society of New York in the Stuyvesant Institute, when Dr. J. W. Francis delivered an address. The attendance exceeded 400 ladies and gentlemen. The most interesting portion of the address was that in which Dr. Francis narrated the circumstances which led him to take an interest in phrenology. He was in Edinburgh when the subject first attracted general attention, and heard Dr. Barclay ridicule it in his own coarse but effective style in his lectures on anatomy. Then came the famous assault on it by Dr. John Gordon in the 49th number of the Edinburgh Review, which he carefully read. Afterwards he visited Paris, and heard Dr. Gall demonstrate the ignorance of the reviewer in regard not only to phrenology, but to the anatomy of the brain; and he saw that both Dr. Barclay and Dr. Gordon had condemned what they did not understand.

There never was a more unfortunate blunder for Edinburgh than that committed by those two medical teachers. The success of the University of Edinburgh is of very considerable importance to the prosperity of the city, for Mind is her staple, and almost her sole field of profitable exertion. During the last century the university had attained a high reputation by marching foremost in the adoption of every important discovery and improvement, and by numbering among her teachers a succession of men of distinguished talent. She had been long celebrated as a school of mental science, and the eloquent discourses of Dugald Stewart still cast a halo of glory around her brows. While she was yet in this condition, the discovery of the functions of the brain, embodying the true philosophy of mind, and resting on the sure basis of induction, was presented to her. Had her leading minds examined and embraced it, and incorporated it with their teaching, she would instantly have started forward in both her medical and ethical schools at least half a century in advance of all her rivals. The stimulus to thought and improvement which such a step would have created, and the extensive discussions to which it would have led, (and in which, being in the right, she would have triumphed,) would have kept her name constantly before Europe, and have sent forth young and enthusiastic minds, conscious of the soundness of their attainments in the new philosophy, and of their own strength, to spread her fame in every land. She would have stood in the front rank of philosophy for a century to come.

How different has been her actual course! In 1803, Dr. Gall's discovery was first noticed in the Edinburgh Review by Dr. Thomas Brown. He was a man of a powerful mind, and capable of appreciating it, but at that time it was known to him only through meagre reports of Dr. Gall's lectures published by his pupils. He condemned it, but in comparatively moderate terms. By an unfortunate selection the next notice of it in the Review fell into the hands of Dr. John Gordon, a man of an acute and active mind, with a natural gift of ready utterance, but rash in judgment, and destitute equally of profundity and comprehensiveness. The unmeasured and unmerited abuse which he heaped not only upon phrenology, but on Dr. Gall, its founder, and on Dr. Spurzheim, its defender and extender, although palpably unphilosophical and ungenerous, and, in the eyes of those who knew the subject, altogether unsatisfactory to the understanding, coincided so perfectly with the opinions of the leading men of the day, that they adopted them, and committed themselves irretrievably as determined opponents of the physiology of the brain. In 1826, Lord Jeffrey made a third vigorous but unsuccessful attempt in the Review to sustain them in their false position, and up to this hour their hostility has increased in proportion to the progress of the new philosophy.

Dec. 21. Thermometer 33°. Jersey City.—New York stands on an island, but it was long before I could discover its pretensions to an insular situation by inspection either of nature or of ordinary maps. It seemed a promontory merely; bounded by the East River on the east, and the Hudson on the west. About eight or ten miles north of New York, however, a channel of a few hundred yards in breadth, and of very moderate depth, admits of boats and barges passing from the one of these streams to the other, and completes Manhattan Island. In Long Island, opposite New York on the east, stands Brooklyn, a large suburb of the city, and connected with it by means of several steam ferry-boats, which ply night and day. On the shore of New Jersey, opposite New York on the west, stands Jersey City, another suburb fast rising into importance, and also connected with New York by means of steam-boats, which ply without intermission. The Hudson is here about a mile in breadth. Jersey City stands at the point of termination of the Morris Canal, and of the Philadelphia railroad, and is a pleasant place of residence. It was begun about fifteen years ago, and at that time a lot of building ground measuring twenty-five feet in front, and one hundred feet backwards, might have been bought for fifty, sixty, or seventy dollars, according to the situation. Lately one in a peculiarly valuable situation was sold for $3000. The population is now 2500 inhabitants. A brick house of twenty-four feet in front, forty-four in depth, and three stories high, costs $400 per annum for rent, or $7000 of purchase-money, and $8 per annum of ground rent. These rates are greatly less than in New York; besides which Jersey City is free from the heavy local taxes of the older town. The rate of interest drawn from capital expended in building houses here is less than that yielded by solid stocks, or by money secured on bond and mortgage.

Dec. 21. Social Condition of New York.—In society I have taken various opportunities of making inquiries into the social condition of women, and the young, and into other topics; and the general results which I have arrived at may be thus stated. I hazarded the observation, that while America claimed the merit of treating women with an almost chivalrous respect, my experience, so far as it had yet extended, led me to doubt whether they held the same exalted rank in the social scale as in Britain. There they are part of the moving powers of society in certain departments. We solicit the patronage of ladies of distinction in favour of a musical performer or an artist, and they are able to move an extensive social circle in their behalf. They take the lead in many charitable and religious societies. In domestic life the lady of the house is regarded by the friends and visitors of the family as an equal power with the master of it. I was informed, in return, that in New York no lady would arrogate the importance implied in becoming ostensibly a patroness of a new musical debutante; but that ladies are active and efficient managers of benevolent and religious societies. The young, however, push their parents too soon off the stage. A handsome well-bred gentleman, whose circle of visiting in genteel society here was extensive, told me that he coincided a good deal with me in opinion, and that he did not consider that the married ladies in general held the same place, and exerted the same influence here, which they do in Europe. He had a pretty extensive acquaintance with young ladies of highly respectable families; yet he was not acquainted with the mothers of above twelve of them. The mothers were laid aside, and the young ladies often formed acquaintances, and acted in regard to them for themselves, without judging it necessary to take their mammas along with them.

I have often inquired who are the leading physicians in New York, and every one concurs in the opinion that there are none: that is to say, that no individuals stand so prominently forth from possessing superior talents, acquirements, and experience, as to be generally appealed to as consulting advisers in difficult cases. There are several who enjoy extensive practice and general consideration, (among whom Dr. Francis is one,) but they are not recognised by common consent of the citizens as wiser or better than many others.

Public Opinion.—Influence of the Clergy.—It is generally admitted that there is here a great fear of public opinion. Few men are to be found who, on any subject, will venture openly to espouse opinions that are not supported by a large and respectable party. The periodical press follows rather than leads opinion; but this is the case in every country. The clergy visit very little in general society; are seldom guests at ceremonious dinners; and are still more rarely invited to evening parties; nevertheless they exercise a powerful influence on opinion. They can favour or impede the practice of a young physician very considerably, by recommending him to the families of their flocks, or by warning them against him. Some medical men, for example, who have embraced Phrenology, decline to read addresses in favour of it before a public audience, through fear of the clergy. The clergy are occasionally members of the civic council, and exercise great influence in its deliberations; and one gentleman who, to some extent, is under the control of the council, told me that he could not, while he held his office, safely advocate Phrenology openly, in consequence of their hostility.

Dec. 22. Ther. 44°. Dissection of the Brain. A meeting of a number of medical and other gentlemen attending the lectures was held this day, for the purpose of dissecting the brain. The method of dissection introduced by Dr. Gall, is not generally known in the United States. Dr. Spurzheim's plates were compared with the appearances in the dissected brain, and recognised to be faithful.

Fires in New York.—Every second night at least, the State House bell sounds the alarm of fire, and often two or three times in one night. At first the frequent tolling of the bell seemed dreadful, as indicating calamity and suffering; but custom has already so familiarised us with it, that we merely look to see in what direction the firemen are running, and if they go out of sight, we conclude that the conflagration is in a distant quarter of the city, and trouble ourselves no more about it.*

Dec. 23. Thermometer 37°. Ignorance of an English D. D. concerning the State of Religion in the United States.—In calling a few days ago for Mr. J. C. Brigham, Secretary to the Bible Society in this city, I learned from him, in answer to my inquiries, that this is a very extensive and powerful association, and that it is supported with great zeal by the religious public. We spoke of the stability of religion in the United States, and he said that he entertained no apprehensions on the subject. It appears to me that the cause of the uneasiness which some persons in the United States feel about religion, may be traced to the state of transition in which society exists; it is passing from the scholastic to the scientific age, and religion has not yet seriously begun to adapt herself to the change. He gave me "Hear the Church," a sermon preached in the Chapel-Royal, St. James's Palace, on the 17th of June, 1838, by Walter Farquhar Hook, D. D., reprinted at Burlington, New Jersey; and called my attention to the want of knowledge of the state of the Church in America, which is betrayed by the following passage of the discourse: "When the United States of America were English Colonies, the English Church was there established; at the Revolution the state was destroyed. Monarchy has ceased to exist; but the Church, though depressed for a time, remained uninjured. So that there, among American Republicans—under the superintendence of no fewer than fifteen bishops, you will find her sacraments and ordinances administered, and all her ritual and liturgical services administered, with not less piety, zeal and solemnity than here in England;" (all this is true;) "there," continues Dr. Hook, "you may see the Church, like an oasis in the desert, blessed by the dews of heaven, and shedding heavenly blessings around her, in a land where, because no religion is established, if it were not for her, nothing but the extremes of infidelity or fanaticism would prevail."

The Americans are justly astonished at the want of knowledge concerning their social and religious condition which, notwithstanding all that has been written on the subject, continues to prevail even among educated men in England. A very slender extent of research would have enabled Dr. Hook to discover that in New England, which always has been, and still is, distinguished for its religious spirit, Episcopacy has exercised but a very slender influence; that in Pennsylvania and New York, Presbyterianism, in all its purity and power, has far outshone the Church of England; and that throughout America in general, this sect exercises only a third or fourth rate influence over the public mind. Dr. Hook apparently includes all other sects except his own within the "two extremes of infidelity and fanaticism;" but this is an extravagant error. I have already seen evidence that zeal, piety, and knowledge, combined with sound practical sense, are to be found among the clergy of all denominations in this country, and that the wild fanatical preachers are far more rare than is generally believed in Britain.

Dec. 24. Thermometer 37°. William Augustus Conway and Mrs. Piozzi.—Mr. Conway was known in England as a tragedian. He came to this country in the exercise of his profession; but, after some time, relinquished the stage and studied for the ministry. He is reported to have induced cerebral disease by excessive application to his studies, and presented indications of abstractions and deep melancholy, which attracted general attention from those who knew him. In December, 1827, he was seen slowly and deliberately letting himself down the side of a packet-ship in which he was a passenger, on her voyage from New York to Savannah, into the sea, and it was evident that he made no effort to second the exertions of those on board to save him. His papers, with his other property, came into the hands of the public administrator of the effects of foreigners who die intestate in New York, and among them was found a large number of original letters written to him by Mrs. Piozzi, in 1819 and 1820. She died at Clifton on the 2d of May, 1821, and she was, therefore, at that time in her 79th and 80th year. Mr. Conway was then on the English stage, and the old lady seems to have taken as ardent and extensive an interest in him and his affairs, as if she had combined the qualities of his youthful lover and his mother. All her talent and vivacity beam forth in her epistles. She not only wrote to him largely herself, but sent to him original letters written to her by several of her own distinguished correspondents; among these was a letter from Mrs. Siddons, dated 27 Upper Baker street, Regent's Park, the 18th of May, 1818; also letters from Dr. Samuel Johnson to her, dated Edinburgh (but should be Newcastle), Aug. 12; Edinburgh, Aug. 17; Banff, Aug. 25; Inverness, Aug. 28; and Skye, Sept. 14—all in the year 1773. I have not the means at hand of ascertaining whether these letters of Dr. Johnson have been published by her; but it is probable that they have. Her letters to Mr. Conway have never been in print. They have excited so much curiosity, that several of them had been copied, and it was from the copies that I obtained this information.

Dec. 24. Thermometer 12°. Phrenology.—This evening I completed my course of sixteen lectures at Clinton Hall.

Dec. 25. Thermometer 20°. Christmas.—This is Christmas day, and most of the shops are shut, and the churches open; but the observance is entirely voluntary.

Salaries of Public Officers.—The salaries of public officers in the United States are very small, compared with the large remuneration allowed to every other kind of labour. The Chancellor of the state of New York receives $3000, and each Judge of the Supreme Court $3000, and of the Circuit Court $1600 per annum. It has been mentioned to me that one of the judges resigned, and procured an appointment as clerk to his own court. The fees made this the more lucrative office of the two.

Life Assurance.—There are only three Life Assurance offices in New York, and they do little business. They limit their risks on one life to $5000 (about 1000*l.*) and this sum is not sufficient to provide for a family. One office has lately extended its risks to $10,000. The causes here assigned for this limited business, are the same as those which were stated to me in Boston. The great value of capital leads most men to believe that they can realise a better provision for their families by trading on the premiums than by paying them to an office; the facility of providing for families lessens anxiety on their account, and the early period at which marriage in general takes place, affords to parents a great probability of living to see their children settled in the world. The premiums are considerably higher than in Europe, yet the companies have ample means of accumulating them at 6 and 7 per cent. on undoubted security, whereas British offices can scarcely realise more than 3½ per cent. When they become better acquainted with the business, they will probably insure at lower rather than at higher rates than in Europe; and this will extend their business. If the premiums were moderate, and the sums insured larger, many policies would probably be opened to secure sums advanced to young men beginning business, and whose premature death constitutes the chief risk in lending money to them. If the British companies, which are overloaded with capital, could invest it in this country, under skilful and honest guidance, their profits would be immense. Were they to employ faithless agents, however, the chances are great that in a brief space they would have their hands filled with bubble stocks and phantom mortgages, and be swindled out of nine tenths of their remittances.

Dec. 26. Ther. 20. Public Grounds for Air and Exercise.—There is an increasing want of grounds for obtaining air and exercise in this city. The Battery, a space of two or three acres at the southwestern extremity of the town, on the margin of the bay, and the Park, a space of about the same extent, a mile from the Battery, and in the midst of trading streets, are the only lungs of New York. It is not yet too late to secure a drive up one side of the Manhattan Island and down the other. A broad carriage road, with side walks, thickly shaded with trees, and preserved sacred from all thoroughfare business traveling, might yet be made, commencing at the termination of the present buildings, a little way beyond Tenth street. In a few years, the city will extend miles beyond this point; as its population becomes dense and confined, (by rivers on each side,) epidemics will scourge it severely, and bitter regrets will be felt, when it is too late, that means were not adopted in time to preserve the health of the poorer classes, by providing them space for fresh air and recreation. If the American press would present its readers with faithful descriptions of the evils which the English, Scottish, and Irish large towns are suffering from neglect of this element of health, and call on them to take warning in time, they would discharge an important public duty. I fear such a proposal would be unpopular, on account of the expense; but if it should be so, posterity will deeply lament the spirit which caused it to be neglected.

* The following statement appeared in the newspapers in the beginning of 1839:—"The total number of fires which occurred in the city of New York from the 1st of January, 1838, to the 31st of December in the same year, was 154, causing a loss, by the destruction of the buildings, of $333,671, and of property by fire and water, of $359,942."

CHAPTER IX.

Dec. 27. Ther. 23°. Journey to Philadelphia.—We sailed from New York at 12 o'clock noon for Amboy, on the New Jersey shore. The usual channel by which the steamboats make this passage, lies between the western shore of Staten Island and New Jersey, but it is already encumbered with ice. We therefore took the outer channel, stretching farther into New York Bay, and running along the eastern shore of the island. We passed quantities of floating ice, and the air was sharp, but pleasant. The sun shone brilliantly, and imparted an agreeable warmth, in any situation screened from the wind. We arrived at Amboy at half-past two; and entered a railway car, which carried us directly across the state of New Jersey, and placed us at half-past six P. M. on the left bank of the Delaware, exactly opposite to Philadelphia. It was now clear moonlight, and very cold.

We found the river completely frozen over, and the sides encumbered with large masses of ice, which the rising tides had pitched up against the shore. This was the first day on which the navigation had been completely interrupted, and no arrangements had yet been made for transporting passengers to the city. We wandered, in the moonlight, backwards and forwards along the margin of the river, admiring the city reposing in solemn majesty on the opposite shore, and sending forth gleams of light from its innumerable gas-lamps, till 8 o'clock, when we were summoned to follow a guide one mile higher up the stream. We walked in a long straggling train, a picturesque group of men, women, and children, muffled up in every variety of cloak, mantle, and costume, that could keep out the cold, which was now intense. On arriving at the point of embarkation, the ladies were put into a boat, and the sailors, with their usual cheering cries, shoved it along the now solid surface of their proper element. The ice at first was so rough, that the tossing was nearly equal to that of a stormy sea, and the alarm of the ladies was great; but as they left the shore, they reached the pure unbroken surface, and glided smoothly along.

The first glimpse which we obtained of Philadelphia was agreeable. We entered by Front street, and then turned into Chestnut street. All was regular, clean, and bright. We passed the front of the United States Bank, an imitation of the Parthenon, in white marble, and beautifully lighted up by gas-lamps, so dispersed behind the tops of the pillars that only the light and the building were visible.

Dec. 28. Ther. 13°. Riots at Harrisburg.—Harrisburg, a village on the Susquehannah, about one hundred and five miles from Philadelphia, is the political capitol of Pennsylvania, in which the state legislature hold its sessions. The legislature met in the beginning of December, but owing to a dispute relative to certain returns, two speakers were chosen, and two houses of representatives were organised. This was done peaceably. When, however, the session of the senate commenced, on the afternoon of the same day, a mob was in attendance which attempted to influence and dictate the course to be pursued by that body. The senate adjourned in confusion, and the mob organised "a committee of safety," which directed their proceedings. Disorder reigned for several days, during which neither branch of the legislature could hold a regular session; "the Executive Chamber and State Department," says Governor Ritner, "were closed, and confusion and alarm pervaded the seat of government." The militia were called out; and obeyed the summons. Their presence, without shedding of blood, frowned down every thing like open violence, and under their protection "the members of the legislature were free to settle their own differences in their own manner."

The excitement in Harrisburg was very great, and all over the Union the proceedings attracted much attention. A stranger to the people and their institutions, from perusing the newspaper reports, would have imagined that a new Revolution and a civil war had commenced in Pennsylvania; but when one is able to observe matters more closely, these impressions vanish. So far as I could understand, the merits of the dispute were these: A very important amendment of the constitution of the state has lately been adopted by the people, which comes into effect on the 1st of January, 1839. The recent elections have, it is understood, given a preponderance to the democratic party in all the three branches of the legislature; and when the democratic governor, Porter, comes into office in January, there will be a great dismissal of whig office-bearers, and an installation of their opponents. The parties, however, are so nearly balanced, that the struggle for power is one of life and death, and every means that legal and political ingenuity can devise, are resorted to by the whig party to retain office, and by the democratic party to expel them from it.

The House of Representatives consists of one hundred members. Of these, there are undisputed returns of democratic members, 48
Whig members, 44
While there are eight seats for the county of Philadelphia disputed and claimed by both parties, 8

In any European country, a tumultuous assault on the legislature, if successful, would probably have been the forerunner of a revolution: but here it is of far inferior importance. In the United States, a revolution can scarcely mean any thing but an abandonment of freedom. The suffrage is already all but universal, and the people elect, either directly or indirectly, not only the legislature but every officer of state. The wildest imagination, therefore, cannot devise a more democratic form of government; and as there is no aristocratic class, having separate interests and distinct feelings from the people, who could usurp power, a revolution could lead only to a despotism. The states, however, are very far removed from that condition in which a despotism becomes possible. There are no poverty-stricken, suffering, and ignorant multitudes, whom an aspiring tyrant can beguile to lend him their physical force to overthrow the liberties of their country. A large proportion of the electors are owners of their own farms, while even the humblest class possesses property and some degree of intelligence. All are reared in the love, not only of freedom, but of power. There are no social disorders worth mentioning; certainly none at all calculated to induce the rich to surrender liberty for the sake of safety to their property and lives. Generally speaking, justice between man and man is fairly dispensed and vigorously executed. It is only when the government acts against the people, or when the people are seized with a frenzy, and perpetrate mischief by mobs, that the judiciary and executive powers are felt to want strength. These occurrences are rare, and arise from some single specific and temporary cause. There is no general, lurking discontent secretly gathering strength till it become ready to break down the fences of the law, and to seek redress through anarchy and blood. Every grievance, as it is felt, is proclaimed by a thousand trumpet tongues in the most exaggerated forms, and as the people control absolutely both the legislature and the executive, it cannot protract its existence till it become really formidable. The governments of the particular states, when regarded from a distance, may appear to be so feeble, that society is constantly in danger of anarchy; but when the condition of the people is closely examined, it is discovered that the causes and elements of anarchy are wanting. These governments resting on the popular interests, popular intelligence, and popular will, really possess so broad a basis, that it is impossible, in the present circumstances of the nation, to upset them, and as the power of reconstruction is constantly present, although they should be dislocated in any of their parts, they reunite with a rapidity, and act again with a vitality, that furnish the strongest indications of health and vigour.

A democracy is a rough instrument of rule, in the present state of education and manners in the United States, and I have not yet met with a British radical who has had the benefit of five years' experience of it, who has not renounced his creed, and ceased to admire universal suffrage. But the coarseness of the machine, and its efficacy, are different questions. It is coarse, because the mass of the people, although intelligent, compared with the European masses, are still very imperfectly instructed, when their attainments in knowledge and refinement are contrasted with powers which they wield. It is efficacious, however, because it is sound in its structure, and its mainsprings are strong.

I read without alarm the accounts of the Harrisburg riots, of the calling for the troops of the United States to aid in suppressing the "rebellion," as some of the newspapers named it, and of the march of one thousand armed militia to the seat of the disturbances. I knew that the rioters had farms or stores, wives, children, and other relatives, and that they had a profound regard for their own lives and personal safety; and I "calculated" that, however loudly they might bluster and threaten, there would be no bloodshed and no destruction of property. And it was so; the riots are now all extinct, the legislature pursues its deliberations in peace, and already men wonder what all the uproar has been about.

The American Philosophical Society.—I dined by invitation with the American Philosophical Society, and found myself at the left hand of one of the chairmen (Professor Chapman), who is also one of the vice presidents of the society, opposite to the Count de Survilliers (Joseph Bonaparte), who sat on his right. I was introduced to the members before dinner, and to the count, who gave me, in the English and American style, a hearty shake of the hand. When I first saw him enter the room before dinner, he appeared like a short, muscular, amiable, country gentleman; and not having heard that he was expected, my surprise was great when I was introduced to the ex-king of Spain. He has resided for many years in the city or neighbourhood of Philadelphia, where he exercises an elegant hospitality, and is greatly respected. He speaks English imperfectly. His head is large, the anterior lobe of an average size, the coronal region (the seat of the moral sentiments) is large, and Cautiousness is much developed. His temperament is sanguine-lymphatic. His manner is simple, kind, and amiable. On examination, the features, particularly the nose, mouth, and chin, are perceived evidently to belong to the family of Napoleon; and when he smiled, and also when he spoke earnestly and gravely, the expression of the mouth was exceedingly like that which appears in the best pictures of the emperor. His health was given, and the concluding words of the prefatory address were, "the toast is Joseph Bonaparte—once a king, still a sovereign, and always a philosopher." He is an American citizen, and every citizen is a sovereign—being one of a sovereign people. Mention was made of his literary and philosophical tastes, of his refined hospitality, and of the esteem which he had acquired from all who knew his virtues. He replied in a short, elegant, and appropriate speech in French, the import of which was, that he had seen many countries, and their inhabitants; but had never known any so happy, so prosperous, and so worthy of his esteem, as the people of the United States. He had known them for twenty-five years, and if they proceeded in future as they had done in that period, they would become the greatest and the happiest nation on the globe.

The American Philosophical Society was founded by Franklin, and he was long its president. His memory was the first toast given after dinner. The chair in which he sat is preserved and venerated; and here, as in Boston, his character and writings continue to exercise a living influence. In both cities, his busts and portraits abound. In most of the eastern American towns, there are societies, streets, squares, hotels, oyster-taverns, omnibuses, and fire-engines, bearing his name.

One of the vice presidents, Dr. Patterson, did me the honour to propose my health. In acknowledging the compliment, I took occasion to remark, that in my own country I had advocated the cause of the people, and was glad to find myself in a land where that cause is triumphant: that the eyes of the civilised world are directed towards the United States of America, to watch the progress and mark the results of the great social experiment which is here proceeding; that a steady advance in morality, intelligence, religion, and prosperity in these states, will accomplish more for the cause of freedom in Europe, than all beside that has been done, spoken, and written in its favour; but that if they shall make shipwreck of law, social order, and happiness, they will do more to blast the brightest prospects of mankind, than the worst tyrants who have disgraced the page of history; the tyrant makes the good to sigh; the failure of the American republic will plunge them in despair. These sentiments were well received. The hours passed off in the most agreeable manner; social hilarity mingled with intellectual power, gave zest to the whole proceedings of the evening.

Dec. 30. Ther. 30°. Appearance of Philadelphia.—This morning presents snow with a tendency to thaw. Innumerable sleighs, with their many bells, are passing every where in the streets. The local situation and also the plan of this city, was fixed by William Penn; and they do great credit to his taste and judgment. It lies in a plain of two miles in breadth, extending between the rivers Schuylkill on the west, and Delaware on the east, and rising from 20 to 40 feet above the high-water levels of them. Both rivers are navigable from the sea to the town, the former for schooners and barges, and the latter for ships; and both are navigable for boats and barges for many miles landward. The streets are laid at right angles, east and west, and north and south: those running north and south are nearly parallel with the rivers; the others extend from river to river. The latter streets bear the names of the trees found growing on the soil before the town was founded—Vine street, Cherry street, Mulberry street, (familiarily called Arch street, but for what reason I could never discover), Chestnut street, Walnut street, Locust street, Spruce street, and so forth. The streets which cross them, take numbers for their names, commencing with that next the Delaware. It is called Front street, and the next are Second street, and so forth, till Thirteenth street, when the numbers change and count from the Schuylkill, First, Second, Third, and so forth. Nothing can exceed the convenience and elegance of this plan. The humblest capacity suffices to enable a stranger to find his way in Philadelphia.

The houses are regular and handsome. In the principal streets, they are "fixed," as it is here called, that is, finished off with marble. In some streets, the houses are built of marble as high as the drawing-room floors; in others, only the steps and the setting of the doors and windows are of marble. There is an abundant supply of excellent water from the Schuylkill, distributed all over the city in pipes, and the streets have drains under ground, and are kept beautifully clean. The swine, however, here, as well as in New York, are free citizens; but they are more restrained to the inferior streets. This day the foot pavement, composed of brick compactly joined, was instantly cleared of snow, and order, comfort, and cleanliness cheered the pedestrian as he threaded his way amidst the throng.

American Debates.—A friend enquired my opinion of the Harrisburgh riots, and said that in Philadelphia they created no uneasiness, as every one knew that they would pass off in words, and lead to an improved election law, which would prevent their recurrence. He remarked, that an English traveller had taunted the Americans with the trifling nature of the debates in their congress compared with the subjects discussed in the British parliament; but that he had omitted, in his published work, to state the cause of the difference. Here many important social principles are irrevocably settled, which are still under debate in Britain. No ingenuity could call forth a debate in congress on the questions of a voluntary or established church; on tithes; on entails; on free trade; on corn laws; on the merits of hereditary legislators; on an extension of the right of suffrage; on the ballot; or on national education; because all these, which agitate the British empire to the centre, are here settled beyond the possibility of dispute, and experience has confirmed the wisdom of the manner in which they have been decided.

In the course of many conversations which, at various times, I have enjoyed with men of superior talents and education in America, who have visited Britain, I have found that their estimate of the intellectual condition of the middle and upper classes in the old country, is very different from our own. The Americans allow us the superiority in science, erudition, and the fine arts, but they are astonished at our timid, circumscribed, and prejudiced thinking on many social and political questions, particularly such as those before enumerated. A well educated American gentleman, particularly if engaged in the practice of the law and general politics, is as familiar with the principles on which these have been decided in America, as with his alphabet; and far from admiring the wordy declamations and hollow plausibilities which are uttered on them in the British houses of parliament, he is amazed at the slow proceedings of knowledge, and the narrow understandings of those who waste years in such discussions. In the Congress of the United States, points of administration necessarily form important topics of debate, because few questions involving general principles remain undetermined.

Wistar Club.—I was introduced this evening, by a friend, to the Wistar Club. It consists of men of every grade and occupation in Philadelphia, who are at all distinguished for love of intellectual pursuits. There is no professed business, and no formality at the meetings, which are held in succession at the houses of the members, on every Saturday evening, during the winter months. The company begins to assemble at 8 o'clock, they are received in the drawing-room, form themselves into groups, and converse till half-past nine. They are then ushered into the dining-room, where an elegant supper and wine are enjoyed, standing; by half-past ten or eleven all have retired. This club is of great value in a society in which social visiting is not much practised, and all are busy. It is a rendezvous for congenial minds every week, and as rivals here meet, exchange courtesies, and enjoy a social meal, it promotes a kind and liberal spirit among individuals, who, if isolated, would be exposed to moroseness and jealousy. I owe the members of this club a large debt of gratitude for many pleasant and instructive hours spent among them.

Dec. 30. Ther. 14°. Sunday.—I heard Dr. Bothune of the Reformed Church preach a discourse to a numerous and attentive congregation. He is highly evangelical, and is much esteemed for his general talents. Sunday is observed with the greatest strictness and decorum in this city.

A clear bright full moon shines deliciously on the snow. The city is quiet, and we find ourselves exceedingly comfortable at the Marshall House.

Public Education.—Within three years the permanent state appropriation to this object has been increased from $75,000 annually to one ollar for each taxable person, which is estimated to be equal to $350,000 for the next school year. This sum is appropriated to common schools, and $50,000 more will be required to pay annuities to colleges, academies, and female seminaries. Three years ago there were 32,544 children in the common schools of the state. There are now about 230,000. The schools were then kept open not quite three and a half months, while they are now open about seven months in the year.

At the close of the year 1835, only 762 common schools were in operation, and about seventeen academies (the latter in a state of almost doubtful existence), with no female seminaries fostered by the state. She has now 5000 common schools, thirty-eight academies, and seven female seminaries in active and permanent operation. These are altogether exclusive of private schools, academies, and female seminaries, many of which are ably conducted and extensively useful.

"Of the 1027 townships, wards, and boroughs now in the state, each intended to form a common school district; 875 have accepted the common school system, and have it in operation; and 786 have received their portion of the state appropriation for the present school year, commencing on the first Monday in June last. The number of accepting districts goes on steadily increasing, and the usefulness and economy of the system, where fairly tested, are becoming every day more apparent. All that now seems necessary to the success of the system is, that some immediate and efficient means be adopted for the preparation of common school teachers."—Governor's Speech.

Pennsylvania is charged with more than a common degree of ignorance, and the sums and numbers now mentioned, while they prove the fact that the education of the existing generation has been grossly neglected, show that she has become ashamed of this stigma on her reputation, and has taken vigorous measures to remove it. She has already lost much by her neglect: Her existing generation is unquestionably in arrear of that of all the older states in general intelligence, and her legislation and public conduct afford evidence of the bitter fruits of the darkness of the public mind.

The business of the secretary of the commonwealth, as superintendant of common schools, has so much increased within the past three years, as seriously to embarrass that officer. The governor recommends the establishment of a department of education.

Dec. 31. Ther. 22°.—Dr. Morton's Crania Americana.—This day I visited Dr. Morton's collection of American Indian skulls, which is valuable and extensive, and his specimens are well authenticated. I had the pleasure of showing him and Mr. Phillips, who assists him ardently in the measurements necessary for his beautiful and extensive work on these skulls, the method pursued by the phrenologists in estimating the dimensions of the coronal region and anterior lobe of the skull.

1839. Jan. 1. Ther. 20°. I again met Dr. Morton and Mr. Phillips, and discussed the method of measuring the skull. I greatly admired Dr. Morton's method of drawing the skull on a reduced scale. His lithographic drawings of the skulls are excellent, and of the full size of nature. He has engaged the services of a talented artist, whom he keeps constantly employed on his plates, which are drawn under his own eye, and each carefully compared with the original, before it is committed to stone. I narrowly scrutinised a number of them, holding the original skulls in my hand, and trying them and the plates by means of callipers, and found them faultless.

New Year's Day.—This is a beautiful bright new year's day, and the militia and fire-engine companies are marching in procession through the city with banners flying and martial music sounding. The fire companies are all voluntary associations of citizens, who serve without pay, and vie with each other in keeping their engines and pipes in the most efficient and brilliant condition, and in being the first on the ground wherever there is a fire. Yesterday was the centenary of their institution, and they held a grand jubilee, and listened to an oration delivered in a church in celebration of their services. It was to me a new spectacle to see a train of engines fully a mile in length, with all the apparatus necessary for extinguishing fires, maintained in the highest order, by unpaid citizens; and to learn that the companies have existed for so long a period. They are as expert as they are imposing in their appearance, and the office is by no means a sinecure, for they are called out by alarms of fire at least two or three times every week.

Jan. 2. Ther. 32°. Sir Walter Scott and the Ballantynes.—We have met several literary gentlemen to-day at dinner, and Mr. Lockhart's attack on the Ballantynes, and the reply of James Ballantyne's executors, was a topic of interesting conversation. One gentleman remarked, that he had read Sir Walter Scott's Life very attentively, and had come to the conclusion that Scott had obtained the full proceeds of the sales of his works from both Constable and Ballantyne; he added, that the facts stated by Mr. Lockhart himself in his Life, appeared to him to be at variance with the idea that the Ballantynes were the cause of Scott's ruin. Professor Dunglison, in allusion to Dr. Beaumont's experiments on Alexis St. Martin's digestive powers, mentioned that he had performed many of the experiments at Washington, which are recorded in Dr. Beaumont's work.* Dr. Dunglison has just written "An Appeal to the People of Pennsylvania on the subject of an Asylum for the Insane poor." There is no state hospital for these unfortunates in the whole of Pennsylvania—another reproach to so large and wealthy a community, and one also

* Mr. Combe.—It is with no little regret that we observed in the volumes of Mr. Combe on the United States, which have just been published, an allusion evidently to a private conversation which took place at a dinner table, in which Mr. Combe makes the editor of this journal do Dr. Beaumont the signal injustice of stating, that the suggestions and experiments made at Washington, and detailed in Dr. Beaumont's book, were by the editor.

The error is another instance of the difficulty and impropriety of travellers attempting to detail private conversations. Mr. Combe was informed, that certain suggestions were made to Dr. Beaumont, and certain experiments performed by the editor in Washington along with him, whereas the observation of Mr. Combe would lead to the inference that Dr. Beaumont himself suggested and performed none of them.

The editor of this Journal has been extremely careful not to detract from the results of the meritorious and persevering investigations of Dr. Beaumont, and it is painful to him to have the subject brought forward in this manner. It is strange, indeed, that Mr. Combe should not have seen the injurious effect of such a statement to one party, even if the impropriety of attempting to detail private conversations had not impressed him.—Dunglison's Med. Intelligencer.

closely connected with her neglect of education. Connecticut and Massachusetts have set noble examples in this department of public benevolence, which New York is rapidly imitating.

Yankee.—The British err in calling all the Americans Yankees. The appellation properly belongs only to the inhabitants of the New England States; and they are proud of it. Here, however, and farther south, it begins to be used as a term of depreciation, and means a keen, active, artful, unscrupulous, and somewhat self-complacent person, who pursues his own interest regardless of all other considerations. It is said to be an Indian corruption of the word English—Yan-gee-se—Yankees.

Jan. 4. Ther. 40°. Phrenology.—Mr. Nicholas Biddle, President of the United States' Bank, called, and informed me that he had attended a course of lectures given by Dr. Gall at Carlsruhe in Germany, in 1806 or 1807. He, subsequently, presented to me a skull which Dr. Spurzheim had marked for him, showing the situations of the organs as then discovered, and which had remained in his possession ever since. This relic possesses historical value. It has often been asserted that Dr. Gall invented his physiology of the brain, and did not discover it. When I was in Germany in 1837, I saw a collection of books describing the science at different stages of its progress, and also skulls marked at different times; all proving that the organs were discovered in succession as narrated by Drs. Gall and Spurzheim. This skull, which records the state of the science in 1806 or 1807, presents blank spaces where the organs of Hope, Conscientiousness, Individuality, Concentrativeness, Time, Size, and Weight, are now marked, these having at that time been unascertained. Farther, the local situations, and also the functions of the organs then marked by Dr. Gall as ascertained, continue unchanged in the marked skulls of the present day.

Jan. 4. Ther. 40°. Phrenology.—Dr. John Bell, who in 1822 edited an American edition of my first work on Phrenology, and a few other gentlemen, kindly undertook the duty of forming a class, and making arrangements for my lectures in this city. I delivered my first lecture this evening to an audience of 438 persons, of both sexes, in the lecture room of the new museum; and they sustained the address of two hours' duration (the usual interval of five minutes being allowed) with the most gratifying patience and attention.

Jan. 5. Ther. 44°. Errors of the Press.—Many complaints are made against the morality of the American press, but I have hitherto had experience only of its blunders. Labour is here so valuable, that every man does too much, and in consequence work is executed often in a slovenly manner. At New York, the huge placards of my lectures posted in the town bore that I proposed to lecture on "Phrenology applied to Elocution" instead of Education; a most unfortunate blunder for me, as my elocution is sadly defective, and deeply tinged with a Scottish accent. Dr. Gall's works were advertised as Gall's works for weeks after I had sent notice of the error. The reports of my lectures in the Daily Whig of New York were often blundered in the names, grammar and spelling, to the very extremity of error, not from bad reporting, but in consequence of carelessness in correcting the press. I sent a statement of the size and relative proportions of the Phrenological organs in the head of Sir Walter Scott, taken from an authentic bust, to the New York Mirror, and received a proof, which was so blundered as to be utterly unintelligible even to myself. I applied at least six times to the editor to return the MS., that I might correct the proof, but the MS. was lost, and I had no alternative but to request the article to be destroyed, which was done. In this city (Philadelphia), which is famed for the superiority of its press, the printer omitted the hour in the placards announcing my first lecture!

Mr. Dunn's Chinese Museum.—One of the most interesting sights in Philadelphia, and one which, so far as I know, is unique, both in Europe and America, is Mr. Dunn's collection of Chinese objects exhibited in the lower hall of the Philadelphia Museum. Mr. Dunn resided for many years at Canton, and has collected specimens of every kind of object and article illustrative of Chinese life; and here they are arranged, labelled, and beautifully displayed. There is, for example, a Chinese silk store, as it is here called, (or shop in England.) There are shelves filled with labelled packages; the shop-keeper, as large as life, and in the usual Chinese dress, is showing a piece of black silk on the counter to a customer also in full costume, who is examining it minutely. Behind the counter is a clerk making entries in a book, and before the counter are two men reposing on chairs and smoking. In another part of the hall there are a traveling tinker and his work tools, and a traveling shoemaker at work; there are Mandarins of various grades in their full costumes, with their secretaries behind them; ladies of rank in full dress; every variety of china, earthen-ware, and japanned utensil used in ordinary life, including a beautiful and elegant collection of lamps; there are also models of Chinese houses, pagodas, bridges, and of ships of every dimension; pictures representing the country, their military evolutions, and their courts of justice, into which the offenders are brought in wooden cages. The birds, fishes, shells, minerals, and smaller quadrupeds peculiar to the country are also exhibited in excellent preservation. In short, a survey of this museum approaches closely to a visit to China. It has been open only for one week, and it is said that 8000 persons have visited it within that time.

Mr. Thom, Sculptor.—While we were examining these objects, Mr. Thom, well known in Scotland as the self-taught artist, who produced the group of Burns' Jolly Beggars in freestone, and other works, introduced himself to me. He has been in the United States for three years. He was successful in his exhibition of these figures; but his group of Old Mortality was quite a failure. He then made a figure in red sandstone of General Washington, eight feet high, and was equally unsuccessful in exhibiting it. We went with him to the Masonic Hall, and saw this figure. I cannot conceive any purpose to which it can be applied except being placed on the top of a monument, where it may be looked at from a distance; for it is not a pleasing object when closely examined. He has sold his group of Old Mortality to Mr. Dunn, (of the Chinese Collection), to be placed in Laurel Hill, a cemetery about three miles from Philadelphia, in a beautiful spot on the banks of the Schuylkill, which has lately been opened, in imitation of Mount Auburn, near Boston. He is now employed in executing the oramental work of the Girard College.

Napoleon's Army of England.—A gentleman of Philadelphia who is intimately acquainted with Joseph Bonaparte, mentioned to me in conversation, that this personage had told him, that when Napoleon was at Boulogne, with the army collected to invade England, Robert Fulton, the inventor of the steamboat, had offered to build for him steamboats to transport his men; but that Napoleon had treated him as a charlatan! How different might the history of Europe have been, if Napoleon had listened to this proposal!

January 6. Ther. 39°.—The Clergy.—We heard the Rev. Mr. Barnes preach in a large, handsome church in Washington Square. His congregation filled every pew. He is a man of great talents, and very much respected. His discourse appeared to me to be highly evangelical, but I afterwards learned, that he had been prosecuted on a charge of heresy, before the Presbytery and Synod of Philadelphia, and had been held guilty of Pelagianism, or of maintaining that the sin of our first parents was imputed to them only, and not to their posterity; and that we derive no corruption from their fall, but are born as pure as Adam when he came out of the hands of the Creator; and some other doctrines which flow from these premises. He appealed to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which, in May, 1835, acquitted him of the charge. The resolutions, however, which the Assembly passed in regard to Mr. Barnes, excited great alarm in many of its members for the purity of the church, and in 1837, the Assembly, by a majority of 148 to 110, excised from the Presbyterian Church, four synods, containing twenty-eight presbyteries, or 509 ministers, 599 churches, and about 60,000 communicants. A litigation respecting the funds and property belonging to the General Assembly, is now in dependence before the supreme courts, between the old and the new schools, as the two parties are familiarly named. The new school is charged with holding views which the old school considers as heretical.

The clergy here lead a most laborious life. In addition to three services which are required from most of them, they meet the young and instruct them in the principles of their faith before the morning service, or between it and the afternoon service, on the Sundays, and also occasionally on week-days, and they preach on one additional evening in the week. I was advised to alter the night of one of my lectures from Wednesday to Thursday on account of the great number of religious congregations which meet on the Wednesday evenings; only two meet on Thursdays.

Social Manners.—I have been informed that in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, fewer persons entertain company at dinner, and that there is less social intercourse in private houses in the evenings, than in the same ranks in Britain. Several causes combine to produce these differences. In the American cities, trained and skilful servants, capable of getting up a handsome entertainment, without excessive labour and anxiety to the lady of the house, are not numerous: Again, the gentlemen are so deeply immersed in their private affairs, and the ladies so occupied with the cares of their families and housekeeping, that when evening comes they have little energy and vivacity left for social entertainment. From the same cause they have fewer general interests, ideas, and accomplishments which can be brought forward to create interest or confer pleasure on persons similarly circumstanced with themselves. Another obstacle has been mentioned to me of which I have no means of judging; namely, that the spirit of ostentation leads some families to live in large houses expensively furnished, whose circumstances do not admit of their entertaining company in a style corresponding with this display, and who therefore rarely entertain at all. But there is much mental vivacity in the people; they are not idle, but resort largely to churches, theatres, and lecture-rooms. It would be a great error, however, to infer from what has now been stated, that in these cities nobody gives dinners, or evening entertainments. We have enjoyed much hospitality of the most refined and elegant description, and I speak only of the comparative frequency of such social parties among the people themselves, in the indulgence of their own tastes, in the American and British cities.

Jan. 8. Ther. 45°. Professor Gibson.—Today I accompanied Dr. Gibson, Professor of Surgery, to the Anatomical Museum of the Pennsylvania University. He is a distinguished and successful teacher. He both draws and models in wax, with great success, and by these means renders even minute parts of the human structure distinctly visible to his class. Colossal models of the eye, ear, brain, nerves, and other parts, are used here for demonstration by other anatomical teachers also, and the advantages of the practice are self-evident. Professor Gibson was educated in Edinburgh, acted for two seasons as assistant to Dr. Monro, and was intimate with the late Mr. Andrew Fyfe: he wrote a thesis on the differences in the structure of the bones in the different varieties of the human species ("De Formis Ossium Gentilitia.")

Effects of Exercise on the Bones.—In the collection of Dr. Horner, Professor of Anatomy (in the university), I saw the skeleton of a lame beggar, whose thigh bones were bent up parallel with the abdomen, and whose arms and hands had been used for locomotion, his hands touching the ground. The bones of the shoulder and forearm were thicker than those of the thigh and leg, and the bones of the hands larger than those of the feet, the consequence, probably, of want of exercise in the former, and of superabundance of it in the latter.

The Episcopal Church in America.—In conversing with a distinguished divine of this persuasion, he told me that his clergy did not feel the want of legal endowments in this country; but that they looked up to the Church of England as the great mother of their church; that they considered endowments and an establishment by law as best fitted for the church in that country; that they looked with interest on the contest between the Dissenters and the Established Churches in Britain and Ireland; and that their sympathies were with the latter.

Jan. 9. Ther. 33°. Sully's Portrait of Queen Victoria.—A suit in law is proceeding here between Mr. Sully, the painter, who resides in Philadelphia, and the St. George's Society, of this city. They offered him $1000 for a portrait of Queen Victoria. He went to London, obtained sittings, and painted the picture. He exhibited it in London, for his own advantage, and brought it home. He wished to exhibit it here also, for his own benefit; but the proprietors object and deny his right to do so. He is copying it, before he delivers it, and they dispute also his right to do this. He considers himself to be supporting one of the acknowledged privileges of artists; and there are various parties and opinions on the merits of the question, which are still under discussion.

Mr. Norris's Locomotive Engines.—We have had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Norris, a distinguished engineer of this city, who has just received orders from England for six locomotive engines, for the Birmingham and Great Western Railways. This circumstance is justly giving considerable public satisfaction here, as a practical acknowledgement of the superiority of American skill and workmanship.

Mitigation of the Criminal Law.—There is a strong desire among certain humane and enlightened individuals in Philadelphia, to realise the further mitigations of the criminal law, although on the whole it may be regarded as comparatively humane. I was amused at the light in which these endeavours were viewed by an eminent gentleman of the legal profession with whom I conversed on the subject. He complained of the modern philanthropists for obstructing the course of justice, and saving criminals from the gallows, who richly deserved that fate. One criminal, whose trial he witnessed, had murdered his wife, by beating her to death. The challenges of the jury by the prisoner, had exhausted the list of the summoned jurors, and in such cases it is usual for the judge to make up the legal number of jurors, by requesting any of the respectable spectators in court to serve. In this case a respectable man offered himself and was accepted. He was a philanthropist, came there for the purpose, and fairly starved out the rest of the jury, and induced them to return a verdict which involved the highest punishment short of death, thirty-four years imprisonment. They were disposed to have him hanged. He has been ten years in confinement, and has not yet manifested signs of remorse. It appears to me, that the philanthropist had not made a very great inroad on justice in this instance, even on the showing of the party who blamed him.

American Institutions.—The late amendments of the constitution of Pennsylvania, and the triumph of the democratic party in electing a majority of both houses of the legislature, and also the governor, have caused great irritation to the losing party, and a number of excellent and deserving persons are embarrassed by their own expulsion from office. I hear such persons say that they would prefer a military despotism to the institutions of the United States as at present administered; others, more moderate, inform me that they would prefer a government like that of the British in Canada to their own democracy. It would be easy to represent these sayings as evidence that respectable persons in the United States are tired of their republican forms, and desire the repose of a monarchy; but I have had experience enough of political life to be able to distinguish between expressions uttered under irritation caused by defeat, and those which spring from sober conviction. If any American would collect and record the lamentations over the fallen greatness of the British Empire, and the prophetic anticipations of social ruin, uttered by the Tories after the passing of Lord Grey's Reform Bill, in 1832, he might prove to demonstration that the nation was then tired of liberty, and solicitous for a despotism. Not one of these Tories, however, would have agreed to surrender one privilege which his own class possessed, in order to bring in a despot: The Tories were discontented solely because some degree of control over the national affairs had been given to an extended class of the people, which so far abridged their own power. It is the same here. Those who invoke a despotism would fight to the last to preserve that liberty which they affect to despise, if a despot should appear and propose to deprive them of it. Their unhappiness arises from some portion of power having passed from their own hands into those of the people. Allow this disappointment to subside, and they will prove themselves to be patriots true to their country and its institutions.

Spirit of the People.—An incident occurred, in regard to my lectures, which illustrates the mental condition of the mass of the people in this city. The Philadelphia Museum is a very large and handsome building, the upper floor of which is fitted up as a Museum of Natural History, and the lower floor is occupied by Mr. Dunn's Chinese Collection and a public lecture-room, which have separate doors. So far back as 11th December last, a friend engaged the lecture-room for sixteen nights, at the rent of $250. Subsequently, the directors of the Museum let the upper floor for concerts à la Musard, to be given by Frank Johnston and his brass band, [and to other persons for vocal performances.] These concerts are attended by 2000 or 3000 people, the admittance being 25 cents, or one shilling sterling each. The music is so loud that it often drowns my voice, and when the audience above applaud with their feet, I have no alternative but to stop till they have done. I wrote a letter to the person that has the charge of the Museum, soliciting him to explain to the audience that a lecture, attended by nearly 500 of their fellow-citizens, was proceeding below, and to beg of them as a favour to applaud with their hands instead of their feet. He replied, that to make such a request would only render the annoyance greater. As the lecture-room was let to me before Frank Johnston and his band [and others] began their performances, and as I was not warned of their night, I thought that the directors were bound to remove the disturbance; in other words, to render the lecture-room fit for the purpose for which it was let; but I resolved to submit to the grievance. One of my audience, however, altogether unknown to me, wrote a letter to the editor of the United States Gazette, complaining of the interruption, and also of the benches being so close that "there is not space enough even for a short man to dispose of his legs." To this hour I have no suspicion who wrote the letter; but it produced the following reply:—

"Mr. Editor:—The remarks in your paper of January 9, lead me to conclude that Mr. Combe cares very little for the comfort of his audience, notwithstanding, in absence of every feeling of delicacy, he suggests, through the intervention of your correspondent, that the internal architectural accommodations of the lecture-room of the Philadelphia Museum be altered, and that the public of the city give up the national custom of applauding with their feet instead of their hands. Would clapping of the hands alone be a sign of approbation understood by those who have ever been accustomed to be spoken to in sounds resulting from kicking of the heels?"

"Let Mr. Combe and his friends take into consideration, that the Museum makes more in a single evening than Mr. C. pays in rent for his whole course of lectures, and it is not to be expected that public concerts, given on established nights before Mr. C. came to this city,* are to be put off for his accommodation, unless he come forward boldly, and, as Paul Clifford elegantly expresses it, 'forks up the blunt' in a quid pro quo. Again, as the majority rules, it is not proper that thousands of the people should forego their amusements, to please Mr. C. and his 450 auditors. But there is a remedy. The hall of the Musical Fund can be obtained for, I suppose, $50 a night, about $34 more than Mr. Combe pays for his present room. As the gentleman is independent of pecuniary considerations, and as the public are acquainted with the Fund Hall, I see no objection to the change, unless a want of change should be urged against this suggestion.

* This is not a correct statement; I engaged the room on the 11th December, and the concerts were not then announced.

"ONE OF THE AUDIENCE."

The editor of the paper added the following note to this communication:—

"We think it proper to state, that the article to which our correspondent alludes was not written at the suggestion of Mr. Combe, but by one who is an attendant upon his lectures, and who, in paying for a ticket, deemed himself entitled to hear—and, not hearing, to complain.

"Whether Mr. Combe will go to another hall or not, we cannot say; but if he hired that in the Museum, he supposed it suited to the purposes for which it was let, and not exposed to interruption.

"We do not feel called upon to enter into any discussion of the matter, not being of the audience above or below; but having complied with the suggestion of a friend in the hint we gave, we have thought it due to him to say, that his motives were only what they purport to be, viz: the convenience of Mr. Combe's audience.—ED. U. S. G."

After this letter appeared, the applauding with the feet increased; and I asked several gentlemen whether they really had so unfavourable an opinion of the urbanity and sense of justice of the audience above as to believe, that if civilly requested, after a proper explanation, they would not agree to use their hands. Some said, that they thought the people would willingly do so, if addressed by a person whom they respected; others, however, were of opinion, that the request would only make them more aware of their power, and dispose them the more to use it, and to increase the disturbance. Certainly, nobody ventured to address them, and we sustained the evil to the close of the performances, and near the end of my course.

The impression which this incident made on my mind in regard to the state of morale of the people of Philadelphia, and to the relation subsisting between them and the enlightened class, was not favourable. The foregoing letter breathes the very spirit of injustice and vulgar insolence, and I thought that if that class of citizens who had sufficient refinement to enjoy a concert of instrumental music, and sufficient wealth to be able to afford a shilling each night for hearing it, entertained and acted on the sentiments which it expressed, I should pity the nation which was subject to their rule. Subsequent events, however, satisfied me, that this inference is not fairly warranted by the circumstances. The letter was the emanation of a single mind. This is, therefore, chargeable on the individual alone who wrote it. A lawyer in a distant state who had been much accustomed to public life, and to whom I narrated the circumstances, put this simple question to me:—Did you apply to persons accustomed to public speaking when you wished the audience above to be addressed? I then recollected that at that time all my acquaintances were among medical men, professors, and private citizens, and I answered, No. "This," said he, "explains the whole difficulty. No man unaccustomed to meet our people face to face, and to feel their pulse as he addresses them, could have ventured to ask a favour from two thousand of them, with a fair chance of success; but if you had found some one of their own public characters, who knew them, and whom they knew, to make the request, I venture to say, that it would have instantly been complied with, and you should have had no more annoyance." I was at that time comparatively a stranger to the American people, but after a much more extensive experience of their qualities, I acknowledge my conviction to be that this gentleman is in the right.

Jan. 11. Ther. 40°. Phrenology.—In consequence of my ignorance that the Delaware was subject to freezing below Philadelphia, I sent the collection of casts, skulls, and drawings used in my lectures from New York to this city by sea. They left New York on the 25th December, and they have been sticking in the ice within Cape May since the 27th, and are there still. Fortunately the Phrenological Society of Philadelphia procured a collection of casts from Edinburgh many years ago, which have been kindly lent to me, and Professors Gibson, Horner, and M'Clellan, and Dr. Bell, and other friends, have amply supplied all remaining deficiencies of illustrations. My regular audience is now 500, and it is composed of the first class of ladies and gentlemen in the city, including many of the professors and medical practitioners.

Jan. 12. Ther. 48°. The Girard College.—Mr. Girard was an old merchant, who had accumulated great wealth, and became desirous of providing at once a monument for himself, and a college for orphans. He left his fortune in trust to the city council of Philadelphia, with instructions to accomplish these objects.

The trustees elected Alexander Dallas Bache, Esq., LL.D., a great-grandson of Dr. Franklin, president of the college, and on the 9th of July, 1836, they passed a resolution authorising him to visit all establishments in Europe similar to the Girard College, or any others which promised to afford useful information in organising it, and to report. In the mean time, they have proceeded to carry the will into execution, and have expended considerably above the full income of the fund, which is said to be about £24,000 sterling annually, in building the college.

Dr. Bache appears to have executed the important duty devolved on him with great industry and ability, and his own views of education are liberal and enlightened. In Pennsylvania education is deficient not only in quantity, but still more in quality; and as it is extremely difficult to induce an uninstructed people to adopt improvements of the want of which they have no consciousness, and of the value of which they have no adequate comprehension; and as no onward movement can be made in any thing without their sanction, this magnificent institution, if well managed, may become a radiating centre from which higher views both of education and of modes of instruction may be diffused over the whole state.

Mr. Girard calls on his trustees to "develop talent," but ex nihilo nihil fit—nature must give ability before it can be unfolded; and the records of several eleemosynary institutions of a kind similar to his college, which have been in operation, under the management of various public bodies, or of trustees, in Edinburgh, for more than a century and a half, have developed comparatively little talent of high order, during the whole of that long period. They have furnished many useful and respectable citizens, but I have not read any list of more distinguished men who have emanated from its halls. A similar remark probably applies to many other eleemosynary institutions. There must be a cause for this dearth of high talent. I do not impute it to neglect in the teachers, or to want of patronage and opportunities of rising afforded to the pupils: The instruction is equal to that generally received by boys in the middle ranks of life, and the directors, being influential men, are both able and willing to advance the pupils in after life, to the full extent of their abilities. Besides, great talents need no patrons: They unfold themselves, and open the way to distinction not only unaided, but in opposition to the most momentous obstacles.

The explanation which I venture to give of the dearth of great talent in the pupils of eleemosynary institutions is one furnished by phrenology. Children become destitute orphans (and only such are received into these hospitals,) either in consequence of their parents having married late, so that their strength was exhausted, and they died before rearing their offspring; or from their having possessed bad constitutions, which sunk before the usual age of decay; or from their having had feeble or ill-balanced brains, which led them into vicious, reckless, or foolish conduct, terminating in premature death; or from some combination of these or similar causes. Only in cases of blameless accidents can children become destitute orphans, without some serious departure by their parents from the laws of health impressed by the Creator on the human constitution. The children, therefore, furnished by society for these institutions may be viewed as generally descending from parents of inferior constitutions; these imperfections are transmitted to the offspring; and hence the latter rarely rise to superiority over the children of better constituted individuals.

I perceive that as the civic rulers of Philadelphia are the patrons of the Girard College, their political opponents have already begun to make "political capital" out of their management of it. They accuse them of converting the vast expenditure attending its erection, into jobs, and means of political corruption. Mr. Girard, however, has taken precautions to avert any gross deviation from the objects of his will, by declaring, that, if the city functionaries shall infringe the rules which he has laid down, they shall forfeit the management, which shall then devolve on the state. This provision makes them act with the greatest circumspection, and during my stay in Philadelphia, I repeatedly heard of their laying cases before the most eminent lawyers for advice, whether certain contemplated measures were or were not consistent with the will.

Cemetery at Laurel Hill.—This cemetery is situated about three and a half miles from Philadelphia; it lies between the Schuylkill river, on the west, and the Ridge road on the east, and extends to upwards of twenty acres. The highest point of the grounds is at least one hundred feet above the level of the river, to which it slopes gradually down. It is planted with forest-trees, and ornamented with shrubs and flowers. The entrance is a pure specimen of Doric architecture, occupying a space of 216 feet along the road. There is a cottage ornée for the residence of the superintendent; a beautiful Gothic chapel, a large house for visitors to rest in, a receiving tomb, and stabling for forty carriages, with a green-house for the protection of the ornamental plants and shrubs in winter. The first object that strikes the eye, after passing within the gate, is a small Gothic erection, within which Thom's group of Old Mortality is placed. There sits Sir Walter Scott, and beside him are Old Mortality and his pony, all most appropriately placed among the tombs. The cemetery belongs to an incorporated joint stock company, and was instituted only in 1836.

Jan. 13. Ther. 40°. Sunday.—We heard Mr. Furness preach an excellent sermon on the resurrection of Lazarus, occasioned by the death of a young mother belonging to the congregation. He is the first and only Unitarian minister in Philadelphia. His church is handsome, and his congregation numerous and genteel. Philadelphia is distinguished for orthodoxy and Quakerism.

Jan. 15. Ther. 33°. Prosperous Times.—These are what are called "prosperous times" in Philadelphia. The depression which attended the suspension of cash-payments by the banks in 1837, has passed away. Bank paper is now abundant, speculation is afloat, and prices are high. A house in Chestnut street, in the best situation, with a front under thirty feet, and ground extending probably 150 feet backwards, has just been sold for $35,000, (7000*l.* sterling) to be converted into a china store. The stores, or shops, in this city, are very handsome, and their wares are of a sumptuous description. The display of female beauty and good taste presented by Chestnut street on a fine day, would do credit to any European city.

Jan. 16. Ther. 20°. John Vaughan, Esq. and Benjamin Franklin.—Mr. Vaughan is now in his 83d year, and is one of the most interesting men in Philadelphia. He is secretary to the American Philosophical Society, and lives in their apartments. He was educated under the auspices of Benjamin Franklin, was his intimate friend, and, in a long career of public usefulness and private benevolence, has faithfully walked in his footsteps. He was one of Dr. Franklin's suite when he was presented to Marie Antoinette after France had recognised the independence of the United States. Dr. Franklin had ordered a wig, and intended to appear in a full court dress; but when the wig was sent to him, it was too small. He told the perruquier that he had married his whole arrangements by this blunder, and that it was now too late to rectify it. "Ah! mon Dieu, Monsieur, c'est que votre tête est trop grosse," was the ready reply; and Franklin at once resolved to appear in his velvet coat, of the Quaker cut, with his hair combed back; in short, in his usual attire when dressed for a private party. His fine venerable figure, in this unique yet becoming apparel, created quite a sensation in the French court, and what was the result merely of a barber's blunder, was talked of as an admirable specimen of good taste and republican independence! His suite were all in court dresses; and as Mr. Vaughan had only newly arrived at Passy, he was fitted with clothes hired for the day from a friper.

In the hall of the American Philosophical Society, there is a portrait of Franklin in the act of reading. He is dressed in a wig and light blue coat. This portrait, which Mr. Vaughan describes as an exact resemblance, gives him an expression about the lower part of the face different from that of any other portrait which I have seen; it indicates more concentration of mind.

The bust of him, of which we have casts in Edinburgh, is here in marble, and is a duplicate of the head and shoulders of his statue erected above the front door of the Philadelphia Library, of which he was the founder. It also is a faithful representation of him according to Mr. Vaughan's testimony. His chair likewise is here, and bespeaks his ingenious mind. It is in itself an old, comfortable, leather-covered arm-chair, on wheels. But the bottom turns round on a pivot, and its under side presents steps for mounting up to the shelves of the library. The chair in which Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence is also preserved here. It is small, circular in form, with arms, and a high back; and a flat black board is fixed over the right arm, on which Jefferson wrote.

American Declaration of Independence.—In the library is shown an original draught of the Declaration of Independence, in Jefferson's handwriting, with all the corrections made on it in its progress through congress. The Edinburgh Review, in noticing Captain Marryatt's observations on this document, in his work on the United States, ridicules the idea of its being an original, and says that if Captain Marryatt "had ever read that very interesting book (Memoirs of Jefferson, i. 17), he would have been aware how grossly a Mr. Vaughan of Philadelphia was hoaxing him when he talked of having discovered the original draught of the Declaration of Independence." Captain Marryatt, in his second work, rates Miss Martineau soundly for having written that review, but this remark affords strong presumptive evidence to me that she was not guilty of that transgression. No one who had been as much in literary society in Philadelphia as she was, could have spoken of "a Mr. John Vaughan." Such a phrase was as unlikely to have presented itself to her, as that of "a Mr. Macvey Napier" would be to occur to a literary stranger speaking of the distinguished men of Edinburgh. Again, she must have known that the evidence of this being a genuine document is complete. On my second visit to Philadelphia, in March, 1840, Mr. Vaughan enabled me to peruse original letters, giving its history, from the day it was composed to that on which it was presented to the American Philosophical Society. Mr. Jefferson wrote with his own hand two copies of his first draught; and sent one to Richard Henry Lee, who moved its adoption in congress, and the document which Mr. Vaughan showed to Captain Marryatt, and which I minutely examined, is that duplicate with the corrections added. He showed me a large collection of letters extending over twenty years, and ending in 1826, written to himself by Thomas Jefferson, and the identity of the handwriting in them and in this draught is evident. I saw numerous autographs of Franklin, and perceived that the corrections on the draught, said to be in his handwriting, are clearly genuine. Mr. Vaughan exhibited also a letter, dated a few weeks before my visit, from the son of Richard Henry Lee to himself, expressing his astonishment at the reviewer's remarks.

Among the passages deleted by congress, is a vehement denunciation against George III. for exercising his veto to prevent the abolition of the slave trade, when proposed by the colonies. On pages 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, of the "Memoir, Correspondence, and Miscellanies from the papers of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Thomas Jefferson Randolph" (Boston, 1830), the Declaration of Independence, in its original and amended forms (the original containing this paragraph), is printed at full length; and at page 146, a fac-simile of it (taken from the draft in the library) is given. These copies correspond in every particular with the draught in the society's library, which is framed between two thick plates of glass, for its preservation. The reviewer refers to this memoir as showing that Captain Marryatt must have been hoaxed; but it does not contain a word to warrant such an assumption.

Money Exchange.—I wished to remit a sum of $1000 to New York, and applied to two of the first banks here for a draft on that city; but they referred me to the brokers, whose numerous "exchange offices" abound in Philadelphia as they do in New York. I learned that nearly the whole business of exchange is in the hands of these brokers. The draught was purchased from a broker, and the premium was only $3 at eight. The rise of the profession of brokers is recent. The following interesting account of it appeared lately in one of the American periodicals:—

"At this period (1800) of the history of New York, the business of a broker was hardly known; there were only three stock and exchange brokers in the city. They were Nathaniel Prime, Leonard Bleacher, and A. H. Lawrence. The two first are living. Their operations in stocks were very small. Only two banks, viz.: the New York and the United States, were in existence, added to which, there were two or three insurance stocks. Then it was rare that a share was bought except for investment.

"The change in this branch of business has been truly astonishing. We are enabled to give a list, amounting to eighty-six in number, belonging to the board. Besides these, there are many who deal in money, real estate, and stocks, that do not belong to the board.

"The question naturally arises, how so many persons can obtain a living? which is solved by the fact, that, from the examination of one gentleman's books, we find that sales of from \$400,000 to \$800,000 are now made in stock in a day, and in brisk times the sales will average a million. The greatest operations are in fancy stocks, which fluctuate daily from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 and 5 per cent. Delaware and Hudson is the foothall. One large dealer informs us that he sold of this stock alone, a number of shares equal to the whole capital. The brokerage paid in that stock alone, is immense, perhaps equal to one half the capital per annum. Harlæm, Mohawk, and Stonington, are among the 'Fancies.' Stonington has been as high as 125, and as low as 18. A broker of our acquaintance purchased for a gentleman at 65. He went to the East Indies—in the mean time it fell to 18. A few days after he returned, he sold out at 69, leaving him a fair interest. Harlæm has been as high as 200, and as low as 34. Mohawk has experienced the same fluctuations. Dry Dock has varied about 70 per cent. during the past year. The capitals of the Fire Stocks have, within five years, been nearly all swept away. They are now very stable. The Marine Companies are much depressed.

"The stock speculators are divided, taking the same names as those familiarly known in London, 'Bulls and Bears.' The former endeavour to carry up stocks, while the latter are interested in carrying them down. In the number of produce brokers, and the amount of business done, there has been quite a great change. At the period alluded to there were but two persons engaged as produce brokers, and they transacted but little business. Now the number is very great, and the operations immense."

Jan. 17. Ther. 30°. The Streets.—The streets are covered with sheets of pure ice, rendering it dangerous to walk on them. I asked why sand or ashes were not strewed on them, and was told that visitors would bring it into the houses on their feet and dirty the carpets! They may break their limbs by falling, but the carpets must be preserved unsullied. I admire very much the richness and perfect preservation of the carpets on the public rooms in most of the houses in which we visit in this city, but I would give up a little of the pleasure which they afford me for the sake of safety in the streets. However, the tastes of the citizens are more to be regarded than those of a passing stranger.

Jan. 18. Ther. 33°. The weather is delightful: bright sunshine and very moderate frost. Phrenology.—Several days ago, Dr. Winn Bush called and informed me that he had seen Dr. George M'Clellan remove two tumours from the head of a young man named Richardson, one external to the skull at the situation of the organs of Firmness and Conscientiousness, and the other internal; that the skull to the extent of several square inches had been removed, and that the brain in this region was found to have disappeared; that nevertheless, the patient had sat up in full possession of all his mental faculties, and conversed with them during the operation, and, particularly, had manifested great firmness and self-possession; and he requested me to reconcile these facts with phrenology. The case had attracted much attention, and was extensively spoken of in Philadelphia as one strikingly adverse to phrenology. My reply was, that if such a case had occurred, it was the first that I had heard of sufficiently authenticated; and that I could offer no opinion on it till I should see it myself, which I solicited permission to do. To-day, Dr. M'Clellan was so kind as to take me with him, when he went to dress the wound. He stated, however, that the supposed difficulty in regard to phrenology had disappeared, because on the second or third dressing he and Dr. Bush were astonished to see that the convolutions had risen up, and that in point of fact they had never been destroyed, but only displaced by the pressure of the internal tumour. It was about the size and form of half of a hen's egg cut longitudinally. The external tumour was about the same size. Both had been formed in consequence of a blow received from a stone, so slight at first as scarcely to attract attention; and their growth had extended over a period of three years. The interior tumour had been formed between the skull and the falx, the longitudinal canal having been carried down uninjured below its lower surface. Dr. M'Clellan remarked, that the slow growth explained the non-affection of the mental faculties. The brain had never been disorganised, but merely pressed downwards, and Nature had accommodated herself to the change.

When I saw the patient, he was pale, and much reduced in flesh, but placid and quite intelligent. He rose from bed, came into the adjoining room, and sat before the fire. On the dressing being removed, I saw the surface of the organs of Self-Esteem, and Love of Approbation exposed. They were large, particularly Self-Esteem. They rose and fell with the pulsation of the arteries. They were entire, and on a level with the other portions of the brain. I conversed with him, and received from himself the information which is here embodied concerning the cause and growth of the tumour. He said he knew that it was a matter of life and death, and resolved to submit to the operation, and to endure it manfully. His organs of Firmness seemed to be very large, but they were not involved in the injury, or only partially so, at the posterior edge.

Dr. McClellan stated that this case showed the importance of surgeons knowing accurately the situation of the organs; because, although he now saw that the organs of Firmness were not involved, he would at first have certified that they were destroyed, and that the patient manifested the faculty powerfully: He was now satisfied that the organs affected by the tumour were Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation, and that he had not had adequate opportunities of judging whether the manifestations of these faculties were affected or not; besides, there was before our eyes evidence that the convolutions had not been disorganised.

The patient recovered, and after his convalescence he mentioned facts that showed that his sentiments of Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation had not remained unaffected during the progress of the disease. He was a player and ventriloquist, and performed in the western cities. He stated, that before receiving the blow, he was an entire stranger to diffidence. For the first three months after the accident, he felt no change in his mental condition, and was not aware that there was an affection of his head. At the end of that time, the external tumour began to attract his attention, and he felt also visitations of diffidence, which he had never before experienced. He was convinced that his powers of acting were unimpaired, yet he could not give effect to this conviction—for he felt as if he should fail. In the course of time his self-confidence diminished so much that he could no longer appear on the stage, yet his intellectual faculties were clear and active.*

So far from this case, therefore, having been unfavourable to Phrenology, it proved, when fully investigated, a striking confirmation of its truth. Dr. McClellan is Professor of Surgery in the Jefferson College, Philadelphia, and he subsequently informed me, that before my arrival in that city, he had ridiculed Phrenology in his lectures; that he had come to my lectures with the view of obtaining additional materials for refuting it; that he had at first conceived this case to be one strongly adverse to its pretensions, but now saw that it was the reverse; that the result of hearing my whole course had been to convince him of the futility of the objections on which he had previously relied, and to dispose him to devote a serious attention to the subject. Before I left Philadelphia, he made the amende honorable to his class; told them that he had rashly condemned the science; that its principles were consistent with the best established facts in physiology, and that it was supported by a greater body of evidence than he had imagined. He wrote a letter to the same effect to Dr. Sewall of Washington, whom he had previously encouraged in his attacks against the science, and strongly counseled him to revise his opinions.

Portrait of General Washington.—I visited

* In April, 1840, the patient most unexpectedly accosted me in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. He was then in good health, and acting as barkeeper in a hotel. He was occasionally subject to headaches, but did not mention any other inconveniences affecting him. [A detailed account of the case of Richardson, written by Dr. McClellan, has been published in the American Phrenological Journal, No 4. Vol. iii. January, 1840.]

the studio of Mr. Rembrandt Peale. He is the son of the earliest portrait painter that America can boast of, and his father seems to have been an enthusiast in the art (as this gentleman is himself), for he named two of his sons Rembrandt and Titian, and educated both as painters. Mr. Rembrandt Peale was personally acquainted with General Washington, and painted a large equestrian portrait of him, which he preserves in his studio. The charger is white: The picture appeared to me to possess much merit as a work of art; and the likeness has been pronounced to be faithful. Washington's head, as here delineated, is obviously large; and the anterior lobe of the brain is large in all directions; the organ of Benevolence is seen to rise, but there the moral organs disappear under the hair. The temperament is bilious-sanguine; the action of the muscles of the mouth strongly express Secretiveness and Firmness, and the eyes bespeak these qualities combined with Cautiousness. The general expression of the countenance is that of sagacity, prudence, and determination.

Mr. Peale mentioned that his father painted a miniature of the General, in his head-quarters, for Mrs. Washington. His bedroom was so small that it admitted only of one chair, which was dedicated to the painter, and Washington sat on the front of the bed. It was the only apartment occupied by the General as his own. His officers were in the other rooms crowded together. A messenger arrived, and a despatch was presented to Washington. He read the signature and part of the contents, and, without speaking a word, handed it to an officer, one of his aides-de-camp, who was present, and he continued conversing with the painter. The officer read and returned the despatch; Washington then read it deliberately from beginning to end, and at the distance of half an hour from first receiving it, he said, "Burgoyne has surrendered; this is an account of it."

Mr. Peale mentioned that General Washington sat to him three times for his portrait, in an apartment in the State House. The hour was seven in the morning. The first morning, when the State House clock struck the first bell of seven, the door opened, Washington entered with his watch in his hand, and he was seated before the clock had done striking the hour. The second morning he was seen walking in the State House yard; he was going from the stair when the first stroke of seven reached his ear; he wheeled instantly, walked quickly back, ascended, and was in the room before the clock had finished seven, again holding his watch in hand. On the third morning he entered as the clock began to strike.

During the war of independence, a base attempt was made to injure Washington by representing him as a traitor. It was stated, that one of his servants had run away from him, and carried off a bundle of letters, and that among these were duplicates of several which he had written to one of the British commanders, offering to use his influence to bring back the Americans to their allegiance to Great Britain. Washington was a man of awful presence and reserved habits. Every one was afraid to ask him if the letters were genuine, and he did not deign to utter a word on the subject himself. The whole country was in a state of excitement about them, when Mr. Peale's uncle, who was an intimate friend of Washington, ventured to put the question to him. He allowed a smile to play for an instant on his countenance, as if glad that he had been asked, and replied: "Sir, I never lost any papers, and no servant of mine ever ran away." These words were published, and their effect was electrical. The calumny was extinguished instantly.

It is deeply to be regretted that there is no cast of the head of Washington taken from nature. I have examined the common busts and portraits of him, but they show only that the head was large, and that its general proportions were harmonious. I have heard the question discussed both in England and the United States, whether Washington was really a great man; seeing that he did not, in any particular direction, show any extraordinary power. Judging from his conduct and his writings, as well as from what we know of his head, I infer, that he was one of those rare specimens of humanity in whom nearly all the mental organs are largely developed, and in harmonious proportions. Such a combination produces a character distinguished for mental power in all directions. His temperament, as already stated, seems to have sanguine-bilious, giving activity and the capacity of long endurance. He exhibited a constancy which no difficulties could shake, an honesty of purpose and ardour of patriotism which no temptations could overcome or opposition subdue. He placed the welfare of his country on its true basis, that of industry and virtue; and he always regarded its interests before his own. In him there was no important quality of mind deficient, and no quality in excess; there were in his understanding no false lights, and no deficient lights. He gave to every thing its due weight and no more. He was dignified, courteous, and remarkably just. He was brave, yet cautious and politic; quick to perceive and prompt to execute; always acting at the right time, and in the right manner. Those who say that he was not a great man, can merely mean that he displayed no one quality in excess; that he showed no coruscations of isolated talent, and performed no individual acts calculated to dazzle or amaze mankind. But he accomplished a very great achievement, the independence of his country, by a succession of most wise and efficient measures, every one of which showed mental superiority. In short, he displayed, in a long career both of adversity and prosperity, that sterling worth of soul, that clear and sound judgment, that grandeur of the whole man, which rendered him far more great and estimable than those geniuses who are endowed with splendid partial talents combined with great defects. In my opinion, Washington was one of the greatest men that ever lived.

One of the most touching monuments of his patriotism with which I became acquainted in the United States, was "a fac simile of his public accounts, kept during the Revolutionary War," printed in Washington in 1838, of which my excellent friend Mr. Thomas Gilpin presented me with a copy. The accounts commence in June 1775, end in June 1783, and are all written with his own hand. They extend to 66 folio pages. The authenticity of the copy is certified by the chief of the engineer department at Washington, on 24th September, 1833. It is published "for the benefit of Washington's Manual Labour School and Male Orphan Asylum." Although he accepted of no salary or pay, he is minute to an extraordinary degree, in the specification of his expenses, and the account contains notes in explanation of every sum which appears to be large, and also intimations of all claims which he conceives to be still due by the United States, to individuals employed in his service.

January 19th. Ther. 30°. Lynch Law.—A criminal trial is proceeding here in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, before Judges King and Randall, of Henry Chauncey as principal, and of William Nixon, and William Armstrong, accessories, for the murder of Eliza Sowers, in an attempt to produce abortion. The accused were at large on bail, but the audience in court were so strongly excited by some of the evidence against Nixon, that on leaving it they attempted to lynch him, and he was rescued by the police. Chauncey was subsequently condemned, while Nixon was acquitted. The populace of Edinburgh endeavoured to treat the notorious murderer, William Hare, the associate of Burke, in the same manner, when he was liberated from prison after Burke's condemnation. The conduct of the mob in Philadelphia was mentioned in the newspapers and slightly condemned. In society, however, I heard the outrage spoken of in terms of strong condemnation, and mob ascendancy seems to be regarded as an increasing evil. In Philadelphia, last year, a mob burned down a splendid public hall, because meetings were held in it for the abolition of slavery, and no attempt was made to prevent them. The fire companies, with their engines, attended, and strenuously exerted themselves in preventing the fire from spreading to the adjoining buildings, but they made no efforts to extinguish the fire in the hall itself. From the tone in which such outrages are spoken of in the public journals, there appears to be abroad, in the minds of men generally, a fear of the people, which deters them from boldly speaking disagreeable truths to the masses. They are right to abstain from scolding or violent vituperation; but they withhold also, to too great an extent, the language of fervid reason and energetic moral sentiment in condemnation of their conduct. I observe that a virtuous editor occasionally gives full expression to his just indignation against acts of violence committed by the people in some distant state or city, where his paper does not circulate. This is well, but it would be still better and more magnanimous if he would also boldly condemn domestic iniquities.

The trial of Chauncey brought to light many indelicate and disgusting scenes, all of which were reported in the newspapers. In Edinburgh, such trials are conducted with closed doors, and the details are omitted by the reporters for the press.

Advertisements.—The American newspapers insert advertisements on moderate terms, and have a very large proportion of their sheets filled with them. Any one may, for a fixed sum, engage a certain number of inches in a column during the year, into which he may insert whatever notices he pleases. The charge for insertion of a standing advertisement is diminished, within certain limits, at each repetition. The consequence is, that advertisements are repeated so often that they are not generally read. In many instances, after the most extensive advertising of my lectures, I have met with individuals who had never seen the announcement of them, and who confessed that they did not read advertisements. There is one part of the paper, at the close of editorial remarks, in which advertisements may be inserted at a higher rate, and these are pretty generally looked at; but those among the dense columns of old advertisements have little chance of attracting attention. The only way of being certain to be read, is to obtain an editorial paragraph referring to the notice in another column. The editors were so obliging as generally to favour me with these mementos; but the regular advertisers are thrown upon their own means for arresting the public eye. One common method is to print in capital letters at the top some very important words, such as "Cure your cough! cure your cough!! cure your cough!!!" Then follows the announcement of some sovereign balm, lozenge, or lotion:—Or "Boots! boots!! boots!!!" "Stoves! stoves!! stoves!!!" There is character in these announcements. In America, every one is so intently and so exclusively engaged about his own affairs, that urgent appeals must be made before his attention can be diverted to the pretensions of his neighbours.

Coal.—Mines of anthracite coal are wrought in the interior of Pennsylvania, and the produce is imported in large quantities into all the Atlantic cities. The coal requires a chimney with a strong draught to make it burn, but when fairly ignited it gives a powerful heat. The present prices per ton of 2240 lbs. are for "large lumps $5 50;" "broken and screened $6;" "large egg $5 50;" "nut $5."

Aristocracy.—The London Atlas of 1st December last, contains a clever article on the English aristocracy, which has led to an interesting conversation with some of the citizens of Philadelphia. The Atlas admires the titled aristocracy, because it presents an exciting object to the ambition of the inferior ranks, and stimulates them to exertion: It is not a barrier impassable to merit, but on the contrary, one which opens and admits the man of plebeian birth when he acquires great wealth, or distinguishes himself by his talents. It is thus preserved from senility, and at the same time continues to command the reverence of all the inferior grades. These reasons strike men very differently here. The plebeian, it is here said, when absorbed into the hereditary peerage, leaves his own class, with all his interest in it; he enters the higher ranks, adopts their sentiments, and lends them the aid of his talents, energy, and knowledge, in supporting their privileges and pretensions. The people are thus first neglected, and then abandoned, by those who should have been their natural protectors; and they sink into degradation. I have seen it stated in English periodicals that Lords Eldon and Stowell were sons of a barge-master and small coal-dealer at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; that Lord Tenterden was the son of a barber at Canterbury: Lord Gifford was articled to a solicitor, and Lord Langdale, the Master of the Rolls, was an accoucheur. The rise of such men, and of many others, to the highest rank and employments in the state, does honour certainly to themselves, and many persons think also to the institutions of the country under which such elevations are possible; but these successful aspirants forget the class from which they have sprung. In the United States, also, men of talent, integrity, and industry, rise to eminence and consideration; but if they seek the gratification of their ambition in any department of public life, they depend so completely on the people for their elevation, that they dare not neglect them. I have already mentioned that in the United States, ambitious lawyers, representatives, and senators, lecture to the people, deliver orations before them, and court their good opinion by private civilities. In England, this would be regarded by men of rank as a degradation.

The consequences of the two systems are very different. In England, the middle classes form a gulf of vast depth and width between the people and the aristocracy, and so completely cut off communication and sympathy between them, that the high aristocracy, generally speaking, have no just conceptions of the manner in which the people live, of the sufferings they endure, or of the effects of their own legislation on their happiness. The middle ranks, again, having their ambition directed upwards, become regardless of the people in proportion as their means of benefiting them increase: If a plebeian family acquire great wealth and become distinguished for superior talents, and by these advantages attain to a legitimate influence on the public councils of the nation, they are tempted, by the English institutions, to devote their whole advantages to the service of the aristocracy. In the United States, they cannot avoid dedicating them to that of the people. It is an evil certainly to live in subjection to an ignorant and self-willed multitude; but in proportion to the pressure of this evil, is the desire to escape from it strong; and there is only one means of deliverance in the United States; namely, by raising the people in their moral and intellectual condition. Accordingly, I perceive that the power of the people has already produced on the minds of men of every variety of disposition a deep impression of the urgent necessity for advancing the cause of general education. The selfish and rich have discovered that they have no security for their possessions except in the enlightenment and morality of the people; the philanthropists and philosophers rejoice in the improvement of the people as a measure which they have always desired; while the divines labour for the elevation of the people as their proper vocation: The only indifference to education is found in the masses themselves, many of whom have not yet learned to appreciate its value; and the only opposition to it comes from unprincipled demagogues who entertain hopes for themselves, while the electors are ignorant, but whose sagacity enables them to desert their own ruin as the result of the general instruction of the people. Society in America, therefore, is so composed as to direct all the efficient forces of the social body, to one great object, the improvement of the masses.

In Britain, on the other hand, we have powerful established churches, so richly endowed that they are in no way dependent on the people, but solely on the aristocracy. In consequence, they have allowed the masses to fall into a deplorable state of ignorance.* We have middle classes, who, in proportion as they become capable of serving the people, are tempted by a false ambition, to desert them; and an aristocracy so little influenced in its enjoyments, by the condition of the people, that we might suppose it to belong to a different race. To complete the system, in Britain the people are restrained from invading the peace of the superior classes by means of strong police and military forces, wielded by a vigorous executive government, which is supported in this exercise of its power, by all the influence of those whom it protects.

* State of Education in England.—The register of marriages in England throws an incidental light upon the state of Education. The parties married sign their names, if they can write, and affix their marks, if they cannot. Judging by this criterion, it appears, that among 100 men who marry in England, the number unable to write is 33. Among 100 women, 49; and the mean of both, 41. As it is estimated that the number who marry annually is only about 3 per cent. of the persons marriageable, the data are too limited to afford sure results.

In the United States, the people have the power to tyrannise, if they please, over the wealthy, the educated, and the refined; and in Britain, the aristocracy and middle classes have the power to trample, if they choose, on the masses who have no control over the legislators. So far as my observations extend, the people in the United States have not perpetrated one-twentieth part of the acts of injustice, by their legislation, against the rich, which the aristocracy in Britain have done by their legislation against the poor.

I freely confess that while I lived under the British institutions, and enjoyed the advantages which they confer on the upper and middle classes, I, like many others, had a less lively perception of their one-sided character. Even now, after contemplating the greatly superior condition of the masses in the United States, I am bound to state my conviction that this democracy, in its present condition of imperfect instruction, is a rough instrument of government, and that, were I to consult my personal comfort merely, I should prefer to live in England. But viewing the results of both, as a citizen of the world, and as a man bound to love his neighbour as himself, and perceiving that the one tends naturally to the elevation of the few and the degradation of the many, while the other tends to the improvement of all, it is impossible not to wish success to the American Republic.

CHAPTER X.

Philadelphia, Jan. 21. Ther. 33°. The Climate.—There is far less moisture in the air of Philadelphia than in that of British cities in winter, and more electricity. The climate is so stimulating, that wine is unnecessary, and to many persons disagreeable. On 11th January, I mentioned the circumstance of my collection of drawings and casts being on board of a schooner which was then frozen up in the Delaware. The ice-boat has succeeded in cutting a clear way in the river, and the vessel has arrived. I find that the boxes have been on deck all the voyage, and these not waterproof: Nevertheless there is scarcely any damage done even to the drawings. A small portion of water has entered and been frozen after reaching the first layer. In Dr. Franklin's days, the English considered the climate of America more damp than that of their own country, and he, with his usual sagacity, expresses doubts whether the opinion be correct, at least in regard to Philadelphia. Whatever may have been the state of matters then, the air is now certainly drier in the American city: But much of the forest has been cleared since that time.

Godliness profitable unto all things.—The Boston newspapers contain a circular, dated 19th December, 1838, addressed by the commissioners appointed by the Western Railroad Corporation, to the clergy of Massachusetts, pointing out to them "the moral effects of rail-roads," and earnestly requesting them "to take an early opportunity to deliver a discourse before your congregation, on the moral effect of rail-roads on our wide extended country." A Philadelphia newspaper, in copying this circular, remarks that it is an improvement on the text, "Religion (Godliness) is profitable unto all things."

January 22. Ther. 23°. The Eastern Penitentiary.—"This day we visited the Eastern Penitentiary, of which Mr. S. R. Wood, one of the Society of Friends, is the warden.

The warden, in his reports, specifies deficiency in education, as one common cause of crime, and remarks that the convicts in general do not possess the instruction given even in the common free schools of the state.

He repeats again and again, as the result of all his experience, that, "to communicate any material benefit to those who are brought here, their sentences should extend to two years or more."

The warden in his seventh report observes, "that a minute inspection of the character of the unhappy inmates of prisons has developed another interesting fact—that many more of them than was supposed are irresponsible beings, (p. 8). And the inspectors remark, that "there are no doubt some criminals who are incorrigible." The effect of the Penitentiary discipline on them does not generate vindictive feelings, but they leave the establishment with sentiments of regard, rather than resentment, towards those who have attempted to alter their vicious habits. Phrenologists have long proclaimed, that the great cause of the incorrigibility of criminals is the excessive predominance of the organs of the animal propensities over those of the moral and intellectual faculties, and that this class of persons is really composed of moral patients, who should be restrained, but not otherwise punished, during life. As nature is constant in her operations, this truth will in time force itself on the conviction of society; and after injustice and severity shall have been perpetrated for ages, by the free and the fortunate towards the ill constituted and unhappy, a better system of treatment will probably be adopted. Why are the clergy, those guardians of the poor, and ministers of mercy, silent on this subject? Even those of them who are Phrenologists, and know the truth of what I now state, have not moral courage sufficient to lift their voices on behalf of these unfortunate beings.

The health of the prisoners is indicated by the following table:

YEAR.	Average Number in Confinement.	Number of Deaths.	Mortality per cent.
1830	31	1	3.
1831	67	4	6.
1832	91	4	4.4
1833	123	1	.8
1834	183	5	2.7
1835	266	7	2.6
1836	360	12	3.3
1837	387	17	4.3
			8) 27.1
			3.4
			Average.

The reports state, that the deaths arise in some instances from incurable disease affecting the prisoners at their entry, and that the average is greatly augmented by the sickly inefficient condition of the coloured prisoners, who, by self-abuse, become debilitated in mind and body, and

* I am aware that the report of Mr. Crawford to the British government, and the works of De Tocqueville, Miss Martineau, and other travellers, have deprived this subject of all pretensions to novelty; but I perceive a great deficiency of information concerning criminals still existing in the public mind; and as important alterations in the Prison System of Scotland are now in progress, it appears to me to be useful to present once more, even at the risk of repetition, a view of the Eastern Penitentiary.

diseased, and make up three fifths of the whole mortality.

A few convicts labouring under insanity at the time of condemnation, have been sent to the penitentiary, and the inspectors complain, that in one or two instances they have been convicted, in the full knowledge of their insanity, with a view to get quit of them as troublesome to the county! A committee of the legislature, in a report read in the senate on 14th February, 1837, states, that "no instance of insanity has, as yet, occurred in the eastern penitentiary, which has not been traced to causes wholly independent of, and either anterior or posterior to the confinement. Whatever might be the disturbing and stultifying effects of strict seclusion, without labour, without books, without moral instruction, and without daily intercourse with the keepers, certain it is, that with all these circumstances to relieve the distressing ennui, and the supposed maniacal effects, of absolute isolation, the inmates of our prisons are in no danger of aberration or alienation of mind from the cause supposed." (p. 4.) Again, "A comparison of the bills of mortality of the eastern penitentiary, with those of several other institutions, will show conclusively, that the unbroken solitude of the Pennsylvania discipline, does not injuriously affect the health of the convicts. At the eastern penitentiary, the deaths are two and five-tenths per cent.; at the Sing Sing prison four per cent.; at Auburn, two per cent., and so on, settling the question beyond a possibility of doubt, that as great a measure of health is preserved in the Pennsylvania prisons, as in other similar institutions in the United States, or elsewhere."

We visited a number of the male convicts who had been confined for periods ranging from seven to sixteen months to eight years, and their appearance did not indicate either bad health or mental depression. We were introduced also into the cells of several female convicts, some of whom had ornamented the walls with pictures and needlework, giving to the apartments an appearance of tidiness and comfort that bespoke a healthy condition of mind in the inmates.

The food appears to be too rich and abundant for solitude, and several of the men had applied to be placed on a tea diet, consisting of tea and bread, which is allowed them when asked for. Secret vice abounds among the men, particularly the coloured convicts, who have few mental resources; but one of the white male prisoners had celebrated its pleasures and pains in an ode written with a pencil on the white-washed wall of his cell. In conversing with the prisoners, I found them seemingly resigned and cheerful; but I place little reliance on appearances presented to a casual visitor of a prison, especially when he is accompanied by an officer. He will be shown only the best cases, while the convicts will be agreeably excited by his visit and feel little disposition to complain to one who has no power to relieve them, and in presence of a person whose displeasure they dread, and against whom every complaint would be an accusation. At the same time justice requires me to state, that Mr. Wood offered to introduce us to any cells we chose to point out; and gave me the conviction that he had no secrets to conceal. His views of the criminal mind appeared to me to be sound and enlightened, and his principles of action at once just and humane.

In regard to the effects of the discipline in the eastern penitentiary, I observe that the system of entire solitude, even when combined with labour, forgotten that Ideals do exist; that if they be not approximated to at all, the whole matter goes to wreck! Infallibly. No bricklayer builds a wall perfectly perpendicular, mathematically this is not possible; a certain degree of perpendicularity suffices him; and he, like a good bricklayer, who must have done with his job, leaves it so. And yet if he away too much from the perpendicular; above all, if he throw plummet and level quite away from him, and pile brick on brick heedless, just as it comes to hand—! Such bricklayer, I think, is in a bad way. He has forgotten himself: but the Law of Gravitation does not forget to act on him; he and his wall rush down into confused welter of ruin!

This is the history of all rebellions, French Revolutions, social explosions in ancient or modern times. You have put the too Unable Man at the head of affairs! The too ignoble, unvaliant, fatuous man. You have forgotten that there is any rule, or natural necessity whatever, of putting the Able Man there. Brick must lie on brick as it may and can. Unable Simulacrum of Ability, quack, in a word, must adjust himself with quack, in all manner of administration of human things; which accordingly lie unadministered, fermenting into unmeasured masses of failure, of indigent misery: in the outward, and in the inward or spiritual, miserable millions stretch out the hand for their due supply, and it is not there. The "law of gravitation" acts; Nature's laws do none of them forget to act. The miserable millions burst forth into Sansculottism, or some other sort of madness: bricks and mortar lie as a fatal chaos!—

Much sorry stuff, written some hundred years ago or more, about the "Divine rights of Kings," moulders unread now in the public libraries of this country. Far be it from us to disturb the calm process by which it is disappearing harmlessly from the earth, in those repositories. At the same time not to let the immense rubbish go without leaving us, as it ought; some soul of it behind,—I will say that it did mean something; something true, which it is important for us and all men to keep in mind. To assert that in whatever man you chose to lay hold of (by this or the other plan of clutching at him) and clapt a round piece of metal on the head of, and called King,—there straightway came to reside a divine virtue, so that he became a kind of god, and a Divinity inspired him with faculty and right to rule over you to all lengths: this—what can we do with this but leave it to rot silently in the public libraries? But I will say withal, and that is what these Divine-right men meant, That in Kings, and in all human Authorities, and relations that men god-created can form among each other, there is verily a Divine Right or else a Diabolic Wrong; one or the other of these two! For it is false altogether, what the last Sceptical Century taught us, that this world is a steam-engine. There is a God in this world; and a God's sanction, or else the violation of such, does look out from all ruling and obedience, from all moral acts of men. There is no act more moral between men than that of rule and obedience. Wo to him that claims obedience when it is not due; wo to him that refuses it when it is! God's law is in that, I say, however the parchment laws may run: there is a Divine Right or else a Diabolic Wrong at the heart of every claim that one man makes upon another.

It can do none of us harm to reflect on this: in all the relations of life it will concern us; in Loyalty and Royalty, the highest of these. I esteem the modern error, that all goes by self-interest and the checking and balancing of greedy knaveries, and that, in short, there is nothing divine whatever in the association of men, a still more despicable error, natural as it is to an unbelieving century, than that of a "divine right" in people called Kings. I say, Find me the true Könning, King, or Able-man, and he has a divine right over me. That we knew in some tolerable measure how to find him, and that all men were ready to acknowledge his divine right when found: this is precisely the healing which a sick world is every where, in these ages, seeking after! The true King, as guide of the practical, has ever something of the Pontiff in him—guide of the spiritual, from which all practice has its rise. This, too, is a true saying, That the King is head of the Church. But we will leave the Polemic stuff of a dead century to lie quiet on its book-shelves.

Certainly it is a fearful business, that of having your Able-man to seek and not knowing in what manner to proceed about it! That is the world's sad predicament in these times of ours. They are times of revolution, and have long been. The bricklayer with his bricks, no longer heedful of the plummet or the law of gravitation, have toppled, tumbled, and it all welters as we see! But the beginning of it was not the French Revolution; that is rather the end, we can hope. It were truer to say, the beginning was three centuries further back: in the reformation of Luther. That the thing which still called itself Christian Church had become a Falsehood, and brazenly went about pretending to pardon men's sins for metallic coined money, and to do much else which in the everlasting truth of Nature it did not now do: here lay the vital malady. The inward being wrong, all outward went ever more and more wrong. Belief died away; all was doubt, disbelief. The builder cast away his plummet; said to himself, "What is gravitation? Brick lie on brick there!" Alas, does it not still sound strange to many of us, the assertion that there is a God's-truth in the business of god-created men: that all is not a kind of grimace, an "expediency," diplomacy, one knows not what!

From that first necessary assertion of Luther's, "You, self-styled Papa, you are no Father in God at all; you are a Chimera, whom I know not how to name in polite language!"—from that, onwards to the shout which rose round Camille Desmoulins in the Palais Royal, "Aux armes!" when the people had burst up against all manner of Chimeras, I find a natural historical sequence. That shout, too, so frightful, half infernal, was a great matter. Once more the voice of awakened nations; starting confusedly, as out of nightmare, as out of death-sleep, into some dim feeling that Life was real; that God's world was not an expediency and diplomacy! Infernal;—yes, since they would not have it otherwise. Infernal, since not celestial or terrestrial! Hollowness, insincerity has to cease; sincerity of some sort has to begin. Cost what it may, reigns of terror, horrors of French Revolution, or what else, we have to return to truth. Here is a truth, as I said: a truth clad in hell-fire, since they would not but have it so!

A common theory among considerable parties of men in England and elsewhere used to be, that the French nation had in those days, as it were, gone mad; that the French Revolution was a general act of insanity, a temporary conversion of France and large sections of the world into a kind of bedlam. The event had risen and raged; but was a madness and non-entity—gone now happily into the regions of dreams and the picturesque! To such comfortable philosophers, the Three Days of July, 1830, must have been a surprising phenomenon. Here is the French nation risen again, in musketry and death-struggle, out shooting and being shot, to make that same mad French Revolution good! The sons and grandsons of those men, it would seem, persist in the enterprise: they do not disown it; they will have it made good; will have themselves shot, if it be not made good! To philosophers who had made up their life-system on that madness-quietus, no phenomenon could be more alarming. Poor Niebuhr, they say, the Prussian professor and historian, fell broken-hearted in consequence; sickened, if we can believe it, and died of the Three Days! It was surely not a very heroic death; little better than Racine's, dying because Louis Fourteenth looked sternly on him once. The world had stood some considerable shocks in its time; might have been expected to survive the Three Days, too, and be found turning on its axis after even them! The Three Days told all mortals that the old French Revolution, mad as it might look, was not a transitory ebullition of bedlam, but a genuine product of this earth where we all live; that it was verily a fact, and the world in general would do well every where to regard it as such.

Truly, without the French Revolution, one would not know what to make of an age like this at all. We will hail the French Revolution as shipwrecked mariners might the sternest rock, in a world otherwise all of baseless sea and waves. A true Apocalypse, though a terrible one, to this false withered artificial time; testifying once more that Nature is preternatural, if not divine, then diabolic; that semblance is not reality; that it has to become reality, or the world will take fire under it—burn it into what it is, namely nothing! Plausibility has ended; empty routine has ended; much has ended. This, as with a Trump of Doom, has been proclaimed to all men. They are the wisest who will learn it soonest. Long confused generations before it be learned; peace impossible till it be! The earnest man, surrounded, as ever, with a world of inconsistencies, can await patiently, patiently strive to do his work, in the midst of that. Sentence of Death is written down in heaven against all that; sentence of Death is now proclaimed on the earth against it: this he with his eyes may see. And surely, I should say, considering the other side of the matter, what enormous difficulties lie there, and how fast, fearfully fast, in all countries, the inexorable demand for solution of them is pressing on—he may easily find other work to do than labouring in the Sansculottic province at this time of day!

To me, in these circumstances, that of "Hero-worship" becomes a fact inexpressibly precious; the most solacing fact one sees in the world at present. There is an everlasting hope in it for the management of the world. Had all traditions, arrangements, creeds, societies that men ever instituted, sunk away, this would remain. The certainty of Heroes being sent us; our faculty, our necessity, to reverence Heroes when sent: it shines like a pole-star through smoke-clouds, dust-clouds, and all manner of down-rushing and conflagration.

Hero-worship would have sounded very strange to those workers and fighters in the French Revolution. Not reverence for Great Men; not any hope, or belief, or even wish, that Great Men could again appear in the world! Nature, turned into a "machine," was as if effete now; could not any longer produce Great Men:—I can tell her, she may give up the trade altogether, then; we cannot do without Great Men! But neither have I any quarrel with that of "Liberty and Equality;" with the faith that, wise great men being impossible, a level immensity of foolish small men would suffice. It was a natural faith then and there. "Liberty and Equality; no authority needed any longer. Hero-worship, reverence for such authorities, has proved false, is itself a falsehood; no more of it! We have had such forgeries, we will now trust nothing. So many base plated coins passing in the market, the belief has now become common that no gold any longer exists, and even that we can do very well without gold!" I find this, among other things, in that universal cry Liberty and Equality; and find it very natural, as matters then stood.

And yet surely it is but the transition from false to true. Considered as the whole truth, it is false altogether; the product of entire sceptical blindness, as yet only struggling to see. Hero-worship exists for ever and every where: not Loyalty alone; it extends from divine adoration down to the lowest practical regions of life. "Bending before men," if it is not to be a mere empty grimace, better dispensed with than practised, is Hero-worship; a recognition that there does dwell in that presence of our brother something divine; that every created man, as Novalis said, is a "revelation in the flesh." They were poets, too, that devised all those graceful courtesies which make life noble! Courtesy is not a falsehood or grimace; it need not be such. And Loyalty, religious Worship itself, are still possible; nay, still inevitable.

Kings.—Of all kind of men, God is the least beholding unto them; for he doeth most for them, and they do ordinarily least for him.—Bacon.

Read before the Society of Arts, by Charles H. Wilson Esq. Architect, Edinburgh.

I shall now notice the mosaic work of Florence, before touching on cameo cutting. It differs entirely from Roman mosaic, being composed of stones inserted in comparatively large masses; it is called work in pietra dura. The stones used are all more or less of a rare and precious nature. In old specimens the most beautiful works are those in which the designs are of an arabesque character. The most remarkable specimen of this description of pietra dura, is an octagonal table in the Gabinetto di Barocci, in the Florence Gallery. It is valued at £30,000 sterling, and was commenced in 1623 by Jacopo Datelli, from designs by Ligozzi: twenty-two artists worked upon it without interruption till it was terminated in the year 1649. Attempts at landscapes and the imitation of natural objects were usually failures in former times—mere works of labour, which did not attain their object; but of late, works have been produced in this art in which are represented groups of flowers and fruit, vases, musical instruments, and other compatible objects, with a truth and beauty which excite the utmost admiration and surprise. These pictures in stone are however enormously expensive, and can only be seen in the palaces of the great. Two tables in the Palazzo Pitti are valued at £7000, and this price is by no means excessive. These are of modern design, on a ground of porphyry, and ten men were employed for four years on one of them, and a spot is pointed out, not more than three inches square, on which a man had worked for ten months. But Florentine mosaic, like that of Rome, is not merely used for cabinet tables or other ornamental articles; the walls of the spacious chapel which is used as the burial place of the reigning family at Florence are lined with pietra dura, realising the gem-incrusted halls of the Arabian tales. Roman mosaic, as we have seen, is of great value as an ally to art; but Florentine mosaic can have no such pretensions, and time and money might be better bestowed. The effect is far from pleasing in the chapel I have alluded to, and I think that the art might be advantageously confined to the production of small ornaments, for which it is eminently adapted.

An imitation of the pietra dura is now made to a great extent in Derbyshire, where the Duke of Devonshire's black marble, said to be quite equal to the famous Nero Antico, is inlaid with malachite, Derbyshire spars, and other stones; but the inlaying is only by veneers, and not done in the solid as at Florence. This, with the softness of the materials, makes the Derbyshire work much cheaper, and yet, for a table, 20 to 24 inches in diameter, thirty guineas is asked. Were a little more taste in design and skill in execution shown, the Derbyshire work might deserve to be more valued, as the materials, especially the black marble, are beautiful.

I shall now return to cameo cutting. This art is also of great antiquity, and is pursued with most success in Rome, where there are several very eminent artists now living. Cameos are of two descriptions—those cut in stone, or pietra dura, and those cut in shell. Of the first, the value depends on the stone as well as on the excellence of the work. The stones most prized now are the oriental onyx and the sardonyx: the former black and white, in parallel layers; the latter cornelian, brown and white; and when stones of four or five layers of distinct shades or colours can be procured, the value is proportionably raised, provided always that the layers be so thin as to be manageable in cutting the cameo so as to make the various parts harmonise. For example, in a head of Minerva, if well wrought out of a stone of four shades, the ground should be dark gray, the face light, the bust and helmet black, and the crest over the helmet brownish or gray. Next to such varieties of shades and layers, those stones are valuable in which two layers occur of black and white of regular breadth. Except on such oriental stones, no good artist will now bestow his time; but, till the beginning of this century, less attention was bestowed ed on materials, so that beautiful middle age and modern cameos may be found on German agates, whose colours are generally only two shades of gray, or a cream and a milk-white, and these not unfrequently cloudy. The best artist in Rome in pietra dura is the Signor Girometti, who has executed eight cameos of various sizes, from 1½ to 3½ inches in diameter, on picked stones of several layers, the subjects being from the antique. These form a set of specimens, for which he asks £3000 sterling. A single cameo of good brooch size, and of two colours, costs £22. Portraits in stone, by those excellent artists Diez and Saulini, may be had for £10. These cameos are all wrought by a lathe with pointed instruments of steel, and by means of diamond rust.

Shell cameos are cut from large shells found on the African and Brazilian coasts, and generally show only two layers, the ground being either a pale coffee colour, or a deep reddish orange: the latter is most prized. The subject is cut with little steel chisels out of the white portion of the shell. A fine shell is worth a guinea in Rome. Copies from the antique, original designs, and portraits, are executed in the most exquisite style of finish, and perfect in contour and taste, and it may be said that the Roman artists have attained perfection in this beautiful art. Good shell cameos may be had at from £1 to 5£ for heads, £3 to £4 for the finest large brooches, a comb costs £10, and a complete set, of necklace, earrings and brooch, cost £21. A portrait can be executed for £4 or £5, according to the workmanship.

THE PACKET PRESIDENT.

The figure-head of the President steamship was a full length likeness of General Washington. The following passages from the life of Columbus, were hung in fine painting (in imitation of ancient tapestry) upon the walls.

No. 1. A. D. 1470.—Columbus selling maps and charts at Lisbon for the support of his family and aged father at Genoa.

No. 2. A. D. 1470.—Columbus contemplating his enterprise, is kindled into enthusiasm by considering himself to be the person alluded to in Holy Writ who is to carry the Gospel into new lands.

No. 3. A. D. 1484.—Columbus begging bread and water for his child at the Franciscan Convent of St. Rabida; Juan Perez Marcheza passing by, is much struck by his appearance.

No. 4. A. D. 1484.—The conference at La Rabida, at which Juan Perez Marcheza and the Physician Garcia Fernandez are struck by the grandeur of his views.

No. 5. A. D. 1492.—On Friday, 3d August, 1492, Columbus set sail as admiral of the seas and the land he expected to discover. On the 11th October, Columbus stood on the stem of his vessel, when he espied land at 2 o'clock in the morning. The foremost then fired a signal.

No. 6. A. D. 1492.—Columbus landed and gave thanks to heaven for the success of his enterprise. At dawn on the 12th October, he landed in the New World at Guanahani or St. Salvador, one of the Bahama Islands, when the most mutinous and rebellious of his crew thronged around him and embraced his feet. The naked and painted natives regarded the white men as visitors from the skies.

No. 7. A. D. 1492.—Columbus entering Barcelona in triumph. In his journey through Spain he received princely honours all the way to Barcelona, where the court then was. Several natives returned with him.

No. 8. A. D. 1493.—Columbus received at court by Ferdinand and Isabella, who rose as he approached, and raised him as he knelt to kiss their hands.

No. 9. A. D. 1500.—Columbus arrested. Notwithstanding his great successes, his enemies at home persuaded the king to supersede him, and Francis Baradilla was sent to bring him back in chains.

No. 10. A. D. 1500.—Columbus's arrival at Cadiz, a prisoner, chained—which event caused so universal a burst of indignation throughout Spain, as to compel Ferdinand to disclaim all knowledge or share in the disgraceful transaction.

Columbus born 1446, at Genoa; died, aged 51 years, in neglect and poverty.

"Thus ended," says the historian, "a noble and glorious career, inseparably connected with the records of the injustice and ingratitude of kings."

LAUGHTER.

An anonymous writer (1769) classifies the different laughs as follows:—1. The side-mouthed or the decent laugh—2. The gracious laugh, or the smile—3. Laugh of dignity or protection—4. The silly or simple laugh, which must be distinguished from the naturally ingenuous—5. The self-approving laugh, or that of sheer vanity—6. The laugh of coarset, civilised compact, or fashionable usage—7. The laugh of affectation or disdain—8. The laugh of sincerity, openness, and serenity, that in a pleasing manner diffuses itself over the whole countenance—9. The laugh of hypocrisy or dissimulation, or (according to the vulgar phrase) in one's sleeve, which must be distinguished from—10. The laugh of determined or absolute malice—11. The laugh constrained, is that observable when we make an effort to repress an unreasonable impulse—12. The laugh extorted, or mechanical, is brought on by excessive tickling, or by wounds of the diaphragm, or by certain noxious beverages—13. The laugh caused by soreness of the mind, spite, resentfulness, desire of revenge, mixed with a certain pleasure that is in an alliance with pride—And lastly, 14. The laugh inextinguishable, as Homer calls it in Greek, but that in our vulgar phrase, may be expressed by the outrageous or horse-laugh, whose explosive bursts we cannot stop. In 1662 an Italian astrologer published a treatise of about six sheets, wherein he distinguished the different temperaments of mankind by their different modes of laughing. Thus the hi hi hi notifies melancholy people; the he he he the phlegmatic persons; the ho ho ho those of a sanguine disposition.

Power of Machinery.—It is calculated that two hundred human arms with machines now manufacture as much cotton as twenty millions of arms were able to manufacture without machines forty years ago. It is further calculated that the quantity of manufactures of all sorts at present produced by British workmen, with the aid of machines, is so great, that it would require, without that aid, few hundred millions of workmen!

OF TRAVEL.

Travel, in the younger sort, is part of education; in the elder, a part of experience. It is a strange thing that, in sea voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men should make diaries; but in land travel, wherein so much is to be observed, for the most part they omit it; as if chance were fitter to be registered than observation: let diaries, therefore, be brought in use. The things to be seen and observed are the courts of princes, especially when they give audience to ambassadors; the courts of justice, while they sit and hear causes; and so of consistories ecclesiastic; the churches and monasteries, with the monuments that are therein extant; the walls and fortifications of cities and towns; and so the havens and harbours, antiquities and ruins, libraries, colleges, disputations, and lectures, where any are; shipping and navies; houses and gardens of state and pleasure near great cities; armories, arsenals, magazines, exchanges, burses, warehouses, exercises of horsemanship, fencing, training of soldiers, and the like; comedies, such whereunto the better sort of persons do resort; treasures of jewels and robes; cabinets and rarities; and, to conclude, whatsoever is memorable in the places where they go; after all which the tutors or servants ought to make diligent inquiry. As for triumphs, masks, feasts, weddings, funerals, capital executions, and such shows, men need not be put in mind of them: yet they are not to be neglected. If you will have a young man to put his travel in a little room, and in short time to gather much, this you must do: first, as was said, he must have some entrance into the language before he goeth; then he must have such a servant, or tutor, as knoweth the country, as was likewise said: let him carry with him also some card, or book, describing the country where he travelleth, which will be a good key to his inquiry; let him keep also a diary; let him not stay long in one city or town, more or less as the place deserveth, but not long; nay, when he stayeth in one city or town, let him change his lodging from one end and part of the town to another, which is a great adamant of acquaintance; let him sequester himself from the company of his countrymen, and diet in such places where there is good company of the nation where he travelleth: let him, upon his removes from one place to another, procure recommendation to some person of quality residing in the place whither he removeth, that he may use his favour in those things he desireth to see or know: thus he may abridge his travel with much profit. As for the acquaintance which is to be sought in travel, that which is most of all profitable is acquaintance with the secretaries and employed men of ambassadors: for so, in traveling in one country, he shall suck the experience of many: let him also see and visit eminent persons in all kinds, which are of great name abroad, that he may be able to tell how the life agreeth with the fame. For quarrels, they are with care and discretion to be avoided; they are commonly for mistresses, healths, place, and words; and let a man beware how he keepeth company with cholerick and quarrelsome persons, for they will engage him into their own quarrels. When a traveller returneth home, let him not leave the countries where he hath traveled, altogether behind him; but maintain a correspondence, by letters with those of his acquaintance which are of most worth; and let his travel appear rather in his discourse than in his apparel or gesture; and in his discourse let him be rather advised in his answers than forward to tell stories: and let it appear that he doth not change his country manners for those of foreign parts; but only prick in some flowers of that he hath learned abroad into the customs of his own country.

DIARIES—MORAL, HISTORICAL, AND CRITICAL.

We converse with the absent by letters, and with ourselves by diaries; but vanity is more gratified by dedicating its time to the little labours which have a chance of immediate notice and may circulate from hand to hand, than by the honest pages of a volume reserved only for solitary contemplation; or to be a future relic of ourselves, when we shall no more hear of ourselves.

Marcus Antoninus's celebrated work entitled Τὰς ἑαυτοῦ Of the things which concern himself, would be a good definition of the use and purpose of a diary. Shaftesbury calls a diary "A Faultbook," intended for self-correction; and a Colonel Hardwood in the reign of Charles I. kept a diary, which, in the spirit of the times, he entitled "Slips, Infirmities, and Passages of Providence." Such a diary is a moral instrument, should the writer exercise it on himself and on all around him. Men then wrote folios concerning themselves; and it sometimes happened, as proved by many that I have examined in manuscript, that often writing in retirement they would write when they had nothing to write.

Diaries must be out of date in a lounging age; although I have myself known several who have continued the practice with pleasure and utility. One of our old writers quaintly observes, that "the ancients used to take the stomach-pill of self-examination every night. Some used little books, or tablets, which they tied at their girdles, in which they kept a memorial of what they did, against their night-reckoning." We know that Titus, the delight of mankind, as he has been called, kept a diary of all his actions, and when at night he found upon examination that he had performed nothing memorable, he would exclaim, "Amici! diem perdidimus!" Friends we have lost a day!

Among our own countrymen, in times more favourable for a concentrated mind than in this age of scattered thoughts and of the fragments of genius, the custom long prevailed; and we their posterity, are still reaping the benefit of their lonely hours, and diurnal records. It is always pleasing to recollect the name of Alfred, and we have deeply to regret the loss of a manual which this monarch, so strict a manager of his time, yet found leisure to pursue; it would have interested us more even than his translations, which have come down to us. Alfred carried in his bosom memorandum leaves, in which he made collections from his studies, and took so much pleasure in the frequent examination of this journal, that he called it his hand-book, because, says Spelman, day and night he ever had it in hand with him. This manual, as my learned friend, Mr. Turner, in his elaborate and philosophical Life of Alfred, has shown by some curious extracts from Malmesbury, was the repository of his own occasional literary reflections. An association of ideas connects two other of our illustrious princes with Alfred.

Prince Henry, (the son of James I.) our English Marcellus, who was wept by all the muses, and mourned by all the brave in Britain, devoted a great portion of his time to literary intercourse; and the finest geniuses of the age addressed their works to him, and wrote several at the prince's suggestion; Dallington, in the preface of his curious "Aphorisms, Civil and Military," has described Prince Henry's domestic life: "Myself," says he, "the unblest of many in that academy, for so was his family, had this especial employment for his proper use, which he pleased favourably to entertain, and often to read over."

The diary of Edward VI. written with his own hand, conveys a notion of that precocity of intellect, in that early educated prince, which would not suffer his infirm health to relax in his royal duties. This prince was solemnly struck with the feeling that he was not seated on a throne to be a trifler or a sensualist; and this simplicity of mind is very remarkable in the entries of his diary; where on one occasion, to remind himself of the causes of his secret proffer of friendship to aid the Emperor of Germany with men against the Turk, and to keep it at present secret from the French court, the young monarch inserts, "this was done on intent to get some friends. The reasonings be in my desk." So zealous was he to have before him a state of public affairs, that often in the middle of the month he recalls to mind passages which he had omitted in the beginning: what was done every day of moment, he retired into his study to set down. Even James II. wrote with his own hand the daily occurrences of his times, his reflections and conjectures; and bequeathed us better materials for history than "perhaps any sovereign prince has left behind him." Adversity had schooled him into reflection, and softened into humanity a spirit of bigotry; and it is something in his favour, that after his abdication he collected his thoughts, and mortified himself by the penance of a diary. Could a Clive or a Cromwell have composed one? Neither of these men could suffer solitude and darkness; they started at their casual recollections!—what would they have done had memory marshalled their crimes, and arranged them in the terrors of chronology?

When the national character retained more originality and individuality than our monotonous habits now admit, our later ancestors displayed a love of application, which was a source of happiness, quite lost to us. 'Till the middle of the last century, they were as great economists of their time as of their estates; and life with them was not one hurried, yet tedious festival. Living more within themselves, more separated, they were therefore more original in their prejudices, their principles, and in the constitution of their minds. They resided more on their estates, and the metropolis was usually resigned to the men of trade in their Royal Exchange, and the preferment hunters among the back-stairs at Whitehall. Lord Clarendon tells us in his "Life," that his grandfather in James the First's time had never been in London after the death of Elizabeth, though he lived thirty years afterwards; and his wife, to whom he had been married forty years, had never once visited the metropolis. On this fact he makes a curious observation; "The wisdom and frugality of that time being such, that few gentlemen made journeys to London, or any other expensive journey, but upon important business, and their wives never; by which providence they enjoyed and improved their estates in the country, and kept good hospitality in their house, brought up their children well, and were beloved by their neighbours." This will appear a very coarse homespun happiness, and these must seem very gross virtues to our artificial feelings; yet this assuredly created a national character; made a patriot of every country gentleman; and, finally, produced in the civil wars some of the most sublime and original characters that ever acted a great part on the theatre of human life.

This was the age of diaries! The head of almost every family formed one. Ridiculous people may have written ridiculous diaries, as Elias Ashmole's; but many of our greatest characters in public life have left such monuments of their diurnal labours.

These diaries were a substitute to every thinking man for our newspapers, magazines, and annual registers; but those who imagine that these are a substitute for the scenical and dramatic life of the diary of a man of genius, like Swift who wrote one, or even of a sensible observer, who lived amidst the scenes he describes, only show that they are better acquainted with the mere ephemeral and equivocal labours.—D'Israeli.

From Carlyle's Lectures.

THE HERO AS KING.

CROMWELL, NAPOLEON, MODERN REVOLUTIONISM.

May we not say, moreover, while so many of our late Heroes have worked rather as revolutionary men, that nevertheless every Great Man, every genuine man, is by the nature of him a son of Order, not of Disorder? It is a tragical position for a true man to work in revolutions. He seems an anarchist; and, indeed, a painful element of anarchy does encumber him at every step—him to whose whole soul anarchy is hostile, hateful. His mission is Order; every man's is. He is here to make what was disorderly, chaotic, into a thing ruled, regular. He is the missionary of Order. Is not all work of man in this world a making of Order? The carpenter finds rough trees; shapes them, constrains them into square fitness, into purpose and use. We are all born enemies of Disorder: it is tragical for us all to be concerned in image-breaking and down-pulling; for the Great Man, more a man than we, it is doubly tragical.

Thus, too, all human things, maddest French Sansculottism, do and must work towards order. I say, there is not a man in them, raging in the thickest of the madness, but is impelled withal, at all moments, towards Order. His very life means that; Disorder is dissolution, death. No chaos but it seeks a centre to revolve round. While man is man, some Cromwell or Napoleon is the necessary finish of a Sansculottism. Curious: in those days when Hero-worship was the most incredible thing to every one, how it does come out nevertheless, and assert itself practically, in a way which all have to credit. Divine right, take it on the great scale, is found to mean divine might withal! While old false Formulas are getting trampled every where into destruction, new genuine Substances unexpectedly unfold themselves indestructibly. In rebellious ages, when Kingship itself seems dead and abolished, Cromwell, Napoleon step forth again as Kings. The history of these men is what we have now to look at, as our last phases of Heroism. The old ages are brought back to us; the manner in which Kings were made, and Kingship itself first took rise, is again exhibited in the history of these two.

We have had many civil wars in England; wars of Red and White Roses, wars of Simon de Montfort: wars enough, which are not very memorable. But that war of the Puritans has a significance which belongs to no one of the others. Trusting to your candour, which will suggest on the other side what I have not room to say, I will call it a section once more of that great universal war which alone makes up the true History of the World—the war of Belief against Unbelief! The struggle of men intent on the real essence of things, against men intent on the semblances and forms of things. The Puritans, to many, seem mere savage Iconoclasts, fierce destroyers of Forms; but it were more just to call them haters of untrue Forms. I hope we know how to respect Laud and his King as well as them. Poor Laud seems to me to have been weak and ill-starred, not dishonest; an unfortunate pedant rather than any thing worse. His "Dreams" and superstitions, at which they laughed so, have an affectionate, loveable kind of character. He is like a College-Tutor, whose whole world is forms, College-rules; whose notion is that these are the life and safety of the world. He is placed suddenly, with that unalterable luckless notion of his, at the head not of a College but of a Nation, to regulate the most complex, deep-reaching interests of men. He thinks they ought to go by the old decent regulations; nay, that their salvation would lie in extending and improving these. Like a weak man, he drives with spasmodic vehemence towards his purpose; cramps himself to it, heeding no voice of prudence, no cry of pity. He will have his College-rules obeyed by his Collegians: that first; and till that, nothing. He is an ill-starred pedant, as I said. He would have it the world was a College of that kind, and the world was not that. Alas! was not his doom stern enough? Whatever wrongs he did, were they not all fully avenged on him?

It is meritorious to insist on forms; Religion and all else naturally clothes itself in forms. Every where the formed world is the only habitable one. The naked formlessness of Puritanism is not the thing I praise in the Puritans, it is the thing I pity—praising only the spirit which had rendered that inevitable! All substances clothe themselves in forms: but there are suitable true forms, and there are untrue unsuitable. As the briefest definition, one might say, Forms which grow round a substance, if we rightly understand that, will correspond to the real nature and purport of it, will be true, good; forms which are consciously put round a substance, bad. I invite you to reflect on this. It distinguishes true from false in Ceremonial Form, earnest solemnity from empty pageant, in all human things.

There must be a veracity, a natural spontaneity in forms. In the commonest meeting of men, a person making what we call "set speeches," is not he an offence? In the mere drawing-room, whatever courtesies you see to be grimaces, prompted by a spontaneous reality within, are a thing you wish to get away from. But suppose, now, it were some matter of vital concernment, some transcendent matter (as Divine worship is,) about which your whole soul, struck dumb with its excess of feeling, knew not how to form itself into utterance at all, and preferred formless silence to any utterance there possible—what should we say of a man coming forward to represent or utter it for you in the way of upholsterer-mummery? Such a man—let him depart swiftly, if he love himself! You have lost your only son; are mute, struck down, without even tears: an importunate man importunately offers to celebrate Funeral Games for him in the manner of the Greeks! Such mummery is not only not to be accepted; it is hateful, unendurable. It is what the old prophets called "idolatry," worshiping of hollow shows; what all earnest men do and will reject. We can partly understand what those poor Puritans meant. Laud dedicated that St. Catherine Creech Church in the manner we have it described; with his multiplied ceremonial bowings, gesticulations, exclamations: surely it is rather the rigorous formal Pedant, intent on his "College-rules," than the earnest Prophet, intent on the essence of the matter.

Puritanism found such forms insupportable; trampled on such forms;—we have to excuse it for that. No form at all rather than such! It stood preaching in its bare pulpit, with nothing but the Bible in its hand. Nay, a man preaching from his earnest soul into the earnest souls of men: is not this virtually the essence of all churches whatsoever? The nakedest, savagest reality, I say, is preferable to any semblance, however dignified. Besides, it will clothe itself with due semblance by and by, it be real. No fear of that; actually no fear at all. Given the living man, there will be found clothes to him; he will find himself clothes. But the suit of clothes pretending that it is both clothes and man—We cannot "fight the French" by three hundred thousand red uniforms; there must be men in the side of them! Semblance, I assert, must actually divorce itself from reality. If semblance be why then there must be men found to rebel against semblance, for it has become a lie! These two antagonisms of war here, in the case of Laud and the Puritans, are as old nearly as the world. The went to fierce battle over England in that age; as fought out their confused controversy to a certain length, with many results for all of us.

In the age which directly followed that of the Puritans, their cause or themselves were little likely to have justice done them. Charles Second and the Rochesters were not the kind of men you would and the use of books, and an occasional visit from a religious instructor, leaves the moral faculties still in a passive state, and without the means of rigorous active exertion. According to my view of the laws of physiology, this discipline reduces the tone of the whole nervous system to the level which is in harmony with solitude. The passions are weakened and subdued, but so are all the moral and intellectual powers. The susceptibility of the nervous system is increased, because organs become susceptible of impressions in proportion to their feebleness. A weak eye is pained by a degree of light which is agreeable to a sound one. Hence, it may be quite true, that religious admonitions will be more deeply felt by prisoners living in solitude, than by those enjoying society; just as such instruction, when addressed to a patient recovering from a severe and debilitating illness, makes a more vivid impression than when delivered to the same individual in health; but the appearances of reformation founded on such impressions are deceitful. When the sentence is expired, the convict will return to society, with all his mental powers, animal, moral, and intellectual, increased in susceptibility, but lowered in strength. The excitements that will then assail him, will have their influence doubled, by operating on an enfeebled system. If he meet old associates and return to drinking and profanity, the animal propensities will be fearfully excited by the force of these stimulants, while his enfeebled moral and intellectual powers will scarcely be capable of offering any resistance. If he be placed amidst virtuous men, his higher faculties will feel acutely, but be still feeble in executing their own resolves. Convicts, after long confinement in solitude, shudder to encounter the turmoil of the world; they become excited as the day of liberation approaches, and feel bewildered when set at liberty. In short, this system is not founded on, nor in harmony with, a sound knowledge of the physiology of the brain, although it appeared to me to be well administered.

These views are supported by the "Report of Doctor James B. Coleman, physician to the New Jersey state prison (in which solitary confinement with labour is enforced), addressed to the board of inspectors, November 1839." The report states that, "among the prisoners there are many who exhibit a child-like simplicity, which shows them to be less acute than when they entered. In all who have been more than a year in prison, some of these effects have been observed. Continue the confinement for a longer time, and give them no other exercise of the mental faculties than this kind of imprisonment affords, and the most accomplished rogue will lose his capacity for depredating with success upon the community. The same influence that injures the other organs will soften the brain. Withhold its proper exercise, and as surely as the bandaged limb loses its power, will the prisoner's faculties be weakened by solitary confinement." He sums up the effect of the treatment in these words: "While it subdues the evil passions, almost paralyzing them for want of exercise, it leaves the individual, if still a rogue, one who may be easily detected;" in other words, in reducing the energy of the organs of the propensities, it lowers also that of the organs of the moral and intellectual faculties, or causes the convict to approach more or less towards general idiocy." Dr. Coleman does not inform us whether the brain will not recover its vigour after liberation, and thus leave the offender as great a rogue after the close, as he was at the beginning of his confinement.

The Auburn system of social labour is better, in my opinion, than that of Pennsylvania, in so far as it allows of a little more stimulus to the social faculties, and does not weaken the nervous system to so great an extent; but it has no superiority in regard to providing efficient means for invigorating and training the moral and intellectual faculties. The Pennsylvania system preserves the convict from contamination by evil communications with his fellow-prisoners, and prevents his associates from knowing the fact of his being in prison. These are advantages that go so far to compensate the evils of solitude, but do not remove them.

In maintaining that some men are moral patients who should be restrained, but not otherwise punished, I have often been met by the objection, that this doctrine destroys human responsibility. My answer has been, first, that phrenologists, in urging this view, desire only to extend the class of idiots and the insane, who are by universal consent absolved from responsibility; and, secondly, that men in general, while they reject as dangerous and untrue the proposition in the abstract, adopt it practically, and are unwittingly guilty of the most flagrant inconsistency and pernicious injustice.

I have asked these objectors, if they would receive into their families, as domestic servants, or into their employment in stores, convicts who had served out their time in state prisons, supposing them qualified by knowledge for the duties of these stations; and most of them have answered that they would not. On being asked why they would decline, they have generally replied that they had not sufficient confidence in their reformation. There is obviously great inconsistency in such conduct. If they believe that every individual has power to reform himself, and that the prison is wisely framed to effect this reform, it is cruel to assume that the individual in question is not reformed, and to exclude him from social comfort and honour on this assumption. The truth is, they act on the principle that some criminals are incorrigible, and that this may be one of the number: and therefore decline placing trust in any. Yet they blame us for teaching the same doctrine, and desiring to found on it a better practice.

It is satisfactory to find that these views are supported by the experience of the inspectors and warden of the eastern penitentiary. They not only express a desire that the incorrigibles should be treated as patients, but strongly urge the necessity of an asylum for discharged convicts intermediate between the prison and common society. In their report for 1838, the inspectors remark, that "the situation and sufferings of discharged convicts have excited our attention and sympathy. We feel that we shall be excused in presenting the subject to the consideration of the legislature and our fellow citizens generally. The small sum of money ($5) allowed to a convict on his discharge is often expended whilst he is seeking for employment. But when that is gone, and no employment can be had, what hope is there that he will be able to struggle against poverty and maintain his virtue? This class of men, as well as a large portion of the labouring poor, need advice and assistance to help them along the rugged pathway of life." The warden, in his report for the same year, says, "The unwillingness manifested by most employers to take persons released from prison into their work-shops, makes it difficult for convicts to obtain good situations at any period of the year, but during the winter especially. Out-door work is scarce, and those discharged at this season often find themselves in so very destitute a situation, that we need not be surprised if they should sometimes be tempted to steal rather than starve. I believe much benefit would result from the courts either extending or diminishing in a slight degree the confinement, so as to make it terminate in either the spring, summer, or autumn."

The necessity for an asylum for convicts intermediate between the prison and society, while the present system of treatment is pursued, is obvious. Before a convict can be fitted to re-enter the social circles of his country with a fair prospect of continuing in the paths of virtue, the discipline which he has undergone must have invigorated and enlightened his moral and intellectual powers to such an extent, that he, when liberated, shall be able to restrain his own propensities, amidst the usual temptations presented by the social condition.

There is only one way of strengthening faculties, and that is by exercising them; and all the American prisoners which I have seen are lamentably deficient in arrangements for exercising the moral and intellectual faculties of their inmates. During the hours of labour, no advance can be made, beyond learning a trade. This is a valuable addition to a convict's means of reformation; but it is not all-sufficient. After the hours of labour, he is locked up in solitude; and I doubt much if he can read, for want of light; but assuming that he can—reading is a very imperfect means of strengthening the moral powers. They must be exercised, trained, and habituated to action. My humble opinion is, that in prisons there should be a teacher of high moral and intellectual power, for every eight or ten convicts; that, after the close of labour, these instructors should commence a system of vigorous culture of the superior faculties of the prisoners, excite their moral and religious feelings, and instruct their understandings. In proportion as the prisoners give proofs of moral and intellectual advancement, they should be indulged with the liberty of social converse and action, for a certain time on each week day, and on Sundays, in presence of the teachers; and in these conversazioni, or evening parties, they should be trained to the use of their higher powers, and habituated to restrain their propensities. Every indication of over active propensity should be visited by a restriction of liberty and enjoyment; while these advantages, and also respectful treatment, and moral consideration, should be increased in exact proportion to the advancement of the convicts in morality and understanding. By such means, if by any, the convicts would be prepared to enter society with their higher faculties so trained and invigorated, as to give them a chance of resisting temptation, and continuing in the paths of virtue.

In no country has the idea yet been carried into effect, that in order to produce moral fruits, it is necessary to put into action moral influences, great and powerful in proportion to the barrenness of the soil from which they are expected to spring.

The convicts whom I saw in this prison presented the usual deficiencies in the organs of the moral sentiments in relation to those of the animal propensities which distinguish criminals in general. One man, in whom the superior organs were very deficient, and Acquisitiveness, Secretiveness, and Destructiveness very large, with a good intellectual development, said, in answer to a question from me, that it would depend on circumstances whether he would steal again after he was liberated.

Jan. 26. Ther. 26°. Asylum for the Blind.—We visited this asylum, and found it a large, commodious, well arranged institution, which receives an appropriation from the state. Dr. Friedlander, the superintendent, who is greatly esteemed, is at present in the south, on account of bad health. The pupils labour only three hours a day, in brush, basket, mat, and shoe making, needlework and knitting. They are taught the ordinary branches of school education. Their books, in raised characters, are printed in the establishment, and they use the common Roman capital type. I mentioned Dr. Howe's remarks on the facility with which the blind learn to read letters of a variety of forms, and the advantage of each institution printing separate books and interchanging; but I was told that the pupils here find a difficulty in reading any letters except those to which they have become accustomed. This seems to me to be an error founded on an assumption that such will be the case, rather than an experience that it is so. Farther, Dr. Howe's pupils increase the extent and variety of the exercise which they are enabled to take, by climbing up poles, jumping over beams, and performing other athletic feats. Here it is believed to be dangerous to the blind to do such acts, and the pupils always keep on the ground. It appears to me that Dr. Howe has a bold, active, enterprising mind, and that to a certain extent he impresses his own character on the minds of his pupils. He enlarges the practical boundaries of their capacities by encouraging them to believe in the greatness of their natural extent.

Jan. 26. Ther. 52°. The Weather.—Yesterday with evening the wind changed to the southeast, and, a high temperature, it rained in torrents all night, and all this day till 4 P. M., when the wind suddenly veered round to the northwest, and blew a gale.

Dr. Benjamin Rush.—We met in society this evening Dr. Joseph Parrish, a distinguished and most amiable Quaker physician. He is attending my lectures, and informed me that forty years ago he was a pupil of Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, and recognised in phrenology the more complete development of many ideas which Dr. Rush had entertained. The same remark had occurred to myself on reading Dr. Rush's "Inquiry into the Influence of Physical Causes on the Moral Faculty," read by him before the American Philosophical Society on the 27th of February, 1786. That "oration," as it is called in the original, displays great powers of observation, and sagacity in deducing inferences, and approaches more nearly to Dr. Gall's discovery than any other work which I have seen.

The Quakers.—Philadelphia was founded by William Penn, who was at once a man of family, and a Quaker; a fortunate combination for the infant city. In the choice of the situation, the plan of the city, the names of the streets, and in many of his regulations, there are proofs of his cultivated taste; while the uprightness and simplicity of the Quaker principles, which he and his followers established, strongly and favourably influence society here even in the present day. About eleven years ago, a large section of the Quakers of Pennsylvania became Unitarians, under the influence of Elias Hicks. Some of these, while they have preserved their connection with the sect, have abandoned the costume; while others have left the Society of Friends entirely. The original Quakers, who have not changed their opinions, are called "the orthodox" friends. In Pennsylvania, the Hicksite Quakers amount to about 15,000 and the orthodox to about 8000. In the United States, the total number of Hicksite Quakers is about 30,000, and of the orthodox 100,000. Of these latter, one half are residents of the states of Indiana and Illinois.

A man who has produced so great a revolution in the religious tenets of a powerful sect, is an interesting object of observation. A friend kindly presented me with a small engraved portrait of him, which indicates a large development of the moral and intellectual organs; large Firmness, and a high bilious and nervous temperament, the combination usually found in energetic reformers. The base of the brain also seems to have been well developed, but it is more difficult to judge of its size in a picture. The following "Remarks on the character of the late Elias Hicks," were extracted, by the same friend, from several biographical sketches of him:—

"Elias Hicks was born in Long Island in 1748, and died in 1830. When about twenty years of age he embraced the principles of the Society of Friends, in due time became a minister, and for more than fifty years he laboured with unwearied diligence for the instruction and benefit of his fellow-men. He traveled through almost every state in the union, as well as into Canada several times; scrupulously avoiding any gratuity or reward for his multiplied and protracted labours. The testimonies which his Society held before the world, he bore patiently and fearlessly, urging them on the consciences of his hearers, in a manner which did not permit them to be indifferent, and with a zeal which demanded and secured the attention of those whom he addressed. Large numbers listened and crowded around him to hear the joyful tidings which he had to bear. He was at all times the friend of freedom of conscience, thought, and action, and the able and unceasing advocate of human rights. The African and Indian were never forgotten by him, but were embraced within the circle of his benevolence. He was in early life deeply impressed with the injustice and cruelty of keeping slaves, and was among the first who brought the subject frequently and forcibly before the members of his religious society. It was some time before his friends could unite with him, but where principle was involved, his perseverance was unabating, and his resolution immovable.

"He was a man, in the language of Scripture, 'instant in season and out of season' to do good to his fellow-beings. He was truly a peacemaker; in all his relations in life kind and affectionate; and his manners were peculiarly distinguished by a patriarchal simplicity, and unaffected goodness. Hence it was not unfrequently the case, that persons who, from false reports, had contracted strong prejudices against him, have been completely disarmed by a short interview.

"The strong and abiding sense of justice and equality which marked his intercourse with his fellow-men, was exemplified in relation to a circumstance which took place when he was absent from home. A person to whom he had lent money to assist him in business, had been unsuccessful, and in closing his concerns he secured to Elias Hicks a sufficient amount of his property to indemnify him for the sum lent. On his return he called together the creditors, stated to them his unwillingness to retain the amount wholly to himself, and gave directions that it should be divided among them all, in proportion to the sums respectively due to each person. It was upon these principles that he regulated his conduct throughout his long and valuable life. His kind and benevolent feelings carried him out towards every species of human suffering, and led him to be kind and liberal in supplying the necessities of the poor. He laboured diligently with his own hands, believing it to be the duty of all to be usefully employed in obtaining the necessaries of life.

"In declaring what he believed to be the counsel of God, he was bold and fearless. Possessing an acute and argumentative mind, he assailed the strong-holds of superstition and bigotry with great boldness, which alarmed the timid, and aroused the prejudices of many. Yet to the candid inquirer, and sincere seeker after truth, he breathed the language of encouragement, of consolation, and of comfort. His great and primary concern was, to draw the minds of the people to practical righteousness—from all outward dependence, to the sure foundation, the Rock of Ages, the spirit of truth—'Christ within, the hope of glory.' He was an example of Christian humility, and eminently preserved from being elated by the applause of men, or depressed by their censure. He impressed upon the minds of the young the importance and necessity of early attention to the inward discoveries of divine light, cautioning them not to rest in the tradition of their fathers, nor to depend upon the teachings of men for that knowledge which brings life and immortality to life in the soul.

"In times of great trial during the division and separation in the Society of which he was a member, he experienced the truth of the declaration, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in thee.'"

The Inward Light.—It is a fundamental doctrine with the Society of Friends, that every man has received an inward light sufficient to guide him in the discharge of his duty, if he consult it in a right spirit. My Quaker friends discussed the bearing of Phrenology on this doctrine with great acuteness and candour. I hazarded the explanation, that the inward light which they spoke of, if it be regarded as natural, probably consisted of the spontaneous dictates of the moral sentiments, which condemn all abuses of the propensities; that apparently George Fox, the founder of their sect, had enjoyed a large development of the organ of these sentiments, particularly of Conscientiousness and Benevolence, and that, judging from his own feelings, and assuming all men to be constituted like himself, he had interpreted certain passages of Scripture in accordance with his individual experience, and thus arrived at the doctrine of the sufficiency of the inward light as universal, while Phrenology showed that it was limited to men possessing the best constituted brains. This view was new to the Friends; but they told me that it seemed to throw some light on several anomalies which had long remained inexplicable. Some of their body had such a clear and forcible consciousness of the existence of the inward light, that they could not conceive how any person of a sane mind, whether of their society or not, could doubt its existence; while others of their own sect, and numerous individuals who did not belong to them, either doubted the reality of the perception of that light, or regarded it as altogether a phantom of imagination. Phrenology leads us to infer, that the believers in the light probably possess large, and the unbelievers small, organs of the moral sentiments, and that hence they really differ in their inward experience, and err in assuming their own consciousness as a standard of universal human nature. I expressed the opinion, that individuals who are very deficient in the moral organs, do not possess the inward light sufficiently clear and strong to serve as a guide to their conduct, and that hence arose the need of specific precepts, such as are contained in the Scriptures, commending certain acts, and prohibiting others; and that Phrenology will one day prove useful to all sects in leading them to correct their doctrines, and to bring them into harmony with universal human nature, instead of limiting them to cases of particularly constituted minds.

Catholicism in the United States.—We attended divine service to-day in the Roman Catholic church (St. John's) in Thirteenth street, and found a large and genteel looking congregation, with all the usual ceremonies of catholicism. We were told that the Catholics here are chiefly foreigners, who bring their religion with them; and that they are an inoffensive sect in the United States. The free institutions of the country modify the spirit of their religion, and they are good citizens and estimable neighbours. I mentioned to a Protestant gentleman, whom I afterwards met in society, the great difficulty which I experienced in attaching any meaning to the ringing of bells, burning of candles, and other ceremonies of the Catholic worship, and he told me that his impressions were very different. His father (a protestant) had sent him, when a boy, to a Roman Catholic monastery in Canada for the sake of giving him a thorough education in the French language; the priests initiated him into the meaning of their ceremonies, and employed him as one of the bell-ringing and train-bearing boys, who serve at the altar; and so profound an impression of the sanctity and solemnity of the worship had been made on his mind, that he could not, to the present day, enter a Roman Catholic chapel without vivid emotions of veneration, with which his judgment did not harmonise, for he had not been converted to their faith. From this, we may infer that to Catholics these ceremonies are by no means unmeaning mummeries, as we Protestants are too prone to imagine them to be.

Legislature of Pennsylvania.—Every one acquainted with the machinery of the British parliament knows that for many years nothing could exceed the profligate dereliction of all principle which characterised the action of the committees of the house of commons on private bills. The majority of the members of these committees often disposed of the most momentous interests of their constituents without hearing a word of the evidence on which their decisions were supposed to be founded. Their votes, governed by motives of private interest, or of political favour or hostility, were secured by solicitation and influence; and, in short, they were moved by every consideration except those of utility and justice. Even in the present day, when some of these more flagrant abuses have been extinguished, the individual whose rights and interests are in dependence before a parliamentary committee, finds himself degraded into a petitioner for favour, instead of a solicitor for justice. He is still under the necessity of plying the members of the committee with every possible external influence to induce them to attend in their places, that they may hear the evidence, and understand the arguments, which he considers it necessary to present to them, often at a ruinous expense, to enable them to judge of the merits of the measure on which they are bound to report with the impartiality of judges.

I was anxious to learn whether any similar evil exists under the democratic institutions of the United States, in which the elections are frequent, the suffrage nearly universal, and the responsibility of the representatives to the people complete.

A gentleman who has been a member of the Senate of Pennsylvania informed me, that the same mischievous machinery is at work in their legislature. There is extensive jobbing and treating relative to private bills, or bills for the establishment of public companies. The parties who apply for the bill, or their agents, come to Harrisburg while the legislature is in session, and, under pretence of explaining the subject to the members, flatter them, give them suppers, and open their understandings by means of plentiful libations of wine. Many of the representatives are men from country districts, of little education, and humble fortune, but of unquestionable integrity, who would reject with indignation a money bribe, but who unconsciously fall before personal flatteries and champagne. The technical name for these practices is "lobbying."

In the legislature of New York, some years ago, "lobbying" was reduced to a system. The agents for the various private bills concerted their measures together, and made up lists of all the members of the legislature, specifying those whom they could influence absolutely, those whom they could probably carry, and those (a very small remnant) who were altogether independent; and, after "the order of the day," or list of business before the chambers, was published, they met in a tavern, and took the "yeas and nays" on every bill in which they were interested, either pro or con. The first bill, for instance, was named; (probably one for a charter to a bank;) the roll of the representatives was then called, and the different agents answered "yea" or "nay" for the members respectively whose votes they could command. When this was finished, the independent members were distributed according to the best estimate which the agents could form of their probable course of action; the balance was then struck, and the announcement regularly made, the "yeas" or the "nays" have it. So complete was this machinery, and so perfect the sagacity with which the opinions of the independent members were guessed at, that the decisions of the chambers became ludicrous echoes of those of the "lobby!" At last a check was given to the practice, but much of it still exists; and it will exist until a higher education of the people shall raise the standard of their moral and intellectual perceptions. As a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain, so, in social life, if the public mind be blind and selfish, the representatives of that mind will never rise into the regions of truth and justice.

It is a common opinion, that if the suffrage for legislators be universal, and elections be frequent, a due regard to their own interests will lead the people to choose wise representatives, and the representatives to adopt just and beneficial measures; but this is an error. Phrenology shows us that self-interest depends on the animal propensities, and that every one of them is merely a blind impulsive power, which desires its own gratification, but which needs to be illuminated by knowledge, and guided by morality, before it can successfully attain its own objects. The organs of the propensities are generally the largest and most active in the brain; and most of us, therefore, are by nature abundantly selfish; but we are not equally clear-sighted in regard to the best means of promoting our own interests. Indeed self-interest more frequently defeats than accomplishes its own objects, through ignorance of the obstacles that lie in its way, and of the means which nature has appointed as indispensable to its own gratification. Every legislature, therefore, which is founded on the maxim that self-interest will discover the best means of attaining its own ends, and that where all are represented it will necessarily lead to the general good, rests on a bed of sand. In the conflict of selfish desires of equal force, justice may be reached as the only point at which adjustment will be possible, as objects propelled in opposite directions by equal forces fall into diagonal lines, and meet in a central point; but this is a dangerous, circuitous, and uncertain method of attaining to truth. The moral sentiments alone desire universal happiness, and intellect, extensively informed and highly cultivated, is necessary to discover the means of realising their desires. High moral, religious, and intellectual training, therefore, in the people at large, and nothing else, will produce pure and wise legislation. The most consolatory view of the present condition of the people of the United States is, that their institutions give such unlimited play to the selfish principles of their nature, that, by their very blunders and sufferings, (which are neither few nor small,) they will be forced into the discovery of the incapacity of self-interest to find its own way to happiness, and be led, by the very necessity of their circumstances, to call in the aid of morality and knowledge—in other words, to increase and improve the moral, religious, and intellectual cultivation of their rising generations.

Phrenology.—One third at least of my auditors, now exceeding 500 persons, belong to the Society of Friends, including both Orthodox and Hicksites, and they tell me that Friend John Joseph Gurney, who has recently come to the United States on a mission of charity and religion, is warning his friends, and the circle which he influences, against Phrenology, as a dangerous doctrine, and one to be shunned by sound believers. As they have now heard a pretty full exposition of it, they take the liberty to judge for themselves, and I do not find that their fears keep pace with those of Mr. Gurney. In answer to the question, whether Mr. Gurney meant to affirm that it is dangerous to religion to teach the true functions of the brain, or only that Phrenology is false, and therefore dangerous?—my friends replied, that, so far as they could learn, he knew little about the subject, and appeared to condemn it on vague impressions existing in his own mind, rather than on any specific information concerning its merits.

Jan. 29. Therm. 30°. Mr. Du Ponceau, Baron Hammer, and Captain Basil Hall.—This day I met Mr. Du Ponceau in society, and he asked me about the accentuation of the Gaelic, which he reads, but has never heard spoken. Unfortunately, I could give him no information on the subject. He came to the United States from France in 1775, and has realised a fortune in the law. He is highly celebrated as a philologist. He corresponds with Baron Hammer of Vienna, and mentioned that he had translated and published the Baron's Letter in answer to Captain Basil Hall's statements in his work called Schloss Hainfeld. The Baron had written to him that he could not induce any periodical in England to publish it. He was much interested when I told him that I had formed an acquaintance with Baron Hammer, now Baron Hammer Purgstall, when I visited Vienna in 1837, and had received from him a copy of the letter in question, printed in "the New York American" of 6th Dec. 1836; and that I had subsequently succeeded in getting it inserted in a London newspaper. This led to an interesting conversation concerning Captain Hall and Schloss Hainfeld, when I mentioned to him that Baron Hammer had requested me to peruse several original letters written by the Countess of Purgstall to him, all in English, in which she expressed herself in the most kind and confidential terms towards him. I had read also a letter from the Countess Rzewnska to him, which showed that Captain Hall received his invitation to Schloss Hainfeld through him, communicated to the captain by the Countess Rzewnska, and afterwards confirmed by the Countess Purgstall herself. Baron Hammer's interposition is not mentioned in the work. In one of the Countess Purgstall's letters to the Baron, she mentions that Captain Hall had not brought much information that interested her: that she found him given up to admiration of the Duke of Wellington, and that his high toryism annoyed her, all her sympathies being with the whigs. In another letter, she tells Baron Hammer that, on reflection, she is satisfied that she acted wisely in refusing to subscribe a letter which Captain Hall had drawn up and pressed her to sign, expressive of sentiments which she did not entertain towards her sister Mrs. Dugald Stewart. In another letter, she confides her most private wishes, and expresses the greatest gratitude, to Baron Hammer. She likewise tells the Baron that Captain Hall is obviously writing a journal in her house, but that he never informs her what he is inserting in it. The countess had informed him also that Captain Hall frequently spent only the hour after dinner in her society, and did not even send to ask how she had passed the night. The Baron remarked that Captain Hall took Schloss Hainfeld for "his own man-of-war," and ordered every thing for himself as if he had been owner. After the countess's death, the Baron succeeded to the property, and he invited the captain and his family to continue in the castle as his guests until they found it convenient to return to England. He detailed a series of incidents that occurred after this invitation, that are better buried in oblivion, and which I forbear to specify: but they conveyed to me a strong impression of the indiscretion of Captain Hall's publication, and of the injustice done to Baron Hammer in his work. The Baron has placed several of the countess's letters to him, which throw light on Captain Hall's statements, in the Imperial Library at Vienna, where they are open to the inspection of every one who desires to peruse them. He made these communications to me with a request that I should publish them, as he considered himself injured and ungratefully treated by Captain Hall. I should have had great hesitation in doing so, had not Captain Hall, in the work complained of, converted the incidents of the private life of a lady, into whose house he was received in the confidential characters of a friend and a guest, into the materials of a romance, and by the incorrectness of his statements, done injury both to the living and the dead. Captain Hall is a man of great talents, but his hostility to the Americans, and the inaccuracies of his statements in regard to them, are loudly complained of by the most respectable men in the city of Philadelphia.

Common Schools.—I visited a common school in the city, and found the system to be similar to that pursued in Boston and New York. The master of a primary school must be capable of teaching "orthography, reading, grammar, geography, history, writing, arithmetic, and book-keeping;" and, where a majority of the parents of the children attending the school require it, he must also teach German. The teachers are appointed, after examination, by the board of directors of common schools, and may, at the end of any month, be dismissed for "incompetency, neglect of duty, cruelty, or immoral conduct." No teacher is allowed to receive "any compensation from parents or guardians in addition to that paid by the district." The tenth head of the "Regulations for common school districts," is in these words, and it is here printed in the same types as in the original:—1st, THE RELIGIOUS PREDILECTIONS OF PUPILS AND THEIR PARENTS OR GUARDIANS SHALL BE SACREDLY RESPECTED. 2d. No catechism, creed, confession, or manual of faith, shall be used as a school book, nor admitted into the school; sectarian instruction not being the province of the school-master, but of the parent or guardian, and the spiritual instructor selected by him."

The teacher is required to "pay most especial regard to the morals, habits, and general behaviour, as well as to the mental instruction of his pupils. The punishments to be inflicted by the teacher, shall be, 1st, Reading aloud the rule violated. 2d, Insertion of the offender's name under the head of 'bad conduct,' in the monitor's book. 3d, Private and public admonition. 4th, Detention after school hours. 5th, Special reports or complaints to parents or guardians. 6th, The rod. The rod shall be applied, whenever, in the teacher's judgment, it shall be necessary; when used, it shall be inflicted with certainty and effect; but passion or cruelty in its application shall be avoided. The hours of instruction shall be from 8 to 12 in the forenoon, and from 2 till 5 in the afternoon, from the 1st of April till the 1st of October; and from 9 till 12, and 1 till 4, during the rest of the year."

"The Old and New Testaments, containing the best extant code of morality, in simple, beautiful, and pure language, shall be used as a school book for reading, without comment by the teacher, but not as a text-book for religious instruction."

The Monitors in Schools.—The regulations provide for the appointment of monitors, who shall be members of the highest classes, and whose duty shall be to enter in a book the offences of which the scholars shall be guilty; but I was informed that the employment of monitors has been abandoned in all the common schools in Philadelphia, and that each school is now under the charge of a male and two female teachers; the females having a salary of $200 each. This arrangement is new in the boys' schools, and one of the directors mentioned that it has been found to answer well. The young women treat the boys with a kindly interest, obviously influenced by sex, and the feeling is reciprocal. The boys, when studying under the young women, are more gentle and refined in their manners than when taught by male teachers, and they perform their tasks more obviously from a desire to please. This is as it should be. There is nothing necessarily indelicate or improper in the feelings of the sexes towards each other. Indeed, I have heard ladies of the strictest principles and the most refined delicacy, acknowledge that they were conscious of receiving an additional stimulus to exertion from the influence of a teacher of the opposite sex. There is no reason why this excellent ordination of Nature should not be employed to promote the training and instruction of the youthful mind.

The High School of Philadelphia is now forming under the charge of Mr. John Frost and Mr. Wines. I had read an excellent abridgement of the History of the United States, by "John Frost," reprinted in London, but imagined that this was a mere nom de guerre. It gave me pleasure to meet with the real author, and to find him an accomplished teacher instead of a shadow. Mr. Wines, also, has written two valuable works on education.

Phrenology.—I was taken, by a medical friend, several miles out of town, to visit a boy of seven or eight years of age, who, in July last, had received a kick from a horse in the region of the organ of Time (above the centre of the eye brow) on the right side. It had completely driven in a portion of the skull an inch in length, and half an inch in breadth, and the fragment of bone must have rested on the superorbital plate. The convolution constituting the surface of the organ of Time must have been injured, with part of the organs of Tune and Eventuality, and probably also the organs of Colouring, Order, and Weight. All the organs on the left side were untouched. The integuments had completely reunited over the wound, but the skull was not restored. When the boy walked smartly, the pulsation of the brain was distinctly seen. The boy had been kept quiet in the house, without bodily or mental labour, ever since the accident; and he appeared to be intelligent and healthy when I saw him. It will not be until he shall have been exposed to intellectual efforts and anxiety, that it will be seen whether his faculties have suffered by the injury; or whether the brain has been restored. The practitioner first called in after the accident, had sewed up the integuments and left the bones sticking in the brain, and the arteries bleeding into it, and the boy was quite insensible when visited by my friend in Philadelphia. Owing to the imperfect education of many of the medical men in the United States, such instances of mistake are not uncommon in the rural districts.

Jan. 30. Ther. 40°. The Judges.—Under the former constitution of Pennsylvania the judges held office for life, but under the recent amendment, which came into operation on the 1st of January current (1839,) they are henceforth to receive appointments for ten years only. The reason assigned for the change is, that under their life tenures, they were indolent in their proper spheres, but became active as political partisans. It is feared that under the new system, they will make the law bend to popular sentiments; so that there appears to many persons to be only a choice between two evils. The salary of the Chief Justice of the supreme court is only $2,666 67 cents a year, a sum so small that a trader in moderate business, will regard it as an unproductive year when he does not realise as much. Each associate justice of the supreme court receives $2000 per annum. I record these statements as they were made to me; but I must add, that I have met with several of the judges, and they appeared to me to be strong minded able men, possessed of extensive information.

Feb. 1. Ther. 40°. The Alms-House.—We visited this institution, which is situated on rising ground lying on the right bank of the Schuylkill, a little below the city. "The main buildings, which are four in number, are arranged in the form of a parallelogram, and cover and enclose an area of about ten acres." It has a handsome architectural front, which appears to great advantage when viewed from the city. The entire building cost above one million of dollars, and it is altogether so magnificent in reference to its objects, that it has been not unaptly denominated "the Pauper Palace." It includes a pauper lunatic asylum and an hospital for the sick. It was erected and is supported by assessments on the city and liberties. Its fame stands so high, and has extended so widely, as affording comfortable quarters for the destitute, that some of them have been known to walk two hundred and fifty miles to reach it. Although only the poor of the city and suburbs have a legal right to enter it, these distant strangers throw themselves down at the door during the night, and refuse to rise or go away, stating their resolution to make good their quarters after such a toilsome march. It contains at present about 1800 inmates.

I was surprised equally at the magnificence and extent of the building, and at the number of paupers, in a city of only 200,000 inhabitants, situated in a young, fertile, and prosperous country, where labour is greatly in demand, and highly remunerated; but I was assured that three-fourths of the inmates are foreigners who are cast forth from all the countries of Europe, and fall as a burden on the United States.* This is probably too true; because, in general, only those individuals who find a difficulty in providing for themselves at home emigrate; and hence many of the foreigners landed in America are feeble in mind, dissipated, or reckless persons, whom their friends in Europe have shipped off to rid themselves from the burden of their maintenance. One of the directors of the Alms-house mentioned to me that the managers for the poor of St. Cuthbert's parish in Edinburgh, had actually shipped off a body of paupers and landed them very recently at New York, two of whom are said to be idiots.†

* The number of paupers I find is really small when contrasted with that of Edinburgh, a city without manufactures or any other great source of pauperism. On the 1st of October, 1840, Mr. Small, Treasurer to the Edinburgh Charity Workhouse, reported the number of persons receiving permanent support from that institution to be 3500; besides 100 supplied with temporary aid. The population is under 100,000, as the poor of the parish of St. Cuthbert's, as well as those of the Canongate, are separately provided for. These two parishes nearly surround the ancient city, and St. Cuthbert's includes many new streets and populous suburbs.

† I expressed my astonishment at this statement and disbelief in its accuracy, and afterwards ascertained that it is essentially incorrect. A Mr. Johnson came to Edinburgh, and engaged a number of the younger inmates of St. Cuthbert's Charity Workhouse to go with him, as indentured servants, to his farm in Canada. He entered into a legal bond to the managers to carry them to that country, to provide for them, and remunerate them suitably for their labour. He proceeded with them to New York, but there his means failed him, he was imprisoned or non-payment of the "head money," a tax ex-

The Alms-house has a medical and surgical hospital attached to it, where clinical lectures are delivered twice a week. It is unfortunately two miles from the city, and in consequence the students do not see the regular course of clinical treatment; but only hear it described on lecture or visiting days.

The whole establishment is kept clean to the eye, but the nose and lungs detect imperfect ventilation, particularly in the departments for the children; who are afflicted with ophthalmia, languid looks, and other indications of a low condition of the corporeal system. It is extremely difficult to induce paupers voluntarily to admit fresh air into their apartments, except in very warm weather, and in building an alms-house, adequate means for involuntary ventilation as well as warmth should be provided. I was glad to observe that pictures, objects, and apparatus, are supplied for teaching the children; an advantage not enjoyed in many of the city schools.

Sorcery.—The following advertisement appeared in the "Public Ledger" newspaper a few days ago. "A Card. Madam Dussar, thankful for past favours, respectfully informs the ladies and gentlemen of Philadelphia, that her residence is No. 6 Watson's alley, Locust, 1st alley below Tenth, where she will be happy to solve all questions relating to dreams, marriages, journeys, losses, gains, and all other lawful business, sickness, death, &c. j. 30. 3 t." The small letters at the end mean "January 30, three times;" and we may presume that Madame Dussar meets with customers who indemnify her for the expenses of advertising, and leave her besides a suitable remuneration for her skill and trouble. There are ignorant and superstitious individuals in all countries; but the circumstance which gives this announcement interest in my estimation is, that the male customers above twenty-one years of age of this lady have votes for the civic rulers of Pennsylvania, and may exercise an influence on its banks, public works, credit, and general prosperity. It would certainly be desirable to bring this profession to a close by a higher and more general education of the people. I have been informed (but perhaps the story is an old "Joe Miller") that within four or five years from the present time, the cashier of a bank in Philadelphia applied to one of these ladies to learn who had committed a robbery on the bank, and that she directed him to a certain house, in the garret of which he would find an old chest, and in the chest the lost money. He found the house, the garret, and the chest, but no money. The sorceress had sent him thither to annoy a family whom she disliked!

Feb. 3. Ther. 26°. The Free Negroes.—Our apartments at the Marshall House are under the charge of a coloured man, who, although a complete negro, has a brain that would do no discredit to an European. It is of a full size; the moral and intellectual regions are well developed; and his manner of thinking, speaking, and acting, indicates respectfulness, faithfulness, and reflection. He was originally a slave, and purchased his own freedom. His wife also is of pure African blood, and his children of course gible by law on emigrants, and they were left destitute. The newspapers in New York represented the matter as if the paupers had been deliberately shipped off by the managers of St. Cuthbert's parish, in order to relieve themselves from the expense of maintaining them, and to impose them as a burden on the United States; but this was not their intention.

the same. One of his sons named "Rob Roy," (what would Helen Macgregor have thought of her husband's name-sake?) was extremely desirous to hear some of my lectures, and his father asked if he might be permitted to go into the room. No objection existed on my part to lecture to an audience of any colour, if they were intelligent and attentive; but Americans feel differently. I consulted some liberal friends as to what could be done without giving offence, and it was arranged that, after the audience was assembled, Rob Roy should enter and stand near the door, at the back of all the seats, and thus pass for a servant in waiting. He followed this plan, and no notice was taken of his presence. I have not introduced the question of abolition into my lectures, because it is foreign to their object. So far, however, as the subject lay incidentally in my way, I have not shrunk from it, but have introduced the skulls and casts of negroes among those of other varieties of mankind, and freely expressed my opinion of the moral and intellectual capabilities indicated by their forms.

Quaker Preaching.—We attended the meeting-house of the Hicksite Quakers this day. The women were seated at one end, and the men at the other. One male Friend spoke, and afterwards Mrs. Lucretia Mott delivered an excellent address. We had previously formed the acquaintance of this lady, and of her husband Mr. James Mott, and observed that in private society she manifests the power of intellect of a philosopher combined with feminine refinement and delicacy. In delivering her address, her manner of speaking was so clear, yet so soft and touching, and the matter of it was so full of wisdom and goodness, that it drew tears from the eyes of C—, and intensely riveted my attention.

Feb. 4. Ther. 33°. William Penn.—We visited the Pennsylvania Hospital in Pine street. It is a medical and surgical hospital and a lunatic asylum in the heart of the city, surrounded by ample grounds and stately trees. In front there is a well executed bronze statue of William Penn, standing in full Quaker costume, hat and all, with the charter of Pennsylvania, granted by Charles II, in 1681, in his hand. From the top of the dome, an extensive view is enjoyed, and an emotion of astonishment presses on the mind, that this large, rich, regular, beautiful, and enlightened city, should all have grown up from an absolute wilderness since 1681, and that Penn should have had the vigour and sagacity of mind to look forward to its increase with the eye and hope of a prophet; and should at that time have laid it out in streets, and squares, and ways, almost exactly as it now appears, with so much to approve of, and so little to amend.

Phrenology in Baltimore.—After repeated advertisements in the Baltimore newspapers, requesting those citizens who desired that I should lecture there, to enter their names at a bookstore, twenty-six individuals have appeared, and this success has been reported to me. As the number which I require is 150, I have declined to lecture in that city. I have been solicited to repeat my course in Philadelphia, and offered to do so, if 200 subscribers appear for a second course.

Loss of the Use of Words, &c.—Dr. Parrish, Jun., called and introduced a man of slender stature, bilious and nervous temperament, retreating forehead, and prominent eyes, a policeman, about thirty-eight or forty years of age, who, after sleeping in a very cold bed in December last, at Harrisburg, (whither he had been conveyed as a soldier to suppress the riot,) had felt some uneasy sensation in his head, and then discovered that he had lost the use of words. Although he understood language, and could articulate, he could not find words with which to express his own ideas. He saw distance erroneously: a house distant one street, appeared distant a mile or a mile and a half; he lost the perception of numbers also, and could not reckon. He felt no pain in any particular part of the head. He gradually recovered the use of the lost faculties, but even now he cannot use numbers readily: he calls numbers "times." In endeavouring to name dates, he says it was "last time," or "a time before that." The lower part of the anterior lobe is narrow, and projects considerably. If one may hazard a conjecture, I should say that the intense cold had produced congestion of some of the intellectual organs; those most affected being the organs of Language, Size, and Number; the other intellectual faculties were unimpaired. The cause of these affections is obscure; but the fact of only three faculties, and these so distinctly marked, being involved in this case, not only confirms the general principle of a division of the brain, but affords grounds for presuming that the phrenological divisions are real.

Fashion.—The British public appear to have a great difficulty in understanding the condition of the fashionable world in the United States. They generally imagine that little refinement and elegance, but abundance of vulgar glitter and ridiculous pretension prevail there. They forget that the United States embrace a country of vast extent, exhibiting society in all its stages. The love of distinction being innate in the human mind, fashion is found in the social circle of the savage as well as in that of the monarch of France or England. In the United States, every condition of society, from that of the newly cleared wilderness to that of the opulent eastern cities, has its circle of fashion, and great differences may naturally be expected to exist. Philadelphia presents a great amount of female grace, beauty and accomplishments, and of handsome young men, rather verging towards dandyism; while the shops contain the most expensive and elegant wares, and the public rooms in many of the houses of wealthy citizens are richly furnished and decorated. The refinement and elegance of manners which distinguish the highest circles in London may not abound, but there is more of nature in its genuine forms. In short, there is no difficulty in finding society in which any mind, less fastidious than that of a Beau Brummel, may feel itself at home. Indeed, the contest for superiority in fashion between different circles, is here as keen and active as in any European city. Market street is the northern boundary of fashionable residences. The fashionable inhabitants of Chestnut, Walnut, and Spruce streets, which lie to the south of that line, will scarcely recognise as compeers families living to the north of it. If a stranger were to come to the city and occupy a house of the first class, beyond the northern boundary, and give the most splendid entertainments, he would nevertheless find it difficult to make his way into fashionable society. This is neither more nor less absurd than the rule in London thirty years ago, which limited all good style to localities south of Oxford street, and doomed the north to irretrievable vulgarity. Many families of good fortune and the highest respectability live north of Market street, but few of them aim at figuring in the fashionable circle. We were told that one fashionable family have ceased to invite the English to their house, on account of the ungrateful conduct of the visitors of that nation, who have from time to time published their travels.

Feb. 5. Ther. 32°. Residences of the Poor.—It is distressing to learn, that even in this beautiful city the houses of the poor too much resemble the residences of the same class in European towns. Dr. Parrish informed me that great numbers of young children die here every season in hot weather from cholera infantum, or, as it is commonly called, the summer complaint. The poor live in small houses, never intentionally ventilate their rooms, and seem not to know the use of cold water. He would enter one of these dwellings on a summer morning when the thermometer stood at 90°, and find an infant shrivelled and bedewed with a clammy perspiration. It had been gasping all night for breath, and not drawn one mouthful of fresh air, and had, perhaps, never been washed from its birth. Death speedily relieves it. Many of the parents who thus treat their children are Irish. He hired an Irish nurse to suckle one of his own children. She gave her own son to an Irish family to board. When the hot weather came, he thought of her infant, and went to see it. It was in the condition before described. In three hours more it would have been dead. Without a day's delay, he sent the whole Irish family with the child to his farm, and saved it. "I should have felt very uneasy," said he, "if it had died, because my child was thriving under the care of the mother whom nature had given to it, but whom I had taken away for the benefit of my own."

We were a good deal in Quaker society in Philadelphia, and enjoyed it highly. The principles of moderation, truthfulness, and simplicity, in which they are trained, render their manners pleasing, and those individuals among them who possess in addition high moral and intellectual qualities, are not only excellent specimens of good breeding, but most interesting companions. We knew female Quakers who, if introduced at the court of Victoria, would be regarded as perfectly well-bred.

Feb. 6. Ther. 14°. Emigrants.—This evening a well dressed respectable looking Scots-woman called and introduced herself to me, and told me that she and her husband had been servants in the family of one of my friends in Edinburgh; that they had come to the United States a few years ago; that her husband now acted as assistant in keeping a store in Market street, Philadelphia, for which he received $350 per annum; that she also had found employment; and that both were well, happy and respected. She had a child with her equally well dressed with herself, and thriving in its appearance. She added that "this is the country for poor, honest and industrious people to come to." The visit afforded me much gratification.

Musical Instruments.—An Italian gentleman mentioned to us, that the climate of Philadelphia destroys musical instruments imported from Germany or England. He had an excellent piano-forte sent to him from Germany; but the first summer dried up the wood so thoroughly, that the keys would not act, and the instrument became useless. He hoped that the winter would restore it; but was disappointed. The German instruments are not varnished, but polished. The air takes off the polish, and in one year the naked grain of the wood appears. The American instruments are made considerably stronger than the European, and are nearly as delicate in their tones. The wood is seasoned up to the demands of the climate before being used, and it stands in better. The manufacture of pianofortes is a very extensive branch of trade in the eastern cities of the Union; still, the Americans cannot be called a musical people. Most of the really accomplished musical amateurs in Philadelphia are Italians or Germans, or descendants of these nations. This is very natural; for the English who settled in these colonies were not the musical part of that nation, and the pursuits of their descendants, since they came hither, have not been favourable for the development of the fine arts. The stimulating climate, however, and active brains of the Americans, may be expected, in due season, to bring forth both taste and talent for painting, sculpture and music. The coloured population show considerable capacity for music. Frank Johnson's brass band, which has been collecting large crowds of listeners in the upper rooms of the Philadelphia Museum (and disturbing my audience) is entirely composed of coloured men, and the music is said to be very creditable to the performers.

CHAPTER XI.

Feb. 8. Dr. Franklin and Lord Hillsborough.—On visiting Mr. Vaughan at the apartments of the American Philosophical Society this day, he showed us, and read, a manuscript report by Dr. Franklin of his interview in London with Lord Hillsborough, secretary of state, when the philosopher presented his commission as agent for the people of Massachusetts. He describes the secretary as having scolded both him and his constituents, and declined to recognise him as their agent, because his commission had not been sanctioned by the governor. The report is in the handwriting of Franklin, but it is not subscribed by him.

Phrenology.—I gave the last lecture of my course this evening, and received the thanks of the audience in a series of gratifying resolutions. They guaranteed a class of 200 hearers for a repetition of the lectures, and a second course was immediately announced.

Feb. 9. Ther. 45°. Animal Magnetism.—This subject is exciting considerable interest in Philadelphia; and the proceedings of Dr. Elliotson, and the attacks on him in the London Lancet, are much spoken of in medical society. The medical men here who do not admit the existence of animal magnetism, ascribe the phenomena to hysteria. As some cases in the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb in this city have attracted attention, we visited it, and saw a deaf and dumb girl of about nine years of age, of a nervous and bilious temperament, lively, and in good health magnetised. The operator seated her in a rocking chair, placed his hands and thumbs in contact with hers, and thus induced the magnetic sleep. Her head fell on her shoulder, and she appeared to lose consciousness. He raised her up, pushed her about the room, and raised her arms. She then seemed to acquire an internal consciousness, appeared as if in an ecstasy, answered questions intelligently, walked, and jumped, and threw her arms about, as if extremely happy. Passes were then made with the hands across and nearly touching her forehead, when she awoke. She was again magnetised, and repeated the same evolutions. The questions were put by means of touch and the finger alphabet, and were answered in the same manner. Another girl, of the same age, fair, and of the sanguine and lymphatic temperament, and who was not deaf and dumb, was next magnetised. In her natural state she was so bashful (she had very large Cautiousness and Love of Approbation), that she would scarcely speak even in answer to a question. After being magnetised and put into a state of somnambulism, her bashfulness disappeared, and she became lively and confident, answering questions readily. She was asked what certain pictures which were put into her hands represented, and although her eyes were not bandaged, but closed as in sleep, she carried the pictures to the lamp, and placed her head, and occasionally her fingers, on them; she also held them up to the light, as one would do who enjoyed faint but natural vision. In some instances she told correctly what objects they represented, in others she did not. She was requested to read, but did so very imperfectly, and obviously directed a chink of her eyelids, which she opened, to the book. A mask, having the eyeholes pasted over with thick paper, was put on, and she was requested to read. She could not do so; but, by holding back her head, she brought the opening at the nose into the line of the axis of the eye, and then offered to read.

There was no reason to believe that these young children were taught to act a part, although the latter in some of her actions appeared as if doing so. The gentleman who operated on them was most reasonable in his remarks. He professed only to show the effects of an experiment which he had been led to try in consequence of the general interest which the subject had excited, and offered no theory to explain the phenomena. I asked him if he would allow me to try the experiment also. He consented most readily; and I selected the deaf and dumb child as the one whose conduct gave me the greatest confidence in her simplicity of character. To my own surprise, my passes were effectual. They brought the girl out of her state of somnambulism; afterwards induced it again, and once more awoke her out of it. This was my first and only experiment in animal magnetism; and as I came to the house with the intention of being a spectator merely, there was certainly no concert between the girl and me, and her appearance and actions did not lead me to suppose that she had been trained to deception. In this case the deception, if there was any, must have been at least extemporaneous.

It is possible that some of my readers may conclude from this narrative, that I am not only a phrenologist, but an animal magnetiser, a union of faiths and professions which they may think natural and appropriate; but I merely report facts. I profess to have neither studied nor practised animal magnetism, and to be a stranger to its merits; but I do not shrink from witnessing experiments on any subject, or from trying them, if in my power; and still less from reporting what I see. The whole subject of animal magnetism appears to me to be involved in the profoundest obscurity; but this is a good reason why it should be subjected to the most searching scrutiny by observation.

Feb. 10. Therm. 25°. The African Church.—We heard a sermon to-day in the Episcopal church occupied by the people of colour in Philadelphia. The slightest tinge of colour in the skin, perhaps discernible only by a practised eye, excludes its owner from social intercourse and social worship with the whites. The church was commodious and comfortable, and the congregation respectable in their appearance. The service was performed, and a fair average sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. Douglas, also a man of colour. Many persons may imagine that ludicrous incidents must have presented themselves in such a church. They would expect to hear the minister and congregation mistaking and mispronouncing the English language; reading with strange accentuation, or curtailing the sentences with baby-like abruptness; but all such ideas are utterly groundless. The service was read and the sermon delivered in pure good English, equal to that of any of the other clergymen of the city, and the whole demeanour of the congregation was becoming and devout. Some of them are rich and well educated, and not a few are marked by such faint traces of African blood, that in Europe they might mingle in any society without their origin being suspected, unless some lynx-eyed American were present to detect it. One large and commodious pew, which I am told belongs to Dr. Rush's family, is generally reserved for white visitors. So intense is the aversion even of many humane and educated persons in this city to the coloured race, that apparently they would shrink back from the gate of heaven, if it were opened by a coloured man and showed coloured people within. Only the warmly philanthropic view them as men, and treat them with real regard. I have not been able to discover whether there is a sufficient number of rich and well educated coloured persons in this city to form a cultivated society among themselves. I suspect that there is not; and that the most accomplished individuals of the coloured race live here as in a social wilderness, raised by their attainments above the mass of their own people yet excluded from the society of the whites.

Feb. 13. Therm. 32°. The House of Refuge.—We visited the House of Refuge for juvenile offenders of both sexes. This institution is similar to the one in Boston for the same purpose, previously described. Children found, by the magistrates or other judges, guilty of petty larcenies, assaults, and vagrancy, and also children whose parents complain of them as unmanageable, are recommended to the consideration of the managers of this institution, who, if they regard them as proper subjects, and have accommodation, receive them, and detain them during their own discretion. They are taught manufacturing furniture for umbrellas, cane-chair making, casting in brass, turning, and book-binding, and also reading, writing, and arithmetic. They attend school two hours, and labour the rest of the day, with the exception of intervals for meals, and of half an hour for play. We were told that these children learn as much by an attendance for two hours a day at school as those in the city schools do in four or five hours. The alternation of labour and learning brings the mind and brain fresh to the lessons.

The annual report to the legislature states that "during the year 1838, 137 inmates, viz. 92 boys and 45 girls, were received into, and 129 left the refuge, viz. 90 boys and 39 girls, and there remained on the 31st ultimo 158, viz. 105 boys and 53 girls.

"Twenty boys were indentured to farmers, seven to shoemakers, one turner, one bookbinder, one butcher, two chairmakers, one tailor, two blacksmiths, one sashmaker, three manufacturers, one miller, one bricklayer, one printer, one baker, one sugar-maker, one cabinet-maker.

"The girls (16) were indentured to learn housewifery."

These children are not detained long enough to learn a trade thoroughly. They are apprenticed to farmers in the country, to the sea, and to tradesmen in small villages; but seldom in large towns. A considerable number of them are ultimately reformed. They are supported by gifts, legacies, and appropriations from the state. The managers let out the labour of the inmates to tradesmen in the city, but the recompense is not nearly equal to the expense of the establishment. Religious worship is performed in a chapel by the ministers of all the sects in the city in rotation, except the Roman Catholic, whose priests decline to officiate, because the chapel is not consecrated. Some of the managers attend every Sunday, and the clergy are requested to confine themselves to the broad and practical principles of Christianity, and to omit peculiar doctrines; also not to address the children as convicts or criminals.

I have studied the crania of the North American Indians and of the negroes in various parts of the United States, and also observed their living heads, and have arrived at the following conclusions. The North American Indians have given battle to the whites, and perished before them, but have never been reduced either to national or to personal servitude. The development of the brains shows large organs of Destructiveness, Secretiveness, Cautiousness, Self-Esteem, and Firmness, with deficient organs of Benevolence, Conscientiousness, and Reflection. This indicates a natural character that is proud, cautious, cunning, cruel, obstinate, vindictive, and little capable of reflection or combination. The brain of the negro, in general (for there are great varieties among the African race, and individual exceptions are pretty numerous), shows proportionately less Destructiveness, Cautiousness, Self-Esteem, and Firmness, and greater Benevolence, Conscientiousness, and Reflection, than the brain of the native American. In short, in the negro brain the moral and reflecting organs are of larger size, in proportion to the organs of the animal propensities now enumerated, than in that of the Indian. The negro is, therefore, naturally more submissive, docile, intelligent, patient, trustworthy, and susceptible of kindly emotions, and less cruel, cunning, and vindictive, than the other race.

These differences in their natural dispositions throw some light on the differences of their fates. The American Indian has escaped the degradation of slavery, because he is a wild, vindictive, cunning, untameable savage, too dangerous to be trusted by the white men in social intercourse with themselves, and moreover, too obtuse and intractable to be worth coercing into servitude. The African has been deprived of freedom and rendered "property," according to Mr. Clay's view, because he is by nature a tame man, submissive, affectionate, intelligent and docile. He is so little cruel, cunning, fierce, and vindictive, that the white men can oppress him far beyond the limits of Indian endurance, and still trust their lives and property within his reach; while he is so intelligent that his labour is worth acquiring. The native American is free, because he is too dangerous and too worthless a being to be valuable as a slave; the negro is in bondage, because his native dispositions are essentially amiable. The one is like the wolf or the fox, the other like the dog. In both, the brain is inferior in size, particularly in the moral and intellectual regions, to that of the Anglo-Saxon race, and hence the foundation of the natural superiority of the latter over both; but my conviction is, that the very qualities which render the negro in slavery a safe companion to the white, will make him harmless when free. If he were by nature proud, irascible, cunning and vindictive, he would not be a slave; and as he is not so, freedom will not generate these qualities in his mind; the fears, therefore, generally entertained of his commencing, if emancipated, a war of extermination, or for supremacy over the whites, appear to me to be unfounded; unless, after his emancipation, the whites should commence a war of extermination against him. The results of emancipation in the British West India Islands have hitherto borne out these views, and I anticipate that the future will still farther confirm them.

The Anglo-Americans in some degree admire the American Indian character, invest it with a kind of nobleness and dignity, and some families even boast of their inheriting Indian blood; while the negro is despised, hated, and by some even abhorred, as scarcely belonging to the human species. This opinion has neither philosophy, religion, nor experience, to sanction it. Much as Mr. Clay's speech was admired, I often asked in society, whether any one meant to justify slavery, or to maintain that a time will not come when it must cease. The answer generally given was, that few persons defend slavery as in itself right, or desire its unlimited endurance; but that, since the abolitionists commenced their agitations, few will avow even these sentiments in public.

Feb. 14. Ther. 39°. Clerks.—Young men educated as clerks, capable of writing letters and keeping books, superabound in Philadelphia, and receive only $4, while a porter is allowed $6 a week. A young Scotsman, belonging to this class, assured me that he had found it extremely difficult to procure employment, and when he was successful, he received only $4 a week. I asked some persons in trade, who corroborated the statement, for an explanation of the fact itself. They said that the common schools qualify a great number of young men for the counting-house; that the sons of labourers are often ambitious, and although only moderately gifted with talent, become clerks, conceiving this vocation to be more genteel than labour. To them are added a multitude of clerks constantly arriving from Europe. Between the two, the market is overstocked, employment is not to be obtained, and they solicit engagements for the means of a bare subsistence.

Feb. 15. Ther. 34°. Lecture-room.—So much dissatisfaction was expressed with my late room, that, after visiting every other apartment in Philadelphia fit for the purpose, and attainable, I have been under the necessity of engaging the Musical Fund Hall in Locust street, at $800 for sixteen lectures, or 10l. a night; besides paying for attendance. It is the usual concert room, too large for my class; but I could find no other room, at a more moderate rent, that was large enough.

Feb. 16. Ther. 34°. Railroad to Baltimore.—This morning at eight o'clock we left Philadelphia, and traveled in large and comfortable cars, warmed by stoves, to Baltimore. The railroad consists of a single track; the distance is ninety-four miles, and although we suffered considerable detention by the bridge over the Schuylkill having been lately carried away by a flood, and not yet restored, we arrived at 3 P. M. There is a "ladies' car" in each train, appropriated for ladies, and the gentlemen who are traveling with them. It is divided into two apartments, and a place of retirement is added. This is a great accommodation, particularly when children are in the party.

Baltimore.—In the United States, Baltimore is often called the monumental city, because it possesses two public monuments; one a column in honour of General Washington, and the other a structure of a less definite description, to commemorate the citizens who fell in defending Fort M'Henry against the British, in 1814. The city stands on irregular ground, some of the streets are steep, and those recently built are wide and handsome. Brick is generally used, but the fine quality of it, and of the masonry, gives an appearance of taste and elegance to the fabrics. We were told that the trade and population are increasing rapidly, and that the present estimate is, that the city contains 80,000 white, and 20,000 coloured persons. The latter are mostly slaves.

Phrenology.—I had the pleasure of meeting with several medical gentlemen of this city, previously known to me by correspondence as phrenologists. Among these was Dr. Stewart, who, many years ago, sent to the Phrenological Society of Edinburgh, casts of the heads of Pepe, Courro, Felix, and Tardy, pirates of atrocious character executed in Baltimore. He mentioned to me, that, some years ago, he had removed a tumour from the head of a man, a manager of slaves on a plantation, who, when in health, was remarkable for steadiness, firmness, and decision of character. The tumour was situated externally over the organs of Firmness, and after it was formed, he lost these characteristics of mind and became undecided, and finally imbecile. He lingered for some weeks after the operation, and died. A post-mortem examination of the head showed that the convolutions of the brain below the tumour, and constituting the two organs of Firmness, were disorganised by suppuration. Dr. Stewart received the report of the state of the brain from a country surgeon who knew nothing about phrenology, and the account of the change of character from the gentleman who had employed his late patient. Neither of these knew the relation of the fact which he communicated to the fact communicated by the other.

Feb. 18. Ther. 33°. Washington City.—This morning at 9 o'clock, we left Baltimore, and traveled to Washington by a railroad. The distance is thirty-eight miles, and the country is undulating, but the railroad finds a practicable track through the valleys. The soil seems to be poor, but clothed with small trees. A chill wind blew, and the ground was covered with snow. On approaching Washington, the first object that presents itself is the capitol, a large massive building painted white to resemble marble, with a dome not of very successful proportions. The town looks like a large straggling village reared in a drained swamp, with the navigable Potomac about a mile distant.

Feb. 19. Ther. 27°. Visit to the President.—Dr. Sewall, to whom I brought a letter, called and undertook to introduce us to Mr. Van Buren, the President. The "White House," as the presidential residence is named, lies at one end of the chief street of Washington, and the capitol at the other, the distance being one and one eighth part of a mile. It is a large square building; not particularly striking in its architecture. We entered as if going into a public office. We opened the door, met nobody, and were asked no questions. At last we reached the ante-room, and here a servant appeared. Dr. Sewall sent in his own name and ours, and, in less than a minute, we were requested to enter a large room, which resembled the business-room of a chief secretary of state. Mr. Van Buren immediately appeared, received us kindly and politely, and entered into conversation. He spoke of steam navigation, the corn laws, Mr. O'Connell's quarrel with the Dublin Press, and the rising of the Chartists, and appeared to me to possess accurate information, and to state sound views on every topic on which he touched. His manners are very agreeable, combining the ease of a gentleman accustomed to the best society, with the dignity of a public character. The busts and portraits of him, and even the caricatures, which every where abound, are excellent likenesses.

Conservatism of the Law.—Each state has a written constitution, which defines not only the powers of the magistrates, but those of the legislature itself; and the supreme court of the state possesses authority to determine whether any particular act of the legislature be legal or the reverse; that is to say, whether or not it transgresses the limits prescribed to the legislature by the constitution. I lately conversed with an eminent lawyer who had just returned from Annapolis, where he had pleaded the cause of the professors of the university of Baltimore, who sought, in the supreme court of Maryland, to nullify an act of the legislature of that state, on the ground of its being ultra vires, or beyond the powers of the legislature, and had succeeded. I see the decision reported in the newspapers to-day:—"It decides," says the report, "the act (of the legislature) of 1825, which gave to certain trustees the government of the university, to be unconstitutional and void, and all the rights and franchises of the university are declared to be vested in the regents. The opinion of the court is regarded as an able and powerful defence of chartered rights against legislative encroachments."

The constitution of the United States is in some respects similar to that of the particular states. It also has established a supreme court, which has extensive jurisdiction, and performs a most important office in preserving the integrity of the Union. Its judicial power comprehends all cases, in law and equity, arising under the constitution itself, or the laws of the United States; all controversies to which the United States shall be a party; controversies between two or more states, or between citizens of different states, and many others. It sits in Washington, and on the rolls of the court may be seen Maryland versus Virginia, or Ohio versus Indiana, these sovereign states appearing there as private litigants. They argue claims before the judges, and implicitly acquiesce in their decisions. If civilisation were so far advanced in Europe as to induce the whole sovereignties to support the jurisdiction of such a court, it might avert many bloody and expensive wars. The judges of this court in Washington are men of great talent and erudition, and their decisions are highly respected.

Another case has excited great interest all over the Union. Judge M'Kinley, sitting in the district court in Alabama, had decided that a bank incorporated in Georgia, had no right to sue any person in Alabama; that is, that no corporation could sue beyond the state in which it was incorporated. The effect of this decision would be virtually to repeal the Union in so far as the privileges of incorporated companies are concerned, and to leave each state, in regard to its chartered companies, in the same condition as surrounded by foreign countries. The constitution of the United States provides, that, "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," and that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state." The decision of the judge of Alabama was regarded as a refusal to acknowledge the "public act" of the legislature of Georgia which incorporated the bank, as inconsistent with these provisions of the law, and therefore unconstitutional; and the cause was brought into the supreme court of the United States by appeal. Mr. Webster argued powerfully in favour of the efficacy of the privileges of chartered companies in all the states, in so far as they are consistent with the common law. The judgment of the court of Alabama was reversed by a majority of the judges, and the following propositions are reported as being established by the decision:—

"1. That, by the comity of nations, corporations can contract, as well as sue, in other nations, as well as in that in which they exist, or by whose government they are created.

"2. That this comity exists, in a still stronger degree, between states connected together as are the states of this Union.

"3. That the constitution and laws of Alabama establish no such policy as is infringed by the purchase and sale of bills of exchange within their limits by the agents of foreign corporations.

"4. An admission that there are some rights of citizens of other states, secured by the constitution, of which a state cannot divest them. This was not the ground of the decision, but was intended, as we suppose, to be, in legal phrase, the reclusion of a conclusion."

La Signorina America Vespucci.—We met this lady in society this evening. She is here as a solicitor to congress for a grant of land in return for the name which her ancestor, Americus Vespucci furnished to this great continent. On the 29th of January last she presented a memorial in the French language to the senate, in which she sets forth her name and descent, and states that "she has been obliged to quit her country (Italy) on account of her political opinions. She has separated herself from her family, in order to avoid drawing upon them the displeasure of her government. She is now alone, without country, without family, and without protection." She "has been traveling from country to country, without a day, and without a security." "The good queen of the French restored her to courage by granting her protection, so far as even to permit her to travel under the auspices of the French flag. But his generosity does not give her a country; this protection does not bestow upon her the title of citizen." "She is now in this quarter of the globe, which has been baptised by her ancestor; by him who has bequeathed to it his imperishable name." "America Vespucci will make no demand on the American government." "She knows that the Americans have been magnanimous," "that they have been generous towards her who have done a noble act for their country; and that they have, moreover, granted protection to an asylum even to emigrants from other nations. There is but one Vespucci who has given his name to a continent. Will the Americans do nothing for the descendant of Americus?" Her friends made it known to the senate that she desired "citizenship, and a grant of land."

This eloquent appeal was remitted by the senate to a committee of five of their number to consider and report. The chairman of the committee was taken ill, and the committee met in his absence. They divided, two for, and two against, recommending a grant. When the chairman resumed his duties, he found himself in the unenviable position of being called on to decide this delicate question by his single vote. America Vespucci is a tall handsome Italian lady, "young," and "an exile from her own country." She has the sweetest smile and most expressive eyes; and she bent the whole force of her charms and eloquence on the chairman to induce him to espouse her cause. But he was an American senator of business habits, and had also the fear of his constituents before his eyes. He therefore constantly asked her for "a reason," for "a principle intelligible to men of business habits," why the United States should make a grant of land to the descendant of Americus, who, if history might be relied on, had received too much honour, when his name, instead of that of Christopher Columbus, was bestowed on the country. But the lady, who understood no English, urged, in the most beautiful French, the romantic incident of a young female descendant of Americus, an exile from home, coming to congress, after the lapse of so many centuries and soliciting only a small portion of the territory which already bore her name! She enforced this view with all the persuasive arts of eloquence, and could not comprehend what more satisfactory "reasons," or "business-like principles," the senator could require, in order to authorise him to report in her favour. But all her efforts were in vain. The senator stood fast by his "business principles," and the committee reported against a grant either of citizenship or of land, as being unauthorised by the constitution; but strongly recommended a subscription by the American people in her favour. The report was subsequently approved of by the senate, whose individual members subscribed a handsome sum for the lady's benefit, but which she declined to accept.

Manners and Morals of Mississippi.—The ferocious quarrels and dissolute manners of Mississippi have been described by many travellers. They appear to me to indicate a condition of mind in the people somewhat resembling that which prevailed in Scotland three centuries ago, and which is strongly depicted by Sir Walter Scott in his Tales of a Grandfather, and still more strikingly illustrated in the records of the High Court of Justiciary for the same period. Rapine, falsehood and bloodshed, seem then to have been occurrences so common as to have attracted no particular attention. The Western States of the American Union, with similar mental dispositions, possess more of the physical elements of civilisation; and as Scotland has thoroughly changed her character for the better, there is ample reason to expect a still more rapid improvement in the morals of these portions of the American people.

I have had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with a gentleman from Mississippi who has the best means of information regarding it, and whose own talents and dispositions would render him a welcome visitor in any society. He informs me that in Mississippi the legislature has passed severe laws against rioting, in other words, lynching, and using the Bowie knife. This knife has a long blade, like a carving knife, with a thick back to give it strength, an edge as sharp as a razor, and the point rounded off like a scimitar. Its weight and sharpness render it a frightful weapon either for stabbing or cutting. It is carried in a sheath under the waistcoat, on the left side, and can be drawn in an instant. About one in forty of all the western people go thus armed. A law recently enacted, renders it criminal to draw a Bowie-knife, although it be not used. The general complaint against these states is, that their laws may be good, and may prohibit ferocious actions; but that they are not regularly executed. Great efforts are making by the respectable portion of the inhabitants to wipe off this stain from their country. A lawyer of some respectability lately drew a Bowie knife in a quarrel and threatened his opponent. He was carried before a criminal judge, convicted under the recent law, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. He petitioned the governor for a pardon. His petition was refused, and the governor stated publicly, that in no circumstances would he ever pardon any individual convicted under the Bowie knife act. The law, also, has recently made the town or district liable in cases of damage or destruction of property by mobs. There may be difficulty in inducing juries to convict under this statute.

Feb. 20. Ther. 29°. The Capitol and Congress.—This morning we proceeded to the capitol. In approaching it, I could not help feeling ashamed of the barbarism of my countrymen, who in the war of 1814, consigned it to the flames. The external walls have been painted white to obliterate the smoky traces of that unworthy deed. The grand vestibule is under the dome, and has no opening upwards to allow of the escape of air. The consequence is, that the effluvia of human bodies and of tobacco-juice greet the nostrils and afflict the lungs the moment it is entered. We found also that the Senate chamber and House of Representatives are, in this weather, hermetically sealed; except at the doors and chimneys. Although these may provide some change of air for the members, who are all accommodated on the floor, the unhappy visitors in the galleries receive all the vitiated air from below, render it worse by their own breathing, and are nearly doomed to suffocation. The ladies are accommodated with the front seat, and occasionally faint from the impurity of the atmosphere. I sat three hours in the gallery of the senate chamber to-day, and afterwards experienced those debilitating, irritable, and unpleasant sensations which are generated by imperfectly decarbonised blood.

I saw here Mr. Clay, but he did not speak. He is nearly bald. The anterior lobe of his brain is long and high, the middle perpendicular portion predominating. He seems to have large Acquisitiveness and considerable Ideality. In him also Self-Esteem and Firmness are large. The coronal region rises moderately high above Cautiousness and Causality, and the head altogether is high and long, rather than broad. It is of ample size. His temperament is nervous-sanguine, with a little bilious. He is tall and slender; and apparently between 60 and 70. This combination indicates great natural vivacity, readiness of apprehension, facility of illustration, with force of character; but there are two defects in the brain which will prevent such an individual from rising to the first class of minds. Causality and the moral organs do not present the highest degree of development. Men thus constituted do not sufficiently appreciate the influence of the moral sentiments as a natural power, nor do they trace the causes with which they deal, to their first elements, nor follow them to their remote consequences. Mr. Clay's head, however, bespeaks a man greatly above an average in point of mental power, and also practical in his tendencies; and therefore well adapted to the general American mind of the present day.

Here, also, sits Daniel Webster, looking like an intellectual giant among the senators. His enormous anterior lobe, and generally large head, reinforced by large lungs, mark him as a natural leader; but his reflective organs are too much developed in proportion to his Individuality to render his eloquence equally popular with that of Henry Clay. Mr. Webster needs a great subject, involving a profound principle and important consequences, before his strength can be called forth. Give him these, and he will rise to the highest eminence as a pleader and a statesman; but his intellect is too profound and comprehensive to be fully appreciated by the people. On seeing the man, therefore, I am not surprised at a circumstance which I have remarked, that, while Mr. Webster is regarded by a few as the great political character of the United States, Mr. Clay has at least a hundred devoted followers for each one of Mr. Webster's admirers. Webster, however, like Burke, will be quoted for the depth of principle and wisdom involved in his speeches, when the more fascinating but less profound orations of Mr. Clay have sunk into oblivion.

I heard Mr. Cuthbert, senator for Georgia, make a long speech on a bill for preventing the officers of government from interfering in elections. He is a slow and forcible, but not a refined speaker.

The appearance of the members of the senate is favourable. With few exceptions, their brains, and especially the organs of the intellectual faculties, are large, while there is a good average development of the organs of the moral sentiments. Collectively, they seemed to me to be a highly respectable and gifted body of men.

The American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.—In the evening I attended a meeting of this society (incorporated by the legislature of New York) in the capitol. The Honourable Joseph Story, one of the judges of the supreme court, was called to the chair. After some appropriate and instructive remarks by the chairman, the Rev. John Proudfit, of New York, stated the objects of the society. "It aims at the diffusion of pure and wholesome knowledge imbued with the spirit of Christianity." One great object of the society is the publication and general introduction of a National School Library. "It is estimated that there are at least 50,000 schools in the United States; and it is now generally, if not universally, admitted that every one should be supplied with a library." The society proposes the publication of a series of popular works upon all those branches of knowledge that are most interesting to the people; also, the publication of a popular "Journal of Useful Knowledge and of Public Instruction," congenial to the institutions of America. Another object is the preparation of text-books for schools, many of the books now in use being inferior and improper.

Mr. Abbott, the secretary of the society, next addressed the meeting, and exhibited a mass of statistics relative to the publication of newspapers, magazines, and books in England, in France, in Germany, and in the United States; and showed that the United States is one of the most reading communities in the world. He exhibited a case, containing 50 volumes of books already published, the price of which is $20;

mentioned that the cost of placing one similar library in every one of the 50,000 schools of the Union, would be $1,000,000, and asked, "what sum will express the benefits?"

Towards the close of the proceedings, being requested to address the meeting, I offered a few remarks on the spur of the moment to the following effect: "It appears to me that the elementary principles of all the natural sciences, when contemplated in their primitive forms by superior minds, are simple, and that they constitute the native food of the intellect. I include in these sciences the knowledge of man's physical, moral, and intellectual nature, and the relations subsisting between them and external objects and beings. One advantage of communicating instruction in these truths to youth is, that it furnishes them with a solid basis on which to found their judgments. Under the old system, there was much of conflicting opinion; authority stood against authority, and in the phases of human life, chiefly intricacy and inscrutable evolutions were presented. The causes of good and evil did not appear, and the consequences of actions were scarcely traceable. A people invested with political power, whose education leaves them in such a condition, must to a great extent, be exposed to the seduction of their passions, to be misled by imperfect views of their own interests, and even to the delusions of an excited imagination, leading them into wild speculations and impracticable adventures. An education in natural truth has the tendency to steady the whole mind, and to place passion, imagination, and ambition, under the guidance of reason. America needs an education of this kind, because she has no controlling principle in her institutions except the religion, morality, and intelligence of the majority of her people.

"This society, in framing books for schools, will do well to ask themselves, as each volume is presented, 'What does this book teach the people to do?' It is good to know, but it is still better to act. In the present state of civilised society, the history of the past is not a guide to the future. We are in a state of transition, and it is of greater importance to furnish sound, practical principles for the future, than to load the memory with too minute a knowledge of the past. The pages of history are useful chiefly as charts, indicating the shoals on which human happiness has been shipwrecked. We must chalk out new and better lines to direct our future movements. It is extremely difficult to frame books embodying scientific principles, and applying them to practical purposes; but in your country, where the law excludes works on theology from your schools, this object must be accomplished before a truly valuable library of secular school-books can be created." The object of the meeting was to commend the society and its works to the consideration and support of the Union, and to induce the representatives from the different states to make known the merits of its library in their several districts. The attendance was large, and the proceedings were interesting. They were subsequently reported in the "Christian Statesman," from which I have extracted the foregoing remarks, as a short specimen of the terms in which I generally addressed American audiences. The library proposed by this society will enter the field as a rival to that now preparing by Messrs. Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb, of Boston, under the superintendence of the Board of Education of Massachusetts; but there is scope enough for both in the vast territories of the United States.

The hall of the Supreme Court, in which the meeting was held, was destitute of ventilation, and I suffered severely for several hours after leaving it from the effects of bad air. On mentioning this next day, I was told that several lawyers have fallen down dead on the spot while engaged in the most animated pleadings in this hall, and that, although apoplexy was assigned as the cause, some medical men, who knew the state of the atmosphere, had expressed an opinion, that the catastrophes were probably hastened, if not caused, by asphyxia. The late arrangements by Dr. David B. Reid, for ventilating the British houses of parliament are well known here; but no person has yet proposed to adopt them, or any other means, for the preservation of life and health in the public chambers and apartments of the capitol.

Feb. 21. Therm. 43°. The weather is beautiful, and gives indications of the approach of spring.

The Senate—The Sub-Treasury Bill.—I heard part of the debate on a bill for regularizing the office of treasurer, and more effectually preserving the public money in the hands of the officers and agents of government; but none of the speeches was particularly interesting. The subject has excited a great deal of discussion in the public prints. There have been great embezzlements of public money by the officers of government in various departments of the United States; and also losses and embarrassments arising from its having been deposited, until needed, in banks in different states of the Union, many of which have embarked in large speculations with the government treasure, and which called on for repayment, either declared themselves bankrupt, or suspended cash payments. From the want, also, of an efficient machinery extending over the whole Union for effecting the exchange of bank-notes, the rates of exchange between the different parts of the country are constantly fluctuating, and are often ruinously high. When the general government deposits its funds in banks, it is subjected also to the loss and annoyance arising from this state of the monetary system. The democratic party, now in power, have attempted to pass a bill requiring the custom-house duties and the price of the public lands (the chief sources of the revenue of the general government,) to be paid in specie, and this treasure to be locked up by the public officers in strong boxes, and held subject to the orders of the government at Washington; and farther providing that any public servant who shall abstract any portion of it shall be held to have committed felony, and be punished with confinement as a common criminal at hard labour in the state prison.

Nothing seems to me to be more wanted than some such regulation as this to protect not only the public money, but the public morals; for the mode in which the revenue has of late years been distributed, has acted like a forcing stone applied to public cupidity, and tempted many men from the paths of virtue, who, under a better system, would have maintained their honour without a stain. But it has been, and continues to be, violently opposed by the whig party, who are regarded as the patrons of paper currency and the "credit system," with which it is generally supposed that the prosperity of the United States is indissolubly bound up. The democrats have offered various modifications.

such as introducing the demand for specie gradually, accepting for a time the notes of specie-paying banks, and other accommodations to the merchants; but the opposition is as violent and inflexible as ever in regard to the payment of custom-house duties in gold and silver.

Dr. Duncan and the House of Representatives.—While these discussions were proceeding in the senate, an extremely stormy discussion arose in the house of representatives on a question of privilege. Mr. Prentiss, of Mississippi, offered the following resolutions:—

“Resolved, That this house proceed forthwith to inquire—

“1. Whether Alexander Duncan, a member of this house, from the state of Ohio, be the author of a certain publication or publications under his name, in relation to the proceedings of this house, and certain members thereof, published in the Globe newspaper on the 19th inst.

“2. Whether, by said publication or publications, the said Alexander Duncan has not been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this house, of an offence against its peace, dignity, and good order, and of such grossly indecent, ungentlemanly, disgraceful, and dishonourable misconduct, as renders him unworthy of his seat in this house, and justly liable to expulsion from the same.”

There was a call of the house, and 125 members answered to their names. After a great deal of furious disputation and vociferation, Mr. Thomson, of South Carolina, moved to substitute the following motion for that of Mr. Prentiss.

“Resolved, That Alexander Duncan, a member of this house, having avowed himself the author of an article published in the Globe of the 19th instant, grossly libellous of honourable members of this body, that the said Alexander Duncan be reprimanded by the speaker in the presence of the house.”

After this resolution was presented, the house adjourned, it being then 6 P. M., and the usual hour of adjournment being three.

Dr. Sewall, the Anti-Phrenologist.—Dr. Sewall, to whom, as already mentioned, I brought a letter, has been exceedingly attentive to us, notwithstanding the different views which we entertain on the subject of phrenology. We met a large party of senators and members of the house of representatives at his residence this evening, and had much pleasant and interesting conversation. One of the gentlemen present took me by the button, and placing Dr. Sewall and me face to face, said, “Now we have got phrenology and anti-phrenology fairly before us, let us hear you fight it out.” I replied that there was really nothing between us to fight about; that, if the views to which Dr. Sewall had given the name in his work were really phrenology, I should be altogether on his side; that he had, in truth, created a phantom, called it phrenology, and then knocked it down, but that no phrenologist took any interest in such a feat. Dr. Sewall asked if I said this seriously. I answered that I did so, and mentioned that Dr. George McClellan, of Philadelphia, from whom I had brought a letter to him, had previously gone along with him in his views, but now acknowledged publicly to his class, that it was not phrenology which he had previously ridiculed, but erroneous conceptions of his own regarding it; and that he had informed me that he had stated as much in his letter to him (Dr. Sewall). “Then,” added Dr. Sewall, “I suppose that I must revise my opinions. They are not unalterable, like the laws of the Medes and the Persians.” And here the conversation terminated, to the disappointment, perhaps, of some of the members of Congress, who would have enjoyed a “set to” between us considerably. I shall have occasion, at a subsequent time, to mention how far Dr. Sewall profited by the revival of his opinions, which he here indicated as possible.

Ex-President Adams.—I was introduced by Dr. Sewall to the ex-President, Mr. John Quincy Adams, who was one of his distinguished guests; and was just entering into a conversation with him, when a young Scottish lady, overjoyed at hearing, at so great a distance from home, the accents of the Land of Cakes, placed herself between him and me, and poured forth such a volume of questions about Scotland and Scots people, that the patience of Mr. Adams was exhausted. I attempted, by remarks made to him past her shoulder, to retain him, but in vain. He turned off and went to another part of the room, where a circle of admirers was formed around him, which I was never able subsequently to penetrate.

Mr. Adams, after having been President of the United States, now sits in the house of representatives as one of the members for Massachusetts, a position which appears to me to be in every respect consistent with republican principles, and perfectly compatible with the dignity of his previous office. A real patriot is ready to serve his country in any station in which his talents may be useful, and there is true magnanimity in descending at his country's call from the station of supreme power to that of an ordinary representative.

Numerous busts of him are published, but I doubted their accuracy, for I was disappointed in the development of his head; but I now see that they are correct. He is stoutly made, and his temperament is sanguine-nervous bilious, giving him great activity and power of enduring fatigue. His brain is large: The base of it is large, particularly Combativeness and Destructiveness. Self-esteem and Firmness are very large; Acquisitiveness and Benevolence large; Veneration and Conscientiousness full. The anterior lobe is of considerable size, although not large in proportion to the regions of the propensities and sentiments. This indicates a man of impulse, rather than of clear, sound, and consistent judgment. His organs of the observing faculties, however, particularly those of Individuality, are well developed, but they are larger than those of reflection, giving rise to talents for observation, for accumulating knowledge, and for producing it when required; but without a corresponding power of penetrating to the principles of things, and tracing consistently distant consequences. With much kindness of disposition, and stubborn independence of character, the head indicates a liability to heat of temper, and to occasional obstinacy; also, a deficiency in tact, and a difficulty in preserving a continued consistency; the latter imperfection arising not from any tendency to wavering in his dispositions, but from a limited intellectual capacity to perceive fine and distant relations, combined with a self-confidence which will rarely allow him to doubt the soundness of his own inductions.

Most of the Presidents of the United States are said to have injured their private fortunes, by the expenses of office, except Mr. John Quincy Adams. He is spoken of as an economist, who spent what the government allowed him, but no more. The small pay allowed to American functionaries is attended with some evils. Only men of large fortune, of whom there are not yet a great number in the United States, or men in whom ambition is more powerful than prudence, are likely to become candidates for public offices. The latter are the very men whom the people should avoid as public servants; for a democracy, above all other governments, needs men of prudence and of incorruptible integrity to conduct its affairs. A system of government which has the natural tendency to elevate imprudent and ambitious men to power, may be designated as a hotbed to generate jobbers and speculators. I hear it stated, also, that the foreign ministers of the United States are often ruined by the extra expense entailed on them by their office. “The pay of ministers plenipotentiary is $9000 per annum as salary, besides $9000 for outfit. Chargés d'affaires receive $4500 per annum, and secretaries of legation $2000. I am told that some of the members of Congress contrive to save four or five hundred dollars out of their own pay during the session in Washington, and would regard any man as an extravagant waster of the public money who should propose an increase of salaries.

Feb. 22. Ther. 42°. Dr. Duncan.—The debate on the motions to expel or reprimand Dr. Duncan was resumed this morning, and finally the resolutions moved by Mr. Prentiss were “laid on the table,” which means that nothing was done with them. A vote of two thirds of the members is necessary for expulsion: this could not be carried, and nobody cares for a “reprimand” from the chair. The only alternatives left were “laying on the table” or exculpation, and the former was preferred.

I have introduced this discussion chiefly for the sake of the following remarks:—I heard the whole subject extensively discussed by American gentlemen at the public table in Washington, and subsequently in the railroad cars on the way to Baltimore; and the result was generally approved of, on the ground, expressly stated, that the rifle is the only method of settling such disputes. Some few persons lifted up their voices against this sentiment, but they were the minority. While such a state of feeling prevails, the laws recently enacted by Congress, and many of the states, against duelling, must remain nearly a dead letter. One effect which attends the meeting of Congress in Washington is injurious. It withdraws these fierce legislators from the wholesome influence of a more humane public opinion, which would reach them in the larger cities. In Washington they constitute themselves society, and give the tone to opinion.

Gen. Washington's Birthday.—This morning the great guns at the navy yard, a short distance from the city, were fired to celebrate Washington's birthday. In the evening we attended a grand national ball given in honour of the day. The President of the United States, and all the foreign ministers, attended; the latter in their official costumes. Much of the youth and beauty of the city were assembled. The president entered about ten o'clock, leaning on the arms of two stewards of the ball. He wore no costume, and was attended by no insignia of office. The dancing, however, was suspended, and he walked up the middle of the floor between a double row of the company, of all ages and both sexes, who formed a way for him. They bowed, and he returned the compliment; but not a sound was uttered. The band played “Hail! Columbia.” He ascended a platform at the upper end of the room, which was free to all, and on which many ladies and gentlemen were already standing. He then mingled with the company as an ordinary visiter.

The young ladies took the lead at the ball; but I was assured that ladies, however young, gay, beautiful, and accomplished, after being wedded, are no longer recognised as constituent elements of a ball in the city of Washington. A pretty and engaging lady of nineteen, who has been married for one year, mentioned to me, that while in the single state she remorselessly assisted in deleting the names of her acquaintances from the ball lists as soon as they were married, and never dreamt that she was inflicting any hardship on them; but that now she considers it rather hard to be cut off at her age, when her taste for gaiety is yet fresh and unsatisfied, from all active participation in these scenes. There is little retenue or shyness in the youthful fair in the ball-room. 'They act as if the floor belonged to them and their "beaux" (their own expression for young gentlemen); and if the time allowed to them for gaiety before marriage be short, they certainly make the best use of it while it lasts. There is much beauty and amiability, but their forms are fragile, and indicate liability to premature decay.

Opinion seems to be unanimous, that no perceptible evils result from the freedom with which young ladies conduct themselves in the festive parties of the United States. The means of providing for a family are so easily acquired, that most of the men contract marriage at an early age, and seductions are extremely rare. We are told, also, that the young ladies in general display great tact and discrimination in their selection of partners, and very rarely commit themselves to imprudent or unprincipled characters.

The Negro Brain.—In the negroes whom we have seen in this city, the average size of the brain is less than the average size in the free negroes of New York and Pennsylvania. Here the negroes are chiefly slaves, and in some of them the brain is so small, that their mental powers must be feeble indeed. It is a reasonable inference, that the greater exercise of the mental faculties in freedom has caused the brain to increase in size; for it is a general rule in physiology, that wholesome exercise favours the development of all organs. But I fear that another reason may, to some extent, be assigned for the difference, namely, that the condition of the free negroes, when they come into competition with the whites, is so unfavourable, that those of them in whom the brain is deficient in size, and the mental faculties weak, are overwhelmed with difficulties, and die out, and only the most vigorously constituted are able to maintain their position; and hence, that in the free states we see the highest specimens of the race.

Feb. 23. Ther. 40°. Journey from Washington to Philadelphia.—We left Washington at six in the morning by the railroad, arrived at Baltimore at half past eight, breakfasted, and started at nine by the railroad for Philadelphia. The axle of the baggage wagon broke, and we were detained for two hours. Nothing could exceed the good humour with which the passengers submitted to the loss of time while the baggage was transferred into the passengers' cars. The rough treatment, however, which the baggage itself sustained in the act of transference, was very reprehensible. The trunks and packages were thrown about, and dashed against each other on the ground most recklessly, yet this is one of the best managed railroads in the Union. Mr. Newkirk, the president of this company, told me that in engaging all the men employed by the railway company, it is stipulated that they shall practise habitual temperance, and if their breath even shall at any time be observed to smell of intoxicating liquor, although they may be perfectly sober, this shall be regarded as a voluntary resignation of their places; and that, by rigidly acting on these stipulations, no serious accident has occurred since the railway was opened in 1838. Urgent solicitations are often made to him to overlook one transgression, and the most positive assurances given of future good conduct, but he meets all such applications by reminding the petitioner of the rule: "When you put the liquor to your head, you knew that by doing so you resigned your situation. You were then sober, and therefore resigned deliberately; and it is inconsistent to solicit my consent to your remaining after you have done so. I accept your resignation, and you must go." We arrived in Philadelphia at 6 P. M.

Feb. 24. Ther. 41°. "How do you like our country?"—Mr. Charles Matthews has announced a book on the United States, bearing the title, "How do you like our country?" This is a very common question, varied sometimes in this fashion, "How does Boston impress you?" It is generally the first question put, and it is embarrassing to a stranger, because it will often force him to give an answer that will do violence to the feelings either of the querist or of himself, unless he deliver a long discourse expressive of modified likes and dislikes. By this question, however, the Americans in general mean nothing more than an invitation to conversation, as we do in England by the observation, "This is pleasant weather," or the question, "How far have you travelled to-day?"

Feb. 25. Ther. 41°. Wilmington, Delaware.—In the interval between my first and second courses of lectures in Philadelphia, I was solicited to deliver three lectures on education in Wilmington, the chief town in the State of Delaware: it contains 8000 inhabitants, at the distance of twenty-eight miles from Philadelphia, on the line of the Baltimore railway. Thither I proceeded this day, at 3 P. M. We were forced to wait a full hour before leaving the station on the right bank of the Schuylkill, because the train from Baltimore had not arrived, and there being only one track of rails, we could not pass it. The most perfect good humour prevailed among the passengers during the detention. In the cars I have repeatedly met people of colour traveling as passengers, and saw no indignity offered to them. Wilmington enjoys a supply of water raised from the Brandywine river by force-pumps, and distributed in pipes through the town. It has one street paved; but the others present beds of unredeemed mud, ankle deep. Mr. Gilpin, from whom I received great kindness, carries on an extensive manufacture of writing-paper in the neighbourhood of the town, from fine linen rags exclusively, and he was the first to introduce machinery into this branch. Much of the American paper is made from cotton, and is not durable. Bank notes are made from new Russia duck, and it is the newness of the linen that renders them so tough.

State-Lotteries.—Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, have abolished state-lotteries, and prohibited the sale of tickets for the lotteries of other states. Delaware, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, continue to patronise them as well as slavery.

CHAPTER XII.

March 2. Phrenology.—I commenced my second course of lectures in Philadelphia this evening in the Musical Fund Hall. The attendance was 342, of whom a large proportion were "Friends," both orthodox and Hicksites. Many of those who attended the first course have subscribed also for this one.

The Maine Boundary.—War with England.—On the 9th of February Mr. Van Buren presented to the house of representatives at Washington a report from the secretary of state, with the relative documents, regarding the dispute with England about the Maine boundary; and on the 1st of March both houses of congress were engaged from noon till midnight in discussing the subject, and finally passed a bill to authorise the president to engage 50,000 volunteers, and take other measures of a warlike character, to support the governor of Maine. Mr. Webster, on whose cool judgment great reliance is placed, is reported to have said in his speech to the senate, that "if England did not settle this matter by the 4th of July next, the disputed territory should be seized by the United States."

The effect of these discussions on the public mind has been very striking. In every circle into which we enter, almost every voice is raised for war. The battles, both by land and sea, in which the Americans have been victorious over the British, are fought over again in the newspapers; and if one were to judge from the tone of the public mind, war would appear inevitable. Amidst this excitement, however, a few individuals of advanced age and experience may be met with, who, in private conversation, strongly deprecate hostilities; but they regard the popular current of opinion as too strong to be at present stemmed with success.

The opinion is generally entertained in Britain that the Americans are so intensely devoted to gain, and so averse to taxation, that they are not a warlike nation; but my conviction is different. The history of their country, which, in one form or another, constitutes the staple of their instruction at school, records heart-stirring adventures of their ancestors in their contests with the Indians, and afterwards many successful battles in the cause of freedom, when they fought for their own independence. Next comes the war with Britain in 1813, in which the existing generation boasts of many victories. All these achievements are described in the most fervid language, and every battle in which the Americans were victorious, is illustrated by engravings or cuts and celebrated in songs. In the hotels, and in innumerable private houses, pictures representing their triumphs by sea and land adorn the walls: the panels of some of their stage-coaches are ornamented with representations of their frigates capturing their British antagonists; in short, in the United States, the mind of each generation is rendered familiar with tales of war, and excited by their stirring influence from the first dawn of reason till manhood. To these causes of martial incitements, may be added, as by no means ineffective, the Fourth of July orations, and those at militia musters.

Nor are these seeds sown on a barren soil to judge what the worth or meaning of such men might have been. That there could be any faith or truth in the life of a man, was what these poor Rochesters, and the age they ushered in, had forgotten. Puritanism was hung on gibbets, like the bones of the leading Puritans. Its work nevertheless went on accomplishing itself. All true work of a man, hang the author of it on what gibbet you like, must and will accomplish itself. We have our Habeas Corpus, our free Representation of the People; acknowledgment, wide as the world, that all men are, or else must, shall, and will become, what we call free men; men with their life grounded on reality and justice, not on tradition, which has become unjust and a chimera! This in part, and much besides this, was the work of the Puritans.

And, indeed, as these things became gradually manifest, the character of the Puritans began to clear itself. Their memories were, one after another, taken down from the gibbet; nay, a certain portion of them are now, in these days, as good as canonised. Eliot, Hampden, Pym, nay, Ludlow, Hutcheson, Vane himself, are admitted to be a kind of Heroes; political Conscript Fathers, to whom in no small degree we owe what makes us a free England: it would not be safe for anybody to designate these men as wicked. Few Puritans of note but find their apologists some where, and have a certain reverence paid them by earnest men. One Puritan, I think, and almost he alone, our poor Cromwell, seems to hang yet on the gibbet, and find no hearty apologist any where. Him neither saint nor sinner will acquit of great wickedness. A man of ability, infinite talent, courage, and so forth: but he betrayed the cause! Selfish ambition, dishonesty, duplicity; a fierce, coarse, hypocritical Tartuffe; turning all that noble struggle for constitutional liberty into a sorry farce played for his own benefit: this, and worse, is the character they give of Cromwell. And then there come contrasts with Washington and others; above all, with these noble Pym and Hampdens, whose noble work he stole for himself, and ruined into a futility and deformity.

This view of Cromwell seems to me the not unnatural product of a century like the eighteenth. As we said of the Valet, so of the Sceptic: he does not know a Hero when he sees him! The Valet expected purple mantles, gilt sceptres, body-guards, and flourishes of trumpets: the Sceptic of the eighteenth century looks for regulated respectable formulas, "principles," or what else he may call them; a style of speech and conduct which has got to seem "respectable," which can plead for itself in a handsome articulate manner, and gain the suffrages of an enlightened sceptical eighteenth century! It is, at bottom, the same thing that both the Valet and he expect: the garnitures of some acknowledged royalty, which then they will acknowledge! The King coming to them in the rugged uniformistic state, shall be no King.

For my own share, far be it from me to say or insinuate a word of disparagement against such characters as Hampden, Eliot, Pym; whom I believe to have been right worthy and useful men. I have read diligently what books and documents about them I could come at; with the honestest wish to admire, to love, and worship them like Heroes; but I am sorry to say, if the real truth must be told, with very indifferent success! At bottom, I found that it would not do. They are very noble men these; step along in their stately way, with their measured enphisms, philosophies, parliamentary eloquences, ship-moneys, Monarchies of Man; a most constitutional, unblameable, dignified set of men. But the heart remains cold before them; the fancy alone endeavours to get up some worship of them.

What man's heart does, in reality, break forth into any fire of brotherly love for these men? They are become dreadfully dull men! One breaks down often enough in the constitutional eloquence of the admirable Pym, with his "seemingly and lastly." You find that it may be the admirablest thing in the world, but that it is heavy—heavy as lead, barren as brick clay; that, in a word, for you there is little or nothing now surviving there! One leaves all these nobilities standing in their niches of honour: the rugged outcast Cromwell, he is the man of them all in whom one still finds human stuff. The great savage Baresark: he could write no euphuistic Monarchy of Man; did not speak, did not work with glib regularity; had no straight story to tell for himself any where. But he stood bare, not cased in euphuistic coat of mail: he grappled like a giant, face to face, heart to heart, with the naked truth of things! That, after all, is the sort of man for one. I plead guilty to valuing such a man beyond all other sorts of men. Smooth-shaven respectabilities not a few one finds, that are not good for much. Small thanks to a man for keeping his hands clean, who would not touch the work but with gloves on!

Neither, on the whole, does this constitutional tolerance of the eighteenth century, for the other happier Puritans, seem to be a very great matter. One might say, it is but a piece of Formalism and Scepticism like the rest. They tell us, It was a sorrowful thing to consider that the foundation of our English Liberty should have been laid by "Superstition." These Puritans came forward with Calvinistic incredible Creeds, Anti-Laudisms, Westminster Confessions; demanding, chiefly of all, that they should have liberty to worship in their own way. Liberty to tax themselves: that was the thing they should have demanded! It was Superstition, Fanaticism, disgraceful ignorance of Constitutional Philosophy to insist on the other thing!—Liberty to tax oneself! Not to pay out money from your pocket except on reason shown! No century, I think, but a rather barren one, would have fixed on that as the first right of man! I should say on the contrary, A just man will generally have better cause than money in what shape soever, before deciding to revolt against his government. Ours is a most confused world; in which a good man will be thankful to see any kind of government maintain itself in a not insupportable manner: and here in England, to this hour, if he is not ready to pay a great many taxes which he can see very small reason in, it will not go well with him, I think! He must try some other climate than this. Tax-gatherer! Money! He will say: "Take my money, since you can, and it is so desirable to you; take it—and take yourself away with it; leave me alone to my work here. I am still here; can still work, after all the money you have taken from me!" But if they come to him, and say, "Acknowledge a lie; pretend to say you are worshipping God, when you are not doing it: believe not the thing that you find true, but the thing that I find, or pretend to find true!" He will answer: "No; by God's help, no! You may take my purse; but I cannot have my moral self annihilated. The cash is any highwayman's who might meet me with a loaded pistol: but the self is mine, and God my Maker's; it is not yours; and I will resist you to the death, and revolt against you, and, on the whole, front all manner of extremities, accusations, and confusions, in defence of that!"

Really, it seems to me the one reason which could justify revolting, this of the Puritans. It has been the soul of all just revolts among men. Not hunger alone produced even the French Revolution; no, but the feeling of the insupportable all-pervading falsehood which had now embodied itself in hunger, in universal material scarcity and nonentity, and thereby become indisputably false in the eyes of all! We will leave the eighteenth century with its "liberty to tax itself." We will not astonish ourselves that the meaning of such men as the Puritans remained dim to it. To men who believe in no reality at all, how shall a real human soul, the intensest of all realities, as it were, the voice of this world's Maker still speaking to us, be intelligible? What it cannot reduce into constitutional doctrines relating to "taxing," or other the like material interest, gross, palpable to the sense, such a century will needs reject as an amorphous heap of rubbish. Hampdens, Pym, and Ship-money, will be the theme of much constitutional eloquence, striving to be fervid; which will glitter, if not as fire does, then as ice does: and the irreducible Cromwell will remain a chaotic mass of "madness," "hypocrisy," and much else.

From of old, I will confess, this theory of Cromwell's falsity has been incredible to me. Nay, I cannot believe the like, of any Great Man whatever. Multitudes of Great Men figure in history as false, selfish men; but if we will consider it, they are but figures for us, unintelligible shadows: we do not see into them as men that could have existed at all. A superficial unbelieving generation only, with no eye but for the surfaces and semblances of things, could form such notions of Great Men. Can a great soul be possible without a conscience in it, the essence of all real souls, great or small? No, we cannot figure Cromwell as a falsity and fatuity; the longer I study him and his career, I believe this the less. Why should we? There is no evidence of it. Is it not strange that, after all the mountains of calumny this man has been subject to, after being represented as the very prince of liars, who never, or hardly ever, spoke truth, but always some cunning counterfeit of truth, there should not yet have been one falsehood brought clearly home to him? A prince of liars, and no lie spoken by him. Not one that I could yet get sight of. It is like Pocccke asking Grotius, Where is your proof of Mahomet's Pigeon? No proof! Let us all leave these calumnious chimeras, as chimeras ought to be left. They are not the portraits of the man; they are distracted phantasms of him, the joint product of hatred and darkness.

(To be continued.)

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

Sculpture is the noblest, but the most limited of the fine arts. It produces the fewest, but the greatest effects; it approaches nearest to nature, and yet can present little besides models of her living forms, and those principally in repose. Yet, poetry is a sort of sculpture, in which the art flourishes, not in marble or brass, but in that which outlasts both—in letters, which the fingers of a child may write or blot, but which, once written, time himself may not be able to obliterate; and in sounds which are but passing breath, yet, being once uttered, by possibility may never cease to be repeated. Sculpture to the eye, in palpable materials, is of necessity confined to a few forms, aspects and attitudes. The poet's images are living, breathing, moving creatures; they stand, walk, run, fly, speak, love, fight, fall, labour, suffer, die—in a word, they are men of like passions with ourselves, undergoing all the changes of actual existence, and presenting to the mind of the reader, solitary figures, or complicated groups, more easily retained, (for words are better recollected than shapen substances,) and infinitely more diversified than the chisel could hew out of all the rocks under the sun. Nor is this a fanciful or metaphorical illustration of the pre-eminence which I claim for the art I am advocating. In proof of it, I appeal at once to works of the eldest and greatest poets of every country. In Homer, Dante, and Chaucer, for example, it is exceedingly curious to remark with what scrupulous care and minuteness, personal appearance, stature, bulk, complexion, age, and other incidents, are exhibited, for the purpose of giving life and reality to the scenes and actions in which their characters are engaged. All these are bodied forth to the eye through the mind, as sculpture addresses the mind through the eye.

In sculpture, nothing is less impressive than the allegorical personages that haunt cenotaphs, and crowd cathedral walls; for, however admirably wrought, they awaken not the slightest emotion, whether they weep, or rage, or frown, or smile. In poetry, likewise, expanded allegories are the least effective of all the means by which terror, wonder, pity, delight, or anger are attempted to be excited; yet with single figures frequently, and with small groups occasionally, under the guise of metaphors and similes, poetry of every kind peopled more splendidly, beautifully, and awfully than was Grecian Olympus with gods and heroes, the ocean with nymphs and nereids, and Tartarus with furies, spectres, and inexorable judges. Two or three brief specimens may decide the superiority of poetry over sculpture. How could the image of FEAR which "to and fro did fly," be realised in marble as it has been by Spenser in rhyme? Collins' odes are galleries of poetical statuary, which no art could give to the sight, though perfectly made out in the sensorium of the brain.

"Danger, whose limbs of giant mould,
What mortal eye could fix'd behold?
Who stalks his round, a hideous form,
Howling amid the midnight storm,
Or throws him on the ridgy steep
Of some loose hanging rock to sleep."

What sculptor's hand could arrest this monster, and place him in one attitude, which should suggest ALL the ideas expressed in those wonderful lines?—his "limbs of giant mould,"—his stalking, howling, casting himself prone, and falling asleep;—with the accompaniments of the "midnight storm," "the ridgy steep," "the loose hanging rock;" and above all, (perhaps,) the mortal "eye" vainly attempting to fix itself upon this "hideous form?" In the sequel of the same ode we meet with—— "the ravening brood of Fate,

That LAP the blood of Sorrow."

The artist might fearfully represent wolves or wild dogs lapping the blood of a slain victim; but it would require the commentary of the passage itself to make the spectator understand that by the former were meant "the ravening brood of Fate," that follow in the rear of "Vengeance,"—"the fiends," that, near allied to "Danger" aforementioned, "o'er Nature's wounds and wrecks preside;" and that their prey was the personification of "Sorrow." Yet the poet, in the context, does all this as triumphantly as though he could give bodily sight to the mental eye, by which they are discerned through the magic medium of his verse.

Let us bring—not into gladiatorial conflict, but into honourable competition, where neither can suffer disparagement—one of the masterpieces of ancient sculpture, and two stanzas from "Childe Harold," in which that very statue is turned into verse, which seems almost to make it visible:—

THE DYING GLADIATOR.

"I see before me the Gladiator lie;
He leans upon his hand; his manly brow
Consents to death, but conquers agony;
And his droop'd head sinks gradually low;
And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow
From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
Like the first of a thunder-shower; and now
The arena swims around him—he is gone,
Ere ceased the inhuman shout that hailed the wretch who won."

Now, all this sculpture has embodied in perpetual marble, and every association touched upon in the description might spring up in a well instructed mind, while contemplating the insulated figure which personifies the expiring champion. Painting might take up the same subject, and represent the amphitheatre thronged to the height with ferocious faces, all bent upon the exulting conqueror and his prostrate antagonist—a thousand for one of them sympathising rather with the transport of the former than the agony of the latter. Here, then, sculpture and painting have reached their climax; neither of them can give the actual thoughts of the personages whom they exhibit so palpably to the outward sense, that the character of those thoughts cannot be mistaken. Poetry goes further than both; and when one of the sisters had laid down her chisel, the other her pencil, she continues the strain; wherein, having already sung what each has pictured, she thus reveals that secret of the sufferer's broken heart, which neither of them could intimate by any visible sign. But we must return to the swoon of the dying man:—

"The arena swims around him—he is gone,
Ere ceased the inhuman shouts that hail'd the wretch
who won.

"He HEARD IT, and he HEEDED NOT—his eyes
Were with his heart, and that was far away;

He reck'd not of the life he lost, nor prize,
—But, where his rude hut by the Danube lay,
There were his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother:—he, their sire,
Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday,
All this gush'd with his blood." * * *

Myriads of eyes had gazed upon that statue;—through myriads of minds all the images and ideas connected with the combat and the fall, the spectators and the scene, had passed in the presence of that unconscious marble which has given immortality to the pangs of death; but not a soul among all the beholders through eighteen centuries—not one had ever thought of "the rude hut," the "Dacian mother," the "young barbarians." At length came the poet of passion; and, looking upon "The Dying Gladiator" (less as what it was than what it represented,) turned the marble into man, and endowed it with human affections; then, away over the Apennines and over the Alps, away on the wings of irrepressible sympathy, flew his spirit to the banks of the Danube, where, "with his heart," were the "eyes" of the victim, under the night-fall of death; for "there were his young barbarians all at play, and there their Dacian mother." This is nature; this is truth. While the conflict continued, the combatant thought of himself only; he aimed at nothing but victory: when life and this were lost, his last thoughts, his sole thoughts, would turn to his wife and little children.

NEW BOOKS.

The Episcopal Manual: A Summary Explanation of the Doctrines, Discipline, and Worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the United States of America. By the late Rev. William H. Wilmer, D. D. Philadelphia, R. S. H. George, 1841.

It is unnecessary to go into an examination of a work so well known and so highly appreciated by that class of Christians for whom it is intended as the "Episcopal Manual." It is sufficient to remark that this is a new and improved edition, revised and adapted to the present state of the church; and that there are considerable additions and emendations. The book, like the other publications of Mr. George, is very beautifully got up, the paper, print, and binding being all elegant and tasteful.

Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries. By Henry Hallam, F. R. A. S. New York, Harper & Brothers, 1841.

The researches made by Mr. Hallam in preparing his "Constitutional History," and his "History of the Middle Ages," brought under his review the richest and most ample materials for the work before us. Of these he has availed himself, to produce one of those complete and admirable histories which, we are happy to observe, are now quietly taking the place of the lighter and less profitable reading hitherto so much in vogue with the public. Literary history, marking as it does the progress of the human intellect from age to age, forms a most interesting and useful study. The inquiries to which it naturally leads the reader, serve to shed light on every other branch of liberal knowledge, and to give a refined and elegant taste. No work hitherto published in this country has furnished so important an addition to literary history as this. Its popularity will undoubtedly lead to the publication of many others in the same department.

A Week in Wall Street. By One who knows New York. Published by the booksellers, 1841.

This is a terribly bitter satire upon stock jobbers, bankers, brokers, money changers, speculators, et id omne genus. It is written with considerable powers of wit and sarcasm; and the author dashes away, right and left, without considering how important it is to spare the feelings of "gentlemen," who, in fleeing the public by thousands and millions, have only followed the fashion. We dare say that the delicacy of the satirist in scoring rich and "respectable" people in the way he does, will excite more public indignation than the begging of thousands of widows and orphans by a little fancy speculation.

The Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes. Containing Evidence of their Identity, an Account of their Manners, Customs and Ceremonies, together with Sketches of Travel in Ancient Assyria, Armenia, Medina and Mesopotamia, and Illustrations of Scripture Prophecy. By Ashbel Grant, M. D. New York, Harper & Brothers, 1841.

This book belongs to the same class with the famous "Incidents of Travel" of Mr. Stephens. The author's design is to prove the identity of the Nestorian Christians, settled in Western Asia, with the lost tribes of Israel. This theory appears to have been forced upon his mind by the evidences presented to his observation, on a personal visit to the country, in the character of a missionary physician.

The work is written in an earnest, but very manly and unambitious style, and will attract a great deal of attention. We should not be surprised if it should rival "Incidents of Travel" in popularity.

Powhatan: A Metrical Romance, in Seven Cantos. By Seba Smith. New York, Harper & Brothers, 1841.

Any attempt to consecrate the illustrious characters and events connected with American history, either by poetry, painting or romance, we always feel bound to encourage with its full meed of applause. It is with much gratification, therefore, that we witness so successful an effort as the one before us. The poem is written in an easy flowing verse, in a style greatly enriched with imagery and melodious numbers; and the story is carried forward with a rapidity and distinctness quite charming to those who, like us, are averse to the usual romarole and circumbendibus manner adopted by most of our very modern poets. If any poetry can become popular in such an unpropitious age as our own, it must be precisely that which contains the same elements of popularity which we recognise in "Powhatan," viz.: a national subject, beautiful images, melodious numbers, and a lively, animated narrative. The simplicity of language throughout, reminds one of the Scandinavian Eddas or those Spanish chronicles which record the mighty doings of "Roy Diaz, the Champion of Bivar." Such verses commend themselves to the affections of the people in any country, at any age, learned or unlearned, barbarous or refined.

DIARIES—MORAL, HISTORICAL, AND CRITICAL.

(Concluded.)

There is a curious passage in a letter of Sir Thomas Bodley, recommending to Sir Francis Bacon, then a young man on his travels, the mode by which he should make his life "profitable to his country and his friends." His expressions are remarkable. "Let all these riches be treasured up, not only in your memory, where time may lessen your stock, but rather in good writings and books of account, which will keep them safe for your use hereafter." By these good writings and books of account, he describes the diaries of a student and an observer; these "good writings" will preserve what wear out in the memory, and these "books of account" render to a man an account of himself to himself.

It was this solitary reflection and industry which assuredly contributed so largely to form the gigantic minds of the Seldons, the Camdens, the Cokes, and others of that vigorous age of genius. When Coke fell into disgrace, and retired into private life, the discarded statesman did not pule himself into a lethargy, but on the contrary seemed almost to rejoice that an opportunity was at length afforded him of indulging in studies more congenial to his feelings. Then he found leisure not only to revise his former writings, which were thirty volumes written with his own hand, but what most pleased him, he was enabled to write a manual, which he called Vade Mecum, and which contained a retrospective view of his life, since he noted in that volume the most remarkable occurrences which had happened to him. It is not probable that such a MS. could have been destroyed but by accident; and it might, perhaps, yet be recovered.

"The interest of the public was the business of Camden's life," observes Bishop Gibson; and, indeed, this was the character of the men of that age. Camden kept a diary of all occurrences in the reign of James I.; not that at his advanced age, and with his infirm health, he could ever imagine that he should make use of these materials: but he did this, inspired by the love of truth, and of that labour which delights in preparing its materials for posterity. Bishop Gibson has made an important observation on the nature of such a diary, which cannot be too often repeated to those who have the opportunities of forming one; and for them I transcribe it. "Were this practised by persons of learning and curiosity, who have the opportunities of seeing into the public affairs of a kingdom, the short hints and strictures of this kind would often set things in a truer light than regular histories."

A student of this class was Sir Symonds D'Ewes, an independent country gentleman, to whose zeal we owe the valuable journals of parliament in Elizabeth's reign, and who has left in manuscript a voluminous diary, from which may be drawn some curious matters. In the preface to his journals, he has presented a noble picture of his literary reveries, and the intended productions of his pen. They will animate the youthful student, and show the active genius of the gentlemen of that day; the present diarist observes, "Having now finished these volumes, I have already entered upon other and greater labours, conceiving myself not to be born for myself alone."

"Qui vivat sibi solus, homo nequit esse beatus, Malo mori, nam sic vivere nolo mihi."

He then gives a list of his intended historical works, and adds, "These I have proposed to myself to labour in, besides diverse others, smaller works: like him that shoots at the sun, not in hopes to reach it, but to shoot as high as possibly his strength, art, or skill, will permit. So, though I know it impossible to finish all these during my short and uncertain life, having already entered into the thirtieth year of my age, and having many unavoidable cares of an estate and family, yet if I can finish a little in each kind, it may hereafter stir up some able judges to add an end to the whole:

"Sic mihi contingat vivere, sicque mori."

Richard Baxter, whose facility and diligence, it is said, produced one hundred and forty-five distinct works, wrote, he himself says, "in the crowd of all my other employments." Assuredly the one which may excite astonishment is his voluminous auto-biography, forming a folio of more than seven hundred closely-printed pages; a history which takes a considerable compass, from 1615 to 1648; whose writer pries into the very seed of events, and whose personal knowledge of the leading actors of his times throws a perpetual interest over his lengthened pages. Yet this was not written with a view of publication by himself; he still continued this work, till time and strength wore out the hand that could no longer hold the pen, and left it to the judgment of others, whether it should be given to the world.

These were private persons. It may excite our surprise to discover that our statesmen, and others engaged in active public life, occupied themselves with the same habitual attention to what was passing around them in the form of diaries, or their own memoirs, or in forming collections for future times, with no possible view but for posthumous utility. They seem to have been inspired by the most genuine passion of patriotism, and an awful love of posterity. What motive less powerful could induce many noblemen and gentlemen to transcribe volumes; to transmit to posterity authentic narratives, which would not even admit of cotemporary notice; either because the facts were then well known to all, or of so secret a nature as to render them dangerous to be communicated to their own times. They sought neither fame nor interest; for many collections of this nature have come down to us without even the names of the scribes, which have been usually discovered by accidental circumstances. It may be said, that this toil was the pleasure of idle men:—the idlers then were of a distinct race from our own. There is scarcely a person of reputation among them, who has not left such laborious records of himself. I intend drawing up a list of such diaries and memoirs; which derive their importance from the diarists themselves. Even the women of this time partook of the same thoughtful dispositions. It appears that the Duchess of York, wife of James II. and the daughter of Clarendon, drew up a narrative of his life: the celebrated Duchess of Newcastle has formed a dignified biography of her husband: Lady Fanshaws's Memoirs are partially known by some curious extracts; and recently Mrs. Hutchinson's Memoirs of her Colonel delighted every curious reader.

The habit of laborious studies, and a zealous attention to the history of his own times, produced the Register and Chronicle of Bishop Kennett, "containing matters of fact, delivered in the words of the most authentic papers and records, all daily entered and commented on;" it includes an account of all pamphlets as they appeared. This history, more valuable to us than to his own cotemporaries, occupied two large folios, of which only one has been printed; a zealous labour, which could only have been carried on from a motive of pure patriotism. It is, however, but a small part of the diligence of the bishop, since his own manuscripts form a small library of themselves.

The malignant vengeance of Prynne in exposing the diary of Laud to the public eye, lost all its purpose, for nothing appeared more favourable to Laud than this exposition of his private diary. We forget the harshness in the personal manners of Laud himself, and sympathise even with his errors, when we turn over the simple leaves of this diary, which obviously was not intended for any purpose but for his own private eye and collected meditations. There his whole heart is laid open; his errors are not concealed, the purity of his intentions is established. Laud, who had too haughtily blended the prime minister with the archbishop, still, from conscientious motives, in the hurry of public duties, and in the pomp of public honours, could steal aside into solitude, to account to God and himself for every day, and "the evil thereof."

The diary of Henry, Earl of Clarendon, who inherited the industry of his father, has partly escaped destruction; it presents us with a picture of the manners of the age; from whence, says Bishop Douglas, we may learn that at the close of the last century, a man of the first quality made it his constant practice to pass his time without shaking his arm at a gaming table, associating with jockies at Newmarket, or murdering time by a constant round of giddy dissipation, if not of criminal indulgence. Diaries were not uncommon in the last age: Lord Anglesey, who made so great a figure in the reign of Charles II. left one behind him; and one said to have been written by the Duke of Shrewsbury still exists.

But the most admirable example is Lord Clarendon's History of his own "Life," or rather of the court, and every event and person passing before him. In this moving scene he copies nature with freedom, and has exquisitely touched the individual character. There that great statesman opens the most concealed transactions, and traces the views of the most opposite dispositions; and though engaged, when in exile, in furthering the royal intercourse with the loyalists, and when, on the restoration, conducting the difficult affairs of a great nation, a careless monarch, and a dissipated court, yet besides his immortal history of the civil wars, "the chancellor of human nature" passed his life in habitual reflection, and his pen in daily employment. Such was the admirable industry of our later ancestors; their diaries and their memoirs are its monuments!

James II. is an illustrious instance of the admirable industry of our ancestors. With his own hand this prince wrote down the chief occurrences of his times, and often his instant reflections and conjectures. Perhaps no sovereign prince, said Macpherson, has been known to have left behind him better materials for history. We at length possess a considerable portion of his diary, which is that of a man of business and of honest intentions, containing many remarkable facts which had otherwise escaped from our historians.

The literary man has formed diaries purely of his studies, and the practice may be called journalising the mind, in a summary of studies, and a register of loose hints and sbozzos, that sometimes happily occur; and like Ringelbergius, that enthusiast for study, whose animated exhortations to young students have been aptly compared to the sound of a trumpet in the field of battle, marked down every night, before going to sleep, what had been done during the studious day. Of this class of diaries, Gibbon has given us an illustrious model; and there is an unpublished quarto of the late Barré Robertis, a young student of genius, devoted to curious researches, which deserves to meet the public eye. I should like to see a little book published with this title, "Optimum delitiosum in quo objecta vel in actione, vel in lectione, vel in visione ad singulos dies Anni 1629 observata representantur." This writer was a German, who boldly published, for the course of one year, whatever he read or had seen every day in that year. As an experiment, if honestly performed, this might be curious to the philosophical observer; but to write down every thing, may end in something like nothing.

A great poetical cotemporary of our own country does not think that even DREAMS should pass away unnoted; and he calls this register, his Nocturnals. His dreams are assuredly poetical; as Laud's, who journalised his, seem to have been made up of the affairs of state and religion; the personages are his patrons, his enemies, and others; his dreams are scenical and dramatic. Works of this nature are not designed for the public eye; they are domestic annals, to be guarded in the little archives of a family; they are offerings cast before our Lares.

Pleasing, when youth is long expired, to trace
The forms our pencil or our pen design'd;
Such was our youthful air, and shape and face,
Such the soft image of our youthful mind.

From Carlyle's Lectures.

THE HERO AS KING.

CROMWELL, NAPOLEON, MODERN REVOLUTIONISM.

Looking at the man's life with our own eyes, it seems to me a very different hypothesis suggests itself. What little we know of his early obscure years, distorted as it has come down to us, does it not all betoken an earnest, hearty, sincere kind of man? His nervous melancholic temperament indicates rather a seriousness too deep for him. You remember that story of his having a vision of the Evil Spirit, predicting that he would be Sovereign of England, and so forth. In broad daylight, some huge white spectre, which he took to be the devil, with preternatural monitions of some sort, shows itself to him: the Royalists made immense babble about it; but apart from their speculations, we can suppose this story of the spectre to be true. Then there are afterwards those hypochondriacal visions; the doctor sent for; Oliver imagining that "the steeple of Huntingdon was about to tumble on him." Such an excitable deep-feeling nature, in that rugged stubborn bulk of his; in other words, a soul of such intensity, such sensibility, with all its strength!

The young Oliver is sent to study law; falls, for a little period, into some of the dissipations of youth; but speedily repents, abandons all this: not much above twenty, he is married, settled as an altogether grave and quiet man. He pays back what money he had won at gambling; he does not think any gain of that kind could be really his. It is very interesting, very natural, this "conversion," as they well name it; this awakening of a great true soul from the worldly slough, to see into the awful truth of things; to see that time and its shows all rested on eternity, and this poor earth of ours was the threshold either of heaven or hell! Oliver's life at Ely as a sober industrious farmer, is it not altogether as that of a true devout man? He has renounced the world and its ways; its prizes are not the thing that can enrich him. He tills the earth; he reads his Bible; daily assembles his servants round him to worship God. He comforts persecuted ministers, is fond of preachers; nay, can preach himself—exhorts his neighbours to be wise, to redeem the time. In all this, what "hypocrisy," "ambition," "cant," or other falsity? The man's hopes, I do believe, were fixed on the other higher world; his aim to get well thither by walking well through his humble course in this world. He courts no notice: what could notice here do for him? "Ever in his great Taskmaster's eye." It is striking, too, how he comes out once into public view; he, since no other is willing to come: in resistance to a public grievance. I mean, in the matter of the Bedford Fens. No one else will go to law with authority; therefore he will. That matter once settled, he returns back into obscurity, to his Bible and his plough. "Gain influence?"

His influence is the most legitimate; derived from personal knowledge of him, as a just, religious, reasonable, and determined man. In this way he has lived till past forty; old age is now in view of him, and the earnest portal of death and eternity;—it was at this point that he suddenly became "ambitious!" I do not interpret his parliamentary mission in that way!

His successes in parliament, his successes through the war, are honest successes of a brave man; who has more resolution in the heart of him, more light in the head of him, than any other man. His prayers to God; his spoken thanks to the God of Victory, who had preserved him safe, and carried him forward so far, through the furious clash of a world all set in conflict, through desperate-looking envelopments at Dunbar; through the death hail of so many battles; mercy after mercy; to the "crowning mercy" of Worcester Fight: all this is good and genuine for deep-hearted Calvinistic Cromwell. Only to vain unbelieving cavaliers, worshipping not God but their own "love-locks," frivolities, and formalities, living quite apart from contemplations of God, living without God in the world, need it seem hypocritical.

Nor will his participation in the king's death involve him in condemnation with us. It is a stern business killing of a king! But if you once go to war with him, it lies there; this and all else lies there. Once at war, you have made wager of battle with him: it is he to die, or else you. Reconciliation is problematic; may be possible, or, far more likely, is impossible. It is now pretty generally admitted that the parliament, having vanquished Charles First, had no way of making any tenable arrangement with him. The large Presbyterian party, apprehensive now of the Independents, were most anxious to do so; anxious, indeed, as for their own existence; but it could not be. The unhappy Charles, in those final Hampton Court negotiations, shows himself as a man fatally incapable of being dealt with. A man who, once for all, could not and would not understand—whose thought did not in any measure represent to him the real fact of the matter; nay, worse, whose word did not at all represent his thought. We may say this of him without cruelty, with deep pity rather: but it is true and undeniable. Forsaken there of all but the name of Kingship, he still, finding himself treated with outward respect as a King, fancied that he might play off party against party, and smuggle himself into his old power by deceiving both. Alas! they both discovered that he was deceiving them. A man whose word will not inform you at all what he means or will do, is not a man you can bargain with. You must get out of that man's way, or put him out of yours! The Presbyterians, in their despair, were still for believing Charles, though found false, unbelievable, again and again. Not so Cromwell: "For all our fighting," says he, "we are to have a little bit of paper!" No!—

In fact, every where we have to note the decisive practical eye of this man; how he drives towards the practical and practicable; has a genuine insight into what is fact. Such an intellect, I maintain, does not belong to a false man: the false man sees false shows, plausibilities, expediences: the true man is needed to discern even practical truth. Cromwell's advice about the Parliament's Army, early in the contest, how they were to dismiss their city-tapers, fimsy riotous persons, and choose substantial yeomen, whose heart was in the work, to be soldiers for them: this is advice by a man who saw. Fact answers, if you see into fact! Cromwell's Ironside were the embodiment of this insight of his; men fearing God; and without any other fear. No more conclusively genuine set of fighters ever trod the soil of England, or of any other land.

Neither will we blame greatly that word of Cromwell's to them; which was so blamed: "If the King should meet me in battle, I would kill the King." Why not? These words were spoken to men who stood as before a higher than kings. They had set more than their own lives on the cast. The parliament may call it, in official language, a fighting "for the King;" but we, for our share, cannot understand

The Americans inherit the cerebral organisation of the three British nations, in whom the organs of Combativeness, Destructiveness, Self-Esteem, and Firmness, the elements of pugnacity and warlike adventure, are largely developed. In them this endowment is accompanied by a restless activity of mind, which finds natural and agreeable vent in war, and by a degree of intelligence which renders them capable equally of individual enterprise and of combination in action. Add to all these the influence of extreme youth, and the belligerent spirit of this people is easily accounted for. In mentioning their extreme youth, I do not refer to their short national existence of only sixty-three years, since the 4th of July, 1776, but to the extraordinary proportion of young persons in their population. It is well known that the population of the United States doubles every twenty-five years by natural increase alone, and every twenty-three years when assisted by immigration; but I have not observed that any just appreciation has been made by travellers of the influence of this fact on the character of the people. Nearly three generations are on the field at the same time, and as nearly every male, on arriving at twenty-one years of age has a vote, the preponderating influence of the young on the national resolves is very striking. From attending their public political meetings, my conviction is, that the majority of their voters are under thirty-five or thirty-six years of age. Here, then, we have a people of naturally pugnacious dispositions, reared in the admiration of warlike deeds, imperfectly instructed in the principles on which the real greatness of nations is founded, possessed of much mental activity, impelled by all the fervour of youth, and unrestrained by experience. It would be matter of surprise if they were not predisposed to rush into a contest, especially with Britain, whom they still regard as their hereditary foe.

Fortunately, however, for the people, and for the interests of civilisation throughout the world, there are numerous and strong impediments to the gratification of their warlike propensities. Their actual pursuits are all pacific; they live in plenty, and suffer no grievances except those which flow from their own errors, and which they have the power to remove; they have no warlike neighbours to threaten their frontiers; and the constitutions of the general government, and of the several states, leave the executive power so feeble, that it can only add to its own embarrassments by engaging in hostilities. The American standing army consists of only 12,539 men of all arms and all ranks, while its corps of militia are altogether unadapted to aggressive warfare. The nation, therefore, has no force, except seven line-of-battle ships, twelve frigates, and twenty sloops of war (exclusive of those on the stocks,) with which to maintain a war of aggression. So thoroughly inefficient was the militia found to be in the last war, except as a defensive force, that the general government resorted to the expedient of engaging volunteers; and on the present occasion, congress has authorised the raising of 50,000 men on the same terms. Fifty thousand volunteers may not appear to be a very formidable host to those who do not know the American people; but it would probably be found to consist of tough materials. A proclamation for the enlistment of such a force, would call forth that number of young, ardent, enthusiastic men, with heads full of fancies about glory, and temperaments burning for the gratifications arising from enterprise and danger. A few months would suffice to confer on them the advantages of discipline, and they would then closely resemble the hosts of excited Frenchmen whom Napoleon led to the easy conquest of Italy and Germany. It is a blessing to the civilised world that so many impediments exist to this class of men attaining the ascendancy in the national councils.

March 3. Therm. 31°. The Universalists.—This day I heard the Rev. Mr. Thomas, a universalist minister, preach on the text "Charity suffereth long," &c. The inscription in front of the pulpit is "God is Love." He described one great difference between the character of God, as revealed in the New Testament, and that of the gods of the Greeks and Romans, to consist in the "Love" of the God of the Christians. The heathen deities were personifications of "power," much resembling the devil of some Christian sects ("in whose existence," said he, "we do not believe, regarding him as a mere phantom of the imagination.") The discourse was very able, well composed, and delivered from short notes. The congregation presented that respectable appearance in point of dress and deportment which characterises the American churches in general; but it was not so numerous as some others.

The universalists are stated, in the American Almanac, to have 653 congregations or churches, 317 ministers, and 600,000 people in the Union. They believe in universal salvation; but in applying this doctrine they differ among themselves. Dr. Chauncey, of Boston, who is regarded as a high authority among them, in his work on "The salvation of all men," lays it down as a rule that those individuals who in this life have been enabled, by the Son of God, to make great attainments in virtue, shall, in the next, enter on the enjoyment of happiness immediately after death; while the incorrigibly wicked in this world will be "awfully miserable" hereafter, not to continue so for ever, but that they may be convinced of their folly, and recovered to a virtuous frame of mind. Another class of universalists follow Mr. Rely, of England, and Mr. Murray, of the United States, in admitting "no punishment for sin but what Christ suffered; but speak of a punishment which is consequent upon sin, as darkness, distress, and misery, which they assert are ever attendant upon transgression. But, as to know the true God and Jesus Christ is life eternal, and as all shall know him, from the least to the greatest, that knowledge or belief will consequently dispel or save from all the darkness, distress, and fear, which are attendant upon guilt and unbelief, and, being perfectly holy, we shall consequently be perfectly and eternally happy."

I was informed by several individuals in different parts of the Union, that the universalists are making more progress among the common people than the unitarians; and that unitarianism, where it exists, attracts a larger proportion of the higher and better educated circles.

March 4. Ther. 21°. Morus multicaulis, American silk.—The Americans are at present labouring under an excitement about the cultivation of the mulberry tree, the rearing of silk-worms, and the manufacture of silk. The newspapers teem with advertisements, announcing the sale of morus multicaulis trees in innumerable quantities; and many persons are reported to have realised handsome fortunes by rearing and selling them. To-day I saw at Wilmington a waistcoat and pair of pantaloons made of American silk; and although the cultivators may be much further from success than they at present believe, it appears not improbable that, with their ingenuity and perseverance, they may ultimately succeed in adding silk to their other products.

Wilmington.—Lectures on Education.—I delivered my third lecture on education in the Lyceum at Wilmington this evening, which was attended by 170 persons of both sexes. Handsome resolutions approving of the lectures were passed and afterwards published.

At the close of the lecture, an old gentleman rose, and asked me whether there were not brains so deficient, that their owners had it not in their power to act according to the moral law? I had been told that, since my first lecture, there had been a grand debate in the Lyceum on the question whether phrenology leads to fatalism, and that this gentleman had opposed it, on the ground that it does lead to this result. This question was obviously calculated to furnish matter for more argument. In answer, I stated that, before one can judge of what any doctrine leads to, it is necessary to know the doctrine itself; that I had not lectured on Phrenology, but only on education, before the present audience, and, therefore, presumed that they were strangers to what Phrenology teaches; that in Philadelphia, after devoting twenty hours to the exposition of Phrenology, I had dedicated a large portion of one lecture to its connection with "moral responsibility;" and that, as I could not now recapitulate expositions given in these twenty hours, I hoped that the audience would excuse me for not entering on the results deducible from them. This was accepted as a sufficient reason for declining to answer the question.*

March 5. Ther. 18°. In going to Wilmington yesterday, and returning from it to-day, I observed a considerable number of lambs newly dropped in the fields, with their mothers, also numbers of cattle out of doors. There is scarcely a tinge of green to be discovered in the grass. These animals are fed on hay and the leaves of Indian corn, which are saved in harvest, and are said to make good fodder. Autumn-sown wheat is now visible, but it looks dark, small, and sickly. No field labour is going on, as the ground is deeply frozen.

March 8. Ther. 37°. The bad health of the American women.—In the February number of the Southern Literary Messenger, Dr. Harvey Lindsley, of Washington city, makes the following remarks on this subject. I copy his own words, because I believe them to represent the facts correctly, and also because a similar description, if given by a European visitor, would be more likely to give offence than when it proceeds from an American physician.

"The remark," says Dr. Lindsley, "has often been made by Europeans who have visited this country—and the melancholy truth has been confirmed by Americans who have traveled on the eastern continent—that American women suffer much more from ill health than those of other countries. My attention has for some time past been particularly directed to this subject; and I am convinced that the remark is undoubtedly true to an alarming extent, and that it is the duty of the medical profession to examine into its cause, and, if possible, to suggest and urge upon the public the appropriate remedies."

* In my work on Moral Philosophy, under the head of "Treatment of Criminals," I have discussed the question referred to in the text.

"Not only is the average health of our countrywomen much less robust than that enjoyed by corresponding classes in Europe, and particularly in Great Britain, but it is much more infirm than that of the other sex in our country;—I mean, after making due allowances for those diseases and afflictions peculiar to their situation and duties in society.

"With respect to their inferiority in point of vigour, strength, and robustness, to the women of England, as well as of the continent, I believe there is not one dissenting voice among those who have enjoyed the most ample opportunities for comparison, and whose attention has been attracted to the subject. The European has a much more florid and healthful complexion—a much more vigorous person—and is capable of enduring much more fatigue and exposure, and of performing much harder labour. The slender, and delicate, and fragile form—the pale, sallow, and waxen complexion—which are so common among us, are comparatively seldom seen abroad. The feats of pedestrianism, which are almost daily performed in England, even by ladies of rank and fortune, would appear almost incredible to our feeble and sedentary countrywomen. As an illustration of this remark, it is mentioned by a recent traveller, in his letters from England, that, while staying for a few days at the house of a friend in the interior of the country, it was proposed one morning that the family, including the ladies, should make a call on another friend, who lived about five miles distant. They accordingly started on foot, without any remark being made as to the mode of locomotion, as if it were an ordinary occurrence, and, on their way home, were so little fatigued as to be desirous of making a digression of some two or three miles, in order to exhibit some picturesque view, which they thought might be interesting to their guest, as a stranger. Such a pedestrian excursion by an American woman would be an event to be talked of for life!

"That the females of our country are likewise much greater sufferers from ill health than our sex, is a fact which the daily observation of medical men has abundant opportunity of confirming, and a class of diseases, from which they suffer most, are precisely those which we would suppose would be produced by the peculiar causes operating upon them. They are derangements of the digestive and nervous apparatus. Every physician of much experience must have been struck with the fearful extent and obstinate nature of these affections—always difficult to remedy, and frequently even to alleviate; and they seem confined almost exclusively to females and men of sedentary habits. They are always productive of great and protracted suffering."

The American ladies generally ascribe their maladies to the very variable climate of their country. This may have some influence; but their own habits appear to me to contribute much more to their sufferings. They rarely walk abroad for the sake of fresh air and exercise. In general, they live and sleep in ill-aired apartments. Their duties press constantly on their minds, and they do not give sufficient effect to the maxim, that cheerful amusement and variety of occupation are greatly conducive to health. They do not properly regulate their diet; pies, pastry, and animal food, are consumed in quantities too abundant for a sedentary life; and baths and ablutions are too rarely used. Almost every family house in Philadelphia, built within these fifteen years, has a bath; but many of the ladies either do not use them, or, from some misapprehension of their influence, do not remain long enough in them to enjoy their full benefit. We met with a married lady in one of the American cities, whose florid and healthy colour attracted my attention; and, on my remarking it, she mentioned, that in all seasons she slept with her bed-room window partially open. We have followed the same practice since our arrival in the United States, and also walked abroad every day, however cold, and with great advantage to health.

It is not for want of knowledge that the American ladies suffer so much inconvenience from bad health. The works of Dr. John Bell, before mentioned, are highly practical, and in extensive circulation, as are also Dr. A. Combe's Physiology applied to Health and Education, and many similar books. Nay, these works are taught in female academies. But there is a wide interval between knowledge and practice. In one female seminary in which Dr. Combe's "Physiology" (with questions appended to the chapters) is used as a class-book, its rules appeared to me to be violated in the very act of teaching them; that is to say, the brains of the young ladies were strained by excessive tasks, and by undue excitement of the spirit of emulation. The distinction between instructing and training is still imperfectly understood, both in the United States and in Great Britain. These young ladies were taught to repeat the laws of health, but they were not trained to carry them into practice in their daily habits. Apparently, their leading objects in learning them were, to be able to show off their knowledge at the public examinations, to gain prizes, and to establish their reputation for superior talents. The pupils of a distinguished teacher in Edinburgh used to astonish the public by the great extent, accuracy, and readiness of their knowledge of history, exhibited at their annual examinations; but the admiration of their exploits diminished when the secret of his teaching was known. Questions were printed at the end of each chapter, and in reading the work he desired them to mark certain words in the text with a pencil; and added that these constituted the answers to the questions, which they must learn to repeat promptly whenever the questions were asked. They did so; but their knowledge was not an intellectual conception of the historical events, but resulted from a mere parrot-like exercise of verbal memory, and faded as rapidly as it was acquired. I fear that, in the United States, the laws of health are still taught in a somewhat similar manner.

One general defect in the mental condition of all of us is, that in ten instances we act from impulse and habit for once that we do so from reflection. This arises from imperfect training in youth. Our impulsive faculties, being early developed, and possessing great natural energy, are constantly liable to err; and to lead us into evil, when not controlled and directed by enlightened intellect. One object, therefore, in teaching the young, should be to communicate knowledge, and another to train the propensities and sentiments to submit to the control of the intellect. This last department of education is greatly neglected, except in the infant schools conducted on Mr. Wilderspin's principles. In the United States, training is needed above all things; for the public institutions of the country, in fostering a spirit of independence, encourage the young to rely on themselves; in other words, to act from the impulsive elements of their nature, much more than from reflection. Reflection, when founded on knowledge, produces habits of self-denial, self-restraint, and obedience. The want of this practical training and discipline is seen in the males, in the recklessness with which they dash into speculation and adventure, pursuing their leading impulses at all hazards; and in the females, in the pertinacity with which they adhere to practices which they know to be injurious to health, and in their deficiency of mental resolution to submit to the temporary sufferings which always accompany a change of evil habits.

If the conductors of the female seminaries would require their pupils to recapitulate, once a week, what they do in obedience to the laws of health, and train them for two or three years to the practice of these laws, they would form habits that would last during life, and thus render the knowledge which they communicate effectual.

March 9. Ther. 35°. Supremacy of the Law: The Grand Jury.—Judge Bouvier has just delivered an excellent charge to the Grand Jury. The following extracts represent faithfully the spirit in which the judges in the United States generally enforce the claims of the law on the people.

"Besides finding the bills which are prepared by the attorney general and sent to you, you have the right, and it is your duty, to present such offences and offenders as you may know of your own knowledge, or of which proof has been given to you. Sometimes grand juries present nuisances in classes, as gambling-houses, tippling-houses, and the like. This may be well enough, gentlemen, and doubtless such presentments have a good effect in some degree. But if such things are known to exist, it is much better to present the offender and the offence individually. In the generality of the charge, the heinousness of the crime is indistinctly felt or not perceived. One presentment of one such offence, and the name of the offender, followed by a conviction, would have more terror in it to such evil doers than a thousand such fruitless presentments.

"Our exertions to enforce obedience to the laws cannot be too great. The law must reign supreme, or anarchy have the sway. Justice, order, and right must be sustained, or rapine and murder take their place: we have no middle ground, and it is for us to say, whether our noble institutions, justly our pride, and the admiration of the world, are to be sacrificed to the spirit which has manifested itself in so many places, of disregarding the law, and of having recourse to brute force, to redress real or imaginary wrongs. We censure, very justly, those foreign travellers, who, after sharing our hospitality, return to their own country, and publish their views of American manners in such a way as to caricature rather than to paint them. Gentlemen, let us not give them any occasion or apparent justification for such slanders, by a disregard of the laws which we have ourselves made. Upon you depends whether the laws shall be properly enforced; use every exertion, then, to punish its violators; bring all who have been guilty to punishment, and particularly those who make it their business to ensnare others into crime.

"I regret to say, that, with all the exertions which our very vigilant mayors and the police magistrates in the districts make, still the laws are, in many respects, as a dead letter. The fault is not in the officers, for they do all in their power, but in the system, which is not sufficiently energetic to prevent the habitual commission of crime. The laws should not be placed on the statute book as a dead letter, to be brought into action only when accident may lead to detection, perhaps one of a thousand cases, but be constantly active, ready to apply a remedy to every evil felt by society. Who, that looks around, but must admit the laws relating to the sale of spirituous liquors are daily, hourly violated, not in one or two places only, but throughout the city and county of Philadelphia? And yet the mayor of the city and mayor of the northern liberties, and the police magistrates of the districts, have but little power, and less means, to break up these dens of iniquity. The same observations may be made in regard to gaming-houses and lottery-offices, which, though not so numerous, no doubt exist to a great extent, as is evident by the casual discovery occasionally made of some of them."

I have often heard the judges complain of the want of power in the law, and of the deficiency of the means for executing it; as evils which characterise their institutions. The remark of Aristotle in his Politics, that the great danger to democracies lies in the reluctance of the people to part with as much power as is necessary to restrain their own excesses, seems to be recognised by them as too applicable to this country.* Yet a democracy, with such institutions as those of the United States, can have no good grounds for withholding power from their judges and magistrates; because these officers are completely under the control of the people. The laws may be altered, and the judges and magistrates removed, at the will of the people; and it is the interest of all that order should be preserved and property protected. The judges, however, have a natural desire to increase the power of the law and of the magistrates, just as the clergy have to augment the influence of the church; and perhaps it is also a safe rule for them to depict, in strong colours, its defects and the weakness of its executive department, in order to induce the public to lend a vigorous support to both; but, on the whole, it appears to me that life, property, and social order, are fully more secure than a stranger, judging from the charges and conversations of some of the judges, would infer.

The Firemen.—I was amused to-day to see a troop of boys training themselves, in their play, to be future firemen. They had a miniature carriage of a fire-engine, named "Hero," with ropes attached to it, and one of their own number sat on it and represented the engine. They ran round Franklin Square, braying through a tin trumpet, and uttering many unearthly sounds, in excellent imitation of their seniors. The real firemen are all volunteers, and serve without pay; and it is thus that their numbers are recruited.

Mr. Espy's Theory of Storms.—This subject has excited much attention in Philadelphia, and the scientific men concur in expressing an opinion in favour of its essential truth. The following is a condensed abstract of Mr. Espy's principles:—

By ascertaining the dew-point, we discover the quantity of vapour which the air contains. Mr. Dalton, of Manchester, made this discovery. The following table exhibits the relation of the temperature to the quantity of vapour:—

Dew Point.	Quantity of vapour.
32°	1/8
52°	1/4
73°	3/8
80°	1/2

The equilibrium of the air may become disturbed by heat or moisture below. Ascending columns or currents will then be formed. As they ascend, they will come under less pressure, and consequently expand. This expansion will produce one degree and a quarter of cold for every hundred yards of ascent. The dew-point will fall only one quarter of a degree for every hundred yards. Cloud will begin to form when the air rises as many hundred yards as the dew-point is below the air in degree. When the vapour condenses, it will give out the latent caloric into the air. This will prevent the air from cooling more than half as much as it would do in its farther ascent. Thus, the higher the air rises, the warmer will it be when compared to the air outside of the cloud at the same height. For every degree that it is warmer, it will be 1/11 lighter than air at zero. Thus the barometer will fall under the cloud; the air will run in on all sides under the cloud, and upwards, with a velocity of 240 feet per second for a fall of one inch, and so on in proportion to the square root of the fall.

An application has been made to the legislature of Pennsylvania for a grant to defray the expense of an experiment, causing rain to fall by producing an ascending current of air by means of a great artificial fire. The petition was referred to a committee, and on 6th March, Mr. Smith, of Philadelphia, on their behalf, reported in favour of granting Mr. Espy "a sum equal to the expenses of making the experiment, if he shall cause it to rain over a territory of 1000 square miles; the sum of $25,000 if he shall cause it to rain copiously over a territory of 5000 square miles; and the sum of $50,000 if he shall cause it to rain copiously over a territory of 10,000 square miles, or in such quantities as shall keep the Ohio river navigable during the whole summer, from the city of Pittsburg to the Mississippi river; the larger sum in each case to exclude the smaller;" and the committee farther proposed, that the governor should be "authorised and required to appoint three impartial and competent persons to witness and judge of the said experiment, who shall, at the times and places appointed by the said James P. Espy, attend for that purpose; and upon such experiments being fully made and completed, the said persons shall certify to the governor the result thereof, and if the same shall be successful, the governor shall draw his warrant on the treasurer of the commonwealth in favour of the said James P. Espy, for such of the said sums as he shall be entitled to under this resolution."

The New York Evening Star objects to this report, because "the proposition savours of blasphemy!" Surely steamboats, which not only sail without the wind, but even against it, must be moving masses of "blasphemy" in the eyes of the editor of the Star.

Working-men's Grievances.—On the 7th of January last, the working men held a convention, and appointed a committee of twelve of their number to deliberate on their condition and affairs, and to report. The address of the committee "to the working men of the city and county of Philadelphia" has been published. In a country which enjoys an unlimited field for the profitable employment of its people; in which, consequently, labour is highly paid, and in which universal suffrage prevails, an exposition of the working-men's grievances may be regarded as a kind of psychological curiosity. The imagination is tasked to divine in what their sufferings can consist. Yet here is a manifesto which might almost literally be adopted by the Chartists of England, or the workmen of Lyons. "It is necessary," say the committee, "to restore the equilibrium to society which your indifference has permitted others to monopolise." "We cannot, must not, disguise the fact, that other portions of the community have arrayed themselves against your interests, and, while you stand single and alone, and oppose with naked truth their unhallowed schemes, you are only exhausting your strength in an unequal and profitless contest."—"The committee cheerfully assent that the interests of the whole people are identical under our republican form of institutions; but this equality or reciprocity of rights is no longer regarded—the great principles which aroused the latent energies of freemen" "are now lost in corporate interest, which controls nearly all the avenues to wealth, absorbs the whole attention of the legislature, while it leaves you, who are the majority, in a state of abject servitude, and the fruits of your toil to be enjoyed by those who have obtained special grants from the legislature to retain the product which you have produced. We also admit, that no system can be introduced which will free, perhaps, a majority of the people from manual labour; but we do insist that a better system than the present, which inflicts upon them any perpetual toil and eternal poverty, can be devised. What argument can be adduced why a more equal distribution of wealth should not be made? Be not alarmed at the announcement of an equal distribution of wealth, or rather the equal means of obtaining wealth. No surer index can be desired where overgrown wealth and luxury are enjoyed on one side, that squalid wretchedness and misery is the inevitable doom of the other; this is an unerring test, adapted to all ages and countries."

The reader probably expects the next sentence to contain a recommendation to spoil the rich, and divide their wealth among the poor; but the committee entertain other views. They proceed—"There is a natural innate repugnance to be found in us all of associating with those whom we consider not our equals in point of general intelligence—this should be the only distinction known in society. This feeling of superiority may be found in the higher walks of life as regards their own members." "Remember, intelligence is a passport everywhere—commanding respect where aught else has failed." "You are accused of wishing to level down society and appropriate to yourselves the proceeds of others' industry. Throw back the imputation with a vengeance, for you know that the mass are leveled almost below the common feelings of humanity, and your toil appropriated to fill other coffers."

"Do not retaliate." "You are for a system which will level up instead of down." "Fellow working-men! The leveling system we speak of is a system of education which shall teach every child in the commonwealth his duty and interest as a citizen and freeman; working-men are now allowed to take but half a drink at the rippling rill as it flows beneath their feet and—and this, too, as a public charity.

* Aristotle's words are these. Speaking of the establishment of that form of democracy in which the public business is performed by paid functionaries, he says, "Above all, demagogues must never cease to convince the people that, under their favourite democracy, they will be at liberty to live as they list; this will procure for them the assistance of the majority: for the greater part of mankind will always be better pleased to live licentiously, than to submit to the restraints of salutary discipline."—Politics, B. viii. Gillies's Transl. p. 469.

"We speak not of the hackneyed system of education which is now the order of the day—of schools where the same prejudices are taught, and the same partial influences exist, as are found out of doors—of high schools which are said to be founded to carry out more perfectly the system of common schools, where the children of affluent parents are taken from private schools and placed in the common schools, barely sufficient time to have them become members, that they may be taken into the high schools in preference to those who have prepared themselves in the primary institutions, simply because they are more proficient and advanced in their studies; but we speak of a democratic republican education, which regards all the children as equals, and provides food and clothing during the period they are receiving an education to fit them as members of society and component parts of a free government; so when they shall arrive at maturity, and are thrown upon the world and their own resources, they may start equal in the race for the accumulation of wealth, or in pursuit of the honours of the government. This is the leveling system we desire—the only equal distribution of wealth we ask.

"No system, fellow working-men, will tend so directly to a more equal distribution of wealth as an equal and perfect system of education.

"Knowledge is power; the committee, therefore, exhort all to bind up their resources, and let their exertions tend to one mighty and simultaneous effort for the accomplishment of this desired object."

"They recommend, first, The formation of trade societies and associations; secondly, The formation of united trade societies and associations; thirdly, The formation of a literary and scientific institute; fourthly, A joint-stock company for the erecting of a hall for the use of the united trade societies, associations, and institute. They add—"Let not the genius of our institutions, which is based upon the intelligence of the people, reproach you, or the award which posterity will accord to you, grate upon your consciences, as you turn a deaf ear to those imperative demands.

"Remember, fellow working-men, you have a responsible duty to perform, and unless you show a disposition to help yourselves, it will be difficult to make others believe your complaints are well grounded; and it may be a question, but one of immense magnitude, whether men, who have the power to redress their grievances, but will not apply it, deserve the sympathy or aid of a discerning public."

This document exhibits a striking combination of native talent, with deficiency in literary and philosophical education; and apparently both the composition and the scheme have emanated from a single mind. It is instructive, however, to observe the tendency of the human mind when left free, to appreciate knowledge and mental refinement. In the circumstances in which the working-men are placed in Pennsylvania, any other remedy for their grievances than the one recommended would have carried inherent absurdity in the face of it.

American Roads.—At this season, the roads are in their worst condition. A friend who has just come from Easton, fifty miles distant, in the stage, describes the road as composed of soft mud, nearly 18 inches deep, with alternate masses of unthawed clay and large stones. A gentleman who heard this description said, that he saw an Italian music-master, whom he named, who had the top of his head bruised. He asked him if he had met with an accident. "I have only had it bruised," said he, "by its being constantly knocked against the top of the stage coming from Pittsburgh." At the time when this was told, I thought it a facetious exaggeration; but within less than three months, I had the best reason for believing it to be literally true; for I had the crown of my own head severely beaten against the top of a stage coach in the western regions of the state of New York!

March 12. Therm. 33°. The Friends' Lunatic Asylum at Frankford.—We visited this institution, which contains sixty-six patients. The situation is favourable; and the house well adapted to the purpose, except that the apartments have no proper provision for ventilation. There are a garden and walks, and a circular railroad on which the patients move themselves in a car by turning a crank. But they decline to labour, and there is no moral force sufficient to induce them to give up their prejudices against it. They are not all Friends; but all belong to the middle classes of the community, and come chiefly from towns. These classes regard labour as mean, and the free institutions of America render compulsion inadmissible, even for a patient's good. I was told, that the average of insanity is higher among the Friends than among the general community. Two reasons were assigned for this fact; first, their doctrine of the working of the Holy Spirit, and the inward light, their narrow circle of interests, and limited education, act unfavourably on minds predisposed to disease; secondly, they intermarry extensively within close degrees of consanguinity. This institution belongs to the Orthodox Friends.

Education among the Society of Friends.—Many individuals among both classes of Friends in Philadelphia are highly educated and intelligent, and are ardent promoters of moral and intellectual improvement; but the mass is represented as considerably deficient in educational attainments; and some of them, of no mean weight in their society, oppose every advance in education as a dangerous innovation. The young Friends, however, of both sexes, are in the course of discovering their deficiencies, and encourage and support those among their seniors who advocate a more liberal course of study. I am informed that my lectures constitute a subject of anxiety to some of the Orthodox Friends, whose prejudices prevent them from hearing them. Those who do attend feel no alarm; but the absent regard these as misled, and are of opinion that they themselves, who know nothing whatever of the subject, are the best judges of its tendency. They have remonstrated with and prayed for some of my audience to induce them to withdraw, but without success. About one half of the present class is said to consist of Friends of both denominations.*

* The quiet and unostentatious manner in which the Friends carry out their plans for education, and the dread which their older and more experienced members entertain of the follies and vices, which are too often the concomitants of a collegiate course, have caused a general misapprehension, out of the Society, respecting their opinions and practice on the whole subject. It ought to be stated, in their favour, that the first grammar school in Philadelphia, was established by William Penn himself, and Animal Magnetism.—The following case was mentioned to me, separately, by at least half a dozen persons, some of them highly respectable physicians, and others ladies, who were present and saw the facts which they narrated. A young woman, a domestic servant, was severely afflicted by the toothache, but was of such a nervous and sensitive constitution, that she never could summon courage to have her tooth extracted in the usual way. Dr. Mitchell, with her own consent, had her magnetised, and she fell into a profound magnetic sleep. A dentist who was in attendance extracted the tooth, and one of my informants said that she gave no symptoms of sensation, but another told me that she contracted her brow. She had no consciousness of blood trickling from the wound, but the magnetiser desired her to spit it out, and she did so. He restored her to consciousness, and she had no knowledge of having lost the tooth, till her attention was drawn to the fact. She was again magnetised, and the dentist punched out other three stumps of old teeth without her once moving a muscle. About thirty ladies and gentlemen were present, many of them unbelievers in animal magnetism, and most of whom were satisfied that in this instance deception was impossible.

The Organ of Colouring.—This evening I met with a gentleman in whom the organ of colouring is very deficient, and whose powers of perceiving colours are equally feeble. He appreciates blue and green best, but often confounds even them. He has had the names inscribed on a number of colours, and when he wishes to find out the colour of any object, he places them beside it, and when it makes the same impression on his mind with one of them, he judges that it is of the colour inscribed on that piece. This is the way in which I understood his statement; but from his extreme deficiency in all conceptions about colours, his explanations were to me nearly unintelligible. He has no other defect in his sight.

March 14. Therm. 38°. War with England.—This subject continues to occupy almost exclusively the public attention. In my last lecplaced under the direction of a Quaker master: and that "The School Corporation," originated and maintained by the Friends, spends to the amount of twenty-five hundred dollars, annually, in the education of the youth who do not even belong to the Society. Part of the regular and official returns to the Monthly meetings, consist in a report of the number of children, and of their educational wants and facilities. One of the best selected libraries in the country, consisting of between three and four thousand volumes, is attached to the Arch street meeting-house, and is open to all the members of the Society. There is another, consisting of twelve hundred volumes, and a reading room connected with it, at the corner of Fourth street and Apple Tree alley.

The dissatisfaction of the Friends with our common colleges, as not furnishing what they believe to be adequate instruction, is not manifested either by sullen opposition or critical blame, but in their erection and maintenance of schools and academies in which the children of the Society have opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of belles lettres and practical science, in addition to the common elements of an English Education. It will be sufficient to mention, in proof of this assertion, the institution at Haverford, eight miles from Philadelphia, and that at West Town, twenty miles from the city.

As respects the literary zeal displayed by the adult members of the Society of Friends in Philadelphia, it is admitted by all, that they furnish a fair proportion of the auditory of public lecturers on scientific subjects and on sound literature.

are, on Combativeness and Destructiveness, I discussed the sources of war, and alluded to the recent extraordinary excitement of these organs in the American people, adding that it was a consolation to think that the excitement would not be responded to on the other side of the Atlantic. I proceeded to mention, that since the Reform Bill had become law, political power in Great Britain and Ireland was placed essentially in the hands of the middle classes of society; that they were moral, industrious, and reasonably intelligent; that, from experience of its horrors, as well as from motives of interest, philanthropy, and religion, they were averse to war; and that the disputed territory in Maine would appear to them such a worthless object compared with the evils of hostilities, that they would not echo the warlike defiance sent to them from the United States. After the lecture, a crowd of persons collected round me, and asked if this was really possible! They regarded John Bull as proud, grasping, pugnacious, and still so flushed with his continental victories, that he would receive menaces from no people on earth, and that they expected that the British nation would be roused into a flame equal to their own. The assurances that John Bull had now become older, wiser, and more virtuous than he once was, were received with delight, but not very generally credited. Events, however, verified my prediction in his favour.

It is edifying to observe how this people is acted on. Their leaders are far from participating in their excitement, but they dare not, in the first ebullition of public passion, decidedly oppose them. Mr. Van Buren's message was a rational and statesmanlike document; and I hear the most eminent men in public life daily deploring the headlong impetuosity of their youthful people, and say that they are watching the first moment when the masses may be successfully addressed by reason. There is a want of moral courage, however, in the leaders, which, although easily accounted for, is not the less to be lamented. The impression is nearly universal, that any man who should oppose the public sentiment when under strong excitement, would ruin his popularity, and terminate for ever his public life. The torrent of opinion appears to be so overwhelming, that no efforts of reason will suffice to stem it; and the leading men have no sufficient faith either in their own power, or in the rational elements of the public mind, to induce them to venture opposition. Their reliance even on the ultimate ascendancy of reason and virtue is too feeble to allow them fairly to risk their fortunes on the venture. This fact, of which I am convinced by numerous observations, indicates an humble estimate by the public characters of the influence of the moral and intellectual faculties over the mass of the voters. At the same time, neither the leading men nor the people do themselves justice. Party spirit runs so high, that if, at this moment, the wisest and the best men in the union, of one party in politics, should present the most forcible yet respectful appeal to the good sense of the people against war, their political opponents would instantly seize the opportunity to manufacture "political capital" out of it. They would pervert every sentence of the address, hurl denunciations of cowardice and want of patriotism against its authors, and offer the grossest adulation to the vanity of the nation. The people, having committed themselves against the appeal, would be withheld by pride from subsequently doing justice to its authors, who might struggle for years before they could recover that position in public estimation which they had forfeited solely by an act of genuine patriotism. The only mode of avoiding this evil would be for the leaders of both parties in equal numbers to join in the address; but they have too little confidence in each other to admit of such an act of magnanimity.

Among other stimulants to the national appetite for war, I hear in conversation, and see in the newspapers, the most exaggerated and absurd estimates of the evils which England must suffer from hostilities. The ruin of her manufactures, the loss of Canada and her West India Islands, the triumph of the Radicals and Chartists, and the bankruptcy of her treasury, are descanted on, with much complacency, as inevitable consequences of her provoking a contest with the United States. This is the counterpart of the equally absurd lucubrations in which English writers indulge about the consequences to the Americans of a war with Britain: The emancipation of their slaves, the devastation of their southwest territory, the ruin of their commerce and of their Atlantic cities, the dissolution of the union, universal bankruptcy and anarchy, and, finally, a military despotism, are the certain results with which they are threatened if they shall dare to provoke British wrath. This species of threatening and boasting reminds one of two ill-conditioned boys, who, assuming a combative attitude, indulge in reciprocal taunts and maledictions, but show no particular anxiety to begin the fight. War between Britain and the United States would be an act of insanity in both, and a disgrace to the civilisation of the nineteenth century; but even this boasting and daring each other to war shows a lingering barbarism in their minds, which it is their duty, as well as their interest, to eradicate as speedily as possible.

Political Economy.—Mr. Henry C. Carey, of Philadelphia, has published a valuable work on political economy; but I am informed that the subject is very little studied in the United States. As a branch of general education, it is nearly unknown, and ample evidence is afforded by the public press that most of the measures which should be regulated by sound economical principles are proposed, discussed, and adopted or rejected, on local, temporary, or private grounds, with the least possible reference to scientific views. In the United States the same outreries are raised from time to time against monopolies, and banks, and other institutions, which one might expect to hear in Austria or Naples, if the people of these countries were allowed to publish their sentiments; but one rarely meets with a public writer who treats of such subjects with a statesmanlike reference to the great principles which regulate the creation and distribution of wealth, and with a comprehensive regard to the interests of the whole union; and yet such views are much required by this nation. The Americans appear to me to be trying all manner of social experiments, guided only by their instinctive impulses. The union may be regarded as a vast field for the cultivation of the science of political economy by experiment. The Americans will probably solve some of the most momentous problems in economic science—that of paper currency, for example—by the mere exhaustion of errors. But this is a most expensive and painful method of studying a science. It resembles that of rushing into numerous litigations in order to gain a knowledge of law. It is certain that the prosperity of nations, as well as the motions of the planets, is regulated by positive laws, and that happiness is attained only in proportion as these are obeyed. This truth should be instilled as a first principle into every American child, and the development of it in its specific forms and applications should constitute an important branch of general instruction. The American people need above all things to be trained in the perception and belief that they have a Master; a Master who not only will call them to account hereafter, but who actually rules over them in this world, and regulates the ebbing and flowing of their wealth by fixed laws, without the possibility of their escaping from his sway. If the principles of political economy were presented in this form, they would be understood and appreciated.

The neglect of economic science, although to be regretted, is not surprising in this people. They are the genuine descendants of the English, who are characterized by a larger development of the organs of Individuality, Eventuality, and Comparison, than of Causality, giving a practical rather than a speculative tendency to the mind; their institutions render them bold and confident; and their natural position is surrounded by so many avenues to prosperity, that they have a better chance than most people to go right by intuitive sagacity: nevertheless their want of knowledge of scientific social principles exposes them to great evils.

The American constitution is not favourable to legislation on scientific principles. The power of congress, although extensive as to foreign relations, embraces comparatively few domestic interests. Each state, enjoying an independent sovereignty, is prone to pursue its own welfare, with little reference to that of the other states. At this time a vivid discussion is proceeding in the press, between New York and Philadelphia, whether an outlet shall be made from the Pennsylvania Canal at Black's Eddy, into the river Delaware, to enable the Lehigh coal, which now seeks the New York market, to get into the New York canal (the Delaware and Raritan) directly; or whether the coal shall be forced to proceed, as hitherto, to Bristol, thirty-four miles below Black's Eddy, there enter the Delaware, and reascend to the Eddy! The interest of New York is said to dictate the former plan, and that of Pennsylvania the latter. The legislature of Pennsylvania must decide the question; but there is reason to fear that its own apparent direct interest will have a greater influence over its decision than a regard to the general welfare of both states. I have no knowledge of the merits of this controversy, and cite the case merely in illustration of the impediments which the American institutions offer to the application of comprehensive principles of economical science.

The reader may possibly regard the statement made formerly, about the opinions entertained by well-educated American gentlemen, concerning British legislation on the church, tithes, entails, free trade, and similar topics, as inconsistent with the remarks now offered; but in the chapter referred to, I spoke of men of superior attainments, and with reference to questions irrevocably settled and confirmed by experience. At present I allude to the application of principles still undecided by experiment, and to the average mind of the country.

March 16. Ther. 41°. Ship Launch.—We were taken to-day by some kind friends to see the launch of the packet-ship "Thomas P. Cope," 800 tons burden. The ship went off in the most graceful style, amidst beautiful sunshine and a vast concourse of spectators. She glided so softly into the water that she did not perceptibly reel, and no perceptible surge was heaved up by her descent.

March 19. Ther. 57°. Advantages of Training.—In the lecture on education, forming part of my first course in Philadelphia, I explained the difference between instructing and training, and remarked that for the latter the field of social life is necessary. In illustration, I mentioned the great difference in command of temper between a body of lawyers and a body of divines when assembled to discuss their own affairs. In their profession lawyers are trained to oppose and to meet with opposition, without losing temper; while divines are treated with such general deference and courtesy, that they are very little accustomed to contradiction. The consequence is, that lawyers in general discuss their affairs without falling into heats of temper or making personal allusions; whereas the clergy, when assembled in their public courts, do not treat each other with that deference which they are accustomed to receive from the world; they meet as equals, espouse opposite opinions, and contradict each other like ordinary men. Their minds, however, being untrained to bear opposition, they lose their equanimity, become heated, fall into personalities, and exhibit extraordinary aberrations from that meekness of spirit which should characterise the Christian, whether clerical or lay. This description was drawn from observations made in my own country, but the latter part of it considerably amused my audience, the precise cause of which I never found out till to-day. I had, altogether unconsciously, described scenes which had recently occurred in the General Assembly of the Presbyterians in Philadelphia, when the ministers quarrelled and split, an event which had attracted great public attention. The utter unconsciousness, on my part, of the blows I was dealing, contrasted with their actual, although accidental force, excited the risible faculties of not a few of my auditors. The subject has been mentioned to me to-day in the course of a conversation about a cause now depending in the supreme court between these two sections of the Presbyterian Assembly, and which is exciting great and general interest.

Unitarianism in Philadelphia.—Dr. Friedlander, superintendent of the Asylum for the Blind, has died at the age of thirty-seven, deeply lamented, and the appointment of his successor is already engaging attention. A Unitarian left this institution nearly $200,000, and Unitarians have been among its most assiduous promoters. They do not object to Trinitarians being elected as directors, if they be good men; but the Trinitarians use their influence to oppose the election of a Unitarian. I have derived this information from a member of the latter sect; and, if it be correct, it shows that the Calvinists of this city are chargeable to some extent, with the spirit of popery in one of its worst forms, an unmitigated confidence in the infallible soundness of their own opinions. If they could conceive the possibility of their interpretations of Scripture being as liable to error as those of other sects, and give effect to this conception, they would respect the rights of conscience in other men, and approach so much the nearer to the real spirit of Christianity.

March 20. Ther. 45°. Female Delicacy.—The following statement was made to me by a clergyman, who had the best means of knowing the facts, and whom I did not at all suspect of palming on me an "old Joe Miller." In allusion to the fastidiousness of American women about the human figure, he mentioned that the farther south the more ridiculous are the prejudices. The word "leg" must not be mentioned in the presence of a lady, and in whatever part of the abdomen a lady may have a pain, it is always announced as in her "breast." A physician in the south told him that, if he had even proposed to open the body of a young lady, a patient, who had died of a disease imperfectly understood, he should have expected to receive a challenge for the insult from her brother. The physician led him to understand that this had actually happened in his own experience. At the same time these ladies will allow coloured men to come into their bedrooms in the morning to light their fires, even when they are in their morning undress, without the least feeling of outraged delicacy.

Spring.—Radishes appeared at table to-day for the first time; they are the welcome harbingers of spring.

Dr. Morton's "Crania Americana."—I have had the pleasure of holding many consultations with Dr. Morton and Mr. Phillips about the best means of measuring the skulls to be described in this work, and have been greatly interested by the ingenuity and perseverance of Mr. Phillips in overcoming the difficulties that presented themselves. He has now succeeded to an extent that will enable him to proceed with the measurements. Dr. Morton has requested me to furnish an Appendix for his work. He is imperfectly acquainted with phrenology himself, and has composed his text without reference to it. He perceives, however, that when he presents a correct drawing of an average specimen of a national skull, and describes historically the mental character of the nation, he places in juxtaposition the two elements on which phrenology is founded; and he is anxious to obtain the means of enabling his readers to combine them, so that they may draw their own conclusions on the accordance or discordance of the forms of the skulls with the Indian characters. I have engaged to supply this desideratum, without having seen one word of his descriptions of the characters of the Indian tribes. My Appendix will consist of a brief outline of the phrenological faculties, of a drawing of the skull showing the regions of the animal, the moral, and the intellectual organs, with directions how to estimate their relative proportions; and some remarks on the influence of size in the brain on mental power. The reader of Dr. Morton's work, by applying the rules and examples thus furnished to the several skulls delineated in it, will be able to draw his own conclusions. This will expose phrenology to as severe a test as could well be devised; but I have confidence in the harmony and stability of truth, and do not hesitate to hazard the experiment.*

* Since the text was written, Dr. Morton's work has appeared and been very favourably noticed in the medical reviews of the United States and of Britain. I may be permitted to remark, however, that the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal, edited by Professor Jameson, and the Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal, edited by Dr. Craigie, in their ample notices of the work, have omitted to mention not only this experiment, but Dr. Morton's own testimony, penned six months after I left Philadelphia, of the result of it. He says, "I am free to acknowledge that there is a singular harmony between the mental character of the Indian, and his cranial deve-

March 21. Ther. 49°. Fires.—There has been an alarm of fire on five of my lecture nights in succession; and last night the alarm was so near, that I was under the necessity of suspending the lecture till the result should be seen. It was only a chimney on fire, but this is always attended with anxiety in American cities. The roofs of the houses are covered with shingles (thin wood cut into the shape of slates,) which are exceedingly dry, and a spark falling on them might raise a vast conflagration. This is one cause, also, of fires spreading so rapidly in this country. To avoid this danger, zinc is now used to cover the roofs of some houses. Notwithstanding this condition of the roofs, it is not an uncommon practice here to set the chimneys on fire and burn them out, to save the trouble and expense of sweeping them! One of the newspapers lately recommended the burning out of chimneys only during heavy rains, when the wet condition of the shingles might abate the risk of the conflagration extending! In a city like Philadelphia, the police should be armed with power to suppress the practice altogether, under severe penalties.

Phrenology.—At eleven o'clock this day, I had a practical exercise with my class on the temperaments, in the manner already described. Two hundred and twenty-three persons attended, who entered into the business of the meeting with great interest and judgment. Many of the members of the society of Friends stood up to have their temperaments described; but when a call was made for ladies to stand up, there was a pause. I explained the advantages to parents and teachers of understanding the influence of the temperaments of children, as their treatment should vary with their natural constitutions. On hearing this, a Quaker gentleman took his daughter by the hand, and led her up to the platform. Her temperament was described, and then another Friend led up another young lady: after which there was no farther difficulty with the ladies. Among the men, the predominant temperaments were the bilious-nervous and nervous-bilious; the next common was the sanguine and its combinations; and there were very few cases of the lymphatic. Among the young women, also, there was surprisingly little of the lymphatic temperament; nervous-bilious was common; and nervous-bilious-sanguine.

In the evening we visited one of the society of Friends, who with his lady had attended the lectures; and the morning exercises were talked of. A lady of the party, who had not attended the lectures, held forth in severe condemnation of the young ladies who had stood up to have their temperaments described. She accused them of want of delicacy, compared them to Fanny Wright, and uttered many other disrespectful expressions against them. This is the only example which has fallen under my own observation, of the influences by which the amiable and feminine sentiments of the young women of this country are perverted. This female censor of morals was unmarried, and of a certain age. She possessed much volubility, a very slender stock of useful information, great native energy, development as explained by phrenology." In the notices of Dr. Morton's work in Professor Silliman's American Journal of Science and the Arts (which Professor Jameson professes to copy nearly entire), in the London Medico-Chirurgical Review, and in the British and Foreign Medical Review, this result is stated in Dr. Morton's own words, and the interests of truth and justice require that it should be so.

and no lack of self-confidence. Her censures all like two-edged swords on young, timid, and misinformed minds; and she gloried in her power. I told her plainly that it was by such speeches as hers that the young women of this country are made slaves, through the instrumentality of their rest feelings, to injurious customs, to the great detriment of their health and usefulness; but she only launched out the more vehemently against human improvement, and in commendation of the notions of antiquity.

Difficulty of describing Events.—This same lady assured me that there was not one word of truth in Miss Martineau's description of a Quaker marriage, at which she had been present. Another lady of the party, who mentioned that she had herself witnessed the ceremony, stated that Miss Martineau's description was substantially correct. Those who describe manners, experience strikingly the fate of the painter who pleased nobody and every body. Phrenology shows us that men differ in their original faculties, and hence the same event will make different impressions on different minds. They differ in their education and training, and yet each assumes his own perceptions and emotions to constitute the true standard for judging of all things. They differ in their opportunities for correct observation, yet each believes his own impressions to constitute absolute truth. The traveller is only one mind, with a particular combination of faculties, some powerful and others deficient; he is trained in his own peculiar way; he has only his own opportunities of observation, and his own stock of knowledge; and all that he should pretend to accomplish is to record faithfully his individual impressions, and leave his readers themselves to judge of their value.

Rate of Wages.—The journeymen housecarpenters have published a manifesto, addressed "to the public in general, and builders in particular," in which they state that "our present wages is $1 25 cents (5s. 2d. sterling) per day, out of which sum we find it impossible to live, and render unto every man that which is just, although we practise the most rigid economy. Men, under these circumstances, are frequently driven by poverty and care to intemperance, to dispel for a season the horrid gloom which envelops their homes." They ask $1 50 cents per day. They add, that all other trades connected with building receive from $1 50 to $1 75 cents per day.

Working men also complain of another grievance. There is no arrangement by distant banks for redeeming their notes in Philadelphia, and in consequence they are not received by the banks of this city. The only way of disposing of them is to carry them to the exchange brokers, who buy them at a discount corresponding to the distance and difficulties of sending them to their own head-quarters, and obtaining Philadelphia money in return. The workmen complain that their masters buy up these notes at a discount, and pay them over to them at par; throwing the loss of the exchange on them! The Public Ledger, in noticing this abuse, says: "We consider this extortion most unconscionable, and regard every one who will practise it as a thief of the very worst description, for he steals from poverty."

Infidelity in the United States.—I have in vain endeavoured to discover to what extent infidelity prevails in those parts of the United States which I have visited. I have seen no outward traces of it; but when in New York, I was told that a society of Deists meets on Sundays in Tammany Hall, that they are persons of respectable station and morals, who act on conscientious conviction, and moreover, that a large proportion of them are Scotsmen. I was asked to explain how the latter circumstance came to pass; but as I did not see the society, and did not investigate the facts, I declined to offer any opinion on the subject.*

In "The Presbyterian" of the 23d of March, 1839, an evangelical newspaper published in Philadelphia and New York, I find the following statement, which, from the high character of the paper, is entitled to far more weight than any opinion which I could possibly have formed. "There is no doubt that many more men than we are willing or accustomed to believe, are secretly cherishing infidelity. It has been widely disseminated through our country, and even in those portions of it where the gospel has been long enjoyed, and the great mass of the families are moral and religious. Many of our young men in all ranks and classes of society are tainted with it, and help to extend and perpetuate it." This announcement took me by surprise; and it is proper to add, that it does not appear in an editorial form, but in a communicated article, bearing the initials D. N. The editor, however, must have believed it to be correct when he allowed its insertion. The writer ascribes the prevalence of infidelity to "the disuse of the Bible as a class-book in our common schools; the importation of European infidelity and agrianism by Owen, Fanny Wright, and others; the boastful and arrogant claims to reason, free inquiry, and independence of thought, so universally made by infidel writers and speakers, and so captivating to uninformed and uncultivated minds; and the natural preference of the human mind of error rather than truth. It is painful," says he, "to contemplate the wide-spread operation of these causes. No one can travel on our great highways, in steamboats, on canals, and railways, and mingle with the moving masses he there finds, without being sensible of their dreadful effects." He proceeds to recommend a work by Dr. Nelson, now of Illinois, as the best antidote to this evil.

CHAPTER XIII.

March 24. Ther. 43°. Sunday.—We heard a highly evangelical discourse in a church in Broad street, a little below Chestnut street, and found a handsome edifice, a large congregation, and an able preacher; not the pastor of the

* I was told that most of these Scotsmen had been educated in the old country, and had come as emigrants to the United States. While this sheet is in the press, I have perused a work just published, entitled "Religion and Education in America, by John Dunmore Lang, D. D.," senior minister of the Presbyterian church in New South Wales, &c., and himself for many years a minister of the church of Scotland. He there says, "Accustomed as I had been from my youth up to the lean, gaunt form of Scottish orthodoxy, with neither a heart nor a soul beneath its ribs of death, and with an apron of fig-leaves tucked round it to cover the nakedness of the land, I confess it was not less novel to me than it was extremely gratifying, to witness the vigour and the life, the piety and the zeal, the self-denial and the self-devotedness, that evidently characterised both sections of the Presbyterian church." If this church, however, but a stranger. His text was, "Take up the cross and follow me;" and he drew a lively picture of the difference between what he called the maxims and wisdom of the world, and the obligations of Christianity.

March 25. Ther. 43°. The Friends of the People.—I have had the pleasure of meeting in society here an old gentleman who was the friend and associate of Muir, Skirving, and other Scottish Reformers, at the beginning of the French Revolution, and who at that time left his native country on account of political persecution. He settled here, and has been successful in business, having realised a competence. He is much respected.

The Fire Department.—I have already mentioned that the fire-engines are all served voluntarily by the young men of the city; and that they even keep up the engines and hose at their own expense, assisted occasionally by the profits of a ball, or a donation from the civic corporation. I have endeavoured to discover the motives which have maintained this system in full energy for a century. In the first place, in observing the men in one of their processions, I perceived that they were almost all under thirty years of age, and of the sanguine, or sanguine-nervous, or sanguine-bilious, temperaments, which give great love of excitement and action. The midnight alarm, the rushing to the fires, and the labour and peril in extinguishing them, are agreeable to such minds. Farther, their emulation is strongly excited. The point of honour is to be first at a fire. The director of the first engine that arrives becomes director-general of all the engines for the evening. He is, as it were, the commander-in-chief of an allied army during a battle. If the director be not out, the engine-man who first attaches his hose to the water-pipe assumes that high honour. There are no recognised differences in rank in this country, but it struck me that there are, in fact, plebeian and patrician fire companies, drawn from different classes of citizens, and that this adds to the ardour of the competition. The company attached to each engine amounts to from 20 to 100 men, and it starts from its station-house as soon as two or three have arrived to direct its movements. The people in the street assist in dragging it. The competition to be first is so ardent, that ambitious young men sleep as if a part of the brain was left awake to watch for the word "fire," or the sound of the state-house alarm-bell. They will hear either, when no other inmate of the house is conscious of the slightest sound. They will sometimes put on their boots and great-coats, and carry their clothes, which lie ready bundled up, in their hands, and dress at the fire. In rushing along the streets, they often run down and severely injure passengers who are in their way; or if one of themselves falls, the rest drag on the engine, regardless of his fate, and often break his legs or arms with the wheels. When two engines arrive at a fire at the same time, the companies occasionally fight for the first place, and then a desperate and bloody battle will rage for a considerable time while the flames are making an unchecked progress. Add to these evils, the circumstances that fires occur so frerepresentation of the Scottish church be correct, it may account in some degree for the facts alleged to exist in New York. Dr. Lang has renounced his connection with the church of Scotland, and prefers the voluntary system; but he still professes orthodoxy in faith.

quently that the firemen are kept in a state of almost constant excitement, and that Sunday furnishes no respite from their labours. They are often called out on very trivial alarms, and being once abroad at midnight hours, they adjourn to taverns, and pass the night in nocturnal recreations. Troops of boys, also, attach themselves as volunteers to the engines, and acquire idle and dissolute habits. In short, the fire department, which at first sight appears to present a noble specimen of civic devotion and disinterested benevolence, turns out, on a closer scrutiny, to be a convenient apology for excitable young men indulging in irregular habits, which, if not clothed with an official and popular character, would expose them to censure by a strictly moral community. In Boston, the evils of the voluntary fire system have been so severely felt, that it has been abandoned, and a regularly organised and paid corps of firemen now serves in that city. Many respectable persons in New York and Philadelphia desire that their cities also should adopt the same plan.

Rotation in Office.—This is the phrase used to gloss over the palpable injustice and the public disadvantages attending the dismissal from office by each political party on its accession to power, of all their political opponents, however meritoriously they may have discharged their public duties. It is said to have been begun by General Jackson; and the extent to which it is now carried, may be judged of from the following extract from "The Pennsylvanian," a democratic paper, of the 28th of March, 1839:—

"The Washington Globe asks for information as to the extent of proscription, for opinion's sake, exercised by the whig party in Pennsylvania. In reply it is perhaps unnecessary to go into particulars, for the aforesaid proscription was exercised upon a principle of the most sweeping generality. For instance, in 1832, when the whig party gained the upper hand in the city of Philadelphia, and found the offices held by democrats, they did not spare a single man. In the course of that year and the one ensuing, every democrat was swept out, whether his office was high or low, the very watchmen being subjected to the operation as inexorably as those who held places of value. In fact, the treatment of the watchmen was more severe, if possible, than that which fell to the share of the other ejected parties; for they were all discharged in mid-winter, when it was impossible for them to procure employment. So much for city matters.

"In the state, upon the accession of Joseph Ritner, the same course of action was followed to the very letter. Throughout the whole of this commonwealth, in the county offices and upon the public works, every democrat was superseded by some one whose politics were congenial to those of the minority leaders who had been successful by an accidental breach in the democratic ranks. Still more; in 1838, when the political struggle became violent, a species of inquisition as to party faith was established in regard to the very labourers on the public works, and, if a doubt was entertained as to the firmness of their Riterism, they were at once turned adrift. A devotion to Thaddeus Stevens was one of the chief requisites for obtaining a contract; and he who split wood for a locomotive was suffered to split no more if he would not bow to Geisler's cap. Proscriptions was carried to the utmost extent. No one was so humble as to escape it. How many democrats did whiggery dismiss in Pennsylvania?

The answer is brief and comprehensive. All!"

This statement proceeds from a party source; but I have read "The Pennsylvanian" pretty regularly since my arrival in Philadelphia, and so far as a stranger has the means of judging, it appears to me to be ably and honestly conducted. Its own party is at present in power; and, nevertheless, it speaks of the "boring system" in the following terms:—

"Pennsylvania Legislature—The Boring System."—After stating that the legislature has closed its labours for the present, and "that the amount of business left unfinished by the adjournment is greater than on any former occasion," the editor proceeds to say—"We fully believe that great impediments are thrown in the way of the fulfilment of imperative duties by the monstrous increase of boring and lobbying on behalf of the interests of corporate associations, and it is clear to our minds that the time has come to crush this iniquitous system, which is a disgrace to the state, and is a fruitful source not only of political corruption, but of personal debauchery. It is a common case, when any particular institution feels anxious for certain additional privileges which are at the disposal of the legislature, for it to proceed upon a regular and well understood tactique. Its agents or officers appear upon the ground with purses well furnished from the 'contingent fund,' and commence the work of ingratiating. The railroad cars bring up the boxes of champagne, brandy, cigars, and delicacies of all kinds, and it is said that then a convenient room is obtained as a headquarters, where the members of the legislature are at liberty to partake gratuitously of the eating, the drinking, and the roaring frolics carried on in these places of resort, which are open not only all day, but likewise all night, (like the entrance to a certain nameless place described by Virgil,) and where it is also asserted that gambling is frequently introduced to give additional zest to the delights of the boring system, and to initiate those who are as yet untainted by the vicious desires which render men an easy prey to the tempter. To follow up the work thus begun, the collateral operations of making presents of liquor, and various articles, with the loaning of money to the needy and extravagant who are entrusted with power, are brought into play; and the fact is notorious that, of late years, among the members of the legislature, many young men, and not a few of more advanced years, who were deficient in the necessary resolution, have been utterly and often irretrievably ruined by the evil influences to which they were thus subjected at Harrisburg, acquiring habits which led to certain destruction."

I have already remarked, that the conduct of the legislators on private bills on both sides of the Atlantic leaves little occasion to either to boast of a virtuous discharge of public duty. In the English house of commons, the "influences" used to purchase or to strangle justice before committees, are not so humble as those employed to attain the same ends in the legislature of Pennsylvania; but in principle they are the same. They are a disgrace to both countries; but no opposition print in London could have condemned the committees of their political opponents with greater force and a more just indignation than is here exhibited by the democratic "Pennsylvanian," in commenting on its own party.

Fortune-telling.—I have already adverted to the exercise of fortune-telling as a profession in Philadelphia, and observe that in New York it stands in an equally dignified position. "Fortune-telling," says the Journal of Commerce, "has become such a regular branch of business in New York, that cards with the names and residences of professed fortune-tellers are almost daily handed to ladies and gentlemen while walking through the streets. The matter having, however, reached Justice Merritt in the shape of a complaint, he sent officers to the residence of a Mrs. Louisa Kraft, in Christie street, and a Mrs. Theresa George Medier, in Orchard street, each of whose cards had been left at the police office by gentlemen who complained that their wives or daughters had been considerably annoyed by boys thrusting those cards into their hands in the street. The officers easily obtained access to the fortune-tellers, and had their fortunes told them for the low sum of fifty cents each, and then marched off the two ladies to the police office as common vagrants. Mrs. Louisa Kraft on being examined, very candidly admitted "that she did not pretend to tell the fortune of any individual; but that if persons were foolish enough to go to her for that purpose, she would receive their money." The two ladies were both ordered to find bail in $500, to be of good conduct for one year, and in default of such bail were committed to prison.

Such occurrences would excite only ridicule in a European monarchy, where the people exercise no political power; but they are more momentous in a country in which universal suffrage prevails. The "persons who are foolish enough to go to" Mrs. Louisa Kraft to have their fortunes told, are regarded by the law as "wise enough" to choose state officers and legislators.

March 28. Therm. 57°. Marriage Vow.—A friend from a neighbouring state, newly married, came to our hotel to-day with his bride. In conversing with the party, they mentioned that some of the clergymen omit the promise of obedience on the part of the wife from the marriage service, as unconstitutional! This probably is a joke; but so far as my means of observation extend, I should say that American wives in general display the most exemplary devotedness to their husbands, whether they vow obedience before the altar or not.

Conversion of the Jews.—I am assured that in this city Jews are treated in much the same manner as individuals are who belong to the Christian sects. They are received in society according to their attainments and condition. Jewish physicians attend Christian patients, and vice versa. Jews fall in love with, and marry pretty Christian women, and within three generations the Jew is sunk, and the family merges into the mass of the general population. There is a Jewish synagogue, in which the brethren hold meetings on Saturdays; but the spirit of free discussion which has loosened the bonds of orthodoxy in other sects, has not been without some influence on the Jews. They use considerable freedoms with Moses and the prophets, preach and discuss general ethics and natural religion, and altogether wear the chains of Judaism so loosely, that probably their brethren in Europe would disown them.

This description of their condition was not derived from one of their own number, but from a friend, who said that he obtained it from an educated and highly respectable Jew. I enquired of several gentlemen whom I regarded as likely to be well informed on the subject, whether it might be relied on, and they said that it was highly coloured, but that it contains essential truth. I conclude from this example, that the best method of converting the Jews is to treat them with justice and generosity.

How to Manage the People.—The American people may be led by promptness, good nature, and tact; but they will not be driven. In 1812, previously to the declaration of war against England, the mob of Philadelphia seized the rudder of a British brig, lying at the wharf, to prevent her from sailing, there being at that time no legal authority for detaining her. Mr. —, a highly respectable and well known citizen, met them dragging the rudder through the streets in triumph; he joined them, and hauled the rope and cheered with the rest. They proposed to go and break the windows of the British consul. He went with them; and when they came opposite to the house, he addressed them, as if he had never heard of the proposal to break the windows, and said, "Now, my brave lads, let us give him three cheers to show that we are not afraid of the British, and be off." He cheered instantly, and they all joined. At the close of the last cheer, he gave the word "off to the State House;" and suited the action to the word so rapidly that nobody had time to suggest or do any thing else. Arrived at the State House, he said, "Let us give three cheers for America, and lock up the helm in the State House." "America for ever! Hurrah! hurrah!" The key of the cellar was obtained, and the helm locked up, three cheers were given "for ourselves;" "Dismiss" was then uttered, and acted on by his walking away; and all followed his example. As the whole proceeding had been illegal, Mr. — went quietly to the ship, and desired the captain to send up to the State House for his helm in the night. He did so; put it on; and when the sun rose, he was down the Delaware on his voyage to England.

Another anecdote of the same gentleman is equally characteristic of the "way to manage the people." Between Walnut and Spruce streets, and Sixth and Washington streets, lay a piece of ground named the Potter's field, or burial place for strangers. Interments in it had long been prohibited, but it contained some graves and monuments inclosed by railings. There was a strong desire in the minds of many enlightened citizens to clear these away, and to turn the ground into an ornamental square, as it now lay in the heart of the city; but every proposal to obliterate them was resisted by the public sentiment, although no living person could be found who was interested in any of them. Mr. — suggested to a marble-cutter to carry off the monuments quietly, and by slow degrees, at dead of night. In the course of two years, they all disappeared mysteriously, nobody knew how. The rails followed. Nobody interfered; nobody noticed the change until it was complete. He employed men quietly at night to level the surface over the graves. Thus was completed, in less than three years, without any authority whatever, a change which the enlightened residents had in vain solicited permission to accomplish. The ground being reduced to a waste, the civic corporation, without any hesitation, voted money to inclose it with a handsome rail, to plant it, and to furnish it with gravel walks. It is now Washington Square, one of the greatest ornaments, and a great benefit to the city.

March 29. Ther. 63°. The weather is so warm that we have left off fires. The following table has appeared in the newspapers, and is interesting.

"The Baths of Philadelphia.—Owing to the copious supply of water from Fairmount, the city and suburbs of Philadelphia enjoy the luxury of bathing in a way superior to most cities of Europe or America, as the following table will show. It is taken from last year's report of the Watering Committee.

United States Bank.—There is a great sensation this evening about the resignation by Nicholas Biddle, Esq. of his office of President of the United States Bank.

Acuteness of Children.—In the course of my lectures, I urged the necessity of women being thoroughly educated for the sake of guiding the opening minds of children; and this evening one of the Society of Friends whom we visited, read to me in illustration of the lecture, a part of a letter which she had just received from her married sister, living in a neighbouring state. The letter described the questions put to her by her child on hearing parts of the Scripture read. The child insisted on being informed whither Ananias and Sapphira went when they were struck dead. "To hell?" asked the child. The mother gave an evasive answer. "To heaven?" "No." "Where then did they go?" On hearing the description read of Abraham preparing to sacrifice Isaac, and of his being at last told to spare his son, and sacrifice the ram, the child exclaimed, "Well, I do say that that was cheating!" The mother could go no farther. It would be very interesting and instructive to parents and teachers, if a record were published of the observations of children, who have large moral and intellectual organs, on the Scripture narratives. Such a record would show the relation in which these stand to the human mind in its natural condition, before it has been influenced by commentaries and explanations, or glosses indicate what portions of Scripture are calculated most directly to benefit the juvenile faculties. The advantage of selecting passages suited to their capacities would then become evident, and the objection of "mutilating the Scriptures," which is raised in Britain against the proposal to prepare extracts from the Bible for the use of children, would be refuted by evidence, that the young are far from being benefited by an indiscriminate perusal of the whole.

March 30. Ther. 53°. The United States Bank.—Mr. Biddle's letter of resignation is published in the newspapers to-day. He assigns "approaching age and precarious health" as the causes of his retirement. I am informed by the medical friends of Mr. Biddle, that a pressure of labour and anxiety such as he encountered at the last expiry of the charter of the bank, and at the suspension of cash payments in 1837, would in all probability induce either apoplexy or inflammation, and that he has been strongly urged by them to retire. One medical gentleman who knew him well, said to me, that if he had continued in office, and any new difficulty had arisen, he should not have been surprised to hear that he was found dead in his business-room. The stock of the bank has fallen in consequence of his retirement.

March 31. Ther. 40°. Omnibuses and Railroads.—In this city the omnibuses run on Sundays. Rails are laid on the streets for the Baltimore, the Harrisburg, and the New York railroads. The passengers are taken up at convenient stations in the city, and the cars are drawn by horses till they have fairly cleared the houses, when locomotive engines are attached to them. This is found to be a very great convenience; but children are occasionally injured by heedlessly running on the rails.

Pulmonary Consumption.—The late Dr. Benjamin Rush regarded consumption as an inflammatory disease, and applied to it very active treatment. Dr. Parrish told me that he was early struck by the speedy and never-failing death of Rush's patients. Two young students became ill of the disease in the beginning of winter: one of them followed Dr. Rush's advice, and was dead in a few months; the second refused all treatment whatever, and lived double the time of the other, although he also died. Dr. Parrish in his own practice abandoned Dr. Rush's treatment, and recommended air and exercise as abundantly as the strength of the patients permitted; he also advised them to brave, as far as possible, the weather, and to use little medicine. He resorted to bleeding and blistering only when unequivocal symptoms of local inflammation were present, superadded to the tuberculous disease. By this method he was more successful than Dr. Rush. He saved a few, and prolonged, to some extent, the lives of almost all his patients. I have read, with much interest, his exposition of the subject in vols. 8, 9, and 10, of the North American Medical and Surgical Journal.

The Education of the People.—A friend has called my attention to an article in Blackwood's Magazine for February, 1839, No. 280, reprinted here. The object of it is to show that the mass of the people never can become enlightened and refined; that, therefore, education can render them only uneasy and restless; that ignorance is to them the parent of contentment; but that, if they must be educated, a religious education is the only one fitted to do them good. It renders them patient, humble, and moral, and relieves the hardships of their present lot by the prospect of a bright eternity. "How strangely," said my friend, "do such sentiments sound in this country, where we must enlighten and refine the mass of the people or perish, for they rule our destinies. The author obviously considers England as the world, and the present condition of her people as the only one in which the human race can ever exist! If the article be written in good faith, the author needs much to be educated himself. If he is an aristocrat or a priest, endeavouring to prop up a system which devotes eight out of every ten of the English people to toil and ignorance, without prospect of relief on this side of the grave—for the benefit of the remaining two—he deserves to be doomed to undergo this fate himself, that he may know by experience the efficacy of his own prescriptions for human misery."

Chimney-Sweeps.—The chimney-sweeps here are young negro boys. As they glide through the streets in quest of employment, they have a peculiar and melodious cry, slightly resembling a Tyrolean "yodde."

April 1. Ther. 40°. "The Coloured American."—This is the title of a weekly newspaper for the use of the coloured people of the United States. It has reached No. 2 of vol. iii. It consists of four pages, each containing four columns; the price is $2 per annum. The paper of the 30th of March has been sent to me because it contains an attack on phrenology, a denial of its utility, and a commendation of the philosophy of Dr. Thomas Brown, and that of Mr. Young, of Belfast. It is edited by Samuel Cornish and James McCune Smith. I am told that one of the editors is a coloured gentleman, who studied medicine in Edinburgh, and imbibed the prejudices of his teachers against the science, and that he is now labouring to transfer them to his coloured brethren.

Female Delicacy.—In my first course of lectures in Philadelphia, I endeavoured to point out the connection between beauty in the proportions and forms of the human figure, and health. The handsomest figure is one in which the abdomen, the chest, and the head, are all well developed; and this proportion is also most favourable to health; because on the first depends digestion, on the second respiration, and on the third mental energy. The limbs will rarely be found deficient where the proportions of these regions are favourable. I recommend to my audience the study of the human figure in statuary and painting, not only as an interesting object of taste, but as capable of conveying knowledge of great practical utility. A mother, with an eye familiar with those proportions, and instructed in their relations to health, would watch, with increased attention, the habits, postures, and nutrition of her children. If she saw the abdomen tending to become tumescent, the chest flat, and the head enlarged, she would early become aware that there was some deviation from the laws of health, and thus by timely remedies might prevent serious disease. There is no inherent indelicacy in the human figure. It is the workmanship of the Creator, the temple of the mind, and there is impressed on it a beauty of form and an elegance of proportion that render it capable of exciting the most pure and refined impressions in a cultivated and virtuous mind. Where indelicacy is felt, its source must be looked for, not in the object, but in licentious feelings, or in a perverted or neglected education in the spectator. That individual who is able to associate only impure ideas with the most exquisite specimens of the fine arts, resembles a man in whom the aspect of a rich and beautiful domain should excite only feelings of envy, cupidity, and discontent.

These views appeared to me to be well received; and some friends even commended them as useful in tending to correct that false delicacy which injures the health and usefulness of many American women.

In the United States Gazette, however, (a Philadelphia paper), of the 28th of March, a letter subscribed "Candidus" appeared, which, in allusion to my lecture on this subject in the last course, characterised it as having been "equally revolting to the feelings of delicacy of many of the audience, as it was offensive to the national sense of propriety;" and the writer hoped "either that, notice being given of its being obnoxious, it will not again be introduced; or, if it be, that it will meet with a prompt and stern rebuke, which will prevent a repetition."

On the present occasion I intentionally reserved this topic for the last portion of my lecture on Physical Education. I then read the letter to my audience, and announced that I intended to repeat the remarks, and that they would form the conclusion of the lecture; but that, before proceeding, I should pause to allow any lady or gentleman to retire, whose delicacy might be offended by them. Ladies composed more than one third of the audience, and many of them belonged to the Society of Friends. Not a single individual rose. I then stated, in answer to the remarks of Candidus, that "I did not respect any feeling merely because it was 'national.' It had been a 'national' feeling in Scotland to hate the English; in Britain to hate the French: and, in the year 1776, it was the quintessence of patriotism in England to hate you, the Americans; yet every one acknowledges that these were improper feelings in themselves, and that the fact of their being 'national' did not alter their character. Candidus, however, very properly asserts, that, in the present instance, the national feeling 'is founded alike on virtue and reason;' and, if so, it merits respect; but this is the point on which I differ from him in opinion. It has been announced by the highest authority, that 'To the pure all things are pure;' but, according to Candidus, there is one exception, and the verse should have contained the qualifying words, 'except the human figure.' Has the Creator framed any object that is essentially and necessarily indelicate? Impossible! But my leading design in this exposition is not to initiate you into a love of the fine arts, but to call your attention to the necessity of becoming acquainted with the structure of the human body, and the functions of its organs, as the very basis of a rational view of physical education; and in your country this is an important desideratum. You cannot know that structure without studying it; and you cannot study it without looking on it. If you neglect the study, you suffer. Do you believe, then, that the Creator has rendered it necessary for you to study his works, and at the same time made it sinful in you to do so?" Pointing to an anatomical drawing showing the intestines, the stomach, the liver, and the lungs, I said that "I had been assured that in which ever of these organs a lady felt indisposed, she told her physician that she had a pain in her breast, misleading him, so far as she had the power to do so, by an erroneous statement of symptoms, and offering increased obstacles to the successful exertions of his skill for her own welfare. In some instances (as I have been told) this feeling of delicacy renders it extremely difficult for the physician to extract, even by the most pointed questions, real and necessary information from over-sensitive patients. This is false delicacy, and it should be corrected by knowledge. Fortified by these considerations, and also encouraged by the right spirit in which the ladies of Boston, New York, and this city, have received my remarks on the subject in my previous courses, it is my intention again to introduce it to your notice, and I hope to convince you, by your own experience, that it is quite possible to convey valuable information concerning it, without one indelicate emotion or idea being suggested to the mind." The audience repeatedly applauded these remarks as they were delivered, and testified their satisfaction by a loud and general burst of approbation at the close.

April 2. Ther. 53°. New Lunatic Asylum.—Dr. B. H. Coates kindly drove me about a mile and a half west from the city, over the Schuylkill river, to visit a new lunatic asylum, now erecting by the Trustees of the Pennsylvania Hospital, for pauper and other lunatics. The edifice is 420 feet long, is two stories high, in addition to the sunk floor, and contains a long corridor with cells on each side. It is built of sandstone-rubble, except the centre, which is cased with dressed sandstone, veined very like marble. There are two small wings, and the centre is ornamented with a dome. It stands on a gentle eminence fronting the south, in a wooded and cultivated country, and has 108 acres of land attached to it. It is said to be fire-proof, and to possess all the modern improvements for warming and ventilation; but it is not yet finished. The roof is complete, but the floors are not laid. It appears to be highly creditable to the trustees and architect under whose auspices it has been reared.

Railroads in the United States.—In conversing with an accomplished civil engineer, who had visited Europe, on the temporary character and unfinished appearance presented by the American railroads, he said that here a railroad is made in order to call forth population, commerce, and manufactures; whereas in England, they are constructed, because they are wanted by a dense, rich, and industrious population. He considered the American plan best suited to their own circumstances. Their works are sufficient to accomplish the main object—cheap and expeditious transportation. They will be improved as trade increases. Wherever the lines have been judiciously selected, commanding thoroughfares from one important point of the union to another, as from New York to Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia to Baltimore, railroads have been eminently successful.

The Academy of Natural Sciences.—I attended a meeting of the Academy this evening. It was instituted on 25th January, 1812, and incorporated in 1817 by the legislature of Pennsylvania. It has a hall at the corner of Twelfth and George streets, and a valuable and extensive collection of objects of natural history. These are displayed in upright and horizontal cases: they are ranged in accordance with the most approved systems; and their generic and specific names (wherever these can be ascertained) together with the localities and the names of the donors, are attached to each article. The "Journal of the Academy" was commenced in 1817, and continues to be published, not at stated intervals, but when valuable communications have accumulated to suffice for a number. It has reached to seven 8vo volumes, and is widely circulated among scientific persons in America and Europe. It is replete with important details in every branch of science, and is reputed to contain a greater body of facts in reference to the technical natural history of the United States than any other work. The Academy possesses also the richest library on natural history in the United States. It is indebted for a great part of its property and prosperity to its president, William Maclure, Esq., who has bestowed on it several splendid donations.*

The Pursuit of Wealth.—The Americans are taunted by the British for their exclusive devotion to the pursuit of wealth; but in this respect, as well as in many others, they are the genuine heirs of English dispositions, with a better apology for their conduct. One of the earliest injunctions of the Creator to man was, "to multiply and replenish the earth." The Americans have a fertile country of vast extent placed before them inviting them to fulfil this commandment; and it would argue mental lethargy or imbecility were they to disobey the call. But how can a wilderness be peopled and replenished without the creation of wealth? Houses must be built and furnished; clothes and implements of husbandry must be manufactured; animals must be reared; yet these are the constituent elements of wealth. The fertile soil of the west, therefore, invites the active and enterprising spirits of each generation to advance and take possession of it. Within two years after it is cleared, it places in the hands of the occupier a surplus produce after supplying his own wants. He sends this surplus to the eastern cities to be sold, and receives in exchange the various manufactured articles which constitute the conveniences and ornaments of civilised life. The demand of the west on the capital and industry of the east, is incessant and increasing. The rich lands of the west, aided by the rapid increase of population, present investments which can scarcely fail, after a few years, to yield an immense profit to the adventurer; and this legitimate drain for capital affects profits and interest, and the value of property all over the union. There are revulsions, no doubt, but the wave never recedes so far as it had advanced, and those who fail are generally men who have engaged in enterprises far beyond the measure of their capital and legitimate credit. Were the people of the east, therefore, to despise riches, and to become merely the cultivators of literature, philosophy, the fine arts, and all the social graces, they would be fit subjects for their own lunatic asylums. The physique must precede the morale in the order of nature. We must be well lodged, clothed, and nourished, and altogether physically comfortable, before we can bend our minds successfully to refinement, philosophy, and the investigations of abstract science. The people of the United States, therefore, are only fulfilling a law of nature. They are peopling and replenishing the desert, and devoting themselves to this duty with a degree of energy, assiduity, and success that is truly astonishing. It is in vain to blame their institutions or their manners for these results. They owe their origin to nature.

But while I thus hold that the Americans do not merit disapprobation for pursuing wealth as their national vocation, I regard the impulse which prompts them to do so, as one which needs to be watched, and within certain limits resisted, lest it should swallow up all other virtues. Their real prosperity depends on the co-ordinate activity of their acquisitive with their moral and intellectual faculties. If their external circumstances stimulate Acquisitiveness with a power equal to 10, they should put on a power of moral, religious, and intellectual cultivation equal to 15, to guide and restrain it. They are endeavouring to do so by their public schools; and if they succeed, they will in due season become a magnificently great nation; great equally in the possession of physical and moral civilisation.

The Americans, although highly acquisitive, are not sordid as a nation. They expend their wealth freely, and where the object meets with their approbation, they are even munificent in their donations. The sums contributed by them to religious and benevolent societies, to the building of churches and colleges, and to the support of hospitals and similar institutions, are very large. I frequently heard of strangers coming from distant parts of the country to the cities, soliciting subscriptions to build churches, and was told that they were successful. Unitarians have repeatedly told me, that they had subscribed to build evangelical churches; but no instance was mentioned to me (though such may not be uncommon) in which an evangelical believer had contributed to the erection of a Unitarian edifice. I heard a scientific gentleman defend his countrymen and himself against the charge of excessive acquisitiveness, in the following pithy sentences: "I have always," said he, "pursued wealth, because I saw that I could accomplish nothing without it. A sordid mind is indicated by the uses which it makes of property, and not by the pursuit of it. I employ two men to assist me in my scientific analyses and experiments, and pay them $1000 per annum. If I had not bought lots of ground which have doubled in value, I could not have done this; so that in point of fact the money acquired by my lots is devoted to the extension of science."

April 3. Ther. 50°. Cause of the Decline of Quakerism.—I have already mentioned that a number of individuals left the society of Friends at the time of the separation between the orthodox and the followers of Elias Hicks. A sagacious old Scotsman, who has been many years a citizen of Philadelphia, gave me a novel theory of the decline of Quakerism. "The real cause of it," said he, "is the excessive multiplication of banks. The paper currency is so abundant, and so recklessly issued, that a spirit of gambling speculation has seized the whole community, against which Quakerism cannot maintain itself. Farming is the only occupation, consistent with the simplicity of Quaker principles, which is left to them." The same individual summed up his character of the Americans, the result of forty years' observation, in these words: "They are most awful braggars; there is no end or limit to their boasting; yet they are the most active people I ever saw. If they only knew how to go right, there is nothing which they might not achieve."

Sunday Traveling.—The running of the railroad cars on Sundays from Philadelphia to Columbia, is announced and apologised for, as indispensable to overtaking the greatly extended spring trade of this season, and a promise is given, that the arrangement is only temporary, with a view to forwarding an accumulating mass of goods. In the eastern states, the steamboats and stage-coaches, except the mails, do not run on Sundays; but there are morning and evening trains on the railroads for passengers.

Franklin's Grave.—After at least ten unsuccessful attempts to find open the gate of the burial ground in Mulberry street, corner of Fifth street, in which Benjamin Franklin is interred, I succeeded in gaining admission to it to-day. The number of funerals which one sees is strikingly small for so large a city, and this indicates a young population. Franklin's grave is covered by a large marble slab, lying on the ground, on which is inscribed:

BENJAMIN	}	FRANKLIN,
AND DEBORAH 1790;

* The postulatam for which this Scotsman's theory was framed, turns out to be imaginary. Quakerism is not on the decline. The numbers of the society of Friends are annually on the increase.

and nothing more. On a similar slab, to the left, and exactly in the same form, are inscribed the words, "Richard and Sarah Bache, 1811." These were his daughter and her husband. The situation is favourable for the erection of a monument, and Franklin certainly merits, although his memory does not stand in need of, this mark of respect.

Imprisonment for Debt.—In conversing on this subject with an Englishman who has been settled for some years, and has prospered, in this country, but in whom not one English notion has been changed, he said to me—"When you go home, recommend this country as a paradise for rogues. Most of the states have abolished imprisonment for debt, and every one who chooses may issue bank notes. A well varnished story will enable any one to obtain credit; and having obtained it, there is no law to force him to pay. But for honest men this is not the country at all. Republican institutions will never succeed." He should have added, that imprisonment for debt is not abolished where fraud can be established. There are two sides to every question. I have had opportunities of observing the operation of the law of imprisonment for debt in the old country, and do not think that the United States would commit a great error in abolishing it.

A man who sells goods is pursuing his own interest fully as much as he who buys. In the keen competition to effect sales, sellers use every art of persuasion to induce their customers to buy, and also strive to obtain prices as high as possible. Many well-meaning, but weak men, and also many speculative men, are by these means drawn into purchases far beyond the limits of their regular means of selling. When the day of payment comes, the creditor trusts to the law to enforce his claim; and, through terror of a jail, the buyer, to raise the needful funds, sells his goods at a loss. By a few repetitions of this error, he becomes insolvent; but for some time after this takes place, he continues in possession of as much means and credit as to be able to proceed with his trade. He must now, however, buy and sell largely in order to raise means to meet his obligations as they become due. Acute sellers soon discover that he is in this situation; they calculate how long he will be able to proceed before his losses accumulate to such an amount as to force him to stop payment altogether; and they add per centage to per centage on the price as they reckon the day of failure to approach. If the buyer be a man of resources, he may go on for two or three years in insolvency, and during all this time the persons who sell to him are "sponging him," as they term it, by ever increasing additions to their demands. He is in such a condition, that he must sell, or fail and go to prison. He sells cheap that he may raise money to avert this catastrophe as long as possible; and in order to sell, he must buy. Thus, between buying at high, and selling at low prices, he at last arrives at the goal, and openly declares himself bankrupt.

To allow the seller, who has partly induced, and partly profited by this course of transactions, to wind up his proceedings by putting the debtor in jail, is neither just nor beneficial. If the seller be deprived of this power, he will trust to his own sagacity in selecting honest men for his customers, and he will also be more attentive to their interests. In short, instead of trusting to the law to enable him to reap the fruits of his own rapacity, he must conduct trade on higher moral and intellectual principles.

This is no imaginary representation. I have seen the whole machinery in operation, and traced its effects. One example may be mentioned in illustration. A mercantile friend told me that a Mr. B——, whom we both knew, had come to him and looked at some goods. "He had rarely dealt with me before," said my friend, "but I had judged from his forced sales that he was below par (insolvent); and from the prices at which he was purchasing from Mr. C. and Mr. D., that he must be pretty far gone. I wished, therefore, to get rid of him; and I asked ten per cent. above the market price. To my astonishment, he at once accepted my offer. He selected another parcel of goods, and asked the price. Being already farther in with him than I had intended, I added fifteen per cent. to the price of these. He did not hesitate a moment, but purchased them also. He proceeded to a third parcel, and asked the price. Being resolved now to pull him up at all hazards, I demanded twenty-five per cent. above the market price: he grumbled a little, but gave in, and desired me to send the whole purchases to his warehouse. The prices amounted to 500*l*. I was convinced that he was now in desperation, and that an immediate bankruptcy might be expected, and I closed the conference by asking him for 'security' for the payment. He turned on his heel and walked off without speaking a word; I retained the goods, and within a fortnight he was in the Gazette as a bankrupt." I subsequently had the means of tracing the transactions of Mr. B—— for several years, and observed that he had run the course before described, and that this was the last and desperate effort to maintain a regularly sinking trade.

I have already described the very strong excitement which the natural circumstances of the union present to the acquisitive propensity in the Americans. Nevertheless they are incessant in their calls for additional stimulants. They create oceans of paper currency, and proclaim the "credit system" as indispensably necessary to their very existence as a commercial people. With all deference to their judgment, it appears to me that they stand in need of checks and regulators on their acquisitiveness, instead of stimulants. The natural rate of profit is so high, and they are so active and economical, that, if they had only some adequate machinery to regulate their movements, they would advance with extraordinary rapidity to wealth. If the majority of them were sufficiently enlightened to discern (as many of the judicious and better informed among them do) their true position, and the means of promoting their real welfare, they would check their banks, their credit system, and their vast speculations, and advance more leisurely in pursuit of gain. The Scripture proclaims that he that hasteneth to be rich falleth into a snare; and the Americans afford striking examples of the truth of this proposition. The philosophy of the text is, that capital, time, and labour, are necessary to the production of wealth; that before we can legitimately obtain it, we must give an equivalent, and every equivalent also requires time, labour, and capital, for its production. He who hastens to be rich, therefore, tries to create wealth, or to acquire it, without complying with these natural conditions. But nature is too strong for him; he is blind to the obstacles which she presents to his success, and he falls into a snare. It is true that, in a rich and extensive country, a few individuals may, by gambling and speculation, acquire sudden wealth; but some others must lose as much. Time and labour must have been employed to produce the wealth before it could be lost and won; and these men produce nothing. They shuffle property from one hand to another, but the nation is in no degree made richer by their speculations. All young Americans, therefore, should be trained to understand the real laws by which wealth is produced and distributed, and to submit to them as they would do to the commandments of the Bible. The natural effect of the abolition of imprisonment for debt is to render merchants more cautious whom they trust. It should check, rather than encourage, "the credit system."

While, however, the Americans appear to me to have pursued the right road in abolishing imprisonment for debt, they are, from all that I can learn, much in fault with respect to their bankrupt laws: Their laws leave debtors in possession of the power of distributing their effects among their creditors, and of conferring preferences on favourites, to an extent that is unknown in other civilised countries. Besides, there is no general bankrupt law extending over the whole union; and as each state is to the others a foreign jurisdiction, a man may be discharged of his debts in one state, and an undischarged bankrupt in another, without the possibility of remedying his condition. When imprisonment for debt is abolished, there should be a cheap, efficacious, and general law for transferring the whole property of a debtor directly to his creditors for equal distribution, and he should have no power whatever either to obstruct or regulate the operation of the law. Provision should be made, also, for his obtaining a complete discharge with consent of his creditors, or a large proportion of them, but not otherwise. At present no public notice is given of bankruptcy; so that an individual may be utterly bankrupt in New York, and the fact be unknown in Philadelphia, unless by private communication. This opens a wide door to fraud, and to unprincipled speculation. If the Americans knew their real interests, they would publish the name of every bankrupt in every town of the union, as is done in Britain, where the official intimations of bankruptcy are transferred from the London and Edinburgh Gazettes into every newspaper in the kingdom. Honest men gain by this information, for it enables them to know the speculators. Honourable merchants may once or twice become insolvent by misfortune; but there are individuals who pass their lives in swindling and bankruptcy, and the American method of concealment is admirably adapted to their purposes.

It is only a few years since a bankrupt law was passed even in Massachusetts, one of the most enlightened states in the union. On the 19th of March, 1835, a report on the subject of "insolvent debtors," by the Hon. Horace Mann, as chairman of a committee, was presented to the senate of that state. It is replete with admirable views eloquently expressed. The following sentences should be adopted as maxims by the legislatures of every civilised country:—"The committee entertain a firm conviction that the legal relation between debtor and creditor exerts a commanding influence, not only over individual and national wealth, but also over private and public morals. To establish this relation upon the foundations of natural justice, is one of the primary duties of government." * * * "Your committee will not enlarge upon the obligation and utility of making the legal coincident with the moral code. In many minds ideas of right and wrong are but a transcript of positive enactment or judicial decision; and legal rules are their ultimate conscience. Hence, unjust laws never stop with extinguishing an individual right, or indicating an individual wrong. They fashion and adapt the general mind to injustice. They bind the foreign substance of error to the heart, until the fibres close around it, and it becomes ineradicable for ever. Erroneous principles in legislation commend the injustice they ordain; they impress the form of right upon the substance of wrong; and they withhold from truth its highest advantage—the privilege of being seen. But true legislation, which is the art of applying the rules of right to the affairs of men, should develop those rules, give them a bold and conspicuous prominence, and, illuminating them with a light of its own, make them universally legible." Effect was given, to a considerable extent, to these principles in the act for "the relief of poor prisoners," and in the "Insolvent Act" passed by the legislature of Massachusetts in 1838, chap. 163.

I find a number of vague ideas afloat among the mercantile classes here, which have become maxims, but which appear extremely questionable to a stranger. It is said that "this is a new country, and we must encourage enterprise: although we have many speculators and numerous bankruptcies, yet these are always helping forward the general advance of the country; the individuals may fail, but the results of their speculations remain, and add to the general wealth." The answer to these views is, that wealth can be created only by capital, labour, and time; and that these may be applied prudently or imprudently. The men who apply them with judgment and discretion succeed, and benefit equally themselves and their country; those who, in the employment of them, infringe every law of nature by which the creation and distribution of wealth are regulated, are speculators, and so far from their enterprises benefitting the community, the fact is directly the reverse. They waste the resources which in more prudent and skillful hands would have produced double the advantages which they bring out of them. It is true that the houses which they build, or the manufacturing which they erect, remain, and that in the course of years the wealth and population of the country advance and render them useful; but they were not wanted at the time they were built, the capital expended on them has been unprofitably locked up, and the enterprise and industry of wiser and better men, from whose hands it has been withdrawn by the speculators, have been paralysed for years. The American people appear to me to be so extremely active and enterprising, that no encouragement needs to be held out to speculators to engage in bold schemes in order to promote public prosperity. On the contrary, they will prosper more rapidly, and enjoy far greater felicity, if by their laws and institutions they will put a check on such spirits, and encourage the honest, the wise, and the prudent, to lead them forward in their commercial career.

April 4. Ther. 53°. How to choose a Sec.—The following anecdote is not an old Joe Miller. I relate it because, while it illustrates the kindly feeling which reigns among the members of a sect towards each other, it shows how this amiable trait of character may be taken advantage of by rogues. A bookseller, a native of Germany, came from England, settled in one of the large American cities, and began business in a moderate way. He had a stock of neatly printed bibles that. To us it is no dilettante work, no sleek officiality; it is sheer rough death and earnest. They have brought it to the calling forth of war; horrid internecine fight, man grappling with man in fire-eyed rage—the infernal element in man called forth, to try it by that! Do that therefore; since that is the thing to be done. The successes of Cromwell seem to me a very natural thing! Since he was not shot in battle, they were an inevitable thing. That such a man, with the eye to see, with the heart to dare, should advance, from post to post, from victory to victory, till the Huntingdon farmer became, by whatever name you might call him, the acknowledged strongest man in England, virtually the King of England, requires no magic to explain it!

Truly it is a sad thing for a people, as for a man, to fall into scepticism, into dilettantism, insincerity; not to know a sincerity when they see it. For this world, and for all worlds, what curse is so fatal! The heart lying dead, the eye cannot see. What intellect remains, is merely the vulpine intellect. That a true King be sent them is of small use; they do not know him when sent. They say scornfully, Is this your King? The Hero wastes his heroic faculty in bootless contradiction from the unworthy; and can accomplish little. For himself he does accomplish a heroic life, which is much, which is all: but for the world he accomplishes comparatively nothing. The wild rude Sincerity, direct from Nature, is not glib in answering from the witness-box; in your small-debt pie-powder court, he is scouted as a counterfeit. The vulpine intellect "detects" him. For being a man worth any thousand men, the response your Knox, your Cromwell gets, is an argument for two centuries whether he was a man at all. God's greatest gift to this Earth is sneeringly flung away. The miraculous talisman is a paltry plated coin, not fit to pass in the shops as a common guinea.

Lamentable this! I say this must be remedied. Till this be remedied in some measure, there is nothing remedied. "Detect quacks?" Yes, do, for Heaven's sake; but know withal the men that are to be trusted! Till we know that, what is all our knowledge; how shall we so much as "detect?" The vulpine sharpness, which considers itself to be knowledge, and "detects" in that fashion, is far mistaken. Dupes indeed are many: but of all dupes, there is none so fatally situated as he who lives in undue terror of being duped. The world does exist; the world has truth in it, or it would not exist! First recognise what is true, we shall then discern what is false; and properly never till then.

"Know the men that are to be trusted?" alas! this is yet, in these days, very far from us. The sincere alone can recognise sincerity. Not a Hero only is needed, but a world fit for him; a world not of Valets;—the Hero comes almost in vain to it otherwise! Yes, it is far from us: but it must come; thank God, it is visibly coming. Till it do come, what have we? Ballot-boxes, suffrages, French Revolutions:—if we are as Valets, and do not know the Hero when we see him, what good are all these! A heroic Cromwell comes; and for a hundred and fifty years he cannot have a vote from us. Why, the insincere, unbelieving world is the natural property of the Quack, and of the Father of Quacks and Quackeries! Misery, confusion, unvaracity are alone possible there. By ballot-boxes we alter the figure of our Quack; but the substance of him continues. The Valet-World has to be governed by the sham-Hero, by the king merely dressed in King-gear. It is his; he is its! One of two things. We shall either learn to know a Hero, a true Governor and Captain, somewhat better, when we see him; or else go on to be for ever governed by the Unheroic;—had we ballot-boxes clattering at every street-corner, there were no remedy in these.

Poor Cromwell—great Cromwell! The inarticulate Prophet; Prophet who could not speak. Rude, confused, struggling to utter himself, with his savage depth, with his wild sincerity; and he looked so strange, among the elegant Euphuisms; dainty little Falklands, didactic Chillingworths, diplomatic Clarendons! Consider him. An outer hull of chaotic confusion, visions of the Devil, nervous dreams, almost semi-madness; and yet such a clear determinate man's energy working in the heart of that. A kind of chaotic man. The ray as of pure starlight and fire, working in such an element of boundless hypochondria, unformed black of darkness! And yet withal this hypochondria, what was it but the very greatness of the man? The depth and tenderness of his wild affections; the quantity of sympathy he had with things—the quantity of insight he would yet get into the heart of things, the mastery he would yet get over things: this was his hypochondria. The man's misery, as man's misery always does, came of his greatness. Samuel Johnson, too, is that kind of man. Sorrow-stricken, half-distracted; the wide element of mournful black enveloping him—wide as the world. It is the character of a prophetic man; a man with his whole soul seeing, and struggling to see.

On this ground, too, I explain to myself Cromwell's reputed confusion of speech. To himself the internal meaning was sun-clear; but the material with which he was to clothe it with utterance was not there. He had lived silent; a great unnamed sea of Thought round him all his days; and in his way of life little call to attempt naming or uttering that. With his sharp power of vision, resolute power of action, I doubt not he could have learned to write books withal, and speak fluently enough; he did harder things than writing of books. This kind of man is precisely he who is fit for doing manfully all things you will set him on doing. Intellect is not speaking and logicising; it is seeing and ascertaining. Virtue, Vir-tus, manhood, hero-hood, is not fairspeoken immaculate regularity; it is first of all, what the Germans well name it, Tugend (Taugend daw-ing or Doughtiness), Courage and the Faculty to do. This basis of the matter Cromwell had in him.

One understands, moreover, how, though he could not speak in Parliament, he might preach, rhapsodic preaching; above all, how he might be great in extempore prayer. These are the free outpouring utterances of what is in the heart: method is not required in them; warmth, depth, sincerity, are all that is required. Cromwell's habit of prayer is a notable feature of him. All his great enterprises were commenced with prayer. In dark inextricable-looking difficulties, his officers and he used to assemble, and pray alternately, for hours, for days, till some definite resolution rose among them, some "door of hope," as they would name it, disclosed itself. Consider that.

In tears, in fervent prayers, and cries to the great God to have pity on them, to make His light shine before them. They, armed Soldiers of Christ, as they felt themselves to be; a little band of Christian Brothers, who had drawn the sword against a great black devouring world not Christian, but Mammonish, Devilish—they cried to God in their straits, in their extreme need, not to forsake the cause that was his. The light which now rose upon them—how could a human soul, by any means at all, get better light? Was not the purpose so formed, like to be precisely the best, wisest, the one to be followed without hesitation any more? To them it was as the shining of Heaven's own Splendor in the waste-howling darkness; the Pillar of Fire by night, that was to guide them on their desolate perilous way. Was it not such? Can a man's soul, to this hour, get guidance by any other method than intrinsically by that same—devout prostration of the earnest struggling soul before the Highest, the Giver of all Light; be such prayer a spoken, articulate, or be it a voiceless, or inarticulate one? There is no other method. "Hypocrisy!" One begins to be weary of all that. They who call it so, have no right to speak on such matters. They never formed a purpose, what one can call a purpose. They went out balancing expediences, plausibilities; gathering votes, advices; they never were alone with the truth of a thing at all. Cromwell's prayers were likely to be "eloquent," and much more than that. His was the heart of a man who could pray.

But indeed his actual speeches, I apprehend, were not nearly so ineloquent, incondite, as they look. We find he was, what all speakers aim to be, an impressive speaker, even in Parliament; one who, from the first, had weight. With that rude passionate voice of his, he was always understood to mean something, and men wished to know what. He disregarded eloquence, nay, despised and disliked it; spoke always without premeditation of the words he was to use. The Reporters, too, in those days, seem to have been singularly candid; and to have given the Printer precisely what they found on their own note-paper. And withal, what a strange proof is it of Cromwell's being the premeditative ever-calculating hypocrite, acting a play before the world. That to the last he took no more charge of his Speeches! How came he not to study his words a little, before flinging them out to the public? If the words were true words, they could be left to shift for themselves.

But with regard to Cromwell's "lying," we will make one remark. This, I suppose, or something like this, to have been the nature of it. All parties found themselves deceived in him; each party understood him to be meaning this, heard him even say so, and behold he turns out to have been meaning that! He was, cry they, the chief of liars. But now, intrinsically, is not all this the inevitable fortune, not of a false man in such times, but simply of a superior man? Such a man must have reticences in him. If he walk wearing his heart upon his sleeve for daws to peck at, his journey will not extend far! There is no use for any man's taking up his abode in a house built of glass. A man always is to be himself the judge how much of his mind he will show to other men; even to those he would have work along with him. There are impertinent inquiries made: your rule is, to leave the inquirer uninformed on that matter; not, if you can help it, misinformed, but precisely as dark as he was! This, could one hit the right phrase of response, is what the wise and faithful man would aim to answer in such a case.

Cromwell, no doubt of it, spoke often in the dialect of small subaltern parties; uttered to them a part of his mind. Each little party thought him all its own. Hence their rage, one and all, to find him not of their party! Was it his blame? At all seasons of his history, he must have felt, among such people, how, if he explained to them the deeper insight he had, they must either have shuddered aghast at it, or believing it, their own little compact hypothesis must have gone wholly to wreck. They could not have worked in his province any more; nay, perhaps they could not now have worked in their own province. It is the inevitable position of a great man among small men. Small men, most active, useful, are to be seen every where, whose whole activity depends on some conviction which to you is palpably a limited one; imperfect, what we call an error. But would it be a kindness always, is it a duty always or often, to disturb them in that? Many a man, doing loud work in the world, stands only on some thin traditionality, conventionality; to him indubitable, to you incredible: break that beneath him, he sinks to endless depths! "I might have my hand full of truth," said Fontenelle, "and open only my little finger."

And if this be the fact even in matters of doctrine, how much more in all departments of practice. He that cannot withal keep his mind to himself, cannot practise any considerable thing whatever. And we call it "distimulation," all this! What would you think of calling the general of an army a dissembler, because he did not tell every corporal and private soldier, who pleased to put the question, what his thoughts were about every thing? Cromwell, I should rather say, managed all this in a manner we must admire for its perfection. An endless vortex of such questioning "corporals" rolled confusedly round him through his whole course; whom he did answer. It must have been as a great true-seeing man that he managed this, too. Not one proved falsehood, as I said; not one! Of what man that ever wound himself through such a coil of things will you say so much?

The lovers and cultivators of flowers are meditating the establishment in Philadelphia of a flower market. Some one has written us remarks, which we publish in favour of this very amiable project.

FLOWER MARKETS.

The French count among the very useful and ornamental institutions of their capital, its flower markets. There are two principal ones, held every other day, supplying the citizens fresh flowers for every morning of the week—the large open spaces upon the quays, and in front of the Madeleine church, affording convenient places of exposition and display. The rich treasures are here tastefully set out in urns, baskets, hedges, arbours—delighting the eye with infinite colours, and embalming the air with delicious fragrance. Birds are chirping upon trees, in their ornamental cages, recommending themselves to purchasers, and now and then a Flora, or other garden divinity, is seen peeping through the penumbra of a rosebush. Ornamental baskets, garden seats interwoven from withes, seeds and shoots for engrafting, make up the assortment. By these markets the French afford employment to the poor, a means of innocent gratification to the rich, improve the public taste in flowers, and bring to the highest perfection the industry and skill of their horticulturists.

Among other benefits of these markets, the idlers of society are tempted from their sickly couches into healthful exercise and recreation. How dreary and disconsolate is a morning walk in Philadelphia! A lady of delicate habits lies still till the dog star has made the day insupportable, and exercise hurtful—till she has become nervous, peevish, unhappy—till the red has died in her cheek, and she is wan and withered and ugly. And the young gentleman of leisure—what is there to lure him from his dear and soothing and fascinating morning slumbers! He, too, heedless of the song of birds and fragrant breezes, presses till midday the soft down. Why go abroad where there is no eye to see, no appetite to be gratified; where his fine genteel air and embroidered waistcoat are lost upon the idle winds.

The English, too, are lovers of flowers, equally with the French, with this difference, that the taste in France is universal, while in England they keep "Flora's prettiest smells" for the noses of the gentility. They have no flower markets, but only shows of flowers, and every English lady is a great patroness of these floral institutions, to which you pay for admittance. Flowers, too, creep in at the window of every rural cottage, and look out from every city verandah upon the street. They are also, as in Paris, an essential part of the fashionable balls, concerts and saloons; and the English have great taste in the graceful arrangement of these ornaments. I went five years ago in London to a "Tulip show," having the most splendid collection of this fair family in the world. One of the sisters, beautifully feathered, was valued at 100 guineas. Though the same sun kindles the blush in the diamond as in the rose, says Pope,

"We prize the stronger effort of his power,
And always set the gem above the flower."

Not always, says the English tulip. How much more gaily the tulip blooms when you pay a crown for admission, and when one is "Florist to Her Majesty!"

I visited also a show of lilies—an exquisite flower in its perfection, and worthy to be the emblem of a race of kings.

—Great David's son
Arrayed in all his robes and types of power, Shone with less glory than that simple flower."

But that which throws all other exhibitions of this kind in the shade, is the English Horticultural.

For this "show," a garden is provided at Chiswick, five miles from London, and tastefully laid out into smooth lawns and walks, and here and there thickets of trees and shrubbery. Under tents, are exhibited the flowers: full bands of music are distributed in proper stations, and guinguettes, where those not content to live on this pure element, the air, find other refreshments—ham, bread and butter, ice cream, chocolate, and the everlasting tea. I surmounted the five miles to witness this fete, and did not repent of it. Here were twenty acres of green turf, fresh from the shears, and covered (as I learnt from the tickets left at the gate) with 14,000 persons—two thirds, of the beau sexe. It seemed like a rivalry between nature and art—between the animal and vegetable world. Shrubs, and sparkling flowers, in all their colours, and odours, music, and the fairest women upon the earth. The "senses ached." The day, too, was most favourable to romantic enjoyment. Fleecy clouds passing now and then over the sky, caused an intermingling of shade and sunshine, and the wind being lively and variable, the music awoke the senses, now, with a loud and thrilling melody—now, stole upon the ear as from a distance—and now, died away insensibly upon the breeze. I will not paint to you the flowers, the elegance and delicacy of tints, with which the eye was delighted, for indeed, my impression is, that our annual exhibition in Chesnut street is not generally inferior in beauty or variety, but only in quantity, to this of the English; but such a collection of vigorous and handsome men, and healthy, deep-bosomed, and beautiful women, is to be seen nowhere but in the moist and genial clime of Great Britain.

When Pluto came up to gather flowers in the sweet vale of Enna, he gathered Proserpine, and not the flowers; so would any god of taste at Chiswick.

In improving our institutions in America, we should adopt the good, and reject the bad, of all countries alike. For a floral exhibition, I can imagine no better model than this of London. Twenty acres of pretty women, with their escorts, for a single day, at half a guinea each—near 30,000 dollars! and the exhibition open several days. In an open garden, there is the enjoyment of fresh air, freedom from crowd, and beauty of perspective. The flowers are better displayed, and their colours invigorated by contrast with the green sward. For the rare, exclusive, and aristocratic pleasures, our best teachers are, indisputably, the English; but for the simple, republican, and positive enjoyments, which improve general human nature, and sweeten the common and daily intercourse of life, our instructors and the instructors for all the world, are the French.—The Philadelphia, like the London, Flora contents herself, with a display of her flowers, with the butcher's stall, and sets up in social sweetness by side of each other—tripes and tulips—a rump steak and a bouquet of roses. If there is any spot in our city sacred from mortar and brick, for heaven's sake let her have it for a Flower Market. By so doing you will furnish gratification to all, employment to many idle and destitute persons;—you will substitute public for secret meetings of pleasure—refined and liberal amusements, for those which are gross and disreputable. The French are to be imitated in this. The English do nothing for the refinement of the common world. London has, therefore, the most debased vulgar upon the face of the earth. It cannot be denied, that the poorer people of Paris are decent in their manners and dress, and graceful beyond the example of all other nations. The French open their galleries to the poor, and their Flower Markets, even on Sunday, which is perhaps wrong, or not necessary in our American cities. The English do not so desecrate religion—they gather, to be sure, in squads of five hundred at a time, around their gin palaces, pick pockets, and get drunk—men, women, and children—before breakfast; but, thank God, they do not sell and buy flowers on the Sabbath.

By its very intercourse with flowers, human nature seems to me to be improved. I have never seen beauty more attractive than at the Parisian flower-markets—so healthful and glowing with morning exercise—in colours emulating the purest tints of the rose. And the flower-girl, too—her two-penny frock hung as if by instinct upon her rounded limbs, and trying hard to hide her well-developed bosom, who, with tapering fingers, arranges you a bud and two leaves in your button hole, as if twined by the fingers of the graces—has an urbanity and attractiveness of beauty above all the other girls of her class. The love of flowers is the universal passion, transmitted from the first man and woman. I have seen many a lady of idle fortune, find amongst her flower pots a full employment of her time, deriving constant delight from their society, growing into serene and quiet dispositions, and saving her husband many a predestinated scratched face. To favour the establishment of gardens and galleries, and other means of pleasure which are healthful and public, and which, in giving delight, tend to refinement, is assuredly a duty enjoined upon all who have charge of the public morals. Amusement and recreation are among the necessities of human nature—the affections have their wants as imperious as those of the body—in the world's cold utilities the heart withers and dies.

We have at hand materials for an abundant "Flower Market," at least once a week, and taste is not wanting for its patronage and support. But where to locate it? Some point to the front of the State House, others of the Washington Square—neither convenient; but what have we better!

With what bitterness of reproach shall we be one day censured for this stinted economy of space. At individual, a Mr. Strutt, lately has fenced with ornamental railings of iron, and covered with shrubbery and fountains, a ten acre field he owned in the suburbs, and presented it to his native town of Derby for the use of the public. Is it not a shame that our congregated wisdom has not done so much as the public spirit of this one English gentleman has accomplished with no better a name than Mr. Strutt! Besides its fifty open spaces like the Palais Royal, Paris has four gardens, the Luxemburg, the Tuilleries, Garden of Plants, and Champs Elysees, of more than a hundred acres each, in the very midst of its crowded districts. Gardens of this extent adjacent to our Chesnut street, Schuylkill or Delaware, Southward and Northern Liberties, what a change would they have wrought upon the face of this fair city! The entire squares of Philadelphia may be conveniently spread upon the Park of St. James alone; and two of these squares we owe to the folly of our predecessors burying within the precincts of the city. The Franklin and Washington squares now adding so much to our comfort and health and beauty, were grave yards before they were public walks. Insatiate Moloch!—it is not by the living, but the dead, that those delicious spots, upon which our children play so innocently and sportively, and men and women expatiate with so much delight, have been snatched from thy grim empire of brick.

Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest. With Anecdotes of their Courts, now first published from Official Records and other Authentic Documents, private as well as public. From the second London edition, with corrections and additions. By Agnes Strickland. Vol. I. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1841.

The previous historical works of Mrs. Strickland, her zeal, impartiality, industry, and her chivalrous feeling towards the heroines of the olden time, all peculiarly fitted her for the writing of the work before us. Her researches among the ancient books and archives have brought a great number of curious, interesting and important facts to light; and her perpetual reference to the descriptions, letters, conversations, &c. of contemporaneous personages give a freshness and spirit to each of these "Lives," which will constitute their principal charm and their indisputable claim to popular favour. The work will be received by scholars as an invaluable addition to English history.

The first volume includes the lives of Matilda of Flanders, Queen of William the Conqueror; Matilda of Scotland, Queen of Henry I.; Adelicia of Leovaine, second Queen of Henry I.; Matilda of Boslogne, Queen of Stephen; and Eleanor of Aquitaine, Queen of Henry II. It is enriched with a portrait of Matilda, and printed and bound in elegant style.

The second volume is now in press, and will be issued in the course of a few weeks.

FROM MR. GRANT'S BOOK ON THE NESTORIAN CHRISTIANS.

Many convincing arguments are adduced by the author, to prove that the Nestorians are the veritable lost tribes of Israel. It is a highly interesting book. A great part of the country had not been explored by any preceding traveller.

"Oct. 26.—Started for the patriarch's residence at eight in the morning. Descended to the river and forded it on a horse, the first I had seen since entering the Nestorian country in the mountains. The water was waist deep, and fifty or sixty yards across. We now found a better road than I had seen for a long time before; the rock having been cut away, and regular steps chiseled out in the more precipitous and difficult places, leaving, at intervals, the excavated rock hanging over our heads."

"The patriarch, having heard of my approach, sent a horse, with some of his own men, to escort me to his dwelling, which stands far up on the mountain side. Our course continued about N.E., till we came in sight of his residence, when we recrossed the river on our right, at the mouth of a considerable creek which waters the district of Diss. A Koordish castle, the summer residence of Suleiman Bey, the second chief of the Hakary tribes, stands upon an eminence commanding this bridge, from which the mansion of the patriarch is distinctly visible, distant a little more than half a mile. A party of Koords who met us scrutinised me very closely, but offered no molestation. From a distance, I could see the patriarch looking out of his chamber window with a small spyglass, to get a view of his strange visitor from the New World."

"At half past twelve I found myself in the presence of the Patriarch of the East, the spiritual head of the Nestorian Church, who gave me a cordial welcome, but without that flow of heartless compliment and extravagant expression of pleasure which is so common in the mouth of a Persian. He said that he had been looking for a visit from some of our mission for a very long time, till he had begun to think we should never arrive; but, now that I had taken such a long and difficult journey to see him, he could not doubt that we would have given him the pleasure of an interview at an earlier day, but for an apprehension of the dangers to which I had alluded as the reason of our long delay. 'And now,' he added, 'you are doubly welcome; my heart is rejoiced that I see your face; and you will make my house your own, and regard me as your elder brother. It is a happy day for us both. May your journey be blessed.'

"The patriarch is thirty-eight years of age, above the middle stature, well proportioned, with a pleasant, expressive, and rather intelligent countenance; while his large flowing robes, his Koordish turban, and his long gray beard give him a patriarchal and venerable aspect, which is heightened by a uniformly dignified demeanour. Were it not for the youthful fire in his eye, and his vigour and activity, I should have thought him nearer fifty than thirty-eight. But his friends assured me that the hoariness of his beard and locks was that of care and not of age. His situation is certainly a difficult and responsible one, since he is, in an important sense, the temporal as well as the spiritual head of his people. To preserve harmony, and settle differences between the various tribes of his spirited mountaineers, and with the Koords by whom they are surrounded, is a labour that would tax the wisdom and patience of the greatest statesman; and I could hardly wonder that the hoar-frost of care was prematurely settling upon his locks. It was quite evident that the patriarch's anxiety extended not less to the temporal than to the spiritual wants of his flock; as his first inquiries related particularly to their political prospects, the movements in Turkey, the designs of the European powers with regard to these countries; and why they did not come and break the arm of Mohammedan power, by which many of his people had been so long oppressed, and for fear of which the main body of them were shut up in their mountain fastnesses.

"He is pacific in his disposition, and he carries his rifle in the anticipation of an encounter with the brown bear, the wolf, hyena, or wild boar of their mountains, rather than with the expectation of fighting their enemies the Koords. But, while the latter never enter the central parts of their country, they are sometimes brought into collision with them on their borders, as already noticed. Such had recently been the case in Tehoma and Jelu; and, during my visit at the patriarch's, he was called upon to decide what should be done with two Koords who had been taken by his people from a tribe that had some time before put two Nestorians to death. Blood for blood is still the law; and custom requires that a tribe be held accountable for the conduct of each of its members. Hence it mattered not whether the individuals they had taken were guilty of the murder; it was enough that they belonged to the same tribe, and by right they should die. The patriarch, however, was inclined to mercy, while his people, at the same time, must receive justice. After due deliberation and investigation of the case, the patriarch at length decided that, inasmuch as his people had brought the captive Koords into their own houses, they had, in a sense, become their own guests, and, consequently, their lives must be spared. But they might accept a ransom from the Koords; and thus the matter was finally settled.

"During five weeks which I spent at the patriarchal mansion, I had an opportunity to see Nestorians of the greatest intelligence and influence from all parts of their mountain abodes, and to elicit from them such information as I had not an opportunity to collect in any other way. I endeavoured by every possible means to collect satisfactory statistical and other information, to which I shall have occasion to recur in other parts of this work. I also visited some of the villages and places of chief interest in the vicinity."

"I made my arrangements to proceed on my way, (to Júlamerk, situated at the west side of the Nestorian Territory.) The parting scene was truly Oriental. The patriarch presented me with a pair of scarlet shahwars, the wide trousers of the country, trimmed with silk, and one of the ancient manuscripts of his library. It was the New Testament, written on parchment seven hundred and forty years ago, in the old Estrangelo character. His favourite sister Helena furnished us with a store of provisions sufficient for a week, and sent me a pair of warm mittens, made by her own hands from the soft goat's-hair of the country.

Finally, a thousand blessings were invoked upon my head, and ardent wishes were expressed that I might return with associates, and commence among these mountains a similar work to that in which we were engaged upon the plain. Our last repast was finished, the parting embrace was given, and I set off towards the residence of Nooroolah Bey, the famous chief of the independent Hakary Koords. He had removed from his castle at Júlamerk, the capital, and was now living at the castle of Bash-Kalleh, nearly two days' journey from the residence of the patriarch.

"A report that robbers were on the road occasioned some alarm as I pursued my way along the banks of the Zab. But no robbers made their appearance; and I passed on without molestation to the strongly-fortified castle of the chief, which was distinctly visible, long before we reached it, from the mountain spur on which it rests.

"Most unexpectedly I found the chief upon a sickbed. He had taken a violent cold about three days before my arrival, which had brought on inflammation and fever. I gave him medicine, and bled him, and then retired to my lodgings in the town, at the foot of the mountain on which the castle was built.

"In the evening the chief sent down word that he was very sick, and he desired that I should do something to relieve him immediately. I sent him word by his messenger that he must have patience, and wait the effects of the medicines I had given him. About midnight the messenger came again, saying that the chief was still very ill, and wished to see me. I obeyed the call promptly, following the long winding pathway that led up to the castle. The sentinels upon the ramparts were sounding the watch-cry in the rough tones of their native Koordish. We entered the outer court through wide, iron-cased folding doors. A second iron door opened into a long dark alley, which conducted to the room where the chief was lying. It was evident that he was becoming impatient; and, as I looked upon the swords, pistols, guns, spears, and daggers—the ordinary furniture of a Koordish castle—which hung around the walls of the room, I could not but think of the fate of the unfortunate Shultz, who had fallen, as it is said, by the orders of this sanguinary chief. He had the power of life and death in his hands. I knew I was entirely at his mercy; but I felt that I was under the guardian care of One who had the hearts of kings in his keeping. With a fervent aspiration for His guidance and blessing, I told the chief it was apparent that the means I had used were producing a good effect, though he needed more powerful medicine, which, for a time, would make him worse instead of better; that I could administer palliatives; but if he confided in my judgment, he would take the more severe course. He consented, and I gave him an emetic, which he promptly swallowed, after he had made some of his attendants taste of the nauseating dose to see if it was good. I remained with him during the night, and the next morning he was much relieved. He rapidly recovered, and said he owed his life to my care. I became his greatest favourite. I must sit by his side, and dip my hand in the same dish with himself. I must remain with him, or speedily return and take up my abode in his country, where he assured me I should have everything as I pleased. As I could not remain, I must leave him some of the emetics which had effected his cure.

"The chief had just heard of the case of a Koordish woman from whose eyes I removed a cataract while I was at the patriarch's residence. With a spice of the characteristic passion of her sex, she was curious to know what had been the effect of the operation, and, long before the prescribed time, she removed the bandage from her eyes. But so strange was the prospect that opened before her, that she was frightened, and immediately bound up her eyes, resolved thereafter to abide by my instructions. This story was so amusing to the chief, that he continued to divert himself by rehearsing it to his courtiers, with encomiums upon my professional skill too Oriental to repeat. He is a man of noble bearing, fine, open countenance, and he appeared to be about thirty years of age. He was very affable, and on my departure he made me a present of a horse, as an expression of his gratitude for the restoration of his health."

"The approach to Júlamerk from the river is very grand. The road rises along the face of the mountain, till at length the traveller looks down from an almost perpendicular height of more than a thousand feet. It was a part of the road which the governor of Salmas had described in the strong figurative terms already mentioned. The castle of Júlamerk stands upon an insulated mountain, in an opening between the higher ranges. It is distant three or four miles from the river, which is visible through the opening ravine.

"The bridge leading to the patriarch's residence had been swept away a few hours before my arrival, so that I could not cross the river and visit the tribes of Jelu, Bass, and Tehoma, as I at first intended; but I was so happy as to find the patriarch a guest with Suleiman Bey, the then presiding Hakary chief of Júlamerk. My reception was most gratifying; and during ten days which I spent in the castle, all my former impressions regarding the practicability and immediate importance of a mission in the mountains were fully confirmed. The confidence and interest of the patriarch in our work appeared to be increased, and he was joined by the chief in his repeated invitations for me to remain or speedily return.

"I everywhere found myself an object of much curiosity, as I had exchanged the wide, flowing robes and turban, worn on my former visit, for my own proper costume, which I was accustomed to wear in Persia, retaining my beard to establish my identity. But the people very properly remarked that there was quite a deterioration in my appearance. I must certainly have appeared like a smaller person; as I became aware on seeing the chief habited in my Frank dress, which he put on in his harem for the amusement of his ladies."

THE HERO AS KING.

CROMWELL, NAPOLEON, MODERN REVOLUTIONISM.

But, in fact, there are two errors, widely prevalent, which pertain to the very basis our judgments formed about such men as Cromwell; about their 'ambition,' 'falsity,' and such like. The first is what I might call substituting the goal of their career for the course and starting-point of it. The vulgar Historian of a Cromwell fancies that he had determined on being Protector of England, at the time when he was ploughing the marsh lands of Cambridgeshire. His career lay all mapped out; a program of the whole drama; which he then step by step dramatically unfolded, with all manner of cunning, deceptive dramaturgy, as he went on,—the hollow, scheming 'Углыарык,' or Play-actor that he was! This is a radical perversion; all but universal in such cases. And think for an instant how different the fact is! How much does one of us foresee of his own life? Short way ahead of us it is all dim; an unbound skein of possibilities, of apprehensions, attemptabilities, vague looming hopes. This Cromwell had not his life lying all in that fashion of Program, which he needed then, with that unfathomable cunning of his, only to enact dramatically, scene after scene! Not so. We see it so; but to him it was in no measure so. What absurdities would fall away of themselves, were this one undeniable fact kept honestly in view by History! Historians indeed will tell you that they do keep it in view;—but look whether such is practically the fact! Vulgar History as in this Cromwell's case, omits it altogether; even the best kinds of History only remember it now and then. To remember it duly, with rigorous perfection, as in the fact it stood, requires indeed a rare faculty; rare, nay impossible. A very Shakspeare for faculty; or more than Shakspeare; who could enact a brother man's biography, see with the brother man's eyes at all points of his course what things he saw; in short, know his course and him, as few 'Historians' are like to do. Half or more of all the thick-plied perversions which distort our image of Cromwell, will disappear, if we honestly so much as try to represent them so: in sequence, as they were; not in the lump, as they are thrown down before us.

But a second error, which I think the generality commit, refers to this same 'ambition' itself. We exaggerate the ambition of Great Men; we mistake what the nature of it is. Great Men are not ambitious in that sense; he is a small poor man that is ambitious so. Examine the man who lives in misery because he does not shine above other men; who goes about producing himself, pruriently anxious about his gifts and claims; struggling to force everybody, as it were begging everybody for God's sake, to acknowledge him a great man, and set him over the heads of men! Such a creature is among the wretchedest sights seen under this sun. A great man? A poor morbid prurient empty man; fit for the ward of a hospital, than for a throne among men. I advise you to keep out of his way. He cannot walk on quiet paths; unless you will look at him, wonder at him, write paragraphs about him, he cannot live. It is the emptiness of the man, not his greatness. Because there is nothing in himself, he hungers and thirsts that you would find something in him. In good truth, I believe no great man, not so much as a genuine man who had health and real substance in him of whatever magnitude, was ever much tormented in this way.

Your Cromwell, what good could it do him to be 'noticed' by noisy crowds of people? God his Maker already noticed him. He, Cromwell, was already there; no notice would make him other than he already was. Till his hair was grown grey; and Life from the downhill slope was all seen to be limited, not infinite, but finite, and all a measurable matter how it went,—he had been content to plough the ground, and read his Bible. He in his old days could not support it any longer, without selling himself to Falsehood, that he might ride in gilt carriages to Whitehall, and have clerks with bundles of paper haunting him, "Decide this, decide that," which in utmost sorrow of heart no man can perfectly decide! What could gilt carriages do for this man? From of old, was there not in his life a weight of meaning, a terror and a splendour as of Heaven itself! His existence there as man, set him beyond the need of gilding. Death, Judgment, and Eternity: these already lay as the background of whatsoever he thought or did. All his life lay begirt as in a sea of nameless Thoughts, which no speech of a mortal could name. God's Word, as the Puritan prophets of that time had read it: this was great, and all else was little to him. To call such a man 'ambitious,' to figure him as the prurient windbag described above, seems to me the poorest solecism. Such a man will say: 'Keep your gilt carriages and buzzing mob, keep your red-tape clerks, your influentialities, your important businesses. Leave me alone; there is too much life in me already!' Old Samuel Johnson, the greatest soul in England in his day, was not ambitious. 'Corsica Boswell' flaunted at public shows with printed ribbons round his hat; but the great old Samuel staid at home. The world-wide soul wrapt up in its thoughts, in its sorrows;—what could parades and ribbons in the hat do for it!

Ah, yes, I will say again: The great silent men! Looking round on the noisy inanity of the world, words with little meaning, actions with little worth, one loves to reflect on the great Empire of Silence. The noble silent men, scattered here and there, each in his department; silently thinking, silently working; whom no Morning Newspaper makes mention of! They are the salt of the Earth. A country that has none or few of these is in a bad way. Like a forest which had no roots; which had all turned into leaves and boughs;—which must soon wither and be no forest. Wo for us, if we had nothing but what we can show, or speak.

Silence, the great Empire of Silence: higher than the stars; deeper than the Kingdoms of Death! It alone is great; all else is small.—I hope we English which he was anxious to dispose of. After he had been established for some time, he called on an old established citizen, and told him that he thought of joining one of the religious bodies of the town, and wished to know which of them was the most influential. His friend imagined that he was in joke, and said that there was a simple way of solving that question. He took up the directory and showed the inquiring bookseller the lists of the directors of all the public institutions. He desired him to write down their names, and he would tell him what sects they belonged to. The bookseller accordingly folded his paper for columns, and wrote on the heads of them, "Presbyterian," "Methodist," "Catholic," "Quaker," "Baptist," "Unitarian," "Universalist," "Jew," &c., and under these heads entered the names of the directors of the institutions, according to the information of his friend. The result was a clear demonstration that the "Presbyterians" were by far the most numerous and powerful sect in the public institutions, whence the inference was drawn that in all probability they would be the most influential in the general affairs of the city. He thanked the gentleman (who still believed that it was a jest) and departed. But it was neither a joke nor a mistake. The bookseller found out which was the wealthiest presbyterian congregation, offered to join them, and presented a handsome gift to the church, and neatly bound copies of his bible to the minister and elders. He was admitted a member, was widely praised among the congregation, sold all his bibles, obtained extensive credit, had a large store and ample trade, and might have done well. But, like too many others, he speculated and ruined himself. At his bankruptcy, the rich men of the congregation were his creditors, one to the extent of $20,000, another of $15,000, another of $10,000, and so forth, every man according to his means!

This is no uncommon occurrence in other countries, and it is a proof of the real Christian spirit of the individuals who are thus cheated. Having entire confidence in the efficacy of their own faith to regenerate the human mind, and being perfectly sincere themselves, they do not suspect the roguery of others. In reference to an individual of a character very similar to this, who had come from Scotland, I was asked, "How do you reconcile the strange and striking discrepancy between the religious professions and the commercial reputation of your countryman Mr. A. B.?" The explanation which I offered, and which I knew to be supported by facts, was, that in the class of persons to which Mr. A. B. belongs, the organs of Acquisitiveness, Secretiveness, and Veneration, are plus, and those of Conscientiousness minus. The large Veneration gives them a strong interest in religious worship, and to this extent their professions are sincere. It reveals to them also the power of this sentiment in other minds. Their large Secretiveness and deficient Conscientiousness, when combined with acute intellect, render them apt at swindling and deceit; and thus accomplished, they are tempted to employ the religious feeling as a means of gratifying their Acquisitiveness.

Many religious persons refuse to believe in the possibility of any individual being sincere in his religious feelings, and at the same time dishonest. They conceive that his religious professions must in such a case be entirely hypocritical. The great cause of their erroneous judgment on this subject, is that, in their conception of religion, they always include morality, and hence conclude that wherever devoutness is really present, morality must necessarily be so also. They are right in holding that the Christian religion embraces both faith and practice, and that no man is a true Christian who does not "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with his God." But they err in not knowing that the natural aptitude of individual minds to discharge these three duties, depends mainly on the size of three separate cerebral organs; and that one or two of them may be small, and the third large, or vice versa; that, for example, the organs of Benevolence and Conscientiousness may be large, and that of Veneration small, and then the individual will be greatly disposed to justice and mercy, but very little to the externals of devotion; while in another the proportions may be reversed, and he may be greatly interested in acts of devotion, but very little addicted to honesty and goodness. When religious men shall rise above their prejudices, and use Phrenology as a means of discovering natural dispositions, they will find less difficulty than at present in discriminating between the sheep and the goats within their fold.

The Deaf and Dumb Institution.—Every Thursday at half past 3 o'clock there is a public exhibition of the manner in which the deaf and dumb are taught. This exhibition, which is well attended by the citizens, serves to support the interest of the public in the institution, and enables strangers to obtain information concerning it without interrupting the ordinary studies of the pupils. Three boys and three girls appeared. They wrote words and sentences with readiness and intelligence, illustrative of any idea or subject that was proposed to them. One of the girls told a little story, in which she employed not only words spelled by the fingers, but also signs and natural language. She was exceedingly animated. Phrenology reveals the natural attitudes, and the expressions of the features and voice, which accompany the predominating activity of many of the faculties. This is called the natural language of the faculties; it is universal wherever man exists, and could be used to great advantage in the instruction of the deaf and dumb. We visited the workshops, and saw the boys making shoes and the girls sewing. The children are numerous, and they seemed healthy and happy. Mr. Hutton, their head teacher, was gentle, quiet, kind, and intellectual in his intercourse with them.

Exclusion of Sectarianism from the Common Schools.—I have already quoted the tenth head of the public "regulations for common school districts," which provides that "the religious predilections of pupils and their parents or guardians shall be sacredly respected." It is only four or five years since this resolution was practically adopted by the board of directors of the common schools. Before that time, every teacher indoctrinated the children under his charge with his own notions. One was zealous in training up the children to be Calvinists and Presbyterians; on the floor above, a Baptist teacher was busy propagating his peculiar views; in another school a Roman Catholic teacher was infusing Catholicism, and next to him a Universalist was with equal zeal engaged in imbuing the youthful minds with his faith. The complaints of the parents were incessant, that their children were taught dangerous and heretical errors under the guise of religion; each applying these epithets to all opinions that differed from his own. At last it was proposed to prohibit all doctrinal instruction in the common schools, and to leave to parents, pastors, and Sunday school teachers, the duty of inculcating the peculiar tenets of the different sects. At first this proposal was vigorously opposed, and described as "infidel;" each sect hoping to obtain the exclusive possession, if not of the whole, of at least a limited number, of the schools, which they should manage in their own way. All, however, stood firm in objecting to their neighbours obtaining the exclusive jurisdiction of any, as they were all supported out of a common fund, and, in the end, the exclusion of all was unanimously adopted, as the only practicable means of solving the difficulty. This rule is now in force, and is found to answer well. In the evenings of week days, as well as on Sundays, I see troops of children going to the "lecture rooms" under the churches, where they are taught the peculiarities of their faith by their several pastors.

Defective Teaching in Common Schools.—The infant school system has not flourished in Philadelphia. So far as I could discover, it has never been in operation in an efficient form, and it is now generally laid aside in the common schools. Pictures, and a few natural objects, may still be seen in some of the schools, but they are rarely if ever used. The great object aimed at, is to teach the children to read fluently. They read long passages with ease, without understanding the meaning of them. One of the female teachers, to whom I remarked this circumstance, acknowledged the fact, and said, in explanation of it, that the parents insisted on the children being rendered great readers; that they complained to the directors of the time spent in explaining words and teaching objects as being "lost;" and that the directors, to satisfy them, desired her to make them "read," and not to waste time in giving explanations. She obeyed, and certainly the children read with great fluency; but the meaning of the words is to a great extent unknown to them. In my lectures on education, I adverted to the errors of this mode of teaching, and told my audience that it reminded me of the mode of teaching English in a certain Highland school in Scotland. The children, whose vernacular tongue was Gaelic, were taught to spell, pronounce, and read English correctly and fluently, and, at a public examination, they displayed such proficiency, that the clergymen present were about to compliment the teacher publicly on his meritorious exertions, when a friend of mine, one of the proprietors of the parish, struck by the mechanical tone of the reading, put several questions to the children regarding the signification of the passages which they had read. He found them ignorant of the meaning of the words. The teacher had omitted to translate the English into Gaelic, and, although they could read and pronounce the words, they did not understand the former language.

The children in the Philadelphia schools are to some extent in a similar condition: they read works on the history of America and other subjects, the language of which is so far superior to the expressions contained in their domestic vocabulary, that, while unexplained, it is to them a foreign tongue. I urged on my audience the indispensable necessity to the welfare of the country that the education of American children should embrace solid instruction in things, and not consist of words merely; and that training also, or daily discipline of the dispositions, should be regarded as of great importance to them. I earnestly advised them to invite Mr. Wilderspin to visit their country, and to show them a few good infant and training schools in operation; after seeing which, they would not long tolerate their present inefficient system. I respectfully recommend to the trustees of the Girard College, if they wish to benefit Pennsylvania, to engage Mr. Wilderspin to spend six months in organising an infant and training school in their seminary. In England, Scotland, and Ireland, the most efficient schools are those which embrace most of his principles and practice.

The Yellow Fever in Philadelphia.—Upwards of thirty years ago, (1805,) Philadelphia was visited with yellow fever, and the disease raged like a pestilence. Dr. Parrish, then a young man, volunteered to act as assistant resident physician in the Yellow Fever Hospital. He told me that he never experienced the least fear, and never was sick for a day. All the inhabitants who could leave the city had fled, and at noon it was still as at the midnight hour. The hospital was situated near the river Schuylkill, a short distance from town, and though for seven months he resided in it amidst the sick and the dying, yet he was happy. He was constantly engaged in discharging his duty, and no seven months of his life seemed to him so pure and bright in the retrospect as these. This is easily understood. He has a beautiful development of the organs of the moral sentiments, combined with fair intellect, and all these faculties glowed with beneficent and pleasing excitement. His first convalescent patient was an old woman. When he saw symptoms of recovery, he removed her into a private apartment to relieve her from the shocking spectacles of the dead and the dying which filled the public ward. She petitioned to be carried back, it was so lonely to be left by herself in a room. He complied with her request, and she recovered. The attendants became so careless, that he often saw a man, when relieved from duty, instead of going into an adjoining house prepared for him to sleep in, enter a bed from which he had just removed a dead patient, wrap himself in the bed clothes, sleep soundly, and take no harm. The Catholic priests were constant in their attendance; while the clergymen of other denominations rarely ventured within the walls. In such scenes the celibacy of the Roman Catholic priesthood has a value.*

He saw an aged priest proceed to administer extreme unction to a woman who was fast dying. She refused to repeat certain words. He told her she could not be saved unless she complied. He explained, argued, and entreated. She continued obstinate, sunk back, and died. As she expired, the old priest shed a flood of tears. Dr. Parrish was deeply affected, and said that the scene carried home to him a strong conviction of the priest's sincerity and benevolence. At a subsequent period of my residence in the United States, I had the pleasure of meeting with Dr. Caldwell, of Louisville, who mentioned that he also had resided in the Yellow Fever Hospital as an assistant physician, and that, in his opinion, the exciting causes of the disease were confined to the town of Philadelphia. Of the hospital attendants, not one who had never entered the town was taken ill. Some who visited the town during the day were seized with the disease; and of those who slept all night in it scarcely one escaped. He never entered the town, and enjoyed perfect health.

Dr. Parrish on Liberty of Conscience.—A few years ago, a young lady wrote a letter to Dr. Parrish, who is a Hicksite Friend, in which she says—"I had no personal acquaintance with you. I never listened to your conversation on general topics, and probably never may, at any future period. But I have seen you at the couch of sickness; I have seen you, by the benignant smile of sympathy, soothing the suffering invalid, and, with accents of sweetness, cheering the room of sorrow. And, oh! I have said, Shall such a mind be inveigled into those absurdities and awful delusions, as ridiculous to every truly sober understanding, as they are dreadful to the view of any Christian! Shall such a mind be led captive in the most fearful species of enthralment, that of blasphemy and infidelity, under the imposing garb of the most refined spirituality—of the most professedly sublime and elevated religion," &c. She prays that he may become an evangelical Presbyterian.

He wrote a reply characterised by Christian benignity in its most beautiful form. "In the extensive practice of my profession," says he, "for many years I have been accustomed to view poor, frail human nature in its most unveiled forms. The longer I live, the greater is my compassion for erring humanity. I have observed, that, in the hour of deep affliction, the Episcopalian, the Presbyterian, the Methodist, Baptist, Roman Catholic, Friend, &c. &c. notwithstanding their various modes of faith, all call upon one common God and Father. Among these, none manifest more composure than the Catholic, after confession and absolution by his priest. Thou wouldst perhaps call him an idolater, when thou sawest him with the crucifix, on which his dying eye was reposing with confidence and consolation, as he was passing through the dark valley of the shadow of death. Were I in the same situation, and the priest were to offer me similar consolations, I should reject them at once, as 'absurd and ridiculous,' so far as they related to me. Yet never have I dared, at such a moment, to attempt to unsettle the mind of a Catholic by an exposition of my own religious views. I have also seen the poor despised Jew, calm and resigned on the bed of death, unshaken in the religion of his fathers. Surely these things should teach us a lesson of charity, remembering we are dust.

"I have often admired, and been humbled in beholding, the simplicity of the Gospel, as taught by our Divine Master. In the first place, he commissioned poor fishermen to be its promulgators. Does he refer us to nice theological distinctions—or are we called upon to test each other by opinions and speculations? Look at his plain directions delivered in his sermon on the Mount. Hear his positive declarations—"A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit; wherefore, by their fruits ye shall know them." And in the hour of final judgment, on what is that judgment predicated? Is it on orthodox opinions, or on practice? 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungered and ye gave me meat, I was thirsty and ye gave me drink, I was a stranger and ye took me in, naked and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me, in prison and ye came unto me,' &c.

"From the views now unfolded, it will be perceived, although thou art a Presbyterian and I am a Friend or Quaker, yet, with my present feelings, between us there must be no controversy. Claiming sincerity for myself, I award it fully to thee," &c.

"When I perceive the bitter fruits which are so often produced by the conflicting opinions of professing Christians, my mind is affected with sorrow; yet it is at seasons consoled by the reflection, that, happily for the human family, they are not to be finally judged by any earthly tribunal, but by a heavenly and compassionate Father, who pities his erring children; who sleeps not by day, nor slumbers by night; but who watches over us for good, and numbers the very hairs of our heads: And although justice and judgment are the habitations of his throne, yet thanksgiving and praise be ascribed unto our God, for his mercy endureth for ever."*

CHAPTER XIV.

April 7. Therm. 53°. Spring.—This day is agreeably warm. The apricot trees are in full blossom; the weeping willows, which abound in the public squares, are in full leaf, and the buds of the other trees are rapidly swelling; the grass, from dark russet, has become green. The stoves with which the boxes of the police-watchmen are furnished are no longer used. Every thing indicates the dawn of summer.

Fires.—The fire-engines were out this morning at seven, again at 2 P. M., and now, 10 P. M. the State House bell is announcing a third fire in the southwest part of the city. We see the sky red and lurid, and the engines are rushing and roaring past our windows. The words "roaring" or "braying" scarcely convey an idea of the hideous noise which the leader of an engine makes through a brass or tin trumpet as he advances. It is intended to sound an alarm, and to give notice to clear the streets for the passage of the procession.

April 8. Therm. 50°. Fraud Detected.—One of the judges mentioned to me a curious detection of a fraud which had occurred in his experience on the bench. The judge himself has been in the practice of writing his private notes in the Greek character, although in the English language. Those notes have occasionally fallen into the hands of persons who have taken them for Greek, and they gave him a reputation, which he was far from claiming, of being a great Greek scholar. On one occasion a German Jew was brought into court charged with fraudulent bankruptcy. The judge asked to see his books. "Oh," said the counsel for the Jew, "you need not take any trouble about them, for they are all written in Hebrew, and nobody can understand them." He, however, insisted on seeing them. They were produced, and were written in the Hebrew character certainly; but, judging from

* I hope that I may be excused for mentioning, to the honour of the Scottish clergy, that they ventured boldly into the Cholera Hospitals at Edinburgh, and administered consolation to the sick and dying, at a time when that disease was regarded as even more formidable than the yellow fever.

* This excellent man has gone to render his own account to the tribunal which he describes. A few days after he gave me a copy of this correspondence, I parted with him apparently in excellent health, and in a green old age. When I returned to Philadelphia, in April, 1840, he had just died. He was esteemed and beloved by men of all sects and parties in his native country, and I cannot withhold my feeble tribute of respect to his excellent qualities.

own practice, it struck him that they might nevertheless be in the German language. He asked forward a man whom he saw in court who spoke the same dialect of German as the Jew did, and made the Jew read aloud his own entries in books. The German understood every word them. The books were unraveled, and the text completely exposed.

Objections to Infant Schools.—One of the actors of the common schools informed me that he perceived the advantage of teaching by objects, but that he had laboured to introduce cabinets of natural history and philosophical apparatus into common schools, but that he met with great difficulties. The infant schools had been given because the children were found not to be prepared by them for the higher schools. Their instruction needed to be begun anew. Although they could multiply twenty by twenty by the aid of Wilderspin's board, yet when they came into higher school where no board was used, they did not multiply six by six. Although they did name a lion from his figure in a picture, and state its natural history very learnedly, they did neither spell nor read its name. I offered hypothetical explanations of these facts: first, it may have happened that the infant school teachers were themselves imperfectly informed and trained, which I considered highly probable, because I had not been able to discover a single copy of Wilderspin's work on infant schools in the city of Philadelphia. If so, the teachers may be omitted to instruct the children in words as well as objects, which is a complete departure from the true principles of infant teaching. Secondly, the masters in the higher schools may have taught words so exclusively, that children who had been trained to connect an idea with every word may have been completely at a loss when words were presented to them without pictures. He said, that his own experience had led him to the conclusion that the great obstacle to the success of infant and other schools for teaching by objects, was the want of trained and capable teachers. Some of the teachers are appointed through political influence, and have no ideas to communicate. I repeated to him the great service that Mr. Wilderspin had rendered to this much of education in Britain, and urged him to use means for obtaining his assistance.

I find that most of the directors of the public schools are men engaged in business, who mean well towards education, but who do not understand the subject. Besides, they have not sufficient time to devote to the schools. They see that their own district receives its proper proportion of the fund appropriated to education (for Philadelphia above $200,000 annually,) and that is expended on schools; but this is nearly all they can accomplish. It is, nominally, the duty of the secretary of the commonwealth to superintend all the public schools, but as it is impossible that he can discharge this duty, he scarcely attempts to do so. Party enters so largely into every appointment in Pennsylvania, that there is some danger that, if a secretary for public instruction were appointed, the office might be conferred, in consideration of capacity to discharge its duties, but as a reward for political exertions. The ignorance of the people constitutes a serious obstacle to the improvement of education in this state; and to me it was curious to see the same impediments to this great cause arising here from popular ignorance, which in England flow from the hostility of the church and the aristocracy!

April 9. Ther. 55°. A Firemen's Fight.—

The newspapers to-day contain a report of a trial on cross bills by individuals of rival fire companies, who fought for possession of a fire-plug or station, and each has prosecuted the other for an assault!

April 10. Ther. 35°. Effects of Democracy.—One accustomed to European cities detects subordinate influences of the democratic principle in the American cities, which probably escape the observation of natives. The carriage way in the streets in Philadelphia is paved with round water-worn stones, apparently gathered from rivers, and is consequently rough. The foot way is beautifully paved with brick, and is very smooth. The whole traffic of the town, carried on in wheelbarrows, proceeds on the foot pavement. Even in the best streets, the citizen must give way to the wheelbarrow. The foot pavement is raised 6 or 8 inches above the carriage way, and the barrows have a little wheel fixed on a sort of outrigger in front, to enable them to mount up to the side pavement after each crossing. In European cities, all vehicles are generally confined to the carriage way.

Moyamensing Prison.—This is the name of the prison for the county of Philadelphia. It is a modern structure, and consists of solitary cells in corridors 280 feet long and three stories high. It is conducted on the same principles with the Eastern Penitentiary. The physician who kindly accompanied me in my visit, assured me that the treatment pursued in these two prisons is not injurious to health. There are no baths, cold or warm, for the prisoners, and no yard for exercise. I should imagine a warm bath once a week would produce, both morally and physically, a beneficial influence on these convicts. Their cells are thoroughly ventilated. There is an aperture in the wall on the level of the floor, communicating directly with the external atmosphere, for allowing the air to enter, and a hole in the opposite wall, just below the ceiling, for allowing it to escape into a ventilating chimney, which goes to the roof. The prisoners, however, on the different floors, contrive to converse and communicate through these lower openings. This prison also has a kind of water-closet in each cell.

Nothing has struck me more than the extensive want of this accommodation in the American cities. Every reproach ever heaped on Scotland for its barbarism in this respect, may now be transferred to the United States. Very few of the best hotels can boast of civilisation in this particular; and in Philadelphia, where there is abundance of water, there are sad deficiencies even in genteel houses. This want must be enumerated among the efficient and even important causes of bad health. The most refined and sensitive individuals of both sexes suffer great inconvenience rather than travel from twenty to fifty yards in the open air, when the thermometer is at zero, or very little above it; and to those who are labouring under intestinal affections, exposure in these frozen regions is fraught with the greatest dangers. I have heard physicians of great experience lamenting the extent of suffering that may be traced to this cause; yet they hesitate to urge publicly means for removing it, through dread of giving offence.

The Dangers of Riches.—In this city, refined, easy, social intercourse, for the sake of relaxation and enjoyment, is rather limited. The dinner hour is two or three o'clock. A hasty meal is swallowed, and the merchant returns to his counting-house, the lawyer to his briefs, and the physician to his routine of visits. Digestion is interrupted by this sudden return to mental and bodily exertion, and dyspepsia extensively prevails. These various persons return home to tea; but they have neither vivacity, ideas, nor feelings, for passing the evening in easy conversation. They are pressed down in mind by a load of business which they cannot throw off, or exhausted by labour and bad digestion, so as to have little enjoyment in society. There is no idle class to cultivate society as an object. One family tried to have an easy party once a week, to keep open house in the evening, but the attempt was unsuccessful. For several weeks, a few were induced to come, then they left off coming, and so the experiment failed. Some would not go, just because it was an innovation, and because, by staying away, they could disappoint the innovators, and prevent them from establishing a practice which every one might not be disposed to adopt. If a young man inherits a fortune and follow no profession, it generally happens that in less than ten years he ruins his fortune in low pursuits. In a few years more his health is equally reduced with his estate, and he is banished from society, or admitted only on sufferance. These young men are pitied, their fate is predicted, and the prophecies are too generally realised. There is no class to sustain them in the condition of idlers, and no sinecure offices for them in the institutions of the country. The few who form exceptions to this rule are men of natural taste and refinement, who engage in literature or science as a pursuit. These are esteemed happy.

April 11. Ther. 60°. The Maine War.—The Monongahela packet ship has just arrived at Philadelphia, and brings the "Liverpool Standard" of the 8th March. This is the only communication from England since the news of the vote of 50,000 volunteers reached that country, and the paper is read with intense interest. It ascribes the war to the whig ministry, and depicts to the Americans the certainty of their ruin, if they go to war, just as the American papers have been, for some time, exulting in the ruin of England, as the consequence of hostilities. It is lamentable to see the two freest and most enlightened nations of the world thus gloating over the prospect of each other's destruction, in consequence of a dispute about a piece of waste land, which is not worth more in fee-simple than the value of two line-of-battle ships. It is said here that a million and a half of dollars would purchase the disputed territory out and out! The anxiety for the arrival of the Great Western, with official despatches, is great. Already the derangement in business, the fall of stocks and property, and the apprehensions of another bank suspension in this city, have cast a gloom over society, and war is already deprecated by the multitude as earnestly as, a few weeks ago, it was invoked.

Black-Foot Indians.—Mr. Catlin has kindly presented me with two skulls of Black-Foot Indians, from the base of the Rocky Mountains, sent to him by Mr. Mackenzie. They approach pretty closely to the Caucasian variety in form, but they are smaller than the skulls of the Anglo-Saxon race. The organs of Combativeness and Destructiveness are very large. The organs of Firmness and Veneration are large, while those of Benevolence and Conscientiousness are small. The anterior lobe devoted to intellect is pretty well developed. This combination indicates a ferocious, cruel, warlike disposition, the more formidable that the intellectual capacity is greater than in many of the Indian races. Dr. Morton the 8th day of April inst., while in the prison hospital, from disease; the fatal termination of which was hastened by flogging, labour, and general harsh treatment, imposed by the agent, Elam Lynds, and Galen O. Weed, one of the keepers, and also by inexcusable neglect and want of proper care on the part of the physician, Lansingh Briggs, who reported him from time to time as well, when actually sick."

April 19. Therm. 48°. The Election.—This evening the democratic party celebrated its triumph with processions, banners, transparencies, illuminations, squibs and crackers. Every thing passed off without disorder.

April 21. Therm. 37°. Sunday.—I heard the Rev. Mr. Dewey preach an excellent sermon, in which he spoke freely and decidedly against the late manifestations of the national spirit for war, and reproved the corruptions practised at the last election. He depicted the immorality of war; but said that, when a people is absorbed in a sordid love of gain—when its political institutions are defiled by perjury and bribery—war, with all its horrors, will be a less evil than the natural fruits of such a social condition. This is a striking proof that, under the voluntary system, a preacher is not necessarily led to gloss over the imperfections of his flock.

Dr. Channing's Answer to Mr. Clay's Speech.—Dr. Channing has addressed and published a letter to Jonathan Phillips, Esq., in answer to Mr. Clay's speech on slavery. It is exciting much attention, and is an admirable production. It is full of the eloquence and energy of the moral sentiments. He introduces a powerful rebuke of the Philadelphians for burning Pennsylvania Hall because abolition meetings were held in it. The Philadelphians are beginning to be ashamed of that outrage.

April 22. Therm. 43°. Universalists.—The Rev. Mr. Ballou, a universalist minister from Boston, preached here yesterday, and denied the existence of the devil, and of eternal punishment. Bennett's newspaper deprecates such doctrines as extremely dangerous; for, if they be believed, there will be no check on the "Loco Focos," and the Wall street brokers!

April 23. Therm. 51°. Tit for Tat.—The Chartists.—As a set-off against the charges made by the English press against the Americans for their mob atrocities, the papers here are recording the precautions of the British ministry against the chartists. It is said that large bodies of horse, foot, and artillery, and a rocket brigade, have been sent into the manufacturing districts of England to prevent an expected appeal to arms by these men. In the United States no risings of the people in arms are necessary to obtain a redress of grievances. They accomplish their sovereign will quietly through the ballot-boxes. In England the masses are so untrained to freedom that universal suffrage would lead to revolution; but their entire exclusion from all control over the government is attended with great evils. British legislation is partial to the higher and middle classes, and, in many particulars, unjust to the people. If the latter were allowed to send fifty representatives to the house of commons, their grievances would be proclaimed and remedied. They might be authorised to elect delegates by whom the direct nomination of the representatives should be effected. By some such machinery, they might be permitted to wield a reasonable degree of influence over the legislature without introducing the evils of universal suffrage. The chief recommendation of universal suffrage in America is its effect in forcing the more enlightened members of the community to exert themselves earnestly to instruct and improve the masses for their own protection. We want such an influence in Britain very much; and a limited and indirect representation of the people would be more effectual, and far more desirable, than armed insurrections. The latter probably will never cease until the former be granted.

The Licentiousness of the Press.—The following paragraph, taken from "The Boston Transcript," is another example of reprisals:—"We had heard and read much of the licentiousness of the public press of London, but had no adequate idea of its infamous extent, until we received, a short time since, from a friend in London, who sent them to us to enlighten our ignorance, six or seven copies each of 'The Crim. Con. Gazette,' and 'The Bon Ton Gazette,' papers which are sold openly in the streets for a penny a copy, and of which thousands are circulated daily. The contents of these papers are so disgusting, that we found it next to impossible to read them. We do not believe that we could have made, from the whole lot, half a column of extracts, that any Boston publisher or editor would dare to lay before his readers. And this is the garbage on which the minds of tens of thousands of the inhabitants of London feed daily."

The Park Theatre.—When we arrived in New York in September last, the public gave Mr. Wallack, the manager of the Park Theatre, a complimentary benefit at $3 for each ticket to all parts of the house. On the 19th of April, they gave him another benefit at the same rate, and on both occasions the theatre is reported to have been crowded.

April 24. Therm. 56°. High Prices of Provisions.—There are great complaints in the eastern cities of the high prices of provisions, particularly of beef. In Philadelphia it costs from 8d. to 9d. a pound, and in New York from 9d. to 10d. Various causes are assigned for this unusual state of the markets. It is said by some that in 1836-7 the mania for speculation had so completely seized all classes, that even the farmers were affected by it, and abandoned tillage for trafficking in shares and lots, in consequence of which there is now a real scarcity of farm produce. Others say that, for many years past, cattle were reared and fattened in the west, then sent to the Atlantic cities, and sold cheaper there than they could be reared on the eastern border; that this led to the neglect of grazing in the east; that the west has now become so densely peopled that it consumes all its own cattle, and that this is the cause of the scarcity in the eastern cities.

Should British Dissenting Clergymen emigrate to America?—This question is often put by letters to the American clergy, and personally to individuals who have visited the United States. My advice to them is to let well alone, and stay in their own country, if they can obtain a decent livelihood. A clergyman must be born and "reared" in the United States to fit him for his situation and duties. The deficiency of domestic service—the high rents and exorbitant prices of most manufactured and imported articles in the cities—the limited extent of social habits—the arduous labour—the strict surveillance exercised by society over official persons—and the overwhelming force of public opinion—render the United States no paradise to well educated men accustomed to social life in Britain.

April 26. Therm. 57°. Extension of New York City.—The speculating mania which seized this people in 1836 has left traces which it will require several years to obliterate. Large tracts of ground, cleared and levelled for building, lie waste at the north end of the city, waiting for the extension of the population. It is probable that more money has been lost and won in speculation on these "lots," than would have sufficed to cover them all with buildings. There is a substratum of truth in Cooper's descriptions of the scenes that occurred at that time, in his novel, "Home as Found."—"Can you tell us the history of this particular piece of property, Mr. Hammer?" said John Effingham to one of the most considerable auctioneers. "With great pleasure, Mr. Effingham; we know you have means, and hope you may be induced to purchase. This was the farm of old Volkert Van Brunt—five years since—off which he and his family had made a livelihood for more than a century, by selling milk. Two years since, the sons sold it to Peter Feeler for a hundred dollars an acre; or for the total sum of 5000 dollars. The next spring Mr. Feeler sold it to John Search, as keen a one as we have, for 25,000. Search sold it at private sale to Nathaniel Rise for 50,000 the next week, and Rise had parted with it to a company, before the purchase, for 112,000 cash. The map ought to be taken down, for it is now eight months since we sold it out in lots, at auction, for the gross sum of 300,000 dollars."

* * * * * "And on what is this enormous increase in value founded? Does the town extend to these fields?"—"It goes much farther, sir; that is to say, on paper. In the way of houses, it is still some miles short of them. A good deal depends on what you call a thing in this market. Now if old Volkert Van Brunt's property had been still called a farm, it would have brought a farm price; but as soon as it was surveyed into lots, and mapped——" "Mapped!"—"Yes, sir, brought into visible lines, with feet and inches. As soon as it was properly mapped, it rose to its just value. We have a good deal of the bottom of the sea that brings fair prices in consequence of being well mapped."

I was long puzzled to discover what this last statement, about selling "the bottom of the sea" at fair prices, alluded to, until I saw a large map of Manhattan Island in an apartment of the State House, New York; and sure enough a number of lots appear on it extended into the sea, at New York city, Brooklyn and Haerlem. There are intended for wharves, and were favourite subjects of speculation under the name of "water lots."

We may laugh at the Americans for these follies, but in 1814-15 they were equalled in Leith in sugar speculations, and in Edinburgh, in 1824, in building and joint-stock company adventures.

American Judges.—This evening I had the pleasure of meeting with three distinguished men who have held, or now hold, the office of judges, and they seemed to me to be well qualified to command respect in any country. One of them told me that the abolition of imprisonment for debt for small sums had produced excellent effects in the State of New York; that subsequently the measure had been extended to all sums, and be thought that the abolition, when thus extended, had encouraged gambling speculations and fraud.

Spring.—We had a drive to-day into the country on the middle road, and returned by the Bloomingdale road. The fruit trees are in full blossom, and the forest trees are fast bursting. Spring proceeds with extraordinary rapidity, but I miss the sweet scolding of the lark which cheers the British spring. Here the groves are silent; but the plumage of the feathered race is strikingly beautiful in its colours.

The Cause of the High Prices of Provisions.—The editor of "The Pennsylvanian" says that the disease of America "is the credit system." "We have become a nation of speculators. The whole mass of society is affected with the gambling spirit; and in the pursuit of a royal road to wealth, while the head works, the hands are idle. Men will not stay to dig and to delve when impressed with the conviction that city loans or new lands will convert them into nabobs." "The disease must work out its own cure." "When men find that all cannot be rich, that speculation and this massive emigration are merely a feverish mania, and that farming and grazing for the supply of large cities, form a sure and profitable business, then, and probably not till then, will provisions be sold at reasonable rates, and preserve some degree of steadiness." This, as already mentioned, is a democratic paper, but in no country could the press address the people in bolder or sounder terms than these. The heat of last summer (1838) was excessive in the United States, which rendered provender deficient in quantity, and this also must have had a great effect on the supply, and consequently on the price, of cattle.

April 29. Ther. 55°. The Asylum for Coloured Orphans.—To-day we visited the Asylum in Twelfth Street for coloured orphan children. It was opened in July, 1837, and is managed by ladies. It contains between fifty and sixty negro children, of both sexes, from five or six to twelve or thirteen years of age. They are clothed, fed, boarded, and taught; and although the building is too small for so great a number, it is kept in excellent order. The children are taught on the infant school system, and performed their exercises well. They have a play-ground behind, and are encouraged to take abundance of exercise. One little child, born in slavery, and recently liberated and sent to the asylum, presented a more stupid aspect than the others sprung from free parents. This may have been the result of its condition in slavery, without intelligent companions, or other stimulants to its mental faculties. In the course of my inquiries, I learned that a considerable number of deaths had occurred within the first two years. The disease in a majority of cases was scrofula in one or other of its varied forms. It was ascribed to the scanty and improper diet of the children before admission, and to the insufficiency of nutriment contained in the regular but light food supplied in the asylum. For some time no animal food was allowed, and Indian corn meal, and brown bread made of rye and unbolted wheaten flour, were among other things largely used. One of the consequences of this kind of diet was inordinate irritation of the mucous membrane of the bowels, and almost constant diarrhoea. The orphans were so enfeebled, that many sunk under the acute and epidemic or contagious diseases peculiar to childhood, which more robust children would have passed through in safety. Both the managers and physician became convinced of the necessity of improving the diet of the establishment. A change was accordingly made in this respect, as well as in others of equal importance, and was followed by a remarkable improvement in the health of the children. Animal food is now used four times a week in a solid form, and twice in soup. White bread, rice and milk, the vegetables of the season, &c. are abundantly supplied. It is now a year since there has been a death in the asylum, where no less than fifteen deaths occurred during the preceding eighteen months. This extraordinary exemption from mortality is not ascribed to change of diet only, but to this and other ameliorations of perhaps greater importance introduced by the enlightened and benevolent managers of the asylum. The experiment, however, has been repeatedly made of going back from the better to the poorer kinds of food, and uniformly with injurious consequences.

April 30. Ther. 54°. General Washington's first Presidency.—This day the Historical Society of New York celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of General Washington as President of the United States, on the 30th April, 1789. Deputations of learned men assembled from various parts of the Union to attend the ceremony. The meeting, which was held in the Middle Dutch church, was opened with prayer; an ode, written by Mr. Bryant, was sung by the choir, and then Mr. John Quincy Adams delivered an "oration." By a very proper arrangement, ladies and the gentlemen who accompanied them were admitted first, and afterwards the doors were opened to gentlemen. Being unaccompanied by a lady, I obtained a place only in the second pew from the front of the gallery, far from the speaker. A young American, with a quid of tobacco in his cheek, who sat before me, put his feet on the seat of the pew, and sat on the board that holds the Bibles, in front of the gallery, and effectually cut off every possibility of my seeing Mr. Adams, and the distance prevented me from hearing him. I sat upwards of an hour without having caught one sentence of the "oration," which, from its effects on the audience, appeared to be eloquent. Mr. Bryant's ode was as follows:—

"Great were the hearts, and strong the minds
Of those who framed, in high debate,
The immortal league of love that binds
Our fair broad empire state with state.

"And ever hallowed be the hour,
When, as the auspicious task was done,
A nation's gift, the sword of power,
Was given to glory's unspooled son.

"That noble race is gone; the suns
Of fifty years have risen and set;
The holy links these mighty ones
Had forged and knit, are brighter yet.

"Wide—as our own free race increase—
Wide shall it stretch the elastic chain;
And bind in everlasting peace,
State after state, a mighty train."

The day was concluded by a grand public dinner of the Historical Society.

From the reports of the oration, I afterwards discovered that it was essentially an historical resumé of the political history of the United States.

"Never," says Mr. Adams, "since the creation of the globe, has such a continuous scene of prosperity and glory blessed any people as was conferred by the constitution. Yet it was most obstinately and pertinaciously contested. Never did human foresight so completely fail as in the doubts entertained of its success. Nor Washington nor Hamilton dared to hope that it would act so well in practice as it has done. Between the 4th of March and 14th of April, 1789, Washington wrote thus to Knox:—"This delay is to me in the light of a reprieve; my feelings are like those of a culprit going to the place of execution. Without the requisite political skill, to be taken thus in the evening of life from the quiet scenes of domestic felicity, and required to take the helm of affairs and guide this untried and doubtful machine, leaves me small hope of success. I am embarking my good name in a shallow bark on an unknown and tempestuous sea; but be the voyage long or short, two things, my integrity and firmness, shall never forsake me. Whether I succeed or fail, please or displease upon other points, these the world can never deprive me of."

"Opposed to him and his principles were many eminent patriots of the revolution. They rallied under the flag of state rights; their cry was for unlimited state sovereignty, and unlimited state independency, not amenable to the Union. These denounced the best men of the day, with Washington at their head, as federalists and Tories. He was embarking upon this troublous sea a good name, unparalleled in the annals of history. In his Diary he says, 'About 10 o'clock I bade adieu to Mount Vernon, to private life and domestic felicity.' Yet he was deceived. His progress from Mount Vernon to New York was one continuous triumphant procession. All ages, both sexes, all conditions of persons, turned out to greet their friend and preserver, and demonstrate their enthusiastic admiration of him. In passing over the Schuylkill bridge a wreath of flowers was, unconsciously to himself, dropped on his head by a blooming boy placed in a triumphal arch above him. At Trenton a band of aged matrons turned out to welcome and thank him for the defence of their property, their persons, their all—thirteen years before. The virgin daughters of those mothers strewed his path with flowers, and with a song sublime as that of Miriam hailed him as their protector, who had been the defender of their mothers.

"It is delightful to look back upon the long vista of fifty years, and see all the bright visions of hope formed by those good men more than realised; and all their despondency and doubts more than dispelled."

CHAPTER XV.

May 1. Ther. 61°. Rent and Taxes in New York.—A comfortable family house, of about twenty-five feet in front, and from forty to forty-five feet in depth, consisting of kitchen, dining-room, drawing-room, and bed-room floors, in a medium situation, lets at $800, or 160*l.* of rent, and pays about $80 per annum of taxes.

The Erie Canal.—This canal, which connects Lake Erie with New York, through the medium of the Hudson River, although only begun in 1817, has already proved too small for the extent of trade which passes through it, and a vivid discussion is proceeding in the legislature about widening and deepening it, and constructing double sets of locks; so that the stream of boats may never be interrupted except by frost. This extraordinary increase of traffic has been caused by the rapid development of the population and resources of the western parts of the state of New York, consisting of a vast extent of rich alluvial soil now nearly all cleared and settled; and also by the rapid advance in wealth and population of the states which border on the great western lakes. The town of Buffalo, in the state of New York, is situated at the terminus of the canal where it enters Lake Erie. It has a spacious harbour, in which may be seen three-masted vessels, brigs, schooners, and from fifteen to twenty large steamboats, all plying an active trade.

"The property from other states passing into the Erie Canal by Buffalo, increased as follows in the last four years:

1835,	22,124 tons.
1836,	36,273
1837,	42,229
1838,	96,187

"The merchandise passing to the West from Buffalo, was 1835,	18,466 tons.

1836,	30,874
1837,	22,236
1838,	32,087

"The amount of wheat and flour, those great articles of western produce, increased steadily from 15,935 tons, in 1835, to 57,979 tons in 1838."*

It is only by contemplating such facts as these that one can form a conception of the extraordinary rapidity with which the western states are rising in population, industry, and wealth.

Female Lecturer on Physiology.—Mrs. Gove, a lady belonging to the Society of Friends, impressed with the great importance to the female sex of instruction in anatomy and physiology, pursued a regular course of study in these subjects, under the Professors of Boston, and then commenced lecturing on them to ladies. She was well received in Boston, and has recently lectured in New York. She is a lady of unquestioned character, and her lectures were attended by most respectable persons of her own sex in this city. No gentlemen were admitted. The advantages of this instruction are self-evident, and every real friend to human welfare must wish her success; Bennett's "Morning Herald," however, to its own deep disgrace, has published what he pretends to be reports of her lectures, pandering to the groveling feelings of the men, and alarming the delicacy of the ladies—an effectual way, in this country, to stifle any new attempt at improvement. I have inquired into the character of the lectures, of ladies who heard them, and they declare Bennett's report to be scandalous caricatures, misrepresentations, and inventions.

May 2. Ther. 65°. Dr. Channing on War. One of the excellent qualities of Dr. Channing is his moral intrepidity. There never was a more sincere devotee to truth than this excellent man; and, not content with enjoying it himself, he comes forth to apply it to practical use, on all occasions when legitimate opportunities occur. No one who has not visited the United States, and witnessed the prostration even of powerful minds before public opinion, can form an adequate conception of the extent of Dr. Channing's moral courage. Generally, when the public mind goes farthest wrong, it burns with the intensest vivacity, and displays the most formidable unanimity. Its ordinary leaders shrink from addressing it when thus excited. Dr. Channing, on the contrary, on such occasions comes forth in dauntless might. He has just published a sermon on war, delivered in the beginning of last year, with a preface adapting it to the present crisis. It is calculated to have the best effect in bringing the minds of the people to reason, and amply supports Dr. Channing's high reputation.

Lord Brougham on the Maine Boundary.—Lord Brougham, in his place in the house of peers, and in reference to the Maine boundary dispute, is reported to have said, "He had the consolation of believing, of being convinced, that we were undeniably, clearly, and manifestly in the wrong; and when a man or a nation was in the wrong, to acknowledge error did not make the case of either worse." The Americans are highly commending this acknowledgment. In a company to-day, I heard the speech discussed, when a sagacious old gentleman said, "I wish that an honest man had said so, and it would have served us more!" This remark terminated the conversation.

May 4. Ther. 43°. Spring.—The peach, pear, and apple trees, are profusely covered with blossoms; the foliage of the forest trees is partially unfolded, but there are no "gowans" to deck the ground in this country.

Protection to Negroes.—The House of Assembly has passed a bill to secure a trial by jury to "alleged fugitives from service in other states," anglicæ, slaves, before being delivered up to their masters. The claimant must prove to the satisfaction of the jury, "the identity and escape of the alleged fugitive," who shall "be defended by counsel at the expense of the state." The bill enacts, that "the alleged fugitive shall be entitled to subpoenas for his witnesses without any charge; constables serving the same shall have their fees from the country;" and "every witness summoned shall be bound to attend without fees, as in criminal cases. No claimant shall have a writ to arrest a fugitive from labour, until he shall have filed, in the office of the county clerk, a bond in the penalty of $1000, with two sureties, conditioned to pay all costs and expenses legally chargeable against him; also the sum of $2 per week for the support of the fugitive while in custody; also all expenses of the fugitive in case the decision shall be against the claimant; and also the sum of $100 to the alleged fugitive and his damages." The bond may be prosecuted "by any person claiming benefit from its provisions, in the name of the people; but the people shall not be liable to costs in such suit."

This bill does credit to the House of Assembly of New York.

Public Defaulters.—The newspapers teem with instances of cashiers, tellers, and directors of banks committing enormous frauds, embezzling funds, sending false certificates of deposit into circulation, and so forth. While we were in Philadelphia, Dr. Dyott was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to the Moyamensing prison for fraudulent bankruptcy, committed by him on a gigantic scale as a banker. A committee of the legislature of Michigan has just investigated the affairs of the Bank of Ypsilanti, and reported, "that they consider the failure of the bank an instance of as glaring a fraud as was ever perpetrated in this or any other community"—and, in conclusion, report a bill for the repeal of the charter of the said bank.

Slavery, Emancipation, and Colonisation.—A correspondence has appeared in the New York Journal of Commerce, between the Rev. Benjamin Tappan of Augusta, Maine, and F. S. Key, Esq., a lawyer of Washington, on the subjects of slavery, colonisation, and emancipation. The letters are written in an excellent spirit, and Mr. Key describes the state of slavery in impartial terms. They should be read by every one who desires to form a correct idea of the difficulties which beset slave owners, even of the most humane and upright dispositions, in accomplishing abolition. Slavery cannot permanently exist in a state bordering on a free state. When Maryland has free her slaves, Virginia, after a few years, will be compelled to follow her example, by two causes, 1st, The slaves will escape easily; and 2dly, Free labour will come in and displace them. He contemplates the irresistible advance of freedom by this process. He is a warm advocate of colonisation, because the negroes prosper in Africa; while, in the United States, emancipated slaves become immoral and wretched. The greater number of slaves whom he has seen set free have perished miserably from incapacity to maintain themselves. As a lawyer, he has assisted many slaves to obtain freedom; but very few, indeed, have improved their condition by liberty. If the men in the north would receive the slaves, and provide for them as freemen, there are a great number of slaveholders in Maryland who would willingly emancipate their negroes and send them to the north. The exertions of the abolitionists are said to have retarded emancipation and injured the slaves. A man loses caste who deals in slaves, or who treats them harshly.

These are a few of the topics touched on in Mr. Key's letter, and I believe that his representations contain much truth. It may be remarked, however, that there are two causes for the unsatisfactory conduct and condition of emancipated slaves in slave states: 1st, A life spent in slavery deprives the individual of self-will and self-reliance, and of those intellectual resources which are indispensable to successful exertion. 2dly, In such a society there is no legitimate place for liberated slaves. Every thing is cast in the mould of slavery, and free negroes are unwelcome residents among slaves and their masters. The masters regard their presence as calculated to render the slaves discontented, and are disposed to throw impediments in the way of their success, rather than remove them. General abolition would not be attended by these causes of failure, particularly if the slaves were previously prepared by education for freedom.

A Traveling House.—This day a wooden house, supported on large beams, mounted on four wheels, and drawn by horses, passed our windows in Broadway, in its progress from one situation in the city to another.

"The Church of the Messiah."—A handsome new Unitarian church, for the Rev. Mr. Dewy, has just been opened in Broadway. It is built of stone, and is of Gothic architecture. It has a gallery, and altogether is seated for 1500 persons, and is said to have cost $100,000. The pews are lined with dove coloured damask; they have stuffed backs, and cushions for the seats. It has a very chaste and elegant appearance. The "Morning Herald" reports that Dr. Skinner, who has a Presbyterian church in the near neighbourhood, preached a sermon on the occasion, on the text, "Dagon appeared alongside of the ark of the covenant," and warned his congregation against the Unitarians.

* Report by Mr. Verplanck to the Senate of New York State.

Design.—We visited the fourteenth annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design. The pictures consist chiefly of portraits and landscapes. A feeling for art, and a power of colouring, are conspicuous in the works; but with the exception of the pictures of Mr. Sully, Mr. Ingham, and a few others, the portraits stand low in the scale of excellence. In many of them the drawing of the heads is bad, the attitudes are stiff, and the countenances staring. The subjects look as if they were sitting for their pictures. They have put on a face for the occasion, and in many of them the expression is so full of Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation (intended for character and smartness) that the pictures are almost ludicrous.

The scheme adopted for the encouragement of art in Scotland, and which has been successful, is much wanted in the United States. A society was formed, each member of which paid at least £1 ($5) per annum. A committee of the subscribers laid out the money in purchasing the best pictures, offered for sale by living artists at each annual exhibition. The pictures were formed into lots, and distributed among the subscribers, whose names were drawn from an urn. These pictures are now spread over all Scotland, and have increased the general taste of the people for works of art. The sum paid for pictures has in some seasons exceeded £3000, and this has afforded encouragement to the artists in the best possible form—that of remuneration for their talents and labour.

The United States are at present in a condition analogous to that of Scotland. There is no general taste for the fine arts among the people; no rich aristocracy to purchase statuary and pictures, and, therefore, no adequate encouragement to artists. Yet there are many thousands of persons who, from a favourable feeling towards art, and from the hope of gaining a prize, would willingly subscribe $5 per annum to such a society as I have described. If the Americans will try the plan, it can scarcely fail to succeed. They have both the temperament and development of brain that will produce excellence in the fine arts, if they will only enable artists to live.

Phrenology in the Family.—The Rev. Joseph A. Warne, A. M., an Evangelical clergyman, and pastor of the church near the Museum in George street, Philadelphia, has published "Phrenology in the Family," 18mo, pp. 290; a work intended to assist parents in the education of the feelings. It points out the character and legitimate uses of each primitive feeling, the ordinary forms in which it is liable to be abused by children, and the best means of training it to proper modes of action. It is calculated to be highly useful in domestic education.

May 7. Ther. 56°. Benevolent and Religious Societies.—The annual meetings of the great benevolent and religious societies of the Union are now taking place in New York, and they present striking evidence that, however active the acquisitive and ambitious propensities of this people may be, their benevolent and religious sentiments are far from being dormant. The crowds of persons in attendance, and the large sums of money contributed, bespeaks a vigorous and general activity of the moral faculties.

American Anti-Slavery Society.—An abstract of the annual report was read by one of the secretaries of the society. By this document it appears that the present number of abolition societies is 1650—of which 304 are new societies, formed since the last anniversary. The number of presses devoted or open to the discussion of slavery has increased, and now amounts to 9 weekly, 1 semi-monthly, and 2 monthly publications, from which are issued 25,000 sheets weekly, and for the support of which $40,000 are annually received from subscribers.

American Tract Society.—The fourteenth annual report states, that during the year 1833 new publications have been stereotyped, making the whole number of the society's publications 944, of which 58 are volumes. In addition to these, 672 works, including 50 volumes, have been approved for publication abroad. Of some tracts more than 100,000 copies have been printed within the year, and of one 184,000 copies; total printed during the year, 356,000 volumes, 3,657,000 publications; 124,744,000 pages.

American Bible Society.—Abraham Keyser, Esq., the treasurer, read his annual report. The receipts during the year were $95,126 82, and the expenditures $98,205 31. The Rev. John C. Brigham, the corresponding secretary, announced a donation by James Douglas, Esq. of Cavers, in Scotland, to the society, of £1000 sterling. The report next alludes to the calls for supplies of the holy Scriptures in various parts of the world, to the amount of $50,000. During the past year the issues were 134,937 copies, and the total number 2,588,285. These copies were in seventeen different languages.

Traveling Houses.—To-day I saw another wooden house of two stories, bearing on one corner "Washington Place," and on another "Greene street, traveling to a new site. Planks were laid down before it on the carriage-way, rollers were placed on the planks, and the house was dragged forward on them. The motive power was applied thus: Large iron bolts were driven deep into the ground eighty or one hundred yards in advance of the house; the bolts supported a windlass, to which was attached a strong cable, the other end of which was fastened to the house by pulleys and a hook. A horse, by turning round the windlass, wound up the cable, and the house slowly advanced on the rollers. When it was brought up to the windlass, the latter was carried forward another 100 yards, fastened to the ground, and the same operations were repeated.

May 9. Ther. 56°. Paterson Village.—This is a manufacturing village in New Jersey, eighteen miles from New York. We visited it by a railroad. It is built on the banks of the Passaic river, near a large fall, which supplies water-power for several important manufactories. The scenery is picturesque. We visited Mr. Colt's manufactory of rifles, which discharge eight balls in succession with one loading, also of pistols that discharge four balls. There are these numbers of barrels, which can be turned round to the same lock: Of course, when once discharged, there must be a corresponding extent of reloading; but in the Indian wars, and in cases of attack by robbers, these rifles are like loaded batteries in the hands of the assailed. The workmanship appeared to be excellent, and the number sold is said to be large.

May 12. Ther. 56°. Religion.—I heard the Reverend Mr. Bellows preach. He said that the vulgar notions of heaven being a place where men stand through all eternity doing nothing but singing psalms, and of hell consisting in flames, and darts, and devils, are altogether unworthy of an enlightened age. Heaven consists in the highest activity of our faculties directed to proper objects, which confers the highest delight; Hell in the abuse of our faculties, with the consequent misery. I heard this discourse criticised by some persons as too free: others approved of it, and said that preaching in general is far behind the enlightenment of the age; and that there is a greater desire for liberal, rational, and practical sermons, in the United States, than I could infer from the character of the sermons which I usually hear.

An advertisement has appeared in the following terms:—

Christian Liberty.—The Association for the Promotion of Christian Liberty will hold its first anniversary at the Stuyvesant Institute, on Friday evening, at half past seven o'clock. The cardinal principle of the association is, that American Christians, in their religious associations, are entitled to as much liberty as they enjoy in their political associations as American citizens. Persons disposed to unite with the association, and the public generally, are respectfully invited to attend. David Hale, Leonard Crocker, Wm. C. Redfield, S. F. B. Morse, Geo. R. Haswell, Seth B. Hunt, Wm. T. Cutter, Committee.

"May 9, 1839."

The meeting was held, but, as few persons came forward to join the association, it was adjourned.

Sale of Pews.—The pews in the "Church of the Messiah" have been sold by auction, and their prices are reported in the newspapers.

There are 196 pews in the church, and they were valued at $97,378. Of these, seventy-four in the body of the church were sold at prices varying from $1200 to $401, according to the size and the situation, and twenty-two in the gallery at prices ranging from $475 to $125. There are still 100 pews left unsold, valued at $39,478, making with those sold, a total of $101,298, being $3924 above the estimated values. These sums are applied in defraying the expense of building the church. The owners of the pews contribute annually towards keeping the church in repair, supporting the minister and the choir, and defraying all other necessary expenses. The salary paid to the Reverend Mr. Dewy was stated by one of the congregation to be $4000 per annum, with leave of absence for nine weeks, during which the congregation pays for supplying the pulpit. This is the only church about which I have been able to obtain so much information, but I presume that the Evangelical congregations are equally liberal to their pastors. The sums paid annually by individuals for church accommodation appear to be much larger in this country than in Britain.

Election Law.—On the 7th May the legislature of the state of New York passed a law to remedy the abuses complained of at the elections. It enacts, that any person swearing falsely as to his qualification, shall be guilty of perjury, and persons wilfully procuring others to swear falsely, shall be guilty of subornation of perjury; and both shall be punished accordingly. Persons attempting to influence or deter an elector in giving his vote, shall pay a fine not exceeding $500, or suffer imprisonment not longer than one year, or both. Persons voting or offering to vote in a ward in which they do not reside, or more than once at an election, shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, or by both. Persons advising or assisting others not duly qualified to vote, shall suffer the same punishment. Any inhabitant of another state voting or offering to vote in this state, shall be guilty of felony, and shall be confined in the state prison not more than one year, &c.

If the republican form of government be fertile in abuses, it is gratifying to observe the promptitude and energy with which checks and remedies are applied to mitigate or remove them.

May 14. Ther. 66°. Police of New York City.—I have more than once made remarks on the imperfections of the police system in New York, and perceive that the evil is attracting public attention. The "Journal of Commerce" contains a letter describing New York as the dirtiest city in Christendom. It complains of the huge dirty swine perambulating the foot pavements, one of which ran against the writer of the letter. They, however, he says, do great service to the city, for they eat up the animal and vegetable matter thrown out into the streets, which otherwise would breed a pestilence—in fact, they are the chief scavengers. The sting of this representation lies in its essential truth.

It is no part of the public duty of the police officers of this city to trace out and apprehend thieves and robbers who have committed depredations on private persons. A number of them exercise this vocation on the employment of the persons who are pillaged, and who either pay them fees, or engage to give them a certain proportion of the stolen property if they recover it. The police magistrates do not concern themselves in the matter, until the thief be detected and brought before them for judgment, and there is no other functionary whose duty it is to superintend the efforts of the officers to bring delinquents to justice. In short, in New York an experiment seems to be in progress to ascertain with how little of government a great city can possibly exist. I do not think that it has great cause, at present, to boast of its success.

May 16. Ther. 66°. Phrenology.—This day I was introduced to James J. Mapes, Esq., a scientific gentleman, residing in 461 Broadway, New York. His daughter fell from a window when she was about four years of age; her head struck against the iron bar which extended from the railing to the wall, and the skull was extensively fractured, but without rupturing the pia mater, or doing any serious injury to the brain. She was attended by Dr. Mott; a part of the skull was removed from the superior-posterior portion of the head, the integuments were drawn over the wound, and the child recovered. The part of the skull removed was that which covers the organs of Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation. She does not wear any plate over the wound; but the hair over it, like that on the other parts of the head, is fine, and is kept short. Immediately after the wound was closed, her father was struck with the variety of movements in the brain, and its great mobility during mental excitement, producing, as he said, a sensation in the hand when placed on the integuments, as if one were feeling, through a silk handkerchief, the motions of a confined leech. He felt as if there was a drawing together, swelling out, and a vermicular kind of motion in the brain; and this motion was felt in one place and became imperceptible in another, according as different impressions were made on the child's mind: but not being minutely acquainted with phrenology, he could not describe either the feelings or the precise localities in which the movements occurred. He observed also, that when the child's intellectual faculties were exerted, the brain under the wound was drawn inwards.

The child was introduced to me; she is now eight years of age, healthy and intelligent; and no external trace of the injury is visible to the eye. The form of her head is that of a superior female child: it is long, and moderately broad at the base; Secretiveness, Love of Approbation, Self-Esteem, Cautionness, and Firmness, are all large. Benevolence and Veneration are well developed, and the anterior lobe is large. I saw the pieces of the skull which had been removed. They may be three and a half by three inches in superficial extent. The skull has not been replaced. On applying my hand, I felt the brain rising and falling with the respiration, and distinctly ascertained that the organs of Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation were denuded of the skull; also a small part of Conscientiousness, and the posterior margin of Firmness. Her father mentioned that, before the accident, he considered her rather dull; but her mother (whom also I had the pleasure of seeing) did not concur in this opinion; both, however, agreed that since her recovery she had been acute, and fully equal to children of her own age in point of ability.

With the permission of her father and mother, I kept my hand for some minutes gently pressing on the external integuments over the site of the injury, and distinctly felt a considerable movement, a swelling up and pulsation, in the organs of Self-Esteem; and the same movements, but in a less degree, in those of Love of Approbation. When I began to talk to the child, she was shy and bashful, and at first would scarcely speak.* The vivid movements in Self-Esteem indicated that amidst her extreme bashfulness this organ was active. As I continued to converse with her, and succeeded in putting her at her ease, the movements in Self-Esteem decreased, while those in Love of Approbation continued. I spoke to her about her lessons and attainments, not in flattering terms, but with the design of exciting Self-Esteem; and the movements increased. Again I soothed her, and they diminished. This was repeated, and the same results ensued. Her father gave her several questions in mental arithmetic to solve: she was puzzled, and made an intellectual effort, and the peculiar movements in the organs of Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation ceased; only a gentle and equal pulsation was felt. She solved the question, and we praised her: the peculiar movements in Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation returned and increased. This experiment was repeated at least four times, with the same results. I took out a piece of paper and began to write down notes, in pencil, of what had occurred. She looked at my writing; and as all attention was now withdrawn from herself, and her mind was occupied intellectually in observing what I was doing, I placed my hand on the integuments, and only the gentle and regular pulsations of the arterial system were perceptible.

I am much indebted to Mr. Mapes, the father of the child, for permitting me not only to see this very interesting case, but to publish his name and residence, so that my remarks may be verified, or corrected if I have erred.

This case is replete with instruction in practical education. It tends, so far as one example can go, to prove that, by exercising the intellectual faculties, we do not necessarily excite the feelings; and also that each feeling must be addressed by objects related to itself before it can be called into action."

* "Bashfulness is the result of the fear of not acquitting one's self to advantage, and of thereby compromising one's personal dignity." System of Phrenology, 4th edition, p. 792.

Shipwrecks.—A gentleman called on me to-day, who said that he did so in consequence of having read the observations on shipwrecks in storms contained in the "Constitution of Man." He stated that he had been bred to the sea; had served as mate, and subsequently, for four years, as master of a merchant vessel; and had, in the course of his own experience, come to the conclusion that not above one shipwreck in twenty was excusable, and that nineteen vessels out of every twenty were lost through ignorance, incapacity, or carelessness in the masters, or through avarice in the owners, who sent them to sea in an improper condition. When mate of a vessel, his captain became tipsy, and, in the very gathering of a storm, ordered the crew to set more sails. My informant took the responsibility upon himself of assuming the command of the vessel, ordered the captain below, took in all the sails except one, and trimmed the ship with the utmost expedition. He had scarcely finished, when the rising storm became a tempest; he laid the ship to, and she rode it out well. In the middle of the tempest the captain re-appeared on deck, having slept himself sober. He was astounded at the sea and the wind, and recommended that even the one sail should be taken in, but he was persuaded to allow it to stand. The captain never forgave him for having "mutinied," as he termed it; and my informant left the ship when she made her destined port in the Mediterranean.

The Franklin Fund.—I was introduced to-day to a gentleman in extensive business as a dial-plate maker; and he mentioned that the beginning of his elevation in the world was a loan of $250 from the Franklin Fund. He speaks with great gratitude and respect of Franklin's provident generosity.

May 16. Ther. 66°. Physical Geography of America.—A very intelligent friend, lately a member of the house of assembly in the legislature of New York, told me that he had read with great interest an article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, by Charles Maclaren, Esq., of Edinburgh, on the physical geography, &c. of America. He regarded it as a masterly view of the physical features of this country. I told him

* Some years ago a similar case was reported by Mr. John Grattan of Belfast in the Phrenological Journal, vol. ix, p. 473, and vol. x, p. 11. Two fissures having the appearance of the fontanelles in children, and which looked as if there had been an absorption of the bone, had existed for at least six years in the head of a gentleman aged fifty-six. So far as Mr. Grattan could learn from mere description, they were situated—the one on the left nearly over Veneration and part of Firmness, and that on the right across part of Conscientiousness and Hope; "and I am positively assured," says Mr. G., "by his daughter, that his clerks could at any time tell when he was angry, without hearing him speak or seeing his face, but simply from the great depressions which on such occasions occurred in those fissures, or, as they termed it, 'the holes that would appear in his head;' and that she has at different times observed the same phenomenon herself." The lady states farther, that "the depressions remained so long as he was under the influence of passion; and, as it subsided, the depressions gradually disappeared." See other cases in my System of Phrenology, 4th edit. p. 16.

that Mr. Maclaren had never been in America; when he remarked that few readers would have discovered this to be the case.

Haerlem.—We visited some friends a few miles beyond Haerlem, in a beautiful situation overlooking the East River. The strawberries and green peas are in full blossom, and the gooseberries ready for tarts.

May 17. Therm. 63°. Staten Island.—We visited this lovely island, and had a drive to the old fortification and signal port, New Brighton, &c. Staten Island is the quarantine station in the bay of New York. About a quarter of a mile from the shore strong posts have been driven into the bottom of the sea, and a large platform erected on them, partly covered with a roof. Emigrants are transferred to this platform from their ships, and inspected by the health officer before being permitted to land. We saw a multitude of them on it like sheep in a pen.

May 18. Therm. 64°. Phrenology.—This evening I completed my second course of lectures in New York, and a committee was appointed to present resolutions.

May 19. Therm. 63°. Dr. Channing.—We heard the Rev. Dr. Channing preach in the church of the Messiah on the text "Blessed are the peace-makers." The church was crowded in every part. The sermon was replete with moral beauty, and the delivery was gentle, earnest, and touching. He gave a graphic view of the present state of the social, religious, and political struggles of this country. He regarded them as only the natural workings of the human mind groping its way to freedom; and anticipated that they will lead to universal love and justice, which alone can form the basis of universal peace. Civilisation is progressive, and it cannot attain to its highest condition until peace, based on benevolence, and justice, prevail. The discourse was listened to with the profoundest attention, and much spoken of afterwards.

Twenty years ago, no congregation in New York would admit Dr. Channing into its pulpit. His first sermon in this city was delivered in a private house, and his second in an anatomical lecture-room. Now, the unitarians have two handsome churches, well attended by highly respectable congregations.

I perceive that the liberality of the different sects towards each other increases in proportion to the number and standing in society of the adherents of each. In Boston, the unitarians are numerous, and belong to the first class. There I could discover no ostensible prejudice against them. The governor of the state and almost all the judges of the courts were unitarians; and among the magistrates and school directors, they were found co-operating with Calvinists and men of other sects in all public duties, without dissension or disrespect on any side. In New York, where the unitarians have only two congregations, and are of comparatively recent origin, the prejudices entertained against them by the orthodox sects are stronger; and in Philadelphia, where they are still more recent, and have only one church, the dislike of them, as a religious body, is still more conspicuously manifested. It has been remarked that sectarian hatred increases in proportion as the differences in opinion between the partisans diminish. The animosity, for instance, expressed by Calvinists against Jews is far less than that manifested against Unitarians.*

* In Scotland, where both the church and the dis-

May 20. Therm. 66°. Phrenology.—The committee of my class presented a series of elegant and complimentary resolutions, and requested me to sit to an artist for a model of my head, to be embossed on a silver vase which the individuals who have heard my lectures intend to present to me in token of their esteem. Nothing can exceed the kindness with which my lectures have been received in this country, and only the fear of being charged with indulging my own vanity prevents me from expressing how deeply I feel every mark of their approbation. I may remark that in the resolutions of the second classes, both in Philadelphia and New York, the foundation of phrenology in natural truth is recognised.

Fast Driving.—The thermometer stood at 83° in the shade this evening, and at this temperature innumerable gigs and carriages of all sorts were driving on the Bloomingdale road at the rate of from ten to fifteen miles an hour, amidst clouds of dust which obscured vision at the distance of a hundred yards. They were filled with parties driving for pleasure!

May 31. Therm. 63°. A Flat-headed Indian. I was introduced to the Reverend Jason Lee, who has been a missionary among the Indians, beyond the Rocky Mountains. He was accompanied by Thomas Adams, an Indian of about twenty years of age, of the Cloughewallah tribe, located at the falls of the Wahlamette River (the Multumoh of the maps,) about twenty-five miles from its junction with the Columbia River. The tribe presses the heads of their children by boards and hair cushions, applied to the forehead and occiput. This young man's head had been pressed. It was broader from side to side above the ears (from Secretiveness to Secretiveness) than it was long from front to back (from Individuality to Philoprogenitiveness.) The spinous process of the occipital bone was as high as to the top of the ear. The head appeared as if it had been tilted up behind, in such a manner that the forehead, although deficient in the reflecting organs, was made to stand much nearer the perpendicular than otherwise it would have done. So far as could be judged in a case of such distortion, the organs of Destructiveness, Acquisitiveness, Secretiveness, Self-Esteem, Love of Approbation, and Firmness, were very large; those of Combativeness, Philoprogenitiveness, and Adhesiveness, deficient. It was difficult to estimate the size of the moral organs, they were so displaced. The organs of the observing faculties, lying on the superciliary ridge, were fully developed; the brain at the reflecting organs was shallow and deficient, but on the left side, the organ of Causality was pretty distinctly marked. The organs of Form and Language were large.

The young man spoke English well, and had practised speaking it for two years. He was intelligent in his conversation, and said that he liked the Indian and American modes of life equally well. His face was exceedingly broad, full, and lymphatic. The predominant expression was that of Love of Approbation. There were no traces of thought in his smooth fat cheeks, but his eye was dark and mild; and, when he seeters are almost all Calvinists, intolerance reaches its maximum; and the religious public are far from manifesting that liberal and Christian spirit which, while it holds fast by that which it regards as right, recognises its own fallibility, and admits the privilege of other men to do the same, without offering disparagement to their characters in thought, word, or deed.

smiled, the countenance was pleasing. I endeavoured to direct the conversation so as to ascertain, if possible, the extent of his intellectual powers. On all subjects that fell within the scope of the faculties of observation (the organs of which are fairly developed) he was intelligent, ready and fluent; but on others which required the aid of Comparison and Causality, he was dull, unintelligent, and destitute equally of ideas and of language. Thinking that probably he did not understand the words used on these topics, I tried to explain them; but found an obtuseness of comprehension that rendered the attempt unsuccessful. I found those intellectual powers to be of tolerable strength whose organs were fairly developed, and those to be deficient whose organs were small. Mr. Lee said that he was warm-tempered and touchy.

I explained to Mr. Lee that the convolutions of the brain in this youth might have been displaced, but not destroyed or entirely impeded in their growth, as the spinal marrow exists and performs its functions in persons afflicted with hunchbacks, although bent out of its usual direction. I requested him to carry a cast of a normal European brain with him, when he returned to his station, and to beg the medical officer of the fur company, who lives in his neighbourhood, to examine carefully the brain of these Flat-headed Indians after death, and report minutely the differences in the size and distribution of the convolutions. Mr. Lee mentioned that the tribe called by the English Flat-headed Indians do not compress the heads of their children, and that they are not flat-headed. The name is erroneously bestowed. The tribe to which this youth belongs do compress the skull in infancy.

Having no means of discovering the condition of the feelings in this young man, I requested my friend Mr. Samuel W. Dewey, who had procured this interview, to use every means of observation in his power, and to report to me on this subject. He did so, and two letters with which he favoured me are published in the Phrenological Journal for January, 1841. They are highly instructive, and show that those propensities and sentiments, were most active (so far as Mr. Dewey had the means of observation) the organs of which were largest in the brain.*

Mr. Lee spoke confidently of the success of missionary efforts among the Indians, and mentioned several who had been reclaimed to agriculture and Christianity. A man, he says, cannot be a Christian who is a wanderer in his habits; and he recommends that missionaries should teach the useful arts and Christianity simultaneously.

Colony of Liberia.—Mr. Matthias, Governor of the Pennsylvania and New York colony at Bassa Cove in Liberia, in Africa, was present;

* After I left New York I saw an announcement of the death, in that city, of the companion of this Flat-headed Indian, who was ill at the time of this conference. I was told that Dr. Reese attended him as his physician. This gentleman had previously published "The Humbugs of New York," among which he included phrenology; but he allowed this young man to be buried without examining his brain, or at least without reporting on it, or calling in the aid of phrenologists to do so. It is strange that those who are so confident that phrenology is a "humbug" should be so averse to producing evidence by which alone it can be proved to be so. The condition of the brain in a Flat-headed Indian is an interesting and unknown fact in physiology, and any medical man who has the means of throwing light on it, and neglect to use them, is no friend to his own profession or to general science.

and he assured me that this settlement and another of the same description are doing well. The colonists (negroes from the United States) are increasing in numbers; they support all the civilisation which they carried out with them; live in peace, and maintain law and justice. They are not attacked by the surrounding tribes. He remarked that the negroes improve in America when free, and that they improve still more in Africa when they become their own masters. I mentioned to him my estimate of the difference between them and the American Indians, and he acquiesced in my observations in regard to the qualities of the Africans.

Natural Language of Secretiveness.—In describing the head of Colonel Aaron Burr, I adverted to the large size of the organ of Secretiveness, and the deficiency of that of Conscientiousness. A writer in the "New York Mirror," in describing him, says, "He glided rather than walked; his foot had that quiet, stealthy movement which involuntarily makes one think of treachery; and, in the course of a long life, I have never met with a frank and honourable man to whom such a step was habitual." This is an excellent description of the natural language of large Secretiveness and deficient Conscientiousness, as expressed in the gait. The writer's observation is correct, that no frank and honourable man—that is, no man in whom Benevolence and Conscientiousness are larger than Secretiveness—will be found characterised by that kind of motion.

May 22. Ther. 60°. Fire.—The House of Refuge was burned to the ground this forenoon. It was a stirring but melancholy sight to see the whole engines of New York city, amply supplied by water from ponds outside the walls, playing for hours on the burning mass with the greatest energy, but without effect. But the building was old, and its loss is not much regretted, except for the immediate inconvenience which it occasions.

Anti-Abolition Meeting.—The town of Newark in New Jersey was taunted with manufacturing the whips with which the slaves are flogged in the south? It replied that it manufactures whips in general, and that carters use the article alleged to be employed in scourging the slaves. The inhabitants have held a meeting, James Millar, Esq., the mayor, in the chair, at which violent resolutions were passed, the last of which declares "that the subject of slavery appertains to the slave states alone—that the question of its duration or abolition belongs exclusively to them—and that the meddling interference of others is uncalled for by any considerations of public justice or of public policy." The opinion expressed in this resolution prevails generally in the United States.

CHAPTER XVI.

May 24. Ther. 60°. West Point.—My phrenological labours being now terminated for the season, we resolved to visit Lake George, Niagara, and Canada, and this morning at seven o'clock, embarked on board the "Avon" for West Point, where we landed at a quarter before eleven, the distance being 50 miles. The military academy belonging to the United States stands here on a platform of land elevated several hundred feet above the Hudson River, and surrounded by hills clothed to the summit with wood. No situation can be more lovely. There are at present about 240 cadets in the establishment. They are maintained and educated in civil and military engineering at the public expense for four years, on condition that they serve the state, if called on, for four years after the expiry of their time. On the hill which rises to the west of the plateau, there is an ancient fort (Fort Putnam) in ruins, which is a picturesque object, and repays the labour of ascending it. There are monuments to Kosciusko, to Lieut-Col. Wood, who was killed in September 1814, leading a charge at Fort Erie, and to a pupil who was accidentally killed by a gun in his exercises. These objects, although all simple in themselves, being placed in appropriate situations, add to the interest of the scene. There is an excellent hotel for the accommodation of visitors; but it has been let this year by the government on the condition of total abstinence by the guests from all liquors, containing alcohol in any form. Not a drop even of beer is sold. It has, in consequence, been difficult to find a tenant, and the house is now only in the course of being fitted up. We, however, obtained a good bedroom, and dined at an excellent ordinary kept for a few officers of the establishment. Major Leslie politely conducted us through the public buildings, which are extensive and commodious; but here also the want of ventilation in the apartments forced itself upon our notice by the disagreeable effects of vitiated air. So careless are the students and attendants on this point, that I found every window close in several class-rooms which had been vacated for the day, and which were full of carbonic acid gas and the effluvia of the human body. I used the freedom to open them for my own comfort while passing through them, for which I hope to be forgiven by the students. The habit of chewing tobacco, and spitting, prevails in the hotel to a distressing extent.

May 25. Ther. 63°. Phrenology.—This morning we had a storm of thunder and lightning, which had a sublime effect among the mountains. It cleared off at nine o'clock, and at eleven we embarked on board of the "Champlain" for Albany. In this boat an amusing incident occurred. One of the passengers accosted me, without any preface or introduction. "You have just finished a course of lectures in New York?" "Yes, sir." "How long is it since you lectured in Syracuse?" "I was never in Syracuse in my life." The gentleman was surprised and walked away to the other end of the boat; and on his return he renewed his interrogation. "Have you any of your books with you?" "No—they are all the property of booksellers, and I take no charge of the sales." "Have any of them been printed in Europe?" "Yes, they were all printed there first." This answer caused him to turn and take another walk to a distant part of the deck. He returned, still apparently greatly puzzled. "I read your book and I have made observations, and am disposed to believe in Phrenology." "Observation is the only philosophical mode of attaining conviction." "Do you examine heads?" "I do, for my own instruction, but not publicly, or for money." He again looked puzzled. "Where is the very tall man that was with you, when you traveled through Kentucky?" "I have never been in Kentucky." I understood that you had a very tall man, of 7 feet 4 inches, and a very short man with you, in that state." "I have not traveled in this country with any man, either tall or short, and I have not even seen any man of extraordinary stature here."

At this point, the interrogator's sagacity was completely at fault. He left me, and never resumed the conversation. I afterwards discovered the cause of his enquiries. An itinerant phrenologist, named Frederick Coombs, had traveled through the western country examining heads, and, to add to the attractions of Phrenology, carried with him a giant and a dwarf, whom he exhibited as a show. This gentleman mistook me for him; nor had he been unique in this error, for a newspaper had previously been sent to me containing an intimation that "the gentleman with the giant and the dwarf is not Mr. George Combe of Edinburgh!"

Politeness to Ladies.—The Americans always give place to ladies in the stage coaches, rail-road cars, at the public tables, and in other similar situations. In the steamboat, at dinner to-day, a small incident occurred which affords an illustration of this practice. I was seated at table, with Mrs. Combe on my right hand. A gentleman, leading a lady, saw the chair next me on the left hand unoccupied. He placed his lady in it, and then requested me to rise and give him my seat. I declined to do so; on which he said, "Very well, sir, if you are so uncivil as not to give place to a lady, I shall certainly seek another place at the table;" and before I had time to utter another word of explanation, he and his lady were off beyond my reach. The plain meaning of the request appeared to me to be this: "Be so good, sir, as to leave the seat beside your lady, and give it to me that I may sit beside my lady;" but I did the gentleman injustice. After dinner, he came up to me, and said, "Sir, I owe you an apology for my remark: I did not observe that you had a lady with you: You were quite right in retaining your seat."

Political Economy.—I enjoyed some interesting conversation with a gentleman who happened to be a passenger, and who had had an opportunity of observing the evolutions of the mercantile world in the United States for many years. On my remarking that many mercantile men in the great cities of the union appeared to me to conduct their business too much in the spirit of speculation, without taking accurate and comprehensive views of causes obviously in operation, which would as certainly affect the value of their commodities, as the sun would ripen the crop in autumn, he acquiesced in the correctness of the observation, and added that many merchants dash at every thing as a speculation, and talk of "the chance" much more than of the principle in nature by which the supposed "chance" must be ruled. I described to him the effects which I had observed in Scotland to flow from too free an emission of paper money. Men were tempted by it to manufacture, and also to import goods, far beyond the demand for consumption; a rapid rise in the price of the raw material and in wages occurred; and prices of manufactured articles rose for a few months. This was called "prosperity;" but speedily the foreign exchanges became unfavourable to Britain; gold was demanded from the Bank of England to pay for the excess of imported goods; the bank, finding her coffers drained, contracted the currency; the resources of the Scottish banks in London were circumscribed; they took the alarm, lessened their discounts, called in their loans, and realised the debts due to them. The direct consequences of this were, that those individuals who had manufactured or imported on the "credit system" were forced to sell at any sacrifice in price, in order to raise funds to meet their engagements; will long maintain our grand talent pour le silence. Let others that cannot do without standing on barrel-heads, to spout, and be seen of all the market place, cultivate speech exclusively,—become a most green forest without roots! Solomon says, There is a time to speak; but also a time to keep silence. Of some great silent Samuel, not urged to writing, as old Samuel Johnson says he was, by want of money, and nothing other, one might ask, "Why do not you oo get up and speak; promulgate your system, and your sect?"—"Truly," he will answer, "I am continent of my thought hitherto; I happily have yet had the ability to keep it in me, no compulsion strong enough to speak it. My 'system' is not for promulgation first of all; it is for serving myself to live by. That is the great purpose of it to me. And then the 'honour'! Alas, yes;—but as Cato said of the statue: So many statues in that Forum of ours, may it not be better if they ask, Where is Cato's statue! than say, There it is!"

But now by way of counterpoise to this of Silence, let me say that there are two kinds of ambition; one wholly blameable, the other laudable and inevitable. Nature has provided that the great silent Samuel shall not be silent too long. The selfish wish to shine over others, let it be accounted altogether poor and miserable. "Seekest thou great things, seek them not;" this is most true. And yet, I say, there is an irrepressible tendency in every man to develop himself according to the magnitude which Nature has made him of; to speak out, to act out, what Nature has laid in him. This is proper, fit, inevitable; nay, it is a duty, and even the summary of duties for a man. The meaning of life here on earth might be defined as consisting in this: To unfold your elf, to work what thing you have the faculty for. It is a necessity for the human being, the first law of our existence. Coleridge beautifully remarks that he infant learns to speak by this necessity it feels. We will say therefore, To decide about ambition, whether it is bad or not, you have two things to take into view. Not the coveting of the place alone, but the fitness of the man for the place withal: that is the question. Perhaps the place was his; perhaps he had a natural right, and even obligation, to seek the place! Mirabeau's ambition to be Prime Minister, how shall we blame it, if he were 'the only man in France that could have done any good there?' Hopefuller perhaps had he not so clearly felt how much good he could do! But a poor Necker, who could do no good, and had even felt that he could do none, yet sitting broken-hearted because they had lung him out, and he was now quit of it, well might Gibbon mourn over him.—Nature, I say, has provided simply that the silent great man shall strive to speak vital; too amply, rather!

Fancy, for example, you had revealed to the brave old Samuel Johnson, in his shrouded up existence, that it was possible for him to do a priceless divine work for his country and the whole world. That the perfect Heavenly Law might be made Law on this Earth, that the prayer he prayed daily, 'Thy kingdom come,' was at length to be fulfilled! If you had convinced his judgment of this; that it was possible, practicable; that he the mournful silent Samuel was called to take a part in it! Would not the whole soul of the man have flamed up into a divine clearness, into noble utterance and determination to act; casting all sorrows and misgivings under his feet, counting all affliction and contradiction small,—the whole dark element of his existence blazing into articulate advance of light and lightning! It were a true ambition this! And think now how it actually was with Cromwell. From of old, the sufferings of God's Church, true zealous Preachers of the truth lung into dungeons, whipt, set on pillories, their ears cropped off, God's Gospel-cause trodden under foot of the unworthy: all this had lain heavy on his soul. Long years he had looked upon it, in silence, in prayer; seeing no remedy on Earth; trusting well that a remedy in Heaven's goodness would come,—but such a course was false, unjust, and could not last forever. And now behold the dawn of it; after twelve years' silent waiting, all England stirs itself; here is to be once more a Parliament, the Right will get a voice for itself: inexpressible well-grounded hope has come again into the Earth. Was not such a Parliament worth being a member of? Cromwell threw down his ploughs, and hastened thither. He spoke there,—rugged bursts of earnestness, of a self-seen truth, where we get a glimpse of them. He worked there; he fought and strove, like a strong true giant of a man, through cannon-tumult and all else,—on and on, till the Cause triumphed, its once so formidable enemies all swept from before it, and the dawn of hope had become clear light of victory and certainty. That he stood there as the strongest soul of England, the undisputed Hero of all England,—what of this? It was possible that the Law of Christ's Gospel could now establish itself in the world! The Theocracy which John Knox in his pulpit might dream of as a 'devout imagination,' this practical man, experienced in the whole chaos of most rough practice, dared to consider as capable of being realised. Those that were highest in Christ's Church, the devoutest wisest men, were to rule the land: in some considerable degree, it might be so and should be so. Was it not true, God's truth? And if true, was it not then the very thing to do? The strongest practical intellect in England dared to answer, Yes! This I call a noble true purpose: is it not, in its own dialect, the noblest that could enter into the heart of Statesman or man? For a Knox to take it up was something; but for a Cromwell, with his great sound sense and experience of what our world was,—History, I think, shows it only this once in such a degree. I account it the culminating point of Protestantism; the most heroic phasis that 'Faith in the Bible' was appointed to exhibit here below. Fancy it: that it were made manifest to one of us, how we could make the right supremely victorious over Wrong, and all that we had longed and prayed for, as the highest good to England and all lands, an attainable fact!

Well, I must say, the vulpine intellect, with its knowingness, its alertness and expertness in 'detecting hypocrites,' seems to me a rather sorry business. We have had but one such Statesman in England; one man, that I can get sight of, who ever had in the heart of him any such purpose at all. One man, in the course of fifteen hundred years; and this was his welcome. He had adherents by the hundred or the ten; opponents by the million. Had England rallied all round him,—England might have been a Christian land! As it is, vulpine knowingness sits yet at its hopeless problem, 'Given a world of Knaves, to educe an Honesty from their joint action;'—how cumbrous a problem you may see in Chancery Law-Courts, and some other places! Till at length, by Heaven's just anger, but also by Heaven's great grace, the matter begins to stagnate; and this problem is becoming to all men a palpably hopeless one.—

But with regard to Cromwell and his purposes: Hum-, and a multitude following him, come upon me here with an admission that Cromwell was sincere at first; a sincere 'Fanatic' at first, but gradually became a 'Hypocrite' as things opened round him. 'This of the Fanatic-Hypocrite is Hume's theory of it; extensively applied since,—to Mahomet and many others. Think of it seriously, you will find something in it; not much, not all, very far from all. Sincere hero-hearts do not sink in this miserable manner. The Sun flings forth impurities, gets balefully encrusted with spots; but it does not quench itself, and become no Sun at all, but a mass of Darkness! I will venture to say that such never befel a great deep Cromwell; I think, never. Nature's own lion-hearted Son; Anteus-like, his strength is got by touching the Earth, his mother; lift him up from the earth, lift him up into Hypocrisy, Inanity, his strength is gone. We will not assert that Cromwell was an immaculate man; that he fell into no faults, no insincerities among the rest. He was no dilettante professor of 'perfections,' 'immaculate conducts.' He was a rugged Orson, tending his rough way through actual true work,—doubtless with many a fall therein. Insincerities, faults, very many faults daily and hourly: it was too well known to him; known to God and him! The Sun was dimmed many a time: but the Sun had not himself grown a Dimness. Cromwell's last words, as he lay waiting for death, are those of a Christian heroic man. Broken prayers to God, that He would judge him, He since man could not, in justice yet in pity. They are most touching words. He breathed out his wild great soul, its toils and sins all ended now, into the presence of his Maker, in this manner.

I, for one, will not call the man a Hypocrite! Hypocrite, mummer, the life of him a mere theatricality; empty barren quack, hungry for the shouts of mobs! The man had made obscurity do very well for him till his head was grey; and now he was, there as he stood recognised unblamed, the virtual King of England. Cannot a man do without King's Coaches and Cloaks? Is it such a blessedness to have clerks forever pestering you with bundles of papers in red tape? A simple Diocletian prefers planting of cabbages; a George Washington, no very immeasurable man, does the like. One would say, it is what any genuine man could do; and would do. The instant his real work were out in the matter of Kingship,—away with it!

Let us remark, meanwhile, how indispensable everywhere a King is, in all movements of men. It is strikingly shown, in this very war, what becomes of men when they cannot find a Chief Man, and their enemies can. The Scotch Nation was all but unanimous in Puritanism; zealous and of one mind about it, as in this English end of the Island was always far from being the case. But there was no great Cromwell among them; poor tremulous, hesitating, diplomatic Argyles and such like: none of them had a heart true enough for the truth, or durst commit himself to the truth. They had no leader; and the scattered Cavalier party in that country had one: Montrose, the noblest of all the Cavalier; an accomplished, gallant-hearted, splendid man; what one may call the Hero-Cavalier. Well, look at it: on the one hand, subjects without a King; on the other, a King without subjects! The subjects without King can do nothing; the subjectless King can do something. This Montrose, with a handful of Irish or Highland savages, few of them so much as guns in their hand, dashes at the drilled Puritan armies like a wild whirlwind; sweeps them, time after time, some five times over, from the field before him. He was at one period, for a short while, master of all Scotland. One man; but he was a man: a million zealous men, but without the one; they against him were powerless! Perhaps of all the persons in that Puritan struggle, from first to last, the single indispensable one was verily Cromwell. To see, and dare, and decide; to be a fixed pillar in the welter of uncertainty;—a King among them, whether they called him so or not.

Precisely here, however, lies the rub for Cromwell. His other proceedings have all found advocates, and stand generally justified; but this dismissal of the Rump Parliament and assumption of the Protectorship, is what no one can pardon him. He had fairly grown to be King in England, Chief Man of the victorious party in England: but it seems he could not do without the King's Cloak, and sold himself to perdition in order to get it. Let us see a little how this was.

England, Scotland, Ireland, all lying now subdued at the feet of the Puritan Parliament, the practical question arose, What was to be done with it? How will you govern these Nations, which Providence in a wondrous way has given up to your disposal? Clearly those hundred surviving members of the Long Parliament, who sit there as supreme authority, cannot continue forever to sit. What is to be done?—It was a question which theoretical constitution-builders may find easy to answer; but to Cromwell, looking there into the real practical facts of it, there could be none more complicated. He asked of the Parliament, What it was they would decide upon? It was for the Parliament to say. Yet the Soldiers too, however contrary to Formula, they who had purchased this victory with their blood, it seemed to them that they also should have something to say in it! We will not "for all our fighting have nothing but a little piece of paper." We understand that the Law of God's Gospel, to which He through us has given the victory, shall establish itself, or try to establish itself, in this land!

For three years, Cromwell says, this question had been sounded in the ears of the Parliament. They could make no answer; nothing but talk, talk. Perhaps it lies in the nature of parliamentary bodies; perhaps no Parliament could in such case make any answer but even that of talk, talk. Nevertheless the question must and shall be answered. You sixty men there, becoming fast odious, even despicable, to the whole nation, whom the nation already call Rump Parliament, you cannot continue to sit there: who or what then is to follow? 'Free Parliament,' right of Election, Constitutional Formulas of one sort or the other,—the thing is a hungry Fact coming on us, which we must answer or be devoured by it! And who are you that prate of Constitutional Formulas, rights of Parliament? You have had to kill your King, to make Pride's Purges, to expel and banish by the law of the stronger whosoever would not let your Cause prosper: there are but fifty or three-score of you left there, debating in these days. Tell us what we shall do; not in the way of Formula, but of practicable Fact!

How they did finally answer, remains obscure to this day. The diligent Godwin himself admits that he cannot make it out. The likeliest is, that this poor Parliament still would not, and indeed could not dissolve and disperse; that when it came to the point of actually dispersing, they again, for the tenth or twentieth time, adjourned it,—and Cromwell's patience failed him. But we will take the favourableness hypothesis ever stated for the Parliament; the favourableness, though I believe it is not the true one, but too favourable. According to this version: At the uttermost crisis, when Cromwell and his Officers were met on the one hand, and the fifty or sixty Rump Members on the other, it was suddenly told Cromwell that the Rump in its despair was answering in a very singular way; that in their sullen envious despair, to keep out the Army at least, these men were hurrying through the House a kind of Reform Bill. Parliament to be chosen by the whole of England; equitable electoral division into districts; free suffrage, and the rest of it! A very questionable, or indeed for them an unquestionable thing. Reform Bill, free suffrage of Englishmen? Why, the Royalists themselves, silenced indeed but not exterminated, perhaps outnumber us; the great numerical majority of England was always indifferent to our Cause, merely looked at it and submitted to it. It is in weight and force, not by counting of heads, that we are the majority! And now with your Formulas and Reform Bills, the whole matter, sorely won by our swords, shall again launch itself to sea; become a mere hope, and likelihood, small even as a likelihood? And it is not a likelihood; it is a certainty, which we have won, by God's strength and our own right hands, and donow hold here. Cromwell walked down to these refractory Members; interrupted them in that rapid speed of their Reform Bill;—ordered them to begone, and talk there no more.—Can we not forgive him! Can we not understand him? John Milton, who looked on it all near at hand, could applaud him. The Reality had swept the Formulas away before it. I fancy, most men who were Realities in England might see into the necessity of that.

The strong daring man, therefore, has set all manner of Formulas and logical superficialities against him; has dared appeal to the genuine fact of this England, Whether it will support him or not? It is curious to see how he struggles to govern in some constitutional way; find some Parliament to support him; but cannot. His first Parliament, the one they call Barebones's Parliament, is, so to speak, a Convocation of the Notables. From all quarters of England the leading Ministers and chief Puritan Officials nominate the men most distinguished by religious reputation, influence and attachment to the true Cause: these are assembled to shape out a plan. They sanctioned what was past; shaped as they could what was to come. They were scornfully called Barebones's Parliament: the man's name, it seems, was not Barebones, but Barbone,—a good enough man. Nor was it a jest, their work; it was a most serious reality,—a trial on the part of these Puritan Notables how far the Law of Christ could become the Law of this England. There were men of sense among them, men of some quality; men of deep piety I suppose the most of them were. They failed, it seems, and broke down, endeavouring to reform the Court of Chancery! They appointed Cromwell Protector, and went their ways.

THE TASK:

OR, HOW TO WIN A MISTRESS.

An Affecting Story of the Mountain of the Lovers.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

Not many years ago, we read in a book the story of a lover who was to win his mistress by carrying her to the top of a mountain, and how he did win her, and how they ended their days on the same spot.

We think the scene was in Switzerland; but the mountain, though high enough to tax his stout heart to the uttermost, must have been among the lowest. Let us fancy it a good lofty hill, in the summer time. It was, at any rate, so high that the father of the lady, a proud noble, thought it impossible for a young man, burdened, to scale it. For this reason alone, in scorn, he bade him do it, and his daughter should be his.

The peasantry assembled in the valley to witness so extraordinary a sight. They measured the mountain with their eyes; they communed with one another, and shook their heads; but all admired the young man; and some of his fellows looking at their mistress, thought they could do as much. The father was on horseback, apart and sullen, repenting that he had subjected his daughter even to the shadow of such a hazard; but he thought it would teach his inferiors a lesson.

The young man (the son of a small land proprietor, who had some pretensions to wealth, though none to nobility) stood respectful looking, but confident, rejoicing in his heart that he should win his mistress, though at the cost of a noble pain, which he could hardly think of as a pain, considering who it was he was to carry. If he died for it, he should at least have had her in his arms, and have looked her in the face. To clasp her person in that manner, was a pleasure he contemplated with such transport as is known only to real lovers; for none others know how respect heightens the joy of dispensing with formality, and how the dispensing with formality ennobles and makes greater the respect.

The lady stood by the side of her father, pale, desirous, and dreading. She thought her lover would succeed, but only because she thought him in every respect the noblest of his sex, and that nothing was too much for his valour and strength. Great fears came over her, nevertheless. She knew not what might happen in the chances common to all. She felt the bitterness of being herself the burden to him and the task; and dared neither to look at her father nor the mountain. She fixed her eyes now on the crowd (which she beheld not) and now on her hand and her fingers' ends, which she doubled up towards her with pretty pretences, the only deception she had ever used. Once or twice a daughter or a mother stepped out of the crowd, and coming up to her, notwithstanding the fears of the lord baron, kissed that hand which she knew not what to do with.

The father said, "Now, sir, put an end to this mummery;" and the lover, turning pale for the first time, took up the lady.

The spectators rejoice to see the manner in which he moves off, slow but secure, and as if to encourage his mistress, they mount the hill; they proceed well; he halts an instant before he gets midway, and seems refusing something; then ascends at a quick rate; and now, being at the midway point, shifts the lady from one side to the other. The spectators give a great shout. The baron, with an air of indifference, bites the tip of his gauntlet, and then casts on them an eye of rebuke. At the shout, the lover resumes his way. Slow, but not feeble, is his step, yet it goes slower. He stops again, and they think they see the lady kiss him on the forehead. The women begin to tremble, but the men say he will be victorious. He resumes again; he is half-way between the middle and top; he rushes, he stops, he staggers; but he does not fall. Another shout from the men, and he resumes once more; two thirds of the remaining part of the way are conquered. They are certain the lady kisses him on the forehead and on the eyes. The women burst into tears, and the stoutest men look pale. He ascends slower than ever, but seeming to be more sure. He halts, but it is only to plant his foot to go on again; and thus he picks his way, planting his foot at every step, and then gaining ground with an effort, the lady lifts up her arms, as if to lighten him. See, he is almost at the top; he stops, he struggles, he moves sideways, taking very little steps, and bringing one foot every time close to the other. Now he is all but on the top; he halts again; he is fixed; he staggers. A groan goes through the multitude. Suddenly he turns full front towards the top; it is luckily almost a level, he staggers, but it is forward. Yes, every limb in the multitude makes a movement as if it would assist him. See; at last he is on the top, and down he falls with his burden. An enormous shout! He has won! he has won! Now he has a right to caress his mistress; and she is caressing him, for neither of them get up. If he has fainted, it is with joy, and it is in her arms.

The baron put spurs to his horse, the crowd following him. Half way he is obliged to dismount; they ascend the rest of the hill together, the crowd silent and happy, the baron ready to burst with shame and impatience. They reach the top. The lovers are face to face on the ground, the lady clasping him with both arms, his lying on each side.

"Traitor!" exclaimed the baron, "thou hast practised this feat before, on purpose to deceive me. Arise!" "You cannot expect it sir," said a worthy man, who was rich enough to speak his mind: "Samson himself might take his rest after such a deed."

"Part them!" said the baron.

Several persons went up, not to part them, but to congratulate and keep them together. These people look close; they kneel down: they bend an ear; they bury their faces upon them. "God forbid they should ever be parted more," said a venerable man: "they never can be." He turned his old face, streaming with tears, and looked up at the baron: "Sir, they are dead!"

A physician of Edinburgh has written a sensible work entitled "Hints to Mothers," from which we copy some of the remarks on the physical education of girls:—

RULES FOR INVIGORATING THE CONSTITUTION.

Compare the rosy-cheeked daughters of our farmers with the greater part of the accomplished, intellectual, delicate, and nervous misses of our large towns. What has occasioned the difference? Why, you will unhesitatingly answer, the manner in which they are brought up. And what have they gained by the manner in which they have been brought up? A tolerable knowledge of several of the fine arts, music, and dancing, and a sufficiency of general learning, together with a refinement of manners, to fit them for intercourse with well-educated persons, or to appear in polished society. All this, I admit, is valuable; but what have they lost? That alone which can make the above accomplishments a source of pleasure to themselves and others—perfect health. And cannot this last be preserved at the same time that the mind is cultivated? Unquestionably it can; and it shall be my business to point out to you the means of accomplishing both these objects.

In the first place, females, from their earliest years, should be allowed those sports and amusements in the open air, so necessary to a proper development of their bodies, and which are now confined entirely to boys. Instead of being constrained to walk demurely, with measured steps, like so many matrons, they should be encouraged in running and romping at suitable times; and that the motions of their limbs may be unconstrained, their dress should be always loose and easy. For instance, until they are fourteen or fifteen years old, they should be allowed to play in the open air at least six hours every day, when the season and weather will permit. They should be allowed to run, leap, throw the ball, or play at battledore, as they please. All these exercises call the different muscles into action, strengthen the limbs, and impart a healthy tone to the different organs; the blood circulates freely, the nervous system is invigorated, and the redundant fluids are driven off by perspiration. The most suitable dress is unquestionably that which is called Turkish, consisting of trousers and a short frock; and the covering for the head should be light and cool; a straw hat answers the purpose very well. They should never be confined to their tasks to exceed six hours a day, and I am confident they will learn more in that time, if properly managed, than they will in twelve, without sufficient exercise. Make it your own case; can you spend even eight hours a day in study, to any profit? I think not. The mind becomes weary, and then nothing is retained. How then can you suppose that the expanding faculties of children can be constantly exercised for that length of time to advantage? But admit that they can be profitably kept upon the stretch for twelve hours, and that the mental faculties can be fully developed by this means at the age of sixteen, and admit that the faculties can not only be developed, but the mind stored with a vast collection of useful knowledge; what will be the state of the neglected corporeal part, the casket which must contain this polished gem? Why, it will be yet in its infancy, imperfect in its form, and feeble for want of employment; yea, more—it will be the seat of disease, and wear the undoubted marks of premature decay. Depend upon it, too much attention is paid to the culture of the minds of children, and too little to that of their bodies. Do not misunderstand me, or suspect me of undervaluing the former, or of overrating the latter. Certainly the first can never make us happy in this world without the second. I mean, simply, that parents are too fond of forcing genius at an early age, and thus ruining the health. Some parents feel mortified, if their little ones cannot read tolerably at six, and be well acquainted with grammar and geography at ten; and they seem to forget entirely that even if all this be accomplished, there is no probability whatever of their being a single step in advance, at the age of twenty-five, of those who have not learned to read before eight, or become acquainted with grammar and geography before twelve. I do not mention this as an argument against commencing their education in infancy; far from it; for the intellect is improved and developed by exercise, as I have already said, like the body. I only wish to show that neither should be neglected, and that the perfect development of the one is not inconsistent with that of the other. But I would go one step farther, inasmuch as all enjoyment in this life, and even the full force of the mind, depend upon the entire health of the body, it would be safer to direct the principal attention to the latter, till it has arrived at maturity, than to run the risk of its being neglected in the cultivation of the former. The mind can be brought to a high pitch of excellence, even when the work is not commenced until the age of twenty; but if the body be neglected until this period, it is not only incapable of acquiring its natural powers, but speedily suffers from disease.

It is a silly notion with some persons, that if little girls are allowed to run and play at the different games now principally confined to boys, they will necessarily become rude and boisterous; and so health must be sacrificed to affected decorum. Far be it from me to wish to encourage customs or habits which would detract in the least from the gentle and amiable manners for which my fair countrywomen are deservedly celebrated. But I do insist upon it, that they may enjoy, if properly educated, a tolerable degree of Spartan health without losing female gentleness, or acquiring the masculine character of the Spartan females. It will be recollected, that I wish to give them the healthful exercises of that hardy race, with the mental refinement of the moderns. The Spartan women were accustomed, almost from infancy, to run, wrestle, throw the dart, and dance and sing. These invigorated their bodies; but then they were taught to perform these exercises half naked, and in the presence of the other sex, to which may doubtless be attributed their want of sensibility, and the masculine turn of mind which characterised them. "Les filles de Sparte ne sont point élevées d'Athènes: on ne leur prescrit point de se tenir renfermée de filer le lain, de s'abstenir du vin et d'une nourriture trop forte; mais on leur apprend à danser, à chanter, à lutter entre elles, à courir légèrement sur le sable, à lancer, avec force, le palet ou le javelot, à faire tous leurs exercices sans voile et demi nues, en présence des rois, des magistrats, et de tous les citoyens, sans en excepter même les jeunes garçons."—Voyage du Jeune Anacharsis.

Constant exercise and amusement in the open air, then, may be set down as the first thing to be attended to in the physical education of girls as well as of boys, and when they are confined to the house by inclement weather, they should be allowed to enjoy their sports in a large airy apartment; and here I will remark, that there is no in-door exercise I can so strongly recommend as dancing, for it imparts at the same time strength to the body, and ease and gracefulness to its movements; besides, as most children who are taught dancing are very fond of it, it encourages cheerfulness and good humour, so conducive to their health, and I cannot conceive a more rational or delightful employment for a mother, when the weather confines her little ones within doors, than spending an hour or two each day at the piano, while they with happy countenances move around her in unison with the music. An hour or two may be well employed in this way, between breakfast and dinner, and the same time in the evening. In order to derive the full benefit from this delightful exercise, so suitable for the spring time of our existence, it should be in a large room, with the windows open in mild weather, and in one without a fire in it in winter; for then your children will have fresh air, and not become immoderately heated.

Thus far have I spoken in general terms, but if I were to lay down definite rules, they would be the following: Let your children rise at six in summer, and at eight in winter. This is what they are always inclined to do, if left to themselves, and their habits are not vitiated. Let them be washed all over with a little soap and soft water. The water should be always of the temperature of the cistern or well from which it is taken. This will purify the surface, and is refreshing to the whole system in warm weather, and invigorating in cold. Let them amuse themselves a little while before breakfast, especially in the open air in summer: but the breakfast must not be deferred too long, as the appetite will become too keen, and they will eat more than they require. The breakfast should consist of milk, bread, and similar articles. Meats of all kinds, and coffee and tea, they should never taste. Between breakfast and dinner, three hours may be given to study, and the rest devoted to active sports. The dinner must not be at a fashionable hour, but from twelve to two o'clock; at all events, it should not be so late as to allow them to get excessively hungry, and should be of the simplest fare—bread, all kinds of cooked vegetables, and a very moderate allowance of animal food. In hot weather, this last should be omitted altogether, and milk substituted in its place. After dinner, three hours may again be devoted to study, and the rest of the day to active amusements. The supper should be nothing more than bread and milk, rice and milk, and food of a similar description. They should not sit up too long after supper, but retire to bed as soon as they are sleepy. This will commonly be at an early hour, if they rise when they ought to do, for young persons require more sleep than those who have arrived at maturity. They should never sleep on feathers in summer, or be too warmly covered at any time. A hair mattress is probably the best bed all the year round. Their sleeping apartment should not be confined, but airy, and every thing belonging to it should be kept in the neatest possible manner. These rules I would not only enforce while children are very small, but till they arrive at maturity. They are the means of promoting health at eighteen as well as at eight, and if properly followed up, will seldom fail of success.

Early rising is unquestionably conducive to mental as well as corporeal vigour; and it is the duty of every mother to teach her children the impropriety of indulging in sleep, when every other animal naturally obeys the summons to activity.

To every school for girls I would have attached a large play-ground, where they should amuse themselves as they please for five or six hours every day—six hours might be closely applied to their studies and needle-work, &c. They should rise early, and go to bed early, and their food should be of the simplest kind. I am decidedly in favour of Calisthenics, but exercises of this sort should never be insisted on when they grow irksome. It is necessary that the exercises should be relished, as are the ordinary games, such as the ball, battle-dore, &c., or they will do comparatively but little good. When children are left to choose their own sports, they enjoy them most. It is very common for little girls who show any precocity of talents, to be stimulated, by every inducement that can possibly be held out to them, to extraordinary application to their studies, and when they have a fondness for learning, their health is not unfrequently sacrificed by entirely neglecting the body for the embellishment of the mind. I have often witnessed the pride and satisfaction with which parents have spoken of the intellectual acquirements of a favourite daughter, when at that moment her whole appearance bespoke to the observing eye, a constitution seriously impaired by the unremitting labour those acquirements had cost her.

From Carlyle's Lectures.

THE HERO AS KING.

CROMWELL, NAPOLEON, MODERN REVOLUTIONISM.

(Concluded from No. 25.)

The second Parliament, chosen by the rule these Notables had fixed upon, did assemble, and worked;—but got, before long, into bottomless questions as to the Protector's right, as to 'usurpation,' and so forth; and had at the earliest legal day to be dismissed. Cromwell's concluding Speech to these men is a remarkable one. Most rude, chaotic, as all his Speeches are; but most earnest-looking. You would say, it was a sincere helpless man; not used to speech the great inorganic thought of him, but to act it rather! A helplessness of utterance, in such bursting fullness of meaning. He talks much about 'births of Providence.' All these changes, so many victories and events, were not forethoughts, and theatrical contrivances of men, of me or of men; it is blind blasphemers that will persist in calling them so! He insists with a heavy sulphurous wrathful emphasis on this. As he well might! As if a Cromwell in that dark huge game he had been playing, the world wholly thrown into chaos round him, had foreseen it all, played it all off like a precontrived puppetshow by wood and wire! These things were foreseen by no man, he says; no man could tell what a day would bring forth: they were 'births of Providence,' God's finger guided us on, and we came at last to clear height of victory, God's Cause triumphant in these Nations; and you as a Parliament could assemble together, and say in what manner all this could be organized, reduced into rational feasibility among the affairs of men. You were to help with your wise counsel in doing that. "You have had such an opportunity as no Parliament in England ever had." Christ's Law, the Right and True, was to be in some measure made the Law of this land. In place of that, you have got into your idle pedantries, constitutionalities, bottomless cavillings and questionings about written laws for my coming here;—and would send the whole matter into Chaos again, because I have no Notary's parchment, but only God's voice from the battle-whirlwind, for being President among you! That opportunity is gone; and we know not when it will return. You have had your constitutional Logic; and Mammon's Law, not Christ's Law, rules yet in this land. "God be judge between you and me!" These are his final words to them: Take your your constitutional-formulas in your hand; and I my informal struggles, purposes, realities, and acts; and "God be judge between you and me!"

We said above, what shapeless, involved chaotic things these printed Speeches of Cromwell's are. Wilfully ambiguous, unintelligible, say the most: a hypocrite shrouding himself in confused Jesuitic jargon! To me they do not seem so. I will say rather, they afforded the first glimpses I could ever get into the reality of this Cromwell, nay, into the possibility of him. Try to believe that he means something, search lovingly what that may be: you will find a real speech lying imprisoned in these broken rude tortuous utterances; a meaning in the great heart of this inarticulate man! You will, for the first time, begin to see that he was a man; not an enigmatic chimera, unintelligible to you, incredible to you. The Histories and Biographies written of this Cromwell, written in shallow sceptical generations that could not know or conceive of a deep believing man, are far more obscure than Cromwell's Speeches. You look through them only into the infinite vague of Black and the Isane. "Heats and jealousies," says Lord Clarendon himself: "heats and jealousies," mere crabbed whims, theories, and crotchets; these induced slow, sober, quiet Englishmen to lay down their ploughs and work, and fly into red fury of confused war against the best-conditioned of Kings! Try if you can find that true. Scepticism writing about Belief may have great gifts; but it is really ultra vires there. It is Blindness laying down the Laws of Optics.

Cromwell's third Parliament split on the same rock as his second. Ever the constitutional Formula: How came you there? Show us some Notary parchment! Blind pedants:—"Why, surely the same power which makes you a Parliament, that, and something more, made me a Protector!" If my Protectorship is nothing, what in the name of wonder is your Parliamentership, a reflex and creation of that?

Parliaments having failed, there remained nothing but the way of Despotism. Military Dictators, each with his district, to coerce the Royalist and other gainsayers, to govern them, if not by act of Parliament, then by the sword. Formula shall not carry it, while the reality is here! I will go on, protecting oppressed Protestants abroad, appointing just judges, wise managers, at home, cherishing true Gospel ministers; doing the best I can to make England a Christian England, greater than old Rome, the Queen of Protestant Christianity; I since you will not help me; I, while God leaves a life! Why did he not give it up; retire into obscurity again, since the Law would not acknowledge him? cry several. That is where they mistake. For him there was no giving of it up! Prime Ministers have governed countries, Pitt, Pombal, Choiseul; and their word was a law while it held; but this Prime Minister was one that could not resign. Let him once resign, Charles Stuart and the Cavaliers wanted to kill him; to kill the Cause and him. Once embarked, there is no retreat, no return. This Prime Minister could retire nowhere except into his tomb.

One is sorry for Cromwell in his old days. His complaint is incessant of the heavy burden Providence has laid on him. Heavy; which he must bear till death. Old Colonel Huteson, as his wife relates it, Huteson his old battle-mate, coming to see him on some indispensable business, march against his will—Cromwell "follows him to the door," in a most fraternal, domestic, conciliatory style; begs that he would be reconciled to him, his old brother in arms; says how much it grieves him to be misunderstood, deserted by true fellow-soldiers, dear to him from old: the rigorous Huteson, cased in his Presbyterian formula, sullenly goes his way. And the man's head now white; his strong arm growing weary with its long work! I think always, too, of his poor Mother, now very old, living in that Palace of his; a right brave woman; as, indeed, they lived all an honest God-fearing Household there: if she heard a shot go off, she thought it was her son killed. He had to come to her twice a day, that she might see with her own eyes that he was yet living. The poor old Mother!—What had this man gained? what had he gained? He had a life of sore strife and toil, to his last day. Fame, ambition, place a History! His dead body was hung in chains; his "place in History"—place in History forsooth—has been a place of ignominy, accusation, blackness, and disgrace; and here, this day, who knows if it is not rash in me to be among the first that ever ventured to pronounce him not a knave and a liar, but a prices fell ruinously low; trade became stagnant; the "credit" men declared themselves bankrupt; and a period of great suffering ensued. He said that in the United States the same system prevailed to an inconceivable extent; and that as one phantom vanished, another was conjured up. Certain speculators now hold cotton in —, to the value of three millions of dollars, waiting for a rise. The basis of the adventure was the known fact, that last year's crop had been considerably short of an average; and, in the face of a falling market, they held on, convinced that the prices must rise. They acted on this single fact, without taking into consideration collateral circumstances. I remarked that the high price of provisions in Britain is a most important element in such a speculation; for it must influence the price of cotton. The mass of the British people are very important consumers of cotton fabrics: when they are forced to expend all their money in purchasing food, they must wear their old clothes, and give up buying new. They will go in rags rather than starve. He said that this very circumstance might account to some extent for the fall in the price of cotton, although the last crop was short, and that a few more incidental circumstances might entirely counteract the consequences of the short produce; but that these collateral influences were rarely considered by those whose fortunes were at stake.

Condition of New York City.—I made some remarks on the condition of the city of New York; when a gentleman observed that the cause of the disorder of the streets, pavements, police, and many other things in New York, is the aversion of the lower classes to be taxed, and the subjection of the politicians to them. At the present time, the democratic party of that city is engaged in expelling every public officer of the whig party, and substituting their own men; this they could not do, if they offended the people by taxing them. A moral party is much wanted—one which should advocate what is right, and care nothing about votes. Such a party would rally round the sound portion of the people, and do great good. At first they would fail; but if they had courage to persevere, they would acquire such strength that they would be in a condition to dictate terms to both of the political parties. At present, no leading man has courage to encounter the opposition of both; and the substantial interests of the country suffer.

We arrived at Albany at half past six, where we were kindly received by my brother and his wife. Nothing could exceed the beauty of the scenery through which we have passed.

May 26. Ther. 43°. The Niskayuna Shakers.—We drove to this Shaker settlement, situated about half way between Troy and Schenectady. The grounds are not naturally fertile, but are remarkably well cultivated. The settlement presents a number of plain-looking buildings, one of which is used as a church. In size and appearance it resembles an ordinary school-house of one story. This being Sunday, there was a large number of strangers in attendance, who came in carriages of various kinds. The male Shakers entered the church by one door, and the men by another; and the strangers were ordered to follow the same rule. We were provided with benches to sit on. At ten o'clock the Shakers appeared. The women were dressed something like Sisters of Charity; the men wore the ordinary dress of male Quakers, only their coats and hats were of the colour of dust, broader skirts and brims, and of a coarser fabric than those usually worn by other Quakers. The women occupied one end of the floor, and the men the other. The apartment had neither pews, pulpit, desk, nor any other appendage of a church. An aged, sensible-looking man, one of their number, addressed the visitors. He told them that the Shakers are "a peculiar people;" that they were now met to worship God; that the whole human race were interested in what they were doing, and would, in God's good time, be benefited by it; that, in the mean while, their mode of worship and their manners appeared to the world to be strange; that although they knew this to be the case, they opened their doors to every visitor, and all that they required in return was that visitors should behave with common decency, and forbear from whispering and laughing. "We have provided," he continued, "spit-boxes for those who spit, or at least as many as we could, and we hope that they will try to sit near them; if not, we beg that they will not put more tobacco in their mouths, so as to render it necessary for them to spit, and that they will not dirty the floor. Chewing tobacco is a practice not followed by ourselves, and we wish to be protected from its effects."

The service began by one of the men delivering some sensible moral precepts; after which, as the day was warm, the men stripped off their coats, and laid aside their hats; while the women took off their shawls and bonnets. They then commenced singing and dancing; at the same time waving their hands, which they held in the attitude of the forefeet of the kangaroo. While singing they knelt occasionally; and, at other times, several of them took their station in the middle of the floor and sung, while the rest danced round them. Their tunes were merry measures, with strongly marked time, such as are played in farces and pantomimes. By-and-by some of them began to bend their bodies forwards, to shake from side to side, and to whirl round. A favourite motion was to let the trunk of the body drop downwards, with a sudden jerk, to one side, care being always taken to recover the perpendicular before the equilibrium was lost. The head and trunk were drawn up by another jerk. In all their shakings and contortions they never lost the step in their dance, nor ran against each other.

During these gesticulations some of the strangers laughed. One of the male Shakers, singling out a young lady whom he had observed committing this breach of decorum, addressed her thus: "Young woman, you laugh too much. We are a-worshipin' God: we want you to be quiet; that's all we desire."

The Shakers trace back their origin to the days of Oliver Cromwell; but the testimony was lost for many years, and revived in 1747 under James Wardley, a tailor, and Jane, his wife, in Bolton and Manchester, in England. They believe that the second appearance of Christ is at hand, and, in accordance with this doctrine, they enforce a total separation between the sexes. No children are born in their institution.* In 1770, Anna Leese became a distinguished leader of the sect, and declared herself to be "the Elect Lady," the woman "spoken of in Rev. xii. and the mother of all the Elect." In 1774, she, and a number of her followers, left Manchester, complaining of persecution, and came to New York. Being joined by others of their own faith, they settled at this place, then called Nissequenia, near Albany, where they have spread their opinions, and increased to a considerable number. They have also a large settlement near New Lebanon, twenty-five miles to the east of Albany. "They are neither Trinitarians nor Satisfactionists. They deny the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity, the doctrine of election and reprobation, as well as the eternity of future punishment." They deny also "the resuscitation of the body," and "reject the celebration of water baptism and the Lord's Supper."*

* I observed in the newspapers mention made of a bill depending before the legislature of New York state, to provide for the wives and children of men who had become Shakers; but its terms were not published.

They admit freely all who wish to join them, and subject them to probation. I was told that they receive numerous recruits from among destitute Irish mothers with families, whose husbands have died or deserted them. They cultivate the ground, and manufacture a variety of articles, which they sell in the towns. The community is prosperous and rich.

About half a dozen of the men whom we saw were past the middle period of life: they had large, round, portly figures, with regularly-formed and well developed brains, and the external aspect of good sense. They were obviously the leaders. The rest presented heads such as one generally sees in lunatic asylums, characterised by excessive predominance of some organs, and great deficiency of others. The organs of the domestic affections were strikingly deficient in some of them, but not in all. In several, Self-Esteem and Firmness were exceedingly large, combined with a narrow base of the brain, and an expression of countenance in the highest degree fanatical, dogmatical, and inflexible. In these men the nose was disproportionately long. In many the brain was below an average in size, and the men looked silly.

The heads of the women were covered by their caps; but the general size and outline could be seen through the thin muslin. The great majority of them had well-developed foreheads; but in some the head was small. Some were pretty. I distinctly remarked that those who shook, jerked, whirled round, or otherwise gave marks of being possessed, had small heads, and the expression of their countenances was maniacal or fatuous. Those individuals who had large well-shaped brains never manifested contortion, but danced, and sang, and waved their hands, and knelt and rose, all with the most perfect composure. One boy of twelve or thirteen, with a small head, but enormously large Secretiveness, jerked incessantly, so that it became fatiguing to look at him; he was in excellent health, and there was no expression of fanatical emotion in his countenance. He appeared to me to be acting a part. One man whose brain indicated a close approximation to idiocy, rolled his head, and shook incessantly. After the meeting, he continued shaking on the road home to his residence, till one of the brethren gave him a good shake, which had the effect of quieting him. The women were the greatest shakers; and their pale faces, wild looks, and flabby condition, indicated at once a low state of health, and irregular nervous excitement. The oddly formed brains indicate bizarre minds, and these produce strange actions. The sincere members of the community appeared to me to be monomaniacs on the point of their religion. In other respects they are said to be rational, honest, benevolent, and industrious. From the large development of Self-Esteem and Firmness, they would in other days have endured martyrdom without hesitation; but here these feelings are manifested chiefly in pretending to exclusive salvation, and setting at naught the opinions and practices of the world.

* Adam's Dictionary of all Religions.

Rate of Board in Albany.—In winter the members of the legislature assemble from all parts of the state, and hold their sessions here. They live chiefly in boarding-houses and hotels. The rate for a bed-room and board, with the use of a public dining-room and reading-room, is from $3, to $8, $12, and $14 a week, according to the style of the house. Albany looks very beautiful at this season.

May 29. Ther. 63°. Glen's Falls and Caldwell.—Yesterday, we went by the railroad to Saratoga, which is now interesting. It has a clean and fresh appearance, and the air is aromatic from a profusion of blooming lilacs. To-day, we traveled, by a very bad road, to Glen's Falls, a village on the banks of the Hudson, where there is a great abundance of water-power, derived from a fall of 63 feet in the river. There were nine passengers inside the stage, and one on the top. One of the passengers mentioned that "Mr. — of New York had sold to a friend of his a lot of 100 acres up in this country, at $3½ per acre. His friend bought it by a map and description. When he came to take possession, he found the lot composed entirely of rocks and stones, and lying so high, and so deeply buried in an impenetrable forest, that "even a bird could scarcely have got to it." He left it, considering himself completely cheated of his money.

At Glen's Falls, there is an old crazy bridge over the river, so unsafe that the passengers were requested to leave the stage and walk along it. The country from Saratoga to Glen's Falls is pretty well cleared and settled; but the soil is white and sandy. Many stumps of trees stand with crops growing round them. In other places, the stumps have been pulled up by a machine, like teeth drawn from a jaw, and now form substantial and picturesque fences.

The next stage brought us to Caldwell, a village on the shore of Lake George. This part of the road runs between hills, most of which are in a state of nature. We left Saratoga at 1 P. M. after dinner, and arrived at Caldwell at 8 P. M., the distance being 27 miles. We passed a rock where Colonel Williams was killed by the Indians during the French war, and a small insignificant pool, by the roadside, 3 miles from Lake George, named "Bloody Pond," from its having received the slain of a battle fought near it in 1755. The hotel at Caldwell proved good. It is clean and completely prepared for a rush of summer visitors. The situation is extremely beautiful, overlooking the lake.

May 30. Ther. 47°. Lake George.—At 7 A. M. we embarked on board the "William Caldwell," a handsome new steamboat of fifty horse power, low pressure; and sailed down Lake George. It is 34 miles long, and in its general features remarkably like Loch Lomond in Scotland. The breadth, varying from 1 to 4 miles, is the same; the distribution of small and large islands is similar; the hills which rise from the margin of the lake are of corresponding heights; with the exception of the highest peak, which at Loch Lomond is 3260 feet, and here 2200 feet, and with the farther difference, that the American hills are clothed with trees to the summit, while the Scottish mountains are dark and bare.

We reached the northeastern extremity of the lake at half past ten; entered a coach that was in waiting; and passed along the banks of Cecilia River, which, rising from Lake George, empties itself, at the distance of a few miles, into Lake Champlain. We reached the ruins of Fort Ticonderoga on Lake Champlain; surveyed them leisurely, admired the beauty of the scenery, and listened to the stories of the battles which had here been fought between the French and the English, and latterly between the English and Americans. Afterwards, we dined at an inn in the neighbourhood of the Fort, and returned by the same road and the same steamboat in the evening to the hotel at Caldwell, highly gratified with our day's excursion.

Emancipation in Jamaica.—Few passengers were yet traveling by this route to Canada; but we met one English gentleman who had just come from Jamaica, where he had resided for several months, thence he had proceeded to New Orleans, where he entered a steamboat and came up the Mississippi and Ohio to Wheeling; and he was now on his way to Canada. He mentioned that the reports which are circulated in the United States about the effects of emancipation in Jamaica are partly true and partly false. It is true that many of the negroes may be seen idle; but it is not true that the lands in general are left uncultivated. If an estate required the labour of three hundred slaves to cultivate it successfully, free negroes labour so much more energetically, that from one hundred and fifty to two hundred of them actually accomplish the same work within the same time. The remaining hundred or hundred and fifty are still on the estate, and take their turn in labour. The practical arrangement is this—one half or two thirds of the whole labour the first three days of the week, and the remainder the other three days. The negroes enjoy the pleasures of mere existence highly; they bask in the sun surrounded by their wives and children and are happy. The wages paid to them for three days' labour, added to the produce of their grounds, suffice to supply all their wants, and they have not yet contracted artificial tastes, which would call for extra labour to procure the means of their gratification. One or two plantations may be seen uncultivated and covered with weeds; but these belong to individuals who used their slaves and apprentices so cruelly, that nearly all their negroes left them or refused to labour the moment emancipation took effect. Even on these estates, however, a few acres may be seen cultivated—the work of some domestics who were not ill-treated while slaves, and whose gratitude induces them, when free, to remain in the service even of these masters, and to raise provision for their maintenance. I have seen this account confirmed in its essential features by subsequent published reports.

The beautiful scenery through which we have travelled to-day has been the theatre of many a bloody strife, and graves are still pointed out which contain the bones of hundreds of fallen warriors. It is painful to reflect that to these spots came the flower of France and England in the hey-day of life and enjoyment, and in mad-dened fury terminated each other's existence. In looking on a battle field, I cannot help thinking of the mothers who there lost their sons, the wives bereaved of their husbands, and the children whose fathers were cut off; contemplated in such a spirit, the scene appears like an arena in which madmen have come together and indulged their frenzied passions.

May 31. Ther. 46°. It has again become extremely cold. The Indian corn is just appearing above the ground.

June 1. Ther. 53°. The Law.—In all our travels in the United States, we have met with abundant evidence of the activity of the law. Lawyers abound, and courts of justice are held often, and in every locality. To-day we found a vast concourse of lawyers, doctors, and ordinary citizens, at the village of Ballston Spa, near Saratoga, attending the trial, before Judge Willard, of a young man of some fortune accused of murder. After a long trial, he was found guilty of manslaughter in the second degree.

Schenectady.—After leaving Ballston Spa by the railroad, the locomotive engine became unserviceable, and the train quietly stood still. Every car poured forth its company in alarm, like bees issuing from their hive on a serious assault. The passengers pushed the whole train backwards about a third of a mile, to a passing station, when the engine was run off the track, and a messenger was despatched to Ballston, three miles distant, for aid. After waiting an hour, one horse appeared, and we proceeded forward at a snail's pace. The evening was fine, and nature fresh and young, which made the detention less tedious. Independently of such alleviations, however, the Americans are certainly remarkable for good temper; for although there was ground for provocation in the slender supply of horse power when the engine failed, the numerous company displayed the most exemplary patience and good humour. After advancing four miles with one single horse, we obtained three, and at last arrived after dark at Schenectady. We went to the hotel near the railroad office, one of large dimensions, and of good reputation. The first thing to be done on entering an American hotel, is to go to the bar and inscribe your name in the book of arrivals, adding the name of every individual in your party. When a number of travellers arrive at the same time, the bar-keeper consults with the chamber-maid, and distributes the bed rooms according to their estimate of the condition of their guests. Single gentlemen are worst served, ladies and married persons best. I do not know whether it was observed that we were foreigners, and whether any extra attention was paid to us on this account; but in general we experienced the most unexceptionable treatment at the inns, and our accommodations were seldom otherwise than good. On the present occasion we waited longer than usual before any person came to show us to a room. At last the landlady of the house appeared; she mentioned that the chamber-maids "had gone to the circus," apologised for the delay, and did the honours herself in a very pleasing manner.

In Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, excellent gas is burned in the houses, but in the hotels visited by us since we left New York, oil lamps are extensively used. I have observed that they form a pretty accurate index to the general economy of the house. If they are clean, well trimmed, and burning brightly, the house is well kept throughout. The least neglect shows itself in them. The superintending mind which maintains a discipline that reaches them, does not allow higher objects to be neglected, or to be treated in a slovenly manner. In traveling we find the hours advertised for the starting of coaches and railroad cars to be very ill observed.

A detention of half an hour is common, sometimes of a whole hour. While we waited for the starting of a train, C—— read a letter from London which the post had just delivered. A female passenger looked over her shoulder, and attempted to read it. The hand was too cramped for her to make it out, and she turned to her companion and said aloud, "I wanted to see whether that letter was full!"

June 2. Ther. 55°. Road to Utica.—We started by a railroad train this morning at ten o'clock for Utica. The distance is seventy-seven miles. The railroad follows the valley of the Mohawk River. This valley in general is not above a mile broad. On the right bank of the Mohawk runs the Erie Canal, and on the left bank are the high road and the railroad, all nearly parallel to each other. The valley is inclosed on both sides by hills, apparently of 500 or 600 feet in height, partly cultivated, and partly bearing the primeval forest. The railroad consists of a single track, and no inclined plane occurs. It was commenced in 1834, and completed in 1836, at a cost of $1,540,000, or $20,000 per mile. It forms the second link in the great chain by railroad from Albany to Buffalo and the Falls of Niagara. The annual dividends are generally ten per cent. In the car with us were two Canada Quakers, and a person whose appearance and manners led us to suppose him to be a journeyman tradesman. For three hours they discussed the subject of a general or particular providence with good temper, and some considerable ingenuity. The mechanic maintained the doctrine, that "whatever is, is right," which the Quakers denied; but as the subject puzzled Milton's Devils in Pandemonium, it was no disparagement to the talents of my fellow-travellers that they did not succeed in throwing much additional light on its obscurities. We arrived safely at Utica at 3 P. M. and found excellent accommodation in Mr. Baggs's hotel.

June 3. Ther. 54°. The weather is cool and showery. Blossoms are still visible on the apple and pear trees; the oats and barley do not yet cover the ground so thickly as to obscure the soil; and altogether vegetation is later than it is at Edinburgh in ordinary seasons at the same period of the year.

Trenton Falls.—We hired a carriage with grasshopper springs and two horses to drive us to Trenton Falls, fifteen miles distant from Utica. No words can describe the horrible condition of the road, and yet it was a turnpike, on which toll was levied both going and returning. It runs, however, through a beautiful and fertile country, crosses a ridge of hills from which delightful views are obtained of Utica and of the valley in which the Trenton Falls are situated. The houses are neat; much of the country is cleared, and the fields are well cultivated. All seems civilized except the roads. The rural population will scarcely expend a dollar on a road which will not present them with half-yearly dividends and a saleable stock. The waste of labour, destruction of vehicles, and loss of time, are taxes which they seem not to appreciate, or rather which they evade, by using the roads only during winter snows and midsummer droughts when nature renders them passable.

The falls of the Trenton are very picturesque. The river, "the West Canada Creek," is about the same in size as the Clyde at Lanark in Scotland; its bed is cut deep into limestone, and its banks are thickly wooded. There are six falls; the uppermost the water is precipitated eight-teen or twenty feet down an abrupt ledge into a spacious basin. In another the perpendicular descent is forty-eight feet, and in a third it is thirty-seven feet. In the others the fall is broken. The entire descent in less than five miles is 387 feet. The proprietor has cut walks, erected stairs, thrown a bridge across the river, built sheds and seats for resting and taking refreshments, excavated paths in the rock to admit the visitor to the best points of view, secured dangerous paths by chains, and established an excellent hotel; so that, altogether, the visit to the Falls is rendered highly interesting and inviting. The scenery is full of loveliness and beauty, approaching in some points to grandeur. The lime rock abounds in organic remains, and specimens of ammonites, trilobites, &c. along with rock-crystals, are exhibited at the inn. In the hotel, we found residing for a few days one of the most estimable and distinguished men of the United States, with whom we had previously become acquainted, along with several members of his family. We enjoyed the pleasure of their society; and altogether this has been a day of great gratification.

Utica.—This was the site of the old Fort Schuyler. The first settlement took place in 1789. In 1798 a village charter was granted, and in 1832 the place was incorporated into a city. It contains now nearly 10,000 inhabitants. It is regularly laid out, the streets are of good width and mostly paved, but it has no lamps. It has sixteen churches, a lyceum, an academy, a high school, a female institute, a museum, and an institution called the Young Men's Association, in which there is a library and reading-room, which are gratuitously open for the use of strangers. It contains also three banks, an insurance company, and from six to eight newspaper establishments. We found several phrenologists in the city, from whom we received much attention. They drove us to see the new Lunatic Asylum now in the course of erection by the state of New York, about a mile and a half from the town. The foundations of this institution are laid, and on a large scale. It is in the form of a square, and will inclose eleven acres of ground within its area. It is calculated to accommodate 1000 patients, paupers, and also persons who pay. Attached to it is a farm of 130 acres. The building stands on an eminence sixty-eight feet above the level of the Erie Canal, and commands a beautiful view of the surrounding country. The erection of this asylum is intrusted to commissioners, and so searching is the spirit of party, that even the management of charities cannot escape from its influence. Francis E. Spinner and Elam Lynds have been dismissed, and Anson Dart and Willet H. Shearman have been appointed commissioners in their stead, purely, it is said, on party grounds; but Captain W. Clarke, the most active of the commissioners, has in the mean time been spared. We enjoyed much hospitality and excellent society during our stay at Utica. I observed, in a newspaper there, an advertisement by Mr. Crowley, 42 Genesee Street, intimating that he professes Practical Phrenology—that he will give lessons in it on one or two evenings in every week, and that he examines heads for a fee. I did not see him.

June 5. Ther. 54°. Journey to Syracuse.—A railroad is in the course of construction between Utica and Syracuse, but not yet serviceable. The road was described as very bad, and we were advised by our friends to travel by the boat on the Erie Canal. We started at eight o'clock in the morning, and proceeded at the rate of five miles an hour. The distance is fifty-three miles, and the canal runs for a part of the way through a low, marshy, unsettled, and uninteresting country. It rained the most of the day. After dinner, a brisk young man entered the boat, and in a loud voice asked if any lady or gentleman wanted to have "corns cured." He was asked his terms, and said they were half a dollar for one corn, and less for each additional. He offered to remove the corn by the root instantly, without pain, and engaged that it should never grow again. After a great deal of bargaining and bad wit, one passenger made an agreement with him to have one corn extirpated, for which he was to pay 25 cents (1s. sterling.) The operator, who was dubbed by the passengers "the Doctor," pulled out a bottle, borrowed a pen-knife, applied some sulphuric acid to the corn, received his 25 cents, paid 18 cents for his fare, and left the boat. The lent knife was destroyed by the acid, but "the Doctor" was fairly beyond reach before its owner made this discovery. The best piece of wit elicited on the occasion was a remark that this was in every sense "a toe-boat." The master of the boat told me that "the Doctor" had done a small business to-day, but that yesterday he had cleared nine dollars in the boat going east.

In most of the public conveyances, very little attention is paid to the safety of the passengers' luggage. In this boat two men were returning to Rochester, whence they had come yesterday, to inquire after their portmanteaus, which they had missed on arriving at Utica. The owners of all the public conveyances give notice that they will not be responsible for luggage; but the supreme courts in different states have decided that no individual can set aside the common law, which enforces this liability, and that the public notice is of no avail. They have, in some instances, led to the adoption of a regular plan for securing the effects of passengers, which is at once simple and effectual. Long straps of leather are used, having at their extremities loops, to which are attached pieces of tin-plate bearing numbers from one to two or three hundred. The same number is stamped on the tin plates attached to each end of these straps. When a passenger presents his luggage, one of the plates is slipped off the strap and given to him as his voucher; and the strap itself, bearing the other plate, is attached to his portmanteau. This is repeated with every piece of his luggage. At the end of the journey, the baggage master reads aloud the numbers attached to the packages, as he takes them out of the boat, car, or coach; and the owner, on producing the check-plate bearing the same number, receives the package, but not otherwise. There is no lock on the canal from Utica till within one mile of Syracuse, where three descending locks occur. We arrived at Syracuse at half past eight o'clock, and found very comfortable accommodation in the Syracuse Hotel, close beside the wharf.*

* Before we left the United States, the Syracuse and Utica railroad was completed. It is a continuation of the Utica and Schenectady railroad. It passes up the south acclivity of the Mohawk, near to, and parallel with, the Erie Canal. Its length is 53 miles. The capital stock is $800,000. According to a statement of the president, the company received for tolls in five months $117,614, equal to 12 per cent. on its cost, or 30 per cent. per annum. The revenue of these railroads is derived from passengers

Syracuse.—We were again greeted by several highly respectable citizens of Syracuse who have embraced phrenology, and have formed a phrenological society. One of them kindly drove us in an open carriage to Salina, a village in the neighbourhood, which has received its name from its salt springs. These have all been reserved by the state, and they yield a large revenue, applicable to the expenses of the Erie Canal. The spring was known to the Indians, and was discovered by the resort of the wild animals to drink the water. It lies near the Onondaga lake, which is fresh to the bottom. The well at Salina, which was opened twelve or thirteen years since, is seventy feet in depth, and from it brine is raised, by means of forcing pumps worked by a water-wheel, to a reservoir eighty-five feet above the Oswego Canal. It is distributed to a great number of salt-works. In the month of July, 1837, these pumps raised 482 gallons of brine in a minute, or 28,920 gallons in an hour. Its temperature during its passage from the pumps into the reservoir is 50° F. Its specific gravity is 1.11060 at 60° F. It is said that for a period of thirty-six years its strength has undergone no change. One thousand grains evaporated to a perfect dryness by heat, left the residuum of 146.50 grains. The following is the result of an analysis of this quantity of the water:—

Carbonate of lime, - - - -	0.17
Sulphate of lime, - - - -	4.72
Chloride of calcium, - - - -	1.04
Chloride of magnesium, - - - -	0.51
Chloride of sodium, or common salt, -	140.02
Oxide of iron, with a minute portion of silica and carbonate of lime, -	0.04
Carbonic acid, holding in solution the carbonate of lime and oxide of iron, -	0.09
Water, with a trace of organic matter and bromine, - - - -	853.41

1000.00

This brine contains 1130 grains of pure and perfectly dry chloride of sodium in a wine pint, and 9045 grains, or 1.29 lb. avoirdupois in a gallon. It therefore requires 43½ of these gallons to yield a bushel of salt weighing 56 lb. But as salt made by boiling usually contains not less than five per cent. of water, 41½ of these gallons will yield a bushel of salt of mercantile quality.*

There are wells also at Syracuse, Geddes, and Liverpool, and in 1835 the quantity of salt manufactured from them all amounted to 2,222,694 bushels. The individuals who manufacture the salt pay a tax to the state for the use of the springs.

Dr. Hoyt mentioned, that in the men who superintend the boiling of the salt, the venous blood is nearly as florid red as the arterial blood in other men. He bled one yesterday, and but for the continuous flow, he might have believed that he had punctured an artery. These men are remarkably healthy, and if sober, are rarely affected with any ailment.

Syracuse is the capital of Onondaga county.

alone. Their charters prohibit them from carrying goods, the monopoly of which the state, as proprietor of the Erie Canal, reserves to itself. In September, 1840, this stock sold in the New York market at $117 per share of $100.—Tanner's Canals and Railroads, p. 78.

* Abridged from Report by Dr. Lewis C. Beck to the Governor of the state of New York. Assembly paper, No. 900, p. 25.—20th Feb. 1838.

It contains about 800 houses and stores, several churches, two banks, a court house and jail. It appears to carry on an extensive business. We saw two Onondaga Indians, a man and woman, in the street. They have a settlement seven miles distant. These two were poorly clothed, dirty, and forlorn in their appearance; like the most abject of European beggars, only dark in the complexion. They spoke English.

Phrenology.—In the evening the Phrenological Society of Syracuse held a meeting in the Presbyterian church. I had positively declined to deliver a lecture, or to make any public exhibition, but agreed to take a part, incidentally, in the proceedings of any meeting of the society. I insisted that the public notices of the meeting should be so expressed, and they were so. On entering the church, which was filled, the president of the society led me at once to the pulpit; and announced that I would address the audience. I told him that he must begin with the ordinary business of the society; he then said, that they had no business that evening except to hear me. I was thus unexpectedly forced to extemporise without either a theme or preparation. I spoke for an hour and twenty minutes, and the people listened. The phrenologists were so much satisfied, that next morning I found that they had come to the inn, and, as a mark of respect, proposed to the landlord to settle my bill. This intended courtesy I respectfully declined, and we parted friends.

June 7. Ther. 58°. Railroad from Syracuse to Auburn.—This railroad was opened only on the 5th June, and we traveled on it the third morning of its operation. It was not inclosed, and the domestic animals along the line had not yet become accustomed to the appearance of the locomotive engines and trains. It was a curious study to mark the effects of our train upon them, as it rushed past. The horses in the fields generally ran away, carrying their heads erect, and their ears bent downwards and backwards; and they turned their heads alternately to the one side and the other to catch a glimpse of the dreaded enemy behind. One horse, however, turned round to us, and presented a bold and inquiring front. He erected his ears and turned them towards us, stood firm on his legs, and looked as if he would "defy the devil." The sheep and lambs fled in terrible agitation and confusion. The swine early took alarm, and tried to run from before us. When we overtook them, they endeavoured, in an ecstasy of fear, to push themselves through the fences, if there happened to be any, or into the banks. The cows fled, but were speedily breathless, and gave up in despair. A huge breeding hen rose suddenly from her brood, and put herself in an attitude of defence, without moving a step. Another hen, without a brood, flew straight up into the air, in a paroxysm of fright. Fortunately none of these animals ventured on the railroad, and we arrived at Auburn, distance 26 miles, in one hour and ten minutes, without accident or detention. In a separate car were two stout, rascally-looking convicts, chained together, under charge of an officer, going to Auburn state-prison. They were merry and reckless, and came out at the half-way station to have their last supply of tobacco and whisky, before entering on the life of temperance that awaited them in jail.

Auburn State-Prison.—We visited this prison, accompanied by his excellency Governor Seward (to whom we carried letters of introduction,) and saw its whole economy. It was commenced in 1816, and is built on the plan of a hollow square, inclosed by four walls each 500 feet long. The convicts labour during day in large workshops, under the close surveillance of the officers of the prison, to prevent them from conversing. After work hours, they are locked up in separate cells. They move to and from their cells, and to and from the hall in which they receive their meals, in the lock-step, and are never allowed to communicate with each other. The system of treatment is essentially the same as that pursued at Boston and Blackwell's Island, already described. Here, however, the sleeping cells are lower in the roof, and have no ventilating chimneys communicating with the open air. The convicts dined during our visit, and we saw 650 of them in a large apartment, seated at narrow tables arranged like the seats in a theatre, so that the convicts at one table looked on the backs of those at the table before. The keepers were stationed in the open passages to watch them. Their heads presented the usual development of criminals, viz., deficiency of size in many, deficiency of the moral organs in the great majority, deficiency of intellect in many, with large organs of the propensities in nearly all. One exception struck me. A man apparently above sixty presented an ample coronal region, with a good intellectual development, such as one very rarely sees in confirmed criminals. I mentioned the fact to Governor Seward, and he very obligingly made inquiries into his history. He learned that the man had been a "root doctor;" but in consequence of the removal of the late agent of the prison, and the recent appointment of Dr. Palmer in his place, no information could be obtained concerning the offence for which he had been convicted. Among the convicts was a man in respectable circumstances, who, under religious delusions, had chastised his son, a child, to such an extent that he died. He is sentenced to seven years' confinement. His intellectual organs appeared to be of average size; those of Combativeness and Destructiveness to be large; and the moral organs rather shallow and deficient. In the hospital we saw a convict who, six days before, had voluntarily chopped off his left hand. Governor Seward asked him why he had done so. "Because," said he, "it had offended against God and man, and it was borne in upon me, that if I cut it off, as commanded by the Scripture, God would forgive me, and man also." In the hospital we saw likewise an interesting man, Mr. Rathbun of Buffalo, acting in the capacity of steward. He had been engaged in gigantic building speculations in the town of Buffalo, and at Niagara Falls, and failing in resources, he was a participator in forgeries, to the extent, as we were told, of nearly a million of dollars. He was a man of great talent, and of highly popular manners, and so bold in his undertakings, that he was a general favourite with the people. It was with great difficulty that the jury could be induced to find him guilty, although the evidence was overwhelmingly clear, and the frauds enormous in their extent. At last, however, they returned a verdict against him, and he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He has been appointed steward of the hospital as an act of grace. He obeys the prison rules, does not presume on his former station, discharges his duties, but keeps himself quite aloof from his fellow convicts.

Captain Lynds, the late agent of the prison, is described as having been a brave officer of the army, and the father of this convict system. He ad also managed the prison at Sing-Sing. He maintained the opinion that convicts were sent to prison to be punished, and that discipline could be maintained only by the lash. He acted on these views, and his proceedings had been so much at variance with the spirit of the age, that here arose a great public excitement on the subject, in consequence of which he had retired. Dr. Palmer had succeeded him, and the social inner, which we saw, has been instituted since his appointment. I have already expressed my opinion of the relative merits of the Auburn and Philadelphia systems.

Auburn.—After dinner, we hired a carriage and drove along the shores of the Owasco Lake, two miles from the town, and, but for an execrable road, would have enjoyed the scenery highly. Although its banks are low, the landscape of the lake is exceedingly beautiful, and this season in its prime. We visited Judge Conklin of the supreme court, who has a residence near the lake, and enjoyed much interesting conversation with him and his family. The more I see of the American judges, the higher becomes my estimate of their powers, activity, and attainments. I spoke to Judge Conklin of the nearly universal want of ventilation in the American courts. He acknowledged it to be a very great evil, and mentioned that he had suffered severely from it a few years ago, when trying an important cause in the neighbouring town. It was mid-winter, and the trial lasted eight days. The court room was crowded to excess, and there was no cranny for ventilation. He suffered so excessively from the bad air, that he opened the window directly at his back, and sat with it open during the whole days of the trial. He then drove home in an open carriage, the only one he could procure; the thermometer being at zero. He was seized with a cold which nearly proved fatal, and which did not leave him for many months.

We returned to Auburn in the evening. It is one of the most pleasing little towns we have seen, even in this land of pretty villages, and shows evident marks of prosperity. It has numerous mills and manufactories, driven by the stream which issues from the Owasco Lake. Its population now amounts to 6000. There are even churches, an academy, a presbyterian theological seminary, a museum, two banks, a court house, and a jail.

I made inquiry into the system of repairing the roads here, and was told that they are maintained by so many days labour assessed on each proprietor. It is performed in this month. The cuts are filled up with mud, and this is all that is done till the subsequent year. We saw them using the plough to mend some of the by-roads in this state.

I had the pleasure also of visiting Dr. Briggs, whose name has already been mentioned in the verdict of the coroner's inquest on the body of Louis Von Eck. He mentioned that Captain Lynds was severe on small breaches of discipline, for the very purpose of preventing greater infringements of the rules and heavier punishments; that the reports circulated were greatly exaggerated; and that, if such flogging as was described had existed, he, as physician to the prison, must have known of it, which he never did.

June 8. Therm. 65°. Geneva.—At Auburn we met a family from Boston traveling westward, and along with them hired an "exclusive extra," or stage coach seated for nine persons, and drawn by four horses. We started at half past nine A. M., and found the road, although the great high-way turnpike to the west, horribly bad. Here I realised the fact of having the crown of my head rudely beaten against the top of the vehicle, so dreadful were the jolts. Seven miles west from Auburn, we crossed the Cayuga Lake on a wooden bridge one mile and eight rods in length. This lake is thirty-eight miles long, and from one to two miles broad. It is shallow, but a steam-boat navigates it daily to Ithaca, a thriving village at its head, thirty-six miles distant from the village of Cayuga, where we crossed it. Fifteen miles farther west, we entered Geneva, a small town situated on the bank of the Seneca Lake, and distinguished for its picturesque beauty. We dined here; and started again for Canandaigua, where we arrived at eight P. M., the distance being sixteen miles. Since we left Auburn the country has presented a rich soil, well cultivated, with every external indication of great prosperity among the people. C—— was feverish when we arrived at Canandaigua, in consequence of the pain occasioned by the excessive jolting which she had sustained.

Canandaigua.—This village is situated at the distance of half a mile from a beautiful lake bearing the same name, and is itself one of that class of towns which I have seen in no country except the United States. Fifty years ago, it was in the heart of the forest; now its principal street is two miles in length, with two broad side-walks, decorated with trees. The houses stand in enclosures at a little distance from the road, and are ornamented with trees, shrubs, and flowers. The street is a long succession of pretty villas, of pure white, gleaming through the richest verdure. The houses and offices are built chiefly of wood; but they have a handsome appearance. In remote situations in the United States the family burying ground may be seen, indicated by tomb-stones, in the fields or orchards, there being no general burial place except at a great distance. The living there dwell among the dead. Even in the villages, the graveyards, as they name them, are not attached to churches; but are enclosures set apart for this purpose, and unconnected with any buildings. In strolling abroad to-day, I passed the burial ground of this village, and the first tomb-stone that attracted my attention bore the following inscription. "If eternal happiness be the reward of tender love, unobtrusive piety, and the kindest charity, blessed is the spirit which once animated the lovely tenant of this sepulchre." It was the monument of a young wife, erected by her husband to her and her infant daughter.

The peculiarity of American villages consists in the beauty of the dwellings and the superior manners and education of the inhabitants compared with European villages. There is, however, not much society among themselves, but to strangers they are very hospitable. A number of Scotsmen are settled here, some of them in affluent circumstances, and their condition is such that I could not bewail their change of country. Some of them complain of trouble with their "helps;" but I strongly suspect that the meagre wages allowed to domestic servants (less than the common remuneration for labour in other departments of industry,) has much to do with these annoyances. When ample remuneration is given, I am assured that the native Americans will engage in service, and prove faithful, useful, and obliging.

In visiting a Scottish gentleman in this village, I was surprised to observe a number of pictures and articles of vertu which I thought I had seen before. They proved to have been the property of the late Thomas Sievwright, Esq. of Meggetland, near Edinburgh, which had been brought to sale after his death. Their present owner happened to visit that city at the time of the sale, and purchased largely. It was interesting to meet with the relics of an old acquaintance in such an unexpected situation.

The land in this neighbourhood is cleared and fertile. It sells at prices varying from $30 to $50 an acre, according to quality and situation. It may be let on the following terms. If the proprietor furnish only the land, a tenant will pay him one third of the produce in kind. If he furnish the land and the chief part of the stocking and seed, he will receive one half of the produce; but in either case he must sell his share and turn it into money as he best can. Money-rents for land are nearly unknown. Although the soil is excellent, the cultivation is not of a superior order. The price of labour is so high, and that of produce so low (owing to the fertility and vast extent of the new lands in the west, the produce of which is brought to the eastern cities, and keeps grain cheap,) that draining, manuring, and other expensive operations, are sparingly executed. A large crop of wheat yields forty bushels an acre; but this extent of produce is rare. The growth of wheat is much more rapid, and the straw stronger than in Britain; but in general the ear does not fill so thoroughly. The title to land is very simple. A printed form of conveyance is filled up with a description of the property, executed before witnesses, and registered in the county books, and the title is complete. Twenty-five years' possession on a written title gives an indefeasible right, excepting only the claims of minors, and of other persons ab agendo.

June 11. Ther. 58°. Avon Springs.—We proceeded to Avon village, a distance of twenty-five miles, and visited the Avon springs. The first spring is called the Avon New Bath Spring, and was discovered by the present proprietor in 1835. The depth of the well is about thirty-six feet, and the formation through which the water rises is the calciferous slate. The temperature of the water is about 50° Fahr. and the specific gravity is 1.00356. Hotels and baths have been erected at these springs, and there is a considerable and increasing resort to them by invalids.

June 12. Ther. 44°. Indians.—A party of Indians appeared in the village this morning, traveling in a wagon drawn by two shabby gray ponies. The driver was an Indian youth, apparently about sixteen or seventeen years of age, and rather good looking, clothed in the European style, but in clothes of various colours, obviously not made for himself. The women of the party were dressed in trousers and short gowns of cotton cloth; they wore shoes, and each had a good large thick blanket with a blue border wrapped round her person. The young man wore a fur cap, but the heads of the women were uncovered; their hair was long and twisted up behind. They were dark and very plain. They came to sell their manufactured articles. Afterwards two other Indian women came into the village; their costume was the same, only their coarse black hair hung in lank locks about their heads and necks, in savage disorder and neglect. I addressed them; but they understood no English. On my presenting them with a piece of money, they expressed thanks by pleased looks and a slight curtesy.

June 13. Ther. 50°. Geneseo.—We proceeded to Geneseo, a thriving village on the high ground, which forms the eastern boundary of Geneseo valley. The view from it is beautiful and luxuriant. The Geneseo valley consists of a vast expanse of rich alluvial clay, nearly level, through which runs the Geneseo River, navigable for small boats to Lake Ontario. The name means the river of the broad valley. The country is cleared as far as the eye can reach, and carries the richest crops of wheat, and other common grains. "Geneseo flour" bears a high price in the New York market; and in all the villages in this region where there is water-power one sees large mills erected, bearing the inscription "cash for wheat." In clearing the forest, the present proprietor has spared the finest trees and left them in the most picturesque groups. The valley, seen from the village, looks like an extensive and beautiful English park.

This village is the capital of Livingston county, and contains a high school, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Methodist churches, a handsome court-house, two inns, and numerous "stores." The whole country through which we have lately passed, and also this county, lie on limestone. Beginning on the north, the rocks "are the hydraulic limestone, Onondaga and Seneca limestones, the extensive group of fossiliferous shales, succeeded by the upper black shale, the Cashaqua shale, the Gardean and Portage groups. The latter occupies only some of the high grounds in the southern part of Livingston county." For many feet in depth the Geneseo flats, as they are generally called, consist of fine sand and clay intimately mixed.

I observe, for the first time this season, barley in the ear.

June 14. Ther. 48°. June 15. Ther. 46°. The wheat begins to appear in the ear.

June 16. Ther. 50°. June 17. Ther. 52°. June 18. Ther. 71°. To-day we had the first dish of ripe cherries.

June 19. Ther. 48°. We proceeded westward to Batavia, 25 miles, in company with a highly interesting party of friends, in two "exclusive extras," and visited Batavia and Lockport. There we found a railroad which carried us to the Falls of Niagara, where we arrived on the 21st of June.

June 22. Ther. 50°. General Scott.—I had the pleasure of being introduced to this gentleman, whom I have formerly mentioned. He has gained the admiration of the wise and good men of all parties for his successful exertions in restraining the fierce spirit of the American borderers, and preventing them from attacking the Canadian English. He and the British officers on the Canada shore have been, and still are, on the best terms of reciprocal intercourse. To the credit of both, it is generally acknowledged that they, the men of the sword, have been the real peace-makers in this district during the last eighteen months. They have used every exertion to restrain the infuriated masses on both sides. General Scott mentioned to me that his grandfather was a Scotsman, who fought on the side of the Pretender at the battle of Culloden, and subsequently fled to America. He might have returned after the amnesty, but preferred remaining in the colonies. We had the pleasure also of making the acquaintance of General Porter, who resides here, and is the proprietor of Goat Island, in the St. Lawrence, through which the best access has been made to the Falls.

The Western Country.—We met with two friends who had just returned by the lakes from the far west, whither they had gone on an exploratory trip for their own information. They had suffered severely from the ague, and saw almost every family affected with it, many having not yet recovered from the attacks of last autumn. They mentioned that the timber land is generally preferred to the prairies. They came to the conclusion that the "West" forms a desirable place of settlement for men of small capital, great bodily strength, and youth; but that no educated man with a competency can settle there, except by sacrificing for many years every advantage which these confer.

Niagara Falls.—We devoted four days to the enjoyment of this wonder of the world, and were not disappointed. The first impression, however, must differ in every individual, according to the natural endowments and habitual activity of his faculties. I confess the first view did not awaken those profound emotions of astonishment, sublimity, and awe in me which are generally described as its effects on visitors. I had read many descriptions and seen numerous pictures of the scene, and found its general features very much those which I had expected. It excited my intellectual faculties too entirely to allow me to experience vivid emotions. The most forcible idea suggested was that of the astonishing power of gravitation. The mass of waters rushed downwards with an indescribable momentum, and seemed to reveal to the senses the awful force of this mysterious influence. Above the falls the river runs over a bed of limestone; below them it has worn a deep channel in the rock, leaving high perpendicular walls on each side. The difference of level between the water on the upper and that on the lower beds of the rock is 158 feet 4 inches. The descending surface is perpendicular, and the whole waters of the St. Lawrence are precipitated over it in unbroken masses. The fall is fourteen miles from Lake Ontario, into which the waters flow; and it is obvious to the eye that they have excavated the deep channel all this distance,* and are still engaged in the work of excavation. By observing the progress which they have made in certain spaces of time, data have been obtained for calculating the period which must have elapsed since the work began, and that which may be still required before they shall deepen the whole course upwards to Lake Erie, about twenty miles. I became immersed in the contemplation of these ideas, and others of a similar description, all allied to reason, and it was only by degrees that the observing faculties and sentiments awakened and came into communion with the scene. They at last embraced it, dwelt on it, responded to it, thrilled with intense delight, and carried it off indelibly impressed upon the memory and imagination.

It would be in vain for me to attempt a description of the Falls; this has often been given by abler pens. I may mention, however, that after surveying them from the British side, the American side, and Goat Island in the middle of the stream, under the rays of the noontide sun of the 22d of June, and those of a bright full moon at night; after seeing the most perfect solar rainbows lying at our feet by day, and lunar rainbows (like the ghosts of those of the sun) by night; after listening to the legends of Indians losing command of their canoes, and being precipitated over its brow and engulfed in the whirlpool below; after frequent crossing and recrossing the foaming stream below the cataract in boats; and after descending by the Biddle staircase, and looking up to the world of water pouring down overhead; in short, after dwelling for days on its every feature,—I was far less impressed by its sublimity than by its beauty: it is full of grace and majesty, and emotions of pleasure were constantly predominant while I gazed on it. The Atlantic in the equinoctial gale of the 20th September, 1838, seen from the deck of the Great Western, far surpassed Niagara Falls in terrific grandeur. My companion accurately described them in the following words: "One sits and gazes one's self out of all thought, and into a delightful sort of reverie, which is interrupted only when some new effect of clouds or sunlight rouses one's attention. I can only say, that I never saw such greens nor such whites as are presented by the rushing waters—nor such graceful motions, nor such delicate veils, nor such rainbows, nor listened to such lulling sounds! And all in the midst of more beauty of accompaniment than Niagara usually receives credit for. The banks of the river are high, steep, rocky, and wooded: and the water is a cool and lovely green. Goat Island is a little Eden, and all the ways leading to the falls are judiciously laid out." The best guide to the falls is the admirable work of Mr. Ingraham of Boston. He is a man of taste and education, and passionately enamoured of the scene. We walked several miles down the river, and visited the "Rapids," but they merit no particular description. About two miles and a half below the village, the railroad approaches within a few yards of the brink of the precipitous bank of the stream, and at that spot, the falls themselves and surrounding scenery appear grouped together, and look like a living cabinet picture of the most exquisite gracefulness and beauty.

* Mr. Lyell treats of this subject in his Principles of Geology, vol. i. p. 261, 3d edit.

On crossing to the Canadian side, where there was a large and commodious hotel (since burned down), the first object that presented itself was a British sentinel of the 43d regiment keeping guard at the landing-place. He asked no questions, and I learned afterwards that he is posted there to prevent the British soldiers from deserting. There is no danger in crossing the river even in a small boat, for the basin which receives the cataract is so deep (supposed to be 800 feet) and so wide that the turbulence soon subsides.

Lundy's Lane.—This is the name of the village on the Canadian side of the falls, and the site of a severely contested battle between the British and Americans, fought on the 25th of July, 1814. About 870 men on each side were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners, and the Americans retired at night. No traces of the devastations now remain. I wished to obtain some information, and accosted a man sitting in a field. He was an Irishman, and said that he could not walk. I asked him why? His answer was in these words: "I was crazy, sir, and the people who had the charge of me put me into a cellar, and my feet were frozen, and afterwards cut off." "Where did this happen?" "In the town of Niagara, sir." This town is on the Canadian side, near the junction of the river with Lake Ontario. What a scene of suffering and cruel neglect was embodied in this brief narrative!

June 25. Ther. 62°. Journey to Buffalo.—We left Niagara Falls at half past 2 P. M., in a railroad car, and arrived at Buffalo at 4 P. M. The distance is 22 miles. Fifty years ago, it would have appeared as incredible that we should approach to and depart from the Falls of Niagara by railroads and locomotive engines, as that the stream should run upwards; and yet this feat is accomplished. It seems so natural, now when it is done, that only on reflection and by contrast does it excite surprise. This railroad runs nearly along the right bank of the Niagara river the whole way to Buffalo, and affords admirable views of the scenery. Several islands in the stream present themselves, the largest of which, Navy Island, has been the theatre of some recent contests between the government forces and the Canadian Patriots, as they call themselves, or Rebels, as they are named by the British. The people on both sides of the river were strongly excited during the late Canadian insurrection, and the subject still continues an interesting topic of conversation. The feeling of the two nations towards each other was discussed in very reasonable terms by the passengers in the railway car. One of the Americans said, "It is not true that the British hate us. I know that they show our people a great deal of kindness and hospitality when they go over to the other side. It is only the ignorant and bigoted Tories who hate us, and they do so merely because they hate republican institutions. They have no notion what we are. I wish we could catch a parcel of them and parade them through our states, as they did Black Hawk and other Indian chiefs.* It is the only way to open their eyes, and make them see that we are men." This speech called forth a loud laugh of approbation; and it appeared to me to contain a very sensible idea. The Tories in general are kind-hearted men; and a sight of the industry, the prosperity, the order, and attention to religion that essentially reign in this vast republic, notwithstanding its faults and imperfections, would expand their sympathies, and render them less afraid of human nature when left, unguided by kings and nobles, to fulfil its destinies. The same gentleman added, that he knew it to be a fact that the British officers of the line had done every thing possible to alleviate the sufferings of the prisoners taken in the late border troubles.

American Hotels.—The hotels in the western region of New York state are on a large scale and very good; but only one basin, one tumbler, and one basin-stand, are allowed for two persons. On representing civilly, however, our British habits, we were always indulged with duplicates. The meals are served with amazing despatch. We were generally first and last at table, yet only 15 minutes, by my watch, elapsed between our sitting down and rising up. Within that time 150 persons had crammed down a breakfast. "You Europeans," said an American, "eat as if you actually enjoyed your food!" "Assuredly we do—and you Americans will never escape from dyspepsia and headaches until you also learn to enjoy your meals."

* The United States' government from time to time invites the most formidable of the Indian chiefs to visit Washington. They are received with great ceremony, conducted to all the public institutions, and afterwards invited to the large Atlantic cities, where similar honours are paid to them. Care is taken to show them the navy yards and the ships of war, the arsenals and arms; and also reviews of the best appointed militia regiments. The object of the government is to send them home with a practical conviction of the colossal power of the United States contrasted with that of their warrior bands, and it is generally accomplished.

June 26. Therm. 65°. The village of Buffalo was burned to the ground by the English in 1814. It is now a town of 20,000 inhabitants, and carries on an extensive trade, as the eastern port on Lake Erie. Here the New York and Erie Canal has its terminus. The streets are wide, the houses substantial, and the stores numerous, of vast extent, and stocked with almost every useful and ornamental article produced by Europe and America. The newspapers reported the "Lake craft" in the following terms:—"There were in harbour this morning nineteen steamboats, two ships, one barque, seven brigs, and sixty-one schooners: in all ninety sail. Among these is not included the Julia Palmer, now being converted into a steamer. Of the steamboats, about one half are undergoing repairs or being repainted, preparatory to commencing the fall campaign—the others are taking their regular turn in the line. The sail craft are all, or nearly all, loading or unloading, and present a lively appearance." We counted seven large steamboats on the wharf, all announced as ready to sail, and containing excellent accommodation for passengers. They have public cabins and private state-rooms, and, from their large size, promise to be comfortable vessels. One of the three-masted ships was announced as belonging to the "Mill-waukie and Chicago Line," indicating that she is one of a number of regular traders. I have already mentioned that it has been found necessary to enlarge the Erie Canal. It will be made from sixty to seventy feet wide, and seven feet deep, and have double sets of locks. We may safely anticipate, from the vast extent of country with which it communicates by means of the lakes, and the astonishing rapidity with which the population increases, that at no great distance of time even these enlarged dimensions will be too small, and that full employment will be found for the railroads also, in the transportation of goods. Buffalo is probably destined to become a city of several hundred thousand inhabitants! To a spectator on the shore of Lake Erie, every thing resembles an ocean prospect. The eye is arrested by the line where the horizon meets the water; and a few hours' sail must carry the navigator far out of sight of land.

Phrenology.—There is a phrenological society here, and the subject is well understood, and extensively cultivated. I met a number of the medical members, and privately assisted at the dissection of a brain. I was told that the phrenologists are so numerous and influential, that they would experience little difficulty in getting phrenology introduced into the public schools as the philosophy of mind, if they had a work suitable for the purpose. They have only one zealous opponent, a Presbyterian clergyman, who preached against the science. They requested him to publish his discourse; but he declined to do so. In the evening an ordinary meeting of the society was held, this being one of their regular nights. Above fifty persons, ladies and gentlemen, were present, and Dr. Raymond gave an excellent demonstration of the structure of the brain. I delivered a short address, and was much gratified by the state of the science in this important place.

The Indians.—The Seneca village, settled by about 900 Indians, principally Senecas, with some Onondagas and Cayugas, lies from three to four miles southeast of Buffalo. They live on what is called an "Indian Reserve," extending to 49,000 acres of land. I delivered a letter of introduction to Honnondeuh, one of their chiefs, from whom I obtained some interesting information. We found him living in the same hotel with ourselves.

Honnondeuh appears to be about thirty years of age: he is well formed, with features decidedly Indian, and a complexion probably one fourth white. The form of his brain indicates a cross between the Indian and white. He was sent by his father, who is an Indian, to the common school at Buffalo, and afterwards to Hamilton College, where he completed a good education. At the school and college he assumed the appellation of Thomas Strong. He speaks English like an Anglo-American, and his dress and manners are those of an American gentleman. He studied law, and at present receives a salary for acting as interpreter and agent between his tribe and the United States government. A treaty is now proceeding for the removal of his people, and of all the other Indians in the state of New York about (4000 in number,) to a territory west of the Missouri, extending to 1,800,000 acres of prairie and woodland, purchased by the United States government from the Osage Indians.

This Indian reserve approaches to within one mile of the town of Buffalo, and we saw many of the tribe in the town. Some were clothed in rags, with a tattered greatcoat above all, and were reeling drunk in the streets; others were clothed like English carters, and some like respectable tradesmen. Most of the women wore trousers, coarse cotton short gowns, and a large blanket adjusted as a robe. The men wear hats or caps; the women were bare-headed, and often bare-footed, haggard and ugly.

Another of our party asked Honnondeuh what progress the missionaries were making among his tribe? "They begin at the wrong end," said he; "they inform us how to save our souls, but do not teach us how we may improve our condition. We believe that our souls will be taken care of by the Great Spirit; we want rights, justice, civilisation first, and then we shall be glad to hear what the missionaries can do for our souls." He added that the missionaries have kept a school among them, and one of the Gospels, (of which he presented C— with a copy) is printed in the Seneca language. Great difficulty was experienced in translating it, in consequence of the great poverty of that language. I pursued this topic, and learned from him that his tribe have no words to express many of the emotions and ideas formed by means of the moral sentiments and the reflecting faculties, especially when the emotion or idea is a complex one, expressive of the activity of a group of these faculties acting in combination. These emotions and ideas themselves are unknown to them, and the translation is accomplished only by means of paraphrases, some of them of a very awkward character, and which, after all that can be done, do not suggest to the Indian the same emotions or ideas which the English words call up in the Anglo-American mind. In short, the translation, to prove successful, would require in many instances not only to express the original sense, but to evoke feelings and conceptions never previously experienced by the Indian faculties.

He does not understand the language of tribes who live at a distance. There is no perceptible affinity between his speech and theirs. He repeated to us, first in his own language and afterwards in English the speech which he made to the Osage Indians, and their answer, conveyed through three interpreters. It consisted of a series of announcements of substantive facts; of distinct propositions; and of questions founded on these. The answer consisted of direct replies, accompanied by an assurance of amity. We asked him whether Mr. Henry Clay, or the best Indian orator, was the more eloquent. He replied that the ideas which they expressed, and the arguments which they used, were so utterly unlike, that no comparison could be made between them. "Our orators," said he, "could not find words to express, nor could our people conceive, the ideas which Mr. Clay utters. But within our own range I have heard some of our orators as eloquent as Mr. Clay." He said that they instructed some of their young men to speak as orators, or, as they called them, "interpreters."

Honnondeuh had a great deal of conversation with the ladies of our traveling party, gave them Indian names expressive of qualities, and became a great favourite with them. He acted and spoke with natural ease and dignity, and altogether conducted himself as an educated gentleman, and we treated him as such. He is not married; but he has a sister who is educated and married to an Indian.

One of our American friends, who is deeply learned in the history, and practically acquainted with the affairs of the United States, mentioned that he believed the account given to us by Honnondeuh to be substantially correct. He acknowledged that there is great injustice in the treatment of the Indians, but remarked that the evil originated with the English Government, and that the Indian affairs were in such a condition when the American Government succeeded to the English, that no other system could be followed. Besides, said he, the Indians joined the English in the war of the Revolution, and the United States conquered their territory. They conceived that they acted mildly towards them in pursuing the same course which the English had adopted previously to the contest.

Buffalo, as I have already remarked, is the scene of Mr. Rathbun's speculations. He planned the "American Hotel," in which we now reside, and it is as magnificent as a palace. It accommodates with ease 140 travellers.

June 27. Ther. 67°. Railroad to Lewistown. We left Buffalo at nine A. M. in a railroad car on our return to Niagara Falls. It thundered and rained plentifully, and the locomotive engine could not drag us forward. Its wheels continued revolving, but slipped on the wet rails, and we stood motionless. This railroad is twenty-three miles in length, and cost $110,000. It has ascents in some places exceeding seventy feet in the mile. In order to save the expenditure of capital in leveling, the Americans construct their railroads with much higher gradients than the English, and, in this instance, the gradient has been carried so high as to render the road inefficient in wet weather. The company was incorporated in 1834. After many stops we obtained horses, and at half past two o'clock reached Niagara Falls. We did not remain in the village, but entered a railroad train for Lewistown, situated on the right bank of the Niagara, near its junction with Lake Ontario. We arrived there at a quarter past four P. M., and immediately embarked on board of the "Great Britain" steamship for Kingston in Upper Canada. Opposite Lewistown is Queenstown in Canada, which the Americans burned in the war of 1814. On a height above this village a handsome column has been erected to the memory of the English general Brock, who fell there in the Battle of Queenstown. It forms an interesting feature in the landscape, which is naturally fine.*

June 28. Oswego.—The St. Lawrence.—The steamboat was large, and had excellent accommodations. We sailed all night, and at seven A. M. touched at the American town of Oswego, on the right bank of Lake Ontario. It lies at the mouth of the Oswego river, and we were told that here Mr. Van Buren, the present President of the United States, laid the foundation of his fortune by a speculation in lots. He purchased 600 acres of land at $6 or $7 an acre; afterwards sold part of it for $70,000; and keeps the remainder, which is regarded as very valuable. The opening of the Oswego Canal, which branches off from the Erie Canal, and the consequent rise of the town, has caused this great advance in value. He has also obtained several liberal grants from the United States Government to improve its harbour. It now appears to be a flourishing place.

At two P. M. we arrived at Kingston, Upper Canada. The St. Lawrence commences here. When we were at Niagara Falls, General Scott mentioned to us that a plot was suspected to be hatching by the disaffected Canadians and their American allies to burn the British steamboats on the St. Lawrence; that he had communicated all the information he possessed on the subject to the British officers, and had also instructed the American officers to observe the strictest watch to defeat the scheme. At Kingston we entered another steamboat, and soon saw that General Scott's information was acted on. We were boarded by a British sergeant and corporal, and a party of soldiers. The sergeant mustered them on the deck, gave the words "shoulder arms," "open pans," and then went along the line and examined every lock and flint, to see that it was fit for service. The arms were then piled on deck, and we commenced our voyage. The river is here ten miles broad, strewed with a thousand islands, varying from a foot square to many hundreds of acres in extent, all covered with bushes or timber. The evening was fine, and the scene was highly picturesque as we glided among them. Their grouping and forms presented a new picture every five minutes, and all graceful and rich. At sunset the sergeant again mustered his men, and placed three sentinels; one near the paddle box on the American side; one in the stern on the same side, and one in the bow of the boat. It was moonlight. We approached a large barge lying at anchor close to the shore. "What boat, a-hoy?" cried the soldier on the bow. No answer. We approached close to her. She was a lumber boat with nobody on board. We passed Ogdensburg on the American, and Prescott on the British side, and I saw the windmill, which a short time before had been the scene of an attack.

* Before we left the United States, a disgraceful attempt was made to destroy this monument. It is a hollow pillar containing a winding stair. Some miscreants had forced open the door at the bottom, placed several barrels of gunpowder inside, closed the door, and fired the whole by a slow match. The stair was blown out at the top, and the column itself seriously rent, but not thrown from its basis. I heard the Americans express the greatest indignation against the perpetrators of this barbarity! The strictest investigations were made to discover them, but without success. The general opinion seemed to be that it was the work of one individual.

We arrived at Montreal at 7 P. M. on the 29th of June, having traveled 422 miles (the distance from Lewistown,) chiefly by steamboats, but partly by stage-coaches, in fifty hours. We remained in Montreal till eight o'clock in the evening of the 2d of July, when we embarked in the St. George, a large and commodious steamboat, and arrived at Quebec next day at 2 P. M., the distance being 180 miles.

July 4. Ther. 68°. July 5. Ther. 64°. July 6. Ther. 64°. We remained at Quebec during these days, and visited the town, the citadel, General Wolfe's monument, the Falls of Montmorenci, the Indian village of Lorette, and other objects of interest. At 9 P. M. of 6th July we embarked again for Montreal on board of the "Canada" steamboat, and in twenty-four hours completed our voyage, although we ascended the stream, and had a schooner in tow the whole way.

I offer no remarks on Canada for two reasons: first, our visit to it was short, our motions were rapid, and my means of forming correct opinions therefore deficient; secondly, The subject deeply excites party feeling in Britain, and no observations which I could offer would be of use in removing the prejudices which attend political questions. My general impression is, that Lower Canada, compared with the United States, is like senility contrasted with manly vigour; and that this is the result, first, of the ignorance of the French population; and, secondly, of a provincial government. The constitution of the United States develops, in an extraordinary degree, the faculties of its individual citizens, and the energies of its social masses; while a provincial government, by depriving both individuals and masses of political power, and vesting the ultimate disposal of the great interests of the country in a foreign and distant legislature, paralyzes the minds of its subjects, and substitutes feelings of dependence and doubt for those of self-reliance and unhesitating confidence in distant results.

July 9. Ther. 74°. Lake Champlain, Burlington, &c.—At 9 A. M. we left Montreal, crossed the river in a steamboat to La Prairie, traveled seventeen miles on a railroad to St. John's, and at one o'clock embarked on board of a large American steamboat, named the "White Hall," ascended the River St. John and Lake Champlain, and arrived at Burlington in the United States at 7 P. M., after a delightful day's traveling.

On reaching the first port above St. John's, a piteous scene presented itself in a party of Irish emigrants. They were going to the head of the Lake, and the captain demanded their fare. They had no money, and the captain thrust them ashore at this place amidst cries, and tears, and prayers, and every moving appeal which Irish eloquence could command. Great commiseration was excited among the passengers, and we regretted that the expulsion was completed, and the boat pushed off, to prevent their rushing on board again, before we knew what the lamentations arose from. Our compassion, however, was abated, when we were assured by the men in charge of the steamship that the emigrants had money, but were unwilling to part with it, and that they have a regular plan for accomplishing their passage without paying a cent. They go on board and are carried to the first port, before their fare is demanded, and before it is possible to put them ashore for refusing to pay. They are there thrust out, but wait at that port, and go on board the next boat that touches at it on its passage up the lake; they are carried by it to another port, again refuse to pay, and are again put ashore. They wait there for a third boat, and repeat the same evolutions, protesting each time that they have no money. At last they accomplish the whole distance, and then laugh at the captain of the vessel which has brought them to their destination, and boast of their trickery.

July 10. Ther. 72°. 11. Ther. 64°. 12. Ther. 64°. 13. Ther. 64°. 14. Ther. 63°. In these days we visited Montpelier, Hanover, Littleton, and the White Mountains. Miss Martineau has so eloquently treated of the White Mountains, and other travellers have so frequently described the other features of our route, that I merely add that we were much gratified by the beauty of the country, the prosperity of the towns and villages, and the generally good accommodation which we found on the road.

In one of our walks in the valley which lies at the base of the White Mountains (which, by the way, are not white, except when covered with snow in winter,) a young man carrying a gun accosted us, "Do you fear the gun?" "No, if you do not point it at us." He fired at some object almost at his feet. It was a snake about two feet long. He blew its head off, and lifted up its body. He then joined us. "Have you been up Mount Washington?" (the highest peak,) said he. "No." "Perhaps you have been here before?" "No, I have not." "Perhaps you come from a pretty considerable distance." "Yes, I do." "In what direction?" "North-east." "Is it very far down east?" "Yes, a good way." He was preparing another question, when I added, "I have come across the ocean." "Oh, ay! you have come from England; that's a pretty considerable way, as I have heard my father say." "When did your father come to this country?" "Fifty years ago." He then asked me the rate at which agricultural labour was paid in England. I told him as correctly as I could the rate in Scotland. He continued, "Well, I hire by the month to do farm work with Mr. Fabian (the innkeeper,) but I get more money than that; but when I go to buy clothes and shoes, and other articles that I want, I guess that my money does not go so far as it would do in England, and that when we come to the point, how much we have in hand at the end of the year, the difference is pretty considerably less than one would at first suppose, and yet that is the main thing for a poor man to look to. I told him that he was right in supposing that most articles produced by labour were cheaper in England than in the United States. "But," said he, "they tell me that if a poor man become sick in England, nobody will attend to him." I explained to him that this was a mistake, and described the hospitals and dispensaries. I added that the greatest difference lay in this—that in England a man was sometimes idle and willing to labour, and could get no employment; but here there was work always. "Yes," said he, "that makes a great difference; men are scarce here."

I spoke to him of the pranks performed by a same bear at the inn. "On the White Mountains," said he, "I was leading my little brother, three years of age, by the hand, when I saw two young bear cubs run up a tree. I pursued them, and caught hold of one. It cried out, and its mother appeared. My little brother was now in anger. I took off my coat, and tied it by the leaves round the branch on which the young bear sat. I descended, got a thick stick, and commenced an attack on the mother. She retreated before me. I followed her for a mile, leading my brother all the way, and then left him at a cottage. I returned to the tree. My stratagem had taken effect. The young bear had been afraid of the coat, and had not attempted to escape. I climbed up the tree, seized it, and carried it off. The mother had now returned, and its cries brought her to its rescue; but I showed a bold face with my stick, and she did not attack me, but hung upon my footsteps. I proceeded to the cottage and got assistance. We used the young bear as a decoy, and captured the mother also." These are small, dark-coloured bears, and not very formidable.

I have introduced this conversation as a fair specimen of the intelligence, enterprise, and resources of the American labouring people. There was no rudeness or presumption in the manner in which this young man put his questions to me. The predominant motive was obviously the desire of information. He lived in an inquiring age, and acted in its spirit. At the same time he was quite at ease, as all the Americans are in their intercourse with strangers.

Mosquitoes.—After the summer heat fairly sets in, the pleasures of American scenery are greatly marred by the torment of mosquitoes. At the White Mountains, they are really a very formidable evil. Abroad, they assail one in thousands, and sting by every crevice through which the skin can be reached: in the house the nuisance is not abated; and even at night, the only alternatives are to close the doors and windows and shut out both them and the fresh air, or to be stung unmercifully. Around the inn, fires of green wood were lighted to scare them away by the smoke; but with little effect. While suffering under this affliction, we read the following story in the New York Sun, and sympathised very sincerely with the unfortunate hero of it.

"A correspondent writes us, concerning the mosquitoes of Michigan, that a man who lived near Grand River, being in the woods, was exceedingly annoyed by mosquitoes, and took shelter under an inverted potash kettle. His first emotions of joy for his happy deliverance and secure asylum were hardly over, when the mosquitoes, having scented him, began to drive their probosces through the kettle; fortunately he had a hammer in his pocket, and he clenched them down as fast as they came through, until at last such a host of them were fastened to the poor man's domicile, that they rose and flew away with it, leaving him shelterless!"

Portland in Maine.—We left the White Mountains on the 16th of July, and descended through the "Notch," a highly romantic pass made by a narrow cleft in the mountains. In many parts its features are grand and awful, rising almost to the sublime. After a few miles of rapid declivity, the valley opens, and the mountains diminish in height. The scenery, however, continues very beautiful. We reached Conway, 36 miles distant, at half past 7 P. M. We found a pleasant clean inn and attentive host. On the 17th we drove to Portland in Maine, 55 miles, through a gently undulating country, much of it still unsettled, and the crops so late that barley is only now coming into the ear, and oats are still less advanced. Very little wheat is sown. In the valley of the Connecticut we saw numerous maple trees, each with a little trough standing at its root, into which their sap is received for the purpose of making sugar; but we have seen few or none in Maine. Wild strawberries and wild raspberries every where abound, and occasionally dishes of them are presented at table in the inns. Portland is a beautiful town of 16,000 inhabitants, lying in a fine bay; it owns a great number of vessels, which are chartered out to merchants in most parts of the Union, and make voyages all over the globe. Its own commerce is not extensive; but so many of these vessels arrive for orders and repairs, that its harbour presents an array of ships, unexpected both in numbers and tonnage.

We drove to Cape Cottage, on Casco Bay, where we enjoyed sea breezes and beautiful scenery for eight of the hottest weeks of the season.

CHAPTER XVI.

July 18. Cape Cottage.—Ever since we left New York, we have been looking for some calm and cool retreat in which to spend the remainder of the summer. We happened to take up a Portland newspaper which contained an advertisement of the accommodations and agréments presented by Cape Cottage, situated in the neighbourhood of this town, and they seemed to be so exactly what we wanted, that we have come hither to inspect them. To our great joy, they even exceed the description, and are in every respect to our mind. We have, therefore, engaged apartments here for several weeks.

Rammohun Roy.—This individual presents an interesting object of study to the phrenologist. We possess an authentic cast of his head taken after his death in England; and it is distinguished from the heads of his countrymen (of whose skulls the Phrenological Society in Edinburgh has upwards of fifty specimens) in the following particulars. It is considerably larger; and the development of the moral and intellectual organs in particular is decidedly superior to that which is presented by any other Hindoo skull in the collection. Causality, and also Benevolence, Firmness, and Conscientiousness, are large and far above their average size in Hindoo heads.

I have unexpectedly met with a clear, condensed, and authentic account of his moral and intellectual qualities, which I now present to the reader.

Rammohun Roy having been assailed in "Travels in South-Eastern Asia, &c., by Howard Malcolm," has been defended by William Adam, formerly missionary in Bengal, in the Christian Examiner and General Review for July, 1839, published in Boston. Mr. Adam says that Rammohun Roy "promoted the establishment of the Hindoo College by the wealthy Hindoos of Calcutta, at the suggestion of European gentlemen, by remaining silent and inactive at a time when the prejudice against him ran very high among his countrymen, and when he was assured by his European friends that his interference and support would prove more hurtful than salutary, by alarming the jealousy and calling into activity the bigotry and intolerance of his opponents. He gave valuable suggestions to Lord Amherst, the governor-general, when the Government Sanscrit College was about to be established. He pointed out the comparative worthlessness of much of what is called Hindoo learning, and the value and importance of the pure and useful science of Europe to his countrymen. Subsequently, he built expensive school rooms, and established a school at his own cost, for the more useful branches of native learning, the English language, and its science and literature. The latter department only went into operation. He gave his cordial and zealous support to Mr. Duff in the establishment of the institution in Calcutta connected with the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland for the promotion of native education. He encouraged a wealthy friend and adherent to establish a large English school on his estate in one of the interior districts of Bengal, and to place it under the superintendence of the General Assembly's missionaries. To Lord William Bentinck, governor general of India, in the first place, and in the highest sense, must be ascribed the honour of abolishing the practice of Hindoo widows burning themselves on their husband's funeral piles; but next to him it belongs to Rammohun Roy. Previous to the act of abolition, from 300 to 400 widows were burned annually. Long before this period Rammohun Roy had endeavoured to awaken the attention of government and of the European community to the monstrous evil. He wrote pamphlets in English and Bengalee proving that it was not an essential doctrine of the Hindoo religion. He also exposed the modern abuses of the rite, the application of stupefying drugs and force to prevent them from escaping from the pile. With little aid from others, amid many discouragements, he pursued his course, and lived to see the prohibition enacted as a law.

"Born a Hindoo of the Hindoos, as Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, he had every inducement to acquiesce in the system of religion which, by divine right, gave him so distinguished and privileged a place; but in early life he freed himself from the shackles of idolatry, and opened his mind to the grand and elevating idea of the Universal Father, which he retained with firm conviction to his latest breath. Nor was this a barren conviction. His mind expanded in benevolence towards all his brethren of mankind, and his life was spent in their service. With an original capacity for metaphysical reasoning, refined and strengthened by cultivation in the school of Hindoo logic, he employed his profound and various learning to attack the complicated system of Hindoo idolatry, which, in Calcutta, we consider that he chiefly has contributed to shake to its foundations, although the time is probably yet far distant when it will wholly disappear from even a single city of India. In this controversy even Christian missionaries have been glad to avail themselves of the resources brought into use by his acute mind, and to borrow arrows from his quiver without acknowledgment. He laboured, as we have shown, in the cause of education. He laboured to protect the rights, and to save the lives of Hindoo widows. He took a deep interest in every political movement throughout the civilised world favourable to civil and political liberty. He laboured in conversation, and by writing, through the medium of the press, and by evidence given before parliamentary committees during his residence in England, to give a right direction to the measures then in progress for the future government of British India. In his whole career we see the good as well as the great man, the patriot and philanthropist as well as the philosopher; and the effect of such a career, and of such an example, is not to be measured in the narrow spirit of sectarianism, inspired by those who opposed and counteracted him in life, and who now, since the grave has closed over him, would depreciate and misrepresent his labours." P. 400.

The Mosquitoes.—I am now blind in one eye, and lame in both feet, from mosquito bites. We rise at five o'clock in the morning, and see the sun ascend in beautiful majesty from the Atlantic Ocean, which is spread beneath our windows. We breakfast at seven, dine at one, drink tea at six, and go to bed at nine o'clock. My time is spent in preparing the MS. of my lectures on Moral Philosophy for the press, in reading, and in maintaining correspondence with my friends in Europe and the United States. But for the mosquitoes, this place would be a paradise of beauty and delight.

July 29. Ther. 66°. Public Affairs.—The remarks made on 25th May, are already verified. The Great Western has arrived from England, and brings the following intelligence. The drain on the Bank of England for gold to pay for grain imported from the continent of Europe has proceeded steadily for several months, until at last, the bank, in order to contract its circulation and recall the specie, has raised the rate of interest on bills discounted to 5½ per cent. This has led to a contraction of discounts by the country banks in England. Commerce and manufactures are embarrassed, and the prices of commodities are rapidly falling. From this and other causes, the demand for cotton has greatly decreased, and the prices have given way. The fall in this article not only gives a severe blow to the American cotton speculators, but is seriously affecting the interests of the whole Union. The very large quantity of goods lately imported from Europe into the United States must be paid for by means of sales, in the French and English markets, of cotton, flour, or public securities. Flour has become depressed in consequence of the expectation at present entertained of a good crop in England; cotton also has decreased in value; and American securities have become unsaleable in consequence of the great scarcity of money in Britain, and the embarrassments which are anticipated to ensue from these combined causes. The rate of exchange is turning rapidly against the United States, which increases the amount of their debts to England; and a general crisis is expected.

The Firemen.—"The Pennsylvanian" of 22d June contains a letter from "A Father," pointing out, in forcible terms, the great evils occasioned to the morals and habits of young men by the "infatuation of fire engines." He says that all his apprentices who did not join fire companies did well in business; but that those who did join them, to the number of thirty-one, generally became unsteady and went to ruin.

The American Press.—The New York Evening Post, speaking of the personalities which not unfrequently disgrace the columns of the American press, remarks: "The Philadelphia newspaper press is certainly superior to ours in the general decency with which it is conducted, and we have no doubt that the general reputation of its conductors is proportionably higher in the community." In so far as my means of observation extend, I fully concur in the remarks of the Evening Post. The press of Philadelphia in its editorial articles, appeared to me to stand in a creditable position in regard equally to morals, knowledge, and literary attainments.

The Owner's Rights in a Pew.—I have already mentioned, that when an American church is built, the pews are generally sold by public auction, and that each purchaser becomes absolute proprietor of his pew. Several questions have been tried in the courts of law regarding the nature of the right acquired by the purchaser. It has been decided, that a pew is real estate, and is governed by the laws relating to that species of property. The control of it does not lie with the majority of the pew-holders. They can determine as to the management of the building, and impose assessments, in certain cases, for keeping it in repair; but they cannot prescribe to the owner the manner in which he shall use his pew. A proprietor in a church became dissatisfied with the minister, boarded over his pew, and threatened, if the minister did not resign, to keep pigs in it. He was rich and self-willed, and would have executed his threat. The minister resigned. The remedy would have been found in an action for abatement of nuisance, at the instance of the conterminous proprietors. Another pew-owner in the most fashionable part of a church was offended with his neighbour, and let his pew to a family of negroes, on condition that they should possess it. They did so, and the other proprietors, finding there was no remedy for this in law, bought up his right at a very high price. The Boston Times reports the following case, which has recently occurred:—"On the 4th of July last, Mr. James Jackson of Middleborough, nailed up his pew in church at that place, and covered it over with boards, painted over with red ochre, in order, as he said, to prevent its being used for the dissemination of locofocoism, by Mr. Hallet, then editor of the Boston Advocate. Some of the town's people broke into the pew and used it, in consequence of which the owner sued the trespassers, and recovered nominal damages of one cent, he having expressly stated, that he desired nothing more than a verdict to establish his right of property." A general law should be enacted to restrain the right of property in pews within the limits of decency and common sense.*

A School for Good Little Boys.—The following advertisement struck me as curious, from the contrast which it presents to the treatment of children in Scotland forty years ago. When I entered the High School of Edinburgh, the worthy preceptor, Mr. Luke Fraser, could scarcely be said to teach. He prescribed to us lessons to be learned, and if we did not repeat them, he flogged us heartily. Such an essential element did the flogging constitute in our education, that when the pupils of the high school of those days meet, they still ask each other, under what teacher did you "suffer?" It is refreshing to see so vast an improvement in the treatment of youth as this advertisement bespeaks:—

Juvenile Boarding School.—For small boys, at the six-milestone, Bloomingdale (Ninth street), New York. It is located on Dr. V. Mott's beautiful mansion-grounds, with extensive privileges. There is a bathing-room in the house; or the boys can bathe in the river, and be taught to swim by a competent person. The premises furnish an abundance of the finest fruits, cherries, currants, raspberries, strawberries, gooseberries, apples, pears, &c. In addition, the boys are furnished with a fine stock of rabbits, Guinea pigs, pigeons, turtles, hens, &c. The best instruction is provided, and the maternal superintendence is not surpassed. The house having been found too small, a handsome addition and many improvements have just been made, in order to accommodate a few more boys."

* We cannot pretend to say that the odd fashion of using one's pew, as described in the text, is a Yankee notion; but it may with truth be said, that such an exhibition of a man's right of property has rarely if ever been witnessed in more southern parts.

The Massachusetts Fifteen Gallon Law.—A regular legal opposition to this law is proceeding in the courts at Boston. The rum-dealers continue openly to retail rum in small quantities in defiance of the statute; they are prosecuted by the attorney-general before the municipal court, and fined; they refuse to pay, and are committed to prison amidst large assemblages of people, and breaches of the peace are dreaded. After the condemnation of George C. Jacobs to pay a fine of $10 and costs, he was allowed to go at large on a bond for his reappearance on a future day, and the mob moved towards the store of a gentleman who had, on a previous occasion, acted as complainant and witness against a rum-seller, with the obvious design of destroying his property.

"But the mayor, the marshal, and the sheriff were on the spot, and exerted themselves to preserve order. Many active police officers mingled among the crowd, and when a person was particularly disorderly, he was seized and conveyed to the watchhouse. A number of disorderly persons were thus taken away, which had the effect of preventing the ebullition of passion which many anticipated. There was, however, a good deal of noise, cheers, and hurrahs, and it was obvious that nothing but the presence of a strong civil force, and the knowledge that the military would appear immediately if called upon, prevented scenes of riot."—Mercantile Journal.

Temperance.—The late report of the New York City Temperance Society states that the number of licensed liquor shops in that city in 1828 was 3162; in 1838, with a much increased population, 2507.

There were in the State of New York alone, in 1825, 1129 distilleries; the number is now reduced to about 200. In 1837, there were in operation in the city of New York and vicinity 17 large grain distilleries; now there are but nine. In 1837, 32,680,000, $\frac{27}{100}$ gallons of first proof domestic spirits were inspected in this city; in 1838, 18,049,000 $\frac{18}{100}$ gallons, being 14,633,000 gallons less than in the preceeding year, or a falling off of more than 33 per cent., and greater than double the decrease of any previous year.

In the importations of distilled liquor into the port of New York the last year, there was also a decrease of 25 per cent. And it is worthy of notice, that, according to the latest returns of the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1837, there was a decrease of 1,285,084 gallons of wine, as compared with the importations of 1836.—June 1839.

Education.—The American newspapers report that the house of commons lately passed, by a majority of two, a grant of 30,000*l.* for the purposes of education, but that the lords threw out the measure; and that the bishops and peers waited on the queen, and presented an address remonstrating against the appropriation of some other moneys granted for educational purposes, because it was to be bestowed by the privy council for the benefit of all sects. It is further mentioned that, in the month of June last, Lord John Russell, in his place in the house of commons, announced "that government had abandoned the plan of national education which it had intended to introduce (normal schools). So much clamour had been raised against it, and such great and persevering efforts had been made to excite an adverse feeling to it throughout the country, that it would be unadvisable to proceed farther with it." In the course of my travels in the United States, and also in letters, I have frequently been asked what this means. To the Americans it appears altogether incomprehensible. I cannot at present explain it.

Aug. 5. Ther. 61°. De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America."—Before leaving Scotland I had perused this work with much interest and instruction, and I have now completed a second reading of the American edition, with notes by John C. Spencer, Esq., Secretary of State for New York, appended to it in correction and elucidation of the text. After having lived nearly a year under the institutions of which it treats, I perceive its merits still more clearly than before. I have heard lawyers, politicians, philosophers, and intelligent men of every class, commend this work as the most correct and profound that has been written by any foreigner on the United States, and in this opinion I fully concur. M. De Tocqueville's powers of observation are admirable; his accuracy is astonishing (for Mr. Spencer's notes do not convict him of any fundamental errors affecting the general value of the work); his talent for analysis is great; while his depth and comprehensiveness place him in the first class of philosophical thinkers. Add to these great qualities an inflexible honesty that turns neither to the right hand nor to the left, and that never slumbers, but presides equally over his statements of fact, his estimates of manners, and his logical deductions. He certainly has no equal among the authors who have written on the United States. Those who desire to understand the theory and practice of the American institutions, and even the existing manners, need go to no other source. The only point in which I perceive a deficiency is a want of a philosophy of mind that might have enabled him to penetrate more clearly into the future. In the United States a vast moral experiment is in progress. He perceives its magnitude and importance, and the embarrassments with which it is beset; but he does not equally well appreciate the relation in which the phenomena stand to the human faculties, or divine their ultimate effect on American civilisation. The reader rises from the perusal of his work embarrassed by fears and doubts. It appears to me that phrenology enables us to dispel much darkness from the horizon, and to view the future progress of the United States in a more favourable light than that in which it is regarded in his pages.

He censures American manners and institutions with nearly as much severity as many English writers whose works have been heartily abused by the American press, yet his book is spoken of with uniform respect. Two reasons may be assigned for this difference of treatment. First, His candour disarms resentment. Every honest mind perceives that he is actuated by the love of truth alone, and that, if facts be disagreeable, he is not answerable for their effects. Secondly, His work is philosophical, and is not generally read by the American people. It is not necessary, therefore, for the press to abuse it in order to gratify the public taste.

Captain Marryat's "Diary" has just appeared, and the American newspapers are busy abusing him: Mrs. Trollope, Captain Hamilton, Captain Basil Hall, Mrs. Butler, and Miss Martineau, all come in for a fresh vituperation. The Portland Advertiser however, praises De Tocqueville, and blames the Americans for not reading his work. It strikes me that many of the provincial American newspapers abuse Captain Marryat without having even seen his work. The New York newspapers quoted it on its first appearance in that city, and poured forth torrents of invective against it. As soon as these papers reached the distant states, the press of every hamlet produced an original criticism of the work, condemning it without measure and without mercy. From what I have learned regarding the slow circulation of books into distant parts, I am led strongly to suspect that in many instances these discourses were founded solely on the New York texts and materials; and that the principle is boldly acted on that it is a safe rule to condemn every work which speaks disparagingly of the United States, without enquiring very minutely into either its merits or details.

Libraries in Steamboats.—Almost every English and Scottish, and probably Irish steamboat, has a library for the use of the passengers, free. I have never seen a library at all in an American steamboat except in the "Whitehall" on Lake Champlain, and the terms of reading were a deposit of two dollars, and payment of twelve and a half cents for the use of each volume. I saw nobody using the library on these terms.

Aug. 13. Ther. 61°. Maine Loan.—I formerly mentioned that the legislature of Maine had voted $800,000 to defend the disputed territory against England, and that the treasurer of the state had applied in New York for the money without success. He is now advertising for loans on state bonds for $1000 (200*l.* sterling,) bearing interest at six per cent., and redeemable in four, six, or eight years, in the option of the lender. He mentions several banks where his bonds may be obtained. There seems no great risk of Maine raising a large army when her finances are so circumscribed. It is probably a fortunate circumstance for this young, but prosperous and rising state, that the commercial difficulties of the present crisis have prevented her from engulfing herself in debt. Her efforts never could have settled the boundary question, and she is wise to entrust her interests to the government of the United States.

Long Island Pauper Schools.—I have already adverted to the defective accommodation provided for the pauper children in the Long Island schools. It is gratifying to perceive the promptitude with which evils are remedied in the United States. I perceive that on 17th August, the grand jury for the city of New York, among other matters demanding improvement, called attention to these schools.

"The 'nurseries' at the Long Island farm contain 516 boys, 172 girls, 12 men, and 76 women—total, 776. The buildings at the farm are deemed, by the grand inquest, both insufficient and unsuitable to accommodate the large number of children collected there.

"They would recommend that suitable fire-proof buildings be erected on Randall's Island (belonging to the corporation) when practicable, and that this establishment be removed there.

"They regret that cases of ophthalmia still exist among the children, and would recommend that an entire separation, in a distinct building, and at a proper distance, should take place of the persons afflicted with this disease, and prompt measures be taken to eradicate it if possible. They believe that motives of humanity toward the children and those connected with the establishment as physicians and nurses, as well as economy, call for this arrangement."

August 15. 'Ther. 55°. Puseyism in New York.—The New York Review is the organ of the Episcopalians of that city, and it follows closely in the footsteps of the church of England. The 19th number contains a long and elaborate defence of the Oxford "Tracts for the Times," "On Baptism," "The Holy Communion," "Who has authority to administer the Sacraments?" "The kind of prayers that may be offered for the dead," and "The authority of tradition as a guide in religious faith and practice." The reviewer defends the tracts in all points except with regard to prayers for the dead. The perusal of this disquisition is like reading a collection of treatises of the middle ages, written by the schoolmen. The views which it defends are sadly out of place in the United States. The Review itself is fruitlessly labouring to introduce into America the sentiments and ideas which the progress of knowledge is expelling from Great Britain.

In an article in the same number on 'Thomas Carlyle's History of the French Revolution (which it commends), the reviewer observes, that "we see among all (Americans) of every political creed, and every religious faith, a disposition to bring the universe of thought, sentiment, and feeling to the touchstone of the understanding. We are sadly afraid of mysteries." * * "The higher powers shrink and wither in the shallow soil of man's wisdom and the philosophy of the understanding." "The land in which the mass rules is not the free land; that is the home of freedom where the truth rules."† * * *

"The French revolution wrote upon our earth in letters of blood and fire, that as it is with the individual, so is it with the nation; that to trust in the wisdom of man, to rely upon the understanding of man, to leave the mysterious and cling to the intelligible only, to give up faith and confide in sight only, to substitute the love of happiness for the sense of duty, and the equality of the whole for the Christian brotherhood of the whole,—is to take the sure way to crime and disappointment, and slavery and self-reproach." p. 135.

The French revolution taught a lesson the very opposite of that which is here ascribed to it. For centuries before that event, the Roman Catholic clergy had fed the minds of the common people of France with "mysteries," and taught them to give up the "wisdom of man," and to cling to the unintelligible. The people under their guidance had carefully shunned "the philosophy of the understanding," and yielded in all things to their priests. It is true that before the revolution, the philosophers of France had thrown off this yoke; but the people at large had not done so. That event found them still in the profound ignorance into which they had been allowed by the clergy to fall; and what were the consequences? It was not the emancipated philosophers who perpetrated the horrors of that tragedy; but the common people; the rude, ignorant, uninstructed mass; the men who, with their ancestors, had for centuries been left to the sole guidance of the priests, and who by them, for their own ease and aggrandisement, had been kept in grovelling ignorance and disgraceful superstition.

The reviewer observes, "We (the American people) are not safe from those causes which we suppose to have given its dreadful character to the French Revolution." "This cause was the want of reverence. In feudal times, reverence was universal, except, perhaps, among a few of the best informed. As the world has grown older, the veneration for things formerly venerated has disappeared, because too often acquaintance has proved them to be undeserving; and, while the old objects have ceased to be venerated, new objects deserving reverence, have not been brought before us." These are sensible remarks, but who would have expected to see a writer who could state them so clearly, proposing Puseyism as a new object deserving to be venerated! "In addition to this," he continues, "the success which attended analysis and logic, as applied to matter, and many old prejudices and habits, has given us an undue faith in these processes; and men, incline to trust and rely upon no truths save those reached through logic and analysis." This remark is not equally sound with that which preceded it. Correctly stated, the proposition should stand thus: Men decline to receive any doctrine as truth which directly contradicts logic and analysis; and hence they reject Puseyism and its consequences. The reviewer proceeds: "In the United States, all favours the growth of confidence in the intelligible only; of reliance upon the tangible, the useful, the comprehensible. Efforts have been made from time to time to introduce among us more faith and reverence, and if we are not mistaken, there is reason to think there is a philosophy now in progress that will help to sustain these efforts; but as yet the favourers of reverence are few and scattered, separated by religious, or political, or social differences,—and the want of respect and veneration presents daily greater and greater dangers. Children do not reverence their parents, chiefly because these parents reverence nothing themselves. How can a father hope to be respected, who never expresses, by word or act, respect for his fellow-men or his Maker? Independence is, in our land, mistaken for freedom." p. 133. He accuses Jefferson of having been tainted with French principles, and concludes thus: "We do think our country, then, in danger of becoming irreverent, religious, and sensual, rather than spiritual."

The facts here stated, in regard to the present condition of the American mind, are to a considerable extent true; but the remedy proposed of introducing Puseyism and the "mysterious" is preposterous. By tracing the cause of the evil we may arrive at a more rational perception of a remedy. The following views are offered with all deference to the reviewer's opinions.

At the time of the American revolution the Federal leaders were men of great talent, honour, and integrity; but they had been educated in the monarchical principles of England. The people, even after they became republicans, continued to feel that respect for wealth and rank which their English training had impressed upon their minds, and they allowed the federalists to rule. The federalists, following the example of the aristocracy and the clergy in England, did nothing to raise the character and intelligence of the people. In the progress of time this generation died out, and a new generation appeared. They discovered their own power, and made efforts to wield it, and finally triumphed in the election of Jefferson to the presidential chair. While these events were taking place, neither the new leaders of the people, nor the defeated federalists, made any adequate efforts to raise the standard of public intelligence. They neither educated intellectually nor trained morally the people; but left them to their own efforts, and to those of the clergy. After the peace of 1815, the federal party was entirely ruined. They descended from their high pretensions, yielded up much of their heaven of aristocracy, and amalgamated with the best of the republicans, and then took the name of whigs; but still they did nothing effectually to educate the people.

After a few years, the wilder democrats, who had been extinguished by this coalition, had the sagacity to discover that the people might be flattered and seduced away from the whigs, and they came forth with democratical doctrines far below the amalgamated whig creed, as this creed had been below the federal. They triumphed in the election of General Jackson, and still continue to hold power. The very foundation of their victory was the want of reverence in the people for old names, old doctrines, and old measures; but will Puseyism bring them back to venerate these? Assuredly not. The error committed has been in following, for too long a period, the pernicious example of the church and aristocracy of England,—that of neglecting to prepare the minds of the people by education, for wielding with success the vast power which the American institutions have committed to their hands.

It is true that the education of the people is now attracting serious attention; but it is only recently that this has been the case. The active generation at present on the stage is greatly under-educated in reference to their political powers and their duties, and fifty years from the present time must elapse before the real effects of the American institutions can be fairly judged of by their influence on an instructed generation. Even at this day, notwithstanding all past experience, the conviction is not general among the whig party, that their only chance of retaining power (for they may gain it by accident for a time) lies in raising the mental condition of the people up to that degree of intelligence which will enable them to understand the moral and political principles on which the welfare of nations is founded, and in training them to act in accordance with these. It is true that even the purely selfish among the rich have discovered that they are in the hands of the masses, whose ignorance and excitability alarm them. They are, therefore, at last seriously desirous to educate them for self-preservation, if from no higher motive; just as they would desire to pare the claws of a wild beast that had unfortunately got into the drawing-room, and could not be expelled;—but do not many of them still linger over the condition of European society with regret, and lament in their hearts that the people are their masters, and that they cannot do without them?

So far from the attempt being successful to bring back the people to reverence the mere wealth of the rich, or to invest the clergy with a mysterious sanctity, it will now only excite ridicule. The rich and the clergy must bring their genuinely honest man! Peace to him. Did he not, in spite of all, accomplish much for us? We walk smoothly over his great heroic life; step over his body sunk in the ditch there. We need not spurn it, as we step on it!—Let the Hero rest. It was not to men's judgment that he appealed; nor have men judged him very well.

Precisely a century and a year after this of Puritanism had got itself hushed up into decent composure, and its results made smooth, in 1688, there broke out a far deeper explosion, much more difficult to hush up, known to all mortals, and like to be long known, by the name of French Revolution. It is properly the third and final act of Protestantism; the explosive confused return of mankind to Reality and Fact, now that they were perishing of Semblance and Sham. We call our English Puritanism the second act: "Well, then, the Bible is true; let us go by the Bible!" "In Church," said Luther; "In Church and State," said Cromwell, "let us go by what actually is God's Truth." Men have to return to reality; they cannot live on semblance. The French Revolution, or third act, we may well call the final one; for lower than that, savage Sanctulotism men cannot go. They stand there on the nakedest haggard Fact, undeniable in all seasons and circumstances; and may and must begin again confidently to build up from that. The French explosion, like the English one, got its King,—who had no Notary parchment to show for himself. We have still to glance for a moment at Napoleon, our second modern King.

Napoleon does by no means seem to me so great a man as Cromwell. His enormous victories which reached over all Europe, while Cromwell abode mainly in our little England, are but as the high stilts on which the man is seen standing; the stature of the man is not altered thereby. I find in him no such sincerity as in Cromwell; only a far inferior sort. No silent walking, through long years, with the Awful, Unnameable of this Universe; "walking with God," as he called it; and faith and strength in that alone: latent thought and valour, content to lie latent, then burst out as in a blaze of Heaven's lightning! Napoleon lived in an age when God was no longer believed; the meaning of all Silence, Latency, was thought to be Nonentity: he had to begin not out of the Puritan Bible, but out of poor Sceptical Encyclopedies. This was the length the man carried it. Meritorious to get so far. His compact, prompt, every-way articulate character is in itself perhaps small, compared with our great chaotic inarticulate Cromwell's. Instead of "dumb Prophet struggling to speak," we have a portentous mixture of the Quack withal! Hume's notion of the Fanatic-Hypocrite, with such truth as it has, will apply much better to Napoleon, than it did to Cromwell, to Mahomet or the like,—where, indeed, taken strictly, it has hardly any truth at all. An element of blameable ambition shows itself, from the first, in this man; gets the victory over him at last, and involves him and his work in ruin.

"False as a bulletin" became a proverb in Napoleon's time. He makes what excuse he could for it: that it was necessary to mislead the enemy, to keep up his own men's courage, and so forth. On the whole, these are no excuses. A man in no case has any liberty to tell lies. It had been in the long-run better for Napoleon, too, if he had not told any. In fact, if a man have any purpose reaching beyond the hour and day, meant to be found extant next day, what good can it ever be to promulgate lies? The lies are found out; ruinous penalty is exacted for them. No man will believe the liar next time even when he speaks truth, when it is of the last importance that he be believed. The old cry of wolf!—A Lie is no-thing; you cannot of nothing make something; you make nothing at last, and lose your labour in the bargain.

Yet Napoleon had a sincerity: we are to distinguish between what is superficial and what is fundamental in insincerity. Across these outer manœuvres and quackeries of his which were many and most blameable, let us discern withal that the man had a certain instinctive ineradicable feeling for reality; and did base himself upon fact, so long as he had any basis. He has an instinct of Nature better than his culture was. His savans, Bourrienne tells us, in that voyage to Egypt, were one evening busily occupied arguing that there could be no God. They had proved it, to their satisfaction, by all manner of logic. Napoleon looking up into the stars, answers, "Very ingenious, Messieurs: but who made all that?" The Atheistic logic runs off from him like water; the great Fact stares him in the face: "Who made all that?" So, too, in Practice: he, as every man that can be great, or have victory in this world, sees, through all entanglements, the practical heart of the matter; drives straight towards that. When the steward of his Tuilleries Palace was exhibiting the new upholstery, with praises and demonstration how glorious it was, and how cheap withal, Napoleon, making little answer, asked for a pair of scissors, clipped one of the gold tassels from a window-curtain, put it in his pocket, and walked on. Some days afterwards, he produced it at the right moment, to the horror of his upholstery functionary: it was not gold but tinsel! In Saint Helena, it is notable how he still, to his last days, insists on the practical, the real. "Why talk and complain; above all, why quarrel with one another? There is no resultat in it; it comes to nothing that one can do. Say nothing, if one can do nothing!" He speaks often so, to his poor discontented followers; he is like a piece of silent strength in the middle of their morbid querulousness there.

And accordingly was there not what we can call a faith in him, genuine so far as it went? That this new enormous Democracy, asserting itself here in the French Revolution, is an insuppressible Fact, which the whole world, with its old forces and institutions, cannot put down: this was a true insight of his, and took his conscience and enthusiasm along with it,—a faith. And did he not interpret the dim purport of it well? "La carrière ouverte aux talens, The implements to him who can handle them;" this actually is the truth, and even the whole truth; it includes whatever the French Revolution, or any Revolution, could mean. Napoleon, in his first period, was a true Democrat. And yet by the nature of him, fostered, too, by his military trade, he knew that Democracy, if it were a true thing at all, could not be an anarchy: the man had a heart-hatred for anarchy. On that twentieth of June (1792), Bourrienne and he sat in a coffee-house, as the mob rolled by: Napoleon expresses the deepest contempt for persons in authority that they do not restrain this rabble. On the 10th of August, he wonders why there is no man to command these poor Swiss; they would conquer if there were. Such a faith in Democracy, yet hatred of anarchy, it is that carries Napoleon through all his great work. Through his brilliant Italian Campaigns, onwards to the Peace of Leoben, one would say his inspiration is: "Triumph to the French Revolution; assertion of it against these Austrian Simulacra that pretend to call it a Simulacrum!" Withal, however, he feels, and has a right to feel, how necessary a strong Authority is; how the Revolution cannot prosper or last without such. To bridle in that great devouring, self-devouring French Revolution; to tame it, so that its intrinsic purpose can be made good, that it may become organic, and be able to live among other organisms and formed things, not as a wasting destruction alone: is not this still what he partly aimed at, as the true purport of his life; nay, what he actually managed to do? Through Wagrams, Austerlitzes; triumph after triumph,—he triumphed so far. There was an eye to see in this man, a soul to dare and do. He rose naturally to be the King. All men saw that he was such. The common soldiers used to say on the march: "These babbling Avocats, up at Paris; all talk and no work! What wonder it runs all wrong! We shall have to go and put our Petit Caporal there!" They went, and put him there; they and France at large. Chief-consulship, Emperorship, victory over Europe; till the poor Lieutenant of La Pèrre, not unnaturally, might seem to himself the greatest of all men that had been in the world for some ages.

But at this point, I think, the fatal charlatan-element got the upper hand. He apostatised from his old faith in Facts, took to believing in Semblances; strove to connect himself with Austrian Dynasties, Popedom, with the old false Feudalities which he once saw clearly to be false; considered that he would found "his Dynasty," and so forth; that the enormous French Revolution meant only that! The man was "given up to strong delusion that he should believe a lie;" a fearful but most sure thing. He did not know true from false now when he looked at them,—the fearfullest penalty a man pays for yielding to untruth of heart. Self and false ambition had now become his god: self-deception once yielded to, all other deceptions follow naturally more and more. What a paltry patch-work of theatrical paper-mantles, tinsel, and mummery, had this man wrapt his own reality in, thinking to make it more real thereby! His hollow Pope's-Concordat, pretending to be a re-establishment of Catholicism, felt by himself to be the method of extirpating it, "la vaccine de la religion;" his ceremonial Coronations, consecrations by the old Italian Chimera in Notre-Dame there,— "wanting nothing to complete the pomp of it," as Augereau said, "nothing but the half-million men who had died to put an end to all that!" Cromwell's Inauguration was by the Sword and Bible; what we must call a genuinely true one. Sword and Bible was borne before him, without any chimera: were not these the real emblems of Puritanism: its true decoration and insignia? It had used them both in a very real manner, and pretended to stand by them now! But this poor Napoleon mistook: he believed too much in the Dupeability of men; saw no fact deeper in man than Hunger and this! He was mistaken. Like a man that should build upon cloud: his house and he fall down in confused wreck, and depart out of the world.

Alas! in all of us this charlatan-element exists; and might be developed, were the temptation strong enough. "Lead us not into temptation!" But it is fatal, I say, that it be developed. The thing into which it enters as a cognisable ingredient is doomed to be altogether transitory; and however huge it may look, is in itself small. Napoleon's working, accordingly, what was it with all the noise it made? A flash as of gunpowder wide-spread; a blazing up as of dry heath. For an hour, the whole Universe seems wrapt in smoke and flame; but only for an hour. It goes out: the Universe with its old mountains and streams, its stars above and kind soil beneath, is still there.

The Duke of Weimar told his friends always, To be of courage; this Napoleonism was unjust, a falsehood, and could not last. It is true doctrine. The heavier this Napoleon trampled on the world, holding it tyrannously down, the fiercer would the world's recoil against him be, one day. Injustice pays itself with frightful compound-interest. I am not sure but he had better have lost his best park of artillery, or had his best regiment drowned in the sea, than shot that poor German Bookeeller, Palm! It was a palpable, tyrannous, murderous injustice, which no man, let him paint an inch thick, could make out to be other. It burnt deep into the hearts of men, it and the like of it; suppressed fire flashed in the eyes of men, as they thought of it,—waiting their day! Which day came: Germany rose round him. What Napoleon did, will in the long-run amount to what he did justly; what Nature with her laws will sanction. To what of reality was in him; to that and nothing more. The rest was all smoke and waste. La carrière ouverte aux talens: that great true Message which has yet to articulate and fulfil itself every where, he left in a most inarticulate state. He was a great ébauche, rude-draught; as, indeed, what great man is not! Left in too rude a state, alas!

His notions of the world, as he expresses them there at St. Helena, are almost tragical to consider. He seems to feel the most unaffected surprise that it has all gone so; that he is flung out on the rock here, and the World is still moving on its axis. France is great, and all-great; and at bottom, he is France. England itself, he says, is by Nature only an appendage of France; "another Isle of Oleron to France." So it was by Nature, by Napoleon-Nature; and yet look how in fact—HERE AM I! He cannot understand it: inconceivable that the reality has not corresponded to his programme of it; that France was not all great, that he was not France. "Strong delusion," that he should believe the thing to be which is not! The compact, clear-seeing, decisive Italian nature of him, strong, genuine, which he once had, has enveloped itself, half dissolved itself, in a turbid atmosphere of French Fanfaronade. The world was not disposed to be trodden down underfoot; to be bound into masses, and built together, as he liked, for a pedestal to France and him: the world had quite other purposes in view! Napoleon's astonishment is extreme. But, alas! what help now? He had gone that way of his; and Nature also had gone her way. Having once parted with Reality, he tumbles helpless in Vacuity; no rescue for him. He had to sink there, mournfully as man seldom did; and break his great heart, and die—this poor Napoleon: a great implement too soon wasted, till it was useless: our last Great Man!

Our last, in a double sense. For here, finally, these wild roamings of ours, through so many times and places, in search and study of Heroes, are to terminate. I am sorry for it: there was pleasure for me in this business, if also much pain. It is a great subject, and a most grave and wide one, this which, not to be too grave about it, I have named Acroworship. It enters deeply, as I think, into the secret of Mankind's ways and vilest interests in this world, and is well worth explaining at present. With six months, instead of six days, we might have done better. I promised to break ground on it; I know not whether I have even managed to do that. I have had to tear it up in the rudest manner in order to get into it at all. Often enough, with these abrupt utterances thrown out isolated, unexplained, has your tolerance been put to the trial. Tolerance, patient candour, all-hoping favour and kindness, which I will not speak of at present. The accomplished and distinguished, the beautiful, the wise, something of what is best in England, have listened patiently to my rude words. With many feelings, I heartily thank you all; and say, Good be with you all!

GREEK FETE.

I was called at half past six o'clock in the morning to go and see a Greek fete outside the town. On arriving at the bridge, called the Caravan bridge, over the ancient Meles, close to the Turkish burying ground, and in the midst of beautiful gardens, we found a motley collection of Franks, Turks, Armenians, and Jews. There were Armenian women in their white mantles, drawn partly over the face; and manoeuvred by two or three, who had some pretensions to beauty, with all the art of experienced coquettes. Greek girls in their scarlet caps and blue tassels, and Frank women, a mixed race of all nations, in the latest imported Parisian mode. There was the Armenian in his loose robe and extraordinary head-dress, called the calpack, like an immense pincushion; the Turk in his flowing turban and pelisse lined with sable; the Greek in his scarlet cap, and the mixed Frank population, cutting a poor figure in their long frock coats and black beaver hats. In a fine, fresh, green looking garden, filled with lettuces and cucumbers, and in walks bordered by the orange, the pomegranate, the fig-tree, were numerous parties, eating their breakfasts of bread, meat, and little fish, pickled in barrels; at the bottom of the garden was an old woman with a knife, cutting off orange blossoms and distributing them among a crowd of girls. Seating ourselves under a tree, we called for a pipe and coffee. There were no Turkish ladies to be seen; they are not allowed to mix in such entertainments; and although the Turks seem well enough pleased to contemplate the unveiled charms of the Greek and Frank women, yet they would on no account afford their own the same privilege of being looked at and admired. Many of the women are placed under the superintending care of an old hag, who is responsible for their actions, and under whose guidance they walk in gardens and environs of the town. Then it is that some young Frank, who chances to pass the troop, when the old woman is at their head in front, may perhaps be gratified by seeing the veil for an instant removed, and a pretty laughing face exposed to view, and a pair of eyes which tell tales.

LINES.

BY LADY JERVIS.

I am never alone—at early dawn,
When the lark pours her joyous notes on high,
When the diamond dew-drop gems the lawn,
And the daisy opens her tearful eye—
I am never alone—with fragrant hair,
The Spirit of the first young Hour is there.

In one loud pæan our songs arise—
"Thanks to our God for the earth and skies,
For the early dawn, the glittering dews,
For the heaven of song, the glow of hues,
For the life, the light, the love we share,
Thanks! thanks! for the thoughts of praise and prayer."

I am never alone—at warm noon-day,
When the breeze is drunk by the scorching heat,
When the lark hath hushed his thrilling lay,
And the flowers shut up their odours sweet—
I am never alone—beside me lies
The Spirit of the Wood, with deep dark eyes.

My heart is stilled with flower and bird,
My soul is with that spirit heard:
Low, soft as summer's breath arise—
"Thanks to our God for the earth and skies,
For the glowing noon, the cooling glade,
For the sweets of rest, the calm of shade;
For the life, the love, the peace we share,
Thanks! thanks! for the thoughts of praise and prayer."

I am never alone—at evening's close,
When the twittering birds bid earth good night,
When the insect hums round the laurel-rose,
And the bat flies low in the dim twilight—
I am never alone—on bended knee
The Spirit of the Night-wind prays with me.

NEW BOOKS.

Biography and Poetical Remains of the late Margaret Miller Davidson. By WASHINGTON IRVING. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1841.

This was a labour of love. There is the same affinity between the character and genius of this youthful poetess and her biographer, which existed in the case of Kirke White and his biographer, Southey. In each case the task of recovering and embalming the remains of a deceased favourite, encasing them in the amber of their own beautiful creations, has been executed with an affectionate solicitude which does honour to the author's heart.

Margaret Miller Davidson was the sister of Lucretia Davidson, celebrated for her poetical talents and lamented for her early death. Margaret had the same peculiarities of character and talent, the same moral and physical constitution, as her sister; and like her died in early life. Her literary remains were entrusted to Mr. Irving by her mother, not less on account of his intimacy with the family, than his taste and judgment as an editor. The Memoir occupies 152 pages of the volume; the Remains 207 pages, nearly all in verse.

Parents should read this volume. It conveys a very decisive warning against permitting the precocious talent of the young and delicate to develop itself by strong intellectual stimulants to the neglect of physical culture. This subject has not hitherto attracted much attention. But it is important, inasmuch as we every year behold numbers sinking early into the tomb, whose lives might have been preserved by a careful attention to the equilibrium of mental and physical development.

The Moral Influence, Dangers, and Duties, connected with Great Cities. By JOHN TODD. Philadelphia: Smith & Peck, corner of Arch and Third streets, 1841.

The author of the Student's Manual could not have exerted his peculiar talents for moral instruction in a more fertile field than he has selected in the present instance, and his usual vivid, fresh, and highly practical manner was never exhibited to better advantage than in this volume. We commend it to readers of all classes, as a book full of excellent instruction.

A Practical Treatise on the Human Teeth: showing the Causes of their Destruction, and the Means of their Preservation. By WILLIAM ROBERTSON. With plates. First American from the second London edition. 8vo. Philadelphia, 1841. Lea & Blanchard.

This work is not addressed solely to the professional dentist, but to the public at large. It is written in such a manner as to be wholly intelligible; and although some of the author's views—in regard to the production of decay in the teeth—may admit of dispute, he conveys information that must be valuable to all. He states specifically in the preface to the first edition, that one of his objects, "indeed, the chief one," was to make the non-professional reader acquainted with the nature and progress of caries, and with the preventive and remedial measures which it is necessary to adopt, and that, therefore, he has entered no farther into the consideration of the anatomical structure of the teeth, and of the parts connected with them, than appeared to him to be absolutely necessary, in order to make that part of the subject clear and intelligible.

The work will furnish useful hints to every one who is solicitous—and who is not—to preserve the integrity of the important organs of which it treats.

Lectures on Universalism. By REV. JOEL PARKER. D. D. New York: John S. Taylor & Co., 1841.

This is a reprint of a very popular book on polemical theology, published several years since. The new edition is remodeled so as to reply to recent arguments adduced in favour of universalism. Of its merits as a theological argument, we can hardly be expected to offer a very elaborate notice. It is, like all Mr. Taylor's publications, very handsomely printed and bound.

This work is for sale at the bookstore of Mr. R. L. H. George, Fifth street, above Chesnut.

RULES FOR INVIGORATING THE CONSTITUTION.

(Concluded from No. 23.)

In 1829, I was consulted respecting the health of Miss Fisher. She had from the age of six or seven, exhibited uncommon abilities for a child, and though one of a large family, was decidedly a favourite of her father, who was a man of highly respectable literary attainments. Conscious, as she must have been at an early period, of his fondness, it seemed the greatest pleasure of her life to merit his approving smile; and as nothing pleased him so much as her rapid progress in learning, she gave her whole soul to her studies with a devotedness truly astonishing. When eight years old, the quantity of poetry she had committed to memory, and rehearsed with a great deal of taste and expression, was almost incredible, and as she sat upon her father's knee, repeating the sweet strains of Cowper, Hemans, and others, it was easy to see the mingled emotions of pleasure and parental affection which they excited.

I pass over several years with the bare mention of her uniform success in obtaining the first prizes at school, and come to a period that has a more immediate bearing on our subject. Miss Fisher attained her eighteenth year, was rather all, but very spare and delicate: her complexion was fair, and her large blue veins were very apparent about her neck and arms; her eye was animated and full of expression; her voice, in ordinary conversation, was peculiarly soft and melodious, and the remarkable sweetness of her temper was perceptible at the first glance. Her person I will not minutely describe—it would be dwelling too long upon the casket, when the gem it contains should at once rivet the attention.

Her mind was truly a gem of the first order, possessing those native qualities which alone can give intrinsic value. It had received all the improvement which the most unwearied labour could bestow upon it, or even a father's heart could desire, and now shone forth in all the perfection of its splendour. But, alas! it was like the meteor's blaze which appears for a moment, and then vanishes for ever. Her father had indeed gained a prodigy, but lost a child. Need I tell the sad sequel of her tale—it is what all have witnessed, and what may be told of thousands. A slight cough gave the first warning of the impending calamity, and her whole appearance exhibited, to the practised eye, a constitution ruined by neglect of exercise and incessant application to study; and the advances of that relentless disease, consumption, were indeed too visible; but assuming all the mildness and gentleness of character for which its victim was remarkable, it seemed to take from her all fears of its certain consequences and final termination. Still her fondness for those intellectual pursuits which had so much embellished the spiritual part, while its frail covering had been gradually fretted out, was unabated; still she seemed wrapt in a bright vision that was ere long to be interrupted, and could with difficulty be induced to pay any attention to her health. Why should she? She felt no pain, and she could discover in herself no indications of disease. A slight cold would account for her cough—her appetite was as usual—her spirits were undiminished—and to convince her that a fatal disease was already fastening upon her, was to convince her against the evidence of her own senses.

Still, however, the destroyer was gaining ground, but so silently, so stealthily, that no alarm was excited; indeed, he seemed to fascinate the object of his wiles as the serpent does the harmless bird that it decoys to destruction, beguiling her with the mock roses and lilies under which he lay concealed, till she should yield unhesitatingly to his deadly embrace.

Among all the diseases that prey upon human life, none are so false and deceitful as consumption. It singles out the fairest and most delicate part of the creation for its victims, and, alas! too often foils all the exertions and ingenuity of man to arrest its progress. Inflammations, fevers, and a host of other maladies, attack us openly, and with a degree of boldness that at once puts us on our guard; but consumption is a concealed enemy, that silently and unsuspectingly gets possession of the citadel, and slowly carries on the work of destruction at the very seat of life.

But I am wandering from my subject, and fain would I leave the rest untold. Though short, it is full of melancholy—though the fate of thousands, it is not the less replete with painful interest; for who can behold one so young, so intellectual, and so lovely, decked with false roses as for her bridal, and calmly and unconcernedly descending step by step to the gloomy mansion, and not be moved? Suffice it to say, no human efforts could delay the fatal moment, but her lovely spirit shone brightly to the very last, and when its frail tenement was no longer worthy to retain it, it was gently released almost without a struggle or a moan.

Before closing my remarks on the education of females, I will give you a case which has appeared to me well calculated to show the pernicious effects of misguided parental affection, and the power of nature in repairing in some measure the injury she has sustained under certain circumstances. Such cases are undoubtedly rare, for either the health is irreparably destroyed by similar treatment during childhood, or else the condition of the individual prevents the application of the only efficacious remedy.

Mrs. Robertson was born of very respectable parents, both of whom were remarkably amiable, and she had the misfortune to be the oldest of several children. Her mother was one of those anxious, timid women, always looking out for sickness and accidents, and excessively alarmed at the most trifling indication of disease, or the least casualty. She early imbibed the idea that her first-born, Fanny, had an excessively delicate constitution, and would require all the care and assiduity that could possibly be bestowed upon her, to bring her to maturity. This probably arose in some measure from her being rather smaller than most children, and from her having been occasionally visited by some of the complaints peculiar to infancy.

If Fanny coughed or cried, or was disinclined to eat, or was restless at night, her mother was sure she was ill, and flew immediately to the medicine chest for hive syrup, paregoric, or castor oil; and if the child did not soon appear entirely well in spite of this dosing, the doctor was summoned forthwith. She was not allowed to breathe the fresh air, even in mild weather, for fear of croup, and her stomach was kept so constantly disturbed by some of the aforesaid remedies, that nothing like healthy digestion took place; flatulence, acidity, and colic pains were the consequence, and these were invariably attributed to a naturally weak stomach, forbidding the use of any thing but barley-water and arrow-root.

In spite of all these hindrances she grew up, but was in reality a very feeble girl. How could she be otherwise? But what is a little remarkable is, that the mother so completely concentrated all her anxious fears and unwearied attention in this first object of a mother's affection, that her other children, though brought up with sufficient care, completely escaped her pernicious officiousness, and were comparatively robust. The mother concluded from their general health that they were blessed with good constitutions, and required but little nursing; and as Fanny was the idol to whom all her sacrifices were offered, the younger sisters were early taught to wait upon their elder, and being allowed to exercise, eat, drink, and sleep something as nature dictated, they grew up healthy girls.

It is not a little surprising that with all this petting, confinement, and dosing, which commonly sours the temper, poor Fanny should have been tolerably good-natured, not to say amiable; but she was one of the most kind-hearted, affectionate beings I ever saw; and though her frame was very feeble, she was perfectly free from any thing like disease. She was a living evidence of the extent to which nature will be sometimes thwarted in her purposes, though she is more frequently quick to avenge man's mischievous interference in her works. Left to herself, she rarely fails to perfect what she has commenced, but often interrupted, she indignantly casts her task from her, as unworthy of being accomplished.

At nineteen, Fanny was married to a man of excellent character, who did all a kind-hearted husband could do to make her happy. This, as will appear, was no easy matter. When I became their physician, which was at an early period of my practice, they had two children, and Fanny was almost constantly requiring my attendance. She was never in my opinion dangerously ill, but incessantly complaining. She was very thin, pale, and feeble; and the least agitation brought on the most distressing nervous attacks, but I never could discover that she had any fixed malady. She was often shut up in her room for weeks together, with little or no appetite, sleepless nights, and, altogether, in a most pitiable state of weakness. She thought she had at different times all the diseases which "flesh is heir to," except, perhaps, small-pox, yellow fever, hydrophobia, and a few others; and often, often believed herself at the very point of death.

It would be utterly impossible for me to enumerate the different times I have been summoned to her, with an assurance on the part of the messenger that she would not be alive at my arrival unless I went with the greatest possible despatch. But strange as it may seem, in every instance I found her a little relieved, though told that had I been a few moments sooner, I should have thought her nearly in her last agonies.

The fact was, her nervous system was so irritable, that the veriest trifle agitated her, and then she would work herself into the belief that her last moment had come. I am convinced it was no affection or deception on her part, for nothing could be more foreign to her character than to practise either. Her sufferings were all real to her, for which reason I had patience with her, and did all I could to calm and relieve her; and her husband, good man, looked upon her in exactly the same light that I did, and instead of exercising any harshness, did every thing in his power to please her, for the least appearance of dissatisfaction gave such pain to her sensitive mind, that he found it best as much as possible to avoid it.

All my arguments failed to induce her to take regular exercise abroad, a thing, indeed, that she never had done; and though I strongly advised her not to drink tea, she found such temporary satisfaction from it, that she could not resolve to lay it aside. She told me that she knew strong tea was poison to her, and that if sufficiently strong, it would render her for a time delirious, yet she insisted that weak tea was not hurtful to her, and furthermore, that she could not live without it.

This was odd reasoning: for according to this principle a poisonous substance may destroy life if taken in a certain quantity, but habitually taken in minute doses, it is not only harmless but conducive to health.

Fanny was a fond mother, and whenever either of her children happened to be at all indisposed, her fears were immediately transferred from herself to them, and she became really one of the most unhappy beings imaginable. She could neither eat, sleep, nor for a moment leave them, till she fancied they were better, and then, exhausted by her anxiety and exertions, she inevitably took to her bed, which she sometimes could not leave again for weeks.

When consulted by her, the first question she usually put to me was—"Well, doctor, is it possible for me ever to recover?" An assurance from me that she was not in a dangerous state, commonly produced the reply, "I have always been so feeble that I am sure I cannot survive a great while; and it appears to me that every ill turn is more severe than that which preceded it."

She would sometimes ask me with the greatest solemnity of manner, if I thought she would live many days; and I have not unfrequently found it very difficult to maintain my gravity in answering her.

To have lightly treated her fears, would have been to wound her feelings, and irretrievably lose her confidence. Her mental sufferings were exceedingly great; and knowing, as I did, that they depended upon the debility of the body, I had no disposition to ridicule them, or to think them undeserving my attention and sympathy.

It was melancholy thus to see a young female deprived of health, and of almost every enjoyment of life, and dragging out a painful existence in consequence of the misplaced cares of one of the best-disposed mothers, and without any probability of her being essentially benefited by any prescriptions.

But at length a reverse of fortune, as most persons would call it, proved to be any thing but a reverse to her, and did more than all the medicine that could be advised.

Her husband sustained some losses, and was compelled to seek a less expensive mode of living. He sold his property for the benefit of his creditors, and with the trifle which remained to him, emigrated to America, where he purchased a piece of land, erected a log-house, into which he moved his family, and applied himself to the task of clearing up a new farm.

His wife saw the necessity of the change, and did not murmur; but it was hard for her to leave the neighbourhood of that affectionate mother to whom she thought she owed a debt of gratitude she could never be able to cancel, but to whom, in fact, she owed all her sufferings.

To keep even a single servant now was out of the question, and she was compelled by stern necessity, to make exertion which she had never before attempted. The affairs of her little log-tenement were to be managed by her, or not at all; and I must do her the credit to say, considering the life she had always lived, and the extreme delicacy of her frame, she commenced her domestic labours with a degree of fortitude that was really surprising. At first she could do but little at a time, without lying down to rest herself; and many were the hours spent in tears, and dark bodings of the future. But her health and strength slowly improved, and though she now and then gave up and took to her bed, the state of her house soon forced her from it, and after struggling on in this way for nearly two years, she at length found herself sufficiently strong to conduct the concerns with considerable ease; and her husband, discovering that her exertions were doing her more good than all the doctors, thought it most prudent not to ease her burdens, except by kind and encouraging language, and finally saw her in the enjoyment of tolerable health, justly considering the loss of property and the hardships it had brought upon them, the greatest blessing he could have received. That bad health in this instance was entirely the effect of early habits, was fairly proved.

From the North American Review.

LAURA BRIDGMAN,

THE CHILD OF ONE SENSE.

Laura Bridgman, born in Hanover, New Hampshire, in December, 1829, was a sprightly infant, but of feeble constitution, and subject to severe fits, all she was a year and a half old. For six months from that time, her health materially improved, and in this interval, according to the account now given by her family, her infantile capacities were rapidly developed. At two years of age,

"Suddenly she sickened again; her disease raged with great violence during five weeks, when her eyes and ears were inflamed, suppurated, and their contents were discharged. But though sight and hearing were gone for ever, the poor child's sufferings were not ended; fever raged during seven weeks; for five months she was kept in a bed in a darkened room; it was a year before she could walk unsupported, and two years before she could sit up all day." It was now observed that her sense of smell was almost entirely destroyed; and, consequently, that her taste was much blunted.

"It was not until four years of age, that the poor child's bodily health seemed restored, and she was able to enter upon her apprenticeship of life and the world."

The account of her progress till her eighth year, as being obtained at second hand, is brief and general.

"As soon as she could walk, she began to explore the room, and then the house; she became familiar with the form, density, weight, and heat, of every article she could lay her hands upon. She followed her mother, and felt of her hands and arms, as she was occupied about the house; and her disposition to imitate led her to repeat every thing herself. She even learned to sew a little, and to knit.

"Her affections, too, began to expand, and seemed to be lavished upon the members of the family with peculiar force.

"But the means of communication with her were very limited; she could only be told to go to a place by being pushed; or to come to one by a sign of drawing her. Patting her gently on the head signified approbation; on the back, disapprobation.

"She showed every disposition to learn, and manifestly began to use a natural language of her own; she had a sign to express her idea of each member of the family; as drawing her fingers down each side of her face, to allude to the whiskers of one; twirling her hand around, in imitation of the motion of the spinning wheel, for another; and so on. But although she received all the aid that a kind mother could bestow, she soon began to give proof of the importance of language to the development of human character: caressing and chiding will do for infants and dogs, but not for children; and by the time Laura was seven years old, the moral effects of her privation began to appear. There was nothing to control her will but the absolute power of another, and humanity revolts at this; she had already begun to disregard all but the sterner nature of her father; and it was evident, that as the propensities should increase with her physical growth, so would the difficulty of restraining them increase."

In October, 1837, she was brought to the Institution for the Blind in Boston.

"For a while, she was much bewildered; and after waiting about two weeks, until she became acquainted with her new locality, and somewhat familiar with the inmates, the attempt was made to give her knowledge of arbitrary signs, by which she could interchange thoughts with others.

"The first experiments were made by taking articles in common use, such as knives, forks, own maxims and pretensions "to the touchstone of the understanding;" they must abandon "the mysteries" in so far as it relates to the affairs of this world, and attend to that "wisdom" which God has impressed on the material and moral world. It has been my humble endeavour, in "The Constitution of Man," in my "Moral Philosophy," and in my lectures, to convince the people that there are not two "wisdoms" relative to this world, human and divine, but one wisdom, which is altogether of God—which is written in the frame-work of the external universe, and in our own bodies and minds, as well as in the Bible; and that unless they study this wisdom, and act according to it, they cannot prosper in this life. Their present want of reverence may be traced to their deficiency in intellectual education and moral training. The present generation scarcely knows any wisdom superior to its own; but the wisdom of God, when properly taught to them, will render them at once reverential and independent.

The impediments in the way of extending a sound and truly valuable education to the people of America are very great. The first step towards accomplishing this end must be to institute normal schools for the instruction of the teachers, not only in the proper subjects to be taught, but in the best modes of teaching. The assertion that this is necessary, is resented by nine out of every ten of the actual teachers as a personal insult; and they find it no difficult matter to induce the parents of the children to participate in their feelings. Again, many authors and publishers are interested in the existing school books; and to say that some of them are ill adapted for instruction, is to affect the interests of their owners, and render these individuals secret or declared enemies. There are numerous zealous, vigilant, and influential clergymen, each advocating peculiar sectarian views of Christianity; and to expound a principle in mental philosophy or morals which threatens, even in the most remote degree, to clash with their particular interpretations of Scripture, excites their alarm and rouses their hostility. These various interests send forth under-currents of discontent, which wait only the occasion of some tangible act on the part of the friends of education that may be plausibly condemned or successfully misrepresented, when they immediately combine and form a powerful stream of public opposition to the best efforts of the true friends of the people. The only means of removing all these obstacles is the steadfast address of information and reason to the people, in a spirit which will bear in meekness a thousand disappointments, and still persevere in the path of ultimate success.

August 23. Therm. 60°. The Church of Scotland and Education.—In Britain the cause of education has still greater obstacles to contend with. The Edinburgh newspapers contain a report of a meeting held in the Assembly Rooms of that city on the 8th of July, at which the subject of national education was discussed. The company were admitted by tickets, and the Rev. Dr. Muir was called to the chair. The "Central Society" for promoting education (which advocates a national system of education universally applicable by avoiding sectarian teaching), and the evidence of Mr. James Simpson on that subject, given before a committee of the house of commons, were severely commented on. Dr. Muir is reported to have said, that "what excited alarm in his mind on the present occasion, was the remarkable coincidence that had taken place between the opinions of these philosophical educationists and the projects of education which had been issued by the government." Mr. Balfour, the minister of Colinton, moved the first resolution, "to the effect that the education of youth ought to be vested in the ministers of the Established Church," which was seconded by Mr. Johnston. Mr. John Wood, of the Sessional School, moved a resolution expressing thanks to God for the "parochial school system, superintended by the parochial minister, and in which the Bible was received as the basis of all instruction." He declared his dissent from Mr. Simpson's views of education, and commented in "severe terms on the monstrous consequences to which this would lead." Mr. Swinton of Inverleith Row moved that an address be presented to her majesty, and that petitions "be sent to both houses of parliament deprecating the proposed measure" of government to establish an educational system open to all sects. These resolutions were adopted.

I introduce this subject to my American readers as a practical example of the nature and mode of action of an Established Church. It is a single sect, endowed by the government, and placed in possession of ecclesiastical power extending over the whole kingdom, and professing articles of belief sanctioned by act of parliament. It is chained in its position by legal fetters. Theology may gather new lights from science—from profounder erudition in the clergy, or from increasing civilisation in the people; but the law-enacted creed cannot admit one ray of light into its dogmas. When the clergy of an established church see the public mind advancing in knowledge, and in the practice of the Christian virtues of mutual forbearance, justice, and benevolence, they take the alarm for the safety of their own pretensions to supremacy. They discover that, if the people should be educated in useful knowledge, and induced to practise that precept of Christianity which teaches us to "love our neighbours as ourselves," their exclusive dominion would be wrested from them; and they, therefore, leave no effort untried to secure to themselves the education and training of the young, with a view to bind them to their chariot wheels through life.

Since the reformation, the church has had the charge of the education of the people both in England and in Scotland. On the 5th of July, 1839, the Marquis of Lansdowne, in the house of lords, presented a graphic picture of the success with which the church has discharged this duty in England. In Kent, said he, the maniac Thom had induced the people to receive him as one of the Messrs. Rothschild, the rich bankers; as the King of Jerusalem; as the Earl of Devon; and lately in the sacred character of the Saviour of mankind; "and in each of these characters he was implicitly believed and blindly followed, by the greater proportion of the whole population of three or four parishes." "In two or three instances the most infatuated of his followers are the very masters and mistresses of the village schools! Kent was not singular in its ignorance. He believed that in his own immediate neighbourhood, in the west of England, it would only require the appearance of another Thom to give rise to a similar exhibition of fanaticism."

If the common people had been invested with any degree of political power, or had enjoyed any legal and constitutional means by which they could have brought the evils of their ignorance to bear on the enjoyments of the aristocracy and the clergy, would they have been allowed to fall into such a state of mental degradation? No! At present, they have no way of making this ignorance influence the comforts of the rich, except by open violations of the law, such as burning corn-stacks and other property. The chartists have lately destroyed houses and shops in Birmingham to the value of 40,000*l.* sterling. For these offences they are imprisoned, banished, or executed; meanwhile the clergy and aristocracy continue to oppose the only practicable scheme of averting such catastrophes—that of universal education. In the United States, the ignorance of the masses operates through the medium of the ballot-box, and it is filling the wealthy with so much terror for their own safety, that they are as ardently desirous to educate the people, as the majority of the English peers and clergy are to prevent the accomplishment of such an object. Can the Church of England then be safely trusted with the education of the masses in future? Two reasons forbid it. First, Two fifths of the people are dissenters, and the nation includes the whole; and, secondly, the spirit of the Church of England is avowedly conservative of all corporate and social privileges, and it is therefore hostile to the elevation of the masses into that condition of intelligence and morality which will render them fit to send representatives of their own feelings and interests into the legislative assemblies of the country, and thereby to destroy all unjust advantages, enjoyed exclusively by particular classes. No body of men should be entrusted with national education, who do not conscientiously desire to advance both the mental and physical condition of the people, without regard to the consequences of their improvement on the privileges of those who are now their superiors. An enlightened and moral people will grant justice to all, and no class has any title to more.

In Scotland, the clergy have as little reason to boast of their success in national education. Their folds also include only three fifths of the population, and they have therefore no right to direct the education of the whole. Besides, it is confessed by themselves that they shamefully neglected both the spiritual and the temporal education of the people during seventy years of the last century; and Dr. Chalmers lately proclaimed that the large towns in particular of Scotland are overrun by "unexcavated heathens." Dr. Spurzheim, when he last visited Scotland, remarked that the Scots appeared to him to be the most priest-ridden nation in Europe; Spain and Portugal not excepted. After having seen other countries, I can understand the force of this observation. One of the disadvantages of Scotland is her remote situation, and the consequent limited intercourse of the majority of her people with foreign nations. She has grown up as a little world within herself. She tries her church, her clergy, her schools, her opinions in general, by no standard but her own cherished prepossessions; and she finds them perfect. In Protestant Germany, Switzerland, and the United States, the darker features of Calvinism are softening. Scotland clings to them all; and with perfect self-complacency, charges these other nations with "backsliding from the truth." This is precisely what the Spaniards and Portuguese have long done in regard to their opinions, under the guidance of their priests. The clergy and political partisans in Scotland take advantage of this tendency to self-admiration, and by assuring the people that they are the most orthodox Christians in the world, they rivet the chains of bigotry and intolerance round the necks of the enthralled listeners by their own hands. In the United States, the system of education which has called forth the petition from the church party in Edinburgh to the queen, has been in actual operation, and with the best effect, for years. The state provides for all the people, secular education and instruction in those moral departments of Christianity in which all sects are agreed, and it leaves to parents and pastors of every sect the duty of indoctrinating the young in their own peculiar tenets. The state recognises no sect as wiser, or better, or sounder than the others, but leaves the people to judge of their merits, and to support them according to the dictates of their own consciences and understandings. The consequences are—extremely little religious animosity; churches supported by voluntary zeal so numerous that in New England, and in the cities generally over the Union, there is one for every thousand inhabitants; and a clergy so industrious that a large proportion of them actually sacrifice their health, and some their lives, in the discharge of their duties. The churches, moreover, are far more handsome and comfortable in their accommodations, and much better filled, than those of the establishment in Scotland. Meanwhile the whole country is actively engaged in the work of education. It is no wonder, then, that the people of the United States look with astonishment at the proceedings of our established clergy in regard to education, and that they sympathise with the working classes, when they complain of “the great opposition given to a grant of 30,000*l.* for the education of the poor, in contrast with the little opposition to a grant of 70,000*l.* for building a riding house for the queen.”*

Supply of Ice to Calcutta.—American enterprise has led to the regular supply of Calcutta with ice from the United States as an article of commerce. A gentleman of Boston, who owns a ship of 400 tons employed in this trade, described to me the process of loading the ship. In the month of February, the ice is cut into square blocks and built regularly up in the hold till it is quite full. The interstices between the blocks, and also the sides and a few inches at the bottom of the vessel, are filled with husks of rye, and the whole forms a compact mass. The hatches are then closed, and the hold is rendered as nearly air-tight as possible. About one fourth of the whole quantity shipped melts in the voyage. The moisture trickles down and is pumped out with the bilge water; the remaining three fourths are delivered in Calcutta. The trade yields a fair profit.

The New York City Humane and Criminal Institutions.—The female penitentiary at Bellevue contains 71 convicts. The female penitentiary at Blackwell's Island contains 224. The male penitentiary at the latter place contains 232 convicts. The house of refuge contains 158 boys and 58 girls—total 216. The lunatic asylum on Blackwell's Island contains 200 persons—95 men and 105 women. There are in the almshouse at Bellevue 2432 persons—1167 natives of this country, and 1265 foreigners.†

* Address by the general convention of the working classes to the middle classes.

† The almshouse is the refuge for the paupers of the city; and this return confirms two facts which I have already adverted to, namely, that the aggregate number of paupers in the American cities is small compared with that in British cities, and that a large proportion of them are foreigners. In regard to the

The city prison contains 128—95 men and 33 women—16 of whom are in the debtors' department. The “nurseries” at the Long Island farm contain 776 persons—516 boys, 172 girls, 12 men and 76 women.—September, 1830.

Mercantile Honour in New York.—“A dispute has been carried on in some of the papers as to the amount of mercantile honour in New York. Our opinion is, that there are in New York some of the biggest rascals that go unhanged. Besides these, there are a good many little rascals, some of whom were born here, but most of them received their education in other places. Further, there are a great many very well behaved gentlemanly people engaged in trade.”—New York Journal of Commerce, 20th July, 1839. This is an honest, and apparently a very correct, statement of the case.

August 31. Ther. 51°. Law as to Challenge.—It has been decided in Philadelphia that a challenge to fight with fists is an indictable offence; in The Commonwealth v. Caleb Whitehead, before Judge Todd and jury, 15th of August, 1839. The judge remarked that this is not an indictable offence in England, and that the point has never hitherto been decided in Pennsylvania, but that, after hearing able pleadings by the counsel in the case, he is of opinion that it is an indictable offence, and ruled accordingly. The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

A Storm.—Last night the wind increased to a heavy gale from the north and northeast, accompanied by a tremendous rain. Cape Cottage, a frame house of three stories, clapboarded, vibrated to its foundations, and our bed shook beneath us. The rain streamed through the roof, penetrated the room above ours, and fell in large drops on our floor. The windows leaked, and the winds roared through our apartments, as if they had been Æolus's cave. The storm continues this day, and the sea comes rolling in from the Atlantic, in stupendous waves, and breaks with terrific grandeur against the rugged cliffs that skirt the shore.

Captain Marryat's Diary.—I have perused the American reprint of this work. It is a special pleading against the Americans, and not an impartial judgment on their character and institutions. His section on religion is a strange combination of illogical ideas. He represents the multiplication of sects as fatal to religion. This, however, is contradicted by facts. His argument amounts to this: that if we leave the human mind free, with reason and the Bible as its only guides, to form its own opinions, and institute its own ceremonies in religion, the consequence will be simply the multiplication of errors; but he should have explained how the selecting of one sect, and declaring it by act of parliament to be the depositary of the only true faith, will charge formerly alluded to, made against the managers of St. Cuthbert's charity workhouse in Edinburgh of shipping paupers to the United States, in order to free themselves from the burden of maintaining them, I find that I understated their defence. Mr. Johnston paid the agents at Liverpool for the ship “Chieftain” the head-money which is exacted from every individual going from Great Britain to New York, for himself and his apprentices and servants. The captain of the vessel neglected to report him and his people at New York on their arrival, and to pay the “head-money,” in consequence of which Mr. Johnston was carried before the mayor, Mr. Clark, and fined in 500 dollars, and imprisoned because he was unable to pay or give bail for that sum. This was regarded even in New York as an outrage on justice.

coufer on its doctrines the character of unquestionable truth. Does the act which provides bounties for those who believe in the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England, and penalties for those who do not believe in them, render them infallibly true? The lesson which the multitude of sects conveys to my mind is, that those points in which they all agree must be clearly revealed in the Bible, and must therefore constitute the essence of Christianity, while those regarding which they differ widely, must be not so explicitly unfolded, and be therefore less essential to human salvation. The progress of discussion in the United States is diminishing the points of difference, and increasing those of agreement. For example, the eternal perdition of infants is now given up by all, or nearly all sects, whereas a century ago this was a favourite orthodox article of belief. Again, the doctrine of the total corruption of human nature is now in the progress of being abandoned or modified by the different sects; which also was a fundamental element in all sound belief half a century ago. Other modifications are in progress, some of which I shall take a subsequent opportunity of stating.

Captain Marryat accuses American juries of accepting bribes. I have never heard this mentioned by the Americans themselves as a defect in the working of their institutions, and I have no means of knowing to what extent the evil, if it do exist, prevails. But, without meaning in the least to palliate the iniquity of it, I may be allowed to remind Captain Marryat that a short time ago, even in the reformed parliament of Great Britain, the members of the house of commons, the chosen of the land, when acting in the character of judges on committees on disputed elections, disregarded, in the most shameless manner, all law, evidence, and justice, and voted the Tories for the Tory candidates, and the Whigs for the Whig candidates, without a single exception, till the abuse roused the indignation of the honest men of all parties over the whole empire, and was at last corrected. The American juries are often composed of ignorant men in humble circumstances; whereas these committees consisted of men of the first rank, fortune and education in the country.

He mentions a judge who acquitted a female convicted of theft because she was “a pretty girl.” We could have told him in Scotland of a sheriff, only lately deceased, who was so great an admirer of the fair sex, that, according to common report, when he sat as judge in the small debt court, he decided in favour of the lady, whether plaintiff or defendant, the moment he saw her head-gear, as she passed through the crowd to come to the bar, and without waiting to discover whether she was old or young, plain or pretty, or to hear either what she claimed or what she resisted. Such stories have in general just so much truth in them as to render them amusing expositions of the foibles of the individuals of whom they are narrated; but it is absurd to cite them as traits of national character.

Sept. 3. Aurora Borealis.—This evening at half past seven we saw a beautiful aurora borealis. In the zenith its top was exactly like the centre of a splendid canopy, from which its rays, some of them of a deep purple colour, seemed to descend to the horizon. I afterwards read in the newspapers that on the evening of the same day the same appearances had been seen at London, New York, and New Orleans! As there is a difference of nearly six hours between London and New Orleans, this aurora must have retained is form and colours for an extraordinary length of time. The sun must have been shining on New Orleans when the aurora was observed in its greatest splendour in London! Its height must have been great, for it was seen precisely at the same hour in the same part of the heavens, and presenting the same appearances, in New York and Portland in Maine, which are more than 300 miles apart.

Sept. 10. Ther. 65°. Sunday.—In New York it has recently been decided that it is unlawful to sell newspapers in the street on Sunday.

The Amistad Schooner.—For some days a long, low, black schooner, of a very suspicious appearance, was observed hovering off the American coast, and she has at last been captured in Long Island Sound. She was filled with negroes lately brought from the coast of Africa to Havana, a Spanish city, and sold there as slaves to a Spaniard, who hired this vessel to carry them to his estate in Cuba. They rose on the captain and killed him and one of his crew; several others fled from the vessel in a boat, and the rest, including their purchaser, they saved alive. They commanded them to steer for Africa, which they did during the day, as the negroes knew that Africa lay to the south, and the sun showed them the direction; but during the night they invariably steered north, until they came to Long Island coast. A vigorous discussion is proceeding in the American newspapers, whether these men are murderers and pirates, or noble asserters of their invaded rights.

Sept. 11. Ther. 61°. Dr. Sewall, the Anti-Phrenologist.—I formerly mentioned that I had stated to this gentleman that he erred in regard not only to the truth or merits of phrenology, as to which he had as good a right to form a judgment as any phrenologist, but in respect to the subject itself, and that the representation given of it in his work entitled "Errors of Phrenology exposed," was a tissue of mistakes of his own; upon which he had expressed the possibility of his revising his opinions. A second edition of his book has since appeared, in which the old misrepresentations are retained. Not only so, but the same errors in quotation are carefully preserved. As an example of his accuracy in point of doctrine, I cite the following words from my Elements of Phrenology, in which the real phrenological views are stated, and I shall then introduce his representation of them. "The phrenologist never compares intellectual ability with the size of the brain in general; for a fundamental principle of the science is, that different parts of the brain have different functions, and that hence the same absolute quantity of brain, if consisting of intellectual organs, may be connected with the highest genius, while, if consisting of the animal organs, lying in the basilar and occipital regions of the head, it may indicate the most fearful energy of the lower propensities." Elements of Phrenology, p. 151. With this passage before his eyes, Dr. Sewall represents us as saying that, "If a small head be connected with a powerful intellect, it only proves that the brain, though small, is well organised, and acts with uncommon energy!" p. 46.

The following will suffice as a specimen of his representation of facts:—"When all these fail," says he, "in furnishing a satisfactory explanation, another method still more amusing is sometimes resorted to in relieving Phrenology from embarrassment. It may be illustrated by the following facts: There is a celebrated divine now living in Scotland equally distinguished for his amiable disposition, his gigantic powers of mind, and the great moral influence which he exerts upon the Christian world. This individual, it is said, has the organ of Destructiveness very largely developed, and not having any counteracting organ very large, it is contended by those who are acquainted with the fact, that he manifests his inherent disposition to murder, by his mighty efforts to destroy vice, and break down systems of error. In this way he gratifies his propensity to shed blood." By the words "it is said," as well as by the whole context, Dr. Sewall obviously affirms that this is a statement or representation given by Phrenologists. It is a pure fiction! No such statement, or any thing resembling it, is known to me to exist in the whole literature of Phrenology. Dr. Sewall cites no authority for it whatever.

Finally, Dr. Spurzheim carried with him to America several diseased skulls of uncommon thickness, which he showed in his lectures in elucidation of the rule, that in making observations we must select healthy individuals not past the prime of life, because in disease and old age the skull does not indicate the size of the brain. After his death his collection was sold, and one of these skulls came into Dr. Warren's possession, who sent it to Dr. Sewall. He has lithographed it and presented it to his readers without mentioning the rule now stated, or the use which Dr. Spurzheim made of the skull. In some regions this specimen is more than an inch thick! Dr. Sewall introduces drawings of four other skulls differing very widely from each other in thickness, but instead of mentioning the age and state of health of each of them (which he dared not do, because such information would have destroyed his own argument,) he leaves his unskilled readers to infer that they are all normal skulls. His own words are, "The history of the intellectual character of the individuals whose crania are here delineated I shall not detail, as the only object of introducing them is to show the natural and insurmountable obstacles which exist in ascertaining the amount of brain by the measurement or inspection of the living head. Such a history would be entirely irrelevant, as it could in no way aid the Phrenologist in his examination. The difference of their thickness furnishes impressive evidence of the impossibility of ascertaining the volume of the brain by the rules of Phrenology!" It is difficult to decide whether the disingenuousness or the indiscretion of this statement is most conspicuous, for Dr. Sewall is a professor of anatomy, and he certainly knows that the cases in question are exceptions to the general rule, and that in making the foregoing statement he is at issue not only with Phrenologists, but with high anatomical and non-phrenological authorities. Magendie of Paris, for example, who is hostile to Phrenology, has said that the "volume of the brain is generally in direct proportion to the capacity of the mind;" and that "the only way of estimating the volume of the brain in a living person is to measure the dimensions of the skull; every other means, even that proposed by Camper, is uncertain." And Dr. John Gordon, the opponent of Phrenology, in the 49th number of the Edinburgh Review, says—"But we will acquiesce implicitly for the present in the proposition (familiar to physiologists long before the ages of Gall and Spurzheim,) that there is in most instances a general correspondence between the size of the cranium and the quantity of cerebrum; that large heads usually contain large brains, and small heads small brains." p. 246.

It is not my intention to present any answer to Dr. Sewall's lucubrations; this has already been done in a very effectual manner by Dr. Caldwell in his "Phrenology vindicated," and by Dr. Bell in his Eclectic Journal of Medicine; but this second edition is fortified with a new species of evidence, which deserves some attention. Dr. Sewall presented his work to several distinguished men, who knew nothing of Phrenology, but whose opinions are influential in the United States, and obtained their opinions of his book and the science. They wrote him complimentary letters in return, praising his book, and condemning Phrenology as untrue and dangerous, and he has printed these letters in the front of his new edition! This was a cruel hoax perpetrated by him on these respectable men.

Several of the English magazines, and also a Berlin journal, annoyed at the progress of Phrenology, which they had authoritatively condemned, hailed Dr. Sewall's lectures as a grand support to their own hostile opinions, and proclaimed them as a complete refutation of the science. I wish them joy of their ally.

Dr. Channing and the Edinburgh Review.

There are two classes of moralists of very different characters. In the one the intellect is powerful, and the moral sentiments relatively feeble. Men thus constituted regard utility as the standard of virtue, and draw their moral maxims chiefly from the dictates of their understandings, much in the same manner as they deduce mathematical conclusions. Paley is a representative of this class. In the other, the moral sentiments are equal to, or preponderate over, the intellectual faculties. Men of this class first feel the right, the true, and the beautiful, by a species of intuition, and then employ their intellectual faculties to give specific form and expression to their moral impressions. Dr. Channing appears to me to belong to this class; Fenelon, also, was one of them. Critics, like other men, approve of works which embody their own style of thinking, and condemn those produced by minds different from their own. Dr. Channing has been particularly unfortunate in respect to the individuals to whom his works are said to have been committed for criticism in the Edinburgh Review. The first notice of them, which appeared in October 1829, is understood to have been written by the late William Hazlitt. Hazlitt had a vigorous intellect, and considerable Ideality, but he appears to have been deficient in some of the moral organs, particularly Conscientiousness. This faculty produces the love of the simple, the true, and the consistent. Hazlitt had no taste for these, but rejoiced in paradoxes. Conscientiousness, Veneration, and Benevolence, when powerful, imbue the mind with meekness, philanthropy, and a sincere respect for, and trust in, human virtue. Hazlitt laboured under the affliction of disappointed ambition, envy, ill-nature, and distrust of mankind. He was no better qualified, therefore, to appreciate Dr. Channing's genius and writing, than a critic deficient in Time, Tune, and Ideality, would have been to discover and describe the peculiar excellences of Mozart's Requiem. Accordingly, his review is a tissue of small objections, written in a querulous, dogmatical, and contentious spirit, while scarcely a gleam of Dr. Channing's highest qualities appears to have penetrated his mind. The most profound and correct portion of Dr. Channing's character of Napoleon, that in which he traces the grand errors of the Emperor's life and his ultimate downfall, to his insensibility to justice, was to Hazlitt altogether incomprehensible, and he recognises neither truth nor depth in the idea. He entirely overlooks it.

Another criticism of Dr. Channing's works appeared in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1839, which is ascribed to Lord Brougham. If Hazlitt was ill-qualified to appreciate Dr. Channing's genius, Lord Brougham was not much better fitted to do so. To some of Hazlitt's defects he added deficiency of Ideality. Blind to the numberless beauties both of thought and expression in Dr. Channing's "Remarks on Fénélon," written upwards of twenty years ago, he seized on some small defects in its style, pointed out these in a cynical tone, and passed without notice the best as well as the most recent of the author's productions. The time was when the Edinburgh Review was the advocate of freedom of thought, and the patron of high minded principle. Dr. Channing's fame has risen far above the sphere of its influence either for good or evil; but for its own sake, it should not have been found in the ranks of his detractors. His character of Napoleon was worthy of its commendation, even in its brightest days, and he had many other claims to its respect. He was a clergyman, and yet the enemy of creeds, because they fetter the understanding and prevent the progress of the mind in moral and theological science; he was an American citizen, and subject to the whole influence of public opinion, which, in his country, is described as a tyranny, yet he braved that opinion with the most admirable courage, and sacrificed popularity and influence to the calls of duty. His appeal to the American public against the admission of Texas into the Union, is one of the soundest political treatises in point of principle, the loftiest in moral tone, and the most eloquent in composition, in the English language, and it had a prodigious effect; nevertheless, it was written altogether on the unpopular side, and few men in the Union would have ventured to brave opinion as he did in addressing to his countrymen such plain and fervid language, in condemnation of a favourite scheme. Again, his bold and eloquent denunciations of slavery have reared up hosts of enemies against him, and added another claim to the respect of all the generous and good for his talents and his intrepidity. Finally, while the whole Union was excited with a vivid passion for war against England about the Maine boundary, and Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster, and other political leaders, either fanned the flame, or stood aloof and saw it rage, Dr. Channing again stepped forth, and, in an admirable sermon against war, appealed to the reason of his countrymen, even in the midst of their fiercest excitement, in favour of peace, and of the interests of civilisation. These great services, not to his country alone, but to mankind, had all been performed, and their blessed effects were discernible on the public mind, when the review ascribed to Lord Brougham appeared in the United States. Its paltry exposition of defects in the style of one of his oldest essays, and its contemptuous estimate of the merits of the most intrepid and eloquent advocate of the supremacy of moral principle, in public as well as private affairs, and of the rights of the oppressed, was unworthy of a liberal and enlightened critic. Dr. Channing, moreover, was a Unitarian, a sect which is not powerful in the United States, and which is much vilified by the orthodox in Britain; and yet he dared to encounter the prejudices of his countrymen when the orthodox in general took counsel of discretion.

The extent of this merit cannot be appreciated by those who have not lived in the United States. The New York Evangelist says, "The truth is, that ministers are so dependent upon the money-making part, and so easily influenced by the fashionable part of their congregations, that, however forcibly they may preach against sin in general, there is a great want of that moral courage which will point out particular and popular sins, and say to their audiences, 'Ye are the men.'" Dr. Channing has not only said to his countrymen, "Ye are the men," but has represented to them in the boldest manner the principles which they, as Christians, are bound to follow; regardless equally of "the money-making" and "fashionable" portions of his congregation and the community at large.

If the Edinburgh Review had come forward in a spirit worthy of its own principles and of its former fame, and added its influence to give effect to these generous efforts, it would not indeed have raised Dr. Channing's reputation on either side of the Atlantic, for happily this is beyond its control, but would have done credit to itself and the country which gives it birth. The course which it has actually followed, has gratified the enemies of Dr. Channing in America, encouraged them in their depreciation of his talents and usefulness, and made the friends of moral, religious, and political freedom lament the decay of what once was the vigorous champion of the great and the good.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Sept. 12. Ther. 55°. Cape Cottage.—We have now resided eight weeks in this delightful retreat, and I borrow the description of it from C——'s letter to a friend. "Here you may picture us quietly seated in our summer retreat, a handsome, rather large cottage, built of wood, clap-boarded, and painted white, with those green outside window-shutters which give such an air of coolness and neatness to New England cottages in general. Cape Cottage stands upon Cape Elizabeth, a projecting point, jutting out into Casco Bay, and forming one of its extremities. It lies three miles and a half from Portland, whether by a good road or by the sea. Casco Bay is full of islands beautifully grouped; common report states them to amount to 300, but the fisherman whose boat we hire to carry us among them, limits their number to 43. Portland Harbour, which is formed by an indentation in the land, is protected from the Atlantic on all sides by these islands, through which, however, several channels allow ships to approach it from various points. Nothing can exceed the picturesque beauty of the vessels when appearing and disappearing through these openings. The harbour is defended by two forts, named after natives of Portland, Fort Preble, on the main land, and opposite to it on an island, Fort Scammel. The Americans have improved the name of the cape, by changing the Indian 'Pooduc' into 'Cape Elizabeth'; but they have been less successful with the islands, to three of which they have given the unpoetical appellations of 'Hog,'

'House,' and 'Bang.' The main channel to the harbour lies in front of our windows, at the distance of a hundred yards. It is about one mile broad, and is bounded on the opposite side by Hog Island. We enjoy a view of the vessels bound to and from Portland, and certainly no craft can look better under a soft southern breeze and a bright sun; for their sprightly elegant forms glide like nautilus shells on a ground of lapis lazuli, with their white sails unsullied by dirt or coal smoke.

"The coast is rocky, and not unlike that of Cullercoats on our own northeastern shore. The rocks are of mica-slate, which is not always a very picturesque formation; but here they contain iron, which, by rusting, has subjected them to disintegration, and the waves have torn them into manifold forms, and strewn them about in a thousand fantastic groups. They seem as if fashioned for the very purpose of delighting the idler; you may scramble over them for miles, and every pinnacle will afford you a varied view: or you may sit under their shade, screened from all winds and from the sun at every hour of the day. Here you may ruminate on ocean, earth, and heaven, and, if fond of adventure, you may, by indulging in a little absence of mind, be surrounded by the tide, and become a living statue ornamenting a craggy point of rock, till the falling waters set you free. From this grandeur of devastation and disorder, you are brought by a sweep of the coast into a sweet, placid, little bay, where you would think the miniature waves could never swell into fury, and yet we have seen the Atlantic, when roused by a northeasterly gale, pour terrific masses of water into those seemingly peaceful retreats.

"The place is essentially scenic: every white sail that starts out from behind a jutting rock makes you think that an adventure ought to belong to it, and every man who takes up a fishing rod, and places himself on an eminence, however common looking before, is immediately transformed into a picturesque object, and is invested with interest. Although Nature has not endowed me with those strong perceptive faculties that constitute enthusiasts in scenery, yet a fine prospect appeals also to the moral part of our nature, and leads us, by a process too rapid for analysis, from physical to mental beauty, and to its Author, Infinite Goodness. I can seldom recall to my mind's eye, as some persons can, any scene, however lovely or however dear, but through my mind's affections, it may be long remembered. I sit on these rocks and recall the songs of the sea that I used to hear in my dear native land, and among them comes oftentimes that sweet ode of Mrs. Hemans, "The Treasures of the Deep," in the tones of my own fascinating cousin Mrs. A——.

"The land that skirts the coast is like our English downs, grassy and gently undulating, with here a projecting rock and there a little pool. It affords pasture to cattle, sheep, and horses, and is all open to the footsteps of the wanderer. Beyond this, the country is divided into small farms, the possessors of which are also many of them fishermen, whose neat white cottages gleam forth from amidst brushwood, tall Indian corn, and rather stunted trees. As we range along the shore, one ear drinks in the murmur of the waves and the splashing of oars, whilst the other feeds on the notes of American robins, the sharpening of scythes, and the lowing of herds.

"These rural sounds, I am sorry to say, are not always pleasant. In a ramble I took a few days ago, I was distressed by the peculiarly plaintive tone in which a cow, standing alone by a barn, was lowing. 'What's the matter with her?' I asked of a man who leaned over the wall. 'Calf killed,' was his abrupt reply; and as he spoke he spread a fresh skin on the wall. The poor mother recognised it, ran up to it, began licking it, and smelling to the little hoofs that hung down; she then looked into the man's face and lowed most piteously; and again caressed the remains of her lost darling! 'She'll go on that way for four or five days,' said her master; and sure enough it was so, for I never passed that way, for more days than four, that I did not hear her plaintive tones.

"A profusion of wild flowers, some of which are cultivated in gardens at home, may be gathered on the downs and in the fields. Our parlour is generally adorned with bouquets of them, including fragrant dog-roses that grow even in the clefts of the rocks quite down to the margin of the tide. Wild raspberries, of excellent quality, wild strawberries, and the whortleberry, or Scottish "blaeberry," abound every where. 'They, and excellent sea-fishing, attract numerous parties of pleasure from Portland, who arrive, some in handsome barges by the bay, others in equipages of all varieties of form by the road; they spend a few hours rambling singly or in groups, give liveliness to the scene, and return home in the evening. The fields also are alive with grasshoppers, large and small, which hop into your face without ceremony, and are often brought home and hung up in one's closet in some fold of dress, from which they skip forth next morning much to their own gratification and to our surprise. Besides the shrill chirping, which is the only sound uttered by our English grasshoppers, some of these emit a noise like that of castanets in action, or the tapping with an iron-shod walking stick on a hard stone. Nobody can tell me whether this sound proceeds from the cicadæ; but, from watching them, I perceive that the individuals which make it are larger than their chirping brothers. As you walk along, you encounter also whole clouds of primrose-coloured butterflies, and pale blue dragon-flies. These are harmless; I wish we could say as much of those blood-thirsty mosquitoes, which infest us every where, and seem as if sent to remind us, amidst all these sweets, that we are still in a world of mingled good and evil. My poor husband has lain on the sofa for three weeks, lamed with their bites on his ankles, and is only now again able to walk. My own eyes have often been closed up for days by the mountainous swellings with which they have been encircled, but, thanks to Providence, the mosquitoes have generally taken them in turns, and left me one at a time fit for use. We have learned, however, to exclude them from our rooms. We have nailed catgut muslin over every window, through which they find it difficult to squeeze even their slender bodies; and this, with ablutions of camphorated spirits, nearly frees us from their indoor intrusion.

"We have hired a horse and gig from Captain —, (a respectable butcher in Portland,) and had delightful drives into the country. The ground in general, within 10 or 12 miles of our cottage, is pleasing and rural, without being either rich or highly cultivated, and in this dry season most of the roads are good. Every drive brings us within sight of the ocean or the bay, at one point or another; and three tall snow-white towers, crowned with lanterns, and used as lighthouses, are pretty objects in the scene. The condition of the country and people is obviously behind that of the rural population in Connecticut and Massachusetts; but the abundance of spruce firs, generally grouped in small masses, the undulating and verdant surface, and the detached farm-houses and offices, constantly remind me of England, and, in many points of view, of the "Park" of some great earl. Here you seldom see a cottage, however small, that is not brilliant with white paint, and verdant with green shutters, and without something like a garden about it, producing a pleasing impression of cleanliness and comfort.

"A few days ago some one brought up to the house a portion of common sea-weed, which, by a freak of nature, had grown into the exact similitude of a lady's mantelet or cloak, such as have been lately worn in the world of fashion. It was double, and trimmed round with what was doubtless intended for an embroidered flouncing, since it had regular holes in it like what our grandmothers called punching. It was of a very becoming form, I assure you: they are not uncommon here, both of green and brown colours, so we may suit our complexions in the article, which, perhaps, some mermaid mantua-maker has sent up, in hopes to decoy the poor thoughtless lovers of finery to her emporium below the waves!

"But it is time that I should introduce you to the interior of our cottage. It would never do for an American rural retreat; for although a 'public house,' as they name a hotel, it is of such moderate dimensions, that the family of one of the ministers of Portland, that of a senator from Maine to Congress, and ourselves, with the landlord and his family, fill it. This is exactly to our taste, but would be very humdrum to those who rejoice in the crowds of Saratoga, or the White Sulphur Springs of Virginia. At breakfast, dinner, and tea, we form a very agreeable family party, and, as we have our separate parlors, we have retirement at command when desired. We find our fellow-boarders, as we are called here, excellent and agreeable society. The senator has been in England, and, when in Edinburgh, visited Sir Walter Scott, to whom he carried letters of introduction. Sir Walter played off a little hoax on him, which he never discovered till we told him of it. The 'Great Unknown' took him, as his friend, to a public entertainment, given on the occasion of the coronation of William IV., and placed him near Mr. Blackwood, the celebrated bookseller, who was then a bailie, and wore a massive gold chain round his neck, as an insignium of office. Sir Walter introduced the American to Mr. Blackwood, and whispered into his ear, 'You must always call him my lord; he is a bailie!' The senator did as he was directed, and it was only on my husband telling him that a bailie is not styled 'my lord' in Edinburgh that he became aware of the trick. 'Oh, then,' said he, laughing, 'the humorous baronet has been playing off the Yankee against the bailie, and enjoying the joke all the while in his sleeve.' Add to this society visits from various friends in Portland, and from one of the best of Boston's accomplished sons—one engaged in kindred pursuits with my husband, who has come hither and spent several days with us, and you have a picture of our social parties.

"We boast of no finery in our cottage, but it will vie with a palace for order and cleanliness; our fare is not such as would suit a London alderman, but it is abundant, savory, and well-cooked. Air, exercise, and minds agreeably occupied, yet void of care, give an exquisite relish to our dinners of fresh fish, (cunners and pollcks caught by the rod on the rocks, by the master of the inn, his son, or their boys,) our 'chowder,' or fish-soup, our young Indian corn, and our squash—the last a very delicate vegetable, I assure you, notwithstanding its frightfully vulgar name. Fowls, turkeys, beef, veal, and mutton, make up our fare, and we are in no danger of suffering want either of substance or variety in our meals.

"You hear much of the want of respect and other faults in the manners of the people here, and, perhaps, if you had seen our hostess quietly keep the seat in our room in which I found her this morning, and heard her tell me, while I was standing before her, that she was trying my air-cushion, and continue to ask various questions about it, without rising, you would have imagined that this was a confirmation of the fact: But in incidents of this kind the manner is every thing. Our hostess is a naturally genteel woman, and had not the slightest idea of intruding; her curiosity to understand the nature of the air-cushion bespoke an active intelligence, of which we enjoy the advantage in her management of the general affairs of her household. Besides, in this country, such freedoms do not constitute marks of disrespect, and every land should be tried by its own laws of politeness. Those stiff-necked persons who cannot turn to the right or the left as the road bends, had better stay at home, and enjoy their rigid postures in their own chimney-corners. At the same time, I must remark that in this country, where equality is the birth-right of all, manners should form a much more important branch of education than they do. There are many persons who, through thoughtlessness, or selfishness, or mere ignorance, are in the habit of committing offences against delicacy, refinement, and common sense. These certainly should be taught, with all possible celerity and assiduity, that in a state of society where all ranks may mingle together, and where the lowest may be found in juxtaposition with the highest, all are bound to conduct themselves so that they shall not be an annoyance to any. My husband tells them pithily that if they be all sovereigns, as they claim to be, they are bound to be all gentlemen. I go so far with this idea that I maintain that this not only should, but, by proper training in childhood, might be the case in all societies. Look at the manners of the poorest children who have been well trained in one of Wilderspin's infant schools; they are inoffensive and well bred, and the sum of their own enjoyment is not diminished by this accomplishment: Nay, it is increased; for good breeding is the consequence of the education of the moral sentiments, which leads to refinement as well as to virtue. We often hear of an aristocracy of intellect. I wish that all over the world we saw an aristocracy of good breeding: If such existed, political equality would not be far distant.

"But I am writing a dissertation, when I meant only to give you a description. I must introduce you, then, to mine host's eldest daughter Tabby. She is an excellent, sensible, and obliging young woman, and between her and me there have been amicable interchanges of books and other civilities. Her collection of books comprises Byron, Moore, Mrs. Hemans, &c. in poetry; a full and well written history of the North American Indian tribes; a description of Herculaneum and Pompeii; a History of all Religions, and many other works. Well, 'Tabby has just come in to borrow a dress for a pattern; to which I made her most welcome. I mention this incident only to assure you that it may be done, and has been done, without the least shadow of that offensive familiarity which has been attributed to such a request by some of our English historians of American manners. I am quite sure that Tabby would have had pleasure in lending me any of her patterns, and thinks that in borrowing mine she but increases the sum of general enjoyment without in the least deducting from particular advantage. It was a pleasure to me to oblige her; and I can testify besides, that there was no domestic duty which could add to my comfort, which Tabby did not as cheerfully perform as if she had never either owned a work on poetry or borrowed the pattern of a piece of dress.

"The youngest daughter of this family might sit for a picture of Laura or Beatrice. Her face is lovely, with the real golden hair parted from her smooth white brow, and the very peculiarly rich chesnut coloured eyes, which are so rare and so beautiful. This girl, if her form were equal to her face, would be one of the fairest creatures I have seen in this land of fair ones. These girls, and the fishermen, and the boys who attend to the horses and carriages that come here, may be seen strolling together among the wild raspberries, or conversing familiarly under the large portico (with which all American inns are furnished,) a perfect specimen of equality; but if you imagine by this that the girls permit, or the men offer, rude jesting, romping, or other improprieties of behaviour, you commit the error of supposing them to be, in manners and feelings, the exact counterparts of our own people of the same station, which is not the case. Their 'sovereignty' has at least taught them self-respect, and this is a great means of insuring respect from others.

"It is a great comfort to us to be served by the landlord's daughters, and by his wife as cook; for the want of 'help' is as great an evil here as in other parts of the Union. A lady of note, in speaking to me of the flourishing state of the cotton factories at Saco, fifteen miles from Portland, said, 'If you want to know the real aristocracy of this country, look at the factory girls;—they will not come to us as servants—they make us work much harder in our kitchens than they do at their spinning-jennies. It would be all fair if we and they could ride and tie; but absolutely it is we who are the domestic drudges.' This you will think is a sad picture of life in a democracy, but, as you are a benevolent lady, perhaps the cause of it may lessen your regrets. These factory girls are the daughters of small proprietors who farm their own lands, or of respectable tradesmen; they engage in labour to make up a little purse for marriage, or to help an old father and mother, and they naturally prefer that kind of work which yields them the best return. The factory owners pay them two, or two and a half dollars a week of wages, and, in domestic service, they could not obtain much above one-half of this sum.

"If you are not tired of my descriptions, I will introduce you to two more of our friends and companions—fine young Newfoundland Dash, with an ingenuous earnest countenance, ever watching for our casting sticks into the bay that he may swim and bring them back; and little stuffy Yorick, with eyes so clear that I think they must be made of Labrador pebbles, and whose bark is the most perfect expression of self-importance, seemingly uttered to warn the meaner crowd to preserve their proper distance.

"How do we spend our time? In reading, writing, walking, driving, talking, scrambling, and sitting amidst those delicious rocks, in balmy air! The hours fly like minutes, and the days like hours. One amusement of my husband's amuses me. You must know that Portland is a great port for 'the lumber trade'—Anglicè, the log and deal trade; and the coast of the bay is literally strewn with deal-ends and fragments of wood of all shapes and sizes. He gathers those that suit his purpose, fashions them with his knife into the form of ships, fits rudders and masts to them, uses the outer surface of birch bark for sails, and sends them forth into the bay or the Atlantic, as the wind answers. We see them scudding joyously before the gentle southwest wind out into the ocean. If any of them reach your coast, capture them and condemn them as lawful prizes. Another of our amusements is watching the great 'sea-serpent.' I think that we have found out what perhaps has given rise to some of the stories you may have read about it. One night there was a brisk gale from the southwest, and the appearance of stormy weather. In the morning the porpoises came rolling into this harbour in great numbers, and some of them of enormous size. They followed each other in a long straight line, and as the backs of a dozen of them in different parts of this line shot up, at the same moment, a small stretch of imagination could supply solid substance to the watery spaces between them, and thus picture them as one continuous creature. Our host, who is a sensible man, gravely asked if we had seen the 'sea-serpent,' 'who,' said he, 'with his family, is reported to be somewhere off this coast.' I heard him put the same question to a chance fisherman who answered as gravely, 'Oh yes, we've run along side of him for ten miles!' The only drawback, besides the mosquitoes, to our enjoyment, is periodical visitations of dense fogs. They come so regularly every Monday, that we at last reckon them as due on that day. They blot out by their leaden vapour all our lovely islands, bays, roses, cliffs, and even the foaming surge, as if they had never been. One day, as I stood under the portico, the mist opened for a few seconds, just sufficient to show the steam-boat from Boston, like a dim ghost, dripping with the heavy fog, and labouring most disconsolately into port; having, as we afterwards heard, been obliged twice to take refuge on her voyage. She gave us one melancholy glance and groan, and was again shrouded from our view.

"12th September. This afternoon, dear —, we must bid adieu to our pretty cottage and all its agrémens. I have taken my last look of those rocks and waves, and grassy seats, and sunny islands, and I am sad to part with them! It is strange to find one's affections taken captive by a place which one could see only for a few weeks, and which we must leave without the remotest prospect of ever revisiting it; but so it is—our affections answer to the calls of their objects, and leave reason to decide in its own way on the wisdom of their doing so. I have stored my memory with images of goodness, peace, and beauty, and so, my dear Casco Bay, I will not repent of knowing you, though I must leave you behind. You are lying in a glorious sunshine on our last interview, and I carry off your last smile of loveliness as that by which you shall hereafter live in my memory and affections—adieu, I am," &c. C. C.

September 12. Ther. 55°. Portland.—This afternoon we left Cape Cottage, and came in a fine barge with two sails to Portland. The evening was delightful, the sea smooth, and the wind fair. The town looked beautiful as we approached it by water. It stands on the slope of a ridge, and from the manner in which it is built, looks very large for its population, which is only 16,000 inhabitants. We remained six days in the town, and enjoyed the hospitality of many friends, who had formed our acquaintance at the Cottage. The society of Portland appeared to us to be very agreeable, and free from form and ceremony. We were entertained at dinner, tea, and evening parties, every day that we remained, and felt new regrets in leaving so many kind and interesting friends.

Phrenology.—Among other gentlemen in Portland who take an interest in Phrenology we became acquainted with Mr. John Neal, a lawyer and a distinguished author in the United States. He gave me "The New England Galaxy for January and February 1835," to read, on account of the report which it contains of a trial of a boy, in whose defence he had pleaded and led evidence, avowedly on phrenological principles. The case was the following:—

In the month of July 1834, a boy of nine years of age, named Major Mitchell, the natural son of a poor woman living at Durham, 23 miles from Portland, actuated by some provocation offered to him by David F. Crawford, a boy of eight years of age, induced this boy by threats and promises, to go with him into a wood to get some flags. When there, Mitchell beat Crawford with his fists, then stripped off his clothes, bound him to a tree with the suspenders of his breeches, and flogged him with twigs from head to foot to the effusion of his blood, and then attempted to drown him in a pool. Crawford at last escaped from his hands, and arrived at home lacerated and naked. Mr. Neal finding the boy Mitchell prosecuted criminally by the Commonwealth, and friendless, undertook his defence. He learned from his mother that, "when about a week old, he fell off a high chest on the floor, and was taken up for dead. He struck on the top of his head, and when lifted his hands were clenched and his head swollen." He had been at school, but had never advanced beyond spelling words of one syllable. His head presented a very large development of Destructiveness, also large Acquisitiveness and Secretiveness, deficient moral organs, but a fair development of the anterior lobe. Mr. Neal considered that his brain had been injured, and that he was partially idiotic.

The defence was 1st, The deficiency of evidence of the facts; 2dly, The great improbability of the alleged mutilation having been perpetrated by the accused; and 3dly, That his conduct, if according to the accusation, proceeded from injuries sustained by his brain in his infancy. The second defence rested on the trifling nature of the wound, as observed when the boy came home, and the fact that one of Crawford's brothers was deficient naturally in this respect, where it was probable that this boy was so too. The third defence was supported by medical authorities and testimony.

Mr. Neal proposed to put in as evidence, "Spurzheim on Insanity," voce Fatuity, p. 104 of the first American edition: "Combe's System of Phrenology, case of E. S." &c.; but he was met by the objection, that in the case of Ware v. Ware, 8 Grem. l. 56, the supreme court had decided, that "medical books of the highest authority ty" were not competent evidence. He called Dr. Jesse W. Mighles as a witness, who testified as follows: "I am a believer in Phrenology as a science. Great changes have taken place in the treatment of insanity, as well as in the mode of dissecting the brain, since that work (Dr. Spurzheim's) appeared. I have examined the prisoner's head; there is something remarkable in it—a very unnatural depression. I presume it is congenital. All heads are more or less deficient in symmetry, but the want of symmetry here is quite remarkable. I have examined it repeatedly before, and had come to the conclusion long ago, before I was called, that some injury had probably happened to it. The right ear is lower than the left, and there is a considerable protuberance on that side. An injury to the muscle of that ear caused by a fall or blow on the head, might naturally produce these appearances. Certain functions of the brain may cease in consequence of a blow—the functional power (of a part) may be destroyed, while the rest continue undisturbed. Such is the doctrine of the books, and I believe it."

Cross-examined.—"I do not speak of this destruction of the functional power of the brain in part, while other parts continue uninjured, from experience. Change of moral or intellectual character might appear a twelvemonth after the injury, from irritation or inflammation."

Mr. Neal proceeded to ask certain questions at the witness as a phrenologist. The Attorney General objected, and Mr. Neal maintained his right. "At this moment the court interfered and asked a question, which resulted in a declaration by the witness, that he could not, of his own knowledge, say that such and such enlargements of a given organ would produce a correspondent change of character. He believed, although he did not know of his own knowledge, that a blow on the head might change the character of the individual in some particulars, though it left him unaltered, undisturbed in others."

Justice Emery charged the jury. "He commented in a clear and lucid manner on the whole testimony." "But it is said" (he continued) "that the head has a large peculiar formation called the organ of Destructiveness. There is no disposition to keep out of courts of justice true science, but, on the contrary, to pay it marked deference. If a question were raised here as to a fact committed in the East Indies, and by two persons it should be said to have been full moon at the time, and astronomers should be called who should demonstrate from calculations, that there could not have been a full moon at that time, it would be proper evidence for a jury. So, if dyers be called as to the effect of chemical combinations upon colours; or if physicians be called to show the effects of poison upon the human frame, such is competent testimony. But when it shall have been demonstrated by proof like this, that a bump here, or a bump there, shall affect the mind, either to destroy the powers of mind, or decidedly to alter its character, then, and not till then, will such become proper evidence to be submitted to a jury. Where people do not speak from knowledge, we cannot suffer a mere theory to go as evidence to a jury; especially where one says he is a believer in the system, and has no personal knowledge upon the subject. Our decisions are made in the day-light, and the jury are judges of the law as well as of facts."

The jury found the prisoner guilty on both counts, and sentenced him to nine years' confinement at hard labour in the State Prison at Thomaston. "The boy showed no emotion. The same downcast look—the same unalterable countenance—the same dull and sleepy eye—the same stoop, and the same half-open mouth characterised him from the first to the last moment of his trial." Mr. Neal concludes—"I am sure that he understood little or nothing of what he saw, though he told me he did, appeared grateful, and promised to be a good boy when he got to Thomaston."—"They give you enough to eat there, don't they?" was his only remark, when told that he should be in prison as long as all his life previous to his sentence."

To Mr. Neal is due the merit of being the first barrister, so far as my information extends, who has had the courage to bring phrenology directly into a court of law, and to plead upon its principles. The case was very unfavourable for him—first, from the want of direct evidence of the boy's head having been injured; and, secondly, from Dr. Mighles not having had a practical knowledge of the science. Judge Emery's charge was obviously correct, in the circumstances of the case; but the principles which he lays down convey an instructive lesson to phrenological physicians to obtain practical knowledge by observation, and not to rest satisfied with conviction founded on mere testimony or philosophical adaptation. If Dr. Mighles had observed nature, he would have been able to describe the peculiarities of the head more accurately and intelligently, and to say positively whether the head was necessarily that of an idiot, or imbecile boy, or not. He would also have been better able to distinguish between a swelling caused by a blow on a muscle, and one arising from the prominence of a part of the skull caused by the development of brain beneath; and, in this latter case, he would have been better able to bear direct evidence to the connection subsisting between this fact and the boy's vicious dispositions. If he had possessed practical knowledge, he would have been better able also to distinguish a congenital deformity of head from one caused by an external injury, and to point out the bearing of each of them upon the case before him; and, lastly, he would have spoken with the weight of an observer interpreting nature, or narrating facts of which extensive and scientific observation had put him in possession, instead of appearing before the jury as a reader merely, resting his conviction and testimony on statements and arguments contained in books, which books other men of respectable reputation are pleased to treat with ridicule or disrespect. The phrenologists who have observed nature know that, most probably, he was in the right; but they have no direct guarantee that he was so in this individual case (which they have not seen), and, consequently, even they must hold the judge fully justified in refusing to place any reliance on such evidence.

In making these remarks, I have in view solely the application of phrenology to future cases, and do not at all blame Dr. Mighles. He probably never contemplated that he would be called on to make such a solemn use of his phrenological knowledge, and he deserves credit for having had the courage to avow his conviction and state his impressions, when judicially summoned to do so, undismayed by that terror of public opinion which makes cowards of so many able men, when the merits of phrenology are in question.

Jeremy Bentham.—Mr. Neal, when a young man, lived for some time in the house of the late Jeremy Bentham in London, and he mentioned the following anecdote of him. "Mr. Bentham," said he, "had no objection to be known to the world precisely as he was. I frequently amused him for a moment or two by imitating some of his peculiarities of speech, walk, and gesture, and he actually invited Matthews to dine with him, because I thought that a true Bentham on the stage by Matthews would be well received by the public. He regarded it as sitting for a picture, a live picture, and was tickled with the idea. What the result of the negotiation between him and Matthews was, I do not know, farther than this, that Matthews never saw him to my knowledge." This occurred in December, 1826, and is mentioned in a Memoir of Bentham published by Mr. Neal. I told Mr. Neal that the cast of Mr. Bentham's head, taken after death, shows an excessive development of the organ of Love of Approbation. Mr. Neal remarked that Mr. B. "would not bear contradiction from any one except Mr. Doane the barrister, one of his secretaries, and myself. Every body also flattered him to his face—if not by downright eulogy, by submissiveness or unquestioning acquiescence." There is proof of this in every page of the Memoir above referred to. When he understood that Mr. Neal was keeping notes of his conversations, he desired him to write them out every night, and made him read them to him in the morning!

Sept. 18. Ther. 42°. Phrenology.—To-day I assisted at the dissection of a brain in presence of Dr. Rea, Dr. Mighles, Mr. Neal, and a number of other gentlemen, who take an interest in phrenology. Dr. Rea mentioned to me that he had attended a woman who became insane on account of the death of her son, and attempted to drown herself. The head was hotter at the organ of Philoprogenitiveness than in any other part. He cupped her at that part, put on a blister and an issue a little below, and cured her. She is now well.

In the evening, at 7 P. M., we left Portland in the steamboat for Boston, and sailed past Cape Cottage and the scenes which we had so abundantly enjoyed. We took our last look of them with regret, and breathed forth our best wishes for the success and happiness of our late excellent host and his amiable family. Next morning at seven o'clock, after a prosperous voyage, we entered Boston bay and harbour, and found them bathed in sunshine, and beauty, and alive, in every direction, with white sails and gliding forms.

Sept. 23. Ther. 59°. Hartford in Connecticut.—We traveled by the railroad from Boston to Worcester, and by the stage from Worcester to Springfield, and thence to Hartford by the Connecticut river, and arrived here after a very pleasant journey. We met with interesting companions in the public vehicles, and were overwhelmed with kindness at Springfield during our brief stay. The country appeared as picturesque and beautiful as it did last year on our first arrival. New England bears well a repeated inspection, nay, a scrutiny.

Phrenology.—It had been my intention, when I came to the United States, to lecture in Baltimore in October of this year, and then to proceed to Cincinnati and Louisville, and deliver courses in these cities during the winter of 1839—40; but, as already mentioned, no class could be mustered in Baltimore, and the same obstacle has presented itself in Cincinnati. Before I left New York in May, Dr. Gross, from that city, called for me, and was authorised to announce that I should lecture in Cincinnati, if wanted. He gave public notice on his return, but apparently met with so little success that I never heard from him, or from any one else on the subject. I therefore accepted an invitation to deliver a course of twelve lectures on Phrenology in Hartford, one of the two capitals of the state of Connecticut. Its population is about 10,000 persons, who are employed chiefly in trade. I am now preparing for my course.

Advertisements.—The "Courier and Enquirer" of New York, states, that, between the 14th September, 1838, and the 14th September, 1839, it published 143,428 new advertisements, or 464 a day!

The Banks.—The signs of coming adversity are thickening. The United States Bank continued selling bills of exchange on London at par ($9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.) when the banks in New York demanded and obtained 10 and $10\frac{1}{2}$, or from 10s. to 20s. per cent. of premium. This excited much speculation, and a new occurrence has raised this into astonishment. The United States Bank has lately sold its own post notes, payable at long dates, in Boston, to the extent of \$800,000, at a discount equal to 16 and 18 per cent. per annum. The sales were readily effected, as the credit of the bank was undoubted; but the seller proceeded to the Boston banks, in whose notes the purchases were paid for, and immediately drew specie from them for the whole amount! This, it is said, has been shipped to England to enable the bank's agent there to retire its drafts sold to the public at par! The effect has been to paralyse trade in Boston. The banks, drained of their specie, are contracting their issues, and fearing farther disasters. The shares of the United States Bank, which were lately sold at \$118 for the share of \$100, have now fallen to par.

Miss Martineau and the Ladies of Boston.—Miss Martineau has excited great indignation in New England by certain expressions in her book, which are here interpreted to amount to an accusation of drinking against the ladies of Boston. We have never seen any thing that could lead us to suspect the existence of such a vice; and have enquired what could give rise to the statement. One of our chance fellow-passengers, who is extensively acquainted in that city and New York, said that she knew some American ladies who indulge in as many as three glasses of wine after dinner, and then, by means of lavender and cordials, support a state of artificial excitement during the remainder of the evening. "This," she said, "I call drinking." I must leave the ladies to settle this delicate point among themselves; I can only testify that it was not my fortune to meet with any of these excited fair ones, in any part of New England.

Sept. 24. Ther. 46°. The Amistad Africans.—The case of the Africans, captured in the "long, low, black schooner" in Long Island Sound, is exciting an extraordinary degree of interest. The advocates of abolition represent them as heroes who have nobly risen against their oppressors, and recovered their freedom at the hazard of their lives; while the patrons of slavery designate them as pirates, murderers, and banditti, and call for their trial and execution. We visited them this day in the jail at Hartford, in which they have been placed, waiting the disposal of the courts of law. They are all young, and three of them are children. Several seemed to be in bad health, but the rest were robust and cheerful. They are genuine Africans, and little more than three months have elapsed since they left their native shores. Their heads present great varieties of form as well as of size. Several have small heads, even for Africans; some short and broad heads, with high foreheads, but with very little longitudinal extent in the anterior lobe. Their leader Cinquez or Jinquez, who killed the captain of the schooner, is a well made man of 24 or 25 years of age. His head is long from the front to the back, and rises high above the ear, particularly in the regions of Self-Esteem, and Firmness. The breadth is moderate, and Destructiveness is large, but not excessive. Benevolence and Veneration are well marked, and rise above the lateral organs; but the coronal region altogether is narrow. The anterior lobe also is narrow; but it is long from front to back. The middle perpendicular portion, including Comparison and Eventuality, is decidedly large. Individuality is full. The temperament seems to be nervous-bilious. This size and form of brain indicate considerable mental power, decision, self-reliance, prompt perception, and readiness of action.

The Supreme Court of Connecticut has just decided that it has no jurisdiction over these Africans, and that it lies within the district court to dispose of them. They are well treated, and defended by able counsel, who are paid by public subscriptions.

Sept. 25. Ther. 52°. The Militia.—There was a grand muster of militia here to-day. Some of the companies looked quite military, while others certainly were only citizen soldiers in appearance. The mounted officers, dressed in blue coats and white breeches, with abundance of lace, large cocked hats and white feathers, by dint of galloping and prancing supported their military pretensions extremely well. I feel a respect for citizen soldiers, notwithstanding their awkwardness, because they are powerless for evil and aggression, and become always the more formidable the more real occasion there is for their services.

The Late War.—These soldiers remind me of a "history of the late war (that of 1812) between the United States and Great Britain, by H. M. Brackenridge," which I have read. It is ably and temperately written. I heard a distinguished American citizen remark as follows in reference to this war: "We had abundance of provocation to justify it, but I never could help regretting the time we took to declare it. We had suffered great injuries both from the French and the British, which we had long submitted to; and there was something ungenerous to my feelings in our selecting that moment (the 19th of June, 1812) to commence it. Napoleon was then at the summit of his power, and was marching, as every one believed, to the subjugation of Russia, while England alone maintained the cause of humanity and freedom. We chose that moment to join the side of the conqueror, and throw our weight into the scale against Britain." This observation appeared to me to express admirably the real merits of the question which party was to blame for the commencement of that contest. The war itself was conducted by us in the worst spirit. The battles on the lakes, the bombarding and ravaging of the towns on the Atlantic coast, the burning of the Capitol at Washington, and the conflicts between single ships, chiefly frigates, had, every one of them, the tendency to inflict misery on individuals, and to kindle the most rancorous feelings between the nations, but to decide nothing. After having been on the field of some of these battles, and read the narratives of all of them, and having contrasted the small numbers of men engaged in them (from 500 to 3000), with the enormous extent of territory and resources of the United States and of Britain, they reminded me of nothing but two furious women scratching each other's cheeks and tearing each other's hair. They bore no reasonable relation to the only conceivable object of war, that of compelling either nation to yield. The attack by the British on New Orleans appears to me to have been the only part of their operations that was worthy of their fame; I mean the object aimed at in that enterprise, and not the manner in which it was conducted. If the British had captured New Orleans and closed the Mississippi, they might have occasioned serious embarrassment to the Americans; but, as far as I can discover, no other of their projects, although successful, would have carried any important consequences in its train. The command of the Canada lakes would have enabled them to defend that province, which, however, was in no danger from the Americans, for their force never was capable of making conquests. Victory on the lakes might have enabled the British to retard the settlement of some of the American western states, but only in a small degree, for these were accessible by the Ohio, the Mississippi, and the Wabash, independently of the lake navigation.

The British of those days seem to have been actuated by an unbecoming hatred and contempt of the Americans. This last feeling led to most of the defeats which they sustained, both by land and sea; and the same sentiment still lingers among many of the British aristocracy, who exercise a great influence over the destinies of England. I have already explained, that the Americans are really a war-loving, if not a warlike nation, and it would be well that the British understood their real character. It may appear to be an unpatriotic opinion, but my impression is, that, in a fair combat, either by sea or land, of man to man, and gun to gun, the Americans, after acquiring discipline and experience, would beat the British; and the reasons of my opinion are these:—The two nations belong to the same stock, and are equal in physical organisation. The instinct of self-preservation is the motive which induces men to shun danger and to run from a fight, and bravery is in proportion to the motives which can be thrown into the opposite scale. The masses which compose fleets and armies are drawn from the humbler classes of society. In Britain, these have little education, no sphere of political action, no influential compatriots to sound their praises or to cover them with shame on their return as conquerors or cowards. They have no field of ambition to excite their individual energies before they become soldiers or sailors, and when they have embraced these professions the road to high preferment is closed against them. Their motives to fight, therefore, are derived from their native force of character and discipline. In native qualities the Americans are their equals, and in all other motives, except discipline, their superiors. There is more mental activity, a greater range of interests and ideas, a more influential public opinion, and a far wider field of ambition, operating in the case of the American seaman, militia man, and volunteer, than in that of the British sailor or soldier. The discipline on shore will at first be inferior in the Americans; because the British constitution renders discipline almost natural to British soldiers, while that of America trains her population to an aversion to subordination. At the commencement of a war, therefore, the British, with equal numbers, will be more than a match for the Americans; but every day will diminish the disparity. The singular feature, in the case of the Americans, is, that victory or defeat equally tends to increase their belligerent efficiency. A large and influential portion of the people was at first opposed to the war of 1812 against England, and some of the New England states actually refused to march their militia towards Canada on the requisition of the general government; but first the triumphs of the American frigates, and finally the burning of the Capitol at Washington, and the ravaging of their coasts, rendered them not only unanimous but enthusiastically devoted to the war; and if it had continued longer, their energy and efficiency would have rapidly increased.

The Americans are engaged in avocations which prosper most in peace; they are devoted to gain, and averse to subjection to authority. As formerly observed, therefore, although they are full of warlike predilections, these circumstances present strong practical checks on their indulging in the gratifications of war. Add to these impediments the fact, that, after one of the political parties has identified itself with a war, its opponents will make "political capital" out of every thing connected with it; in other words, however just or necessary hostilities may be, they will operate on the feelings of the people against the war, for the sake of destroying their political adversaries. Thus, immediately after the commencement of a contest, and while it is yet known to the people chiefly in the form of burdensome taxes, interruption to trade, and destruction of credit, there will always be a powerful opposition to it, and great distraction in the national councils. At this stage of hostilities the United States government will appear powerless, and the union seem to be on the eve of dissolution; but only let the contest fairly begin, and let either victory or defeat visit the American arms, and in the exact ratio of the pressure from without will be the condensation of public sentiment within. In short, the American nation, like a steel spring, seems to have no energy, when it is fully expanded, but it gathers strength with every ounce of pressure that is applied to it. Its territory is so vast, and its climates so various, that it forms a world within itself; and although a European maritime war would cause great loss and misery to the Atlantic cities, it could not materially affect, far less permanently destroy, the general prosperity of the union.

I sincerely trust that the days of war between the United States and Britain are gone by, never to return; but if the mad passions of either should provoke hostilities, Britain seems to me to have only one course to pursue that will effectually lead to peace. She should act not only justly but generously in the conduct of the war, so as to enlist the sympathies of the good in America in her favour; she should avoid all petty attacks that would serve to irritate public sentiment without the possibility of producing any great results; never engage the Americans without a force sufficient to insure victory: block up their ports, and leave them without petty injuries to excite resentment, without victories to gratify national vanity, and without the pressure of external danger to alarm them for their national safety: in short, let the war be conducted as one of blockading on the sea coast, and self-defence in Canada, and not as one of attack and aggression, and the Americans will sooner come to reason under this administration than under any other. They will suffer loss and annoyance, and yet have no strong passion excited to counterbalance the irritation which these will produce. They are a people impatient of small evils, but capable of meeting great ones with a heroic spirit. They cannot aggressively injure Britain; for their whole institutions render them feeble for conquest; and their attempts on Canada, unless aided by the native population, would be easily repelled. Even should they conquer that province, it is more than probable that they would render as essential a service to the British nation as they did when they achieved their own independence. I repeat, however, that a war between these two nations would be a disgrace to the civilisation of the nineteenth century, and an event which every enlightened American and Briton must deprecate and deplore.

The New England Voice.—It has frequently been remarked, that the people of the New England states have a peculiar intonation of voice, which distinguishes them from Europeans and other Americans; but I have rarely found any of themselves who recognised the difference. They have occasionally asked me to define it, which it was not easy to do; but I found this method the shortest and most successful with them on this point. I said, "Do you discover that I am Scottish?" "Yes, very easily." "How?" "By your tone, accent, and manner." "Then, by the same means, I discover that you are Yankee; and your peculiarities are as strongly marked as mine." They comprehended this illustration at once. Their voice is nasal, hard, and unmusical, except when corrected by a refined education.

Sept. 27. Ther. 38°. Phrenology.—Dr. Brigham kindly undertook the arrangement of the course of lectures in Hartford. The number of lectures has been reduced from sixteen to twelve, of two hours each, and the fee from five to three dollars. I delivered the first lecture this evening, and the attendance was fifty subscribers, twenty visitors, and twelve complimentary hearers. At 6 P. M. the thermometer stood at 65°, a rise of 27° since the morning.

Sept. 29. Ther. 40°. Sunday.—We heard the Rev. Mr. Gallaudet preach a sound but moderate orthodox discourse in the Rev. Dr. Hawes' church. Dr. Hawes is a Presbyterian congregationalist, and has a large church, well filled, and a most respectable congregation. Connecticut has retained her Calvinism more unbroken than perhaps any other state in the union. There are now, however, both Unitarian and Universalist congregations within her boundaries. She is celebrated also for the severity of her ancient moral and religious code, known under the name of "the Blue Laws;" and although there has been a great relaxation in modern times, a trace of the olden spirit is still discernible. The 250th hymn, used in the church which we attended today, contains these lines:—

"Awake and mourn, ye heirs of hell;
Let stubborn sinners fear,
Ye must be driven from earth, and dwell,
A long forever, there.
See how the pit gapes wide for you,
And flashes in your face;
And thou, my soul, look downward too,
And sing recovering grace."

These lines embody the very soul of Destructiveness and Self-Esteem.

Education and Phrenology.—This state possesses a large school fund, the produce of western lands claimed by Connecticut under an old title, and allowed by congress; but she has yet made small progress in applying it systematically and with effect. The legislature, however, has appointed a superintendent of public schools; and Mr. Barnard, the gentleman who now holds the office, entertains enlightened views on the subject of education, and is anxious to improve not only the mode of teaching, but the things taught in the common schools of the state. He had heard of the value attached to my lectures on Phrenology in relation to education, in the three great cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and regretted that so small a number of the inhabitants of Hartford had taken an interest in them.

Several causes are mentioned as accounting for this circumstance. Two itinerant phrenologists have commenced lectures in Hartford since my course was announced; one of them lectures free, as an inducement to the people to pay him fees for examining their heads; and another admits the public at a very low price. The free lectures are crowded, and those for which a fee is demanded are slenderly attended. Besides these two, there have been other phrenological lecturers here during the summer, who have fleeced the people of their money, and left little knowledge in its stead. Farther, the people are accustomed to hear lectures free, and have no idea of paying any serious sum for instruction. They are treated to a new topic, if not a new lecturer, every night, and do not comprehend the advantage of following out any subject in a scientific form, through a series of lectures. Besides, they are all able to read and write; and between scraps of information picked up from these desultory lectures, from newspapers, and from the speeches of politicians, and the absence of any class possessing high literary or philosophical attainments, they believe themselves to be exceedingly well informed. Finally, the propagation of opinion, except on political subjects, is difficult and slow in the United States. Every state presents a focus of interests that engage the chief attention of its own citizens; while every town and hamlet has a set of particular interests that excite contests and discussions, and fill the local newspapers with small details. Hence, the great body of the people of Hartford, although readers of newspapers, seem to know little of the interest excited among the friends of education by my lectures in the large cities, although two of them, Boston and New York, are little more than a hundred miles distant from Hartford; or if they know, they pay little deference to the opinions expressed in these cities. I mention these facts, not from feelings of individual vanity or disappointment, but because they are illustrative of the condition of the public mind, and are not confined to Hartford, but are general over the union. I have found by experience, that moral opinion travels more rapidly and certainly in Great Britain and Ireland. So little progress has yet been made by the people of the United States in regard to a correct appreciation of what constitutes a good education, and of its value to them, that an opposition is at this moment hatching in Massachusetts against the Board of Education of that state. Some democratic politicians hope to catch a few votes by persuading the ignorant that that system of state education is an infringement of private rights; they maintain that a free people have a right to educate their children in their own way, without superintendence; for they cannot say that the Board of Education exercises any control over them; it has no power except that of moral suasion. The board may recommend, but cannot enforce any thing. Some divines also, I am told, in that state, are sounding the alarm among their flocks, that the Board of Education is the harbinger of infidelity.

Oct. 1. Ther. 32°. Phrenology.—Having been requested by Mr. Barnard to repeat my first and second lectures to the members of the Young Men's Institute, and to admit them to the course on reduced terms, I agreed to do so, and gave him carte blanche as to terms. This evening I delivered the first lecture to them free, and was honoured with an attendance of 360 ladies and gentlemen. Mr. Barnard addressed them after the lecture, told them that arrangements had been made, by which they might be admitted to the whole course on their paying one dollar, and the lecture-fund of the institute would pay fifty cents additional for each who should attend; and he recommended to them to avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing the philosophy of phrenology and its application to education explained.

Oct. 2. Ther. 40°. This evening I repeated my second lecture to the members of the Young Men's Institute, and thirty-five individuals attended.

The People of Connecticut.—In conversing with a gentleman from a neighbouring state about the population of Connecticut, I was told that their Calvinistic education, and external circumstances, had rendered them moral, industrious, and frugal; so much so that they are distinguished for the absence of serious crimes, for general propriety of deportment, and for the comfort and respectability of their outward circumstances; but that they are accused by their neighbours of some degree of narrow-mindedness. Like the Americans in general, however, although they are keen in the pursuit of wealth, and economical in its application, they are generous when an object which excites their sympathies is presented to them. They contribute handsomely to charitable institutions. Dr. Howe mentioned that he raised $1200 here very easily for the Institution for the Blind in Boston; and this year $2200 were raised by a "ladies' fair" for charitable purposes. Twenty hearers of a favourite minister subscribed $300, purchased a pianoforte, and presented it to his daughter. There is a "sewing society" also in this town, consisting of young ladies, who meet once a week at each other's houses, at 2 P. M., and sew and gossip till 7 o'clock, when a number of young gentlemen drop in and close the evening with music and a dance. They have adopted an orphan child, which is boarded, clothed and educated at their expense; their needlework providing the necessary funds. I was told that they avoid waltzing, and even playing waltzes, these being regarded as sinful.

Religious Denominations in Connecticut.—The population of this state is estimated at upwards of 300,000. Its sects are the following:—"The Congregationalists have 232 churches, 277 ministers, including 49 who have no pastoral charge, and about 40,000 communicants. The Calvinistic Baptists have 98 churches, 77 ordained ministers, 20 licentiates, and upwards of 10,000 communicants. The Episcopalians have 63 ministers, and about 7000 members. The Methodists had, in 1833, 40 ministers, and 7000 members. There is a considerable number of Universalist Societies, two Unitarian, two or three Roman Catholic, several Free-will Baptist, a few Friends, a few Sandemanians, and one Society of Shakers."—Chronicle of the Church, Newhaven, 18th Oct. 1839.

Oct. 4. Ther. 54°. The Politicians.—The Whigs and Democrats are equally dishonest as politicians; that is to say, they flatter, coax, and mislead the people to get into power; but they pass better laws, and act on purer principles, when assembled in the legislature, than any one could expect, judging from their conduct while candidates for office. The explanation is, that all profess the love of virtue and the people; and, when in power, they feel that any flagrant dishonesty, or unprincipled selfishness, would instantly be exposed by their opponents, and made use of as a lever to turn them out of place. The corruption, moreover, is chiefly in the towns. The farmers and country voters are deceived or misled, but not bribed. They look at the conduct of their rulers without bias or blind partiality; and even the most unprincipled politicians are afraid to commit too glaring iniquities before their eyes. In all the states this class is composed, to a great extent, of proprietors of the soil; and it forms a large proportion of the constituency of the whole United States. If it were better educated, it would serve as a sheet-anchor to their institutions; and, even in its present condition of imperfect enlightenment, it arrests the politicians of either party when their measures have obviously deviated too far from the line of common sense, and especially from that which leads to public prosperity.

Oct. 9. Ther. 48°. Fires.—There have been two enormous fires in New York and Philadelphia. The loss in New York is stated at one million, and that in Philadelphia at $1,400,000.

Mrs. Sigourney.—I borrow the following remarks from C——'s journal:—"We have several times seen Mrs. Sigourney, the American Hemans, and spent an evening at her house. Her history is very interesting, and would prepossess one in her favour, even although disjoined from the talents she has shown. She was a pattern of filial piety, and in the other relations of life has been not less exemplary. One evidence of her excellent qualities is presented by the many warm and sincere friends whom she has attached. Her appearance is pleasing, and her manners entirely natural and unassuming. Her talent for poetry was manifested at a very early age, and was promising even from the first, though a comparison of her juvenile productions with those of her matured intellect shows a considerable improvement. She resembles Mrs. Hemans in being eminently the poetess of the affections; every object and incident creative of human sentiment, or ministering to attachment, finds a responsive note on her truly sweet and feminine lyre. Her prose works, on education and other kindred topics, deserve, and have obtained, a conspicuous place in the literature of her country; and, whatever the merits of her writings may be comparatively with those of other authors, she may justly claim the praise of never having published a line which morality or gentle womanhood need blush to own. She conducts a periodical (an annual) named the 'Religious Souvenir,' of which I have not had an opportunity of judging; but it is popular, and, I believe, has a wide circulation."

Oct. 10. Ther. 54°. The Bank Suspensions.—News has arrived that the United States Bank, and most of the banks of Pennsylvania and Maryland, have suspended cash payments. The United States Bank stock has fallen to $97 in New York, and the utmost consternation prevails. In Hartford the public mind is quiet, and they have confidence in their own banks, but a deep anxiety is visible on the countenances of the men of property. The banks are prohibited by law from paying dividends during their suspension; and as the losses of the fire insurance companies will suspend their dividends, many persons whose capital is invested in the stocks of these institutions, will suffer great privation through the want of their incomes. Besides, the commercial transactions of the whole Union are deeply affected by the derangement of the exchange. The arrival of every post and steamboat from New York is watched with intense anxiety, to learn whether the banks in that city mean to suspend.

It may be proper to mention, for the information of readers who are not old enough to recollect the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England, that a bank-suspension does not necessarily imply a bankruptcy. The Pennsylvania banks proceed with their business as usual, only they decline to pay specie for their obligations. The consequence is, that their bank-notes are at eleven per cent. discount in New York, where the banks continue to redeem their obligations in specie.

The Deaf and Dumb.—I conversed with the Rev. Mr. Gallaudet, who for many years was the principal of the American Asylum for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb, about the mental condition of these individuals, and he dissented from Miss Martineau's views regarding them, expressed in one of her works on America. He considers that the knowledge which they possess, if they be well educated, is both extensive and precise; and that, if they be well trained, they are in general amiable and happy in their dispositions.

Phrenology: Natural Language.—Every propensity and sentiment of the mind, when predominantly active, produces a peculiar tone in the voice, expression in the eye and countenance, and also a peculiar attitude and gait. This is the natural language by which its activity is made known, and, when strongly marked, it is recognised and understood in all ages and countries. Lavater's system of physiognomy was founded on this fact in nature; but it was imperfect, because he did not know the primitive faculties which the various expressions noted by him indicated, and he also introduced, as signs of mental character, the hard parts of the face, which do not owe their form to the state of the brain. Phrenology reveals the functions of the primitive faculties, and enables us to connect peculiar expressions of voice, countenance, and gait, with the active condition of particular powers, and also of particular groups of them, and thus renders physiognomy, or natural language, a branch of the philosophy of mind. The Rev. Mr. Gallaudet, without the aid of phrenology, but from extensive practical observation and experience, has been led to the conclusion that these natural signs may be taught with manifest advantage to children in general, as a branch of education. In the Literary and Theological Review, No. II. for June, 1834, he published an article entitled "On the Language of Signs" as "auxiliary to the Christian Missionary." "It is quite practicable," says he, "to convey by the countenance, signs, and gestures, the import not only of all the terms employed to denote the various objects of nature and art, and the multifarious business and concerns of common life, but also those relating to the process of abstraction and generalisation, to the passions and emotions of the heart, and to the powers and faculties of the understanding; or, in other words, the language of the countenance, signs, and gestures, is an accurate, significant, and copious medium of thought. Instances have occurred in the instruction of the deaf and dumb, in which, in the space of two years, 5000 words have been taught to several intelligent pupils, who were previously entirely ignorant of them and of all language, excepting that of their own natural signs, together with a command of written language, which would place them on an equality, with regard to the expression of their ideas, with the most intelligent persons among those heathen nations who have nothing but an oral language."

These views are not, in his case, purely theoretical, but founded on experience. He adduces some examples in support of them. "In the summer of 1818, a Chinese young man passed through Hartford, Connecticut. He was so ignorant of the English language that he could not express in it his most common wants. As principal of the deaf and dumb asylum of that place, I invited the stranger to spend an evening within its walls, and introduced him to Mr. Laurent Clerc, the celebrated deaf and dumb pupil of the Abbé Sicard, and at that time an assistant teacher in the asylum. The object of this introduction was to ascertain to what extent Mr. Clerc, who was entirely ignorant of the Chinese language, could conduct an intelligent conversation with the foreigner by signs and gestures merely. The result of the experiment surprised all who were present. Mr. Clerc learned from the Chinese many interesting facts respecting the place of his nativity, his parents, and their family, his former pursuits in his own country, his residence in the United States, and his notions regarding God and a future state. By the aid of appropriate signs, also, Mr. Clerc ascertained the meaning of about twenty Chinese words." P. 201. I asked Mr. Gallaudet how he knew that Mr. Clerc's inferences were correct, and he told me that in this and all the other instances mentioned in the article in question, he had ascertained either from interpreters or dictionaries that they were so.

"About a year afterwards," he adds, "I visited Cornwall, in Connecticut, where upwards of twenty heathen youths were at that time receiving education under the patronage of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions." He propounded questions to them by signs. "For example: Thomas Hoopoo, a native of Owhyhee, was asked if his parents were living; how many brothers and sisters he had; when he left his native shores; whether his countrymen worshipped idols and sacrificed human victims; how the women were treated by the men; what was the climate of his country; what its productions; with many enquiries of a similar nature, all of which he well comprehended, and to many of which he replied by signs. The meaning, too, of a number of Owhyhean words was ascertained by signs merely, and found to correspond with the import which had been previously assigned to them in a dictionary which had been for some time preparing in the school; and, indeed, in a variety of instances, the most correct meaning of such words was established, by the medium of signs, in a more satisfactory way than had been previously attempted."

"Opportunities have occurred of intercourse by signs between the native Indians of our country, who have visited the institution for the deaf and dumb, and the instructors (of the pupils), the results of which, in a greater or less degree, have corresponded with those mentioned above."

"May not this curious language of signs and gestures be made subservient to the speedy acquisition of the oral language of people, who have no written or printed language, by the Christian missionary, or to the communication to them of his own language, or to their mutual intercourse with each other, not only on ordinary, but on the most momentous topics, even while they are entirely ignorant of each other's spoken language?"

To many persons these representations may appear almost incredible, but I obtained some explanations which render them more comprehensible. Mr. Gallaudet conversed by signs with the Africans of the Amistad, and learned many particulars of their history and opinions, and afterwards ascertained from an interpreter of their language that his inferences were correct. For example, to discover whether they recognised a God, he assumed the natural language of veneration, looked up as if beseeching and adoring, and pointed to the sky. "Goolly!" said the Africans, "Goolly, Goolly!" then, looking grave, they imitated thunder, uttering the words "Goolly -- Bung! Bung!" There could be no doubt that they gave their name for God.

The exposition of the natural language of the faculties given in my lectures, led to these remarks. Mr. Gallaudet considers that it would essentially benefit children to teach them the natural language of the faculties at the time when they learn to read. The meaning of many words, particularly those which signify emotions, could be conveyed to them more effectually by this medium than by any other. In exhibiting the natural language of any faculty, the faculty itself is called into action, and teaching the natural language will thus become an important auxiliary in training children to virtue. He has the testimony of his own experience in favour of this view. In showing to his deaf and dumb pupils the natural language of Benevolence, Veneration, and the other higher sentiments, he was conscious that these faculties became more active and were cultivated in himself. In his pupils the effect was equally decisive. When they were out of humour, the bland look of Benevolence, and the resigned expression of Veneration, if perseveringly exhibited to them, rarely failed to restore their equanimity and cheerfulness.

I owe to Mr. Gallaudet the first clear view of the importance of natural language in common education.

A great part of his natural language is the same with that taught by phrenologists, both being drawn from nature.*

Many years ago Mr. G. went to Edinburgh to study under Mr. Kinniburgh, the teacher of the deaf and dumb in that city; but Mr. Braidwood had placed him under a bond, with a large

* In visiting the institution for the deaf and dumb, I mentioned to Mr. Gallaudet that, when a boy attending the High School of Edinburgh, I had learned the finger-alphabet, and could use it readily, but that my mother had told me that speaking with the fingers was forbidden in Scripture, and I have given it up and forgotten it. He was surprised to hear of this prohibition; but he subsequently found the verse to which I alluded in Proverbs, ch. vi. v. 12—"A naughty person, a wicked man, walketh with a forward mouth. He winketh with his eyes, he speaketh with his feet, he teacheth with his fingers."

penalty, not to instruct teachers for eight years. He and the directors threw open the institution to Mr. Gallaudet, and allowed him to see every thing, including the lessons that were given to the pupils, but they observed the terms of the bond, and gave him no direct instruction. He then went to Paris and studied under the Abbé Sicard. His system of signs is described in the Encyclopædia Americana. Mr. G. prefers the single-hand alphabet. It is as precise and expressive as the double-hand alphabet, and can be used when one hand is disabled or otherwise employed.

Oct. 12. Ther. 48°. The Temperaments.—To-day I gave an exercise on the temperaments, which was well attended. The predominating temperaments were the sanguine-bilious and the nervous-bilious: There were a few instances of nervous-bilious-lymphatic.

Taxes.—The revenue of the general government of the United States is almost all derived from custom-house duties, the post-office, and sales of public lands. The taxes paid by the particular states, and also by the counties and townships, are raised in a very simple manner. Select men, or assessors, are appointed in different districts by the citizens. They estimate the whole property, real and personal, of each individual. In Connecticut the annual revenue of the property thus estimated is assumed to be six per cent., and the taxes are imposed in the form of an income-tax on it. The sum total of all the taxes payable in Connecticut, exclusive of the duties to the United States' government, amounts to about four per cent. on this estimated revenue. The select men are changed from time to time, and the circumstances of each citizen are so well known that the assessments on the whole are fairly imposed. The rule generally followed is to assume a pretty large amount of property to belong to each individual, and to leave him to prove by his books and affidavit that the estimate is too high. Assuming the whole free property of a citizen to amount to $20,000, or 4000*l*. sterling, the revenue of this sum at six per cent. would be $1200; four per cent. on which would amount to $48, or nearly 10*l*. sterling, being the aggregate amount of all the taxes on an income of 240*l*. sterling per annum.

Oct. 13. Ther. 54°. Sunday.—We heard a sound orthodox discourse in Dr. Hawes' Church from a young clergyman, but were disappointed in not hearing Dr. Hawes himself. An American gentleman, who had traveled much on the Continent of Europe, and to whom I remarked the similarity which exists between a Sunday in Scotland and in Connecticut, observed, that he had been much struck at first with the difference of a Continental Sabbath from both. If a French family, said he, of the most respectable character, should come from Paris to Connecticut, and follow here the practices which they had been accustomed to observe from their infancy at home on Sundays, they would, by our laws, be liable to fine and imprisonment, and if they did not take warning in time, they might, by an accidental outburst of popular feelings, be chased out of the state, or lynched! The kingdom of heaven, we may hope, will ultimately receive at least all the Christian nations, if not the whole family of mankind; and it appears strange that they should find it so difficult to tolerate each other's habits on earth!

Oct. 15. Ther. 51°. Effects of the Institutions of England and America.—I lately conversed with an American gentleman, the father of a family and the owner of a princely estate, all cleared and improved, on the different effects which the institutions of England and those of the United States produce on men placed in circumstances like his. We were led to the conversation by reading the remarks of Baron Perignon, in his "Vingt Jours à Londres," at the coronation of Queen Victoria, in which he says—"Here I make an observation which relates to the manners of this country of aristocracy and liberty, and which establishes an immense difference between them and the French. In France, the two cries of the Revolution were, no privileges (point de privilèges), equality for all (pour tous l'égalité.) In England, on the contrary, all is privilege, and one may almost say that there is no equality. In this country, each has his rank, each his caste—he looks above and below him, that he may not step too high, nor descend too low; and there is no condition, however bad it may be, in which he does not find something to satisfy his pride in being able to class himself above some other person." The "Court Journal" of 11th May, 1839, after quoting this passage, adds—"These remarks are certainly well founded. England is essentially an aristocratic country;—every class is an aristocracy of itself, forming, as it were, an 'imperium in imperio', preserving its own importance, and affecting an exclusiveness as respects those of lower station. It is the extensive prevalence of this principle that precludes the possibility of equality, and which is a bar to that familiarity which exists in France, and prevails, indeed, even between domestics and those they serve."

I asked my friend, who had been in Britain, what, if his princely domain had been situated in England, the great object of his ambition would have been? "Tell me your opinion first," said he. "Well, then," said I, "in all probability you would have been intriguing at court, or throwing your whole influence into the scale of one or other of the political parties, and bargaining for a peerage, to gratify your vanity. You would have executed an entail to transmit your property to your eldest son and his heirs;—and, in short, you would have been occupied chiefly with projects of private or family ambition." He replied, that "he could well understand the powerful influence of the English institutions in giving a selfish direction to the ambition of an individual placed in circumstances like his, and in inducing him to attempt to secure high rank to himself, and permanent wealth to his remote posterity; but that in the United States all such projects would be visionary dreams. Our institutions," he continued, "produce a higher aim. I know perfectly that, under them, my property must be divided. It will make all my own children rich; but it will be again subdivided among their children; and in less than a century it will, in all probability, have passed entirely into other hands, and no trace of it as a domain, or of us as a family, in the English sense, will be left. This makes me feel that I can best serve my posterity by employing my present influence in improving the institutions and general condition of my country. If the United States shall preserve their freedom, and increase in intelligence and virtue, as it is my earnest desire that they should do, then I know that my posterity will enjoy the best field for the exercise of their own talents and virtues, and that every one of them will command that extent of fortune, consideration, and happiness, which his qualities will deserve; and I desire for them no better inheritance."

In point of fact, the effect is precisely what is here described. This gentleman exercises a generous and refined hospitality, without pretension or parade, and devotes his time and fortune to the improvement of the public institutions of the state in which he resides. Among other objects, he has aided very efficiently the friends of education, in obtaining a law passed which provides for the establishment of a library in connection with every common school district. He appeared to me to be a nobler character than an Englishman scrambling for a peerage, as the reward of political subservency, to gratify his individual ambition.

The Eglington Tournament.—At the time when the preceding conversation occurred, the New York newspapers contained pretty extensive reports of the Eglington Tournament. The ordinary Americans, who have no distinct notion of the state of society in Britain, cannot comprehend it. How any men, not insane, could expend such large sums of money in such pure Tom-foolery, appears to them very mysterious. The intelligent Americans express their gratitude to Providence that they have no titled and wealthy aristocracy to play such childish and fantastic tricks, and ask me whether there are not numerous poor and ignorant persons in Scotland for whose instruction 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* might have been better employed than in getting up this pageant. "The tyranny of public opinion" would prevent any similar waste of resources in the United States, although individuals could be found willing to indulge in it.

Education in the State of New York.—One of the most common errors, in my opinion, committed by foreigners who write about America, as well as by the Americans themselves, is greatly to over estimate the educational attainments of the people. The provision in money made by the law for the instruction of all classes is large compared with such countries as Britain or Austria, but, contrasted with what is necessary to bestow a really good education on the people, it is still very deficient. The farmers, for example, are indisposed to dispense with the services of their older children, during the busy season of agricultural labour, nor are they generally in circumstances to admit of it. It is extremely difficult, therefore, to keep open district schools (except for very young children, taught by females for a small compensation) for more than four or five months in the year. A school district in the rural parts of New York state contains only from ten to twenty families. Allowing $350 or $400 per annum to be a moderate remuneration for a qualified teacher (and this is less than a carpenter or blacksmith would earn,) it is nearly impossible to raise this amount from so small a number of persons, most of whom are in moderate circumstances. At present, the sum raised for the salaries of common school teachers is only $12 50 cents (or 2*l.* 13*s.*) per month for each teacher, this being, according to the report of the superintendent of common schools, the average compensation given in the state of New York in 1836 to male teachers. If the people would have properly qualified teachers, the sum that would need to be raised is from $70 to $100 per month, for each of them, as the school term might be longer or shorter. This the people will not pay, and the consequence is, that the education received by probably nineteen twentieths of the children, in the agricultural districts, owing to the condition of most of the common schools, is defective in the extreme; nor can there be any decided improvement in the condition of the schools without an improvement in salary, and in the literary attainments and professional skill of the teachers.

To supply, in some degree, this great defect, a law was passed in the state of New York, about four years ago, empowering each school district in the state to tax itself to the amount of $20 for the first year, and $10 for each subsequent year, for the purchase of books for a district library. There are 10,207 districts in the whole state, and the work of forming these libraries is begun by the friends of education, and is a popular measure. Some of the clergy, however, object to it, because it appears to assume that "the mere intellectual instruction of a community will necessarily tend to reform that community," a principle which they do not admit.

Phrenology enables us to perceive that intellectual instruction will not cultivate the moral and religious sentiments, and that only sedulous training, added to intellectual instruction, will lead to virtuous conduct. The Americans need proper normal schools in which their teachers may be instructed in the philosophy of mind, and in the art of training and teaching, and they must also pay them handsomely, before they will command good education. If the Americans were animated by an enlightened patriotism, they would submit to a large taxation to accomplish this object, because on its fulfilment will depend the future peace and prosperity of their country.

A few years ago Mr. Robert Cunningham, formerly Principal of the Edinburgh Institution for Languages, Mathematics, &c. a full account of which is given in President Bache's interesting Report on Education in Europe, was compelled by the state of his health to relinquish his situation. Having spent his two months' vacation in 1835 in visiting the principal schools of Prussia, and the same period of the subsequent year in an educational tour in France and Switzerland, he had become deeply interested in the subject of Normal Schools, and on the failure of his health, partly with a view to its recovery, and partly in the hope of being instrumental in introducing Normal Schools into America, he visited the United States. After traveling over the Eastern and Middle States, and visiting the principal schools, he was induced, by the hope of carrying out his ulterior object, to accept an appointment as Professor of Ancient Languages in Lafayette College, Pennsylvania. Here he laboured for nearly two years, endeavouring by every means in his power to arouse public attention to the subject of Normal Schools, and to obtain support in carrying out his views. Disappointed in his expectation, he received in the interim an invitation to return to Scotland, and to become Rector of the Normal Seminary at Glasgow, at a salary of £300 ($1500) per annum, which situation he now fills with great credit to himself and advantage to his country. As similar institutions are much wanted in the United States, he has, at my request, kindly prepared for this work an interesting description of the one over which he presides.

* See the American Annals of Education, vol. vi. p. 441.

spoons, keys, &c., and pasting upon them labels with their names printed in raised letters. These she felt of very carefully, and soon, of course, distinguished that the crooked lines spoon, differed as much from the crooked lines key, as the spoon differed from the key in form.

"Then small detached labels, with the same words printed upon them, were put into her hands; and she soon observed that they were similar to the ones pasted on the articles. She showed her perception of this similarity by laying the label key upon the key, and the label spoon upon the spoon. She was encouraged here by the natural sign of approbation, patting on the head.

"After a while, instead of labels, the individual letters were given to her on detached bits of paper; they were arranged side by side, so as to spell book, key, &c.; then they were mixed up in a heap, and a sign was made for her to arrange them herself, so as to express the words book, key, &c., and she did so.

"Hitherto, the process had been mechanical, and the success about as great as teaching a very knowing dog a variety of tricks. The poor child had sat in mute amazement, and patiently imitated every thing her teacher did: but now the truth began to flash upon her—her intellect began to work—she perceived that here was a way by which she could herself make up a sign of any thing that was in her own mind, and show it to another mind, and at once her countenance lighted up with a human expression; it was no longer a dog, or parrot—it was an immortal spirit, eagerly seizing upon a new link of union with other spirits! I could almost fix upon the moment when this truth dawned upon her mind, and spread its light to her countenance; I saw that the great obstacle was overcome, and that henceforward nothing but patient and persevering, but plain and straightforward efforts were to be used.

"The result thus far is quickly related, and easily conceived; but not so was the process; for many weeks of apparently unprofitable labour were passed, before it was effected.

"When it was said above that a sign was made, it was intended to say that the action was performed by her teacher, she feeling of his hands, and then imitating the motion.

"The next step was to procure a set of metal types, with the different letters of the alphabet cast upon their ends; also a board, in which were square holes, into which holes she could set the types, so that the letters on their ends could alone be felt above the surface.

"Then, on any article being handed to her, for instance, a pencil, or a watch, she would select the component letters, and arrange them on her board, and read them with apparent pleasure.

"She was exercised for several weeks in this way, until her vocabulary became extensive; and then the important step was taken of teaching her how to represent the different letters by the position of her fingers, instead of the cumbrous apparatus of the board and types. She accomplished this speedily, and easily, for her intellect had begun to work in aid of her teacher, and her progress was rapid."

She had been six months at the institution, when her mother came to visit her.

"The mother stood some time, gazing with over-flowing eyes upon her unfortunate child, who, all unconscious of her presence, was playing about the room. Presently Laura ran against her, and at once began feeling of her hands, examining her dress, and trying to find out if she knew her; but not succeeding in this, she turned away as from a stranger, and the poor woman could not conceal the pang she felt, finding that her beloved child did not know her.

"She then gave Laura a string of beads which she used to wear at home, which were recognised by the child at once, who, with much joy, put them around her neck, and sought me eagerly, to say she understood the string was from her home.

"The mother now tried to caress her, but poor Laura repelled her, preferring to be with her acquaintances.

"Another article from home was now given her, and she began to look much interested: she examined the stranger much closer, and gave me to understand she knew she came from Hanover; she even endured her caresses, but would leave her with indifference at the slightest signal. The distress of the mother was now painful to behold; for, although she had feared that she should not be recognised, the painful reality of being treated with cold indifference by a darling child, was too much for a woman's nature to bear.

"After a while, on the mother taking hold of her again, a vague idea seemed to flit across Laura's mind that this could not be a stranger; she therefore felt of her hands very eagerly, while her countenance assumed an expression of intense interest—she became very pale, and then suddenly red—hope seemed struggling with doubt and anxiety, and never were contending emotions more strongly painted upon the human face; at this moment of painful uncertainty, the mother drew her close to her side, and kissed her fondly, when at once the truth flashed upon the child, and all mistrust and anxiety disappeared from her face, as with an expression of exceeding joy she eagerly nestled to the bosom of her parent, and yielded herself to her fond embraces.

"After this, the beads were all unheeded; the playthings which were offered to her were utterly disregarded; her playmates, for whom but a moment before she gladly left the stranger, now vainly strove to pull her from her mother; and though she yielded her usual instantaneous obedience to my signal to follow me, it was evidently with painful reluctance. She clung close to me, as if bewildered and fearful; and when, after a moment, I took her to her mother, she sprang to her arms, and clung to her with eager joy."

The parting scene evinced alike her tenderness, intelligence, and resolution.

"Laura accompanied her mother to the door, clinging close to her all the way, until they arrived at the threshold, where she paused and felt around, to ascertain who was near her. Perceiving the matron, of whom she is very fond, she grasped her with one hand, holding on convulsively to her mother with the other, and thus she stood for a moment—then she dropped her mother's hand—put her handkerchief to her eyes, and turning round, clung sobbing to the matron, while her mother departed, with emotions as deep as those of her child."

At the end of the year 1839, when she had been a little more than two years at the institution, her proficiency was thus described:—

"Having mastered the manual alphabet of the deaf-mutes, and learned to spell readily the names of every thing within her reach, she was then taught words expressive of positive qualities, as, hardness, softness; and she readily learned to express the quality, by connecting the adjectives hard or soft with the substantive; though she generally followed what one would suppose to be the natural order in the succession of ideas, by placing the substantive first.

"It was found too difficult, however, then to make her understand any general expression of quality, as hardness, softness, in the abstract. Indeed, this is a process of mind most difficult of performance to any, especially to deaf-mutes.

"Next she was taught those expressions of relation to place, which she could understand. For instance, a ring was taken and placed on a box, then the words were spelt to her, and she repeated them from imitation. Then the ring was placed on a hat, and a sign given her to spell; she spelt, ring on box—but being checked, and the right words given, she immediately began to exercise her judgment, and, as usual, seemed intently thinking. Then the same was repeated with a bag, a desk, and a great many other things, until at last she learned that she must name the thing on which the article was.

"Then the same article was put into the box, and the words 'ring in box' given to her. This puzzled her for many minutes, and she made many mistakes; for instance, after she had learned to say correctly whether the ring was on or in a box, a drawer, a hat, a bucket, &c., if she were asked, 'where is house, or matron,' she would say, 'in box.' Cross-questioning, however, is seldom necessary to ascertain whether she really understands the force of the words she is learning; for when the true meaning dawns upon her mind, the light spreads to her countenance.

"In this case, the perception seemed instantaneous, and the natural sign by which she expressed it, was peculiar and striking; she spelt on, then laid her hand on the other; then she spelt into, and enclosed one hand within the other.

"She easily acquired a knowledge and use of active verbs, especially those expressive of tangible action; as to walk, to run, to sew, to shake.

"At first, of course, no distinction could be made of mood and tense; she used the words in a general sense, and according to the order of her sense of ideas. Thus, in asking some one to give her bread, she would first use the word expressive of the leading idea, and say, Bread, give, Laura. If she wanted water, she would say, Water, drink, Laura.

"Soon, however, she learned the use of the auxiliary verbs, of the difference of past, present, and future tense. For instance, here is an early sentence: Keller is sick—when will Keller well; the use of be she had not acquired.

"Having acquired the use of substantives, adjectives, verbs, prepositions, and conjunctions, it was thought time to make the experiment of trying to teach her to write, and to show her that she might communicate her ideas to persons not in contact with her.

"It was amusing to witness the mute amazement with which she submitted to the process, the docility with which she imitated every motion, and the perseverance with which she moved her pencil over and over again in the same track, until she could form the letter. But when at last the idea dawned upon her, that by this mysterious process she could make other people understand what she thought, her joy was boundless.

"Never did a child apply more eagerly and joyfully to any task, than she did to this; and in a few months she could make every letter distinctly, and separate words from each other; and she actually wrote, unaided, a legible letter to her mother, in which she expressed the idea of her being well, and of her expectation of going home in a few weeks. It was indeed a very rude and imperfect letter, couched in the language which a prattling infant would use. Still it shadowed forth, and expressed to her mother the ideas that were passing in her own mind.

"She is familiar with the processes of addition and subtraction in small numbers. Subtraction of one number from another puzzled her for a time; but by help of objects she accomplished it. She can count and conceive objects to about one hundred in number; to express an indefinitely great number, or more than she can count, she says hundred. If she thought a friend was to be absent many years, she would say, will come hundred Sundays—meaning weeks. She is pretty accurate in measuring time, and seems to have an intuitive tendency to do it. Unaided by the changes of night and day, by the light, or the sound of any timepiece, she nevertheless divides time pretty accurately.

"With the days of the week, and the week itself as a whole, she is perfectly familiar. For instance, if asked what day will it be in fifteen days more, she readily names the day of the week. The day she divides by the commencement and end of school, by the recesses, and by the arrival of meal-times.

"Those persons who hold that the capacity of perceiving and measuring the lapse of time is an innate and distinct faculty of the mind, may deem it an important fact that Laura can evidently measure time so accurately, as to distinguish between a half and whole note of music.

"Her judgment of distances, and of relations of place, is very accurate. She will rise from her seat, go straight towards a door, put out her hand just at the right time, and grasp the handle with precision."

The first prodigious difficulties thus happily overcome, her progress during the last year, which completed the eleventh year of her age, was, of course, more rapid.

"A perceptible change has taken place in the size and shape of her head; and though unfortunately the measurement taken two years ago has been mislaid, every one who has been well acquainted with her, notices a marked increase in the size of the fore-

She is now just eleven years old; and her height is four feet four inches and seven tenths. Her head measures twenty inches and eight tenths in circumference, in a line drawn around it, and passing over the prominences of the parietal, and those of the frontal bones; above this line the head rises one inch and one tenth, and is broad and full. The measurement is four inches from one orifice of the ear to the other; and from the occipital spine to the root of the nose, it is seven inches.

"Nothing has occurred to indicate the slightest perception of light or sound, or any hope of it; and although some of those who are much with her, suppose that her smell is more acute than it was, even this seems very doubtful.

"It is true that she sometimes applies things to her nose, but often it is merely in imitation of the blind children about her; and it is unaccompanied by that peculiar lighting up of the countenance which is observable whenever she discovers any new quality in an object.

"The progress which she has made in intellectual acquirements, can be fully appreciated by those only who have seen her frequently. The improvement, however, is made evident by her greater command of language; and by the conception which she now has of the force of parts of speech, which last year she did not use in her simple sentences; for instance, of pronouns, which she has begun to use within six months. Last spring, returning fatigued from her journey home, she complained of a pain in her side, and on being asked what caused it, she used these words, Laura did go to see mother, ride did make Laura side ache, horse was wrong, did not run softly. If she were now to express the same thing, she would say, I did go to see mother, ride did make my side ache. This will be seen by an extract from one of her teachers' diary of last month:—Dec. 18th. To-day Laura asked me 'what is voice?' I told her as well as I could, that it was an impression made upon another when people talk with their mouth. She then said, 'I do not voice.' I said, 'can you talk with your mouth?' Answer, 'No.' 'Why?' 'Because I am very deaf and dumb.' 'Can you see?' 'No; because I am blind, I did not talk with fingers when I came with my mother, doctor did teach me on fork—what was on fork?' I told her paper was fixed on forks; she then said, 'I did learn to read much with types. Doctor did teach me in nursery. Druilla was very sick all over.'

"It will be observed that these words are all spelled correctly; and, indeed, her accuracy in this respect is remarkable. She requires to have a word spelled to her only once, or twice at most, and she will seldom fail to spell it right ever afterwards.

"She easily learned the difference between the singular and plural form, but was inclined for some time to apply the rule of adding s, universally. For instance, at her first lesson she had the words arm, arms, hand, hands, &c.; then being asked to form the plural of box, she said box s, &c., and for a long time she would form the plural by the general rule, as lady, lady s, &c.

"The word or, insignificant as it seems, has been a stumbling-block to Laura up to this day.

"With pronouns she had very little difficulty. It was thought best at first to talk with her as one does with an infant; and she learned to reply in the same way. Laura want water, give Laura water; but she readily learned to substitute the pronoun, and now says give me water—I want water, &c. Indeed, she will not allow persons to address her in the third person, but instantly corrects them, being proud to show her knowledge.

"She learned the difference between present and past tense the last year, but made use of the auxiliaries; during this year, she has learned the method of inflecting the verb. In this process, too, her perfect simplicity rebukes the clumsy irregularity of our language; she learned jump, jumped—walk, walked, &c., until she had an idea of the mode of forming the imperfect tense, but when she came to the word see, she insisted that it should be seed, in the imperfect; and after this, upon going down to dinner, she asked if it was eat—eated, but being told it was ate, she seemed to try to express the idea that this transposition of letters was not only wrong, but ludicrous, for she laughed heartily."

"The most recent exercises have been upon those words which require attention to one's own mental operations, such as remember, forget, expect, hope, &c.

"Greater difficulties have been experienced in these than in her former lessons, but they have been so far surmounted that she uses many words of this kind, with a correct perception of their meaning.

"Her idea of oral conversation, it seems to me, is that people make signs with the mouth and lips, as she does with her fingers."

"When Laura first began to use words, she evidently had no idea of any other use, than to express the individual existence of things, as book, spoon, &c. The sense of touch had, of course, given her an idea of their existence, and of their individual characteristics; but one would suppose that specific differences would have been suggested to her also; that is, that in feeling of many books, spoons, &c., she would have reflected that some were large, some small, some heavy, some light, and been ready to use words expressive of the specific or generic character. But it would seem not to have been so, and her first use of the words great, small, heavy, &c., was to express merely individual peculiarities; great book was to her the double name of a particular book; heavy stone was one particular stone; she did not consider these terms as expressive of substantive specific differences, or any differences of quality; the words great and heavy were not considered abstractly, as the name of a general quality, but they were blended in her mind with the name of the objects in which they existed. At least, such seemed to me to be the case, and it was not until some time after, that the habit of abstraction enabled her to apply words of generic signification in their proper way.

"This view is confirmed by the fact, that when she learned that persons had both individual and family names, she supposed that the same rule must apply to inanimate things, and asked earnestly what was the other name for chair, table, &c.

"The moral qualities of her nature have also developed themselves more clearly. She is remarkably correct in her deportment; and few children of her age evince so much sense of propriety in regard to appearance. Never, by any possibility, is she seen out of her room with her dress disordered; and if by chance any spot of dirt is pointed out to her on her person, or any little rent in her dress, she discovers a sense of shame, and hastens to remove it.

"She is never discovered in an attitude or an action, at which the most fastidious would revolt, but is remarkable for neatness, order, and propriety.

"There is one fact which is hard to explain in any way; it is the difference of her deportment to persons of different sex. This was observable when she was seven years old. She is very affectionate, and when with her friends of her own sex, she is constantly clinging to them, and often kissing and caressing them; and when she meets with strange ladies, she very soon becomes familiar, examines very freely their dress, and readily allows them to caress her. But with those of the other sex it is entirely different, and she repels every approach to familiarity. She is attached, indeed, to some, and is fond of being with them; but she will not sit upon their knee, for instance, or allow them to take her round the waist, or submit to those innocent familiarities which it is common to take with children of her age."

"She seems to have also, a remarkable degree of conscientiousness, for one of her age; she respects the rights of others, and will insist upon her own.

"She is fond of acquiring property, and seems to have an idea of ownership of things which she has long since laid aside, and no longer uses. She has never been known to take any thing belonging to another; and never but in one or two instances to tell a falsehood, and then only under strong temptation. Great care, indeed has been taken, not to terrify her by punishment, or to make it so severe, as to tempt her to avoid it by duplicity, as children so often do.

"When she has done wrong, her teacher lets her know that she is grieved, and the tender nature of the child is shown by the ready tears of contrition, and the earnest assurances of amendment, with which she strives to comfort those whom she has pained.

"When she has done any thing wrong, and grieved her teacher, she does not strive to conceal it from her little companions, but communicates it to them, tells them 'it is wrong,' and says, 'I am a poor love wrong girl.'

"It has been remarked in former reports, that she can distinguish different degrees of intellect in others, and that she soon regarded almost with contempt, a new comer, when, after a few days, she discovered her weakness of mind. This unamiable part of her character has been more strongly developed during the past year.

She is fond of having other children noticed and caressed by the teachers and those whom she respects; but this must not be carried too far, or she becomes jealous. She wants to have her share, which, if not the lion's, is the greater part; and if she does not get it, she says, 'My mother will love me.'

"Her tendency to imitation is so strong, that it leads her to actions which must be entirely incomprehensible to her, and which can give her no other pleasure than the gratification of an internal faculty. She has been known to sit for half an hour, holding a book before her sightless eyes, and moving her lips, as she has observed seeing people do when reading.

"Her social feelings, and her affections, are very strong; and when she is sitting at work, or at her studies, by the side of one of her little friends, she will break off from her task every few moments, to hug and kiss them with an earnestness and warmth that is touching to behold.

"When left alone, she occupies and apparently amuses herself, and seems quite contented; and so strong seems to be the natural tendency of thought to put on the garb of language, that she often soliloquises in the finger language, slow and tedious as it is. But it is only when alone, that she is quiet; for if she becomes sensible of the presence of any one near her, she is restless until she can sit close beside them, hold their hand, and converse with them by sign.

"She does not cry from vexation and disappointment, like other children, but only from grief. If she receives a blow by accident, or hurts herself she laughs and jumps about, as if trying to drown the pain by muscular action. If the pain is severe, she does not go to her teachers, or companions for sympathy, but on the contrary tries to get away by herself, and then seems to give vent to a feeling of spite, by throwing herself about violently, and roughly handling whatever she gets hold of.

"Twice only have tears been drawn from her by the severity of pain, and then she ran away, as if ashamed of crying for an accidental injury. But the fountain of her tears is by no means dried up, as is seen when her companions are in pain, or her teacher is grieved.

"In her intellectual character, it is pleasing to observe an insatiable thirst for knowledge, and a quiet perception of the relations of things. In her moral character, it is beautiful to behold her continual gladness, her keen enjoyment of existence, her expansive love, her unhesitating confidence, her sympathy with suffering, her conscientiousness, truthfulness, and hopefulness.

"No religious feeling, properly so called, has developed itself; nor is it yet time, perhaps, to look for it. But she has shown a disposition to respect those who have power and knowledge, and to love those who have goodness; and when her perceptive faculties shall have taken cognizance of the operations of nature, and she shall be accustomed to trace effects to their causes, then may her veneration be turned to Him who is almighty, her respect to Him who is omniscient, and her love to Him who is all goodness and love!

"Until then, I shall not deem it wise, by premature effort, to incur the risk of giving her ideas of God, which would be alike unworthy of his character, and fatal to her peace.

"I should fear that she might personify him in a way too common with children, who clothe him with unworthy, and sometimes grotesque attributes, which their subsequently developed reason condemns, but strives in vain to correct."

FEMALE EDUCATION.

A great deal has been said of the original difference of capacity between men and women; as if women were more quick, and men more judicious—as if women were more remarkable or delicacy of association, and men for stronger powers of attention. All this, we confess, appears to us very fanciful. That there is a difference in the understandings of the men and the women we every day meet with, every body, we suppose, must perceive; but there is none surely which may not be accounted for by the difference of circumstances in which they have been placed, without referring to any conjectural difference of original conformation of mind. As long as boys and girls run about in the dirt, and rundle hoops together, they are both precisely alike. If you catch up one half of these creatures, and train them to a particular set of actions and opinions, and the other half to a perfectly opposite set, of course their understandings will differ, as one or the other sort of occupations has called this or that talent into action. There is surely no occasion to go into any deeper or more abstruse reasoning in order to explain so very simple a phenomenon. Taking it, then, for granted, that nature has been as bountiful of understanding to one sex as the other, it is incumbent on us to consider what are the principal objections commonly made against the communication of a greater share of knowledge to women than commonly falls to their lot at present; for though it may be doubted whether women should earn all that men learn, the immense disparity which now exists between their knowledge, we should hardly think could admit of any rational defence. It is not easy to imagine that there can be any just cause why a woman of forty should be more ignorant than a boy of twelve years of age. If there be any good at all in female ignorance, this (to use a very colloquial phrase) is surely too much of a good thing.

Something in this question must depend, no doubt, upon the leisure which either sex enjoys for the cultivation of their understandings;—and we cannot help thinking, that women have fully as much, if not more, idle time upon their hands, than men. Women are excluded from all the serious business of the world: men are lawyers, physicians, clergymen, apothecaries, and justices of the peace—sources of exertion which consume a great deal more time than producing and rearing children; so that, if the thing is a thing that ought to be done—if the attainments of literature are objects really worthy the attention of females, they cannot plead the want of leisure as an excuse for indolence and neglect. The lawyer who passes his day in exasperating the bickerings of Roe and Doe, is certainly as much engaged as his lady who has the whole of the morning before her to correct the children and pay the bills. The apothecary, who rushes from an act of phlebotomy in the western parts of the town to insinuate a bolus in the east, is surely as completely absorbed as that fortunate female who is darning the garment, or preparing the repast of her Æsculapius at home; and, in every degree and situation of life, it seems that men must necessarily be exposed to more serious demands upon their time and attention than can possibly be the case with respect to the other sex. We are speaking always of the fair demands which ought to be made upon the time and attention of women; for, as the matter now stands, the time of women is considered as worth nothing at all. Daughters are kept to occupations in sewing, patching, mantua-making, and mending, by which it is impossible they can earn ten-pence a day. The intellectual improvement of women is considered to be of such subordinate importance, that twenty pounds paid for needle-work would give to a whole family leisure to acquire a fund of real knowledge. They are kept with nimble fingers and vacant understandings, till the season for improvement is utterly passed away, and all chance of forming more important habits completely lost. We do not therefore say that women have more leisure than men, if it be necessary they should lead the life of artisans; but we make this assertion only upon the supposition, that it is of some importance women should be instructed; and that many ordinary occupations, for which a little money will find a better substitute, should be sacrificed to this consideration.

We bar, in this discussion, any objection which proceeds from the mere novelty of teaching women more than they are already taught. It may be useless that their education should be improved, or it may be pernicious; and these are the fair grounds on which the question may be argued. But those who cannot bring their minds to consider such an unusual extension of knowledge, without connecting with it some sensation of the ludicrous, should remember, that, in the progress from absolute ignorance, there is a period when cultivation of mind is new to every rank and description of persons. A century ago, who would have believed that country gentlemen could be brought to read and spell with the ease and accuracy which we now so frequently remark,—or supposed that they could be carried up even to the elements of ancient and modern history? Nothing is more common, or more stupid, than to take the actual for the possible—to believe that all which is, is all which can be; first to laugh at every proposed deviation from practice as impossible—then, when it is carried into effect, to be astonished that it did not take place before.

It is said that the effect of knowledge is to make women pedantic and affected; and that nothing can be more offensive than to see a woman stepping out of the natural modesty of her sex, to make an ostentatious display of her literary attainments. This may be true enough; but the answer is so trite and obvious, that we are almost ashamed to make it. All affectation and display proceed from the supposition of possessing something better than the rest of the world possesses. Nobody is vain of possessing two legs and two arms;—because that is the precise quantity of either sort of limb which every body possesses. Who ever heard a lady boast that she understood French?—For no other reason, that we know of, but because every body in these days does understand French; and though there may be some disgrace in being ignorant of that language, there is little or no merit in its acquisition. Diffuse knowledge generally among women, and you will at once cure the conceit which knowledge occasions while it is rare. Vanity and conceit we shall of course witness in men and women as long as the world endures: but by multiplying the attainments upon which these feelings are founded, you increase the difficulty of indulging them, and render them much more tolerable, by making them the proofs of a much higher merit. When learning ceases to be uncommon among women, learned women will cease to be affected.

A great many of the lesser and more obscure duties of life necessarily devolve upon the female sex. The arrangement of all household matters, and the care of children in their early infancy, must of course depend upon them. Now, there is a very general notion, that the moment we put the education of women upon a better footing than it is at present, at that moment there will be an end of all domestic economy—women will once suffer women to eat of knowledge, the rest of the family reduced to the same kind of factory diet. These, and a number of other referable to one great and common error—that man does every thing, and that every thing is done by man;—nothing; and that every thing is done by positive institution, rather than by nature. Can any thing, for example, be more perfectly absurd than to suppose, that the perpetual solicitude which a mother children depends upon her ignorance of Greek and Mathematics; and that she would desert an infant for a quadratic equation? We seem to imagine, that we can break in pieces the solemn institution of nature by the little laws of a boarding-school; and that the existence of the human race depends upon teaching women a little more or a little less;—that Cimærian ignorance can aid parental affection, or the circle of arts and sciences produce its destruction. In the same manner, we forget the principles upon which the love of order, arrangement, and all the arts of economy depend. They depend not upon ignorance nor idleness; but upon the poverty, confusion, and ruin which would ensue from neglecting them. Add to these principles, the love of what is beautiful and magnificent, and the vanity of display;—and there can surely be no reasonable doubt, but that the order and economy of private life is amply secured from the perilous inroads of knowledge.

We would fain know, too, if knowledge is to produce such baneful effects upon the maternal and the household virtues, why this influence has not already been felt? Women are much better educated now than they were a century ago; but they are by no means less remarkable for attention to the arrangements of their household, or less inclined to discharge the offices of parental affection. It would be very easy to show, that the same objection has been made at all times to every improvement in the education of both sexes, and all ranks,—and been as uniformly and completely refuted by experience. A great part of the objections made to the education of women are rather objections made to human nature than to the female sex; for it is surely true, that knowledge, where it produces any bad effects at all, does as much mischief to one sex as to the other,—and gives birth to fully as much arrogance, inattention to common affairs, and eccentricity among men, as it does among women. But it by no means follows, that you get rid of vanity and self-conceit because you get rid of learning. Self-complacency can never want an excuse; and the best way to make it more tolerable, and more useful, is to give it as high and as dignified an object as possible. But at all events, it is unfair to bring forward against a part of the world an objection which is equally powerful against the whole. When foolish women think they have any distinction, they are apt to be proud of it; so are foolish men. But we appeal to any one who has lived with cultivated persons of either sex, whether he has not witnessed as much pedantry, as much wrongheadedness, as much arrogance, and certainly a great deal more rudeness, produced by learning in men than in women: therefore, we should make the accusation general—or dismiss it altogether; though, with respect to pedantry, the learned are certainly a little unfortunate, that so very emphatic a word, which is occasionally applicable to all men embarked eagerly in any pursuit, should be reserved exclusively for them: for, as pedantry is an ostentatious obtrusion of knowledge, in which those who hear us cannot sympathise, it is a fault of which soldiers, sailors, sportsmen, gamblers, cultivators, and all men engaged in a particular occupation, are quite as guilty as scholars; but they have the good fortune to have the vice only of pedantry,—while scholars have both the vice and the name for it too.—Rev. Sydney Smith.

MARGARET DAVIDSON.

There is no example on record of two such specimens, in the same family, of precocious genius, as Lucretia and Margaret Davidson. The following lines were composed by the latter on leaving her home, in the tenth year of her age:—

That dear old home, where passed my childish years,
When fond affection wiped my infant tears!
Where first I learn'd from whence my blessings came,
And lisped, in faltering tones, a mother's name!

That dear old home, where memory fondly clings,
Where eager fancy spreads her soaring wings;
Around whose scenes my thoughts delight to stray,
And pass the hours in pleasing dreams away!

Oh, shall I ne'er behold thy waves again,
My native lake, my beautiful Champlain!
Shall I no more above thy ripples bend
In sweet communion with my childhood's friend?

Shall I no more behold thy rolling wave,
The patriot's cradle, and the warrior's grave?
Thy mountains, tinged with daylight's parting glow?
Thy islets, mirror'd in the stream below?

Back! back!—thou present, robed in shadows lie,
And rise, thou past, before my raptur'd eye!
Fancy shall gild the frowning lapse between,
And memory's hand shall paint the glowing scene!

Lo! how the view beneath her pencil grows!
The flow'et blooms, the winding streamlet flows;
With former friends I trace my footsteps o'er,
And muse, delighted, on my own green shore!

Alas! it fades—the fairy dream is past!
Dissolved the veil by sportive fancy cast.
Oh why should thus our brightest dreams depart,
And scenes illusive cheat the longing heart?

Where'er through future life my steps may roam,
I ne'er shall find a spot like thee, my home;
With all my joys the thought of thee shall blend,
And join'd with thee, shall rise my childhood's friend.

The elder sister died when Margaret was in her second year. "On ascending the skies, it seemed," says her mother, "as if her poetic mantle fell, like a robe of light, upon her infant sister." Margaret died in 1838, aged fifteen years and eight months. The following is the affecting account giving in Mr. Irving's sketch of the last illness and premature death of this interesting girl, so gifted beyond the common allotment of human beings. A young brother had preceded her to the grave only a few months.

The anguish of the mother was still more intense, as she saw her bright and beautiful, but perishable offspring thus, one by one, snatched away from her. "My own weak frame," says she, (in a letter to Miss Sedgwick,) "was unable longer to sustain the effects of long watching and deep grief. I had not only lost my lovely boy, but I felt a strong conviction that I must soon resign my Margaret; or rather, that she would soon follow me to a premature grave. Although she still persisted in the belief that she was well, the irritating cough, the hectic flush, (so often mistaken for the bloom of health,) and hurried beating of the heart, confirmed me in this belief, and I sank under this accumulated load of affliction. For three weeks I hovered upon the borders of the grave, and when I arose, it was to witness the rupture of a blood vessel in her lungs, caused by exertions to suppress a cough. Oh! it was agony to see her thus! I was compelled to conceal every appearance of alarm, lest the agitation of her mind should produce fatal consequences.

"The best of medical aid was called in, but the physicians gave no hope; they considered it a deep-seated case of pulmonary consumption. All that could be done was to alleviate the symptoms, and protract life as long as possible by lessening the excitement of the system." When Mrs. Davidson returned to the bedside, after an interview with the physicians, she was regarded with an anxious, searching look by the lovely little sufferer, but not a question was made. Margaret seemed fearful of receiving a discouraging reply, and "lay, all pale and still, (except when agitated by the cough,) striving to calm the tumult of her thoughts," while her mother seated herself by her pillow, trembling with weakness and sorrow. Long and anxious were the days and nights spent in watching over her. Every sudden movement or emotion excited the hemorrhage. "Not a murmur escaped her lips," says her mother, "not during her protracted suffering. 'How are you, love! how have you rested during the night?' 'Well, dear mamma; I have slept sweetly.' I have been night after night beside her restless couch, wiped the cold dew from her brow, and kissed her faded cheek in all the agony of grief, while she unconsciously slept on; or if she did awake, her calm, sweet smile, which seemed to emanate from heaven, had, spite of my remembrance, lighted my heart with hope. Except when very ill, she was ever a bright dreamer. Her visions were usually of an unearthly cast; about heaven and angels. She was wandering among the stars; her sainted sisters were her pioneers; her cherub brother walked hand in hand with her through the gardens of paradise! I was always an early riser, but after Margaret began to decline, I never disturbed her until time to rise for breakfast, a season of social intercourse in which she delighted to unite, and from which she was never willing to be absent. Often when I have spoken to her, she would exclaim, 'Mother, you have disturbed the brightest vision that ever mortal was blessed with! I was in the midst of such scenes of delight! Cannot I have time to finish my dream?' And when I told her how long it was until breakfast, 'It will do,' she would say, and again lose herself in her bright imaginings; for she considered these as moments of inspiration rather than sleep. She told me it was not sleep. I never knew but one, except Margaret, who enjoyed this delightful and mysterious source of happiness, that one was her departed sister Lucretia. When awaking from these reveries, an almost ethereal light played about her eye, which seemed to irradiate her whole face. A holy calm pervaded her manner, and, in truth, she looked more like an angel who had been communing with kindred spirits in the world of light, than any thing of a grosser nature."

There seems, indeed, scarce any thing of earth in her compositions; all is heaven. Her juvenile poems, and even conversations, are but impressive joys and sympathies that gush out from the abundance of her inspirations. At three years, "the stars shone like the eyes of angels," and she prays God "to make her wings that she may fly to her departed sister." At eight years, a little piece to her brother begins with the following stanza:—

Yon island see! so fair and bright,
Like gems upon the azure sea,
The waters dance like forms of light,
And waft my brother dear from me.

"Her meekness and patience, and her even cheerful bearing, were unexampled. But when she was assured that all the tender and endearing ties which bound her to earth were about to be severed, when she saw that life and all its bright visions were fading from her eyes—that she was standing at the entrance of the dark valley which must be traversed in her way to the eternal world, the struggle was great, but brief—she caught the hem of her Saviour's robe, and meekly bowed to the mandate of her God. Since the beginning of August, I had watched this tender blossom with intense anxiety, and marked her decline with a breaking heart; and although from that time until the period of her departure, I never spent a whole night in bed, my excitement was so strong that I was unconscious of the want of sleep. Oh, my dear madam, the whole course of her decline was so unlike any other death-bed scene I ever witnessed; there was nothing of the gloom

CHAPTER XIX.

Oct. 17. Ther. 59°. Schools.—The secretary of the American Common School Society "estimates the total number of children in the United States between the ages of four and sixteen years at 3,500,000; and of this number 600,000 do not enjoy the benefits of a common school education." (Chronicle of the Church.)

Oct. 21. Ther. 38°. We attended the Episcopal church and heard Mr. Burgess preach. The church is well appointed and well filled, and the music was excellent. They use an improved prayer book.

Ridicule of Public Characters.—The Americans indulge extensively in ridicule of the governors and other men set in authority over them. The judges and clergy appear to be the only public characters who escape from this outrage. The practice exerts an evil influence on the minds of the people themselves. It diminishes their Veneration and fosters their Self-Esteem, and is without a shadow of apology. The subjects of despots are often forced, by an irresistible and irresponsible power, to groan under the administration of weak or wicked men, and have no means of escaping from their inflictions, or even of solacing themselves amidst their sufferings, except by venting their displeasure in satire and wit. In America the people choose their own magistrates of all grades; and in Connecticut the judges for a long series of years were nominated every six months, and even now they are elected annually. It seems a reasonable expectation that the electors should reverence the objects of their own choice, at least while they permit them to retain power; but the minority, who do not concur in the appointment, take revenge for their disappointment by lampooning the individuals who have obtained the suffrages of the majority. They plead the example of England in extenuation of this conduct. In England, the person and character of the sovereign are sacred by law, but the ministers are delivered over to the public as objects of unbounded invective and derision. In the United States, the people themselves are the sovereigns, and they are as sacred as the queen in England. No newspapers, or orators, dare to proclaim their ignorance, their fickleness, their love of money, or any of their other imperfections. The president of the Union and the governors of the states are merely their executive magistrates or ministers, and, like their prototypes in Britain, they are abandoned to the abuse and ridicule of all.

Salaries of the Judges.—The judges of Connecticut, as before mentioned, were for many years elected by the people half-yearly, and now they are elected annually. So forcibly, however, does habit, and the tendency to acquiescence in established arrangements operate, that the judges are regularly re-elected, and are allowed to serve till they reach seventy years of age, when they are no longer eligible. In fact, an annual appointment is very nearly as secure a tenure of office as one for life, unless the incumbent be guilty of glaring incapacity or misconduct. The salaries, however, in this state are so small that they present no temptation to a lawyer, in even moderate practice, to leave the bar and ascend the bench. The chief justice receives only $1100 per annum of salary, and the four associate justices $1050 each. The salary of the governor of the state is $1100. An instance occurred, not many years ago, of a chief justice, a man of talent and high legal accomplishments, whose family increased to such an extent, that he could not maintain and educate them on his salary. He resigned his office, returned to the bar, and speedily doubled or tripled his income. The Americans respect men of wealth; and as there are now many persons in Connecticut, in no very exalted station, whose incomes are double or triple those of the judges, the latter are liable to be looked down on by vulgar minds on account of their poverty. They are also unquestionably open to strong influences from popular opinion. Nevertheless, the testimony of good and able men here is strong in favour of their intelligence, uprightness, and independence.

Slavery.—I conversed with a gentleman who passed a winter in Bermuda, when there were many Negro slaves on the island. None, however, had been imported for more than fifty years before the time of his visit, and during that interval they had been educated, well treated, and employed as pilots, and in other offices of trust. He said that they were finely-formed men, their features had improved, and their countenances had lost the heavy African expression. They not only looked but actually were intelligent. This shows the capability of the Negro race of improvement by cultivation.

Washington College.—This is the name of the college in Hartford. In 1840 the number of students was—resident graduates, 13; seniors, 14; juniors, 13; Sophomores, 29; freshmen, 14. Total, 83.

Oct. 22. Therm. 22°. State Prison at Weathersfield.—To-day I visited this state prison, situated a few miles from Hartford, with six or seven gentlemen who have attended my lectures. Among them were the Rev. Principal Totten of Washington College, the Rev. Mr. Gallaudet, Dr. A. Brigham, and others. It is conducted on the principles adopted in the state prisons at Boston and Auburn already described. There are nearly 200 prisoners at present on the books. They sleep in separate cells, but labour in large workshops, back to back, and in presence of keepers, who prevent speech or communication. The prison yields about $7000 per annum of profit to the state, a satisfactory proof that it is managed with vigour and economy. I here learned a curious fact illustrative of the Connecticut character. By the existing statutes, adultery is a crime punishable by three years' imprisonment and hard labour in the state prison. The law is rarely executed against ladies and gentlemen who go astray; but when an idle pauper becomes a burden on the city's funds, it is not uncommon to permit a few facilities for the commission of this crime to encompass him;—if he err he is tried, condemned, and sent to the state prison, where his morals are corrected, and he is forced to maintain himself.

Moral Responsibility.—In the course of my lectures in Hartford, I had stated and illustrated the difference between the heads of men who are habitual criminals, and those who are virtuously disposed, and impressed on the minds of my audience the peculiar forms and proportions of the animal, moral, and intellectual regions of the brain which distinguish these two classes, and also those which are found in the intermediate class in whom the three regions are nearly in equilibrium. Mr. Pillsbury, the superintendent of the prison, brought a criminal into his office, without speaking one word concerning his crime or history. I declined to examine his head myself, but requested the gentlemen who accompanied me to do so, engaging to correct their observations, if they erred. They proceeded with the examination, and stated the inferences which they drew respecting the natural dispositions of the individual. Mr. Pillsbury then read from a manuscript paper, which he had prepared before we came, the character as known to him. The coincidence between the two was complete. The prisoner was withdrawn, another was introduced, and the same process was gone through, with the same result in regard to him. So with a third, and a fourth. Among the criminals, there were striking differences in intellect, and in some of the feelings, which were correctly stated by the observers.

These experiments, I repeat, were made by the gentlemen who accompanied me, some of whom were evangelical clergymen, of the highest reputation. They inferred the dispositions from their own perceptions of the forms of the heads. They recognised the great deficiencies in the moral organs, and the predominance of the animal organs, in those individuals whom Mr. Pillsbury pronounced to be, in his opinion, incorrigible; for the question was solemnly put to him by Dr. Brigham, whether he found any of the prisoners to be irreclaimable under the existing system of treatment, and he acknowledged that he did. One of the individuals who was examined had been thirty years in the state prison, under four different sentences, and in him the moral region of the brain was exceedingly deficient. I respectfully pressed upon the attention of the reverend gentlemen, that the facts which they had observed were institutions of the Creator, and that it was in vain for man to be angry with them, to deny them, or to esteem them of light importance.

Mr. Pillsbury added that he could not trace above one in fifty criminals who was thoroughly corrected, and the reformed were young offenders committed for not less than five years for the first time. A shorter confinement led them directly back to crime. More offenders against the person than against property are reformed.

In treating of the difference between the functions of Individuality, which observes things that exist, and those of Eventuality, which observes motion, or active phenomena, I had mentioned in my lectures that a spectator of a military review, who has large Individuality and small Eventuality, will observe and remember the details of the uniforms, and other physical appearances of the men, but overlook and forget the evolutions; while another spectator with large Eventuality and deficient Individuality will observe and recollect the evolutions, but overlook and forget all the minute particulars in dress and appearance. It having been observed that Mr. Pillsbury's head presented this last combination, Mr. Gallaudet, without giving any explanation of his object, asked him whether in seeing a review, he would observe and recollect best the appearance of the men or the evolutions. He replied instantly, "The evolutions."

Oct. 23. Ther. 32°. The Bearing of Phrenology on Scripture.—The facts before mentioned have led several members of my class to serious reflections on the relation between Phrenology and the prevalent interpretations of Scripture. I have repeated to them what I have said to all others, that Nature will not bend, nor will she cease to operate, and that if they discover any discrepancies between her truths and their own interpretations of the Bible, these interpretations must be corrected and brought into harmony with nature.

I afterwards learned that a relaxation of the principles of Calvinism has already taken place in the theology of Connecticut, which renders the views of the human mind presented by Phrenology less formidable to the divines of that state than to those of the Church of Scotland. Dr. Taylor, Professor of Divinity in Yale College, celebrated as one of the most orthodox institutions in the Union, has for some years abandoned the doctrine of the total corruption of human nature, and been supported by a large majority of the clergy of the state. Dr. Tyler now leads the orthodox, or total-corruption party, and has been enabled to found a new theological seminary at Windsor, on the Connecticut, which numbers seventeen or eighteen students. I have looked into the controversy on this subject, and find the following statement of Dr. Taylor's views given by himself in a letter addressed to Dr. Hawes, of Hartford, dated the 1st of February, 1832:—

"I do not believe," says he, "that the posterity of Adam are, in the proper sense of the language, guilty of his sin; or that the ill-desert of that sin is truly theirs; or that they are punished for that sin. But I do believe, that, by the wise and holy constitution of God, all mankind, in consequence of Adam's sin, become sinners by their own act.

"I do not believe that the nature of the human mind, which God creates, is itself sinful; or that God punishes men for the nature which he creates; or that sin pertains to any thing in the mind which precedes all conscious mental action, and which is neither a matter of consciousness nor of knowledge. But I do believe that sin, universally, is no other than selfishness, or a preference of one's self to all others—of some inferior good to God; that this free voluntary preference is a permanent principle of action in all the unconverted, and that this is sin, and all that in the Scriptures is meant by sin. I also believe, that such is the nature of the human mind, that it becomes the occasion of universal sin in men in all the appropriate circumstances of their existence; and that, therefore, they are truly and properly said to be sinners by nature."

The phrenological doctrine, that every faculty is manifested by a distinct organ; that the Creator constituted the organ, and ordained its functions; that therefore each is good in itself, and has a legitimate sphere of action; but that each is also liable to be abused, and that abuses constitute sin, approaches closely to Dr. Taylor's views, as expressed in the preceding letter. There is a general opinion abroad that Dr. Taylor is still progressive in his opinions, and that he will announce farther modifications of Calvinism. Those who embrace liberal opinions in theology say, that they expect him still farther to purify the faith of Connecticut; while those who adhere to the ancient creed express their fears that the extent of his backslidings is not yet fully developed.

Oct. 24. Ther. 51°. The Hartford Retreat.—This is a lunatic asylum beautifully situated, and having 17 acres of ground attached to it. The patients perform no labour, and the classification is very imperfect; nevertheless Dr. Fuller the physician mentioned that the cures amount to 90 per cent. of the recent cases. He told me that a part of the head which he had pointed out (Concentrativeness) is always small in the incurably insane, or that it becomes small if the disease be continued; and that, when that part is large, he expects recovery. This was new to me, and I record it, to call the attention of phrenologists to the subject. Dr. Brigham, who accompanied me, pointed out a case of mania proceeding from disease of the cerebellum, which he had successfully treated by local depletion in that region.

Oct. 25. Ther. 48°. Phrenology.—I delivered the last lecture of my course, and a committee was appointed to present resolutions.

Oct. 26. Ther. 47°. The committee waited upon me, and presented the resolutions. Tickets were, at my request, presented to the editors of all the periodicals published in Hartford, who, as I was informed, attended the lectures. They did not, so far as I observed, notice them during their progress, and I was told that the cause of their silence was the fear of giving offence by either approving or disapproving. After the close of the course, "The Congregationalist" printed a favourable notice, but avoided offering any opinion on the merits of Phrenology.

The Deaf and Dumb Institution.—We visited this institution along with Mr. Gallaudet. The United States' government gave a donation in its favour of a township of land in Alabama, which has been sold, and the proceeds invested; and it is thereby enabled to provide food, lodging, and tuition, for its pupils, for the annual payment by each of $100, or 20*l.* sterling. Mr. Gallaudet called our attention to the happy expression of the countenances of the pupils, and again differed from Miss Martineau in his opinion of the mental condition of the deaf and dumb. He regards it quite possible, when their natural talents and dispositions are good, to educate them, and to train their dispositions thoroughly. We saw them perform a variety of exercises, indicating great intelligence and mental resources.

I gave Mr. Gallaudet the proposition, that, "many years ago, Columbus discovered America," to be communicated by signs merely, without finger-spelling or the use of any language except that of the countenance and gestures, to his former pupil David. In our presence he made a variety of signs, and David wrote, "A long time ago Columbus sailed west and discovered America." The communication made to David was, that, "a long time ago a great man sailed west," &c.; he supplied the name from his general reading. Mr. G. next mentioned to us, that he would communicate by signs also, without words, that "the American leaders signed the Declaration of Independence." He made a variety of gesticulations, and David wrote, "John Hancock advised them to make war with England and be independent." David has a large anterior lobe of the brain and very large organ of Imitation, with an excellent development of the moral organs, and a sanguine and nervous temperament. He is now one of the assistant teachers of the institution, and supports his aged mother out of his salary. When he was a child, she lamented over his deafness, and regarded him as her greatest burden. He is now her only stay.

We saw also Julia Brace, who is blind, deaf, and dumb. The anterior lobe of her brain is well developed, indicating natural intellectual talent, but the coronal region is rather deficient. She has great acuteness in smell and touch; and delivered our handkerchiefs to us by smell, after they had been mixed, and we had changed places. She examined C——'s dress from her bonnet to her shoes, most carefully, by touch. She dresses herself, makes her own bed, and does up her own hair; but she has received very little instruction, and seems unhappy. She has neither occupation nor amusement. As she has large organs of Time, I recommended that she should be taught to beat time for her entertainment. The deaf and dumb pupils here dance with pleasure and success.

Oct. 27. Ther. 53°. The Pulpit.—To-day we heard the Rev. Dr. Hawes preach. His text was in Matthew, vi. 19. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth," &c. He is the eminent Congregationalist minister to whom Dr. Taylor's letter before quoted was addressed. He agrees with Dr. Taylor in his opinions about original sin. He preached a bold, liberal, and practical sermon, in relation to the commercial crisis which has just occurred. He told his congregation that a character made up of deep anxieties about dollars and cents could not be pleasing to God; that the wealth of many of them was about to be swept away; and that, from their natural reluctance to part with it, strong temptations to act dishonestly would arise; but he exhorted them to part with all freely except their integrity. God required them to pay all they owed, to the last cent, and if they did so, so far as they had the means, and preserved their honour, they would be more worthy than if they parted with conscience, and had the whole world as their own. He said that there is something fundamentally wrong in the "credit system" of this country. Only one young man in twelve who begins business in New York succeeds and becomes rich: the rest pass through speculation and various fortunes to bankruptcy and ultimate ruin. "The crash which is now heard at a distance will soon reach you, and the labouring poor will be thrown out of employment, and they must rely on you for subsistence. The missionaries whom you have sent abroad will look to you for a continuation of your supplies; you must not abandon them in the wilderness. You can answer these calls only by retrenchment. Calculate the sums you spend on sumptuous clothing, elegant furniture, and costly entertainments, and lop off part in time, and prepare the saving for these calls. Do not despond. When all your accumulations are gone, you will have your fertile land, your bright sun, your strong arms; and if you preserve also a pure conscience, you will still have the best blessings of life, and you know that God will never cease to be gracious." This is merely a faint outline of the discourse, written down from memory after my return home from the church. In tone, matter, and manner, it was bold, searching, honest, yet sympathetic and encouraging—such, in short, as sermons should generally be. It bore the directest reference to real life, and applied Christianity to practical duties. Instead of being forgotten as soon as uttered, as many sermons are, my impression is that it will be distinctly remembered in Hartford long after the present day.

Hartford.—The situation of Hartford is very beautiful, and many of the citizens live in detached villas surrounded by grass plots and shrubberies, situated on gentle eminences commanding extensive views of the valley of the Connecticut and the hills by which it is bounded. The custom of being over-housed is said to prevail here extensively. I was told that the annual expenditure in many of these large and handsome villas will not exceed $1500 (£300 sterling) per annum. In England they would suffice for the accommodation of families possessing £1500 or $7500 a year.

Oct. 28. Ther. 48°. We left Hartford with sincere respect for the kind friends whose society we had enjoyed, and, at 2 P. M., sailed up the river for Springfield. The water in the Connecticut is now very low, and, although the steamboat is small and draws little water, we could not pass the rapids, but entered and passed through a canal six miles long. We rose by three locks of ten feet in height each, and again entered the river. The steamboat has its wheel and paddles in the stern. In the canal we moved at the rate of six miles an hour, and the surge was not greater than I have seen raised by a tow-boat going at the same rate. For ten days past the weather has been, and still continues to be, clear, calm, and mild. The rich tints of autumn render the woods gorgeously beautiful, and the whole scenery is exceedingly picturesque. We arrived at Springfield at half-past six.

Oct. 29. Ther. 40°. To Worcester and Boston.—This day, at half-past eleven, we started for Worcester by the railroad, which has been opened since we traveled to Springfield a month ago. Yesterday a stray horse had its legs and head cut off on this railroad by the engine, and the night before a cart had left a cart with stones standing on the track, against which a train loaded with merchandise had run in the dark and been smashed to pieces. We hoped to be more fortunate, and were so; but, although we encountered no danger, our patience was sufficiently tried. About ten miles from Springfield we came to a dead "fix," and the whole train stood motionless for three long hours, enlivened only by occasional walks in the sunshine, and visits to a cake store, the whole stock of eatables in which was in time consumed, the price of them having risen from hour to hour in proportion to the demand. The advance was equal to at least 250 per cent. between the first sales and the last. The cause of our detention was the non-arrival of the train from Worcester, which, from there being only a single track of rails, could pass our train here and nowhere else. We heard nothing of its fate, and expected it to arrive every minute till four o'clock, when at last an express on horseback came up, and announced that it had broken down, but that it was now cleared off the rails, and that we might advance. Again I admired the patience and good humour of the American passengers, which never forsook them in all this tedious detention. A clergyman, of some pretty liberal sect, but whose name I did not learn, knew me, and spent two hours of this time in discussing the attributes, power, and foreknowledge of the Deity—the laws of nature and Phrenology—often in language to which I could attach no definite ideas. When he raised his hat, I saw that he possessed very moderate organs of Causality; yet he was acute in all the perceptions that related to Individuality and Eventuality: he seemed also to be sincere and amiable; and, having a high nervous temperament, he delighted in metaphysical discussions, although he was not fitted by nature to excel in this field of philosophy. At 6 P. M. we arrived at Worcester; but here we found ourselves in another "fix." The afternoon train from Boston does not arrive till 7 P. M., and we could not proceed to that city until it appeared. It was now dark, and for another hour and a half the passengers sat with exemplary patience in the cars. At half-past seven P. M. we started again, and arrived in Boston, without farther impediment, about ten o'clock, with pretty good appetites, as we had breakfasted at half-past seven in the morning, and been allowed no meal since that hour. The car was seated for fifty-six passengers, and contained at least thirty. There was no aperture for ventilation, and, when night came, the company insisted on shutting every window to keep out the cold. A few who, like us, preferred cool air to suffocation, congregated at one end, where we opened two windows for our relief.

Oct. 30. 1840. Ther. 40°. Boston.—Phrenology.—Some weeks ago the friends of education in Boston sent me an invitation to return and deliver a second course of lectures on Phrenology, in this city; and they have secured an audience, hired a chapel, in Philip's Place, Tremont street, and made all other necessary arrangements for my accommodation.

Education.—A course of weekly lectures is now in the progress of being delivered gratis by the educated gentlemen of Boston to the assistant teachers of the common schools. To-day, we heard Mr. Mann deliver an excellent address on "corporal punishment." The hall in Tremont Row was crowded. He drew a striking picture of the different mental conditions of the children who are assembled in the common schools. They not only differ in their natural dispositions, but at home some may have been spoiled and indulged in their every whim; others may have been taught by example to swear, to lie, and to steal; others may have been beaten unmercifully and capriciously, and have known no law except that of force. The schoolmaster is called on to reduce this mass of discordant elements to order, and to infuse into it the spirit of disobedience, attention, exertion, self-command, and mutual respect. He did not think that in the present state of the civilisation of Boston, corporal punishment could be entirely dispensed with in common schools. He, however, deprecated its excessive use. There were teachers, he said, who, if consulted about the situation of a school-house, would plant it at the side of a birch-grove, "not for the sake of the shade, but of the substance." In his view, the minimum of infliction would indicate the maximum of qualification in the teacher for his duties. He recommended that corporal punishment should always be inflicted in private, because the imagination exaggerates its terrors, while familiarity lessens them: that the rod should be used in solemnity and sorrow, and never in passion; and that the quantity of punishment should be such as to render it a real chastisement, but never cruel. He entered into a philosophical exposition of the objects of punishment, and of its effects on children of different natural dispositions. His discourse contained, also, admirable illustrations of his principles, in which wit and logic were gracefully combined, and the whole was interspersed with passages of touching eloquence. Altogether the lecture was a moral and intellectual treat.

The Sub-Treasury Law.—I have repeatedly expressed my humble opinion that the democratic party is in the right with regard to instituting a national treasury, with sub-treasurers, in various parts of the union, who shall receive the revenue of the United States in specie, and lock it up in strong boxes until needed, and who shall be punished as felons if they embezzle any part of it. They are labouring hard, through the newspapers, in the speeches of their orators, and by lectures specially devoted to the subject, to unfold to the public the principles which regulate the currency, the evils of excessive bank issues, and irredeemable paper; and, altogether, they afford on this subject an example of sound sense, real patriotism, and respect for the understandings of the people, which cannot be sufficiently commended. The whigs meet their arguments by declamations about the evils into which the democrats have brought the country; they ascribe the present universal derangement of the currency, the stagnation of trade, and the general bankruptcy which prevails, to the "hard cash" principles of Van Buren and his party; and promise them "credit," wealth, and plenty, if they will turn the democrats out of office and put them in. The imperfectly educated people understand little of abstract reasoning; they are rarely capable of tracing a principle in political economy through present evil to distant good, while they are captivated by promises of future prosperity, and readily believe in what they wish to be true, viz. that whig rule will restore banks, credit, wealth, and general happiness. They are going rapidly round to the whig side.

Nov. 3. Ther. 38°. We went to Dr. Channing's church in Federal street to-day, Sunday, but he did not preach. A stranger officiated in his stead. As soon as the sun sets, we hear the piano fortes, and the ladies' voices singing in full activity. Dr. Tuckerman, well known for his highly philanthropic exertions in consoling and reclaiming the vicious poor of Boston, is extremely ill of consumption, and we were not allowed to see him when we called. He is much esteemed, and his illness is deeply regretted.

Nov. 5. Ther. 27°. Orestes Augustus Brownson.—This gentleman was originally a preacher, and afterwards became a politician; and his mental fertility and originality are so great that, two years ago, he established "The Boston Quarterly Review" to afford a vent for his thoughts. He has not only conducted, but essentially written it since. In his eighth number for October 1839, an article appeared on the "Education of the People." "Religion and politics," says he, "do in fact embrace all the interests and concerns of human beings, in all their multiplied relations." * * "If, then, we are to have in the commonwealth a system of popular education, which shall answer the legitimate purposes of education, we must have a system which shall embrace both religion and politics." (p. 402.) Mr. Brownson is a warm democrat, and his object is avowedly to undermine the Board of Education. He objects to the board because it recommends the teaching of Christianity "so far, and only so far, as it is common to all sects." "This," says he, "if it mean any thing, means nothing at all." "There is, in fact, no common ground between all the various religious denominations in this country, on which an educationalist may plant himself. The difference between a Unitarian and a Calvinist is fundamental. They start from different premises." "The gospel of Jesus Christ is 'another gospel,' as expounded by the one, from what it is as expounded by the other." "If we come into politics, we encounter the same difficulty. What doctrines on the destiny of society will these normal schools inculcate? If any in this commonwealth at present, they must be whig doctrines, for none but whigs can be professors in these schools. Now the whig doctrines on society are directly hostile to the democratic doctrines. Whiggism is but another name for Hobbism. It is based on materialism, and is atheistical in its logical tendencies!"

These latter words would serve admirably well for a motto to a pamphlet by the Bishop of Exeter against national education; but my object in noticing Mr. Brownson's article is to make a few remarks on the insidious course of argument by which he (the friend and advocate of "equal rights and social equality," as he calls himself) labours to destroy the most beneficial institution for the welfare of the people which his country can boast of. His argument, reduced to a logical form, appears to me to be the following:—"All education," says he, "that is worth any thing, is either religious or political." But there is no common ground in Christianity in which all sects can meet, and as our "equal rights" prohibit any one sect from enforcing its doctrines on all, therefore there can be no religious education by the state. Again: This commonwealth is nearly equally divided between the whig and democratic opinions. "Equal rights" prohibit either party from enforcing its peculiar principles on all the children of the state: therefore there can be no "political" education. As, however, all good education must be either religious or political, and as neither of these can possibly be accomplished in Massachusetts, there can be no education by the state at all.

Such, accordingly, is Mr. Brownson's avowed conclusion; and there is a remarkable harmony between the results reached by the ultra-democratic and by the ultra-tory party in England, when arguing on the subject of the education of the people. It is explained by the unity of their objects; both desire to keep the people in ignorance, that they may use them—the tories as docile labourers and administrators to the comfort and luxury of genteel life, and the ultra-democratic politicians as stepping-stones to power. One aim of this article was obviously to foment the opposition to the Board of Education, which I have already mentioned as being secretly hatching; but I am told that it is so completely ultra in its propositions, that Mr. Brownson has defeated his own object.

The only public education which he advocates is that of grown people by means of the pulpit and lyceum. He has some good remarks on the necessity of the pulpit extending the range of its interests, and embracing the affairs of this world in a far more direct manner than it has hitherto done; and I have heard the same idea frequently thrown out by men of various religious opinions in the United States. He urges also the advantage of making the lectures in the lyceums embrace man's moral and social nature, or politics. He ministers to the Self-Esteem of the uneducated mass; for he tells them that they are wiser than the government, and says that it is the duty of the rulers to receive instruction from the people, and not to pretend to give it. "Democracy," says he, "is based on the fundamental truth, that there is an element of the supernatural in every man, placing him in relation with universal and absolute truth; that there is a true light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world; that a portion of the spirit of God is given unto every man to profit withal. Democracy rests, therefore, on spiritualism, and is of necessity a believer in God and in Christ. Nothing but spiritualism has the requisite unity and universality to meet the wants of the masses." p. 406.

This paragraph shows what Mr. Brownson means by his charges of irreligion against the whigs. They regard the human faculties as standing in need of education. This, in his opinion, is atheism and materialism. He maintains that "there is an element of the supernatural in every man, placing him in relation with universal and absolute truth," which is spiritualism and true religion. In other words, this "element of the supernatural" means the unenlightened and untrained impulses of the human faculties, ever ready to take on whatever impressions, and to move in whatever directions, men of bold and ardent minds choose to communicate to them. It was this "element of the supernatural" which enabled the maniac Thom to persuade the people of Kent that he was Jesus Christ, and to induce them to die in testimony of their belief. So far from its being true that "there is no common ground between all the various religious denominations in this country," the contrary may with more reason be maintained; namely, that here, where no men are bribed by privileges and endowments to profess opinions which they do not believe to be true, but where the mind is left in freedom to deal with Scripture according to its own perceptions of truth, those views in which all sects of intelligent and well-informed men are agreed must really constitute Christianity, and those in regard to which there "is no common ground between them" must be non-essentials. The "Christian Examiner" for July, 1839, observes that, "ever since the apostolic days, the tendency has been to make the metaphysical view of Christ the essential and only important one. However a few may have felt, the mass of Christians have held the moral view of Christ wholly subordinate. Men have never been martyred because they held too low notions of the Saviour's character. His character has formed no subject for creeds. But creeds have almost always been filled with speculations as to his nature. To sustain particular views on this point, no efforts, no penalties, have been thought too great. For this churches have hurled denunciations against heretics; for this the inquisition has dug dungeons, and armies have been arrayed with hostile banners, and the sky of Christendom been red with the flames of martyrdom. Christians often have not merely ceased to imitate, but have ceased to think of the character of Christ, in contentions about his nature." Do not these remarks forcibly embody the proposition, that Christian sects have never disputed concerning the excellence of the precepts and the practical conduct of Jesus Christ? and do these form no "common ground" between them, on which to base a religious education? These precepts and that example also, be it observed, relate, to a great extent, to human conduct in this world, with which alone states and governments are entitled to interfere. The metaphysical and abstract opinions about which the great differences exist, have reference chiefly to man's destiny in a future state, and regarding them every individual is entitled, by the principles consecrated at the reformation, to judge exclusively for himself.

If the people of the United States fairly understood Phrenology, these attempts to perpetuate their ignorance, in order to render them the enthralled slaves of selfish and ambitious politicians, would rouse their warmest indignation. Phrenology represents our various faculties as general powers or capacities merely, each having at once an extensive sphere of legitimate action, and a still wider field of abuse. Education is the process of communicating to these faculties instruction how they may best accomplish their own gratifications, or how they may avoid evil and pursue good. The faculties have all innate activity, and in acting they will infallibly produce either good or evil; evil, if left blind and unguided; good, if enlightened and trained to virtue.

In a busy life, education must begin early, otherwise it can never be accomplished well. Every individual in a civilised community, to borrow from a friend a forcible illustration, is a copartner for life with all the other members of that community: the social body having thus a direct interest in the ability and inclination of every member to discharge his duty, and to observe the laws of the copartnery, is entitled to insist on every one of them submitting to that degree of instruction which is necessary to render him fit for his situation. In other words, every state has the right to instruct and train its members as to accomplish them for their secular duties, while it has no title to interfere with their private judgments concerning the best means of ensuring their safety in a future life.

The "London Morning Advertiser" of 10th Oct. 1839, mentions, that "At a public meeting held in the Tower Hamlets, it was stated by Mr. H. Althans, the advocate of education, that, when the new Lancasterian school was opened in Bethnal Green, a few weeks ago, out of 300 boys above the age of ten years, who presented themselves for admittance, no fewer than 173 were found to be utterly ignorant of every letter of the English alphabet." This is trusting to the inward light on the great scale, and may probably satisfy Mr. Brownson; but if, by the law of England, these 300 boys had had the prospect of voting in the election of the queen, the judges, and the clergy, as well as of the members of the two house of parliament, and of all the civic functionaries, it is highly probable that the bishops would have done more for their instruction, and that the house of peers would not have thrown out the bill for granting 30,000*l.* for normal schools.

Nov. 17. Ther. 33°. Insanity.—In my lectures, after describing the healthy states of the mental faculties, I have added remarks on the effects of disease in the organs on their manifestations, and by this means endeavoured to convey to my audiences rational ideas of the causes and nature of insanity. A gentleman, whom I met with in society this evening, told me that this part of my course is particularly interesting and consolatory to him. A near relative of his is insane, and he finds that the lectures are clearing up to his understanding the phenomena of the deranged mind which he had observed, but which he could not previously comprehend; and he now understands also how a cure may be effected in insanity as well as in any other disease. He expressed his conviction, also, that the diffusion of these views among the people will have a great effect in dispelling the ideas of horror and mystery which are so generally connected with insanity, and which, in his own case, he feels to constitute no small portion of the evil. In my last lecture, I remarked that there is no raving or violence in a well conducted lunatic asylum, except when particular patients are labouring under diseased excitement of Combativeness and Destructiveness, and that such cases are rare, and the excitement generally of short duration. He recognised the correctness of this description from his own visits to the asylum, and wished that the public could comprehend it, that their sympathies for the insane might be divested of terror. There is more proper feeling about insanity in the United States, so far as my observations extend, than in Britain; the relatives of persons affected generally view it as a disease, and are more rarely ashamed of it as a disgrace.

The Law.—In Massachusetts conveying is reduced to its simplest elements, and the records of deeds, with the exception of two volumes, are complete, from the foundation of the colony to the present day. Nevertheless, vexatious questions about titles occur here, as in other countries, only not in such great numbers. By the law of this state, an administrator must obtain a license from the proper court to sell the real estate of a person deceased, and it is effectual for only one year; but it may be renewed if necessary on application. Some years ago, an administrator, in strict conformity with the law, sold some valuable property by auction, within the year, and received the price, but, by some oversight, omitted to subscribe the deed of conveyance till three days after its expiration. The heir of the deceased now claims the property, which has risen much in value, and declines to refund the price. The chancery powers of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts are not complete, and, if the title should be set aside, it will require some dexterity so to shape the claim for indemnification against the heir as to reach him effectually. If the case should be brought into the chancery department of the Supreme Court of the United States, there would be no difficulty, for its powers are universal to redress all wrongs.

Taxation.—In Boston, the middle class of citizens pays most taxes, and contributes most liberally to charitable institutions. The city taxation is much higher than that for state purposes, and, like the state taxes, is levied on the whole estimated property, real and personal, of each citizen. Some rich men, to avoid this, live beyond the limits of the city, where they display the symbols of their wealth, and come to town to transact business in humble stores or counting-houses. By this means they withdraw much of their property from taxation for civic purposes. There are other very rich men who continually migrate from state to state, and live in hotels and boarding-houses, to avoid taxation. At the same time, other rich men make a munificent use of their wealth. Mr. Dwight has presented $10,000 to the state, to be expended in instituting normal schools, as an inducement to the legislature to grant an equal sum. Before this gift, no normal school existed in Massachusetts.

Nov. 10. Ther. 27°. The Swedenborgians.—To-day we attended divine worship in the Swedenborgian chapel. It accommodates five or six hundred persons, is commodious and neatly fitted up, and generally well filled. There is something extremely amiable and spiritual in the mental condition of this class of Christians, and their service was refined and soothing. They have a spiritual interpretation for every incident and doctrine in Scripture. Wonder, Individuality, and Comparison, seemed to be predominant organs in most of the congregations.

Nov. 11. Ther. 22°. New York Election.—The democratic party have triumphed in the election of the members of the legislature for the city of New York, by a majority of fifteen hundred. The newspapers of that city belonging to both parties acknowledge that it has been conducted with order and decorum, and that the result fairly expresses the opinion of the majority. This election took place under the amended law, and it affords a striking example of the power of a democracy to rectify its own errors; for the civic election last April was marked by disgraceful and wholesale bribery and perjury by both parties.

In the state of New York, the Whigs have elected the governor and the majority of both houses of the legislature; so that the Democrats have the ascendancy in the city alone.

Boston Election. The License-Law.—This is the election day in the city of Boston for the governor and other officers of the state and the members of the legislature; and I went to a polling station to observe the proceedings. All was order and good humour, but opinion is sadly distracted about the license-law, and these differences are now about to operate on the legislature through the medium of the ballot-box. I have already mentioned that, by moral agitation alone, the cause of temperance had made so great a progress in Massachusetts, that, in 1838, the legislature had passed an act, in which both Whigs and Democrats concurred, prohibiting the sale of any liquors, containing alcohol, in less quantities than fifteen gallons except by special license; that the law was opposed from the first by several friends of temperance as going too far, and as being erroneous in principle; and that it was subsequently evaded by devices, opposed by the rum-dealers by passive resistance, and finally assailed by appeals to juries to disregard it as unconstitutional. The attorney-general of the state struggled hard against all these forms of hostility to the law, and obtained many convictions against offenders in spite of them; but now the question comes to be decided by the people of the whole state. This is done by their voting for candidates pledged to their various opinions, and even political differences have given way, in a slight degree, to zeal for or against the license-law. At the poll-to-day, I found a "regular Whig ticket" containing a list of candidates all Whigs, and a "regular Democratic ticket" all Democrats: both made up without reference to the temperance question; a "Union Liberal ticket," containing candidates all Whigs, but the one half temperance and the other half anti-temperance men, or, as a friend wittily said, a "ticket composed of a glass of rum and a glass of water" alternately. There is a "Whig temperance ticket," the candidates in which are all both Whigs and temperance advocates, a "Democratic temperance ticket" in which they are all Democrats and friends of temperance. Besides these, there was a "Liberal Whig" ticket, an "Independent Democratic" ticket, a "Union Temperance" ticket, and an "Abolition" ticket, the precise meaning of some of which I did not learn. I may here anticipate events subsequent in time, in order to complete this subject at this its most interesting crisis. The result of this day's election all over the state was, that the Whig governor, Edward Everett, was removed, and Mr. Marcus Morton, a Democratic judge, was chosen governor by a majority of one; the Whigs maintained their ascendancy in the senate and house of assembly, but by a diminished majority; and when the houses met, one of their first acts was to repeal the license-law by nearly a unanimous vote.

Mr. Everett retired from office on 1st January, 1840, and I was told by some of his friends that, within a few days after the loss of his election was announced, he received nearly a hundred and fifty letters from political adherents, expressing their deep regret that they had not gone to the poll on the day of election, because they had considered his return so certain that one vote could be of no importance to his cause! The path of duty in such cases is plain. Every citizen who wishes well to a public man is bound to vote for him. It is a strange perversion of morals to argue that because other men will discharge their duty, I may safely neglect mine. In answer to my enquiries, what cause had led to Mr. Everett's exclusion from office, three were mentioned: First, He had studied so assiduously to please all, and offend none, that he had taken no decided part on the question of the license-law, and had not allowed himself to be clearly ranked either with its supporters or opponents. If he had taken either side, he would have been more decidedly supported: Secondly, The circumstance of his being a Unitarian always carried some orthodox votes against him; and, thirdly, he had been four years in office, and some part of the people become impatient of the continued supremacy of one individual, and like to practise "rotation in office."

The first of these reasons, I believe, was the one which chiefly operated against Mr. Everett; yet, according to sound constitutional principles, his conduct was right. He held the situation of chief magistrate, and possessed a veto on the acts of the legislature: To have declared himself the ally of a particular side of a question that would certainly come before the legislature in its next session, would have been tantamount to intimating that the members of the legislature might save themselves the trouble of discussing it; for his negative could extinguish all enactments inconsistent with his declared opinions.

Mr. Marcus Morton, it is said, has stood on the Democratic ticket for governor of this state for fourteen years, and is now elected for the first time, and by a majority of one! He is described to be an able lawyer and an honest man.

Nov. 13. Ther. 33°. Ventilation of Schools.—When Mr. Elliott, the present mayor of Boston, entered on his office on the 1st January last, he delivered a public address, in which, among other improvements, he strongly advocated the necessity of ventilating the common school houses. Effect has been given to his recommendation in a new school house which I this day visited. The ceilings of the rooms are high. In winter a large supply of air, heated by a brick furnace to a moderate temperature, is introduced, and it is let off by five or six separate flues in different parts of the room, which can be opened and shut at pleasure. In each of the rooms the temperature, regulated by a thermometer, was 67° F., the external air being 35°. The garret which used to be lost, has, at Dr. Howe's suggestion, been floored and plastered, and furnished with swinging ropes; and in bad weather the children play in it during the intervals of teaching. All the seats have backs. The teachers told me, that since they have occupied this school house, the vivacity and capacity of the scholars have obviously been raised, and their own health and energy increased.

The advantage of not separating the sexes in their hours of recreation, is forcibly illustrated by the following statement extracted from Mr. Stow's excellent work on the "Training System."—"In a large Foundling Hospital, in the south of Ireland, the boys and girls, from infancy, are permitted (not compelled) to play together, and the result has been, to the knowledge of the superintendents and directors, that only three girls had gone astray in sixteen years; many had given proofs of decided piety; and a large proportion of the females had gone out into service, and otherwise settled in life. Whereas, in Dublin and elsewhere, where the females in hospitals and charity schools are strictly excluded from the other sex during the whole course of their residence in these institutions, the number that had almost immediately gone astray on their leaving the hospitals was lamentable in the extreme."—p. 82. Mr. Stow's work, and that of Wilderspin, are worthy of the attention of every person interested in education.

CHAPTER XX.

Nov. 14. Ther. 41°. Mr. Lalor's Prize Essay on Education has arrived in Boston, and I hear it very highly commended. It recognises the benefits which phrenologists have conferred on the cause, and I am told that, coming to America, backed by the approval of the Central Society of Education in London, it will give additional weight to the views which this science unfolds in regard to teaching and training the young.

The Chartists.—A friend brought to me "The Western Messenger," vol. vii. No. VI. published in Cincinnati in October, 1839, and requested me to read the first article, on "The Chartists," and to give him my opinion whether it fairly represented their case. I have read it, and, while it shows a want of correct information on some important points, it contains a great deal of truth, and truth which, read here at a distance from the prejudices which obscure one's judgment at home, makes me blush for my country. It points out forcibly the unjust taxation of Britain, by which property is exempted, and consumable articles loaded with duties, throwing the chief burden on the poor, who by their numbers are the great consumers. It describes the ill-regulated condition of the jails, and the tyranny of the magistrates, who all belong to the aristocratic class, in committing the poor to these prisons for the most trifling offences, and also in exacting heavy bail from James Lovett and Joseph Collins, the chartist leaders. It exposes the sufferings of the manufacturing population, quoting the reports of the commissioners on the Factory System, and Bulwer's England and the English. It represents the poor-law improvement act as an additional oppression on the poor, but this is a mistake; it accuses the Whigs, as a party, of being as averse to further reform as the Tories, another error; it regards the Chartists as in the right, and as justified in taking up arms; the latter, a view from which the wisest philanthropists, who know the whole circumstances, will dissent.

I mentioned to my friend that, in June 1838, I had visited Warwick jail, and could confirm the charges made against it. I saw untried prisoners confined in the society of convicted felons, and subjected to the same severity of prison discipline. They were ranked up in the court-yard with the condemned, to be gazed on and recognised by visitors, and I had observed one young man of respectable dress and gentlemanly appearance, said to be a clerk in a shop in Birmingham, and still untried, who looked as if he wished the ground to open and swallow him up, so ashamed was he of his condition, yet in the eye of the law he was still innocent! In the society of thieves and prostitutes condemned to transportation to New South Wales, I saw a girl of eight or nine years of age, sentenced to imprisonment for having stolen a flower from a flower-pot in a low window in the town, the owner of the flower-pot being a relative of the magistrate who committed the child.* Such facts,

* I mention these cases from memory, and have no note of the names, but similar facts are not rare.

I say, made me ashamed of my country, and showed how callously the rich rule when the poor have no legitimate means of making their grievances felt by their masters. If these magistrates had been elected by the people by ballot, such outrages to humanity and justice could not have long existed.

The grand obstacle to the remedy of these evils is the ignorance of the people. In those few instances in which the elective franchise has been preserved to them, they have sold themselves shamefully for sums of money to the highest bidder, and, in the late commotions, they talked of obtaining their rights by physical force. This alarms the middle classes, and affords the aristocracy decent pretences for coercing them by law, and opposing their instruction. The middle classes of society, in whose hands the supreme political power is now lodged, are also so imperfectly educated, that they fear the people and worship their superiors in rank, wealth, and titles. "The greatest enemy of the political conduct of the House of Lords," says a recent critic, "submits to their superiority of rank as he would do to the ordinances of nature; and often thinks any amount of toil and watching repaid by a nod of recognition from one of their number." This spirit must be changed before justice will be done to the people in Britain; and the middle classes must open their sympathies to the wrongs of the poor, and insist on justice for all.

Nov. 16. Ther. 42°. Domestic Servants.—A lady told us that her mother, seeing the annoyances suffered from bad servants, had, on her first entering on housekeeping, resolved that her luxury should consist in good servants; that she lived in a humbler house than many of her neighbours of the same income, but sought out first-rate "helps" and paid them high wages. She has been uniformly well served, and one servant has been in her family for twenty-five years. A few other ladies testified to a similar experience.

Endowments for Education.—A Mr. Smithson of London has left $500,000 to the Government of the United States, to be employed in extending the limits of knowledge among men, or for some similar purpose: and a Mr. Lowell has lately left a large sum to the city of Boston for providing gratuitous lectures to the people. It is questionable how far legacies for these purposes do good. It is in vain to expect that the general education of the people can be accomplished by means of legacies. They need instruction from competent lecturers, and they will never obtain these, until they consent to pay them. Legacies induce the people to think that they should not compensate lecturers by themselves paying for instruction; and while this idea prevails, a body of professional lecturers can never be found. Gifts of money to provide lecture-rooms and apparatus may be extremely useful, because these will furnish the physical accommodations for lecturing, and enable the

In the "Globe" of 21st September, 1840, a case is referred to in which the Rev. James Barker, clerk, prosecuted a boy named Thomas Bridge for damaging his fence to the value of one halfpenny. Robert Webb, aged twelve years, testified that the accused pulled some hazel-nuts from the hedge of the prosecutor, but it was not proved that he had damaged the fence. The prosecution, therefore, failed; but the penalty, if the boy had been found guilty, might have been confinement in the county jail for two months, including the tread-mill.—"Newmarket Petty Sessions." lecturers to lower their terms; but the remuneration for the instruction given should be contributed by the people themselves. Legacies to endow lecturers on education, whose business it should be to act as missionaries to rouse the people to do their own duty, may also, in the present state of human knowledge, be beneficial. No part of the Smithsonian Fund is to be applied to ordinary teaching, but all is to be dedicated to institutions of a scientific character, calculated to extend the boundaries of knowledge.

Infant Schools.—I find several attempts are in progress in Boston to work out the system of teaching and training which is adapted to infant schools, and to a certain extent they are successful; but nearly the whole processes are invented by the sagacity of a few individuals. Wilderspin's work, and the other manuals for infant-school teaching, are not reprinted in this country, and the originals are not in general circulation. I have advised some of the friends of education to invite Wilderspin to come to the United States and show them these schools in really efficient operation; but they fear public opinion, which will not sanction such a step. Public opinion exerts a troublesome influence in many respects in this country. It will not favour infant schools, until they shall be seen in successful action; yet it will not countenance the best means of accomplishing this demonstration. It frowns and opposes, and insists on being convinced, and leaves to philanthropic individuals the expense, toil, and risk of achieving the public good. If they be successful, it will then deign to smile; if not, it will visit them with obloquy. It is so powerful, also, that individuals find it extremely difficult to act without its support. Owing to the want of its sanction children cannot be easily collected into these infant schools. The parents are afraid of ridicule from their neighbours, or of something wrong, or at least unusual, being taught to their offspring, and decline to send them.

Nov. 17. Ther. 38°. We heard a discourse in the church in Chauncy Place, preached by the Rev. Mr. Dewey of New York, on the character of Job. Mr. Dewey is here on the invitation of the Society for diffusing Useful Knowledge, and has delivered several lectures to large audiences.

In society this evening I heard a great deal of sensible discussion about the present condition of public affairs. The recent increase of the democratic party in Massachusetts is variously accounted for. The hostility to the license-law is regarded as its chief cause. Both Whigs and Democrats concurred in enacting this law, because it was at first extremely popular; but no sooner did its stringency begin to give offence than the Democrats made "political capital" out of it; that is to say, they ascribed the law to the Whigs, and constituted themselves its vigorous opponents; and they have turned that capital to good account. It is true that the Whigs had a majority in the legislature which passed it, and could have stifled it, but it is equally certain that the Democrats as a party did not oppose it, while they believed that the people were in its favour. I perceive, however, that some of the profounder men of the Whig party desecry in the event other influences. They acknowledge that the true democratic principle is advancing, and has much influenced this election, and that the days when the wealth and education of Massachusetts were permitted to govern it are fast passing away. This appears to me to be a natural result of the present condition of American society. No ad-quate foundation for an aristocracy of birth or wealth is afforded by the institutions of this country, and the intelligence of the people has reached that point at which they are capable of combination, and have become aware of their own power. The Whigs, therefore, should throw themselves cordially into the arms of the people, and, by advancing their improvement in every way, become their leaders on higher principles than those of mere wealth and station.

I hear some sagacious persons also remarking that the present extreme embarrassments of commerce will do good, because nothing but the want of physical means will prevent this people from going too far a-head in pursuit of gain. They are deficient in self-control; and things so often "right themselves," that much is taken away from the effect of the lessons of experience. This last observation is correct. The natural sources of prosperity in this country, in abundance of fertile land, great ingenuity, ceaseless activity, and economy, are so great, that all classes recover from the prostrations caused by their errors in an incredibly short space of time.

Nov. 18. Ther. 37°. The Planet Venus.—To-day, at half past eleven o'clock A. M. we saw the planet Venus shining brightly in a clear sky, the sun shining at the same time. She was a little west of south. Multitudes of people were standing in the streets gazing at the spectacle. Some said that they had seen stars in sunlight before, but to most of them the spectacle seemed to be new.

Nov. 20. Ther. 27°. Phrenology.—The friends of education have requested me to deliver one lecture to the assistant teachers, and three lectures in the Odeon Theatre, at the end of my present course, to which I have with great pleasure acceded.

Portrait of Sir Walter Scott.—In visiting Mr. Ticknor, in Park street, we saw an original portrait of Sir Walter Scott painted at Abbotford in 1824, by Leslie, the celebrated American artist. It is a most truthful representation of the original man, and the head appeared to me to be perfect. As a work of art, also, it will stand investigation, although in this respect it is surpassed by one or two portraits of him by other artists. Taking it for all in all, however, those who look on this picture have all but seen Sir Walter Scott himself. It represents him in his short green coat, his usual dress in the country. Having seen Sir Walter frequently in the Court of Session for more than five and twenty years, and having minutely studied his head, I was much gratified to see such a faithful representation of it as this picture presents.

Nov. 21. Ther. 21°. Phrenology and Animal Magnetism.—A brother lecturer introduced himself to me to-day, and gave me his own history as follows: Originally he kept a store, and while in this employment became a little acquainted with Phrenology. He examined the heads of his customers; his interest increased; and he then began to study it in books. He afterwards gave up the store, and commenced lecturer, head-examiner, and magnetizer. He gives three lectures; the first free, at which he examines heads to excite interest. He charges 12½ cents (6½d.) to every person who attends each of the subsequent lectures, and he examines heads privately for fees. In all his lectures he gives his audience facts. "If," said he, "you were to address them with reason, you would never see them after the first lecture." Out of a village of 1500 inhabitants he generally drew from two to three hundred dollars in a week. He was a pure specimen of a Yankee. His temperament was sanguine, bilious, and nervous, indicating great activity; his head was of moderate size, the organs of the observing faculties were large, and those of reflection moderate. I expressed my fears that his mode of proceeding did injury to Phrenology in public estimation as a science. He said that he believed it did so with the better educated classes, but that the people would not receive it in any other way. These facts indicate the condition of the public mind in the rural districts of the United States.

Jeffreys' Respirator.—Last year I exhibited one of these respirators at the end of my lecture on Physical Education in Boston, and described its structure and use. I did the same in New York and Philadelphia. They were previously unknown. I perceive that they are now coming into use in Boston.

Evidences of Christianity.—In conversing with an American clergyman to-day, he remarked that the men who affirmed that they felt no difficulty about the evidences of Christianity, were either incapable of thinking, or hypocrites. In his opinion, the evidence was attended with many difficulties, and they were great either way. "There was too much evidence to enable a reflecting mind to reject Christianity, and too little fully to satisfy the understanding when independently applied to its investigation. I remarked that it appeared to me that all the practical portions of Christianity were daily gaining strength from the development of science and the progress of civilisation. Free trade and free institutions are examples of the maxim, "Love your neighbour as yourself" carried into effect on the large scale. The importance attached to doctrinal points will probably diminish in proportion as men become sufficiently civilised to practise the precepts. The doctrines also will one day undergo a new investigation when they come to be considered in relation to the functions of the brain. One point is certain, that all that is true will gain ground; and only error is in danger of suffering from free discussion. My esteem for both the intellect and honesty of this divine was increased by his candour.

Nov. 23. Ther. 12½°. The Winter.—The weather continues brilliantly clear. In the forenoon, the wind from the northwest is high and cutting, but it lulls in the evening and during night. The sun rises at ten minutes past seven, and shines directly into our windows. At 8 P. M. we have a large anthracite coal fire made up; it burns bright all night; it keeps the temperature in our bed-room at 58°; and is still a good fire in the morning when we rise. We leave a portion of the window open all night to supply the room with fresh air; and altogether suffer less from cold than in Scotland.

Africans and Indians.—Some time ago, I communicated to a scientific friend, whose opportunities of observation have been ample, and whose powers of analysis are profound, the ideas which I entertained of the African and native American Indian races, such, nearly, as I have formerly described them. He has expressed his opinions by letter to the following effect:—"Your views respecting the intellectual capacity and general character of the African race do not, I think, differ very materially from my own. Your estimate of them is certainly higher than mine, though not perhaps very strikingly so. And had you had as free access to masses of them, especially of those fresh from their native country,* as I have had, I feel persuaded that the difference in our opinions respecting them would have been less. That they are superior to the North American Indians in their moral and social qualities, and therefore in their tameableness, cannot be doubted. But that they are superior in intellect I am not yet prepared very positively to affirm. Nor would I affirm the opposite. That our Indians are in all the attributes of mind greatly above some of the African varieties is certain. This is especially true as relates to the Boschesemen and other tribes of the Hottentot race. They and the Papuans are such miserable representatives of humanity, that it would puzzle a jury of naturalists to decide to which they are most nearly allied, the genus Homo, or the genus Simia. All that I have ever very strenuously contended for on this subject is, that the Caucasian race is constitutionally, greatly, and irreversibly superior to the other races of man. And of this I am as fully satisfied as I am that the Caballus equus is superior to the Caballus asinus, zebra, or quagga. And the superiority is explained and substantiated by Phrenology."

Teachers.—I delivered a lecture to the assistant school teachers, and other persons interested in education, and had a large audience. The subject of the lecture was the question, Does the mind manifest a plurality of faculties differing from each other in functions and relative strength, or is there only one general power equally susceptible of all emotions, and equally applicable to all pursuits? I pointed out the great difference that would ensue in practical teaching, according as the one or other theory was embraced. After the lecture, the teacher of a distinguished private seminary mentioned to me that, in consequence of the views which he had derived from my lectures on Phrenology last year, he had ventilated his school, alternated the studies, and increased the intervals of relaxation, and had found the health of himself and his scholars improved, their powers of application increased, and greater enjoyment imparted to them all. I mention these little incidents to encourage others.

The Rights of Women.—It is currently reported that at the late election of the state officers of Massachusetts, about one hundred votes were given in favour of Mrs. Maria Ann Chapman as governor, or rather "governess," of the state. This is a lady of superior talent and amiable qualities, who has distinguished herself as an abolitionist. I have never been able to learn in an authentic form to what extent votes were really given for her; or whether they were bestowed in earnest, in recognition of the rights of women, or as a hoax; but from the way in which the fact is mentioned, I am inclined to believe that some votes have been given for Mrs. Chapman. As Victoria governs England with great éclat, there are persons who think that there is no good reason why Mrs. Chapman should not govern Massachusetts; more especially as her people could remove her at the end of the first, or any subsequent year, if she did not give them satisfaction, which Victoria's subjects cannot do.

Nov. 24. Ther. 31°. The Rev. Mr. Pierpont.—Mr. Pierpont is distinguished in America and in Europe for his poetical talent. He is the author, among other excellent pieces, of the celebrated song "The Pilgrim Fathers." A majority of the pew-holders of his church lately decided that his reply to some charges brought against him by certain of his hearers is satisfactory, and he continues his ministrations. The charges were in fact ridiculous, his real offence having been his ardour in the temperance cause. In his "Reply," he gives some amusing illustrations of these accusations. "I adverted," says he, "to the fact that casks of rum bearing the Boston brand might be seen lying on the wharves of Smyrna, and was led to inquire whether, if one of our merchant vessels carries missionaries to Asia in the cabin, and New England rum in the hold, the influence of the new world is, on the whole, a blessing to the old, if with our religion she takes our rum?" * * "I proposed to them from the pulpit the question, Whether is nearer the kingdom of God the sober believer in Mahomet, or the drunken believer in Jesus?" His congregation consisted to a great extent of distillers, one of whom led the opposition against him. Speaking of this individual, he says, "He heeded not the hail from Hollis' Street pulpit that rattled upon the copper of his still—his still, 'whose worm dieth not, and whose fire is not quenched,' even on the Christian Sabbath!"

* My friend is correct in this remark. The Africans of the Amistad, who were only a few months from their native shores, presented heads, on the whole, inferior to the negroes whom I had previously seen in the United States.

Another of the charges against him was that he followed "an imported mountebank," which was understood by him to mean condemnation of his attachment to Dr. Spurzheim and Phrenology. In a beautiful apostrophe to the "Shade of the lamented Spurzheim," he answers this accusation. "Thou wast honoured in thy life as few in this land have been. Thou wast honoured in thy death and in thy funeral obsequies as, in this generation, no other man has been. The munificent merchant of Boston who gave thy bones a resting-place in the sacred shades of Mount Auburn, and placed over them that beautiful copy of the tomb of Scipio, was content to cut thy name upon its front as thine only epitaph; feeling, that wherever science was honoured, or philosophy loved, no other could be needed. It was left for the chairman of a committee of Hollis' street society to express his own views of this philosophy, and thy worth; and under the name of 'Spurzheim' he writes, 'THE IMPORTED MOUNTBANK.'"

"Yes, gentlemen, I have entered somewhat into the 'exciting topic' of Phrenology. I was a hearer of Dr. Spurzheim, and have been since, and mean to be again, a hearer of the lectures of George Combe. To these two 'imported mountebanks' I feel myself more indebted for instruction in the philosophy of mind, and upon the conditions of the healthy manifestation of the mental powers, than to all other men, living or dead."*

* I was surprised at the observation that Dr. Spurzheim's monument was reared by "a munificent merchant in Boston." I learned, on inquiry, that at the time of Dr. Spurzheim's death, when the sympathy was strong, a good many small sums were subscribed by the citizens of Boston for this purpose, but, that when the money came to be demanded two years afterwards to pay the artist, the feeling had died away, and some difficulty was experienced in making the collection. Mr. William Sturgis, a merchant, a man of large fortune and generous spirit, no Phrenologist, but a great admirer of moral worth, and who had taken a deep interest in Dr. Spurzheim as a man, requested that these efforts should cease, and paid the requisite sum. $1000, out of his own pocket. The Phrenological Society of Boston presented him with a copy of all Dr. Spurzheim's works, with a handsome letter expressive of their

It was subsequently stated in the Boston newspapers that it was not Dr. Spurzheim, but Mr. George Thompson the antislavery lecturer, who was meant by the "imported mountebank" in the publication of Mr. Pierpont's opponents. Mr. Pierpont had repeatedly offered to his congregation to submit his conduct to an "ecclesiastical council," but the discontented members declined this appeal. This is the ordinary way of settling differences between pastors and their people. The accusers and the accused name a number of clergymen of the same persuasion with themselves, as umpires; they subscribe a regular bond of arbitration to them, and the courts of law enforce the decision given upon it.

We heard Mr. Pierpont preach to-day from the text, "Try all things, hold fast that which is good." The sermon contained a regular and very able discussion of the nature, aim, and modes of action, of the two spirits of "Reform" and "Conservatism," which are so active in the world. Both are implied in the text. "Try all things" is the maxim of the determined reformer. "Hold fast by that which is good" should satisfy the most timid Conservative. The error committed by many reformers consists, not in "trying all things," but in not "holding fast by that which is good;" while the error of Conservatism lies in holding fast by that which is only comparatively good, and refusing to try any thing with a view to making it better. Conservatism resisted printing as a substitute for writing in the manufacture of books; it resisted the substitution of mechanical power for human and animal labour; it resisted Christianity as superseding Heathenism; it resisted the Reformation and clung to Popery. Both spirits are necessary for the welfare of the world, and our object should be to prevent either from becoming the sole motive of action. The text is unlimited in its application; we are commanded to "try all things." There is no truth so thoroughly established, and no custom so sanctioned by time, as to have any legitimate claim to exemption from trial. The world is progressive, and new generations are constantly appearing on the stage: if we wish to strengthen the minds of the young we should permit, nay encourage them to "try," by the tests of reason and Scripture, all the doctrines and observances which we teach them. If these be "good," they will stand only the faster by being "tried" again and again; and if they cannot undergo this scrutiny, they are not "good," and we should not ask the young to receive them as true.

Nov. 25. Ther. 57°. Mr. Abbott Lawrence. This gentleman was lately chosen as one of the representatives of Massachusetts to Congress. We visited him this evening, before his departure for Washington. He is a man in whom the moral and intellectual qualities are happily blended; he is much esteemed, and full of patriotism in the best sense of the word. He labours assiduously to raise the moral and intellectual condition of his countrymen, in the belief that if they excel in these qualities all other things will be added unto them. In my journal of this date, I find these words written: "He is in horror at the prospect of the bad air in the chambers at Washington. I urged him to make a motion to esteem and gratitude, which was published in the Boston newspapers at the time, but the notice of it had not reached me. The name of Mr. William Sturgis will descend honourably to posterity associated with that of Dr. Spurzheim.

have them ventilated." When this was written, he appeared to be in a green old age, apparently under or about sixty. He went to Washington; engaged warmly in his duties; and within three months was taken seriously ill. His life was despaired of; and after long and protracted suffering, he escaped by only a hair's-breadth from the grave. Before we left America he was under the necessity of resigning his seat on account of his health, and retiring into private life! Perhaps the bad ventilation had some influence in producing this deplorable result.

The Weather.—In the early part of the day the thermometer rose to 70° F. The wind was in the south, and much rain fell; but before sunset the wind changed, and the sky became clear. At 10 P. M. it was freezing. Next morning the thermometer stood at 11°.

Nov. 27. Ther. 24°. This evening I concluded my second course of lectures.

Nov. 28. Ther. 23°. Thanksgiving Day.—I heard Mr. Gannet, Dr. Channing's colleague, preach to-day in his church in Federal street. His text was, "Do all to the glory of God." He said, that "Thanksgiving Day" presented one of the few occasions on which politics could legitimately be introduced into the pulpit. As religious principle should regulate every action of life, political action formed no exception. He strongly condemned the practice of voting with one's party in opposition to the conscientious dictates of individual judgment. He insisted on the necessity of every man in this country bringing his conscience and his understanding to the study of political questions before deciding on them, as he would do in any other matter of serious import, that he may do justice to himself and to society, by exercising an enlightened and salutary influence on public affairs. He denounced all political frauds, lying, slandering of opponents, and unscrupulous arguments, as forbidden by Christianity. The sermon was sound, bold, and forcible. In the other services, there was presiding good taste and Christian sentiment towards all nations on the earth.

Nov. 29. Phrenology and Education.—The remark was occasionally made to me by persons who had heard my lectures on Education, without having attended those on Phrenology, that the views presented were so sound and luminous that I should have done much more good if I had omitted Phrenology, and delivered them simply as founded on common sense. This, said they, would have saved the lectures from the prejudices which exist in so many minds against Phrenology, and which render them suspicious of every doctrine and practice springing out of it. My answers were, first, That a knowledge of the influence of the organs on the power of manifesting the mental faculties, is a fundamental requisite to the right understanding of the subject of education. Secondly, That to have withheld this important knowledge, because it was unpopular, would have been improper and uncandid. By following such a course I should also have been extending the impression already produced by too many disingenuous phrenologists, that the science is worthless, and that the soundest views of education may be obtained without its aid, which I know not to be the case. Thirdly, That such conduct would have been unjust and injurious towards the founders and defenders of Phrenology. It would have been appropriating to myself the fruits, and leaving to them not only the toil but the obloquy of having raised them. Fourthly, That lectures on education, founded on Phrenology gy, make a deeper and more permanent impression on the understanding than if based on mere common sense, and can be more certainly and successfully carried into practice. Every man's common sense differs from that of his neighbour. In New England, I had visited a common school, the head master of which told me, that he devoted one half of his whole hours of teaching to arithmetic and mathematics, because he had discovered that pupils who excelled in those branches soon became proficient in every other, such as grammar, geography, and repetitions. No phrenologist could have held such views, because he must have known that arithmetic and mathematics depend on different organs from those which take cognisance of language, grammar, and general reasoning. I observed that the organs on which arithmetic and mathematics depend predominated over the other intellectual organs in this person's own head, in consequence of which he could teach these branches with most ease and success, and his common sense led him to conclude that all his pupils were similarly constituted to himself. When teachers rely solely on common sense and their own experience, they act merely on the suggestions of their strongest propensities, sentiments, and intellectual faculties, whatever these may be, without reference to the differences which exist between their minds and those of their pupils. Phrenology presents a scientific guide to all.

Nov. 20. St. Andrew's Day.—By invitation from the office-bearers, I attended the celebration of the hundred and eighty-second anniversary of the Scots Charitable Society of Boston, held in the Pavilion Hotel. Mr. W. H. Wilson was in the chair, and Mr. John L. Miller acted as Vice President. The room was ornamented with transparencies of St. Andrew, St. George, and St. Patrick; and other emblems and memorials of the "Father Land." Mr. Everett the governor of the state, Mr. Elliot the Mayor of the city, Thomas Colley Grattan, Esq., the British Consul (author of "High-ways and By-ways,") and a number of other distinguished guests, were present. The history of this society is interesting. On the 6th of January 1657, a few Scotsmen of the town of Boston associated themselves together for the purpose of raising funds for the relief of their poor and distressed countrymen, and the records of their proceedings have been preserved for nearly the whole intervening period between that date and the present time. The resolution founding the association is expressed in singularly solemn and forcible religious phraseology. "We look for the assistance of the Great God, who can bring small beginnings to greater perfection than we, for the present, can think of or expect; and we likewise hope that God, who hath the hearts of all men in his hand, and can turn them which way soever he pleases, will double our spirits upon them (that shall come after us,) and make them more zealous for his glory, and the mutual good one of another than we." In 1684 their numbers being considerably increased, they assumed the form of a regular society. "The society thus constituted, continued in existence until the breaking out of the troubles of the Revolution, when, on account of the loyalty of its members, who, desiring to fight neither against their native or adopted country, all retired either to the Provinces or to Great Britain. After the declaration of Independence was acknowledged by Great Britain, many of the former members of the society returned to their old homes, and in the year 1784" they obtained a charter re-establishing the society. The society continued to flourish until the war of 1812-13-14, when it suffered severely, and it afterwards "continued a languishing existence for fifteen years." It again, however, revived, and is now in a flourishing condition. It has been the means of alleviating much misery; and it forms a striking and cheering example of the inherent vitality of a good principle. Almost every other institution of this state, religious, civil, and judicial, has been destroyed and reconstructed again and again since this society was founded, but it has lived through all vicissitudes, and risen from its ashes even when it seemed to have been finally extinguished by adversity.

Besides Scotsmen, the company consisted of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Americans; and nothing could be more pleasing than to observe the tact and good sense with which, in the expression of their national feelings, each of these sections avoided all extravagance and matter of offence to their neighbours. The only jar which struck on my mind was in hearing the Governor of Massachusetts, with great good nature, join in singing the Queen's anthem, and, allusion to her enemies, giving utterance to the sentiment "confound their politics," "frustrate their knavish tricks;" more especially as he was lately in great danger himself of being forced to become one of her enemies when the "Maine troubles" wore a threatening aspect. Victoria, or rather her counsellors, are not so infallible as to render it certain that she is always in the right in her quarrels; and even, independently of this consideration, good taste would dictate that, to render the anthem perfect, it should be purified of the manifestations of Self-Esteem and Destructiveness which are implied in these words.

The health of Governor Everett was given by the chairman, and received with great cordiality. In returning thanks, he delivered an appropriate, classical, and eloquent address. The delivery was graceful, animated, and fluent. He describes the Scottish character in the chastest language, and with nice discrimination, he adverts felicitously to the leading incidents in the history of the country, and enumerates her distinguished writers with a just critical acumen, showing altogether a highly cultivated, well-stored, and accomplished mind.

Mr. Grattan also delivered a speech full of fervid eloquence and generous sentiment; and the proceedings of the whole evening constituted a highly intellectual treat. Champagne was constantly administered by the servants after the cloth was drawn, but the company used it, and all the other wines and liquors, in most exemplary moderation.

Dec. 1. Ther. 40°. A Scottish Sacrament. Burns, in his "Holy Fair," has rendered a Scottish sacrament in the country famous in all parts of the world where his dialect is understood; but I was struck with the description of the same solemnity in a city, given by an American gentleman of serious habits and a cultivated mind, who had visited Edinburgh about thirty years ago. The subject was introduced by his asking me whether the same state of things continued to exist which he witnessed at that time. I asked him what he particularly alluded to, when he gave me the following picture of his impressions: He happened to be in Edinburgh in the week of the sacrament, and was introduced to the Rev. Dr. Campbell, long since deceased. The solemnity of the Thursday's fast day; the long and serious discourse delivered on the Saturday; the extreme solemnity of the Sunday's dispensation of the bread and wine, and the deep impressiveness of the Monday's prayers and preaching, appeared to him more than reverential; they were awful. His mind was depressed by the terrible images and sentiments which had been constantly brought before it during these days. The clergymen also who officiated, as well as the congregation who listened, seemed to him to be broken down under a sense of guilt and apprehension of punishment. He was invited to dine on the Monday, after the close of the exercises, with Dr. Campbell and his brother clergymen who had assisted him on the occasion. He at first shrunk from accepting the invitation. He conceived that the evening would be passed in practically carrying out the awful admonitions of the previous days, and that every man would be found searching deeper and deeper into his own heart, drawing forth another and yet another sin, and casting it from him. As, however, he had received so much kindness from the reverend doctor who gave the invitation, he considered it his duty to accept it. He entered the house with the most solemn feelings, and prepared his mind to meet his friends in harmony with the spirit which he believed to pervade them. He was surprised to see a bright and benignant smile on Dr. Campbell's countenance, and was speedily introduced to the late Rev. Dr. Ireland, and a whole circle of other doctors in divinity. They all looked differently from what he had expected. They seemed to be happy, smiling, and good natured. Dinner was served, the cloth withdrawn, and the servants left the room, when forthwith there broke forth bursts of merriment, droll stories, an universal hilarity that appeared to him like the opening of the clouds and the sudden gleam of sunbeams after the awful darkness of a thunder tempest. The bottles circulated freely, first port and sherry, and by and by a call was made for the "mountain dew." This was compounded into "toddy," and the mirth grew more vivacious; the stories deepened in a certain kind of interest; the confines of good and evil seemed constantly threatening to intermingle; and only at a pretty advanced hour in the evening did this joyous and jovial party separate. He was then young, and unused to the ways of the world, but he had often reflected on the subject since. He had come to the conclusion that in the one scene the ministers were acting in their professional, and in the other in their natural capacities; and he did not think the less of the Scottish clergy from his having been permitted by this incident to see them in their natural condition. He had been brought up in different views of Christianity himself, but he rejoiced to see that the austere doctrines of their church had left their social qualities unblighted and unimpaired; and that they were amiable, cheerful, kind-hearted, and sensible men. I told my friend, that no very marked change has taken place in these particulars in modern times. The Scottish clergy regard the "Monday's dinner" after the sacrament as the only remnant of the "carnival" that is left to them, and they think it no sin to enjoy it as such.*

* Since my return to Scotland, I have been assured by a friend who has frequently attended these "Monday dinners" in Edinburgh, that within the last ten or fifteen years a most decided improvement has, in some quarters, taken place. The description in the text was accurate at its own date, and my Scottish readers will judge how far it continues generally to be so.

Dec. 2. Quackery.—In conversing with a gentleman on the great extent to which this evil appears to prevail in the United States, so far as one can judge from the advertisements in the newspapers, he said that quackery extends through all departments of business; even in lecturing, said he, "it abounds so extensively, that prudent people pay no attention to certificates, none to resolutions, and none to newspaper reports, because all these can be obtained by impudence and money; often they are forged; and the only mode of treating them according to their deserts is to regard them with utter neglect. This operates against the man of talents and sound acquirements, until, by extensive and persevering efforts, he has reared a personal reputation. This is the real cause," said he, "of the people of Baltimore, Cincinnati, and latterly Providence, having declined to pledge themselves to attend your lectures, until you appeared among them and showed what you could do." I remarked that the names appended to the resolutions of my classes were a guarantee against imposition. "Few names," said he, "except those of politicians, are much known beyond their own district in our wide extended country; and besides, even our respectable citizens are so often drawn by their good nature into commending persons whom they wish to advance, that it is at all times difficult to tell whether any encomium proceeds from the merits of the party praised, or the kindness of the individual who utters it."

Mobs.—To-day I heard Judge Thatcher deliver a clear and sensible address to the grand jury of the county of Suffolk, from which I learned that, during the last session, the legislature of Massachusetts has rendered any city or county in the state liable for three fourths of all damages done by mobs, if the owner have used reasonable care to protect his property. This law will form a good check on mobs, but it is difficult to discover why the compensation does not reach the entire loss.

"The Perkins Institution and Massachusetts Asylum for the Blind."—This institution is now removed from Pearl street, in the heart of the city, to Mount Washington, on Dorchester Heights, looking down on the bay. It was built in the days of speculation for a hotel, and is a splendid establishment. It is now admirably fitted up for the purpose of educating and instructing the blind in trades. The pupils were removed to it last summer; and during the first three months after their removal, the boys and girls consumed 25 per cent. additional of provisions. They enjoy here purer air, more extended exercise, and sea-bathing. Dr. Howe cultivates the sense of propriety in the children as assiduously as if they could see. They are taught to keep their own bedrooms in order, and to lay every object in its proper place. In bathing they are clothed, and they are prohibited from ever appearing undressed even before each other. They have the same delicacy of feeling in this respect which is found in well-trained children who see. We entered into the school about sunset, and commenced an examination of the boys in geography, natural philosophy, and arithmetic. Dr. Howe and Mr. Mann, who accompanied us, carried the questions into a wide range of topics by conversation, and we found the pupils possessed not only of great acquirements in knowledge, but of well cultivated powers of reasoning. It became quite dark, and no lights were brought, but our examinations proceeded uninterruptedly. Nothing before ever enabled me so completely to realise the condition in which the blind habitually live as this scene did. For the time, we participated with them in being in unbroken night; and by no other means can one so fully appreciate the value of their attainments. In the dark we were helpless; but they read, cyphered, demonstrated mathematical propositions, traced the courses of rivers, seas, and mountains, on their maps, fetched and carried whatever object they wanted, knew where everything lay, and were as full of vivacity as if they had enjoyed the benefits of light.

I have already adverted to the great improvement in printing for the blind accomplished in this institution. In the type used by Dr. Howe, a chapter of the Bible is printed in less than half the space occupied by the type in use in Scotland, and is as easily read. It may be true that a page of the Scottish print may be cheaper, estimated by the square foot; but as it contains only half the quantity of matter, the expense of printing any given book is greater.*

Dr. Howe openly acknowledges that he owes whatever success has attended his exertions in improving the education of the blind (and it is great) entirely to the light derived from phrenological views of mental philosophy:—"Before I knew Phrenology," said he, "I was groping my way in the dark as blind as my pupils; I derived very little satisfaction from my labours, and fear that I gave but little to others." Our upper classes are all instructed in the general principles of intellectual philosophy, and we explain to them both the old and the new systems; but I never knew one of them who did not prefer the latter, while I have known many who have taken a deep interest in the philosophy of Phrenology, and heard them avow that they were made happier and better by understanding its principles. Some of our teachers are persons of considerable intellectual attainments, and all of them have adopted the new philosophy since they joined the institution, not because they were induced to do so by any request of mine, or on any consideration of extrinsic advantage to themselves, but solely because their duties led them to examine all the theories of mental philosophy, and the new system recommended itself most forcibly to their understandings, and appeared most susceptible of practical application.†

Much as we found to interest us in this institution, the most attractive of all the pupils is the girl Laura Bridgman, now about nine or ten years of age. She has from infancy been deaf, dumb, and blind; and is also destitute of the sense of smell. She has grown considerably in stature since last year, and I observed a distinct increase in the size of her brain. The coronal, or moral region, in particular, has become larger, not only absolutely, but also in proportion to the animal region. Her temperament is nervous, with a little sanguine. The head altogether is of full size and well formed. The organs of the domestic affections are amply developed, and in the best feminine proportions. Self-Esteem, Love of Approbation, Cautiousness, Firmness, and Con-

* Since my return to Great Britain, I have shown specimens of Dr. Howe's type to several persons who take an interest in printing for the blind. The superior legibility and economy of the Boston printing are generally admitted; but one gentleman, highly educated and accomplished, who is himself blind, thinks that if there were two lines less in the page it would be still more distinct.

† Dr. Howe, at my request, put this testimony into writing, and authorised me to use it.

scientiousness, are all large. The anterior lobe of the brain also is large, and both the knowing and reflecting departments are well developed. The organs of Order are large, and she shows great tidiness in all her arrangements.

Phrenology leads us to understand that in this child the moral and intellectual powers exist in great vigour and activity, and that all that is wanting to her successful education is the means of conveying knowledge to them. Dr. Howe and his assistants, guided by this science, have succeeded wonderfully in the work of educating her. I perceive a manifest and important improvement since last year. She manifests the most sensitive delicacy in regard to sex. When I placed my hand on her head she was troubled, and removed it; but she did not interest herself to remove a female hand. The natural language of her countenance expresses intelligence and happiness; and we were told that she is very happy. She has been taught the finger alphabet, and converses readily with the masters and scholars. She has been instructed in writing also; and when informed of our names, she felt C.'s dress and mine, recognised us as old acquaintances, recollected our visit of last year, and wrote in pencil the words—"Laura glad see Combe," and presented them to us.

Two of the pupils named Baker, to whom she was much attached, were absent on a visit to their friends, and she had worked a bag which she wished to send to them. She had just finished a letter to them, which she kindly allowed me to carry with me, as a specimen of her chirography, and said she would write another. It was in the following terms:—"Louisa and Elizabeth Baker.—Laura is well. Laura will give Baker bag. Man will carry bag to Baker. Laura will cry, Baker will come to see Laura. "Drew," another pupil, "is well. Drew give love to Baker. Laura Bridgman."

I asked Dr. Howe by what means he succeeded in teaching her the connection between the letters "delivered," and the act of delivering, and so forth. He said that the meaning of all such words was communicated only by very frequent repetition of the act, and by writing the letters each time. He took a bag, for instance, and time after time made Laura deliver it to him, and write the letters, and thus he succeeded in connecting the mental conception with the words. She has large organs of Philoprogenitiveness, and has a little doll which she caresses and dresses very neatly. She has a great admiration of ornaments, and was delighted with C.'s bracelets and brooch. She has a separate box for her own bonnet, and another for the other parts of her dress, and preserves them all in the greatest order. She has at present no ideas of religion. Dr. Howe waits for the farther maturity of her organisation, and the greater development of her faculties, before he attempts to convey to her this species of knowledge; and in the mean time every one is enjoined not to allude to the subject, lest they should convey impressions that might render her unhappy, and which it might be impossible to eradicate.

"She has improved very much in personal appearance as well as in intellect; her countenance beams with intelligence; she is always active at study, work, or play; she never repines, and most of the time is gay and frolicsome."

"She is now very expert with her needle, she knits very easily, and can make twine bags, and various fancy articles, very prettily. She is very docile, has a quick sense of propriety, dresses herself with great neatness, and is always correct in her deportment. In short, it would be difficult to find a child in the possession of all her senses, and the enjoyment of the advantages that wealth and parental love can bestow, who is more contented and cheerful, or to whom existence seems a greater blessing than it does to this bereaved creature, for whom the sun has no light, the air no sound, and the flowers no colour or smell.

The United States and Cuba.—It is calculated that about fifty Americans of the better class settle annually in Cuba, and there is a great trade between this island and the United States. The Spaniards are becoming acquainted with the American institutions, and it is said that they would not be averse to join the Union. The slave states it is said would gladly consent to their admission, because this would add powerfully to their strength; and the other states, through motives of interest, might not be averse to the compact. The realisation of this idea may be very distant, but circumstances might arise to accelerate it.

Dec. 7. Ther. 38°. The Law of Scotland.—At a party to-day at the hospitable residence of Mr. Grattan the British Consul (whose urbanity, generous sentiments, and high literary talents, have already endeared him to the Americans), we met Judge Story of the Supreme Court of the United States. He expressed his admiration of the Commentaries on Bankrupt and Commercial Law by Mr. George Joseph Bell of Edinburgh; and mentioned that Mr. Bell had lately sent him his "Principles of the Law of Scotland," with a kind letter, which had gratified him much. He said that the freedom with which the Scottish lawyers have investigated first principles, renders their pleadings and writings particularly interesting in the United States, where the law is in the progress of constant change and improvement. He had also studied Mr. Fergusson's Reports of the Cases decided by the Scottish Judges, annulling, for offences committed in Scotland, marriages contracted in England; and he acknowledged that he had derived many valuable lights from them in preparing his own Treatise on the Conflict of Jurisdictions. There is, said he, great depth of reasoning and soundness of conclusion in the opinions of the Scottish judges. In the United States, their doctrine has long been adopted in the practice of the supreme court. He was glad to see that the English judges had at length given effect to the cogent reasoning and luminous exposition of principle adopted by their Scottish brethren; and he admired the unswerving firmness with which the latter had adhered to their own views, opposed as they long were by the great weight and authority of the English judges. He added, "These remarks are not confidential; you may if you please communicate them to the Scottish judges with an expression of my high esteem."

Dec. 8. Ther. 38°.—I met ex-Chancellor Kent in New York, and was told that after descending from that high office, at sixty years of age, beyond which the law of the state did not admit of his being re-elected, he continued to exercise almost chancery powers in his private chambers, and sustained no loss of income, but the reverse. He was applied to for opinions in important cases, and practised extensively as arbitrator in references. He never appeared again at the bar in any court. In Rhode Island the judges are elected annually; but it is said that anarchy has threatened to make more serious inroads on social order in that than in any other of the old states.

Honour and Honesty.—Some time ago I became acquainted with a teacher of the higher branches of education, who now successfully conducts a private seminary in this state, and whose history is instructive. He pursued the same vocation in England, and told me that there he had a fair attendance of scholars, but that many of the parents, even in respectable circumstances, did not pay the school fees for their children, and when he urged for payment, they resented his urgency, and, in the circles in which they visited, accused him of imputed offences, concealing the real one, till his reputation was injured, and his school seriously thinned. As he did not move in the same rank with them, he had no means of defence, and left the country and came to the United States. I asked him, whether he did not experience the same grievance here? He said no; that the Americans considered school fees as debts of honour, and paid them in almost all circumstances. I am sorry to say that in Scotland teachers are no better treated in this respect than this gentleman was in England. I have repeatedly been informed by teachers in my own country, that their fees are ill-paid by the fashionable portion of the middle classes, and that they have the mortification to know that, while they are teaching two or three children without recompense, the parents are sumptuously entertaining fashionable society, at an expense which would have cleared off the school-arrears in one week. They have assured me, also, that urgency on their part is resented in the same way, and with the same effects, as in the case before described. It is difficult to conceive a greater dereliction of all feelings of honour and honesty than such conduct implies.

Dec. 16. Ther. 31°. Observance of the Sunday.—This day we have a very severe snow storm, the first unequivocal symptom of winter. In visiting Lowell I made inquiries about the observance of Sunday by the manufacturing population, about 20,000 in number, and was assured that it is kept sacred in the most exemplary manner. The only exception mentioned is, that occasionally the mills and dams are repaired on Sundays, to avoid throwing large numbers of people idle on week-days. The interests of the owners and of the workmen concur in this arrangement, and the clergy, who are dependent on both, do not object. These operations are viewed as works of necessity. If the Scottish clergy were equally dependent on their flocks, they would not prohibit (as they actually do in some cities) the labouring poor from burying their dead relations on Sundays, under pretence that this is a desecration of the day; causing, by this sanctimoniousness, the loss of a day's labour to these suffering people, at the very time when sickness and death increase their necessary expenses.

Music taught in Common Schools.—I attended a lesson given by Mr. Lowell Mason in vocal music to the girls attending the Hancock common school in Boston. About 200 of them were instructed for half an hour. They are taught only two half hours in the week, but their attainments are very considerable. They read music, analyse the notes, and detect false notes both in rhythm and melody, when played on the piano forte or sung. They give the notes of the common chord in the various positions. They sang extremely well, observing both time and tune with great accuracy. The influence of this instruction in refining their taste, and opening up a source of innocent enjoyment to them, must be valuable. Mr. Mason is employed by the public authorities, and is remunerated from the common school fund.* He appears to be a first-rate teacher; and it is gratifying to see high talent devoted to the improvement of the common people in a branch of the fine arts which, a few years ago, was little prized even by the wealthy citizens of the United States. Although the food of the common people in Boston is abundant and nutritive, and these girls were well dressed, I regretted to observe that their bodily condition did not indicate robust health. Some appeared to have distorted spines, or depressed and narrow chests, and most of them presented that waxy, sodden appearance of the skin, which indicates breathing vitiated air, and absence of sufficient exercise. The school-room was well ventilated, so that they must have suffered at home. This is the more lamentable, as in this country these imperfections are the result not of poverty and physical degradation, as they often are in Britain, but of ignorance or want of resolution to act in conformity with the laws of health.

Dec. 20. Ther. 6°. The Organ of Number.—A gentleman who kindly undertook the management of the tickets for my lectures at Lowell, wrapped up the sum received from each bookseller in a separate paper, and made the person who paid it, mark on the parcel the amount it contained. When he paid the bills for advertising, &c., he took the money wanted out of one of the parcels, and put the receipts for the payments into it, and brought the whole sums collected to me in this form. Not understanding why he had done this, I placed the contents of the whole parcels together, and asked him how much he had received, and how much he had paid. He could not tell! I then observed that his organ of Number was deficient, and he told me that he had adopted this method to "avoid confusion." My own organ of Number being equally small, we tried, both by the pen and by counting the money, to discover the amount: but neither of us could succeed! We finally parted, much to our own amusement, without either of us having been able to find out the aggregate sum either received or paid, and certainly it was not the magnitude of the amount that caused our difficulties. A deficiency of this kind, when it occurs in the organ of Number, occasions only amusement; but I never experience its effects without sincerely sympathising with those individuals who are as defective in the organs of Conscientiousness or Causality as I am in that of Number. They stand as much in need of external guides to virtue and wisdom as a man in my condition does of a ready reckoner; and they are equally unfit to fill situations in which active honesty and reflection are necessary to success, as such a man would be to discharge the duties of a teller in a bank.

Politics of American Authors.—The Whig party in America claims the wealth of the Union on their side, and the Democrats claim the genius. One of the Democratic papers cited the names of Irving, Cooper, Bryant, Leggett, Bancroft, Alexander Everett, Brownson, Nat. Willis, Fay, Prescott, Langtree, O'Sullivan, Nathaniel Greene, among other men of literary talents, as belonging to their party. The "Boston Atlas" answered this boast as follows: "We have only one observation to make, and that is, that somehow or other it has always happened, that, as a general rule, your poets, your story-tellers, your historians, your wits, nay, even your philosophers, have been great worshippers of power, in whatever hands for the time being it might happen to be deposited; and that, after all, the approbation or the praises of this sort of gentry must ever be regarded as a very uncertain test or proof of merit." I should like to see a list of men of genius classed under the heads of Whig and Tory. The general idea is that genius is liberal.

* Not only do concerts à la Musard, at one shilling for the admission of each person, prosper in Edinburgh, but the labouring classes also have concerts this winter (1840-41) in Dun-Edin Hall, to which the admittance is only twopence, and these are crowded every evening. They are patronised by the Temperance Societies, and are valuable auxiliaries to civilisation.

Dec. 21. Ther. 8°. Mrs. Gove's Lectures.—This day C—— attended one of Mrs. Gove's lectures to ladies. The subject was the effects of tight lacing and bad ventilation. The lecture was good, and the attendance was about 300, all females.

CHAPTER XXI.

Dec. 25. Ther. 26°. This is Christmas day, and in Boston all the world is abroad enjoying the fine bright weather. Public worship is performed in the Catholic and Episcopalian churches, but not in the others. The stores belonging to members of these sects are closed, but the rest of the community, who observe the day at all, dedicate it to feasting.

Frauds.—A fraud to the extent of a million of dollars has lately been exposed, perpetrated by the cashier of the Schuylkill bank in Philadelphia. He sold shares to that amount in the bank of Kentucky, and appropriated the proceeds to his own purposes, or to those of the bank over which he presided, which also has failed.

Debts of Cities.—The individual property of the citizens of Boston, New York, Rochester, and I believe of other towns, is liable, by the law of the states, to attachment for debts contracted by their civic rulers, and the liability has been enforced. When, in any of these cities, opposition is made to a tax for paying the interest of the public debt, a few of the largest creditors immediately commence processes against the parties who oppose; and speedily they petition for an assessment for their own relief. The law reserves to every citizen who has paid a debt under these processes, a claim for a rateable reimbursement from all the other inhabitants, but this form of redress is so tedious and expensive, that few resort to it. They prefer aiding the corporation to raise the necessary funds by general assessments. The bonds of these cities (which yield, those of Boston 6, and those of New York and Rochester 7 per cent.) are regarded as among the most secure investments in the United States. This state of the law under democratic institutions contrasts favourably with the provisions of the law under the aristocratic legislature of Great Britain. The civic corporation of Edinburgh borrowed large sums of money on bonds; built a high school, churches, and other expensive erections, for the use or ornament of the city; and then declared itself bankrupt. The law protected these edifices as public property, sacred to social purposes, and also the property of the individual citizens from attachment. The civic corporation which contracted the debts, essentially enjoyed the privilege of self-election, and the citizens had no efficient control over its actions. The law, therefore, regarded the lenders as having trusted for repayment solely to that portion of the corporation's property which could legally be alienated or attached for debt. In the American cities, the inhabitants at large elect their rulers, and are, therefore, justly held responsible for the debts which they contract. Since the Burgh Reform Act came into operation in Scotland, the citizens have enjoyed the right to elect the civic councils, but the law still exempts them from individual responsibility for the public debts.

Dec. 31. Ther. 0°. Dr. Spurzheim's Birth Day.—This is the anniversary of the birth-day of Dr. Spurzheim, and of the institution of the Phrenological Society of Boston. In the morning I waited on Mr. William Sturgis, who erected the monument in Mount Auburn, and thanked him cordially for the tribute of respect which he had paid to his memory. He said that he admired Dr. Spurzheim's sound sense and warm philanthropy, but knew nothing about Phrenology. He repeated, that it was his shrewdness of observation, simplicity of manners, and goodness of heart, that won his esteem. In the evening I delivered an address before the Phrenological Society in the Melodeon, lately the Lyon Theatre, which the public were invited to attend. The order of proceeding was the following:—Mr. Pierpont delivered an appropriate prayer; various airs were performed on an excellent organ; the address was read; and Mr. Green pronounced a benediction. The attendance exceeded 600 persons, and would have been larger, but for the circumstance, that at the same time Governor Everett delivered the introductory address to the Lowell lectures in the Odeon, and had an audience of at least 1500.

Phrenology and Education.—So much interest was excited by my three lectures on education, that, in compliance with the request of numerous friends, I devoted the month of December to repeating them in the following places, and to all the courses the assistant teachers of the common schools were admitted free.

In Boston, to the teachers in the Odeon, and again to the subscribers to the Lyceum. I was told that 1500 persons attended this last course.

In Salem, Lowell, and Worcester, each of which towns is accessible by a railway. The audiences who attended these lectures were numerous, averaging from two to three hundred each. I received more invitations to repeat these lectures than it was possible for me to comply with.

Having been invited to lecture in Albany in January, 1840, I left Boston on the 1st of that month, and remained at Springfield, where also I delivered the three lectures on education, and where again we passed a most agreeable week. I am under the necessity, from the length to which this work has already extended, of omitting many observations relative to these places, and the excellent persons with whom we became acquainted in each of them; and can only remark, that, in the New England villages, there is an amount of moral worth and intellectual attainment that redeems the country from the blots which its reputation sustains by the gambling speculators and ambitious politicians of the great cities, whose public actions attract the chief notice of a stranger, and give in his eyes their own character to that of the whole country. There is a sound kernel of honesty and worth in "old Massachusetts" that will preserve her amidst all her trials.

Lunatic Asylum at Worcester.—I have already described this institution. On the 28th of December I visited it again, and met Mr. Salisbury, one of the trustees named by the state, commencing his official visitation. I was invited to accompany him, and entered every cell and apartment, and saw every patient in the institution, and nothing could exceed the excellent condition in which it appeared. Only four or five furious and filthy patients were found among the whole, and they are lodged in a separate building, so distant that their noise cannot annoy the general inmates of the hospital. Each of these persons was in a distinct cell, the walls of which are of brick, and the floors of mica-slate pavement, heated by fire applied below. The light is admitted from the passage. In one of the cells was a musician, who tears every thing to pieces, and is excessively dirty. He was seated on the warm stone floor, clothed in a very strong and thick cotton vestment, which descended to his ankles. His organs of Time and Tune remained sound amidst the wreck of nearly all his other faculties. I heard him, while thus seated, play several tunes on the flute, with correctness and expression. His head is well formed, with the exception of a predominating Destructiveness. His temperament is nervous-sanguine, and the organs of Imitation and Ideality, as well as those of Time and Tune, are largely developed. Dr. Woodward gave the patients of the hospital a ball on Christmas eve. They themselves decorated very tastefully one of the corridors, with boughs of evergreens, and converted it into a handsome ball-room, which I saw. They looked forward to the entertainment with great interest for many days before Christmas, and it is still affording them a pleasing theme of conversation. It proved very successful, and even this musician performed a part in it.

Dr. Woodward is an enlightened phrenologist, and he assured me that his conviction increases, the more he observes, that the cases are extremely rare in which the whole of the mental organs are involved in disease; and that this conviction led him to try the experiment whether this individual could not be enabled to command himself at the ball. He explained to him the preparations that had been made; asked him if he would like to attend. This awakened up a thousand impressions received in his best days of health and usefulness, and he professed his desire to assist and to play in his professional capacity. Dr. Woodward adverted to his dress, and said that he must appear in the costume of a gentleman, and must conduct himself with decorum, as the only conditions on which he could be admitted. He engaged to comply with both stipulations. When all things were prepared on the evening of the ball, the keepers entered his cell, dressed him in a decent suit of clothes, and led him to his seat among the musicians, and instantly the band struck up, and the dancing commenced. He played in perfect tune and time. One of the keepers was stationed behind him all the evening to prevent accidents, in case of his losing command of himself; but there was no need for his interfering. For three hours he continued to play and conduct himself with perfect propriety. At the end of two hours he complained of fatigue, and said that he believed that formerly he used, about this time, to receive a of a sick chamber; a charm was in and around her; a holy light seemed to pervade every thing belonging to her. There was a sacredness, if I may so express it, which seemed to tell the presence of the Divinity. Strangers felt it, all acknowledged it. Very few were admitted to her sick room, but those few left it with an elevation of heart, new, solemn, and delightful. She continued to ride out as long as the weather was mild, and even after she became too weak to walk, she frequently desired to be taken into the parlour, and when there, with all her little implements of drawing and writing, her books, and even her box and basket beside her, she seemed to think that by these little attempts at her usual employments, she could conceal from me, for she saw my heart was breaking, the ravages of disease and her consequent debility. The New Testament was her daily study, and a portion of every day was spent in private, in self-examination and prayer. My dear Miss Sedgwick, how I have felt my own littleness, my total unworthiness, when compared with this pure, this high-souled, intellectual, yet timid, humble child; bending at the altar of God, and pleading for pardon and acceptance in his sight, and grace to assist her in preparing for eternity. As her strength wasted, she often desired me to share her hours of retirement and converse with her, and read to her, when unable to read herself. Oh! how sad, how delightful, how agonising, is the memory of the sweet and holy communion we then enjoyed. Forgive me, my friend, for thus mingling my own feeling with the circumstances you wished to know; and, oh! continue to pray that God will give me submission under this desolating stroke. She was my darling, my almost idolised child: truly, truly, you have said, the charm of my existence. Her symptoms were extremely distressing, although she suffered no pain. A week before her departure, she desired that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper might be administered to her. 'Mother,' said she, 'I do not desire it because I feel worthy to receive it, I feel myself a sinner, but a desire to manifest my faith in Christ by receiving an ordinance instituted by himself but a short time before his crucifixion.' The Holy Sacrament was administered by Mr. Babcock. The solemnity of the scene can be better felt than described. I cannot attempt it. After it was over, a holy calm seemed to pervade her mind, and she looked almost like a beautiful spirit. The evening following, she said to me, 'Mother, I have made a solemn surrender of myself to God; if it is his will, I would desire to live long enough to prove the sincerity of my profession, but his will be done; living or dying, I am henceforth devoted to God.' After this, some doubt seemed to intrude—her spirit was troubled. I asked her if there was any thing she desired to have done, any little arrangements to be made, any thing to say which she had left unsaid, and assured her that her wishes should be sacred to me. She turned her eyes upon me with an expression so sad, so mournfully sweet: 'Mother, "When I can read my title clear to mansions in the skies," when I will think of other matters.' Her hair, which when a little child had been often cut to improve its growth, was now very beautiful; and she usually took much pains with it. During the whole course of her sickness, I had taken care of it. One day, not long before her death, she said, evidently making a great effort to speak with composure, 'Mother, if you are willing, I will have my hair cut off; it is troublesome; I should like it better short.' I understood her at once, she did not like to have the idea of death associated with those beautiful tresses which I had loved to braid. She would have them taken off while living. I mournfully gave my consent, and she said, 'I will not ask you, my dear mother, to do it; my friend, Mrs. F—— will be with me to-night, and she will do it for me.' The dark rich locks were severed at midnight; never shall I forget the expression of her young faded face, as I entered the room. 'Do not be agitated, dear mamma, I am more comfortable now. Lay it away, if you please, and to-morrow I will arrange and dispose of it. Do you know that I view my hair as something sacred? It is a part of myself, which will be reunited to my body at the resurrection. She had sat in an easy-chair, or reclined upon a sofa, for several weeks.

"On Friday, the 22d of November, at my urgent entreaty, she consented to be laid upon the bed. She found it a relief, and sunk into a deep sleep, from which she was only awake when I aroused her to take some refreshment. When she awoke, she looked and spoke like an angel, but soon dropped asleep as before. Oh! how my poor heart trembled, for I felt that it was but the precursor to her long last rest, although many of our friends thought she might yet linger some weeks. A total loss of appetite, and a difficulty in swallowing, prevented her from taking any nourishment throughout the day, and when we placed her in the easy-chair at night, in order to arrange her bed, I offered her some nice food, which I had prepared, and found she could not take it. My feelings amounted almost to agony. She said, 'Do not be distressed. I will take it by and by.' I seated myself beside her, and she said, 'Surely, my dear mother, you have many consolations. You are gathering a little family in heaven to welcome you.' My heart was full; when I could speak, I said, 'Yes, my love, I feel that I am indeed gathering a little family in heaven to bid you welcome, but when they are all assembled there, how dreadful to doubt whether I may ever be permitted to join the circle.' 'Oh hush, dear, dear, mother, do not indulge in such sad thoughts; the fact of your having trained this little band to inhabit that holy place, is sufficient evidence to me that you will not fail to join us there.' I was with her myself that night, and a friend in the neighbourhood sat up also. On Saturday morning, after I had taken half an hour's sleep, I found her quiet as a sleeping infant. I prepared her some food, and when I awoke her to take it, she said, 'Dear mother, I will try, if it is only to please you.' I fed her as I would have fed a babe. She smiled sweetly, and said, 'Mother, I am again an infant.' I asked if I should read to her; she said yes, she would like to have me read a part of the gospel of John. I did so, and then said, 'My dear Margaret, you look sweetly composed this morning. I trust all is peace within your heart.' 'Yes, mother, all is peace, sweet peace. I feel that I can do nothing for myself. I have cast my burden upon Christ.' I asked if she could rest her hopes there in perfect confidence. 'Yes,' she replied, 'Jesus will not fail me. I can trust him.' She then sank into a deep sleep, as on the preceding day. In the afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. H. came from Ballston; they were much affected by the change a few days had made in her appearance. I awoke her, fearing she might sleep too long; and said her friends had come. She extended her arms to them both, and kissed them, saying to Mr. H. that he found her a late riser, and then sank to sleep again. Mrs. H. remained with us that night. About sunset, I spoke to her. She awoke and answered me cheerfully, but observing that I was unusually depressed, she said, 'Dear mother, I am wearing you out.' I replied, 'My child, my beloved child, it is not that; the thought of our separation fills me with anguish.' I never shall forget the expression of her sweet face, as she replied, 'Mother, my own dear mother, do not grieve. Our parting will not be long, in life we were inseparable, and I feel that you cannot live without me. You will soon join me, and we shall part no more.' I kissed her pale cheek as I bent over her, and finding my agitation too strong to repress, I left the room. She soon after desired to get up; she said she must have a coughing fit, and she could bear it better in the chair. When there, she began to cough, and her distress was beyond description; her strength was soon exhausted, and we again carried her to the bed. She coughed from six until half past ten. I then prevailed on her to take some nutritious drink, and she fell asleep. My husband and Mrs. H. were both of them anxious that I should retire and get some rest, but I did not feel the want of it, and impressed as I was with the idea that this was the last night she would pass on earth, I could not go to bed. But others saw, not the change, and to satisfy them, I went at twelve to my room, which opened into hers. There I sat listening to every sound. All seemed quiet; I twice opened the door, and Mrs. H. said she slept, and had taken her drink as often as directed, and again urged me to go to bed. A little after two, I put on my night-dress, and laid down. Between three and four, Mrs. H. came in haste for ether. I pointed to the bottle, and sprang up. She said, I entreat, my dear Mrs. Davidson, that you do not rise; there is no sensible change, only a turn of oppression. She closed the door, and I hastened to rise, when Mrs. H. came again, and said Margaret has asked for her mother. I flew—she held the bottle of ether in her own hand, and pointed to her breast. I poured it on her head and chest. She revived. 'I am better now,' said she. 'Mother, you tremble, you are cold; put on your clothes.' I stepped to the fire, and threw on a wrapper, when she stretched out both her arms, and exclaimed, 'Mother, take me in your arms.' I raised her, and seating myself on the bed, passed my arms around her waist; her head dropped upon my bosom, and her expressive eyes were raised to mine. That look I never shall forget; it said, 'Tell me, mother, is this death.' I answered the appeal as if she had spoken. I laid my hand upon her white brow, a cold dew had gathered there, I spoke, 'Yes, my beloved, it is almost finished; you will soon be with Jesus.' She gave one more look, two or three short fluttering breaths, and all was over—her spirit was with its God—not a struggle or groan preceded her departure. Her father just came in time to witness her last breath. For a long half hour, I remained in the same position with the precious form of my lifeless child upon my bosom. I closed those beautiful eyes with my own hand. I was calm. I felt that I had laid my angel from my own breast, upon the bosom of her God. Her father and myself were alone. Her Sabbath commenced in heaven. Ours was opened in deep, deep anguish. Our sons, who had been sent for, had not arrived, and four days and nights did Ellen (our young nurse, whom Margaret dearly loved) and I watch over the sacred clay. I could not resign this mournful duty to strangers. Although no son or relative was with us in this sad and solemn hour, never did sorrowing strangers meet with more sympathy, than we received, in this hour of affliction, from the respected inhabitants of Saratoga. We shall carry with us through life the grateful remembrance of their kindness. And now, my dear madam, let me thank you for your kind consolatory letter; it has given me consolation. My Margaret, my now angel child, loved you tenderly. She recognised in yours a kindred mind, and I feel that her pure spirit will behold with delight your efforts to console her bereaved mother."

HOW TO ACQUIRE HIGH HEALTH.

Walker, in his "Original," lays down the following rules for attaining high health. They are worth remembering.

"First study to acquire a composure of mind and body. Avoid agitation or hurry of one or the other, especially just before and after meals, and whilst the process of digestion is going on. To this end, govern your temper—endeavour to look at the bright side of things—keep down as much as possible the unruly passions—discard envy, hatred, and malice, and lay your head upon your pillow in charity with all mankind. Let not your wants outrun your means. Whatever difficulties you have to encounter, be not perplexed, but only think what is right to do in the sight of Him who seeth all things, and bear without repining the result. When your meals are solitary, let your thoughts be cheerful; when they are social, which is better, avoid disputes, or serious argument, or unpleasant topics. 'Unquiet meals,' says Shakspeare, 'make ill digestions,' and the contrary is produced by easy conversations, a pleasant project, welcome news, or a lively companion. I advise wives not to entertain their husbands with domestic grievances about children or servants, not to ask for money, nor produce unpaid bills, nor propound unreasonable or provoking questions; and advise husbands to keep the cares and vexations of the world to themselves, but to be communicative of whatever is comfortable and cheerful and amusing."

LIFE AT THE BAR.

Lords Eldon and Stowell—Sons of a barge-master and small coal-dealer at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Lord Stowell borrowed forty pounds to go to the circuit, and both supported themselves for a time by their talents as private tutors.

Lord Tenterden—Son of a barber at Canterbury; he received an eleemosynary education, but obtained the means to go to college; while there, he enjoyed, from a company in the city of London, an exhibition of three pounds per annum until he took his degree. Some years since, in dining with the company, he very feelingly alluded to the circumstance, and expressed his gratitude.

Lord Gifford—Prior to his being called to the bar, articled to a solicitor near Exeter. His rise was chiefly owing to the interest of the Marchioness of Conyngham, to whom he was distantly related.

Lord Langdale, the Master of the Rolls—Not very long since an accoucheur, and married a daughter of Lord Oxford, whose family he had attended.

Sir John Williams, one of the Judges of the Queen's Bench—Son of a horse-dealer in Yorkshire.

General Wilde—An attorney in the city, in partnership with Mr. Knight: his brother is now an attorney on College Hill, Broad street.

Mr. Serjeant Talfourd—Son of a brewer, at Reading, in Berkshire; received the rudiments of his education at the Protestant Dissenters' Grammar-school, at Mill Hill, near Hendon, and at that time wrote for the public press; he completed his studies with Dr. Talpy, of Reading.

Sir Frederick Pollock, and his brother, Mr. David Pollock—The sons of a saddler of that name, now Messrs. Cuff's establishment, near Charing Cross.

Mr. Baron Gurney—His mother kept a small bookshop for pamphlets in a court in the city; his brother is short-hand writer to the Houses of Lords and Commons. The baron was originally of the denomination called baptists, and for many years attended a baptist chapel in Maize Pond, in the Borough.

Sir John Campbell, the Attorney-General, and son-in-law of Lord Abinger—Reporter to a daily paper, at a time when such labour was worse paid than at present.

Mr. Serjeant Spankie was one of his colleagues. James Stephen, Esq., the Master in Chancery—Also a reporter.

Almost all the judges sent out to the colonies were reporters, and of the present reporters for the daily papers, the greater part are barristers.

Mr. Wallace, of the Irish bar, and M. P., was formerly a weaver.

Sir Edward B. Sugden—Son of a barber, was formerly a clerk to Mr. Groom, the conveyancer. It is remarkable that the admission of Sir Edward was opposed on the ground that he had been a clerk, and but for the exertion of that most amiable man, and ornament to his profession, the late Mr. Hargrave, who contended for his admission, on the ground that, whatever he had been, he was a man of talent, and had written a book which displayed qualifications of a superior order, he would now have been any thing but Sir Edward Burtenshaw Sugden, ex-Chancellor of Ireland.

Mr. Platt, queen's counsel—Son of a gentleman who was clerk to Lord Ellenborough.

Mr. Petersdorff's father kept a furrier's shop.

Mr. Turner, of the home circuit—Formerly in partnership with Mr. Pranthor, an attorney in the city of London.

Mr. Clarkson, of the Old Bailey—His father was an attorney in the Insolvent Debtors' Court on its first formation.

Mr. Charlton, queen's counsel—His father is an attorney, and now in practice in Chancery Lane.

These are only a few of the examples of modern times. The greater number, perhaps, of the departed members of the profession who became distinguished in their times, arose much in the same manner.

Chief Justice Saunders, whose precepts to this day form the best text-book to pleaders, was a beggar boy, first taken notice of by an attorney, who employed him in his office.

Lord Kenyon—An attorney's clerk.

Lord Hardwicke—A peasant, and afterwards an attorney's waiter and office-boy.

Lord Thurlow, himself an illustration of his own rule, used to say that the surest cause of success to a barrister, was "parts and poverty."

When Erskine and Curran once dined with the Prince of Wales, afterwards George the Fourth, the prince gave as a toast, "The Bar!" Erskine said he owed every thing to the bar; and Curran added, "Then what must I say, since it has raised me from the condition of a peasant to the table of my prince." Erskine, when first at the bar, was afraid to go to his chambers, lest he should encounter the ire of his washerwoman; he finally took courage, and entering the same, found to his infinite joy, a brief with twenty guineas by its side! The attorney who sent the brief, did so from a conviction of his great powers of eloquence, which he displayed while conversing with a knot of persons in Lincoln's Inn Hall, and near to the spot where his statue now stands.

NEW BOOKS.

Author's Classical Dictionary.

Few of the old-fashioned scholars of our school-boy days expected ever to see Lempriere's Classical Dictionary superseded. It was the oracle—the final tribunal. But its day is now gone by. The new work of Professor Anthon has "done its business." It will henceforth be considered a book that was an authority.

The new work is every way worthy of Dr. Anthon's gigantic reputation for scholarship. Every authority, ancient or recent, which is worthy of notice, appears to have been carefully consulted in the preparation of each article; and the lights thrown upon ancient history, biography, and antiquities, by the researches of late English and German writers, have been concentrated upon the subjects brought into view in this comprehensive and elegant manual. It forms a sort of cyclopaedia of the ancient world; which may be profitably used as a daily book of reference, not merely by the students in colleges and academies, (to whom it will hereafter be considered indispensable,) but by the divine, the general reader of history, and, in short, by all who claim the distinction of a familiar acquaintance with those subjects which form the basis of classical allusions in all works of polite literature.

The student who places this volume of Dr. Anthon's on his desk, within reach, at the beginning of his course of academical study, and perseveres in referring to it on all points which present themselves in the course of his reading, within its sphere, will prove immeasurably superior in general intelligence to those of his classmates, who pass over names and allusions without any attempt to understand them any farther than is necessary to enable them to read the text.

The Tragedy of the Seas.

This is a collection of the most recent disasters occasioned by sea and steamboat navigation. Most of the narratives are original and fresh, not having previously appeared in book form. The embellishments are very numerous and extraordinary. The designs are exceedingly original; but they were evidently not done by Harvey or Horace Vernet.

The volume is a popular one, and may be had at any of the bookstores.

The History of a Flirt.

An interesting novel; the work, evidently, of a pretty close observer of character, as it develops itself in the higher circles of society. The lessons it conveys, should be carefully pondered by young ladies who are just entering upon a career of fashion and conquest.

Barnaby Rudge. No. 5.

This number is more spirited than any preceding one. Never were two characters contrasted in a dialogue with more complete comic effect than in the conversation between Mr. Cheater and his son. We commend this chapter to the special notice of the playwrights. It is a first rate study for them.

Charles O'Malley.

The new number came out a few days since. It is, as usual, redolent of fun and frolic. The scene where old Mr. Free lays the ghost, is one of the best in the whole work.

Sermons on Revivals, by Rev. Albert Barnes; with an Introduction, by Rev. Joel Parker, D. D. New York: John S. Taylor; Philadelphia: R. S. H. George, 1841.

A work on so interesting a subject as that of revivals, by the Coryphæus of the liberal party of the presbyterians, will naturally attract great attention. Mr. Barnes enjoys a very high reputation for learning and ability. His commentaries on the Bible have made him known throughout the Christian world. His friends will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining copies of this popular little volume for the use of Sunday schools, and for gratuitous distribution.

Hunt's Merchant's Magazine.

The June number of this highly useful periodical was punctually issued. It contains the usual amount of commercial and miscellaneous information, and exhibits the same attention and ability on the part of the editor which has been so frequently and justly commended.

Masterman Ready. New York: Appleton & Co.

The promise made some time since by Captain Marryat, to write a book for children, is now redeemed. It is a delightful story in the Robinson Crusoe vein, full of all sorts of agreeable instruction in the arts of life.

Dining Out. New York: Appleton & Co.

This and the last named work are volumes of the popular series, "Tales for the People and their Children." "The Dangers of Dining Out," by Mrs. Ellis, is probably one of the best temperance stories ever written. It will be extensively read, and will save many a one from the errors of his ways.

Campbell's Life of Petrarch. Philadelphia: Carey & Hart.

Had Petrarch been at liberty to choose a biographer who should do ample justice to his character as a poet, a scholar, and a man, he could not have chosen a better than the author of "The Pleasures of Hope." Mr. Campbell's exquisite sense of the beautiful and the touching, his fine taste and his extensive erudition, were fully evinced in his Lectures on English Poetry. His powers as a critic are not less apparent in the work before us, while the peculiar talents of the lively raconteur appear in the narrative and descriptive portions of the "Life."

The mechanical execution is first rate—a comely octavo, with elegant type, paper, and binding. Mr. Campbell will not complain of being slighted by his American publishers.

Family Secrets. By Mrs. ELLIS. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1841.

The first number of this series contains "The Dangers of Dining Out," and "The Confessions of a Maniac," by Mrs. Ellis. Both are temperance tales, calculated to produce very extensive and beneficial effects on society. The beauty of the style, and the interesting character of the stories, will commend them to general favour; and the moral application is so strong and direct, that it cannot be eluded by any artifice of self-deception.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

Some persons are apt to contrast the acquisition of important knowledge with what they call simple pleasures; and deem it more becoming that a woman should educate flowers, make friendships with birds, and pick up plants, than enter into more difficult and fatiguing studies. If a woman has no taste and genius for higher occupations, let her engage in these, to be sure, rather than remain destitute of any pursuit. But why are we necessarily to doom a girl, whatever her taste or her capacity, to one unvaried line of petty and frivolous occupation? If she is full of strong sense and elevated curiosity, can there be any reason why she should be diluted and enfeebled down to a mere culler of simples, and fancier of birds?—why books of history and reasoning are to be torn out of her hand, and why she is to be sent, like a butterfly, to hover over the idle flowers of the field? Such amusements are innocent to those whom they can occupy; but they are not innocent to those who have too powerful understandings to be occupied by them. Light froths and fruits are innocent food only to weak or to infant stomachs; but they are poison to that organ in its perfect and mature state. But the great charm appears to be in the word simplicity—simple pleasures! If by a simple pleasure is meant an innocent pleasure, the observation is best answered by showing, that the pleasure which results from the acquisition of important knowledge is quite as innocent as any pleasure whatever: but if by a simple pleasure is meant one, the cause of which does not last long, or which can be easily analysed, or which in itself is very faint, then simple pleasures seem to be very nearly synonymous with small pleasures; and if the simplicity were to be a little increased, the pleasure would vanish altogether.

As it is impossible that every man should have industry or activity sufficient to avail himself of the advantages of education, it is natural that men who are ignorant themselves should view, with some degree of jealousy and alarm, any proposal for improving the education of women. But such men may depend upon it, however the system of female education may be exalted, that there will never be wanting a due proportion of sillies; and that after parents, guardians, and receptors have done all in their power to make every body wise, there will still be a plentiful supply of women who have taken special care to remain otherwise; and they may rest assured, the utter extinction of ignorance and folly is the evil they dread, that their interests will always be effectually protected, in spite of every exertion to the contrary.

We must in candour allow, that those women who begin will have something more to overcome than may probably hereafter be the case. We cannot deny the jealousy which exists among pompous and foolish men respecting the education of women. There is a class of pedants, who would be cut short in the estimation of the world a whole cubit, if it were generally known that a young lady of eighteen could be taught to decline the tenses of the middle voice, or acquaint herself with the Æolic varieties of that celebrated language. Then women have, of course, all ignorant men for enemies to their instruction, who being bound (as they think), in point of sex, to know more, are not well pleased, in point of fact, to know less. But, among men of sense and liberal politeness, a woman, who has successfully cultivated her mind, without diminishing the gentleness and propriety of her manners, is always sure to meet with a respect and attention bordering upon enthusiasm.

There is in either sex a strong and permanent disposition to appear agreeable to the other: and this is the fair answer to those who are fond of supposing that a higher degree of knowledge would make women rather the rivals than the companions of men. Presupposing such a desire to please, it seems much more probable, that a common pursuit should be a fresh source of interest, than a source of contention. Indeed, to suppose that any mode of education can create a general jealousy and rivalry between the sexes, is so very ridiculous, that it requires only to be stated in order to be refuted. The same desire of pleasing secures all that delicacy and reserve which are of such inestimable value to women. We are quite astonished, in hearing men converse on such subjects, to find them attributing such beautiful effects to ignorance. It would appear, from the tenor of such objections, that ignorance had been the great civiliser of the world. Women are delicate and refined, only because they are ignorant;—they manage their household, only because they are ignorant;—they attend to their children, only because they know no better. Now, we must really confess, we have all our lives been so ignorant as not to know the value of ignorance. We have always attributed the modesty and the refined manners of women, to their being well taught in moral and religious duty,—to the hazardous situation in which they are placed,—to that perpetual vigilance which it is their duty to exercise over thought, word, and action,—and to that cultivation of the mild virtues, which those who cultivate the stern and magnanimous virtues expect of every body. After all, let it be remembered, we are not saying there are no objections to the diffusion of knowledge among the female sex. We would not hazard such a proposition respecting any thing; but we are saying, that, upon the whole, it is the best method of employing time; and that there are fewer objections to it than to any other method. There are, perhaps, 50,000 females in Great Britain who are exempted by circumstances from all necessary labour: but every human being must do something with their existence; and the pursuit of knowledge is, upon the whole, the most innocent, the most dignified, and the most useful method of filling up that idleness, of which there is always so large a portion in nations far advanced in civilisation. Let any man reflect, too, upon the solitary situation in which women are placed,—the ill treatment to which they are sometimes exposed, and which they must endure in silence, and without the power of complaining,—and he must feel convinced that the happiness of a woman will be materially increased in proportion as education has given to her the habit and the means of drawing her resources from herself.

There are a few common phrases in circulation, respecting the duties of women, to which we wish to pay some degree of attention, because they are rather inimical to those opinions which we have advanced on this subject. Indeed, independently of this, there is nothing which requires more vigilance than the current phrases of the day, of which there are always some resorted to in every dispute, and from the sovereign authority of which it is often vain to make any appeal. "The true theatre for a woman is the sick chamber;"—"Nothing so honourable to a woman as not to be spoken of at all." These two phrases, the delight of Noddledom, are grown into commonplaces upon the subject; and are not unfrequently employed to distinguish that love of knowledge in women, which, in our humble opinion, it is of so much importance to cherish. Nothing, certainly, is so ornamental and delightful in women as the benevolent virtues; but time cannot be filled up, and life employed, with high and impassioned virtues. Some of these feelings are of rare occurrence—all of short duration—or nature would sink under them. A scene of distress and anguish is an occasion where the finest qualities of the female mind may be displayed; but it is a monstrous exaggeration to tell women that they are born only for scenes of distress and anguish. Nurse, father, mother, sister, and brother, if they want it;—it would be a violation of the plainest duties to neglect them. But, when we are talking of the common occupations of life, do not let us mistake the accidents for the occupations;—when we are arguing how the twenty-three hours of the day are to be filled up, it is idle to tell us of those feelings and agitations, above the level of common existence, which may employ the remaining hour. Compassion, and every other virtue, are the great objects we all ought to have in view; but no man (and no woman) can fill up the twenty-four hours by acts of virtue. But one is a lawyer, and the other a ploughman, and the third a merchant; and then, acts of goodness, and intervals of compassion and fine feeling, are scattered up and down the common occupations of life. We know women are to be compassionate; but they cannot be compassionate from eight o'clock in the morning till twelve at night;—and what are they to do in the interval? This is the only question we have been putting all along, and is all that can be meant by literary education.

Then, again, as to the notoriety which is incurred by literature.—The cultivation of knowledge is a very distinct thing from its publication; nor does it follow that a woman is to become an author, merely because she has talent enough for it. We do not wish a lady to write books,—to defend and reply,—to squabble about the tomb of Achilles, or the plain of Troy,—any more than we wish her to dance at the opera, to play at a public concert, or to put pictures in the exhibition, because she has learned music, dancing and drawing. The great use of her knowledge will be, that it contributes to her private happiness. She may make it public; but it is not the principal object which the friends of female education have in view. Among men, the few who write bear no comparison to the many who read. We hear most of the former, indeed, because they are, in general, the most ostentatious part of literary men; but there are innumerable men, who, without ever laying themselves before the public, have made use of literature to add to the strength of their understandings, and to improve the happiness of their lives. After all, it may be an evil for ladies to be talked of; but we really think those ladies who are talked of only as Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Barbauld, and Mrs. Hamilton are talked of, may bear their misfortunes with a very great degree of Christian patience; and such singular examples of ill fortune may perhaps render the school of adversity a little more popular than it is at present.

Their exemption from all the necessary business of life is one of the most powerful motives for the improvement of education in women. Lawyers and physicians have in their professions a constant motive to exertion; if you neglect their education, they must in a certain degree educate themselves by their commerce with the world: they must learn caution, accuracy, and judgment, because they must incur responsibility. But if you neglect to educate the mind of a woman, by the speculative difficulties which occur in literature, it can never be educated at all: if you do not effectually rouse it by education, it must remain for ever languid. Uneducated men may escape intellectual degradation; uneducated women cannot. They have nothing to do; and if they come untaught from the schools of education, they will never be instructed in the school of events.

Women have not their livelihood to gain by knowledge; and that is one motive for relaxing all those efforts which are made in the education of men. They certainly have not; but they have happiness to gain, to which knowledge leads as probably as it does to profit; and that is a reason against mistaken indulgence. Besides, we conceive the labour and fatigue of accomplishments, to be quite equal to the labour and fatigue of knowledge; and that it takes quite as many years to be charming as it does to be learned.

Another difference of the sexes is, that women are attended to, and men attend. All acts of courtesy and politeness originate from the one sex, and are received by the other. We can see no sort of reason, from this diversity of condition, for giving to women a trifling and insignificant education; but we see in it a very powerful reason for strengthening their judgment, and inspiring them with the habit of employing time usefully. We admit many striking differences in the situation of the two sexes, and many striking differences of understanding, proceeding from the different circumstances in which they are placed: but there is not a single difference of this kind which does not afford a new argument for making the education of women better than it is. They have nothing serious to do;—is that a reason why they should be brought up to do nothing but what is trifling? They are exposed to greater dangers;—is that a reason why their faculties are to be purposely and industriously weakened? They are to form the characters of future men;—is that a cause why their own characters are to be broken and frittered down as they now are? In short, there is not a single trait in that diversity of circumstances, in which the two sexes are placed, that does not decidedly prove the magnitude of the error we commit in neglecting (as we do neglect) the education of women.

If the objections against the better education of women could be overruled, one of the great advantages that would ensue would be the extinction of innumerable follies. A decided and prevailing taste for one or another mode of education there must be. A century past, it was for housewifery—now it is for accomplishments. The object now is, to make women artists,—to give them an excellence in drawing, music, painting, and dancing,—of which, persons who make these pursuits the occupation of their lives, and derive from them their subsistence, need not be ashamed. Now, one great evil of all this is, that it does not last. If the whole of life, as somebody says, were an olympic game,—if we could go on feasting and dancing to the end,—this might do; but this is merely a provision for the little interval between coming into life, and settling in it; while it leaves a long and dreary expanse behind, devoid both of dignity and cheerfulness. No mother, no woman who has passed over the few first years of life, sings, or dances, or draws, or plays upon musical instruments. These are merely means for displaying the grace and vivacity of youth, which every woman gives up, as she gives up the dress and the manners of eighteen; she has no wish to retain them; or, if she has, she is driven out of them by diameter and derision. The system of female education, as it now stands, aims only at embellishing a few years of life, which are in themselves so full of grace and happiness, that they hardly want it; and then leaves the rest of existence a miserable prey to idle insignificance. No woman of understanding and reflection can possibly conceive she is doing justice to her children by such kind of education. The object is, to give to children resources that will endure as long as life endures, —habits that time will ameliorate, not destroy,—occupations that will render sickness tolerable, solitude pleasant, age venerable, life more dignified and useful, and therefore death less terrible: and the compensation which is offered for the omission of all this, is a short-lived blaze,—a little temporary effect, which has no other consequence than to deprive the remainder of life of all taste and relish. There may be women who have a taste for the fine arts, and who erine a decided talent for drawing or for music. In that case, there can be no objection to their cultivation; but the error is, to make these things the grand and universal object,—to insist upon it in every woman is to sing, and draw, and dance—with nature or against nature,—to bind her apprenticeship to some accomplishment, and, if she cannot succeed in oil or water colours, to prefer gilding, varnishing, burnishing, box making, or shoe-making, to real and solid improvement in taste, knowledge, and understanding.—Rev. Sydney Smith.

SPENSER AND SHAKSPEARE

Spenser's epithalamium on his own marriage, written in 1594, is of a far higher mood than anything we have named. It is a strain redolent of a bridegroom's joy and of a poet's fancy. The English language seemed to expand itself with a copiousness unknown before, while he pours forth the varied imagery of this splendid little poem. I do not know any other nuptial song, ancient or modern, of equal beauty. It is an intoxication of ecstasy, ardent, noble, and pure. But it pleased not Heaven, that these day dreams of genius and virtue should be undisturbed.

The language of Spenser, like that of Shakspeare, is an instrument manufactured for the sake of the work it was to perform. No other poet had written like either, though both have had their imitators.

SHAKSPEARE.—Of William Shakspeare, whom, through the mouth of those whom he has inspired to body forth the modifications of his immense mind, we seem to know better than any human writer, it may be truly said we scarcely know anything. We see him, so far as we do see him, not in himself, but in a reflex image from the objectivity in which he was manifested; he is Falstaff, and Mercutio, and Malvolio, and Jacques, and Portia, and Imogen, and Lear and Othello; but to us he is scarcely a determined person, a substantial reality of past time, the man Shakspeare. The two greatest names in poetry are to us little more than names.

If we are not yet come to question his unity, if we do that of "the blind old man of Scio's rocky isle," an improvement of critical acuteness doubtless reserved for a distant posterity, we as little feel the power of identifying the young man who came from Stratford, was afterward an indifferent player at a London theatre, and retired to his native place a middle life, with the author of Macbeth and Lear, as we can give a distinct historic personality to either. All that insatiable curiosity and unrelenting diligence have hitherto detected about Shakspeare, serves rather to disappoint and perplex us, than to furnish us the slightest illustration of his character. It is not the register of his baptism, or the draught of his will, or the autography of his name that we seek. No letter of his writing, no record of his conversation, no character of him drawn with fulness by a contemporary, can be produced.

There never was a generation in England which for worldly prudence and wise observation of mankind, stood higher than the subjects of Elizabeth. Rich in men of strong mind, that age has given us a discipline unknown to ourselves; the strictness of the Tudor government, the suspicious temper of the queen, the spirit not only of intolerance, but ofquisitiveness as to religious dissent, the uncertainty of the future, produced a caution rather foreign glass of wine. A glass of wine was given to him, he drank it, and played on, till the close of the entertainment. He was then reconducted to his cell, and had hardly entered it when he recommenced tearing his clothes. In Dr. Conolly's instructive Report on the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum, 1840, he remarks, that "the principle of changing all the circumstances surrounding a lunatic is evidently one capable of application in certain cases, and in certain periods of the malady, with singularly felicitous effects." (P. 26.) This instance in the text shows how powerfully a change of circumstances may affect a lunatic even in the most hopeless condition. In this case, the effect was temporary, but it was great while it lasted.

Dr. Woodward mentioned that he allows about one fourth of the inmates of the Asylum to go into the village on specific errands unattended, and only one man has escaped; and he did so after being enticed by some acquaintance to drink. Social parties, with music and dancing, are given from time to time, which, with religious worship on Sundays, have an excellent effect on the minds of the patients. The music is supplied entirely by the patients themselves.

I saw in the hospital a woman, who, in a fit of religious and destructive mania, had attempted to cut off the heads of two of her children. Philoprogenitiveness was deficient, and Destructiveness enormously large. A man who is insane in regard to wealth, imagining himself to possess incalculable riches, has the organs of Acquisitiveness standing forth in such ample size and well defined forms, that they attract the eye in looking at him even in passing. Ideality is also large, and in his imagination he applies his wealth to gorgeous purposes. There were other striking examples of the concomitance between the peculiar features of monomania and the size of particular organs in the brain; and Dr. Woodward expressed his surprise how any man, living in charge of a hospital for the insane, and capable of mental analysis and physical observation, reasonably acquainted with Phrenology, could avoid conviction of its truth.*

He mentions that he receives many shoemakers as patients. This class is numerous in New England; but he believes that insanity is produced beyond an average extent among them by their breathing vitiated air in their hot, small workshops, without ventilation, and by their unfavourable position when working. The frequent mention of bad ventilation in this work may appear to some of my readers almost like a monomania on the subject in its author, but the evidence of its injurious consequences meets one every where. "Dr. Lombard, whose researches (into the causes of pulmonary consumption) are founded on a total of 4300 deaths from phthisis, and 54,572 individuals exercising 220 different occupations, found by a comparison of all the professions carried on in the open air and in workshops, that the proportion of deaths from phthisis was double among the latter, and this proportion increased as the apartments were close, narrow, and imperfectly ventilated." Dr. Woodward mentioned that he receives also many sailors as patients, whose insanity is produced by intemperance and exposure to severe hardships at sea. The cure in cases of less duration than one year amounts to 86 per cent. on an average of six years.

Dr. Woodward has published a valuable pamphlet, strongly urging the advantage of instituting "asylums for inebriates." His reasoning may be briefly stated thus: "1. Intemperance is a physical disease. 2. It is curable in the great majority of cases, if not always. 3. The greatest existing difficulty in effecting this end commonly arises from the extent of the temptation to which the patient is uniformly exposed. 4. The best remedy for this state of things is to confine the individual, with a view to the avoidance of this temptation, and to the adoption of whatever other measures are necessary for this cure—till he is cured—under charge of an institution expressly adapted to the purpose." The subject has attracted considerable attention in the United States; and as Dr. Woodward's views are unquestionably sound, both physiologically and morally, I hope to see Massachusetts adding to her other claims to public admiration, that of being the first to carry his suggestions into effect.

Jan. 9. 1840. Journey from Springfield to Albany.—The cold has been as low as 8° below zero, and the ground is deeply covered with snow. The distance to Albany is eighty miles, and the road lies over mountains. It has been impassable for some days, but is now open; and as the thermometer is 5° above zero, the sky bright, and no wind, we resolved to proceed on our journey. We hired an exclusive extra mounted on two sleigh-runners and drawn by four horses. At half past 9 P. M. we reached Stockbridge, and found an excellent room provided for us in Mr. Gilpin's inn, by the kind attention of Mrs. Charles Sedgewick. This excellent family we found in affliction. Miss Catharine Sedgewick is in Italy with her brother, who is labouring under very infirm health, and Mr. Theodore Sedgewick, senior, lately died suddenly of apoplexy at Pittsfield. They are distinguished in the United States for their superior talents and virtues.

I select the following description of this day's journey from C's. Journal:—"I never saw so much snow in my life, except at the Grindelwald Glacier, as on this journey, and never any so brilliantly, beautifully, bluely white. Wherever the wind had drifted it into little irregularities, or chinks had opened, we looked into crannies and miniature arches of the most intense sky colour, often appearing like the porticos to fairy palaces, and so mysteriously lovely that I longed to be a sylph and explore them, if so be that sylphs be insensible to cold. In other places the lovely unsullied wreaths were hanging about the snake fences and the small evergreen trees, in the most graceful draperies, and on some of the inequalities in the ground beside us, as we moved along, lay as in little waves, or were spread out in chiseled smoothness. The sun's rays reflected so many diamonds from the surface of the snow, that I was forced to close my eyes. The clearer atmosphere of this country must tend to these appearances, which I never noticed at home."

Next morning we proceeded towards Albany, and again I borrow C's. description.—"The worst of the road was to come. We found it full of 'pitch-holes,' and unfortunately our next sleigh was one of a very inferior description. Pitch-holes mean holes in the snow into which the runners of the sleigh descend with horrid jerks, and in rising out of which the traveller is pitched up high off his seat, on which he again descends with a solid thump. The jolts and jars were so incessant and so severe that my spine literally felt as if shortened a couple of inches by the crushing of the cartilages between the several bones. We dined at Chatham, and were again transferred to another sleigh; it was an old, dirty, wooden box, with the cobwebs of last summer hanging from the top and interstices between the deals of the roof, through which sun, wind, rain, and snow, had full liberty of ingress when they chose. A little before dark we crossed the Hudson on solid ice, and immediately drove to the Mansion House hotel."

Albany from 10th January to 11th February.—We remained in Albany during this interval. I delivered a course of twelve lectures on Phrenology in the Hall of the Female Academy, and was honoured by the attendance of an audience exceeding 200 persons, who received the lectures in the best spirit. On the 17th of January the thermometer fell during the night to 30° below zero, and it was frequently 10°, 15°, and 20° below that point. I suffered no inconvenience from it; and on three nights of the week emerged from a temperature of 70° or 75° in the lecture-room, to these low degrees in the external air, without the slightest unpleasant sensation, except that I felt cold in the balls of my eyes, a feeling which I never experienced before. Occasionally the wind was high, and the cold was then intolerably severe; when the weather was calm, it was comparatively little felt. It was amusing, on these intensely cold days, to observe the efforts of the pigs, dogs, and poultry, to screen themselves from the wind and obtain a few consolatory rays of heat from the brilliant sun. Fortunately the wind came from some points north of west, and they most ingeniously found out the lea and sunny side of projecting stairs, logs of wood, banks of earth, and other masses of matter, and stood in groups drinking in the heat. The horses, that had been driven into perspiration, came into the town like moving automata of frost work, every long hair being the centre of an icicle. I was surprised to discover the extraordinary degree of cold which these animals sustain with impunity. I saw them standing round the churches, tied to stakes or trees, with only a rug or buffalo skin thrown over them, for hours in succession, during divine service. The stables are made of only half-inch boards, and the joints are not covered; so that they form a slender protection from the cold; yet the horses are said to be healthy. One gentleman, who had passed some winters in Canada, told me that he saw a curious compact carried into effect in his own stable between his horse and his poultry. The moment that his horse was unharnessed and tied up in its stall, in winter, a whole flock of ducks, geese, turkeys, and hens, descended on his person and covered every inch of his horizontal surface from his eyes to his tail, and squatted down upon him. They gave and received warmth, much to the gratification of both parties. I saw the work of excavation proceeding in forming a new street. The earth, when newly exposed, steamed with excessive heat; it was 70° or 80° warmer than the air. Innumerable steamboats, barges, sloops, and boats, were frozen up in the river and docks, and the ice, 15 or 18 inches thick, seems like adamant around them. One wonders how they will ever get out. There is much sleighing on the river, and the mail coaches, coming from New York, travel many miles on it. The interiors of the houses are preserved comfortably warm by means of large fires of anthracite coal.

Albany Female Academy.—This may be described as a college for young ladies, administered by trustees, and supported to some extent by the state. In this institution Captain Maryat has forfeited some reputation. He mentions, that at the public examination he secretly assisted the young ladies with their French exercises, and received their acknowledgments confidentially for the favour; the young ladies maintain that all the rules of gallantry prescribed to the Captain an inviolable and eternal secrecy on the subject; instead of observing which he has published an account of the whole transaction in his work on America; betraying their confidence, and, as they say, at the same time, indulging his own vanity. The teacher in whose department the alleged assistance was given, denies the possibility of such an incident having occurred without her having detected the Captain's interference; but this point must be settled between themselves. There is only one opinion, however, among all the ladies, young and old, plain and pretty, of the United States, who have read the Captain's narrative—that, if his own story be literally correct, it was very unlike a British naval officer to reciprocate confidential favours with young ladies, and then to boast of his own achievement. I attended part of the semi-annual public examination of the academy, which commenced on Tuesday the 4th of February, 1840, and was continued on the Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday immediately following.

The senior classes were composed of young ladies apparently from fifteen to seventeen years of age, and their attainments were highly creditable to themselves and to their teachers. They had committed to memory a vast extent of details in history, astronomy, chemistry, physiology, and the other branches before enumerated. It was mentioned by some persons, however, that they are stimulated to excess by emulation, and that they occasionally ruin their health by their exertions to gain prizes. This error is a serious one, for when knowledge is acquired by laborious efforts, not for its own sake, but to gratify the feelings of Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation, its practical value is not appreciated and it escapes from the memory when the gratification for which it was acquired has been attained. Information on the contrary, recommended to the intellect by its inherent interest, and embraced by the moral affections from its practical utility, will become the stock and furniture of the mind through life, and, however limited in amount, it will be all real, and permanently available. Much solid instruction, however, is obviously communicated in this academy. In the examinations, in chemistry, for example, the young ladies, without assistance or directions, performed numerous experiments, and gave the theory of the chemical actions involved in them. In the examinations on astronomy, they referred to an admirable orrery, as to a text book, with clear intelligence; and so in the other branches. It was in history that the memory seemed to be chiefly overtaken, and, viewing their studies in the aggregate, the quantity of matter included in them appeared to be too burdensome to ordinary minds.

Dr. Sprague's Collection of Autographs.—Dr. Sprague's collection of autographs surprised me more than any other object in Albany. It is exceedingly extensive, rich, and valuable, and has been formed entirely by himself. He has whole volumes of autographs of literary men, embracing both the kingdoms of Europe and the United States, and more than one devoted to those of crowned heads, and extending over several centuries. He has correspondents in the European cities who procure for him new treasures as they appear. There are probably few more valuable collections in Europe.

The extreme cold, added to the severe suffering inflicted on C— during the drive from Stockbridge to Albany, unfortunately involved her in much indisposition. She was confined to bed, and continued an invalid during our whole stay in Albany. We experienced fresh instances of American benevolence. The Rev. Dr. Sprague kindly offered to receive us both into his house, and his daughter offered to become C—'s nurse; other female friends offered unreserved attendance on her in her illness. Dr. M'Naughten, a Scottish physician, was most assiduous and successful in his treatment of her, and altogether, although I was prevented by this occurrence from going into society, or extending the circle of my acquaintances, we received renewed proofs of the generous kindness of the inhabitants. Just as the lectures terminated, C— was able to travel, and Dr. M'Naughten recommended to her to set out as speedily as possible for a more genial locality.

Having received an invitation to deliver a course of twelve lectures on Phrenology in New Haven, Connecticut, the seat of Yale College, we left Albany on the 12th, sleighed to Hartford, and proceeded thence by the railroad to New Haven, where we arrived on the 15th of February. On the 16th February the thermometer stood at 15°, which seemed a mild and almost a bland temperature, after having been accustomed to —15°, —20°, and —28°, at Albany.

New Haven.—We remained in New Haven from the 15th of February to the 20th of March. The audience attending my class included most of the professors, and a portion of the students of Yale College, and a large number of the citizens. It was the largest class, in proportion to the population, which I have had in the United States. Our accommodations in the Tontine Hotel were excellent; the town even in winter is beautiful and peaceful; we enjoyed the most agreeable and enlightened society; and C—'s convalescence was rapid and satisfactory. We had the pleasure of cultivating the acquaintance of Professor Silliman, whose scientific reputation stands high, not only in the United States, but in Europe. "The American Journal of Science and Arts," which has now reached its thirty-eighth volume, has long been, and still is conducted by him with the most indefatigable zeal, and serves as the grand channel by which the discoveries of the old and new continents are reciprocally interchanged. He is a man of the most amiable and interesting character, full of kindness, and his manner is so pleasing that it is a common observation in Boston and New York, where he occasionally delivers lectures, that he can speak more plain truths to his class, without giving offence, than almost any other lecturer they hear. In the United States no man's status is lowered by employing his talents usefully, and the most distinguished professors in colleges lecture occasionally to popular audiences in the different towns without any derogation from their dignity. In New Haven we met also Professor Olmsted, Dr. Taylor, whom I have already mentioned, Mr. Noah Webster, the Johnson of New Haven, Mr. Trumbull, the distinguished historical painter of the United States, the friend of Washington and Franklin, and who still uses his brush, Professor Hooker, Mr. Skinner, and other highly accomplished men. The comparative repose which this residence permitted I employed in throwing together some general ideas founded on the observations which have already been detailed. These I shall now present to the reader.

CHAPTER XXII.

March 20. American Civilisation.—Mons. Guizot, in his "History of Civilisation in Europe," has well observed that the degree of civilisation which any age or country has attained is indicated by the "development of social activity, and that of individual activity; the progress of society, and the progress of humanity. Wherever the external condition of man is quickened and ameliorated—wherever the internal nature of man is exhibited with lustre and grandeur—upon these two signs the human race applauds and proclaims civilisation, often in spite of fundamental imperfections in the social state." Let us apply these principles to the United States.

In no country, probably, in the world is the external condition of man so high as in the American Union. The enterprise, intelligence, activity and economical habits of the people have multiplied to an astonishing extent all the physical elements of human enjoyment. It was observed to me by a gentleman who is minutely and extensively acquainted with the United States, that in this country no man, who is able and willing to work, need go supperless to bed. In this he far understated the fact. Labourers here are rich, compared with the individuals in the same class in Europe. Their food is wholesome and abundant; their dwelling-houses comfortable and well furnished; they possess property, and enjoy many of the luxuries which property, in a state of civilisation, is capable of purchasing. The American cities contain great wealth; and reckoning the whole property, and the whole population of the Union, and dividing the value of the one by the sum of the other, my impression is that the product would show a larger amount of wealth for each individual in the United States, than exists in any other country in the world, Great Britain alone probably excepted. In the United States this property is so equally diffused, that it is really national.

The formation of railroads and canals, the multiplication of steamboats, ships, machinery, manufactories, and houses, the extension of the productive soil; in short, the advance of all that ministers to the well-being of "the external condition of man," proceeds in the United States on a gigantic scale, and with extraordinary rapidity. We must grant, therefore, that whatever other "imperfection" may exist "in the social state," this fundamental element of civilisation abounds in a high degree.

The condition of the "internal nature" of man is the next index to civilisation. The human mind is endowed with animal propensities, moral and religious sentiments, and intellectual faculties fitted for observation and reflection. The propensities and sentiments are blind impulsive powers, which inspire man with desires, and impel him to seek for their gratification; but they do not discern either the mode of obtaining their own objects, or the extent to which they may be advantageously indulged. It is the province of intellect to study and to acquire knowledge; and when enlightened by knowledge, to obstruct his path in following the dictates of truth; there is no servile class to corrupt his selfish faculties by obsequiousness and flattery. He is an excellent specimen of humanity, enlightened, benevolent, and just, and animated by an all-pervading activity. There is another class of minds, by far the most common, on whom the three orders of faculties, animal, moral, and intellectual, are bestowed by nature in nearly equal proportions. The American institutions evolve these faculties almost in the proportion in which nature gave them. Men of this class are observed to be habitually selfish, yet occasionally generous; frequently cunning, yet often open and direct; at times carried away by passion and prejudice, but on other occasions manifesting sound judgment and honesty.

In short, the grand feature of American society is the fulness with which it develops all the faculties of its individual members, without impressing peculiar biases on any of them; and hence its heterogeneous aspect in the eyes of foreigners. There is no evil and no good which may not be predicated of it with truth. Numerous examples could be adduced in support of every picture representing good, better, best; bad, worse, worst, in American society. Perhaps the reader may suppose that the same may be said of society in every country; but certainly not to the same striking extent as in the United States. In Europe the different classes are cast in distinct moulds, and some of the faculties of the individuals constituting each class are suppressed, while others are highly developed, to fit them for their conditions. In the United States the individual man stands forth much more as Nature made him, and as freedom and equality have reared him.

It is this extraordinary activity of all the faculties which forms the most striking feature in the people of the United States, and it affords the best guaranty that they are essentially in the right road to a high civilisation.

The imperfections discovered by strangers lie not so much in the American institutions as in the people. The fierce political contests, the sudden elevations and depressions of public affairs, the frequent changes of laws and projects, and the want of smoothness and harmony in the action of the social machinery which have been observed in that country, are the natural indications that the impulsive power which is moving, and also the intelligence which is directing this vast social body, are both operating to a great extent at random; now attaining, and now missing their objects, but ever driving onward towards new experiments and evolutions.

In the exercise of nearly all their high elective, legislative, and administrative functions, the people and their rulers generally proceed on the mere dictates of common sense; and as Archbishop Whalley has well observed, common sense is never recognised as a sufficient guide in the management of important affairs, except when the individual is ignorant of scientific principles of action. A sailor will probably admit that common sense is sufficient to enable a man to preach or to practise medicine, but he will deny that it is adequate to the steering of a ship: He knows little of the difficulties of preaching and practising the healing art, and therefore believes that slender attainments will suffice for them; while he is intimately acquainted with the perils of navigation, and justly decides that scientific knowledge and experience are both indispensably necessary to render a man an accomplished navigator. Instinct does not guide man as it does the low animals; and reason cannot act without extensive knowledge and laborious training. The education of the American people being still essentially defective in relation to their powers and duties, their institutions, when seen in action, do not render justice to the wisdom which framed them. A higher education, discipline in obeying the natural laws under the sanction of religion, and practical moral training, appear to me to be the remedies for these evils.

One test of civilisation, both in individuals and nations, is the power of self-command amidst temptations; and a second is the capacity of discovering and following out through difficulties, the path that leads to ultimate good.—In regard to the first test, it is a common remark in Scotland, that the sons of excessively rigid clergymen occasionally run into wild immoralities when they are emancipated from paternal restraint. The explanation is, that their own moral and intellectual faculties have never been disciplined to resist and to control the solicitations of the propensities amidst temptations. The restraining and directing power has been external; and good conduct depended on its presence. No youth is ever safe or well trained unless these powers be internal; for then only are they ever present and ever at their posts. The same rule holds good in the case of nations. Before the revolution, the French people were restrained from action by priests, police officers, and a numerous soldiery. French society then presented fewer mobs, fewer defiance of the law, and fewer gigantic frauds, in proportion to the population, than American society does at this moment. But were the French of those days in a higher state of civilisation than the modern Americans? No. Their propensities were restrained by external powers, and little scope for self-action was permitted to any of their faculties. The consequence was, that when the pressure of the priests, the police, and the army, was removed, and a strong impulse was communicated to their minds, the propensities blazed forth with frightful energy—there was a lack of self-control—all was distraction and anarchy; and Napoleon restored order only by reapplying the external restraints. The American people live under no external restraints, except those established by God and by themselves. Their regulating influences are situated in their own minds; and they live, not in a state of apathy, but in one of high excitement. They contend for gain, for honour, for power, and in all their contests, only the law of God, the power of conscience, the fear of public opinion, and the laws which they themselves have made and may abrogate at pleasure, repress their ebullitions, and give direction to their efforts. Do they exhibit the wreck of social order, and the degradation of virtue? No! The progress of civilisation has been steady and rapid. In proportion as the new territories have been filled up by a numerous population; religion, law, and order, have been evolved in them. I was told by gentlemen in advanced life, that in their younger days Kentucky was the theatre of fierce duels, gouging, murders, and other gross outrages, as the new states of the West at present are; but in our day Kentucky is comparatively industrious, moral, and civilised. The latter fact I saw during my visit to the West in April, 1840. In the older and eastern states the supremacy of the law, the security of property, and the respect for religion, are unquestionably great. In the previous pages, I have described exceptions, but they are only exceptions; and there is a constant disposition and never-ceasing effort to prevent the recurrence, and remove the causes of them.

When this state of social affairs is regarded as the result of the free internal action of the mind of the whole people, I recognise the presence of a higher general civilisation in the United States than is to be found in any European country, except probably Switzerland, which has similar institutions. What European monarchy could throw such an extent of power into the hands of the whole people as is done in the United States, and afterwards boast of equal order, law, and justice? The oppressed, the injured, the ignorant, and untrained masses would, in all probability, during the first exercise of their power, rush headlong into anarchy. The prominence which outrages and frauds assume in American society is the consequence of the impulse given to all the faculties by their institutions, and of the comparative feebleness of external artificial restraints. As already mentioned, the rogue is developed in all his might and malignity, and his greatness attracts attention; but the good are developed in an equal proportion; and if they do not appear equally conspicuous on the public stage, it is because religion and virtue are in their own nature meek, retiring, and unostentatious qualities. The first step towards self-government is the most difficult; the Americans have made, and partly succeeded in it. Their future progress will be less difficult.

Captain Marryat bears testimony to a fact which is at once the consequence and evidence of this power of self-control in the American people in one department of social life. It is so important that, in my opinion, although he had not recorded one other circumstance in elucidation of American civilisation, he would have done good service to ethical and political science by contributing it alone. "I do not think," says he, "that Democracy is marked upon the features of the lower classes in the United States; there is no arrogant bearing in them, as might be supposed from the despotism of the majority; on the contrary, I should say that their lower ranks are much more civil than our own. In his usual demeanour the citizen-born is quiet and obliging. The insolence you meet with is chiefly from the emigrant classes. I have before observed that the Americans are a good-tempered people, and to this good temper I ascribe their civil bearing. But why are they good tempered? It appears to me to be one of the few virtues springing from Democracy. When the grades of society are distinct, as they are in the older institutions, when difference of rank is acknowledged and submitted to without murmur, it is evident that if people are obliged to control their tempers in presence of their superiors or equals, they can also yield to them with their inferiors; and it is this yielding to our tempers which enables them to master us. But under institutions where all are equal, where no one admits the superiority of another, even if he really be so; where the man with the spade in his hand will beard the millionaire, and where you are compelled to submit to the caprice and insolence of a domestic, or lose his services, it is evident that every man must, from boyhood, have learned to control his temper, as no ebullition will be submitted to, or unfulfilled by its consequences. I consider that it is this habitual control, forced upon the Americans by the nature of their institutions, which occasions them to be so appears to have excited that deep interest in the subject which is the only legitimate proof, in this world, of their success. The grand motive of the clergy of all sects is, no doubt, the love of souls; but there is a secondary circumstance which is, probably, not without some effect in securing their exertions, namely, the knowledge that the acceptance of their peculiar doctrines regarding salvation is the bond which binds the people to their ministrations, and that the more successfully they impress a firm conviction of their views on their flocks, the more secure do they feel in obtaining the means of their own subsistence, and the greater also are their power and influence over their people. This branch of religious instruction, therefore, appears to be in a salutary and satisfactory condition in the United States.

But religious instructors teach also the morality and religion which ought to regulate human conduct in this world. In the great outlines of secular duty, all the Christian sects are agreed; and the clergy of all sects teach them to their flocks. In the course of my attendance in the churches of the United States, I could not, however, avoid making two remarks on this subject; first, that, in proportion as the tenets of any sect represented the dangers of eternal perdition to be great and imminent, and the means of salvation to be difficult, the clergy of that sect taught their own doctrinal views on these points more zealously and more extensively, and the practical duties of Christianity relatively less frequently; and vice versa. Secondly, That the teaching of practical duties was in the vast majority of churches exceedingly general, rarely descending to specific instructions regarding the proper line of conduct to be pursued in the most momentous and difficult departments of life. This defect attaches to nearly all Christian churches, and appears to me to account for the rapid oblivion which overtakes sermons. If I were to draw a comparison in this particular, I should say that the practical affairs of life are more extensively introduced into the pulpits of the United States than into those of Scotland, and the notices of sermons which have been given, will partly enable the reader to judge on this point for himself. Still, in this respect, religious teaching is generally defective, and I think that it is so, because when the Creator introduced into the world a system of causation, in virtue of which, when circumstances are the same, one event follows another in invariable succession; and when He bestowed on man faculties of observation and reflection, rendering him capable of observing circumstances, and tracing the connection between causes and effects, he imposed on him the duty of observing, reflecting, and acting on system; and the moral world forms no exception to this rule. If the constitution of the world, mental and physical, be systematic, and if causation run through every department of it, then, while man acts without sufficient knowledge of, or reference to, the system of the causes in the midst of which he exists; while he acts impulsively and blindly from the mere dictates of his inclinations, and upon superficial, limited, and inaccurate views of the qualities and adaptations of things which surround him, and which really determine his happiness or misery, he does not rise to his proper rank of a rational being. When God framed him and the external world on these principles, He clearly conferred on him the rational character, and it is man's duty to conform to it. If this view be sound, every element of external nature, and every organ and function of the human mind and body which are capable, when properly used, of promoting human happiness, and when abused, of leading to misery, is a divine institution presented to man for his study, and as a guide to his practical conduct. The pulpit, in my opinion, will never discharge its duty to mankind, until it shall become the expositor also of "these doings of the Lord," and shall inculcate the observance of them under the sanction of religion. The pulpit thus employed would contribute more effectually than it now does towards enlarging the sphere of the mind's action—presenting motives to self-control—and directing each individual to pursue successfully his real welfare both for this world and the next. Sermons of this nature would also add greatly to the utility of the lyceums; because the people, finding the elements of natural knowledge invested with a religious interest, would apply themselves with more earnestness and patience to extend their studies under the guidance of scientific teachers.

4thly, Professional Callings.—The great majority of the people of the United States are engaged in arts, manufactures, commerce, navigation, agriculture, divinity, law, and medicine; and their pursuits are therefore useful, and productive of enjoyment. As the paths of industry are rarely obstructed by bad laws or artificial obstacles, American civilisation, in this department, will bear a favourable comparison with that of the most advanced nations. These avocations, however, do not fully develop the highest faculties of the mind. They cultivate Acquisitiveness, Self-love, and the love of distinction, more than Benevolence, Veneration, Conscientiousness, and Ideality. They call the intellect into activity, but many of them do not necessarily direct it to moral objects. They are deserving of all praise as important elements of civilisation; indeed, as necessary to the very foundations of it: but in order to exhibit the "internal nature of man with lustre and grandeur," higher pursuits must be added to and mingled with them. The schools, colleges, and the pulpit, must supply the lustre and grandeur in which the avocations of common life are necessarily defective. Great improvements in professional attainments remain to be made in the United States. American divines are not in general so learned as those of England, but they appear to be more practical; while the professions of law and medicine in the rural districts, comprising nineteen twentieths of the whole United States, stand in need of large accessions of knowledge to bring them to a par with the same professions in the enlightened countries of Europe. The improved education which I have suggested, would render the practice of the professions in some degree scientific or philosophical pursuits, in which each individual would endeavour, in his vocation, to appropriate the laws which the Creator has established as essential to success, and the calm calculations of reason would, to some extent, regulate the impulsive and empirical movements which have hitherto been fraught with so much suffering to the people.

5thly, Political Institutions.—The American Declaration of Independence announces that "all men are created equal," a proposition which, however liable to be disputed in some respects, has (leaving out of view the African race) been practically adopted as the fundamental principle of all the institutions and legislation of the United States. It is the most powerful maxim for developing the individual, in all his faculties and functions, that has ever been promulgated, and it has certainly produced great results. It is probably the first abstract proposition that is clothed with an intelligible meaning in the mind of the American child, and it influences his conduct through life. It sends forth the young citizen full of confidence in himself, untrammelled by authority, unawed by recognised superiority in others, and assured of a fair field for every exertion.

In contemplating this fabric of government, it appears as a mighty school for developing the social nature of man; and it is a school of the kind which nature dictates. The social body controls its own destiny, suffers for its own errors, and enjoys the benefits of its own wisdom and virtue. It gives power to every elector to raise or depress his own fortunes and those of his neighbours; but he must affect both; he cannot isolate himself from his fellows, and pursue, in his electoral capacity, private ends and individual advantages. He must "Love his neighbour as himself;" for his neighbour is his equal, and will not submit to injustice. This form of government calls on individual citizens to discharge many public duties, and offers to their ambition numerous situations of public honour. It quickly brings home to society the experience of the consequences of its own actions: if it commit errors, suffering speedily indicates the necessity for rectifying them; if it adopt wise laws, and pursue salutary measures, it is rewarded with certain prosperity; but its influence in developing the internal faculties of the mind is the chief object of my present remarks.

On perusing the list of officers elected by the American citizen, and of whose proceedings he is the ultimate judge, we discover that there is scarcely an interest relating to human nature in this world, which is not directly or indirectly brought before him for consideration, and placed to some extent under his control. The institutions appear to me to develop the whole faculties of the individual, with little modification. He is educated by them in the belief that he can control every thing but public opinion, and that little self-denial is required from him, except in preserving a civil bearing in society. If, therefore, nature have bestowed on an American citizen a large endowment of the animal organs, with defective organs of reflection and of the moral sentiments, he is speedily developed into an audacious and accomplished rogue. If to the propensities she have added intellect, but still left the moral faculties deficient, he appears as a speculative merchant, an ambitious and unprincipled politician, or a dexterous and unconscientious lawyer—in each character unscrupulously turning the institutions of his country, and the good nature of his fellow-citizens, to his private advantage. If nature have given the citizen a high development of the moral and intellectual organs, with subordinate propensities, the institutions of his country unfold the best of human characters; such an individual is a philanthropist, a man of practical sense, of sterling honesty, and sturdy independence; in short, an ornament to human nature. I have known many such. The American citizen whose mental endowments are naturally high, and whose education has been liberal, is reared in a noble field. There is no glare of aristocracy to obscure his moral perceptions, and no established church to trammel his religious sentiments, and abstract his path in following the dictates of ruth; there is no servile class to corrupt his selfish faculties by obsequiousness and flattery. He is an excellent specimen of humanity, enlightened, benevolent, and just, and animated by an all-pervading activity. There is another class of minds, by far the most common, on whom the three orders of faculties, animal, moral, and intellectual, are bestowed by nature in nearly equal proportions. The American institutions evolve these faculties almost in the proportion in which nature gave them. Men of this class are observed to be habitually selfish, yet occasionally generous; frequently cunning, yet often open and direct; at times carried away by passion and prejudice, but on other occasions manifesting sound judgment and honesty.

In short, the grand feature of American society is the fulness with which it develops all the faculties of its individual members, without impressing peculiar biases on any of them; and hence its heterogeneous aspect in the eyes of foreigners. There is no evil and no good which may not be predicated of it with truth. Numerous examples could be adduced in support of every picture representing good, better, best; bad, worse, worst, in American society. Perhaps the reader may suppose that the same may be said of society in every country; but certainly not to the same striking extent as in the United States. In Europe the different classes are cast in distinct moulds, and some of the faculties of the individuals constituting each class are suppressed, while others are highly developed, to fit them for their conditions. In the United States the individual man stands forth much more as Nature made him, and as freedom and equality have reared him.

It is this extraordinary activity of all the faculties which forms the most striking feature in the people of the United States, and it affords the best guaranty that they are essentially in the right road to a high civilisation.

The imperfections discovered by strangers lie not so much in the American institutions as in the people. The fierce political contests, the sudden elevations and depressions of public affairs, the frequent changes of laws and projects, and the want of smoothness and harmony in the action of the social machinery which have been observed in that country, are the natural indications that the impulsive power which is moving, and also the intelligence which is directing this vast social body, are both operating to a great extent at random; now attaining, and now missing their objects, but ever driving onward towards new experiments and evolutions.

In the exercise of nearly all their high elective, legislative, and administrative functions, the people and their rulers generally proceed on the mere dictates of common sense; and as Archbishop Whalley has well observed, common sense is never recognised as a sufficient guide in the management of important affairs, except when the individual is ignorant of scientific principles of action. A sailor will probably admit that common sense is sufficient to enable a man to preach or to practise medicine, but he will deny that it is adequate to the steering of a ship: He knows little of the difficulties of preaching and practising the healing art, and therefore believes that slender attainments will suffice for them; while he is intimately acquainted with the perils of navigation, and justly decides that scientific knowledge and experience are both indispensably necessary to render a man an accomplished navi-

I consider that it is this habitual control, forced upon the Americans by the nature of their institutions, which occasions them to be so good tempered, when not in a state of excitement."

The facts and the philosophy here are equally sound, except that American-born "domestics" are trained under the same influences with the rest of the community, and, if paid at the common rate of labour and justly treated, they, as a class, are not insolent and capricious. Bad temper arises from unjust manifestations of Self-Esteem and Destructiveness, directed against individuals who have offended our egotism; while good temper is the result of Self-Esteem and Destructiveness kept in abeyance, and Benevolence, Veneration, Conscientiousness, and Love of Approbation, or some of them, actively manifested. If artificial differences of rank afford temptations to indulge in bad temper, they, to that extent, foster unchristian states of mind; while democratic institutions, if they cultivate self-restraint, good-nature, and civility, are unquestionably, in so far, the allies of virtue, and cherish Christian dispositions.

With regard to the second test, I cannot bear the same testimony in favour of the power of the American people to discover and follow forth, through difficulties, the path that leads to general prosperity. They greatly need a higher intellectual illumination to enable them to do so.

But it is said that the institutions of the United States have produced a frightful result in establishing the tyranny of the majority. This subject deserves serious consideration.

In all political, legislative, and corporate assemblies, the minority must, from the nature of things, yield to the majority. The mere fact of the majority in such bodies, carrying their own measures into effect, cannot justly be called tyranny. From the way in which the tyranny of the majority is generally spoken of, a stranger to the United States might be led to suppose that the majority enact laws in favour of themselves to the prejudice of the minority; but this is not the case. Except when legislating for the coloured race, the majority uniformly include themselves in the laws which they pass; and if they be guilty of injuring the minority, it is only in consequence of an error in judgment, which equally affects themselves. A few cases probably might be discovered, in which the majority in the legislature of a particular state, had a common interest which they pursued at the expense of the minority.

But it may be supposed that the tyranny of the majority consists in elevating their own will into supremacy over the law; in trampling on it, for instance, in their character of mobs; in setting it at naught as jurymen; or in forcing the judges to pervert it, under fear of dismissal from office. That examples of such evils do occur, it is impossible to deny; but they are the results of excitement, which is generally both temporary and local; and there is constantly a reaction in favour of law and order. These are merely ebullitions of unguided feeling, and do not assume the character of concerted or intentional tyranny of the majority over the minority. Indeed, my impression is, that they are generally perpetrated by the minority, without the approval of the majority, because, so far as my means of observation extended, I was led to the conviction that a vast majority of the citizens of the United States condemn these outrages, although they lack legal force and moral courage to prevent them. The newly settled, and therefore semi-barbarous, states of the west, and the slave states of the south, should be distinguished from the eastern and more civilised states, in discussing this question. The former may be compared to Ireland in 1824, when an army of 36,000 men was needed to preserve the peace, and the latter to Scotland now, where 1500 soldiers suffice. It would lead only to error to regard the British Isles as one nation, and to detail Irish outrages as examples of the lawlessness of the Scots; and it is equally fallacious to cite the crimes and horrors of the south and west as examples of the influence of democracy in the United States. In judging of political institutions, we are bound to view them in those circumstances where they have been longest tried, and have had freest scope.

Assuming, then, for the present, the eastern states as the objects of our contemplation, I remark that their mobs proceed, in my opinion, from two causes—the constant excitement in which the people live, which pervades all their faculties, and the want of training and discipline in youth. Their outrages are the result of impulse, vivid and general, but momentary; and not of deliberate action on any principle. One feature, moreover, distinguishes an American from an European mob. The moral and intellectual faculties are in a higher state of cultivation in the former than in the latter, and for this reason, the people are more susceptible of moral or legal influence, even in their highest state of excitement. A European mob is like a wild beast, cruel but cowardly; the animal propensities rage with violence, and completely carry captive the moral powers. An American mob, on the other hand, if fairly opposed by men of courage in support of the law, has so much more of the higher elements of mind in its composition, that it may be arrested. I am deeply impressed, from what I saw of the American people, with the conviction, that even a moderate exercise of moral and physical courage by the well-disposed members of society, would check their mobs in the bud; and that individuals who should thus discharge their duty to their country would not encounter one half of the danger to their own persons from an American, that they would do in encountering a European mob. There seemed to me to be, in the eastern states, an increasing and deepening sense of the disgrace which these and similar occurrences bring upon the country, and a strong tendency in public opinion to arrest them.

The tyranny of the majority may be supposed to mean merely that in matters of opinion nobody dares to think, or at least to avow what he thinks, in opposition to the majority; and this is really the only tyranny that exists. It is not correctly named, as I shall subsequently show; but, in point of fact, a very great extent of moral cowardice, or of fear to maintain the right, in opposition to public sentiment, even when it is unquestionably wrong, does prevail in the United States. Before attempting to give an explanation of this phenomenon, it may be instructive to state a few examples of its mode of operation. When the cry for war with England, formerly mentioned, broke forth, the popular excitement was so deep and universal, that, with extremely few exceptions, the most enlightened patriots who condemned, did not dare to oppose it, but suffered it first to expend its force in the manner already described, and then only, ventured, cautiously, to offer to the public mind the suggestions of prudence and reason. Again,—in conversing with the friends of education on the imperfection of their schools in the department of training, and suggesting the advantages of inviting Mr. Wilderspin to come to the eastern cities and show them infant training in practice,—they acknowledged the defect, expressed themselves convinced of the benefit of a visit from Wilderspin—and said that there would be no difficulty in raising by subscription, the sum of money requisite to try the experiment; but one and all added that public opinion would not sanction such a step, and that if they ventured on it, they would do more harm than good to the cause of education. Again, when a scheme was hatching in Massachusetts to overthrow the Board of Education, there were not a few influential persons in different parts of the state, who, in private, acknowledged themselves to be the friends of the board, and who justly estimated its value, yet who had not sufficient moral courage publicly to declare their convictions, and to support it. I was informed of this fact by a gentleman deeply interested in education, resident in another state, who traveled through a large portion of Massachusetts at the time in question, and who made it an object to ascertain the state of opinion on the subject. Once more, when agitation for the abolition of slavery commenced in the New England states, public opinion gave up the individuals who favoured it almost to martyrdom.

This tyranny of opinion proceeds still farther; it takes cognisance of private actions. When walking in the streets of a city with a clerical friend, he observed the cloak which I wore a short light demisaison garment, which I had brought from Edinburgh, and admired it, as suited to the American spring and early summer. "Why don't you get one?" said I. "Because," said he, "public opinion would not sanction it: I should be pointed at as the 'Dandy Parson!'" Some Americans of large fortune who have been much in England, and who have adopted the hours and the style of English dinners, are condemned by public opinion as guilty of foreign predilections and aiming at aristocracy.

Public opinion in these, and in many similar instances, possesses so much force, that few individuals have courage to oppose it.

In contrast to these instances, I may remark that no man is afraid to avow himself to be a wing or a democrat, even in localities where his opinions may be those of the minority; nor a Calvinist, a Baptist, or a Roman Catholic; because these are powerful sects: In short, wherever the individual is backed by an influential number of persons holding the same opinions with himself, he is safe. It is only where one or a few individuals venture to oppose a decided public sentiment that they are in danger. Hence, in cities where there are few Unitarians, an individual, if not afraid, is not to acknowledge himself to belong to that sect. It is an error, therefore, to speak of the tyranny of the majority over the minority of the nation in matters of opinion; the tyranny is rather that of the public over the individual. To a private citizen the public is merely those who move in his own circle, and who may influence his popularity or his social estimation.

The question next presents itself—What is the nature of the danger which threatens individuals who venture to avow opinions generally disapproved of? In the case of the politician it is exclusion from office: to become unpopular ruins all a man's prospects of rising to distinction in the state; and to every American citizen a career of office, from that of constable to that of president of the United States, is open.

constable is as deeply interested about his popularity, as the senator who sees the presidentship within his grasp. I have read advertisements addressed by constables to the electors, soliciting their votes and explaining their own principles and conduct, as anxiously as if they had been competing for the office of governor.

To gain popularity, the public mind must be addressed on its most accessible side. I have already described the great majority of American voters as young, ardent, impulsive, active, and practical, but deficient in profound and comprehensive views, and also in the capacity of pursuing a distant good through temporary obstacles and difficulties. I have stated, also, that their education, in relation to their powers and duties, is very defective. To gain the favour of a people in this condition of mind, actual fitness for office, with honesty and independence in the discharge of public duty, do not of themselves suffice. The candidate must render himself acceptable to the electors individually; he must address their predominant feelings, enter into their leading aversions and predilections, and attach himself warmly to the party or cause which he knows them to regard with the highest favour. He may vouch for his own fitness for office, and his own certificate will often be received, provided, in other respects, his conduct and principles are approved of. If he egregiously fail in the discharge of his public duties, he will be turned out of office at the end of the term for which he was appointed; but the most conscientious and skilful execution of his duties will not, in general, secure the endurance of his tenure, if he publicly advocate unpopular opinions, although altogether unconnected with his station, or if he belong to a party which has lost public favour and been displaced from power.

The best remedy that can be proposed for the evils now described, appears to me to consist in a higher education and a better training of the electors: if they were thoroughly instructed in youth, concerning the laws which regulate the prosperity of nations; in the qualities of the human mind, and in the indispensable necessity of judgment and integrity in public officers to the right management of their affairs—higher qualities would be required in their public men in order to gain their favour, and useful and faithful public servants would be retained in possession of their offices, out of respect to their fitness alone. The idea that it is possible to educate and train a people to act in this manner is regarded by many persons as altogether visionary and Utopian; but to deny this is to maintain that man is not a rational being. A certain advance in the knowledge of his own faculties and of the external world, and of their adaptations to each other, was necessary before the development of his rational nature could fairly commence, and his knowledge has not yet been generally communicated to the young, nor have they been reared in accordance with it, in the United States. That, in their actual condition, their actions and judgments should partake of the character of impulse and direct perception, is inevitable; but their capacity to advance to a higher state of civilisation is not by this circumstance necessarily excluded.

The danger which besets an individual in his private capacity in consequence of openly advocating unpopular opinions, may be best elucidated by referring to the instances already adduced. If any citizen propose improvements in education or which the public mind is not prepared, those individuals whose interests or whose pride would suffer, or whose habits of thinking and acting would be invaded by the change, naturally oppose them. The common schools are placed under the management of directors and inspectors chosen by the people, and the reformers must obtain these offices before they can give effect to their benevolent designs. But the people, being ignorant of the nature and utility of the proposed changes, are easily operated upon by the insinuations, misrepresentations and declamations of the hostile parties, who are scattered every where among them, and who by these means experience little difficulty in rendering the reformers unpopular, and thus preventing their election. The gentlemen who told me that the proposal to invite Wilderspin to the United States, would retard, instead of forwarding, the desired improvements in training, were sound in their judgment; because the prejudices of the people against foreigners, and their dislikes to innovation in their school systems, would, while they were ignorant of the nature of the proposed improvement, have ensured the exclusion of its projectors from office, and placed its opponents in power over the schools. The remedy for this evil is gradually to open up the subject to the public mind in lectures and through the press: or to carry the scheme into execution in some private seminary, and then show it to the people in action. After they comprehend its advantages, they will adopt it. And accordingly, the project of improvement by training is not abandoned by those who perceive its value; but they are proceeding prudently to prepare the people to receive and sanction it. So far from this condition of things being an unmitigated evil, it is attended with many benefits. It leads moral reformers to consider their measures thoroughly, and by anticipating opposition, to detect the weak points of their schemes. It also imposes on them the necessity of addressing the reason and moral sentiments of the people, and of thus aiding in cultivating their rational nature; and, in my opinion, the ultimate test of the merits of all institutions, is the degree in which they promote the accomplishment of this end.

The dangers which individuals incur from braving public opinion in their personal habits or pursuits bear a relation to two circumstances—the extent of their own dependence on that opinion—and if they be independent of it, on the degree of their own sensitiveness of disapprobation. In the case of clergymen, physicians, and lawyers, the dependence of the individual on public opinion is direct and striking, and in most mercantile pursuits, also, opinion may, to a considerable extent, influence individual prosperity. Besides, the example of bowing to it, set by the aspirants after public offices, who are generally the boldest, most active, and influential members of the community, generates and cultivates the habit of doing so in those who move in a private sphere; and the habit being once established, sensitiveness increases in proportion to its universal prevalence and duration, until at last, in many instances, it degenerates into a dread of public disapprobation, so powerful that it paralyzes virtue, and deserves no milder epithet than that of moral cowardice.

This extreme sensitiveness is a peculiar characteristic of the Americans. But, as I have already described the minds of the people to be developed by their institutions in all their faculties, each man according to his own nature, and as each may be discerned pursuing his individual objects with a predominating egotism, there appears to be a contradiction between these two portraits of society. The representations wear the air of paradox; and, in point of fact, nothing struck me so forcibly in the United States as the inconsistency between one aspect of the character of the people and another. Phrenologically, I explain these anomalous appearances by the impulsive activity of all the faculties, undirected by any great landmarks either of established custom, sentiment, or reason. The faculties themselves are heterogeneous in their objects and feelings, and if they be manifested freely, one in one set of circumstances, and another in another, without a presiding guide, inconsistency will be evolved by nature herself. Within the limits permitted by public opinion, an American will pursue his pleasure and his interest, as if no other being existed in the world; his egotism may then appear complete; but when he meets an opposing public opinion, he shrinks and is arrested. The state of manners allows a pretty wide latitude of self-indulgence, and foreigners reporting on this phasis of character describe the people as personifications of egotism; but when the limit of public opinion is reached, this egotist may be seen quailing before, although virtue, honour, and religion, should call on him to brave it. Again, he will not pursue his self-indulgence so far as to give personal offence to his neighbour, because this would be resented. In short, he has that vivid regard to opinion, that he restrains himself whenever he incurs the risk of its condemnation; and if he act improperly, it is because opinion tolerates the wrong.

British authors, however, have in general erroneously estimated the comparative influence of public opinion in their own country and in the United States. It appears to me to be pretty nearly as active and influential in Britain as it is in America, certain differences in its modes of operation being taken into consideration. In Britain society is divided into a number of distinct classes, each of which has standards of opinion of its own. There is a public opinion peculiar to each class, and that opinion has acquired definite forms by the influence of ancient institutions. The opinions and modes of feeling of the individuals in each class, grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength, and in the maturity of life these conventional impressions appear to be absolutely natural. The differences between the grades of society produce corresponding differences in opinion and mode of action; and when an observer surveys individuals of each class acting according to their perceptions of propriety, he may imagine twice because they differ, each is manifesting a full moral independence, in following the dictates of his own judgment. But this is an error. In America all men are regarded as equal; there is no distinct separation into classes, with a set of established opinions and feelings peculiar to each. As society is young, and the institutions are recent, there are no great influences in operation to mould opinion into definite forms, even within this one circle, which nominally includes all American citizens. The proper contrast, therefore, is between the power of public opinion in an English grade and in the American single circle; and, if so viewed, the difference will not be found to be so greatly against the Americans as is generally supposed.

The English candidates for public offices do not bow to popular opinions, because the people have no offices to bestow; but if we select the fashionable circle in London, and consider how many of the individuals who move in it could be induced by the dictates of reason, or even by motives of moral or religious duty, to brave its opinions, and to pursue a line of conduct, however virtuous, that was stigmatised by the whole circle as vulgar or unfashionable, we should find the number very small. The same lack of moral courage which is considered so peculiar to the Americans, would be found almost universally prevalent in it. If we proceed to another grade, the same fear of incurring disapprobation will be found to pervade its members; and so down to the lowest, where public opinion ceases to act. In regard to private conduct the same result presents itself. In Edinburgh, a certain style of entertainment is in use in a certain rank; and, although many condemn the pomp, circumstance, and heavy vanity of the style, not one individual out of fifty will venture to depart from the established usage. In Scotland, instead of the tyranny of the majority, we live under "the fear of the folk;" and the most inattentive observer must have remarked that it is a most potential fear. It sends thousands to church who privately confess that they derive little edification from the exercises; it withholds thousands from countenancing their inferiors in society lest they should be regarded as ungentle; and it impels countless multitudes to give an ostensible adherence to opinions and observances of which they, in their consciences, disapprove. Recently a religious party in Scotland, animated with an extraordinary zeal for the observance of the Sabbath, has denounced as sinful, and suppressed, interments of the dead on that day. This prohibition does not affect the rich, among whom it is not the custom to bury on Sundays; but it is a cruel tyranny over the poor, who, by interring on that day, speedily remove a corpse from their small graves, and find their friends and relatives pressing on wages, and who themselves are saved a day's labour at the time when dis-

 a. of J. B. f. and death are pressing most severely on their P. Besides, a service more solemn and more congenial with a religious frame of mind than a funeral, can scarcely be imagined. Nevertheless, few defenders of the poor man's rights have appeared among the upper ranks of society; and it is my firm conviction that the fear of being charged with countenancing Sabbath breaking and infidelity, has been the chief cause of the silence of thousands who in their consciences do not approve of the prohibition.

The view here presented of the mode in which opinion operates in Britain may be illustrated by an example, in which the opinion, not of a circle only, but of the whole society, was invaded. When the discovery by Dr. Gall of the functions of the brain, and of a system of mental philosophy emanating from it, was first presented to the British public, it contradicted the opinions of physicians, lawyers, divines, men of letters, and philosophers generally, as well as those of the people, respecting the subjects to which it related. How was it received? Did the reviewers, the men of science, the physicians, and the doctors in divinity, investigate it, and brave public opinion by proclaiming its merits? No! It was intuitively felt that the discovery, if true, would convict numerous persons of ignorance in matters of importance, in which they had hitherto been believed by the public to be learned, and that this mortification, above all things, was to be avoided. By a nearly unanimous consent, therefore, the press and public delivered over Dr. Gall, Dr. Spurzheim, and their few followers, to the most unmeasured ridicule and abuse; while hundreds who saw that the public was wrong, shrunk with terror from even whispering such an impression; and at the present day, when a quarter of a century of investigation and debate has considerably diminished the discredit of avowing a leaning to Phrenology, I could present a pretty considerable list of physicians of reputation, of divines of talent and consideration, and of accomplished private gentlemen, who entertain an unhesitating conviction of its truth and importance, and who nevertheless are afraid publicly to acknowledge this conviction, or to act on it. I have often been counseled to lay aside Phrenology, and employ myself in investigations approved of by public sentiment, and been told that the career of honour would then be opened to me; while I have been warned of the unpopularity and other evil consequences that would attend an opposite course of action. It did not fall to my lot to witness in America any greater prostitutions of conscience and judgment at the shrine of public opinion than I daily witness in my own country; and if in America the necessity for such sacrifices be greater than it is in Britain, the only cause of the difference is, that in Britain we are able to address a larger class of educated and reflecting men, who will bestow a second consideration on matters of social importance, and whose opinions will ultimately sway those of the people. In the American states, individuals of the educated class do not feel conscious of their own power, not so much on account of their being few in number, as because they are little united among themselves, and address a mass of their fellow citizens who wield power without possessing commensurate intelligence, and on whom, therefore, it is difficult to make an impression by means of reason.

The inconsistency of the phenomena presented by the American society, strikes a stranger still more forcibly when he observes, not only the impunity, but the success, with which public opinion is occasionally braved by certain individuals. There are men to whom nature has given a predominant development of Self-Esteem and Firmness, with deficient Love of Approbation, who, so far from courting the approval of society, erect themselves into standards to which they expect the world to conform, and who never hesitate to set public opinion at defiance when it suits their interest or ambition to do so. No individuals prosper more than these in the United States. Quackery and bold pretension in every form meet with extraordinary encouragement and success. There is in that, as in other countries, not only a large share of credulity, the offspring of ignorance, ready to swallow every bait presented by ingenious impudence, but there is a sort of admiration of the courage of that man who can boldly walk in his own path, regardless of the scorn, and taunts, and opposition of society; his very impudence confers on him a species of importance; and if he only avoid gross personal immoralities, he may make his way to fortune or distinction with surprising success. There is another class of men, to whom nature has given predominant organs of Conscientiousness and Firmness, who also occasionally brave public opinion in obedience to the dictates of duty. Of these Dr. Channing is an illustrious example. They do not, however, proclaim disagreeable truths to their countrymen without suffering pain in their feelings, and a temporary abatement of their personal consideration; but the quality of moral courage in this form is so rare, and its value so highly appreciated, that they draw towards themselves a profound sympathy and warm admiration from the virtuous and enlightened, and they actually produce a powerful effect. In short, the Americans are themselves ashamed of their own lack of moral intrepidity, and they highly honour the quality when it is displayed by one of their number in virtue's cause. How are these apparent contradictions to be reconciled?

Before answering this question, we may first consider the origin of the influence of public opinion on the minds of individuals. Man is being obviously destined by nature to live in the social state. The same fundamental faculties are common to all, but they are conferred on different individuals in different degrees of strength. While, therefore, there is an identity of nature, there are striking individual differences in mind, which give rise to diversities of feeling, talents, and dispositions. These differences may be regarded as, to some extent, the repulsive elements of society; but nature has bestowed on us also a very powerful faculty of Love of Approbation, (its organs are among the largest in the brain,) which inspires us with the desire of the approval of our fellow men. This faculty presents us with motives to smooth down our peculiarities, to forego our individual indulgences, and to conform as far as possible to the opinions, manners, and habits of our neighbours, in order to obtain their approbation; in short, it Madacamises the highway of social intercourse, and renders it agreeable and smooth. But this faculty needs the illumination of knowledge and the guidance of moral and religious principle to prevent it from degenerating into an universal complaisance, equally ready to acquiesce in the pretensions of vice as to approve of the excellence of virtue. When the quality is deficient in a people, the intercourse of society is harsh and disagreeable; but, when it is too powerful and ill-regulated, it may expose itself in an universal approval of the opinions of the day, and induce them to shrink from condemning any generally received object or opinion, lest they should give offence, or incur disapprobation. It then undermines truth, by sapping the foundations of moral courage.

When this faculty acts along with the love of wealth or of power its selfish influence is augmented, because the approbation of society conduces directly to the gratification of these desires. In the United States, these objects are eagerly pursued by a large majority of the people, and this is the vast influence of public opinion among them is accounted for. But Love of Approbation, when combined in action with the sentiments of Benevolence, Conscientiousness, Veneration, and enlightened intellect, takes a loftier aim; it then desires distinction on account of intellectual attainments, holiness, charity, and truth, and it desires only the approval of men of virtuous lives and cultivated understandings.

Far, therefore, from regarding the great power of public opinion in the United States as in itself an evil, I view it as a gigantic controlling influence which may become the most efficient ally of virtue. It is delightful to see the human mind, when emancipated from artificial fetters, evolving from its own deep fountains a mighty restraining power, far superior in force and efficacy for the accomplishment of good, to all the devices invented by the self-constituted guides of mankind. At present this power is operating in the United States essentially as a blind impulse; many of the artificial standards erected in Europe by monarchy, aristocracy, feudalism, established churches, and other ancient institutions for its direction, have been broken down, and no other standards have yet been erected in their place. No manners or maxims have yet received the stamp of general acceptance, to enable opinion to settle on them with security.

That this is the true theory of the phenomena of public opinion, is rendered probable by the fact that its mighty influence is of recent growth. For many years after the Revolution, it was not felt to the same extent as at present—opinion continued to be modified by the monarchical feelings in which the people had been educated, long after they became their own rulers. It is only within these five and twenty years that the people have discovered and chosen to wield their own sovereign authority; and as if for the very purpose of controlling them, public opinion has within the same period developed its stupendous powers. The ground is gradually becoming cleared of the antiquated posts and rails that directed public sentiment into particular paths; and the question occurs, what is destined to supply their place? Christianity will readily occur, as the most desirable guide; but at present, and for some generations, its influence will be limited by the conflicts existing between the different sects. Besides, the pulpit still devotes too little of its attention to secular affairs, and there are yet too few instances of combination among Christians of all denominations to accomplish general practical good, irrespective of their several doctrinal views. May not some aid be obtained from the maxims of moral and political science, founded on a sound interpretation of the nature of man and of the external world, and of their reciprocal relationship? If the mere forms of monarchy, aristocracy, feudalism, and religious establishments, often at variance with reason and the best interests of mankind, have become fetters with which opinion has been bound as in adamant chains, why may not the dictates of God's wisdom, when developed to the understanding and impressed upon the moral sentiments from infancy, produce as powerful and a much more salutary effect? The United States must look to instruction in moral and political science, aided and sanctioned by religion, for the re-election of standards and guides of opinion; and to the accomplishment of this object the new philosophy will constitute a valuable assistant.

One distinct cause of the fear of individuals to oppose public opinion, when wrong, is the want of reliance on the moral tendency of the public mind, and on its inclination to correct its own errors, and to do justice to those who have braved its disapprobation in defence of truth. The vivid excitement under which opinion is formed, is one element in producing this terror; but another unquestionably is the uncertainty which is felt regarding both the principles and motives by which, at any moment, it may be swayed. The public intellect is practical and direct, and it neither investigates principles nor embraces distant or comprehensive views; while the public feeling is composed of a confused jumble of selfish and moral impulses, the course of which, on any particular emergency, often defies calculation. Nevertheless the race is ever onward; there is little looking back, little calm reflection, little retracing of steps once taken, unless some unsurmountable obstacle presents itself, which, from its magnitude and immovability, deflects the public mind, or makes it recoil upon itself. It appears to me also that the organs of Benevolence and Veneration are larger and more powerful than those of Conscientiousness in the Anglo-Saxon race in general; and that in consequence, both the Americans and British are more distinguished for benevolent and religious feelings than for an acute sense of justice. This defect renders it more arduous for individuals, either in Britain or America, to take their stand on high moral principle in opposition to public opinion, because the faculty which prompts to the rectification of error, and the redressing of injustice, is comparatively feeble in the common mind. But this imperfection may be removed by a more assiduous cultivation of the faculty of Conscientiousness in the young. If the common schools imbued the youthful mind with a clear knowledge of its own faculties, of the laws appointed by the Creator for their guidance, and also of the natural laws which regulate the progress of society, this information might come in place of monarchical and feudal institutions for the guidance of opinion, and might afford fixed starting points, from which the moralist and statesman, the divine and the philanthropist, could advance with safety, in their endeavours to check the people when bent on erroneous courses of action.

In short, if the gigantic regulating and controlling power of public opinion, evolved by the free institutions of America, were enlightened and guided by the principles of Christianity and Science, instead of being left to act impulsively and as it were blindly, it would prove itself not a tyrant, but a protector to virtue, law, order, and justice, far more efficient than any that has hitherto been discovered. It would leave thought and action absolutely free, within the legitimate limits of all the faculties, (which none of the guides of opinion erected by human invention has ever done;) while it would apply an irresistible check at the very point where alone a check would be wanted—that which separates the boundaries of good and evil.

I have made these remarks unhesitatingly, because I believe them to embody some truth: but I admit that it may be long before the American people will appreciate them, and longer still before they will attempt to carry them into effect; but with a nation, as with the God of nations, a thousand years is as one day, and if the views be sound, they will not lose their character or importance by delay.

Whatever estimate may be formed of the adaptation of the new philosophy to the wants of the American people as a guide to opinion, there can be little doubt that some general moral influence, which should command respect and pervade the Union, would be highly useful. The division of the country into states, and these into counties and townships, each of which becomes an absorbing focus of interest to its own inhabitants, retards the diffusion of much valuable knowledge, and to some extent paralyses moral effort. I met with highly intelligent persons in Connecticut, interested in education, who knew nearly nothing of the organisation and action of the board of education in Massachusetts, although this state is divided from Connecticut only by a line. Not only so, but before I left the United States, the Common School Journal of Connecticut had ceased to be published, owing to the want of subscribers. It was a very ably conducted, useful, and cheap periodical, but it did not discuss politics, nor theological controversy, nor news; it was full only of high moral and practical information relative to the improvement of education; and this object interested so few persons that it could not find subscribers sufficient to support its existence! In Pennsylvania still less is known by the public of what is doing in Massachusetts or the other states in mere moral pursuits; and so with other portions of the Union. Large numbers of religious papers are published in the states, but the circulation of nearly the whole of them is local.

In New York several weekly papers devoted to general literature have recently been instituted, gigantic in point of size, and intended, by their contents and moderate price, to command a circulation throughout the Union; but their success also has been limited. The circulation of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal in Great Britain and Ireland, with a population of 24,000,000, is stated to be about 70,000 weekly, while the highest circulation of any one of these N. York papers, I was assured, does not exceed, on an average, 15,000 weekly, among a population of 18,000,000. There is a great difference also in the matter contained in these publications. Chambers's Journal is reprinted in New York, but has only a small circulation. It is too didactic and too little exciting to possess general interest in America. The New York publications are composed of the plunder of European novels and magazines; of reports of sermons by popular preachers; of stories, horrors, and mysteries; of police reports, in which crime and misery are concocted into melo-dramas, now exciting sympathy, now laughter; with a large sprinkling of news and politics. As they obtain the largest and most general circulation of all the publications in the Union, they may be regarded as representing to some extent the general mind; and certainly they are not calculated to convey a high opinion of it. It would be a great advantage to the Union if a paper, composed partly on the principles of Addison's Spectator—taking cognisance of manners and minor morals, and partly on those of Chambers's Journal—combining didactic instruction with a reasonable amount of entertaining reading, could be established and widely circulated; a paper which should serve as the gazette of the philanthropist, of the moral and intellectual of all parts of the Union, which should inform each of what the other is doing in the great cause of human improvement, and diffuse useful intelligence into every town and county of every state.

Such a publication might, in time, serve to create a moral public opinion, and do vast service to the civilisation of the Union. But it should be conducted by a person of much wisdom and discretion, and be cosmopolitan in its principles. The difficulty is great in finding such a person. The success of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal is owing partly to the sagacity, perseverance, and industry of both its editors; but it has also been materially promoted by the genius and peculiar bent of mind of one of its conductors, Mr. Robert Chambers—in whom a combination of mental qualities, rarely met with, occurs. Hence, the work has been marked from its commencement by an unity of design, a variety of matter, popular interest, and scientific solidity, never before exhibited in any similar work—added to which is a presiding morality and sound sense, that recommend it equally to the peer and the peasant. I deem it necessary to make these remarks respecting the special qualities employed in conducting Chambers's Journal, because I do not consider that any association of men of talent, although backed by ample funds, could render such a periodical successful either in Britain or the United States, without at least one conductor peculiarly fitted for the task by his mental endowments, tastes, studies, and attainments; and any attempt to institute such a work which should end in failure and disappointment would retard instead of advancing the accomplishment of its objects. The local newspapers, in general, do not circulate moral intelligence. I frequently read in the Common School Journal of Massachusetts articles of great interest connected with the advancement of public instruction; but, except in a few instances, they were not copied by the press with a view to diffuse them through the state. It was not because the School Journal's circulation superseded the necessity of this, but because the editors of the newspapers were not sufficiently interested in education to perceive the value of the information to their readers.

CHAPTER XXIII.

New Haven, March 20. Phrenology.—The subject of the following case was introduced to me by a medical friend. On 15th September, 1833, Lemuel Camp, now aged 36, temperament bilious-sanguine, keeper of an oyster tavern in this city, was shooting, when the gun burst, and the iron which closes the end of the barrel was driven into his skull, and buried in his brain, in the region of Eventuality. He fell, but soon recovered sensation, and walked home, a mile and a half, assisted by two young men. He was conscious all the time; felt little pain, and sustained little loss of blood. Dr. Knight traveled three miles to reach him, and then extracted the iron. He felt a terrible wrench when it was withdrawn, but no other severe consequences. The broken portions of the skull were extracted, part of the brain came away, the skin closed on the wound, and in five weeks he was able to walk abroad. He gave me this information himself, in presence of a medical friend of his own, and added that his mind has never been affected; but his friend informed me that Camp's wife declares that, since the accident, he has been oblivious of things and occurrences. He will come into the house, lay down his whip, and in a minute forget where he has put it. After being exposed to severe cold, and after drinking, he is liable to be seized with involuntary muscular action, amounting to convulsions. In other respects, his health is good. He took a box out of his pocket and showed the iron and the broken pieces of bone which he carried in it, and he quite seriously assured me, that for the first year after the accident, if any person rattled these in the box, or meddled with them, his wound would ache, although he were a mile distant from the box and bones, and had no previous suspicion of any such interference! After the first year, this acute sensibility ceased! I felt the edges of the wound in the skull, and found them irregular, and the injury seemed to be chiefly on the left side. There is, however, in the box a portion of the frontal bone to which the falx had been attached, and both Dr. Knight and Dr. Hooker afterwards mentioned, that they considered that both sides of the brain had been injured at the point in question. Dr. Knight had no doubt that the longitudinal sinus was ruptured, and accounted for the small hemorrhage by the wound being low in the forehead. Dr. Hooker said, that the patient's intellectual faculties are not impaired. This was all the light I could obtain on the case. The injury was confined almost entirely to the organs of Eventuality, and I could form no accurate estimate of the state of efficiency of this faculty, from the short interview which I had with the patient, who, besides, was not a reflecting man. I must therefore leave the reader to form his own opinion, whether the mind of the patient was entire or not.

Professor Hooker mentioned to me, that my lectures had made few converts to Phrenology in New Haven; in answer to which remark, I repeated the statement made in my introductory lecture, that the truth of Phrenology could be ascertained only by observation, and that the object of my lectures was, not to prove its truth, but simply to teach what was to be observed, and how to observe; and, therefore, that the more scientific any audience was, the fewer would be the believers through sheer credulity, an order of converts which I did not desire. Professor Silliman, on the other hand, in seconding the resolutions adopted by the class, mentioned that he had attended four courses of lectures on phrenology, and that he was satisfied that the great principles of the science were well founded; thus showing that, in his case, conviction bore a relation to the extent of observation on the subject.

Reversed Organs.—Many objections to phrenology are founded on the supposed want of symmetry between the two sides of the brain. The differences between the arrangement of the convolutions on the one side and the other are not greater than between the distribution of the veins in the right arm and the left. Nature occasionally makes considerable deviations from the common position of particular organs in the body; and, indeed, in some instances, entirely reverses their usual locality. This is well known to medical men, but for the sake of the non-medical reader, I present Dr. Hooker's description of a preparation of a human subject which I examined in his anatomical museum.

"In the winter of 1838-9, a subject brought into the anatomical rooms of the Medical Institution of Yale College, was found to have a perfect lateral transposition of the viscera of the body. The heart was on the right side; the right lung had two, the left three lobes, the descending aorta lay on the right side of the spine, the vena cava on the left; the liver with the gall-bladder on the left, the spleen on the right side. The bloodvessels, nerves, and other parts, were examined with the utmost minuteness, and not the least exception was found to a perfect transposition of all the parts, every thing appearing perfectly normal except in position. The subject was a man apparently fifty-five years old, and had undoubtedly been a hard-labouring man, as was indicated by the thickened cuticle of the hands, the large muscles, and other circumstances. He appeared to have died from acute disease of the lungs."

Professor Hooker showed me a skull bearing an inscription—Richard J. Wethby, died Dec. 10, 1829, aged thirty-one, on which I remarked that the organs of Constructiveness must have been very large, because they had depressed the edges of the super-orbital plate on which they had rested, towards the ethmoidal fossæ, and also raised a considerable elevation externally at the usual place on each side; while the organs of Language must have been very small, because the super-orbital plate was convex, instead of being concave, which is usually the case, where they had rested on it. Dr. Hooker mentioned that the man whose skull this was had been a stone-cutter; he had died of consumption, and, during his illness, had given himself to be made into a skeleton after death. He was a very expert artificer in stone, and so deficient in language that in conversation he was not only slow, but used extraordinary words, through deficiency in commanding the usual vocabulary.

March 23. Ther. 37°. Presentation of a Silver Vase.—This evening a beautiful and richly ornamented silver vase was presented to me in Howard's Hotel by the ladies and gentlemen who had attended my two courses of lectures in New York. It was delivered by Mr. E. P. Hurlbut, the author of the work on "Civil Office and Political Ethics," formerly alluded to, in their names, in presence of an assemblage of the subscribers, and prefaced by a speech, of the merits of which it is not suitable for me to speak.

March 25. Ther. 27°. Visit to Ohio and Kentucky.—This day we left New York, accompanied by a much valued American friend, on a visit to Cincinnati and Kentucky, not with the view of lecturing, but to see something of the interior of the country before returning to Europe. We went to Philadelphia, and thence to Baltimore, by the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railway.

April 2. Ther. 32°. We proceeded to Frederick, (Maryland,) a distance of sixty miles, by a railway which runs for a great part of the way along the bank of a small river, the Patuxent, flowing in a beautifully wooded narrow valley. At Frederick we hired an exclusive extra to carry us by the National Road to Wheeling on the Ohio river, and traveled the distance, 221 miles, in four days, having stopped each night to sleep. We descended the Ohio in a steamboat, and arrived at Cincinnati at 6 A. M. on the 8th of April. The thermometer then stood at 40°. The town disappointed me, not in consequence of its own defects, but of the exaggerated descriptions of it which I had read. It is a handsome city of 50,000 inhabitants, and a marvellous example of the rapid increase of the country in wealth and population. In 1795, Cincinnati contained 500; in 1800, 750; in 1810, 2500; in 1820, 10,000; in 1830, 25,000; and now, in 1840, it is estimated to contain 50,000 souls. Mrs. Trollope's bazaar is converted into a lecture room, and is an object of curiosity to strangers.

April 13. Ther. 32°. Visit to General Harrison.—General Harrison, the whig candidate for the Presidency of the United States at the election in November, 1840, lives at North Bend, on the Ohio, 16 miles below Cincinnati; and one of his friends having offered to introduce us to him, we sailed down the river, and waited on him. As he has since been elected president, a few particulars of his history may be interesting to the reader. General Harrison was born in Virginia, on the 9th February, 1773. He was educated at Hampden Sydney College, and then repaired to Philadelphia to pursue the study of medicine under Dr. Benjamin Rush. In 1791, he abandoned the profession of medicine, and obtained from General Washington a commission as ensign in the first regiment of the United States Artillery. He served in the war with the Indians, in the Northwest Territory; and as a soldier, speaking of his appearance at this time, remarked, "I would as soon have thought of putting my wife in the service as this boy; but I have been out with him, and I find those smooth cheeks are on a wise head, and that slight frame is almost as tough as my own weather-beaten carcass." Peace was concluded with the Indians in 1795, and Captain Harrison was appointed to the command of Fort Washington (now Cincinnati,) where he married the daughter of John Cleves Symmes, the founder of the Miami settlements. He subsequently retired to his farm near Cincinnati, and soon acquired that taste for agriculture which, through a long life, has prompted him, when not engaged in public service, to return to the plough, and where we found him at our visit.

General Harrison's residence at North Bend consists of a centre house of two stories, now covered with clap-boards, but which the general told us is really built of logs, and two clap-boarded wings of one story each. It stands about a quarter of a mile from the Ohio, in a grass park, having a few cherry trees in the distance, and several laburnums close to the door. The park may contain forty to fifty acres, enclosed with a rail fence. A foot-path, worn in the grass, but not formed by art, leads from the gate to the door of the house. The floor of the house is about fifteen or eighteen inches above the grass, and three stones of increasing thickness, undressed, not built on each other, but each lying on the ground, at successive distances, serve as steps to surmount this height. The centre house has much the appearance of a log-cabin. The principal room in it is coarsely finished, and the wooden fire blazes on the hearth. One of the wings, however, is finished like a modern house, and comfortably furnished as a drawing-room. Between the park and the river a canal is forming, to connect Cincinnati with the interior of the state.

General Harrison was suffering from a violent headache when we arrived, but Mrs. Harrison gave us a kind welcome, and the general at length appeared. He is now sixty-seven, rather above the middle stature, slender, and he stoops considerably. His temperament is nervous and bilious; his head is long, of full average height, but not remarkably broad. The anterior lobe is above an average both in length from front to back and height; and both the observing and reflecting organs are well developed. The head is obviously flat in the region of Acquisitiveness. The moral region seemed to present an average development. His eye is vivacious, and his countenance is highly expressive of thought; indeed his whole appearance is much more that of a literary or scientific man, than that of a military commander. His habitation presented unequivocal indications of humble fortune: indeed I may say (and I say it without the least feeling of disrespect) of poverty; yet his manner and appearance were those of a man of the world, who was familiar with the best society, and who, in the retirement of his farm at North Bend, retained the polish and appearance of a gentleman.

Immediately after dinner we retired and walked with him over part of his farm. It is his own property, and we were told extends to about 1500 acres, part of his wife's dowry. From the rising ground behind his house the view is highly beautiful, embracing two bends of the Ohio and its picturesque banks. At first it was intended to plant on this spot the great city of the west; but it is said that the commanding officer of the district entertained an affection for the wife of a sergeant who was then stationed at Cincinnati, and that this induced him to remove his troops there, from which circumstance that town sprung into being. Behind the general's house is a large garden, in which we saw a white-headed eagle, with only one leg. It was presented to him by a convention of his political friends; and the gentleman who delivered it, in name of the rest, observed, in his speech, that as an eagle was seen hovering over Fort Meigs when the general fought the battle in its defence, this may possibly be the identical bird! The general remarked to us that eagles were then so numerous in that country that they might be seen hovering over many places. The captors of the eagle had dislocated its leg, and Dr. Thornton, the general's son-in-law, believing it to be broken, had amputated it. The friend who introduced us to the general said, "General Harrison has promised to keep the eagle till the 4th of March next, when we hope he will go to the White House," (the familiar name of the president's official residence in the city of Washington.) "Ah!" said the general promptly, and in the most natural tone, "there is one other condition about that. If Mr. Van Buren abandons his mischievous policy, he may stay in the White House, and I shall remain in mine." He mentioned that in agreeing to be put in nomination for the presidency, he had distinctly announced his resolution to retire at the end of the first term of four years.

In the evening we left North Bend, and had a delightful drive along the right bank of the Ohio to Cincinnati. I was impressed by this visit with strong feelings of respect for General Harrison. After a long life spent in the service of his country, he lives, poor indeed, but he seemed cheerful and happy. He does not conceal his poverty, nor does he make the least parade of it. He alludes to it simply as a fact, and he betrayed not one emotion of envy or jealousy of any human being, and still less did he indicate any feeling of disappointed ambition.

The excitement of the public mind during a contest for the presidency is great and universal; the tongue ceases to utter, and the ear to hear, any words except those relating to the election; the press groans under the weight of the subject, and all the functions of life seem to be exclusively devoted to it. It is the parent of much drinking and debauchery, of fraud, lying, bribing, cajoling, and intimidating. But it also evolves good. The measures of government are severely scrutinised by reason as well as decided on by passion; the whole Union is moved by one interest, and the impression that they all belong to one nation is vividly excited. Local interests are for the moment forgotten, and one pulse appears to beat from Maine to Mississippi. My fear is, that without the recurrence of these elections, the people of the different states would rapidly come to regard each other as strangers and rivals, and insensibly slacken the bonds which bind them together as one great nation. The elections of members of congress have not this effect; for although that assembly is national, each of its members represents only a section of the country. The president alone derives his power from the people of the whole Union.

April 15. Ther. 55°. Kentucky.—We sailed down the Ohio to Louisville in Kentucky, distance 135 miles, and found it a large thriving town, and apparently destined to become a formidable rival to Cincinnati. My chief object was to pay a visit to Dr. Charles Caldwell, with whom I had corresponded for upwards of twenty years, but whom I had never met. He is one of the most powerful and eloquent medical writers in the United States, and has scarcely a rival west of the Alleghany mountains. He has been the early, persevering, intrepid, and successful advocate of Phrenology; and in his character of medical professor, first at Lexington and latterly in Louisville, has exerted a great influence in its favour. To our regret, he was still suffering from the effects of a recent severe indisposition, and was able to see us only for a few minutes, a circumstance which on every account, we deeply lamented. He recovered; and before we sailed for Europe I had the pleasure of receiving a passing visit from him in Staten Island. He is now advanced in life, but so full of fire and vigour, that I look forward to his still labouring in the cause of science for many years.

We traveled by an excellent road to Frankfort, the capital of Kentucky, thence by a railroad to Lexington, near which Mr. Clay resides, but who was then engaged in the senate at Washington, and afterwards to Maysville, where we again met the Ohio. Nothing can exceed the fertility and beauty of Kentucky; yet slavery prevents it from fully flourishing. In passing through a portion of Virginia, and also in Kentucky, I narrowly observed the extent of labour performed by slaves, whether as waiters, house-servants, labourers, or tradesmen, and in all these capacities it was greatly inferior both in quantity and quality to that performed, not only by white men, but by free negroes. In the inns, the slaves run about with a wonderful display of muscular activity, but there is a sad lack of mind in it; they are active in body to avoid vituperation, but their minds are dormant, because they have no interest in their work. The condition of many of the inns, the servants of which are slaves, is very bad. They are sadly dirty and sorely dilapidated; and even in Louisville and Lexington, where they are managed in the best manner possible with such assistants, they are far inferior to the hotels of the same class in the free states, in many of which, too, free Africans are the chief servants. By comparing the amount of exertion, and the progress in work made by the white labourers and tradesmen in Ohio, with those of the slave labourers and tradesmen in Kentucky, I became convinced that a vigorous German or British emigrant, working by the piece, performs more work than two slaves, and does it better; and that two white labourers, taking them on an average, accomplish more than three slaves. Kentucky, with this inferior quality of labour, competes with Ohio and Indiana and their free labour, separated only by the river; and certainly it is not advancing in prosperity nearly so fast as they do, and this in fact is a relative decline. There is a prevailing expectation, therefore, that her own interests will prompt Kentucky to abolish slavery within a few years, independently of any general movement on the subject by the other slave states.

Great religious revivals were in progress at Frankfort when we visited it. The governor of the state had been converted, and prayed publicly every morning at sunrise in one of the churches. The Supreme Court also was in session, and at table we met the judges and many lawyers. The following dialogue took place at the public breakfast table, and was obviously not of a confidential nature, but on the contrary intended, at least by one of the parties, for general edification. The Rev. Mr. ——— said, that the governor had, that morning, given them a most impressive prayer in the church, and, turning to the chief justice, he continued, "When shall we see the chief justice in the church giving us a prayer!" Chief Justice—"Why you see I have so many duties to discharge, that I have no time for it." Minister—"But, chief justice, these are all little matters of this world's concernment, and this is the one thing needful!" Chief Justice—"True, and I have been intending, the first leisure three months I can command, to give the whole subject a thorough consideration." Minister—"But, chief justice, you believe, and no time is necessary for consideration. If you begin at once and pray, the kingdom of heaven will be opened unto you." Chief Justice—"Well, that is very true, but I don't like to set about a thing without a complete investigation. I want to consider the whole question, and to satisfy myself properly. You see that my time is entirely occupied with these causes; it is my first duty to attend to them, and I have not an hour to bestow on any other subject. I must go to court immediately." This dialogue is characteristic of the professions of the speakers, and it shows, also, that, although there is no Established Church in Kentucky, there is no lack of zeal and earnestness in religion.

In Kentucky, slavery exists in its mildest form, and agriculture is the chief employment of the slaves. A farmer buys his ploughman as he does his horses and cattle, and his price is from $700 to $800. Nevertheless, Thomas Jefferson's picture of the effects of slavery is realised even here. In his "Notes on the state of Virginia," he says, "There must doubtless be an unhappy influence on the manners of our people produced by the existence of slavery among us. The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it; for man is an imitative animal. This quality is the germ of all education in him. From his cradle to his grave he is learning to do what he sees others do. If a parent could find no motive either in his philanthropy or his self-love, for restraining his intemperance of passion towards his slaves, it should always be a sufficient one, that his child is present. But, generally, it is not sufficient. The parent storms; the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, gives a loose to the worst of passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals undepraved by such circumstances." * * * "And can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people, that these liberties are the gift of God? That they are not to be violated but with his wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that his justice cannot sleep for ever; that considering numbers, nature, and natural means only, a revolution of the wheel of fortune, an exchange of situation, is among possible events; that it may become probable by supernatural interference! The Almighty has no attribute that can take side with us in such a contest."

It is impossible to add to the force of eloquence of this exposition of the inherent evils of slavery. I had the pleasure of meeting a gentleman, a native of Virginia, who mentioned, that he had emancipated his slaves and removed to a free state, because, among other effects, he saw that slavery was corrupting the minds of his children. He added, however, that his slaves had not profited by their freedom; the incapacity for self-action and self-control which slavery engenders, renders emancipated Africans, in general, unfit to struggle successfully with the difficulties which surround them. These difficulties arise from the existence of slavery and slave laws, and of habits of feeling connected with them, in the society into which they are thrown. By them the negroes are degraded and oppressed after they are free, and often become immoral and miserable. Universal emancipation, which should raise all the Africans at once to the condition of free men, and impose on the whites the twofold duty of treating them with kindness and directing their industrial efforts, will probably prove the only safe and beneficial means of terminating slavery.

Return to New York.—We descended the Ohio from Maysville to Cincinnati, and there engaged a comfortable state-room in a steamboat going up the river to Pittsburgh, where we arrived on the 26th of April. There were only two modes of reaching Philadelphia, one by the Pennsylvania Canal and Portage Railroad across the Alleghany mountains; the other by the public road. We were assured by every one, that the road was in the worst possible condition, and the inns indifferent, and that the canal was preferable. We accordingly embarked on board of the "James Madison" at 9 P. M., and the scene may be thus described. The boat is fitted up exclusively for carrying passengers. The gentlemen's cabin was about 42 feet long, 15 broad, and 7 high; and the ladies' cabin 12 feet long, 13 broad, and 7 high. Behind the ladies' cabin was a dressing-room for them, 6 feet by 7 or so. Before the gentlemen's cabin was the bar-room and the kitchen. There were windows all along on both sides of the boat. There was one small sky-light in the roof of the gentlemen's cabin. Into this space were stowed 35 men, 19 women, and 10 children, 7 of whom were at the breast. The rate of traveling by the boats was four miles an hour. The distance from Pittsburgh to Harrisburgh, is 286 miles, of which we traveled by the canal 249, and by the Portage Railroad 37 miles, occupying four nights and three days. The beds were ranged continuously along each side of the boat, in three tiers, all within the space of 7 feet in height, and they ran directly across the windows; every one of which was anxiously closed, to prevent the ingress of cold and damp air. The passengers, whose beds reached to the door, insisted on closing it also to keep out the cold; so that there was only the small skylight in the gentlemen's cabin for ventilating thirty-five pair of lungs; and it, too, was packed round on every side by luggage, and covered on the top on account of rain. During the day the beds, consisting of mattresses, sheets, pillows, and cotton quilts, were piled one above another, as close as they could be packed, in a corner of the boat, and inclosed within folding doors and a curtain, so as to be out of sight, and to occupy as little space as possible. They were stowed away the moment the passengers left them in the morning, and continued so until bedtime. The smell of animal effluvia, when they were unpacked, was truly horrid. The mattresses and quilts, from their construction, could not be washed, and they were saturated with the perspiration of every individual who had used them since the commencement of the season, or probably from the time when they were first taken on board. There was no provision for holding the clothes of the passengers during the night, except laying them on stools which were speedily upset, or on the floor, which all day had been spit upon by innumerable chewers of tobacco. The sense of suffocation in bed was distressing, and on rising the feeling of discomfort and fatigue proved that nature had not been refreshed. During the day we breathed fresh air on deck, and opened the windows. The cooking was astonishingly well accomplished, considering the small accommodation; and the meals were unexceptionable; but I should willingly have lived on bread and water for a clean bed and fresh air at night. The second night revealed a new horror. The beds had been packed up promiscuously, and they were tossed out in the same manner; so that each night every man got a different sheet, mattress, and quilt, as they chanced to come to hand, which had been used by his neighbours the night before, who in their turn received his!

At Hollidaysburgh eight or ten clergymen, of various denominations, with the wives and children of some of them, joined the boat, and we had now upwards of seventy passengers on board. The captain said that we should soon be "damping" him on account of our discomfort; but he was guileless, and nobody, within my hearing, said an uncivil word to him. He was attentive, and did all that he could to contribute to the welfare of the passengers; but little was in his power. At night one of these clergymen put the question to the vote of the passengers, whether they would have religious exercises. The majority voted in favour of his proposal, and we had prayers and psalms. The majority knelt on the floor, which had been defiled all day by tobacco saliva; and after shutting up all the avenues to fresh air, and preparing to sleep in unwholesome bedding; in short, after setting aside all the laws of health, and assembling around them the natural causes of croup and fever for the children, and of pulmonary affections for themselves—they prayed fervently to God for spiritual blessings, and also for refreshing slumbers and sound health, and to be raised up next morning invigorated and cheered for the labours and duties of the day! They were not rough, wild, excited fanatics; on the contrary, with one exception, they were gentle, kind, cultivated, Christian men. Their exercises were not only clothed in the words, but breathed the very spirit of benevolence and veneration, and their language, always appropriate, was in some instances even elegant and touching. But they were sadly deficient in the knowledge of God's physical creation. Their prayers for health, in these circumstances, appeared to me little short of a mockery of Heaven; they did not ~~mean~~ them as such, and of course were not guilty of irreverence; but God must have suspended his natural laws before he could have given effect to their petitions; and when the question is put, whether rational beings should expect that God should work miracles in order to save them from the consequences of their own ignorance and neglect of his laws—or whether they should ventilate their boat, and preserve decent cleanliness in their night apparel, as a preliminary condition to receiving the blessing of health—there can scarcely be two opinions on the subject. It was their duty to observe the laws of health, before praying for the blessing appointed by the Creator to flow from that obedience. In point of fact their prayers, on this subject, appeared to me not to have been answered: for in the morning the English character, accompanied by a closer attention to the workings of other men's minds, and other exterior signs. This, for similar reasons, had long distinguished the Italians; but is chiefly displayed, perhaps, in their political writings. We find it, in a larger and more philosophical sense, near the end of Elizabeth's reign, when our literature made its first strong shoot, prompting the short, condensed reflections of Burleigh and Raleigh, or saturating with moral observation the mighty soul of Shakespeare.—From Hallam's Literature of Europe.

AMERICAN SCENERY.

Mr. Cole, the accomplished artist, than whom few persons are better qualified to speak on the subject, has delivered a lecture in Catskill, on American Scenery. The Catskill Recorder which promises the publication of the whole lecture, furnishes us with the following extracts. The first relates to the river scenery:—

"The river scenery of the United States is a rich and boundless theme. The Hudson, for natural magnificence, is unsurpassed.—What can be more beautiful than the lake-like expanses of Tappan and Haverstraw, as seen from the rich orchards of the surrounding hills! What can be more imposing than the precipitous Highlands, whose dark foundations have been rent to make a passage for the mighty River? And ascending still, where can be found scenes more enchanting? The lofty Catskill standing afar off; the green hills, gently rising from the flood, recede like steps, by which we may ascend to a great temple, whose pillars are those everlasting hills, and whose dome is the blue and boundless vault of heaven. The Rhine has its castled crags, its vine-clad hills and ancient villages, the Hudson has its wooded mountains, its rugged precipices, its green undulating shores, and an unbounded capacity for improvement by art. Its shores are not besprinkled by venerable ruins, or the palaces of princes; but there are flourishing towns and villas, and the hand of taste has already been at work. Without any great stretch of imagination, we may anticipate the time, when the ample waters will reflect temple and town and dome in every variety of picturesqueness and magnificence."

The subject of the second is the sky.

"The sky will next demand our attention—the soul of all scenery. In it are the fountains of light, and shade, and colour. Whatever expression the sky takes, the features of the landscape are affected in unison, whether it be the serenity of the summer's blue, or the dark tumult of the storm. It is the sky that makes the earth so lovely at sunrise, and so splendid at sunset. In the one, it breathes over the earth the crystal-like ether; in the other, the liquid gold. The climate of a great part of the United States is subject to great vicissitudes, and we complain, but nature offers a compensation. These very vicissitudes are the abundant source of beauty. As we have temperature of every clime, so have we the skies: we have the blue, unsearchable depths of the northern sky; we have the unheaped thunder clouds of the torrid zone, we have the silver haze of England, and the golden atmosphere of Italy. And if he who has traveled and observed the skies of other climes will spend a few months on the banks of the Hudson, he must be constrained to acknowledge, that for variety and magnificence, American skies are unsurpassed. Italian skies have been lauded by every tongue, and sung by every poet, and who will deny their wonderful beauty? At sunset, the serene arch is filled with alchemy that transmutes mountains and streams and temples into living gold. But the American summer never passes without many sunsets that vie with the Italian, and many still more gorgeous that seem peculiar to this clime. Look at the heavens when the thunder shower has passed, and the sun stoops below the western mountains; then the low purple clouds hang in festoons around the steep; in the higher heavens are crimson bands, interwoven with feathers of gold, fit for the wings of angels, and still above is spread that interminable field of ether whose colour is too beautiful to have a name."

THE VILLAGE PREACHER.

Go, proud infidel, search the ponderous tomes of heathen learning—explore the works of Confucius—examine the precepts of Seneca, and the writings of Socrates. Collect all the excellencies of the ancient and modern moralists, and point to a sentence equal to the simple prayer of the Saviour. Reviled and insulted, suffering the grossest indignities, crowned with thorns, and led away to die, no annihilating curse breaks from his breast. Sweet, placid as the aspiring of a mother for her nursing, ascends a prayer of mercy for his enemies,—“Father, forgive them.” O, it was worthy of its origin, and stamped with the bright seal of truth that his mission was from heaven!

Acquaintances, have you ever quarreled? Friends, have you differed? If he who is pure and perfect forgave his bitterest enemies, do you well to cherish your anger? Brothers, to you the precept is imperative—you shall forgive, not seven times, but seventy times seven!

Husbands and wives, you have no right to expect perfection in each other. To err is the lot of humanity. Illness will sometimes make you petulant, and disappointment ruffles the smoothest temper. Guard, I beseech you, with unremitted vigilance, your passions: controlled, they are the genial heat that warms us along the way of life—ungoverned, they are consuming fires. Let your strife be one of respectful attentions, and conciliatory conduct. Cultivate, with care, the kind and gentle affections of the heart. Plant not, but eradicate, the thorn that grows in your partner's path. Above all, let no feeling of revenge find harbour within your breast—let the sun never go down on your anger. A kind word—an obliging action—if it be a trifling concern, has a power superior to the harp of David, in calming the billows of the soul.

Revenge is as incompatible with happiness as hostile to religion. Let him whose heart is black with malice, and studious of revenge, walk through the fields when clothed with verdure and adorned with flowers—to his eyes there is no beauty—the flowers to him exhale no fragrance. Dark as his soul, nature is robed in deepest sable. The smile of beauty lights not upon his bosom with joy; but the furies of hell rage in his breast, and render him as miserable as he would wish the object of his hate.

But let him lay his hand on his breast and say, “Revenge, I cast thee from me: Father, forgive me, as I forgive my enemies,”—and nature assumes a new and delightful garniture. Then, indeed, are meads verdant and flowers fragrant—then is the music of the groves delightful to the ear, and the smiles of virtuous beauty lovely to his soul.—Charles Miner, Esq.

DUELS BETWEEN FRENCH WOMEN.

That women, who can mostly get silly people to fight for them, should not fight themselves, is natural; but there are instances on record in which ladies have shown their determination to avenge their own wrongs. Madame de Villecheu mentions a duel fought with swords by the Henriette Sylvie, of Moliere, with another woman, both in male attire. In the letters of Madame Dunoyer, a case is mentioned of a lady of Beaucaire and a young lady of rank, who fought with swords in their garden, and would have killed each other had they not been separated; this meeting had been preceded by a regular challenge. De la Colombiere mentions a duel that took place on the Boulevard St. Antoine between two ladies of doubtful virtue, in which they inflicted on each other's face and bosom several wounds, two points at which female jealousy would naturally aim. St. Foix relates the case of Mademoiselle Durieux, who in the open street fought her lover, of the name of Antinotti. But the most celebrated female duelist was the actress Maupin, one of the performers at the opera. Serane, the famous fencing master, was one of her lovers, and from him she received many valuable lessons. Being insulted one day by an actor of the name of Dumény, she called him out; but as he refused to give her satisfaction, she carried away his watch and his snuff-box as trophies of her victory. Another performer having presumed to offend her, on his declining a meeting, was obliged to kneel down before her and implore her forgiveness. One evening at a ball, having behaved in a rude manner to a lady, she was requested to leave the room, which she did on the condition that those gentlemen who had warmly espoused the offended lady's cause should accompany her. To this proposal they agreed; when after a hard combat she killed them all, and quietly returned to the ball-room. Louis XIV. granted her a pardon, and she withdrew to Brussels, where she became the mistress of the Elector of Bavaria. However, she soon afterwards returned to the Parisian opera, and died in 1707, at the age of 37.

Under the regency a pistol meeting took place between the Marquise de Nesle and the Countess Polognac for the possession of the Duc de Richelieu; and in more modern times, so late, indeed, as 1827, a Madame B——, at St. Rambert, received a challenge to fight with pistols; and at about the same period, a lady of Chateauroux, whose husband had received a slap in the face without resenting the insult, called out the offender, and fighting him with swords, severely wounded him.

In 1828, a duel took place between a young girl and a garde du corps. She had been betrayed by the ungallant soldier, and insisted upon satisfaction, selecting her own weapons by the right of an offended party. Two shots were exchanged, but without any result, as the seconds very wisely had not loaded with ball. The young lady, however, ignorant of this precaution, fired first, and received the fire of her adversary with the utmost coolness, when, to try her courage, after taking a long and deliberate aim, he fired in the air, and thus terminated the meeting, which no doubt led to many others of a less hostile nature.

In the same month, as a striking instance of the contagion of this practice, a duel was fought near Strasbourg between a French woman and a German lady, both of whom were in love with a printer. The parties met on the ground armed with pistols, with seconds of their own sex. The German damsel wanted to fire across a pocket-handkerchief, but the French lady and her seconds insisted upon a distance of twenty-five paces. They both fired without effect, when the exasperated German insisted that they should carry on the contest until one of the parties fell. This determination, however, was controlled by the seconds, who put a stop to further proceedings, but were unable to bring about a reconciliation.

LIQUORS OF THE ANCIENTS.

Admitting that the invention of barley-wine originated in Egypt, not because they had no wines, but because a stimulating liquor, cheaper than grape-wine, was required for the use of the common people, we can trace the cause of its extending throughout Europe. Don Cassius says that “the Pannonians, who inhabit the banks of the Danube, had neither oil nor wine, except a very little, and that little bad; they eat barley and millet, and from these two kinds of grain made a drink.” We learn from Ammianus, that a similar liquor, called sabia, was prepared from barley or wheat in Illyricum. Tacitus declares that the ancient Germans were much addicted to drunkenness, and that among them “it was no disgrace to continue drinking night and day”—“they prepared a beverage from barley or wheat, which they made into a liquor resembling wine.” It is only in this indirect way that we can learn any thing concerning the corn-wines of antiquity, because we know nothing of the mode of preparation. Were we acquainted with the process, the case would be otherwise: and the chief fact of which we are ignorant is, whether or not any ferment was made use of. Without yeast, the slight fermentation which takes place spontaneously in corn liquors, would afford a poor, rapid, acidulous drink, with very little exhilarating power; and to the taste of us moderns it would prove not a little disgusting. Yeast was certainly known to the ancients. Pliny says, "the frothy head of all these liquors is used by ladies for beautifying the skin of their faces;" but he does not say that it was used in brewing.

At Roman feasts, the wine was contained in earthenware vases or glass bottles, with a label indicating its age and quality; for they set the greatest value on the oldest wines. Sometimes the wine was perfumed, and often it was cooled with snow. It was almost always mixed with water, being seldom drunk by itself: the guests did not mix it, but for this purpose boys of great beauty were in attendance, who measured it into cups as required. The mixing of water with wine, at all feasts, was enforced among the Greeks. As the Scythians and Thracians mixed no water, and were much addicted to drunkenness, if a Lacedæmonian did the same, he was stigmatised as a Scythian toper. The wine at Roman entertainments was served at the second course, along with the fruits. The Romans drank healths, either to each other or to an absent friend; and the quantity drank was in an exact proportion to the number of letters in the person's name—not to the degree of friendship. But the most extraordinary of their convivial customs was the following:—A skeleton was sometimes introduced at feasts, or the representation of one, in imitation of the Egyptians, upon which the master of the feast, looking at it, used to say, "Drink and be merry, for thus thou shalt be after death." Strange, indeed, must be the temper of mind that could be excited to mirth by such spectacles. Some years since, in an old well in London, were found some bottles of wine, which, from various circumstances, especially the glass being in a state of decomposition, and the shape of the bottles, were considered to be of great antiquity. On account of the quantity of burnt wood which surrounded them, it was thought that they had lain there since the great fire in London, in 1666. One of these bottles contained excellent Malaga, the other contained what appeared to have been Port; but the spirit had changed into vinegar, and the vegetable matter was in a state of putrefaction.

During the excavation of the ancient city of Herculaneum, which was buried by an eruption of Vesuvius more than 1700 years ago, an earthen vase containing wine was found in a cellar; it was solid, and resembled a mass of porous, dark, violet-coloured glass. It is probable that this mass had been an evaporated wine. Boyle froze French and Rhenish wines into ice. He relates as follows:—"A physician of my acquaintance having purchased some Malaga sack at Moscow, which was drawn from a frozen hogshead of the same liquor, it proved much better and stronger than was expected, but the remaining part of the ice being thawed, was little more than phlegm. The doctor also observed the like to happen in some other liquors: he did not, however, find the spirituous part always retire to the centre of the vessel, but that it lay sometimes interspersed among the ice." Mr. Boyle also instances that certain wines brought to Moscow are so frozen on their arrival, that the casks were staved, and the wine cleaved with hatchets. He further adduces the case of a barrel of strong beer, left by some sailors on shore in Greenland. On their return next year, it was found hard frozen; "but running a heated spit into the middle of the ice, there issued out a turbid liquor that was exceedingly strong and spirituous, whilst the frozen part was almost insipid."

We have next to trace the progress of the different vinous liquors which have been made use of in the British isles in ancient times. Previously to the conquest of Britain by the Romans, (B. C. 55,) agriculture was almost unknown in the island. The Romans, well versed in this important branch of knowledge, taught the British the arts of peace as well as of war; and, during the time that they maintained possession of the island, so far advanced were the inhabitants in civilisation, that they exported corn and cattle in abundance, as well as metals, and pearls of great beauty. Before the introduction of agriculture into Britain, (says Dr. Henry,) mead, that is, honey diluted with water, and fermented, was probably the only strong liquor known to its inhabitants, as it was to many other nations in the same circumstances. This continued to be a favourite beverage amongst the ancient Britons, and their posterity, long after they had become acquainted with other liquors. The mead-maker was the eleventh person in dignity in the courts of the ancient princes of Wales, and took place of the physician. The following ancient law of that principality shows how much this liquor was esteemed by the princes:—"There are three things in the court which must be communicated to the king before they are made known to any other person; first, every sentence of the judge; second, every new song; and, third, every cask of mead." This was, perhaps, the liquor which is called by Ossian the joy and strength of the shells, with which his heroes were so much delighted.—History of Intoxicating Liquors.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S LOVE FOR MUSIC.—Pleased as my illustrious friend appeared really to be, when I first sung for him at Abbotsford, it was not till an evening or two after, at his own hospitable supper-table, that I saw him in his true sphere of musical enjoyment. No sooner had the quair taken its round, after our repast, than his friend, Sir Adam, was called upon, with the acclaim of the whole table, for the song of "Hey tuttie tattie," and gave it out to us with all the true national relish. But it was during the chorus that Scott's delight at this festive scene chiefly showed itself. At the end of every verse, the whole company rose from their seats, and stood round the table, with arms crossed, so as to grasp the hand of the neighbour on each side. Thus interlinked, we continued to keep measure to the strain, by moving our arms up and down, all chanting vociferously, "Hey tuttie tattie, hey tuttie tattie." Sir Walter's enjoyment of the old Jacobite chorus, a little increased, doubtless, by seeing how I entered into the spirit of it, gave to the whole scene, I confess, a zest and charm in my eyes such as the finest musical performance could not have bestowed on it.—T. Moore.

A SHORT CHAPTER.

When Boys become Men, they are discharged from control.

This gives rise to a dangerous mistake.

Exemption from control being the privilege of Manhood, Boys imagine that it is a proof of manliness to spurn control.

But the proof and test of true manliness, is self-control. He who practises this, has a right to be free from any other; and he is discharged accordingly.

This comes by habit: and the habit is acquired by submission.

He who spurns the control of others before he acquires the habit of self-control, never acquires it, and never becomes a Man.

If, in the mean time, he learns to mistake impatience for spirit, and sullenness for dignity, he puts himself beyond the reach of remedy.

The truest test of Manliness in a Boy, is unhesitating submission to the authority of his Mother. He may obey his father from fear or interest. His obedience to his Mother is an effort of self-control.

CHRISTIANITY IN CHINA.—A native of China, now at Rome, furnishes the following statistical details to the Franconian Courier:—"There are at present about 300,000 Christians in China. The greater part of them are indebted for pastoral care to the Lazarists, but some likewise to the Dominicans and Franciscans, and to a small number of Italian priests. The whole number of priests, European and Chinese, does not exceed 300. Of seminaries, there are but few, and those few are little more than common schools. The Christians are not allowed to practise their religion publicly; but with their private assemblies no interference takes place. The churches are but few in number, and those not capacious enough for their several congregations, and the faithful are obliged to meet privately. Singularly enough, a church erected at Pekin by the Emperor Hany Li, who was very friendly to the Christians, has remained intact. A notion has long prevailed among the Pagans of China, that as long as the cross remains standing on the steeple of this church, no serious calamity can befall the empire. In Canton, there are 8000 and 9000 Christians, who in that city enjoy greater liberty than in any other part of the country. In Macao there are upwards of a thousand Catholics."

A person who undertakes to manage the human constitution, (says Andrew Combe,) whether in a fancy or maturity, without any reference to the principles on which it acts, may be compared to a traveller, who, without a map or a guide, wanders over a new country in search of some particular object or place. By some lucky chance, he may stumble at once upon the locality he is in search of, or reach it at length by some circuitous route. But the probability is greater, that, after wandering about in uncertainty, he will be forced to return, weary and disappointed with the fruitlessness of his journey. He, on the contrary, who adopts the guidance of principle, may be likened to a traveller who, carrying with him a map in which the chief features of the country are accurately laid down, advances with comparative certainty towards his aim. If, at any time, in consequence of omissions or minor inaccuracies, he chances to wander from the right course, the map itself soon warns him of the fact, and, at the same time, affords him the means of correcting the very error caused by its own imperfections.

NEW BOOK.

Two Hundred Pictorial Illustrations of the Holy Bible, and Views in the Holy Land. New York: Roberts Seers; Philadelphia: R. S. H. George, 1841.

This popular work has been but a short time before the public. Of the first series, many thousand copies have been sold. The second series is just issued. It is in every respect superior to the first. The arrangement is more methodical; the engraving is superior; the amount of information is much larger; and, to crown the whole, there is the addition of a splendid frontispiece and title-page, designed by Chapman, and engraved by Roberts and Looseng. We are pleased that the extensive patronage bestowed on the first series has encouraged the publisher to execute the second in such superior style.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

A great deal is said in favour of the social nature of the fine arts. Music gives pleasure to others. Drawing is an art, the amusement of which does not centre in him who exercises it, but is diffused among the rest of the world. This is true; but there is nothing, after all, so social as a cultivated mind. We do not mean to speak slightly of the fine arts, or to depreciate the good humour with which they are sometimes exhibited; but we appeal to any man, whether a little spirited and sensible conversation—displaying, modestly, useful acquirements—and evincing rational curiosity, is not well worth the highest exertions of musical or graphical skill. A woman of accomplishments may entertain those who have the pleasure of knowing her for half an hour with great brilliancy; but a mind full of ideas, and with that elastic spring which the love of knowledge only can convey, is a perpetual source of exhilaration and amusement to all that come within its reach;—not collecting its force into single and insulated achievements, like the efforts made in the fine arts—but diffusing, equally over the whole of existence, a calm pleasure—better loved as it is longer felt—and suitable to every variety and every period of life. Therefore, instead of hanging the understanding of a woman upon walls, or hearing it vibrate upon strings,—instead of seeing it in clouds, or hearing it in the wind,—we would make it the first spring and ornament of society, by enriching it with attainments upon which alone such power depends.

If the education of women were improved, the education of men would be improved also. It is certainly in the power of a sensible and well-educated mother to inspire such tastes and propensities as shall nearly decide the destiny of the future man; and this is done, not only by the intentional exertions of the mother, but by the gradual and insensible imitation of the child; for there is something extremely contagious in greatness and rectitude of thinking, even at that age; and the character of the mother, with whom he passes his early infancy, is always an event of the utmost importance to the child. A merely accomplished woman cannot infuse her tastes into the minds of her sons; and if she could, nothing could be more unfortunate than her success. Besides, when her accomplishments are given up, she has nothing left for it, but to amuse herself in the best way she can; and, becoming entirely frivolous, either declines the fatigue of attending to her children, or, attending to them, has neither talents nor knowledge to succeed; and, therefore, here is a plain and fair answer to those who ask so triumphantly, Why should a woman dedicate herself to this branch of knowledge? or why should she be attached to such science?—Because, by having gained information on these points, she may inspire her son with valuable tastes, which may abide by him through life, and carry him up to all the sublimest of knowledge;—because she cannot lay the foundation of a great character, if she is absorbed in frivolous amusements, nor inspire her child with noble desires, when a long course of trifling has destroyed the little talents which were left by a bad education.

It is of great importance to a country, that there should be as many understandings as possible actively employed within it. Mankind are much happier for the discovery of barometers, thermometers, steam engines, and all the innumerable inventions in the arts and sciences. We are every day and every hour reaping the benefit of such talent and ingenuity. The same observation is true of such works as those of Dryden, Pope, Milton, and Shakspeare. Mankind are much happier that such individuals have lived and written;—they add every day to the stock of public enjoyment—and perpetually gladden and embellish life. Now, the number of those who exercise their understanding to any good purpose is exactly in proportion to those who exercise it at all; but as the matter stands at present, half the talent in the universe runs to waste, and is totally unprofitable. It would have been almost as well for the world, hitherto, that women, instead of possessing the capacities they do at present, should have been born wholly destitute of wit, genius, and every other attribute of mind of which men make so eminent an use: and the ideas of use and possession are so united together, that, because it has been the custom in almost all countries to give to women a different and a worse education than to men, the notion has obtained that they do not possess faculties which they do not cultivate. Just as, in breaking up a common, it is sometimes very difficult to make the poor believe it will carry corn, merely because they have been hitherto accustomed to see it produce nothing but weeds and grass—they very naturally mistake its present condition for its general nature. So completely have the talents of women been kept down, that there is scarcely a single work, either of reason, or imagination, written by a woman, which is in general circulation, either in the English, French, or Italian literature;—scarcely one that has crept even into the ranks of our minor poets.

If the possession of excellent talents is not a conclusive reason why they should be improved, it at least amounts to a very strong presumption; and, if it can be shown that women may be trained to reason and imagine as well as men, the strongest reasons are certainly necessary to show us why we should not avail ourselves of such rich gifts of nature; and we have a right to call for a clear statement of those perils which make it necessary that such talents should be totally extinguished, or, at most, very partially drawn out. The burthen of proof does not lie with those who say, Increase the quantity of talent in any country as much as possible—for such a proposition is in conformity with every man's feelings: but it lies with those who say, Take care to keep that understanding weak and trifling, which nature has made capable of becoming strong and powerful. The paradox is with them, not with us. In all human reasoning, knowledge must be taken for a good, till it can be shown to be an evil. But now, Nature makes to us rich and magnificent presents; and we say to her—You are too luxuriant and munificent—we must keep you under, and prune you;—we have talents enough in the other half of the creation;—and, if you will not stupify and enfeeble the mind of women to our hands, we ourselves must expose them to a narcotic process, and educate away the fatal redundancy with which the world is afflicted, and the order of sublunary things deranged.

One of the greatest pleasures of life is conversation;—and the pleasures of conversation are of course enhanced by every increase of knowledge: not that we should meet together to talk of alkalis and angles, or to add to our stock of history and philology—though a little of all these things is no bad ingredient in conversation: but, let the subject be what it may, there is always a prodigious difference between the conversation of those who have been well educated and of those who have not enjoyed this advantage. Education gives fecundity of thought, copiousness of illustration, quickness, vigour, fancy, words, images, and illustrations:—it decorates every common thing, and gives the power of trifling, without being undignified and absurd. The subjects themselves may not be wanted, upon which the talents of an educated man have been exercised: but there is always a demand for those talents which his education has rendered strong and quick. Now, really nothing can be further from our intention than to say any thing rude and unpleasant; but we must be excused for observing, that it is not now a very common thing to be interested by the variety and extent of female knowledge; but it is a very common thing to lament, that the finest faculties in the world have been confined to tridles utterly unworthy of their richness and their strength.

The pursuit of knowledge is the most innocent and interesting occupation which can be given to the female sex; nor can there be a better method of checking a spirit of dissipation than by diffusing a taste for literature. The true way to attack vice is by setting up something else against it. Give to women, in early youth, something to acquire, of sufficient interest and importance to command the application of the mature faculties, and to excite their perseverance in future life;—teach them that happiness is to be derived from the acquisition of knowledge, as well as the gratification of vanity; and you will raise up a much more formidable barrier against dissipation than an host of invectives and exhortations can supply.

It sometimes happens that an unfortunate man gets drunk with very bad wine—not to gratify his palate, but to forget his cares: he does not set any value on what he receives, but on account of what it excludes; it keeps out something worse than itself. Now, though it were denied that the acquisition of serious knowledge is of itself important to a woman, still it prevents a taste for silly and pernicious works of imagination; it keeps away the horrid trash of novels; and, in lieu of that eagerness for emotion and adventure, which books of that sort inspire, promotes a calm and steady temperament of mind.

A man who deserves such a piece of good fortune may generally find an excellent companion for all the vicissitudes of his life; but it is not so easy to find a companion for his understanding, who has similar pursuits with himself, or who can comprehend the pleasure he derives from them. We really can see no reason why it should not be otherwise; nor comprehend how the pleasures of domestic life can be promoted by diminishing the number of subjects in which persons who are to spend their lives together take a common interest.

One of the most agreeable consequences of knowledge is the respect and importance which it communicates to old age. Men rise in character often as they increase in years,—they are venerable from what they have acquired, and pleasing from what they can impart. If they outlive their faculties, the mere frame itself is respected for what it once contained; but women (such is their unfortunate style of education) hazard every thing upon one cast of the die;—when youth is gone, all is gone. No human creature gives his admiration for nothing: either the eye must be charmed, or the understanding gratified. A woman must talk wisely, or look well. Every human being must put up with the coldest civility, who has neither the charms of youth nor the wisdom of age. Neither is there the slightest commiseration for decayed accomplishments:—no man mourns over the fragments of a dancer, or drops a tear on the relics of musical skill. They are flowers destined to perish; but the decay of great talents is always the subject of solemn pity; and, even when their last memorial is over, their ruins and vestiges are regarded with pious affection.

There is no connection between the ignorance in which women are kept, and the preservation of moral and religious principle; and yet certainly there is, in the minds of some timid and respectable persons, a vague, indefinite dread of knowledge, as if it were capable of producing these effects. There are men, indeed, who are always exclaiming against every species of power, because it is connected with danger: their dread of abuses is so much stronger than their admiration of uses, that they would cheerfully give up the use of fire, gunpowder, and printing, to be freed from robbers, incendiaries, and libels. It is true, that every increase of knowledge may possibly render depravity more depraved, as well as it may increase the strength of virtue. It is in itself only power; and its value depends on its application. But, trust to the natural love of good where there is no temptation to be bad—it operates nowhere more forcibly than in education. No man, whether he be tutor, guardian, or friend, ever contents himself with infusing the mere ability to acquire; but, giving the power, he gives with it a taste for the wise and rational exercise of that power; so that an educated person is not only with stronger and better faculties than others, but with a more useful propensity—a disposition better cultivated—and associations of a higher and more important class.

In short, and to recapitulate the main points upon which we have insisted—Why the disproportion in knowledge between the two sexes should be so great, when the inequality in natural talents is so small; or why the understanding of women should be lavished upon trifles, when nature has made it capable of higher and better things, we profess ourselves not able to understand. The affectation charged upon female knowledge is best cured by making that knowledge more general; and economy devolved upon women is best secured by the ruin, disgrace, and inconvenience which proceeds from neglecting it. For the care of children, nature has made a direct and powerful provision; and the gentleness and elegance of women is the natural consequence of that desire to please, which is productive of the greatest part of civilisation and refinement, and which rests upon a foundation too deep to be shaken by any such modifications in education as we have proposed. If you educate women to attend to dignified and important subjects, you are multiplying, beyond measure, the chances of human improvement by preparing and meditating those early impressions which always come from the mother; and which, in a great majority of instances are quite decisive of character and genius. Nor is it only in the business of education that women would influence the destiny of men;—If women knew more, men must learn more—for ignorance would then be shameful—and it would become the fashion to be instructed. The instruction of women improves the stock of national talents, and employs more minds for the instruction and amusement of the world;—it increases the pleasures of society by multiplying the topics upon which the two sexes take a common interest;—and makes marriage an intercourse of understanding as well as of affection, by giving dignity and importance to the female character. The education of women favours public morals; it provides for every season of life, as well as for the brightest and the best; and leaves a woman when she is stricken by the hand of time, not as she now is, destitute of every thing, and neglected by all, but with the full power and the splendid attractions of knowledge,—diffusing the elegant pleasures of polite literature, and receiving the just homage of learned and accomplished men.—Rev. Sydney Smith.

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.

We presume our readers will all wish to know something of this histrionic prodigy—at present the chief concern of the two great European capitals. The following account is from the London Examiner:—

Every body knows what an important matter to theatre is in Paris. An emeute in the commissariat has precedence at any time of a crisis in the Ministry. The removal of M. Vedal from the direction of the Théâtre Français, made a far more enduring sensation than the removal of M. Thiers from the direction of the Cabinet. And as no one knew better than Napoleon the temper of this good city of Paris, it was some of less vital import to its welfare than an ordinance to reorganise the Théâtre Français, which is set down to indite amidst the smoking ruins of the Kremlin.

Great have been the reverses of the Théâtre Français since those days. Its glory departed with Talma and Duchesnois, for, delightful and attractive as the genius of Mars was admitted to be, it is impossible that any great theatre can sustain itself with comedy. Long and sad was its decline. Houss a comical actor on Corneille; mournful benches at Molière; Racine puffed at by Rococo. Then followed what is called a coalition, which had the natural fate of such unnatural things. As little could the Boulevards be crammed into the Rue Richelieu, as Hugo and Dumas be made to fraternise with Racine and Corneille. A little excitement of novelty, and things became worse than before. So out went Dumas and Hugo, bag and baggage, Madame Dorval included; and while out they went, threatening the old school with annihilation in a Renaissance, the old school had in immediate reserve a more real new birth of its own, from which all the glories of the Théâtre Français sprang suddenly to life once more.

Some one had seen a young Jewess play at the Gymnase, and though she was uneasy and ill at home in her part, and spoke with an accent that was more Swiss than French, and the audience would not applaud her, he thought her worth mentioning in the salon. Piqued by her failure alike in light vaudeville and murderous melo-drame, the young enthusiast had meanwhile, of her own accord, gone hard to work with Corneille and Racine. If, in to fall, she would seem to have thought, it will be better to fall from Notre Dame itself, than from a wall in the garden or the shambles. And these walls were rewarded, and her hopes seemed all fulfilled, when, on the good word of a retired actor, (before whom she had declaimed at the request of the judicious admirer referred to,) she received an engagement at the Francis, with four thousand francs a year. She appeared and succeeded; Paris went out of its wits, and Mademoiselle Rachel's four thousand francs went up to a hundred and fifty thousand. She had been induced to visit England; we had the happiness to see her act Hermione at her Majesty's Theatre on Monday night, in Racine's tragedy of Andromaque; and, in our opinion, the performance more than justified the enthusiasm of the Parisians. It was an effort of the highest genius in this sphere of art, guided and controlled throughout by exquisite good taste. Where the one is, indeed, the other cannot fail to be. And taking genius in this art to consist, as for the most part it does with all, in the power of equalising imagination with reality, it seems to us that there has never been a more indisputable possessor of it than Mademoiselle Rachel.

The first act of Andromaque passes without the entrance of Hermione, and the stage has seldom seen so sorry a business, as Monday night's exhibition of it. One wondered which was most absurd, the pompous politeness of Pyrrhus, or the passionate puling of Oreste. For the verse of poor Racine it was with these actors as we had ourselves been privately too apt to consider it, one continuous, dragging, antithetical whine; and here sank our heads within us, as we thought this at least could scarcely flow much "mended," even from the lips of the trees of Hermione. It is not the custom to drop the

I heard one of them complaining that he felt as if he had no life in him—that his head was as if filled with some heavy inanimate matter; another complained of pain in his head; a third of nausea; and two who were affected with bronchitis, mentioned how much worse they felt in the morning; while the wife of one of them wondered how, on rising, she was seized with faintness, and continued for hours to feel as if she should sink down insensible on the floor. I did not hear one of them connect these sufferings with the bad air and uncleanly condition in which they had passed the night. We had prayers and psalms in the morning, and again on the second evening; but as it rained incessantly, and the cabin was kept, if possible, still more close, the suffering increased; and, for my own part, I did not recover my usual feelings of internal comfort and mental alacrity for several days after we had escaped from this torturing prison.

These clergymen, certainly, were only passengers, and could not alter the circumstances in which they and we were placed. But if they had known and respected God's natural laws, they might have used the great influence which they obviously possessed over the minds of the passengers, in inducing them to admit at least some portion of fresh air, and also in giving effect to a general complaint to the owners of the boats against arrangements so manifestly injurious to health, and which a little skill and expense could unquestionably have remedied.

Some of these ministers were Methodists, and they mentioned that their society allows each preacher $100 for himself, besides his traveling expenses; $100 for his wife, if he be married; $16 for each child below seven, and $24 for each child above seven, and below fourteen years of age, all per annum. Each preacher has a district which he must traverse every six weeks, and at the end of every two years his circuit is changed. These are all the allowances, except gifts from their flocks. By this machinery the thinly-scattered population of the west is preserved within reach of Christian ordinances and cultivation. The love of souls alone can induce men of ordinary attainments to embrace so laborious and ill-requited a profession.

Part of the scenery through which we passed is said to be exquisitely beautiful, but a heavy rain descending through a thick mist prevented us from seeing any object at a distance exceeding a hundred yards from the boat.

One of the passengers in conversing with me asked—"Have you been to the west?"—"A short way only."—"Have you been long in the country?"—"Only about twenty months."—"Did you go to settle?"—"No."—"Were you at St. Louis?"—"No, not so far."—"On the Ohio, then?"—"Yes, as far as Louisville."—"Were you thinking of buying land in Kentucky?"—"No."—"Do you go to Baltimore?"—"No, to Philadelphia."—"Are you settled there?"—"No."—"Farther east perhaps?"—"Yes, a good way farther east."—"What is the name of the town?"—"Why, if you have any particular interest in knowing, I will tell you."—"Oh no, not any particular interest; only one likes to know the gentlemen one travels with. If we hear them inquired about, we can say that we saw them."—"I do not think that there is much chance of your being asked about me." Here the dialogue terminated; but all this was said quite civilly, and without the least intention of rudeness.

The day after this conversation C—— missed a silver fruit-knife, which she valued highly; and I used every means to discover whether she had dropt it in the boat, but in vain. It was given up as lost; when some hours afterwards, I saw it in the hands of the individual who had interrogated me so minutely. "That's my wife's fruit-knife," said I, "which she lost yesterday; where did you find it?"—"Oh, I found it last evening on the deck between two trunks; I have since been inquiring to whom it belonged, and could not find an owner."—"But my wife's initials are on it—C. C."—"True, I saw these letters, but as you would not tell me any thing about yourself yesterday, I had no idea that these were your wife's initials." The inquisitive gentleman kindly returned the knife; and I felt that he had got completely the better of me on this occasion.

April 30. Ther. 55°. We stayed a day at Harrisburg, and admired exceedingly the beauty of the Susquehanna River, on the left bank of which it stands. The village itself, although the political capital of Pennsylvania, is small, plain, and unpretending.

May 1. Ther. 56°. We started this morning at 7 o'clock by a railroad for Philadelphia. The country through which it passed is all cleared, highly fertile, well cultivated, and possesses much natural beauty. The farm-houses and offices looked substantial, clean, and neat; we were told that a great part of the population is of German descent, and that they preserve the language and manners of their original country. At 1 P. M. the engine was allowed to run off the track; and we lost two hours before it could be restored to its place, by means of tackle and a multitude of men. No injury was done to it or any of the passengers; but we had not proceeded far when the engine stood still. All the coals had been consumed, and the engineer had supplied their place with green oak, which would not burn. At last a baggage train came up and pushed our train before it to the next station, where we got a supply of combustible fuel. The engine then performed its duty well, and at 7 P. M. we arrived at Philadelphia, three hours behind the usual time. The distance was 105 miles. During all these delays, the result of sheer carelessness, not an angry or discontented word was heard from the passengers, who were very numerous. The railway train from Philadelphia to New York started at 5 P. M. and we should have arrived an hour before that time, instead of two hours after it. Many individuals who had urgent business and appointments in New York found their plans deranged, and suffered serious inconvenience; yet they bore the disappointment with most exemplary patience and good humour.

May 9. Ther. 45°. Philadelphia and Boston.—I have now seen something of both Boston and Philadelphia, and they present distinct mental characteristics. In Boston literature is more cultivated than science, and speculation is preferred to physical investigation. A person gains reputation there, by having at command all the striking passages of Shakspeare, and knowing every reading of his text, and the opinions of his commentators; by studying Italian, and being able to quote Dante; by learning German and becoming eloquent in Goethe. It is not necessary that he should know chemistry, natural philosophy, natural history, physiology, or even geology. The Bostonians are learned in literature, write well, and speak well; but an ingenious theory has more charms for them than a laborious inquiry into scientific truth. The educated men of Philadelphia study science more generally and extensively. They are precise and accurate in their knowledge of facts and natural phenomena, and solid in their inductions and conclusions; but they know less of books, commentators, theories, and opinions. The temperament of the educated class in Boston presents more of the sanguine and nervous elements than that of the same class in Philadelphia; and in them also, the anterior lobe is, perhaps, a little larger, while the moral organs are generally large in both. In their present condition, the Philadelphians are the more scientific thinkers, and more in harmony with the first class of minds in Europe. Boston, however, takes a deeper interest than Philadelphia in moral, intellectual, and religious pursuits. Boston resembles Edinburgh in the days of Dugald Stewart, when great reputations were founded on acquirements in metaphysics and belles-lettres, and when distinguished literary men were unacquainted even with the rudiments of physical science.

Debts of the American States.—I have frequently been asked whether, in my opinion, the American states will preserve faith with their public creditors and pay their debts. A vast extent of information beyond what I can pretend to possess, would be necessary to enable any one to deliver a satisfactory answer to this question; but some ideas may be presented which may serve to enable others to elucidate it in a more satisfactory manner. The subject divides itself naturally into two heads; 1st, The ability of the states to redeem their obligations; and 2dly, Their willingness to do so. Ample and correct information in regard to the first head, may be obtained from Mr. Trotter's "Observations on the Financial Position and Credit of such of the states of the North American Union as have contracted Public Debts." This work was commended by the American press, and in the United States its details are regarded as worthy of being relied on. I frequently conversed with bankers and capitalists on the subject of the state debts; and in traveling into different parts of the Union, I endeavoured to form some estimate, necessarily a vague one, of the resources of the states. Premising, then, that the debts of the different states have been incurred, not to prosecute wars and measures of destruction, but chiefly to form canals, roads, and railroads, and to institute banks, I remark, that the general opinion which I heard expressed was, that from one half to one fourth of the sums constituting the debts of most of the states, have been wasted through unskilful application and lavished expenditure—the inevitable accompaniments of works undertaken by a popular government; but that the remainder has been beneficially invested. The waste differs much in different states; but allowing for its utmost magnitude, and viewing the extent of surface, the salubrity of the climate, the fertility of the soil, the mineral riches, and all the other natural advantages of the country, together with the industry and ingenuity of the people, the debts appear to me to be a mere trifle in comparison with the resources of the states. Wealth and population are augmenting so rapidly, that twenty years hence, the present amount of state debts, with few exceptions, would scarcely be felt as a burden according to European notions, although both principal and interest were raised by direct taxation. I never heard a man of the least judgment doubt the ability of all the states to meet their obligations; and so far as my own means of judging extend, I concur in this view.

After traveling through a considerable portion of Pennsylvania, and contemplating the amazing richness of her soil and mines, and the very great advantages which she derives from her canals and railroads (with all their faults,) and after witnessing the industry, economy, and wealth of her people, the amount of her debt appeared to me to be no formidable incumbrance on her resources.

It is stated in the American Almanac for 1840, as follows:—

For canals, bearing 5 per cent. interest,	$16,576,527 00
Railroads, do. do.	4,964,484 00
Turnpikes and bridges, do.	2,595,992 00
Miscellaneous, do.	3,166,787 00
Total,	$27,306,790 00

In the American Almanac for 1841, the total stock and domestic debt of Pennsylvania are stated to amount to $33,016,149, or a little more than six millions and a half sterling.

In 1830, her population amounted to 1,848,232, and it must now reach nearly to 1,800,000; while her soil is capable of supporting probably ten millions in abundant comfort. Her financial embarrassments, therefore, arise not from the magnitude of her debt in relation to her means of payment, but from difficulties in bringing the latter forward to meet her engagements; and the same may be predicated of every other state which has paused in the discharge of the interest of its debts.

If the revenues of the canals, railroads, and banks, to which the borrowed money has been applied, should prove sufficient for repayment of the debts, no doubt can reasonably be entertained on the subject. Any proposal to devote these revenues to other public purposes, and to defraud the public creditors, would, in my opinion, be rejected by the legislatures of all the states without a moment's hesitation. But in some instances these revenues have already proved insufficient to discharge the interest of the debts; and in Pennsylvania in particular, the alternative has presented itself, of submitting to taxation in order to raise funds to pay the interest, or of declaring the state insolvent. This occurred in the beginning of 1840, when the interest of the public debt remained unpaid for one day. The difficulty was then surmounted, by a loan from the suspended banks, and the interest was discharged; but this was a mere temporary expedient; and during the session of that year the proposition was fairly brought before the legislature, to impose taxes to make up the deficiency between the revenues yielded by the canals and railroads, and the interest of the public debt. The majority of both houses of the legislature, and also Governor Porter, were democrats, and they had obtained the ascendancy in the state, in a great measure, by reason of their hostility to the banks and the paper currency system, and especially to the Bank of the United States. By a singular coincidence, also, it happened, that at the time when recourse to taxation became necessary to avoid insolvency, the United States Bank, by suspending specie payments, had forfeited its charter, and fallen prostrate under the power of these legislators. The electors and legislators of Pennsylvania, besides, are by no means so enlightened as those of some of the Eastern States; so that, altogether, a combination of circumstances presented itself, well adapted to bring the second question to trial, whether an American state legislature will venture to impose taxes on the people in order to discharge public debts.

The aversion to taxation is great every where, and particularly in the United States: and no surer road to popularity can be found than in resisting a tax; but on the other hand, a state bankruptcy would, if possible, be a still more unpopular measure, from the ruin of families, of banks, insurance offices, and charitable institutions, and also the universal insolvency which it would draw after it; and, supposing American morality to be neither greater nor less than that of other nations, it appears to me that the faith which the financiers and best informed merchants of the eastern cities entertain in the ultimate security of almost all of the state stocks, is well founded.

The great cause of the prosperity of the people in the United States appears to me to be their contiguity to extensive regions of fertile and unsettled land, which drain off the restless and enterprising spirits from all the older states, absorb the population as fast as it increases, pour in plenty to every market, and still preserve the wages of labour high. I met with few British subjects, who, however much they might have advocated universal suffrage at home, continued to admire it after experiencing its effects in the United States. But while I make these admissions, I regard it as undeniable, that just and wise legislation is capable of accomplishing much to benefit, and partial and unwise legislation much to injure, a people; and it appears to me that British legislation is probably both unjust and injurious to the unrepresented mass. The established churches in the three kingdoms have not yet succeeded in inducing the higher classes, whose laws created and support them, to practise the first and fundamental precept of Christianity towards the people, "Love your neighbour as yourself;" and if centuries of teaching of the Gospel, by the most pious and learned of mankind, have been so unsuccessful in this respect, it is not unreasonable at length to try the effect of additional means.

The despotisms of Austria and Prussia are in many respects less injurious to the people than the government of Britain.* The rulers of these countries do not oppress the people with taxes, and leave the rich free; nor do they deliver over the poor to become the uncontrolled subjects of the legislation of the rich. Physically, therefore, they do not injure the masses so deeply. Again: These rulers prevent political and social action in all classes of their subjects; and the minds of the people become so far dormant as to be in some degree in harmony with their external condition. In Britain, the most ample scope for political and social action is permitted to the higher and middle classes, but to the people none. Their minds, however, are agitated and roused by the vivacity of mental action which exists around them, and they feel their own exclusion from the exercise of political power far more keenly than the Austrian people, who, in this respect, see themselves on a level with the noble and the rich. It is a delusion to suppose, that, because the higher ranks are open to receive individuals from the lower, there is no abridgment of their field of political action. Only men of superior talents can emerge from the lower, and take a place in the upper ranks; and, as the masses do not boast of more than average abilities, this liberty of rising can benefit only a few individuals. Besides, while the present state of social arrangement continues, the men of superior minds of their own class are tempted, when they acquire wealth, to leave them, and to assume the prejudices and dislikes of the higher orders, the more effectually to recommend themselves to their new associates.

* The influence of these governments on the minds of their subjects is treated of in the next chapter. With respect to taxes, I may notice, that in France, Germany, Austria, and other continental states, the chief burden of them is borne by land. The Contribution Foncière in France is a permanent property-tax of about 10 per cent. on land and houses.

I have endeavoured, in this work, to expound the principle, that mental action is the first requisite to moral and intellectual improvement. If we expect to confer on the British people intelligence, we must educate them; if self-restraint, we must intrust them with political power, and train them to use it. It appears to me, therefore, that retaining the two abuses of parliament as at present constituted, a limited representation might, with safety and advantage, be granted to the people. The objections to remodeling the house of commons, and introducing universal suffrage for all the members, are formidable. The majority of the people in Great Britain and Ireland are uneducated, possessed of little property, and untrained to political action. A legislative assembly which should represent and give effect to their feelings and ideas, would probably lead directly to anarchy. Both in physical circumstances and mental enlightenment, they are inferior to the majority in America; yet even in America the people are not prepared to do justice to their institutions. Universal suffrage in that country is attended with many evils; and I therefore should deprecate its adoption in Britain, at present, as dangerous to the best interests of society. To household suffrage, or any other limited representation, there would be this objection, that it would still leave a large non-represented class, which would become more discontented and impatient, the nearer it was brought to the line which separated it from the represented. To leave the people unrepresented, and to attempt to perpetuate the selfish reign of the upper classes, is neither desirable nor practicable. The working classes are God's creatures, and are as well entitled to justice as the higher ranks. By the peculiar institutions of this country, the middle classes have been trained to admire and act with the higher; but when their eyes are thoroughly opened to the injustice which has been inflicted on the lower, this idol-worship will cease. Besides, the increasing intelligence of the labouring classes will render their calls for justice irresistible.

If we assume, then, the population of Great Britain and Ireland to amount to twenty-four millions, and that the non-electors are to be electors as eight to one; this will give twenty-one millions of unrepresented persons in the whole of the United Kingdom; or, to obtain round numbers, we may assume them to amount to twenty millions. Suppose the kingdom were divided into 100 districts, each containing a population of 200,000 unrepresented persons. If universal suffrage, limited only by requiring in an elector six months' residence within his ward or county previous to an election—freedom from conviction for felony—and twenty-one years of age, were established, and the power of electing one member of the house of commons were given to each district, the following result might be expected probably to ensue:—The mental faculties of the labouring classes would be provided with a legitimate field of political action, which I consider useful in prompting them to improve their moral and intellectual condition. There would be no non-represented class to foment secret discontent and resistance to the laws. There would be no danger of anarchy, because the members who represent the property of the country would still constitute a large majority in parliament. The labouring classes would have legitimate organs in the legislature capable not only of making their grievances known, but of obtaining, to some extent, the redress of them. In all measures regarding which the representatives of property were nearly equally divided, these hundred members could cast the scale on the side which was most favourable to the people. The higher classes, seeing the people possessed of political power, would be prompted by their own interest, as in the United States, to respect them more, to do them justice, and to assist in elevating their moral and physical condition, and thus by slow degrees our vicious system might be purified, and the British Constitution be adapted to the wants of increasing civilisation. The house of commons is already too numerous; and probably 100 members might well be spared from its present number, whose places might well be supplied by the representatives of the people. Property would still have five and a half votes to one, even supposing these representatives to be disposed to assail it, which is far from being a probable occurrence.

Whatever may be thought of these suggestions, my humble opinion is, that the present condition of affairs in Britain is so palpably unjust and injurious to the masses, that its permanence is impossible, consistently with man's rational nature and the obligations of Christianity. Those persons, therefore, who regard the Reform Act as a final measure, seem blind to the nature of man, and unaware of the age of the world in which they live. It was obviously only the beginning of improvement. If it be not, then, in the words of Jefferson, "I tremble for my country, when I reflect that God is just—his justice cannot sleep for ever."

Return to England.—On the 1st June, 1840, we sailed from New York in the British Queen. In leaving the American shores, we were agitated by profound emotion, awakened not only by parting from many dear and highly valued friends, but by an overwhelming impression of the grandeur of the moral experiment which is now in progress in the United States. Glorious and cheering hopes for its success mingled with fears lest it may have been begun too soon. As we receded from the scene, however, we reflected that Providence has granted to this people for their moral training and intellectual improvement, the period between the present day, and that on which their vacant lands shall be fully settled, and that existing circumstances indicate that they will employ this interval with a deep sense of its importance, and in the end prove true to themselves and to the cause of universal freedom. As we bounded over the sea to the home of our fathers, Hope joined with the understanding in lending bright colours to the future destiny of the land which we had left. We had a prosperous and agreeable voyage; and so admirable were the accommodations of the British Queen, and so full of urbanity and attention her commander, Captain Roberts, and her other officers, that we left the deck of a ship for the first time in our lives with regret. We arrived at Portsmouth on the 16th, and in London on the 17th of June. It is only justice to England to say that, in passing my multifarious efforts through the Custom House of London, I experienced the same facilities and attentions which I have mentioned as afforded to us in Boston. The subject of the next chapter is an address to the people of the United States, which I have been led to believe may be useful, and with which I close this work.

CHAPTER XXIV.

TO THE CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES:

I have visited various European countries, Prussia, Austria, Bavaria, Holland, France, and Switzerland, besides the British Isles, for the purpose of observing the condition of the people living under different forms of civil and ecclesiastical government, and one of the motives which led me to repair to your shores, was to obtain the means of judging of the influence of democracy on the physical prosperity and mental condition of your nation. I am deeply sensible of the sources of error to which a stranger is exposed in observing and speculating on the institutions of a foreign country; but you will be able to detect and correct the errors regarding your own country into which I may inadvertently fall, and I may be permitted to hope that amidst these will be found some admixture of truth.

The people of the United States are justly proud of their political independence, won at the expense of many sacrifices; and also of the institutions which the distinguished founders of their government framed and bequeathed to them for their guidance; but if I were to ask different Americans in what the superiority of these institutions consists, I should receive a multifarious variety of answers. Does phrenology enable us to attain to any precise views on the subject?

In my previous lectures, I have endeavoured to explain to you that happiness consists in the activity of our faculties, and that the greater the number of them called into action, the higher rises our enjoyment. Any object that should delight the eye, would be agreeable; but an assemblage of objects that should simultaneously gratify the eye, the ear, the palate, and the senses of touch and smell, would be universally regarded as yielding a still larger measure of gratification; and so with the internal faculties of the mind. There are three conditions, however, under which this activity must exist, to render it productive of the greatest amount of happiness. First, It must never exceed the limits of health; Secondly, The subordination of the inferior to the superior faculties, established by nature, must be preserved; and, Thirdly, The action of the different faculties must be harmonious. The highest enjoyment, therefore, is produced by the virtuous activity of all the faculties. The question, then, presents itself—What effects do different forms of government exercise on the activity of the mental faculties?

We may consider, First, the influence of a despotic form of government; and I select Austria as an example of a civilised despotism. In Austria, the emperor is at once the fountain of the laws, and the executive power which carries them into effect. His will rules the empire, and is subject to no constitutional control on the part of the people. The religion of the state is Roman catholic; and the pope and priests rule as despotically in ecclesiastical as the emperor does in temporal affairs. Nevertheless, the Austrian is a civilised despotism, and rests essentially on opinion. The emperor is not a tyrant, ruling by means of dungeons and bayonets: he is more like the father of his people: he may be seen walking among them without military guards, or other means of protection, safe in their reverence and affections. I have seen the present emperor going to church in the town of Ischl, attended by a servant carrying his prayer book, and two or three gentlemen of his household, so unostentatiously, that, when he passed as near to me as I am now to you, I could not have discovered his rank, if I had not been told that he was the sovereign of Austria. Austria, moreover, is governed by laws, and the emperor acknowledges that, in regard to the rights of property, these bind him as well as his subjects. In the village of Baden, about twenty miles from Vienna, where there are celebrated baths, the emperor is proprietor of a house in an ordinary street, in which he resides when he visits the springs. The house is in no respect distinguishable in its exterior from those on each side of it. I was told that the late Emperor Francis found it too small, and wished to purchase the contiguous tenement; but that the owner asked an enormous price. The emperor would not submit to what he considered an imposition, and the proprietor, to force him to his terms, let it for a sort of club-house or tavern. The emperor made no complaint, but insisted that the laws of decorum and propriety should be observed by the inmates; and when I saw it in 1837, I was assured that it still continued the property of the individual. In the same year, I saw the present emperor and his household, living in a common street in Ischl. He had purchased or hired four ordinary dwelling-houses standing together, and, by internal communications, converted them into one; but in no respect did they differ, in their external aspect, from those of the other inhabitants of the same quarter of the town. I mention these unimportant details to convey to you an idea of the spirit of the Austrian government, as it exists in the emperor's hereditary states, because many individuals in America, from reading descriptions of its rule in its conquered Italian provinces, imagine it to be every where a despotism of fire and sword.

In what respect, then, does this government favour or permit the activity of the mental faculties of its subjects? Viewing the group which constitutes the domestic affections, I answer that it allows them ample scope. Life and property are secure, the soil is reasonably fertile, and industry abounds. The Austrian subjects, therefore, may enjoy the happiness of conjugal life and domestic affection as perfectly as you do under your democratic institutions. Again: Looking at the propensities of Acquisitiveness, Self-esteem, and Love of Approbation, those mainsprings of exertion in the United States, the Austrian is allowed scope for them all. The farmer, the manufacturer, and the merchant, may accumulate and preserve wealth in Austria as in America; distinctions of rank are recognised, and the field of ambition is open for men to rise from humbler to higher grades. By public service and the favour of the emperor, nobility even may be obtained.

What, then, is wanting? In what respect does the Austrian government, as a means of diffusing enjoyments and advancing the civilisation of its subjects, fall short of yours? In this, that extremely little scope is allowed for the action of the moral and intellectual faculties beyond the sphere of private life. Man is a social being, and the field of public interests is the one in which his higher powers expand, and find their appropriate objects. In Austria, this field is shut up to the people, and is appropriated exclusively by the government. The Austrian people do not manage their own schools and colleges, the affairs of their own towns and counties, or appoint their own civil and military officers; nor do they choose their own religious instructors, as you do. The government performs all these duties for them. But phrenology shows us that the very fundamental element of happiness is activity, and that the higher the faculties which are vividly employed, the more intense and lasting is the pleasure. Now, when man pursues private and domestic objects only, he gratifies chiefly his propensities, which are selfish and inferior in their nature to his moral faculties. It is when he comes forth into the circle of social life, and becomes an agent in producing public good or evil, that his higher powers begin freely to play. A single incident will serve as an example:—The emperor lately issued an edict, intimating that as his subjects had been injured by accidents occurring on railroads, he will levy a fine of 10,000 florins on the directors of the railroad company for every person who shall in future be injured: and if this shall prove insufficient to arrest the evil, he will suppress the railroad altogether. This edict may in itself be wise and paternal; but the power which issued it has no legal limits. And even this, in my opinion, is not its worst feature. In your democracy, in such a case, you would put into action a grand jury, an attorney-general, a judge, a common jury, and many lawyers, and finally the legislature, before you could accomplish the ends reached by the simple edict of the emperor; and the advantage of all this social machinery does not end merely in protecting your people from oppression: it exercises, and, by exercise, strengthens and carries forward the moral and intellectual faculties of your citizens. The impulse given to the intellect and moral faculties by one of your trials, does not terminate in the court-house, any more than a lesson ends in the school. In both instances, the ideas and the activity communicated remain in the mind, and the individual is wiser and better in consequence. He follows his private vocation with more effect, rules his family better, and altogether stands forth a more amply developed rational creature, when trained to use his powers in the important arena of social life. This is the grand effect produced by your institutions, which allow you to manage every interest of the community yourselves.

If an Austrian subject, under the influence of powerful benevolence and enlightened intellect, desire to improve the schools, the roads, the police of his town, the laws, or the mode of administering public offices, the government arrests him in every effort, unless he be employed by itself. If, under the influence of Conscientiousness, Veneration, and enlightened intellect, he wish to purify the religion of his country, he is silenced by priests whom the civil power supports in the exercise of a complete despotism over religious opinion. For instance, in 1839 the church of Scotland sent the Rev. Mr. M'Cheyne, the Rev. Mr. Bonar, the Rev. Dr. Keith, and the Rev. Dr. Black, to Jerusalem to inquire into the condition of the Jews. They returned through Constantinople, Moldavia, Wallachia, and Austria, making investigations into the state of the Jews wherever they went. On the 20th November, 1839, the Rev. Mr. M'Cheyne, in reporting the proceedings of the deputation to the commission of the General Assembly of the Church, informed them that "in Austria, the government will suffer no missionaries. There we were treated with the utmost severity. All our Bibles, our English, our Hebrew, our German Bibles were taken away; our papers were searched to see if they could discover whether we were missionaries, and what were our intentions. In that country it is out of the question to carry the gospel to the poor misguided population. A missionary might stand up for once, but it would be for the first and the last time. There they would not allow you to preach the gospel even to the Jews, who were most ready to receive us; and though they knew they could bring us into difficulty, and get us sent out of the country immediately, we found their synagogue a sanctuary. A Jew, to whom a Bible had been given, said in his own tongue, 'none shall see it; none shall see it;' and, so far as the Jews are concerned, they are open for the preaching of the gospel."*

Education is the first means by which the faculties may be roused into activity. It not only furnishes them with the materials of thought, but wakens and calls forth their latent energies. The Austrian government assumes the control of education, and permits just so much of it to reach the minds of its subjects as will fit them for their condition. The people are instructed in the Roman Catholic as the only true religion, and are taught to look upon themselves as bound to yield implicit obedience to the priests and the emperor. They are allowed to learn mathematics, Greek, and Latin; but moral and political subjects are interdicted, because, where imperfection is detected, these lead to efforts for improvement. If an individual see any thing wrong in the social machinery, he is not encouraged to complain of it even to the government. Any servant, except the highest and most confidential, of the Austrian emperor, who should say that things are better elsewhere, and suggest improvements at home, would be told that he might leave Austria and go into his own Utopia. The government will not permit its subjects even to reside in other countries, to obtain a higher education than their own schools afford. If an individual were to ask a passport to carry his son

* These complaints come with rather a bad grace from the clergy of the church of Scotland, because the General Assembly has long had a committee of its own members specially charged with the duty of watching, and, as far as lies in their power, preventing, the spread of Roman catholicism in Scotland. From the spirit of their reports, I am led to fear that, if they wielded the same temporal power which the Roman catholic church does in Austria, they would serve a deputation of bishops sent from Rome by the Pope to convert the Scottish people and Jews to their faith, much in the same manner as the Austrians did them; and, like the Austrians, they would not doubt that, in dealing with them in this manner, they were contributing to the glory of God and the salvation of souls. I can make no distinction between sects, when they organise themselves with the special object of watching and obstructing the progress of each other. Perfect freedom of discussion, and the absence of all pains, penalties, disabilities, and dialikes, are, in my humble opinion, indispensable to the eliciting and diffusing of religious truth.

to France, Switzerland, or England, to complete his education, it would be refused, and he would be asked, "Why should you send your son abroad to spend your money and imbibe false notions? Our schools and colleges are sufficient to teach all that a good subject needs to know."

The general effect of this form of government, then, is, that it is fitted to render happy all the humbler class of minds, those individuals who have neither desire nor talents to extend their efforts beyond the private sphere; but that it chains up, and thereby obstructs the enjoyment of the men of powerful intellect and high moral endowments, whose sphere of action is public life. The nobler the mind, the more heavily does the leaden load of despotism weigh upon its powers. Farther, it imposes fetters on the general mind of the nation, and retards progression. The government must move before the people are allowed to stir; and where all rational motives for progression are withdrawn from it, its advance must be slow, or if its pace be accidentally quickened by the genius of an individual sovereign, the efforts of his liberality and energy are lost, because the people are not prepared to follow in the path which he opens to them.

The government of Prussia was in much the same state as that of Austria, until it was overthrown by Napoleon in the war of 1807. After its restoration, however, it saw its error. Under the old regime, its subjects had been kept in such profound ignorance, and so thoroughly oppressed, that they possessed neither mental energy nor national feeling, and so fell an easy prey to the invading French. It became the interest of the government to rouse its people from this lethargy, and to excite sentiments of patriotism. This was accomplished by making the serfs free, and instituting a system of universal and comparatively high education. The effects of the change were marvellous: In one generation Prussia stood forth a regenerated nation—full of energy, activity, intelligence, and profound national feeling. But the form of the government was little changed. It continues to be a despotism, but a more liberal and a much more enlightened despotism than that of Austria. The education which it provides for its people is superior to that of any other country in Europe, and I believe superior to any which even you can boast of. The government is well administered. It regulates every thing, but it does it well. Its police and custom-house officers are civil gentlemanly men; the post office department is regular and safe, but it opens letters without scruple when it wants political information; it keeps the stage-coaches, post-horses, and roads of the state in excellent condition, but it monopolises them all. If, however, a single passenger more than the stage will carry presents himself at the hour appointed for its starting, another vehicle is instantly provided for him. The laws are just, and impartially administered. Life and property are as safe as in any country in the world; industry is fostered; and learning and philosophy are patronised. In what, then, is the Prussian government inferior to yours?

I have said that happiness is the result of the activity of all the faculties. The Prussian government, while it does every thing for the people, and does it well, allows the people to do exceedingly little for themselves. It educates them, and elicits talent, but it allows that talent little scope in the social circle, except in its own service. It permits the towns to choose some of their municipal officers, but their number and powers are small. A few simple illustrations will enable you to judge of the restrictions which this government imposes on the activity of the higher faculties of the mind. When I visited Prussia in 1837, one serious evil in their educational system had begun to develop itself. The education of females under the national system has been so much inferior to that of the males, that a body of young women has grown up who are strikingly behind the men of the same generation in general intelligence and accomplishments. The consequence of this inequality in mental attainments is a diminution in that respect for women, which has long been a beautiful feature in the Prussian character. The cause of this evil was understood and regretted by many persons; but it was whispered in society, that the government was more inclined to diminish the education of the men than to increase that of the women. "But," said I to a Prussian gentleman, "why do not your enlightened men themselves institute higher schools for females?" "You speak," said he, "like a Briton. Here nothing can be done without the government. Should any private individuals attempt to establish improved academies for female education without the sanction of government, they would speedily be stopped." The people are not allowed to meet for the discussion of public affairs. Missionary and other religious and benevolent societies exist, but their rules are first sanctioned by the government, and then police spies are sent to their meetings to see that they do not transgress them. Again, the government is so enlightened that its censors of the press will permit the higher minds to publish works of a liberal cast, even on government itself, provided they employ reason, and resort neither to ridicule nor inflammatory declamation, in order to rouse the people to action; and provided also that the books appear in the form of octavo volumes of not less than 300 pages. They do not fear the philosophers of Berlin, and of a few other cities, who alone will read such works; but if any man were to move faster than the government, and to propose plans of practical reform for which it was not prepared, it would immediately arrest his progress. In short, under this monarchy, as under the empire of Austria, self-action in regulating social interests is denied to the people, and the object of the government is to draw into its own service all the energy, talent, and attainments of the nation, and to leave the mass the passive recipients of its impressions. It desires intelligence in the masses, because it needs mind and energy for its own defence against hostile nations; but it refuses to allow free scope to the mind and energy which it has evoked, lest they should subvert its own authority, and introduce self-government. Here, therefore, as in Austria, commonplace persons are happy; but the higher minds are cribbed and limited in their natural and best spheres of action, except when enlisted by the government in its own service. As civilisation must be measured chiefly by the intelligence, power of self-action and self-control of the masses, the Prussian government, by denying the right of political action to the people, limits their advance in mental improvement. It, however, allows religious freedom; for men of all forms of faith are equally eligible to fill public offices.

Let us now advert to the government of Great Britain and Ireland. That country has enjoyed political liberty for centuries, and claims to be the parent of your freedom. In Britain we enjoy the right to say and print what we please, in what form we see proper, and also to go where, and to do what, our own inclinations dictate, on the simple condition that, in pursuing our own gratifications, we shall not unjustly interfere with the rights of our neighbours. We may worship God, also, in any manner that appears to our own consciences to be most acceptable to the Divine Majesty. Life and property are secure, and the paths to wealth and honour are open to all. In Britain, then, it may be supposed that every faculty has as ample a scope for action as in the United States; but there are two bulwarks which arrest, or misdirect, the activity of the intellectual powers and higher sentiments of the people. The first of these is the hereditary peerage, invested with political power and special privileges. It maintains in possession of great legislative, moral, and political influence, a body of men who owe their superiority, not to personal attainments, but to birth alone. If man be a rational being, the objects of his reverence, and the standards by which he forms his manners and opinions, should possess the highest natural gifts, most assiduously and successfully cultivated. A hereditary peerage presents to the public mind of Great Britain and Ireland, standards which do not possess these attributes of natural and acquired superiority. It, therefore, obscures the moral perceptions of the middle and lower ranks, by training them to pay that profound homage to high birth which is due alone to intelligence and virtue. By its influence it also misdirects the ambition of the aspiring minds in all the lower grades, and renders them more desirous to be admitted into its ranks, by any means, than to merit distinction for superior wisdom and morality. It is not open, as a matter of right, to all, but it is to be attained by favour, with or without merit. It maintains a class so far removed from contact with, interest in, or dependence upon, the mass of the people, that it is little moved by their sufferings, and little disposed to elevate their moral and intellectual condition, or to do them justice in the exercise of its legislative powers.

The hereditary peerage operates injuriously also on the lower and middle classes of society, by leading their active and ambitious members to turn away from their fellows whom they should protect and advance, and to adopt the interests and prejudices of the aristocracy, into whose ranks they aspire to gain admission.

The second obstacle to the free action of the mind in Britain is the existence of established churches. These have consecrated opinions, formed, in the dawn of modern civilisation, by theologians who partook much more of the character of monks and school-men than of that of philosophers or practical men of the world, and these opinions stand immovably enacted and ordained by Parliament as the legal guides to salvation, against which advancing reason and science employ their demonstrations in vain. A vast priesthood, amply endowed to maintain these opinions, resist improvement as innovation, and denounce free inquiry as profanity and infidelity. The consequence is the reign of hypocrisy, and the prostration of the religious sentiments by many individuals at the shrines of interest and ambition.

To avoid the charge of misrepresenting the state of Christianity in the British Isles, I present you with the following description of it given by the Reverend Baden Powell, Savilian Professor of Geometry in the University of Oxford, in his work on "The Connection of Natural and Divine Truth," published in 1838.

"Too many nominal Christians entertain only the most miserable idea of the nature of the Gospel they profess to believe; their only notion too often consists in a confused general impression of a certain sacredness in Scripture, which produces little effect beyond that of making them afraid to enter its precincts, and search its recesses for themselves, and yet more fearful lest its sanctity should be invaded by others. And their dread of openly encountering any contradictions, and their anxious desire to shelter themselves under even the most frivolous explanations, if it does not betray a lurking distrust of the proper evidences of their faith, at least evinces the lowest and most unworthy conceptions of the spirit and meaning of the Bible, and an almost total absence of due distinction between the design and application of the several portions of which it is made up.

"With others again, the sincere, but (as we must consider it) misguided spirit of religious fanaticism, produces similar effects. Blinded to all but the internal light of his spiritual impressions, the enthusiast will always entertain a deeply-rooted and devoted hostility against any such distinctions as those here advocated. Maintaining the literal application of every sentence, every syllable of the divine Word, he rejects, as impious, the slightest departure from it. Human reason, along with all science, which is its offspring, is at best carnal and unsanctified; and should any of its conclusions be advanced in contradiction to the letter of a scriptural text, this completely seals its condemnation as absolutely sinful, and equivalent to a rejection of revelation altogether.

"In such cases we may most readily make every allowance due to sincerity, however mistaken. But there are other instances, in which, unfortunately, little claim to such indulgence can be found. There are some who join most frequently in the cry against science in general, and geology in particular, as dangerous to religion, upon no sincere grounds of religious conviction.

"Their adoption of a certain form of faith is dictated by motives of expediency; and the mere value of its practical effects on society. Not themselves recognising its claims as founded in truth, they uphold the established creed, as well as all received errors popularly engrafted upon it, as a convenient and effectual instrument for securing the influence of practical restraints on the multitude. Hence they condemn all inquiries which may come into collision with any portion of the popular belief; and against the agitation of any question which may shake established prejudices, or suggest any distinctions in the application of Scripture, there is an immediate and indiscriminate cry raised, that they unsettle men's minds, and are heretical doctrines of a most dangerous tendency, and such as will weaken and efface all sense of religious and moral obligation.

"But even among the best men and most sincere believers, there exists too often a sort of dread of meeting such questions in a strictly honest frame of mind. Those who have the most conscientious regard for truth in every thing else, seem to think it dispensed with in supporting the cause of religion; and while they earnestly condemn those who, in former ages, could justify the 'pious frauds' introduced in support of the received faith, are yet themselves influenced by the very same spirit, only in a different form, in dreading the dissemination of knowledge, if even imagined to be at variance with established religious belief. The one party seeking to support religion by the propagation of falsehood, the other by the suppression of truth, both agree in treating truth as if it were falsehood, and thus give its enemies the fairest ground to think it so."

Fortified by this authority, I may venture to assert that legislative articles of faith and endowed churches trammel the wholesome activity of the superior faculties of the human mind; and thus far serve as impediments to the advancement of civilisation.

I am far, however, from affirming that the hereditary peerage and established churches are felt by every British subject as obstacles to his enjoyment; or that hundreds of thousands of intelligent, good, and sincerely Christian men of all ranks are not reared under their sway. The Austrian government, civil and ecclesiastical, has moulded the opinions of the people into harmony with itself, and common minds in that country are happy under it, and desire no change. In Britain, also, the institutions of the state have communicated their own forms to opinion; and millions of British subjects admire and honour the hereditary peerage, while their souls rejoice under the wings of rectors, bishops, and archbishops. But it may nevertheless be true that the British institutions, like the Austrian, misdirect the minds even of those who are comparatively happy, and certainly contented, under them. The British clergy will recognise the truth of this proposition when applied to the Austrian people, and concede that their blind, though willing, subjection to popery, is an obstacle to their advance in civilisation; but they will probably deny that a blind, although voluntary, subjection to Calvinism produces any injurious effects on the public mind. It appears to me, however, that in Britain, as in Austria, these institutions operate as weights repressing free mental action; and that the more upright, searching, and independent the moral sentiments and intellectual powers of any individual are, the more severely do they check his pursuit of happiness. I disavow, however, every desire to see them abrogated by force, or prematurely abolished by a temporary and unenlightened excitement of public feeling:—reason and moral suasion are the only weapons by which they can be overthrown, without producing evils much greater than themselves.

Another form in which the established churches of Britain oppose civilisation, is that of hostility to popular and liberal education. They profess to desire the education of the people, but demand the entire control of the means which the government may devote to this object. This demand is not only unjust to the dissenters, whose contributions form important elements of the national wealth, but injurious to the whole community, because its avowed object is to obtain the right of fashioning the religious opinions of all future generations in the moulds of antiquity, which are already worn out; or, in other words, of exercising a spiritual tyranny over unborn multitudes of men. The authoritative declaration by Parliament of certain points of faith, as the only true expositions of the will of God, the offering of large endowments to those individuals who choose to embrace these interpretations, and visiting with obloquy, exclusion, and disqualification, those who doubt them, and especially the investing of these dogmas with the attribute of infallible truth, to so great an extent that every member of the church who publishes serious doubts of their soundness is liable to be expelled for heresy, and excluded from Christian privileges—is at once to anchor theology—to prevent it from advancing with increasing knowledge—and to bind up the moral and intellectual faculties of the best minds from all free, honest, and independent inquiry in this great department of human interests.

What, then, is the influence of the Democratic form of government under which you live, on the activity of the mental faculties? The answer is obvious—you leave all the faculties free to find their own way to happiness as they best are able. You have no hereditary or artificial aristocracy to mould your opinions according to erroneous standards, nor to misdirect your ambition: you have no Established Church to chain up your moral and religious sentiments in the trammels of antiquated articles of belief; you have no self-constituted executive to take out of your hands the administration of your own affairs, and no legislatures formed of privileged classes to restrain your industry by obnoxious laws, or to repress your mental energy, by prescribing boundaries to your exertions. Your government leaves all your faculties free, presents to them the highest and best field for their exercise, and leaves every individual to reap the natural reward or punishment of his own conduct. If the first and most important condition of happiness be the activity of all the faculties, your government complies with it in the most ample manner.

The institutions of the United States not only allow but encourage the activity of all the faculties. In your vast unoccupied territory, a fruitful soil presents its attractions to those individuals in whom Acquisitiveness and Ambition predominate. The cultivators raise millions of bushels of grain from their lands, and rear on their innumerable herds of cattle, and offer these rich productions in exchange for articles of utility or luxury manufactured by your Atlantic cities, or imported by them from Europe. All over the wide expanse of your national domain, industry and enterprise are busy, and Acquisitiveness is stimulated by rich rewards. In your political institutions, Self-Esteem and Love of Approbation find unlimited scope. If the humblest citizen thirsts for power and distinction, there is no constitutional obstacle to his becoming President of the United States. The career of activity is equally open to your moral sentiments and intellectual faculties. Every citizen may not only profess whatever religious or philosophical creed seems best suited to his own mind, but he is at liberty to preach and teach that doctrine; to found churches, schools, lyceums, colleges, and libraries in support of it, and to form associations for its propagation and defence. In short, there is no sphere of action of the human faculties, consistent with the common dictates of morality, that is not here encouraged. Nay, so extensive is your liberty, that it occasionally degenerates into licentiousness:—your citizens, in paroxysms of excitement, occasionally indulge their animal propensities in violence, outrage, and injustice, and the law is too feeble to protect the objects of their displeasure, or to punish those who have set it at defiance.

You perceive then, the mighty difference between your institutions and those of despotic countries. But I call your attention to another principle.

Happiness consists in the free play of all our faculties within their legitimate spheres of action, and this kind of action can exist only when the animal propensities are subjected to the control of the moral sentiments and intellect, and when these latter powers are sufficiently enlightened to be capable of distinguishing between good and evil—between the right course and the wrong—in every department of individual, domestic, and social action. I earnestly press on your attention the great truth, that our affective faculties, both animal and moral, are in themselves that impulses, and that they stand in need of constant guidance. There must be subordination, restraint, self-denial, the power of self-direction, in short, there must be government, and enlightened government, before happiness can be attained. We have seen that your institutions have done every thing to set your faculties free: but what have they done to guide them in the right path? So far as I can discover, the answer must be—too little.

In Europe a National Church professes to cultivate the sentiment of Veneration, and to teach morals and religion. Here you leave every man to embrace whatever religion is approved of by his conscience, or to cast off the restraints of religion at his pleasure. In Europe, artificial rank and hereditary titles profess to inculcate deference and subordination in the different departments of society. Here you have no distinction of rank; and, while you encourage Self-Esteem and the Love of Approbation in their boldest flights, you have no artificial institutions, either for restraining or directing them. In Europe, independent courts of justice, and a strong executive, direct or repress the animal propensities. Here your executive is feeble; and when a general excitement seizes your people, your laws are as cobwebs in restraining the propensities. Your institutions have relied on one sole power to regulate all the faculties in their manifestations—the power of public opinion. But what is public opinion? It is the outward expression of the particular group of faculties which may happen to predominate in activity in the majority of the people at the moment. It is the sum of the active impulses of many individual minds. In questions, however, of moral conduct, of religion, of political economy, of law, or even of common prudence, it is not the number of minds, but the degree of their intelligence and virtue, that gives value to their decisions; and I ask, what do your institutions do to communicate to the mind of each person who forms one of your majorities, that wisdom which alone fits him to act as a directing and controlling power over his own propensities and those of his fellow men? I fear that we must again answer—too little.

The idea seems to be entertained by some of your politicians, that propensity in one man will restrain propensity in another;—that sentiment in one will direct sentiment in another; in short, that out of the conflict of interest against interest, justice will be evolved, and that out of the conflict of reason with extravagance and error—whether in religion, in morals, or in political action, wisdom and truth will be brought to light, and that the social body will at length grope its way to repose, prosperity, happiness, holiness, and virtue. If this result shall ultimately be reached by such a process of mental action, it can only be by the exhaustion of error, and the endurance of countless miseries in the process.

Do not imagine, from these remarks, that I am the advocate of European despotisms, and the enemy of your institutions. Quite the reverse; but it is my object to point out to you, that, in providing an organised moral and physical machinery for regulating the propensities, and directing the sentiments of their subjects into what they consider to be their legitimate spheres of action, monarchs act on a sound and philosophical principle. The propensities are energetic impulses, which must be restrained and guided by some power, external or internal, superior to themselves, otherwise they will deviate into wild abuses. In the European monarchies external restraints are chiefly resorted to; and these, too, unfortunately, are, in many instances, applied by ignorant and selfish men in such a manner as in some degree to crush intellect and stifle virtue, as well as to suppress vice. Although, therefore, you have done well in liberating all your faculties from thralldom to legislative churches, aristocracies, and despots; yet you cannot set them free from the laws of God, written not only in the Scriptures, but on your mental constitution, and on the external world. Some persons appear to conceive liberty to consist in the privilege of unlimited exercise of the animal propensities. The head of Liberty stamped on the earlier medals, commemorative of the French Revolution, is the very personification of this idea. She is a female figure with a villanously small, low, and retreating forehead, deficient moral organs, and ample development of the base and posterior regions of the brain, devoted to the propensities. Her hair is flying back in loose disorder, and her countenance expresses vivacity and passion, but neither morality nor wisdom. The same figure appears on the earlier coins of the United States. Liberty, as I should draw her, would possess large moral and intellectual organs, with moderate propensities. I should arrange her hair in simple elegance, and imprint serene enjoyment, benignity, and wisdom on her brow. She should represent moral liberty, or the unlimited freedom to accomplish all that is good, and the absence of every desire to do evil. Such alone is the liberty after which you should aspire.

I desire, then, to see in this country a moral and intellectual machinery put into vigorous action, calculated to teach the young the legitimate spheres in which all their faculties should act, and to train them to impose that restraint upon themselves, to practise that self-denial, and that self-direction, which are indispensable to happiness and prosperity. I desire to see public opinion, which is here your great restraining power, composed, not of the sum of the ruling prejudices, passions, or interests of the day, but of the concentrated wisdom and virtue of millions of trained and enlightened minds. Such a public opinion I should regard as the best and safest of all governing powers. An ignorant public opinion is, to the wise and good, a revolting tyranny. In this country you have chosen public opinion for your chief regulating influence, and it is impossible for you to substitute for it any other. You have established universal suffrage, placed supreme authority in the hands of your majorities, and no human means, short of military conquest, can deprive that majority of its sway. You have, therefore, only one mode of action left to reach the goal of national happiness; enlighten your people, teach them whatever is necessary for them, in order to guide their faculties aright—train them to self-control—train them in youth to bend all the inferior feelings under the yoke of morality, religion, and reason. In short, educate them—and educate them well.

Most of you will probably acknowledge the advantages of education, point to your common schools, to the large sums appropriated by the states for public instruction, and ask what more can any reasonable man desire? With every feeling of deference towards your learned men and divines, I would answer that you stand in need of a philosophy of mind capable of guiding your steps in your efforts to bestow education on your people. Many will say—is not common sense sufficient to enable us to manage with success both our political and educational institutions? I repeat the observation of Archbishop Whately, that men never acknowledge the sufficiency of mere common sense to the accomplishment of any important undertaking when they fully understand its nature and the difficulties that must be surmounted to ensure success. A blacksmith will probably assure you, that common sense is sufficient to enable you to farm, if he knows nothing about farming; but if you ask him whether common sense will enable you to shoe a horse, he will unhesitatingly answer, that if you try the experiment, you will probably get your brains kicked out for your rashness and presumption. Do you imagine, then, that the successful direction of the affairs of a great nation, and the training of the human mind, demand less of scientific skill and experience than shoeing horses?

But allow me to ask, what do you understand by common sense, which is supposed to be such an all-sufficient guide in the United States? What is called common sense means the notions which have entered the mind of any individual, from such occurrences and sources of information as he happens to have enjoyed. Men's capacities differ, their opportunities of observation differ, and hence their common sense differs. The individual who professes to have no theory, no hypothesis, no system, but to follow plain common sense, has a theory: it is that formed by his innate capacity, aided by his own individual experience.

In some of your academies, the talent for English composition is supposed to be the most valuable attainment that can be communicated to the young; in others arithmetic and mathematics are regarded as the best studies for developing all the faculties; while one female teacher assured me, in all seriousness, that the human mind is a blank, that all minds are alike in their native capacities, and that she can evoke whatever talents and dispositions she pleases. This is her theory, and she has practised on it for many years! You must have observed how the practices of teachers differ; you cannot suppose that each adopts his own method without some reasons for preferring it;—these reasons, however limited and lame, constitute his theory. In point of fact, they all have theories, and the vast differences in their notions prove that nature is not the author of them; because she is always consistent with herself, and gives one response to all. When we have studied nature we agree. Hence, the great principles of astronomy, chemistry, physiology, and of other branches of natural science, are no longer in dispute. But on the subjects of morals, religion, and education, the diversity and conflict of opinion are boundless. Does not this indicate that our notions on these subjects do not yet rest on a scientific basis? In short, that we enjoy no sound and practical philosophy of mind?

To you this state of mental science is an evil of the greatest magnitude. In this country you need not only education, but an education that shall communicate to youth the knowledge, maxims, and experience of age. Here you commit political power to the hands of nearly every man who has attained majority. Your population doubles every twenty-three or twenty-five years. The actual majority of your voters is probably under thirty-five or thirty-six years of age. There is no other country in the world which is ruled by men so young and so inexperienced. I was told before I came here, that the Americans are the most excitable nation on the globe; that you take fire in a moment, and instantly rush to action, whether it be in speculation, in legitimate enterprise, in war, or in political change; and since my stay among you, I have heard the deep-toned war-cry uttered with a force and unanimity which is full of fearful omen. And the cause of this may be discerned. The mind, till thirty-five, acts more under the impulse of the feelings than under the guidance of intellect. By the very laws of our nature, Combativeness, Destructiveness, Self-Esteem, Love of Approbation, and Acquisitiveness, are then more energetic than they are at fifty or sixty; and at that period also experience is most deficient. Life has not been long enough to enable us to accumulate wisdom, to detect the illusions of passion or of vain glory—to supply the deficiencies and correct the errors of an imperfect education.

In your country, then, above all others, your school education should teach your youth the specific knowledge of the constitution and powers of physical nature, and the means by which they may be applied to the promotion of human happiness—of the constitution of the body, and the laws of health—of the constitution of the mind, and the means by which we may be best trained to the discharge of our duties in the private, domestic, and social circles—of the laws by which wealth is created and distributed; and of the influence of morals and legislation on the welfare of the individual and society. As you do not wait until your voters, who wield the destinies of your country—who make peace and war—who make and unmake banks—who make and unmake tariffs affecting industry to the core—and who make and unmake even your schools, colleges, and churches—I say, as you do not wait until age has given them wisdom and experience, but place the helm, at once, in their hands, and allow them to act, while they are still full of young blood, and all the energy, confidence and rashness that attend it—you are called on by every consideration to perfect your schools, so as to communicate to them the dictates of a wisdom which cannot be dispensed with, and which will not otherwise be attained.

In the election which took place in November 1839, the question of the currency was actually brought to the polls in the state of New York. The mottoes were—banks and paper currency on the one side—hard specie and sub-treasury laws on the other. These are questions on which Dr. Adam Smith, Ricardo, McCulloch, and the profoundest political economists, have differed in opinion. Does your education enable your people to understand them, and decide on them? No! Yet your people act whether they understand them or not. They vote the supporters of paper into power; and paper flourishes. If evil ensue, they vote the advocates of specie into power; and paper and credit go to the wall. They try the experiment. But what an awful experiment! How many thousands of individuals and families are ruined by the violence of every change!

In Austria and Prussia the safety-valve of the body politic is loaded with the weight of an established church and 100,000 bayonets. In cases of discontent, opinion cannot escape, until it has burst through these compressing powers, and then it will explode with terrific violence. Here the safety-valve bears no load except the sense of each individual mind. Any strong internal excitement, or the application of external provocation, causes the propensities and sentiments to glow, and to express themselves with instantaneous energy. Their voice is heard in Europe, and the timid hold their breath, waiting for a grand explosion. Perhaps it never comes. In your country, ten times ten thousand valves let off excited opinion so rapidly that the body politic cools down to its natural heat, as quickly as its temperature was raised. But every one of these excitements shakes credit, deranges trade, ruins fortunes, is attended by suffering, and leaves many pangs behind. Load, then, your safety-valves with knowledge of nature and religion, and train your young minds to control passion by virtue, and you will find these means more effectual than millions of armed soldiers, to insure your prosperity and happiness. Mr. Wyse, in his work entitled "Education Reform," says, "A period of total quiet resulting from a long continued acquiescence in old institutions, leaves a very different imprim. upon the national mind from that which is the necessary consequence of a general breaking up of old principles and forms, and an earnest search after new. In the first instance, an education of stimulants becomes necessary. It is essential to the healthy activity of the body-politic. In the second, steadiness, love of order, mutual toleration, the sacrifice of private resentments and factious interests to general good, should be the great lessons of national education." Vol. i. p. 48. Such, assuredly, should be the education of your sons.

Yours is a noble destiny. Providence has assigned to you the duty of proving by experiment, whether man be, or be not, a rational and moral being, capable of working out his own way to virtue and enjoyment, under the guidance of Reason and Scripture, unfettered by despotic power, and unchained by law-enacted creeds. Your institutions and physical condition call all your faculties into vivid action. Among these, the animal propensities, as I have remarked, are not dormant; but those observers err, who allow their attention to be arrested only, or chiefly, by the abuses of the propensities which appear in your people. Virtue consists in meeting and overcoming temptation. As you, then, by possessing freedom are tempted above other nations, you will show a virtue above them all, if you nobly resist every seducing influence, and march boldly onward in the paths of rectitude and wisdom. The subjects of a despot, whose every thought and action are ruled by other minds, have little merit in exhibiting order and decorum in their public conduct. You will prove the true strength of your moral principles, when you restrain your passions by your own virtuous resolves, and obey just laws enacted by yourselves. It is to aid you in this admirable course of action, in so far as the feeble abilities of one individual will go, that I now address to you these observations. And I again ask, do your schools teach all that your young voters should know? all that the best of your citizens would wish them to know, when they act as electors and arbitrators of the public welfare?—I believe not. If you ask how they can be improved you will be answered by as many projects and proposals for education, as if you had inquired for the philosopher's stone.

So far from education supplying this knowledge, it appears to me, that a vast proportion of your people have not yet obtained a glimpse of what, I hope, is destined to constitute the real greatness and glory of your country. I find here, the ambition of many individuals directed towards raising the United States to the rank of the richest and the most powerful nation in the world. They bend their whole minds to the increase of her commercial, agricultural, naval, and military grandeur. This is not wrong; but it is not all. Thousands of your young men pant for war, in order to wreath the laurels of victory round the brow of their native country; and they call this patriotism. I desire to see higher and better views entertained of the glories and destiny of the United States. History presents only the records of wars, devastations, and selfish aggrandisement pursued by all governments that have ever existed;—republics, oligarchies, monarchies—all have run one wild career of immorality and ambition. If your nation consider herself to have no higher vocation than these, she ceases to be an object of moral interest to the philanthropist and philosopher. If her annals be destined to record the contests only of faction against faction, of party against party, or of the nation against foreign nations—the friend of human improvement must turn from her in despair. The grand duty assigned to Americans is to raise up and exhibit to the world, a nation great in virtue; to show, for the first time, since history began, a people universally educated; a people prosperous, refined, happy, and gigantically great, by the realisation, in their institutions, in their private lives, and in their public actions, of the principles of Christianity.

The founders of your constitution, when they established universal suffrage, assumed it as a fundamental principle, that man is a moral, religious, and intellectual being; and that, if thoroughly instructed and left to direct his course by the truths of Scripture and the dictates of reason, he will found and maintain institutions calculated to promote virtue, religion, and universal peace, with all the physical enjoyments and mental gratifications which attend them. Phrenology confirms this opinion, by unfolding to us the great facts that we possess moral and intellectual faculties invested with authority to rule over and direct the animal propensities; and the propensities themselves have all a legitimate sphere of action. When the founders of your institutions threw unlimited power into the hands of the people, they assumed it as a fundamental principle, that the people are capable of being trained and instructed; and that, when so trained, their desires will be towards that which is good, holy, useful, and just; and Phrenology is the only philosophy, with which I am acquainted, which warrants and sustains this assumption. The despotisms and the established churches of Europe are founded, and defended, on a principle directly the reverse of this, viz. that the mass of mankind are so selfish, so ignorant, and so prone to prefer an immediate individual gratification to the general advantage—that the people cannot be trusted with knowledge and power—that it is Utopian to imagine that the masses can be rendered capable of applying self-restraint, and of reaching virtue and happiness by the spontaneous action of their own minds; but that they must be ruled, like children, by the more enlightened members of society, and chartered when they infringe the laws enacted by their superiors in their guidance. These two sets of principles are subjects of constant debate between the liberal and despotic parties in Europe; and both, with the deepest interest, look to you to solve the problem on which they differ. All your aberrations from the dictates of morality; the "colonising" and false swearing at your elections; the practice of betting on elections; your mobs, your Lynch laws, your wild speculations, your bank suspensions, with the injustice to so many of yourselves which accompany them; your Negro slavery; your treatment of the Indians; the incessant abuse which the one of your political parties heaps on the distinguished men of the other; the elopements of persons placed in situations of trust with the funds of the nation, or of their constituents; the excessive number of bankruptcies; the very imperfect police for the prevention of crime which characterises some of your great towns, such as New York; the enormous and calamitous conflagrations which scourge your cities, the results either of recklessness or incendiarism; the great self-complacency of the mass of your people, who, although very imperfectly educated, are persuaded by political orators that they know every thing, and can do wisely on every question; the general absence of reverence for authority or superior wisdom, displayed first in childhood, and afterwards in the general progress of life; the regardlessness of the obligations of contracts and agreements that occur in trade, commerce, and personal service;—all these, and every other fault and imperfection, real or imaginary, which can be ascribed to you with any shadow of plausibility, are carefully collected, blazoned, and recorded in Europe—not to your disparagement alone, but to the degradation of human nature, and to the unspeakable injury of the cause of liberty all over the civilised world.

And I ask—What have you to oppose to these charges? Generally your press hurls back accusations of crimes and follies as bad or worse, as fairly chargeable against European governments and nations. But admitting this to be true, the philanthropist, using a common phrase, replies that two blacks do not make a white, and that this forms no legitimate defence for your imperfections. You have proclaimed the supremacy of man's moral and intellectual nature over his animal feelings, and adopted this principle as the basis of your social fabric, and of your hopes. In the old despotisms of Europe, the very opposite principle is avowed. It is assumed by the rulers of these nations, that if man be free, he will only do evil continually. You profess to impose the restraints of religion and morality on yourselves; they impose the restraints of armed force on their people, to lead them to order and obedience. If you, therefore, realise only a social condition no worse than those which are founded on the opposite principle, the friends of liberty feel that their cause is lost. You are bound to exhibit higher intelligence, a purer morality, a deeper reverence for all that is great, good, and holy—a more rational prudence, a juster estimate of the real value of physical wealth, a greater abhorrence of war and all forms of injustice, and a higher interest in every pursuit that tends to elevate man's moral, religious, and intellectual nature—than are to be found in countries in which the activity of the highest faculties is suppressed by force, or misled by ignorance or fraud—in short, you are bound to impose an enlightened self-restraint on all your faculties; and if you do not do so, you betray the great cause of freedom which Providence has entrusted to your care.

And I ask—Are your schools, your literature, your daily maxims and pursuits, and the spirit which animates the masses of your people, steadily, systematically, and successfully directed towards the attainment of these high and honourable objects? are they adequate to the formation of a public opinion under which a virtuous and enlightened mind may live in peace, and rejoice, and with which it can cordially co-operate? When I converse with your wisest citizens many of them concede that such should be the objects of your institutions, manners, and pursuits; and they labour to reach them; but they often lament the vast interval which lies between these great conceptions and their accomplishment. The enlightened philanthropists of this country desire to see commenced in earnest a system of training and instruction which shall be really capable of preparing the young republican for the discharge of the highest duties which a rational being can be called on to execute, in a manner and in a spirit becoming their grandeur, dignity, and utility; but they experience extraordinary difficulties, arising from the ignorance and the power of the people, in realising their aspirations. Many who now hear me, and who participate in these desires, will confirm what I say. I was invited to come to this country by some philanthropists, who believed that this philosophy would aid your people, in discovering at once, their own need of better instruction and the means of obtaining it. Phrenology lays open, even to the most ordinary mind, an intelligible view of the human faculties; it carries home a striking conviction of the indispensable necessity of education to their improvement and direction, and presents tangible principles for administering this instruction. I have long been an admirer of your institutions, and an advocate of man's capability of raising his moral, religious, and intellectual powers to supremacy over his animal propensities; and I obeyed the call which was sent to me. Far from disapproving of your institutions, I admire them, and have confidence in them; but it is my duty to express my conviction, that your people need a vastly improved education to render them equal to the faithful and successful discharge of the important duties committed to them by the institutions of the states and of the federal government, and to form a public opinion adequate to the due performance of the high duties assigned to this power.

In the preceding lectures I have already explained my views of education, and left them to your judgment. I am far from pressing them on your attention as infallible; I only submit them in all humility to your consideration; "prove (or try) all things, and hold fast that which is good." If you know a sounder and more practical philosophy of mind than that which I have expounded, adopt it, and carry its principles into practice. All that I mean to maintain, without limit and qualification, is, that, in the United States, the moral and intellectual condition of the people must be raised far above its present standard, or your institutions will perish. If you agree with me in regard to the end, you are the proper judges of the means.

You are engaged in trying many momentous experiments in regard to the nature and capabilities of man; and you are now also in the act of solving the true nature and power of Christianity.

You leave reason and scripture, science and theological doctrines, to adjust their several claims to acceptance, and to work out a harmony among themselves. Though your wide extended country be overrun by contending sects, still fear not for religion. If Austria boast of almost unanimity in her faith, it is not because she has found infallible truth, but because she has extinguished in her people the desire and the capacity of independent thinking on religious doctrines. Your numerous sects prove to my mind one great truth, that Christianity is not yet fully understood; that in past ages, the Scriptures have been interpreted, too often without knowledge of the philosophy of mind, and without regard to the dictates of reason and of science. In Britain many persons suffer under feelings of insecurity about religion. They seem to regard it as a pyramid resting on its apex; bishops and archbishops may be pictured on one side; rectors and endowed clergy on another; the lords and commons on a third; and many excellent laymen on the fourth; all straining themselves to preserve it erect, each, apparently, believing that if he were to withdraw his support, it would fall and break into a thousand fragments. Professor Powell, in the work already quoted, ably describes the mental condition of these apprehensive Christians. "Adopting their creed," says he, "blindly from education, custom, or party, too many hold their religion only by a most loose and uncertain tenure, and are lamentably confused in their notions of its nature. Hence they dread a formidable shock to Christianity in every physical discovery; and in the obscurity which surrounds them, imagine danger to the truth in every exposure of error. Insensible to the real strength of their position, they live in groundless alarm for its security; and, accustomed to cherish faith in ignorance, they apprehend in every advance of knowledge, the approach of the enemy of their salvation." But when we discover by means of Phrenology, that religious feelings spring from the innate faculties of Veneration, Hope, and Wonder, we perceive that religion can never be shaken. The churches, creeds, emblems, and ceremonies, which many individuals mistake for religion, are really its effects. They are the outward symbols by which the innate religious sentiments manifest their desires, and seek for gratification. They are no more the causes of religion, than clarionets and violins are the causes of that love of melody which exists in the human mind, and which prompts the intellect to produce them for its gratification. I request of you, then, clearly to distinguish between the sentiment of religion—which is inherent in the human mind;—and its outward symbols—which may assume various forms at different times and in different countries, yet religion itself be not for one moment in danger. The founders of your institutions have acted on this view; and in your country they have placed the pyramid of religion at once on its basis. Here, it is seen standing in all its native solidity, simplicity, and beauty, without needing the aid of human power to preserve it in its place.

In the same spirit, you have trusted the preservation of the purity of the Bible to the moral and religious principles, and the interest, of your printers and publishers. You have conferred no patent monopolies on individuals, and established no boards, with well paid secretaries, to superintend the printing of the Scriptures; yet in your country the text is as pure as it is in Britain. You have learned by experience that an edition in which errors are detected, becomes, by the unanimous verdict of your community, mere waste paper in the hands of those who have produced it, and that this operates as a most efficacious check against corruption.

The attention of the Christian world has lately been called to a singular fact, which is instructive, and I think encouraging to you; It is this—that Protestantism has made little progress in extending itself in Europe, since the "end of the thirty years' war," and that the expansive power, which we believe all truth to possess, has not been manifested by it since that epoch. "It is truly remarkable," says a recent critic, "that neither the moral revolution of the eighteenth century, nor the moral counter-revolution of the nineteenth, should, in any perceptible degree, have added to the domain of Protestantism. During the former period, whatever was lost to Catholicism was lost also to Christianity; during the latter, whatever was regained by Christianity in Catholic countries was regained also by Catholicism." One cause of this phenomenon appears to me to be, that the Protestant Kingdoms of Europe, in general, have imitated the Roman Catholic so closely, that they have in many respects instituted Popish churches under a different name. The Reformation proclaimed freedom of religious opinion; but the Protestant monarchies enacted creeds and endowed churches to maintain them. They stifled opinion, and bound up the human mind in the fetters of authority;—and how could Protestantism, in other words, religious freedom, prosper or expand itself in such circumstances? You, almost alone, have done justice to Protestantism; you have given it a fair field; and if, in your country, Popery should not ultimately yield to it, Popery must contain the greater extent of truth.

In attending the places of religious worship of several of your sects, I have received a profound impression of the vivacity of the religious sentiments among you. I, therefore, consider religion in this country as in the most prosperous condition. Honest and earnest zeal for the glory of God and the welfare of human souls, evinces itself in innumerable forms: It is true that I perceive a great diversity of doctrines; but this fact leads me simply to the conclusion that much yet remains to be done before the true interpretation of Scripture shall be completed; and that many improvements remain to be introduced into Christian theology, before it shall stand side by side with reason and science, and exhibit all the symmetry and beauty of a harmonious compartment in the great temple of universal truth. Far from regarding the diversity of your sects as an evil, I view it as an unspeakable advantage. The existence of wide diversity of the opinions of Christian sects is to me irrefragable evidence that error is not yet fully expurgated from popular Christianity.

How, then, is the religion of Jesus to be purified? Not by adopting one form of its corruption and declaring it, by statute, to be true. This has been tried, and has failed. Not by the recondite studies and commentaries of cloistered monks, or state-endowed and state-chained divines: for what human research and learning could accomplish has been achieved by them already. The doctrines, generally known under the name of Puseyism, afford a specimen of the improvements in Christianity which learned priests, even in the nineteenth century, propose when left to follow the dictates of their own judgment. Christian theology is not destined to advance by such aids as these. The conflicts of your sects will do more for its improvement than has been accomplished by all the commentators who have laboured in the field since the reformation.

One palpable advantage of a number of religious sects, all equal in the eye of the law, is, that their clergy discuss each other's interpretations of Scripture and the doctrines founded on them, with a degree of fearlessness, energy, and effect, which rarely characterises the efforts of laymen in the same field. Each sect brings the doctrines of its opponents to the touch-stone of reason, although some of them shrink from applying reason to their own. In a discussion on points of Scriptural doctrine, between laymen and religious teachers, the latter are prone to charge the former with infidelity, as the short answer to all objection; and the religious world too often makes common cause with the teachers, in giving effect to the accusation. But when the clergy of one sect contend with those of another, their religious characters protect them against this brief method of dealing with their arguments, and the subject must be treated on its merits. By this means, truth is advanced, and theology and reason are brought more and more into harmony. If a layman, for instance, had attacked the Calvinistic doctrine of Election, he would probably have been at once denounced as an infidel. But when the Rev. John Wesley, himself a high authority in religion, in commenting on the Rev. James Hervey's advocacy of this doctrine in his "Theron and Aspasia," says, "But what becomes of other people? (that is, besides the Elect), they must inevitably perish for ever? The die was cast ere even they were in being. The doctrine to pass them by, has 'Consigned their unborn souls to hell,

And damned them from their mother's womb.'

I could sooner be a Turk, a Deist—yea, an Ath-ist, than I could believe this; it is less absurd to deny the very being of God, than to make him an Almighty tyrant;"—when a religious man writes thus, he must be answered in reason, and in Scripture reconcilable with reason.

Again, when the Church of Scotland, claiming Christ as its only head, asserted, that in contending for its own power and privileges with the supreme civil court of the country, it was only defending the "Redeemer's crown rights," any layman who should have stigmatised this as an act of unwarrantable and irreverend assumption, would probably have been accused of infidelity; and the religious portion of the community would have given effect to the charge; but when the Rev. And. Marshall of Kirkintulloch, a speaker at a great meeting of Evangelical Dissenters, held in Edinburgh on the 16th December, 1840, used the following words, the religious public could not treat them thus, but must have pondered them well and answered them in reason. The system of non-intrusion, said he, is "an attempt to set up an institution (the Church of Scotland) in the name of Christ which Christ never sanctioned—an institution breathing a spirit and clothed with a character which the religion of Christ utterly disowns—an institution calling itself national, and claiming a large portion of the national property—an institution claiming a right to dispose of the national property, the national honours, and the national emoluments; yet at the same time refusing to be controlled by the national authority, and setting at defiance all laws but its own. Is this a Christian institution? Is this an institution to be tolerated in any free state? Yet, such is the institution which the non-intrusionists are trying to set up, and of this institution they say that Christ is the head. I deny the assertion. I consider it an assertion bordering upon blasphemy; an assertion throwing a stain, a foul and injurious stain, upon the great name by which we are called. The head of the Church of Scotland! Christ is the head of his own mystical body, the foundation and chief corner-stone of that spiritual living temple which is composed of all Christian men in all parts of the world; but I have yet to learn that the Church of Scotland, either as it has existed hitherto, or as it would exist, provided the non-intrusionists had their will—I say, I have yet to learn that the Church of Scotland and this living temple are one and the same thing. I grant, indeed, that there is a sense in which Christ may be said to be the head of the Church of Scotland; but that is just as he is the head of the Church of England, just as he is the head of the Church of Rome; and just as he is the head of any other existing society, or any other portion of human beings—as the head, for instance of the British empire, or the empire of the Chinese. I will grant that there is a sense in which Christ orders the concerns of the Church of Scotland, and in which he superintends all their affairs, great and small; but that is exactly as he superintends the affairs of the French, or the affairs of their friend Meh met Ali." Such arguments as these, proceeding from religious men and directed against the doctrines of religious men, open up the understandings of the people, and give them courage to think; and by them theology is advanced.

Fear not evil, then, from the multitude and conflicts of your sects.

Many of them reject the authority of reason when applied to themselves, but they all use it to expose and refute the errors of their opponents; and by this constant appeal to reason, I anticipate the ultimate purification of Christian doctrine, and the increasing approximation of all sects towards unanimity. There is one God, and one truth, and no interpretations of Scripture can be sound, or secure of universal acceptance and permanent existence, which contradict reason or clash with natural science. Scripture may legitimately go beyond what reason can reach, as in teaching the resurrection of the dead, but no sound interpretations of it can evolve doctrines that distinctly contradict natural truth. The process of improvement appears to me to be evidently begun. A large portion of your Presbyterian Church has dropped some of the peculiar doctrines of Calvinism, and even Yale College has modified the ancient views of original sin. These are steps, however small, by which the professors of Calvinism are approaching towards the opinions of those who adopt Universalism and Unitarianism. Be not alarmed; it is not my intention to express an opinion in favour of the superiority of any sect; this does not become a stranger, and one whose element is philosophy; but as a philosophical observer, I beg leave to state my conviction that the progress which Christianity is destined to make in your country, is one of approximation to unity in belief; that, in proportion as the knowledge of mental philosophy and physical science is extended among your people, your sects will drop one doctrine after another, as it is discovered to clash with reason and natural truth, and that they will elicit purer, and sounder, and more practically useful doctrines in their place; until truth, commanding unanimity, shall stand forth before an admiring world. This must be the ultimate effect of free discussion. If man be really a rational and moral being; and, however distant the prospect, it is still discernable by the eye of reason and of faith.

If such be the probable result to which your religious discussions will lead, Phenology will serve as a beacon light to guide you on your way. The starting point of innumerable religious differences lies in different views entertained in regard to the nature of man: Phenology will settle this point beyond the possibility of controversy. While every individual takes his own consciousness and observations as the standards by which he measures human dispositions and capacities, metaphysical divines may assign or deny a human mind whatever moral and intellectual qualities best suit their several religious opinions; but when the faculties are studied in connection with organs, this becomes impossible. Organs are visible and tangible, and owe their existence directly to God. The mental qualities, therefore, attached to them, are all equally the direct gifts of the Creator; and be they what they may, they are His workmanship. Hitherto, Scripture has generally been interpreted without the knowledge of the organs and of their influence on the mental manifestations; and it appears to me that, when this knowledge becomes general, many popular interpretations will not bear investigation. Again, Phenology shows us that, to improve the human mind, we must begin by improving the condition of the brain; and that, to attain success in this object, all moral, religious, and intellectual teaching must be conducted in harmony with the laws of physiology. While, however, it foretells of changes in the interpretations of Scripture, and in religious opinions, it affords us a guaranty for the safety, the permanence, and the ever-extending power of religion itself, sufficient to assure the most timid. It brings before our eyes, organs specially destined to the manifestations of religious sentiments. It thereby shows us that religion itself is innate in our nature, and that it is as enduring as the race. It enables us to compare our mental nature, such as God has constituted it, with the precepts of Jesus, and shows us the most admirable harmony between them. It forcibly demonstrates that great differences exist in the relative strength of the faculties in different individuals, and leads us to infer that many of our religious differences are referable to this cause, each of us being impressed most forcibly by the texts of Scripture which speak most strongly to his own predominant faculties. While, therefore, it foretells the dissolution of many dogmatical opinions, which at present put enmity and strife between Christian sects, it presents the strongest confirmation of the great truths about which all are agreed, and gives, if possible, an enlarged prominence and importance to the influence which, when freed from heterogeneous errors, these are destined to exercise over human civilisation.*

One great obstacle to your moral, religious and intellectual progress appears to me to be the influence which the history, institutions, manners, habits, and opinions of Europe are still exercising over the minds of your people. Study them in order to imbihe their wisdom and to adopt the refinement; but avoid the errors which they hibit, and shun them as guides in your religious and political progress. Society is in a state of transition, and old things are passing away. I have endeavoured to point out to you, that your institutions, and those of the governments and churches of Europe, rest on widely different views of human nature and its capabilities. A religious creed, founded on the opinion that man is "wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body," may be adapted to a monarchy, which, acting in the spirit of this dogma, denies political power to its millions, and supports religion by statutes, enforcing these, if necessary, by bayonets; but it may be very unsuitable to you, whose whole social arrangements rest on the assumption that man is by nature a religious, moral, and intellectual being. When, however, your sects, in the exercise of freedom, renounce that opinion, and embrace views of man's nature more in accordance with your social institutions, the chained clergy of Europe may accuse them of heretical errors. But do not allow yourselves to be shaken by their disapproval. If you are right, they are in the wrong; and they are not willing to decide against themselves. Every religious community whose faith has been anchored by the edicts of popes, emperors, kings, or parliaments, will represent your departures from their standards as backslidings and pernicious errors, and the conflicts of your sects as the harbingers of the extinction of religion. But fear not. Before your religion can become capable of exercising a powerful, and a much needed, influence over the public conduct of your people, it must be brought into harmony with the principles of your social institutions, and as you have laid aside European forms of government it is to be expected that you may depart from European standards of faith. After a long night of troubled controversy, a brighter dawn will rise on your religious world; Truth is omnipotent, and free discussion is her glorious arena. She will come forth triumphant; and you will ultimately exhibit Christianity in her purity and might, acknowledging Science as her brother, and Learning as her sister, mingling harmoniously and gracefully with this world's interests, and guiding your people securely in the paths of virtue and peace.

* I have discussed this topic more fully in my lectures on Moral Philosophy, to which I beg leave to refer.

The influence of the American citizen reaches to all the interests of his country; and I have already endeavoured to point out to you how Phrenology may aid you in the discharge of your important duties. Assuming it to be the philosophy of mind founded on the physiology of the brain, it will furnish valuable lights to your understandings when you act,—

As jurymen, and decide on questions of insanity, involving the most important private rights and responsibility to the criminal law;—

As directors of common schools, and superintendents of education;—

As visitors and inspectors of houses of refuge and of prisons;—

As visitors and inspectors of lunatic asylums; and

As electors of legislators, governors, and a vast variety of public officers. Allow me to remark, that, as the whole fabric of your institutions rests on a moral basis, and is devoid of artificial supports, you, of all nations, stand most in need of high moral and intellectual qualities in your public men. It is too obvious that you do not yet possess adequate means of discriminating and selecting individuals possessed of these qualities; for in no country which I have visited, has such an array of delinquencies, committed by men in confidential public situations, been exhibited, as has met my eye since I came to the United States. Many of you will smile when I express my opinion that Phrenology is calculated greatly to aid you in avoiding this monstrous evil. I have stated to you that the native power of manifesting every mental faculty bears a reference, other conditions being equal, to the size of its organs; and that the magnitude of the organs may be estimated. If you wish, therefore, that your public administrators should be vigorous and active, choose men with high temperaments, large brains, and large lungs. If you desire that they should possess native integrity, choose men with predominant organs of Conscientiousness. If you desire that they should possess native benevolence and piety, select individuals in whom the organs of these sentiments are largely developed. If you desire that they should be distinguished for intellectual superiority, select persons with large anterior lobes of the brain. If you require activity, you must attend to the temperament, if general power, to the size of the brain in general.

I have explained to you that the size of the organs indicates only the presence of native mental power. If size and temperament be deficient, I know of no earthly means by which high capacity can be conferred: but these may be possessed without being cultivated. Phrenology affords no key to the extent of cultivation; but this may be ascertained from other sources. What I desire, therefore, to say is, that if you select men with favourable temperaments, large moral and intellectual organs, adequately educated—and moderate animal organs, disciplined to obedience—you may rely on their virtuous qualities when you employ them as public servants, in all emergencies, not involving disease, as severely as upon the physical elements of nature; if you choose men deficient in the moral and intellectual organs, and greatly gifted in those of the animal propensities, be their education and religious professions what they may, you will, in the hour of trial and temptation, find that you have relied on broken reeds, and on vessels that retain no water.

I expect these remarks to draw from many of you a smile of incredulity, and from some even one of derision; but nature can wait her time. You and your sons will probably long condemn this method of distinguishing the native qualities of the candidates who solicit your votes; but you and they will suffer as you have done in times past, and now do, from the inferior qualities of many individuals whom you elect, until you open your eyes to your own interest and duty. It is God who has established the facts which I now explain to you, and what he has appointed can never fail. Your vast constituencies cannot, by personal experience and observation, enjoy the advantage of judging of the qualities of all the candidates who solicit their suffrages; and nothing is more fallacious than the testimonies of friends and political partisans; but the brain cannot be moulded to suit the interests of the day, and it will not deceive you. It affords an index to native qualities which, with honest intention and assiduous care, may be read; and I unhesitatingly anticipate that the day will come when your posterity will acknowledge that it sheds a light from heaven upon the entangled path of their public duties.

Finally—Phrenology, when generally taught, will not only render your citizens far more discriminating in their estimates of the qualities of public men, but it will give them confidence in moral and intellectual principle; it will induce them to seek for, draw forth, elevate, and honour, the good and the wise, who at present are too often borne down and excluded by noisy egotism and bustling profession, and left unemployed in the shade. It will also enable the good to recognise each other, and to combine their powers; it will give definite forms to their objects, and union to their efforts. In short, it appears to me to be a great instrument presented to you by Providence, to enable you to realise that grandeur and excellence in your individual and social conditions which the friends of humanity hold you bound to exhibit as the legitimate fruits of freedom.

In presenting these views to you, I exercise that freedom of thought and of speech which your institutions declare to be the birthright of every rational being; but I do not construe your attention in listening to them into approval of their substance; nor do I desire that your countrymen should hold you answerable for either their truth or their tendency. We must hear before we can know, and reflect before we can understand; and truth alone can bear investigation. Embrace, therefore, and apply whatever I may have uttered that is sound; and forgive and forget all that I may have stated in error. By your doing so, the cause of civilisation will be advanced; while we, although differing in opinion, may live in the exercise of mutual affection and esteem. With my warmest acknowledgements for your kind attention, I respectfully bid you farewell.

END OF COMBE'S NOTES.

BRITISH POPULATION.

In Great Britain the number of individuals in a state to bear arms, from the age of 16 to 60, is 2,744,847. The number of marriages is about 98,030 yearly; and it has been reckoned that, in 63 of these unions, there were only three which had no issue. The number of deaths is about 332,700 yearly, which makes nearly 25,592 monthly, 6398 weekly, 914 daily, and 40 hourly. The deaths among the women are, in proportion to the men, as 50 to 54. The married women live longer than those who continue in celibacy. In the country the mean term of the number of children produced by each marriage is four; in towns the proportion is seven for every two marriages. The number of married women is, to the general number of individuals of the sex, as one to three; and the number of married men to that of all the individuals of the male sex, as three to five. The number of widows is, to that of widowers, as three to one; but the number of widows who marry again is, to that of widowers, in the same case, as seven to four. The individuals who inhabit elevated situations live longer than those who reside in less elevated places. The half of the individuals die before attaining the age of seventeen years. The number of twins is, to that of ordinary births, as one to sixty-five. According to calculations, founded upon the bills of mortality, one individual only in 3126 attains the age of one hundred years. The number of births of the male sex is, to that of the female sex, as 96 to 95.—Edinburgh Philosophical Journal.

THE STORY OF MANDRIN, THE SMUGGLER CAPTAIN.

In the public records of Montbrison, a town in the south of France, near the banks of the Rhone, there is a most remarkable document, which has as remarkable a history. The paper is brief; it is a receipt, and originated in the following circumstances.

About the middle of the eighteenth century, or, to be more pointed, in the year 1764, Mandrin, the famous brigand, presented himself at the gates of Montbrison. He was accompanied by such a force, that no one dreamed of offering the slightest resistance. He took possession of the place in the same manner as the Duke of Nemours had done in the sixteenth century; but with this difference in favour of the brigand, that the latter exacted not one coin from the inhabitants, and caused a rigorous discipline to be observed by his band. One of them, who ventured to appropriate an article of the most trifling value, was publicly punished in the market place.

After making various dispositions for security of his own safety and that of his men during their stay, and for relieving the inhabitants from fear, Louis Mandrin, elegantly attired in a rich court habit, according to the accounts of the old people of the place, betook himself, accompanied by two of his men in the dress of lacqueys, to the house of M. Palmaroux, receiver of taxes for the district. He entered with the greatest coolness into the dwelling in question, but at the same time with the urbanity of deportment which he knew well how to assume, and by which he took a pride in distinguishing himself from the vulgar bandits of the day.

"M. Palmaroux," said he to the receiver-general, "I am come to do myself the honour of supping with you."

This speech was accompanied with a low bow, and an elegant wave of the hat, which was ornamented by a nodding plume of feathers.

"May I request to know, sir, to whom I am indebted for the honour of this visit?" answered M. Palmaroux, stammering through surprise and a suspicion that his free-and-easy visitor, though not known to him, was not of a very pleasant order of persons.

"A very simple question that is, and very easily answered, Mr. Receiver-general," said the brigand; "my name is Louis Mandrin."

"Louis Mandrin!" muttered out the tax-gatherer.

"Pray, do not make a noise, M. Palmaroux," said Mandrin; "that would be imprudent; and do not be alarmed. You judge by report; it is wrong to do so. The only way to acquire a knowledge of people is to see them close at hand; and that is precisely the advantage which I meant to give you in coming thus to treat with you, glass in hand."

"Treat with me!" cried M. Palmaroux; "I do not comprehend what kind of relations there can be between you and me."

The financier did not speak the exact truth here; for a certain tremulousness in his voice, and nervous agitation in his limbs, indicated that he had made a good guess at the business hinted at by his visitor. Mandrin did not allow him at any rate to remain long in the dark.

"Oh!" said the brigand, "our treaty is not one that requires any discussion. It is a simple matter; 'conclude and sign!' You will find me perfectly honourable, and scrupulously regular in my transactions. What! I compromise the credit of an honest receiver? Nothing is farther from my thoughts. I am all for right and justice, and that is the reason that I usually travel with a few musqueteers about me; for you know, my dear Mr. Financier, it requires a certain degree of energy in this world of ours to make equity triumphant. But we'll talk of business afterwards; let us first sup. Where are the ladies? Oh! they have concealed themselves, I wager. What nonsense! They told me that Madame Palmaroux is musical; I shall be enchanted to hear her. One of the disagreeable features of my profession is the deprivation of music. You would scarcely believe, my dear Palmaroux, how much I miss it. Your good lady!"

"Certainly, sir," stammered out the receiver; "but I fear—I fear my wife is indisposed!"

"To see me?" interrupted the bandit in his turn. "Oh these confounded reputations! But I would soon reassure your lady."

In fine, with not the best grace in the world, M. Palmaroux was necessitated to make his wife appear. Madame Palmaroux was a woman; and though she could not enter the presence of the famous brigand without fear and trembling, yet she took the precaution to appear as well dressed as possible, reasoning with herself probably in some such way as this. "Though one cannot help being frightened for a robber, it is needless making one's self a fright for that."

The supper was announced. Mandrin presented to Madame Palmaroux a very white hand, decorated with a variety of costly rings. In the supper-room, the brigand kept his two pretended lacqueys behind his chair. During the repast, the conversation was light and animating. The visitor of the receiver chatted of the court, theatres, romances, and Madame Pompadour, and dropt not a word regarding the motive of his visit. But, at the dessert, he changed the conversation so markedly, that madame foresaw what was coming. Her husband begged her to retire, but she requested to remain, imagining that the man who chatted so gaily with her would be accessible to her influence in the business about to be transacted. But she soon found that Mandrin had two characters, and that there were points on which he made no concessions.

"Well," said Mandrin, swallowing a final glass of champagne, "let us finish our business. How much, Mr. Receiver, have we in our treasury?"

"Ah! very little, M. Mandrin," said Palmaroux; "the people will not pay. They lock their chests against us, and beat our collectors."

"Ah! that is very ill done, indeed," said the bandit; "but let us not lose time. How much have we exactly?"

"Perhaps from seven to eight hundred livres, more or less," answered the receiver-general.

"Take care what you say, my dear M. Palmaroux," said Mandrin, "you know that accuracy is every thing in financial matters. And don't imagine that I come to you as a spoliator. By no means; I am not one of those rude sort of fellows. I intend to put into your coffer, in place of money, a good and valid receipt; one much more regular, I shall be bold to say, than most of those you receive. You understand, it shall be a quitance, signed by me, and sealed with my signet, with a hundred and fifty muskets at my back to give weight to the document. It will be a sterling receipt; every bank in the world would accept such a tender. Come, Father Palmaroux, without more words, the sum have you on hand at present?"

Something in the brigand's manner led M. Palmaroux to delay no longer. "Upon my conscience, six thousand livres." At these words, Mandrin took from his pocket a scrap of paper, and glancing at him, said, "Six thousand seven hundred and ninety livres; that is the sum you have exactly. You see, my dear receiver, we are pretty well informed. But seven hundred livres is a small matter in the conscience of a receiver-general."

The bandit then turned to one of his lacquey attendants, and said "Accompany Mr. Receiver to his office, and get from him the sum of six thousand seven hundred and ninety livres. I know that I never touch money, it soils my fingers; and, besides, it would be ungallic to leave the lady here alone. I have also the pleasure to write. I carry stamps always about with me. Regularity in every thing, that is my motto."

And, in truth, the brigand drew from his pocket a small book, containing proper stamps with writing materials. Having first carefully turned up a portion of the table-cloth to prevent any staining, he then wrote out a receipt in the following terms: "I, the undersigned Louis Mandrin, have collected from the offices of M. Palmaroux, receiver-general of taxes at Montbrison, the sum of six thousand seven hundred and ninety livres, taken against their will from the people of the district; and declare the said receiver duly freed of the said sum, and to be exempt from all recourse on the part of farmer-general or their agents; in notification of which I leave him the present receipt to serve as an available and valid discharge. LOUIS MANDRIN."

After this exploit, Mandrin took a courteous leave of his host and hostess, and, soon after, of the town of Montbrison. Though M. Receiver and Madame Palmaroux could not say much of the pleasure resulting from the visit paid to them, yet they afterwards spoke with wonder at the urbanity of the notorious robber.

After a life in which strange afflictions of breeding, and even acts of direct generosity, were mingled with acts of violence and spoliation, chiefly in the department of smuggling, Mandrin was taken, condemned, and broken on the wheel. Sir Walter Scott, in alluding to the comparative apathy which he himself felt at the first shock of his misfortunes was over, compares his case with that of Mandrin, who, while undergoing his final punishment, declared with his dying breath that he felt no pain, the first blows having so deadened his sensations as to render the rest productive of no suffering.

END OF PART I.

act scene in these plays, and after a few bars of music, Hermione entered. We had heard of an insignificant figure, of ugly features, and forbidding expression: we saw a figure of extreme gracefulness, somewhat above the middle size: a face of small, but pleasing features, radiant with the beauty of intelligence and feeling; and such a form of head as Phidias might have moulded. She was well received, but without enthusiasm. The heavy influence of Pyrrhus and Orestes had by no means deserted the scene. She spoke the first four lines of the part, and it was as if a sudden burst of sunshine had cleared off a dense and dreary fog. The ease and variety of modulation; the subdued but thoroughly conscious power; the sense of what was to be done, and the knowledge of how to do it; were made obvious at once, and in these four apparently unimportant lines.

But some few words we must here interpose about the tragedy, to show what it was the actress had to do. We waive all remarks as to the want of classical truth, or of any remote likeness to it, in the entire conception. Four persons are on the scene, counting the confidants as nothing. There is Pyrrhus, the Epirot king, who has fallen in love with his captive, Andromache; there is Orestes, the Argive prince, who is in hot pursuit of the Pyrrhus abandoned Hermione; there is Andromache, who will not have Pyrrhus; and there is Hermione, who will not have Orestes. The scene never changes from an ante-chamber in the palace of Pyrrhus, and the time is comprised within a day. The action may be somewhat thus described. Orestes arrives at the palace under cover of an embassy from the associated Greeks, to demand the death of Hector's son at the hands of Pyrrhus, but in truth to renew his own pursuit of Hermione. Pyrrhus politely listens to his arguments, and requests him, with a charming courtesy, to carry back a flat refusal to the Greeks. The act closes with the entrance of Andromache, to whom her generous captor relates what he has said to Orestes, with the high-minded remark that she must now at once resolve to marry him, or he shall certainly be obliged to reconsider the whole matter. With the beginning of the second act, we have the griefs and threatenings of the deserted Hermione, and a sly recommendation from her confidant to "try Orestes." She grants him an interview, and, resolved to turn him to use for a last effort on Pyrrhus, sends him to the king as ambassador from herself, with the alternative of instant marriage or eternal separation. If he says nay to me, she intimates, I say yea to you. Meanwhile, Pyrrhus has been talked over by his confidant, and ends the second act with a pious resolution to wed his betrothed, and deliver up the child of Andromache. The despair of Orestes, and the happy triumph of Hermione, open the third act; but both are short-lived; for the act closes with some sensible remarks from the confidant of Andromache to that mourning lady, which leave us without a doubt that the widow will rather marry Pyrrhus, than sacrifice Hector's son. Terrible is the resolve of Hermione, as the fourth act opens, and reveals to us the nuptials of Pyrrhus and Andromache, to come off without delay. Orestes takes from her a terrible commission to slay this faithless king at the very altar, and the act ends with her own quiet and bitter farewell to Pyrrhus, as perjurer and traitor. Alas! love has again returned as the fifth act begins, and a frightful deed is doing. Rage repossesses her as she supposes the deed not done. Love, rage, and all the contending furies which make up despair, drive her to madness on the entrance of Orestes, stained with the blood of Pyrrhus. She spurns the murderer from her, and rushes out to stab herself upon the body of the king. Then the real furies, who have considerably let Orestes alone during the whole play, renew their bewildering attentions to him, and the curtain falls as he sinks exhausted on the stage.

Out of no more promising material than this was the triumph of Mademoiselle Rachel achieved; we lost sight of all the absurdity as soon as she entered, and in the place of a game at cross purposes, in which sulky grown-up children were all struggling to get at their lollypops, each before the other, we found ourselves in the grasp of an earnest overmastering passion, following it, swayed by it, suffering under it. And this, less by means of distinct and separate hits, than by their fusion into one unaltering figure of wayward love. Some of our cotemporaries have remarked on her want of tenderness. It seemed to us that through the whole of her performance, there went trembling, like one flushed vein, the very soul of tenderness. You saw it in the aggravated bitterness of her desertion, as you had seen it in the softened triumph of her possession; and the hate was but another form of the love. Mademoiselle Rachel's most finished mastery of her art, appears in these opposite yet combined expressions. Her contrasts are inimitable, and yet if we may connect such expressions with them, they seem to us to have a most complete proportion, and the most harmonious sweetness. In all that we had before seen of the modern tragic acting of France, this matter of contrast was conveyed in sudden leaps. There, was measured solemnity; here, convulsive boisterousness; and not the most wooden plank to bridge over the chasm. It is not the way with Rachel. She holds continually within her heart the invisible central point of the character she personates, and what we observe of its most startling contrasts, fitful and various as they seem, are but converging or diverging rays. When, in the second act, she sent Orestes to force the answer of Pyrrhus,

"Je n'en puis partir
Que mon pere ou Pyrrhus ne m'en fassent sortir.
De la part de mon pere allez lui faire entendre,
Que l'ennemi des Grecs ne peut etre son gendre.
Du Troyen, ou de moi faites-le décider
Qu'il songe qui des deux il veut rendre ou garder."

through all the loveliness of extreme apparent candour with which the lines were given, there faltered thrice on the very verge of disclosure, at the brief words we have marked, that all-controlling emotion which prompts and half extenuates the artifice. When in the fourth act she bade farewell to Pyrrhus, upon the light of every piercing sarcasm she uttered, there fell the dark shadow of her suppressed agony of soul.

"Est-il juste, apres tout, qu'un conquerant s'abaisse
Sous la servile loi de tenir sa promesse?
Non, non, la perfidie a de quoi vous tenter;
Et vous ne me cherchez que pour vous en vanter."

* * * * *

Tout cela part d'un cœur toujours maître de soi, D'un héros qui n'est point esclave de sa foi."

When, at the very last, she asks about the look of Pyrrhus at the altar,

"Son trouble avouait-il son infidélité?
A-t-il jus qu'à la fin soutenu sa fierté," it was with that agony of outraged tenderness which, at one relenting word, would have thought itself strong enough to recall him from the grave. It is needless to pursue these illustrations. The same harmony of art, pervaded every scene she appeared in. No one separate passage was independent of the rest. Nothing was laborious, nothing spiritless. With a faultless precision and even minuteness of detail, with an execution that never failed to realise its purpose and tell upon the house in every distinct effect, all was at the same time massed, combined, contrasted, with that quiet and unobtrusive power which belongs to the highest genius. Nothing was driven into heroics, nothing sank into hysterics. Informed with feeling, modulated and made musical by passion, the fine verses of the old French poet broke through all the formal restraints of his school, burst from their prison of measured pause and pointed antithesis, and, as they came from the mouth of this natural actress, swept into the broad, free path of nature. There were its occasional abruptness and inequality, its erratic wanderings, its swell and its decline, its resting pauses, its eager and fervent flow. Fletcher, or Shakespeare, never sounded better.

It is the fashion when much is conceded, to take in the same breath a great deal away. So we secretly reward ourselves for what we think great stretches of generosity. Thus if a poet or an actor happens to have one faculty in striking and unquestionable prominence, ten to one he is denied the possession of another of equal significance. 'That stronger Shakespeare felt for man alone,' was the mistake of a poet himself, concerning a greater poet. So we hear it said of an actor that he is great in this passion, but very little in that; and of Mademoiselle Rachel it seems to have been the fashion to say, that, whereas in anger, hatred, she is overpowering; in gentleness, pity, tenderness, love, she exhibits lamentable deficiency. In this there is a vast quantity of nonsense. It is to be observed that the basis of every kind of natural expression is the same, and that, where no physical impediments exist, the same sensibility which suggests one, will supply all. If we were asked to say in what Mademoiselle Rachel excelled, it would not be this or that particular feeling of passion we should describe, but the impression she conveyed to us of a thorough general understanding and mastery as an artist, of the various and most contrasted elements of the art. It seems strange to say this of one so young but such was our strong impression. In the sudden and overwhelming use of what are called 'points,' she has often been excelled. Her voice sails her beyond a certain reach, and there are other evidences, as in the occasional trembling motion of her hands, of physical weakness. But nature, and that in its most pleasing form, gains, in a long run. She has fewer of those temptations to excess, that have betrayed the finest actors. You might expect as great an effect from her as from Pasta, when in Deidamia she shrank under the dagger of Othello, but it certainly would not close, as Pasta's did, in her tucking up her petticoats and running for it. The just natural impulse goes hand in hand with the clear controlling consciousness, and to the very tempest and whirlwind contritutes smoothness.

She can so temper passion that our ears
Take pleasure in their pain.

We hope to have many opportunities of speaking of this inimitable actress, and have the less regret in being unable to occupy much more of our space at present. Our book of Andromache is so marked and scrawled throughout the part of Hermione, that a detailed description of the points which suggested the general view already given of her genius, would be something like a running comment on every other line. Some few things we must say, however; and first, of the first scene, that its quiet art revealed to us at once the whole power of the performance. The self-pity of the proud, hiding within itself to please its pride, was never more affectingly expressed than on the words

"Est-ce là, dira-t'il, cette fiere Hermione?
Elle me dedaignait; au autre l'abandonne."

From out the briefest words (suis-je moi croire aussi) there broke a world of struggling love, sighs that had swollen from the heart, were turned off (He bien, rien ne m'arrete) into careless affectations of indifference. And when, having admitted to her confidant that they ought to leave the palace, she abstractedly turned away and murmured to herself the lines "Mais si l'ingrat venait dans son devoir," &c., the tender self-deceit that was implied in it, the half-conscious self-hypocrisy, was consummately given. It was impossible that it could be real, with all that struggle to think it so.

In the scenes with Orestes it was more difficult to give free play to natural expression yet she perfectly succeeded. It was by still keeping in view what we have said of the secret springs of the character, that the difficulty was mastered. We have already given one example of it. It was never after last sight of for an instant, when she had once, and almost in the same breath, given that fervent sigh to the past (ses feux, que je croyais plus ardents que les miens) and spread out the fatal veil for the future:

"Et quelque soit Pyrrhus Hermione est sensible, Oreste a des vertus."

One saw poor fool Orestes already quivering in it. The fourth act, in which she resolves the death of Pyrrhus, was a succession of distinct effects of power, in grand harmony throughout. Her withering sarcasm at Orestes when at the first he hesitates—how infinitely rather than that would we have had the fate imprecated on Pyrrhus, round every word of which the agony of surviving fondness clung passionately still! The very action of her arms as she pictured his dying look, opened as if to embrace his bloody form within them; and when she uttered the noblest line of the tragedy

"Je PERCERAI le cœur que je n'ai pu toucher," the effect was electrical.

We place a forcible restraint upon ourselves and mention only one line more. It occurred in her answer to Pyrrhus, when after her exquisite sarcasm at the close of the fourth act (beneath which there was a concealed suffering, far transcending any conceivable unreserved expression of it,) he has reproached her with never having loved him. "Je t'ai vu inconsistant," she says, "qu'au rais-je fuit fidele." If any one doubts the tenderness of Rachel, let him try to listen to that unmovable. He may then be quite certain that he has not a spark of tenderness of his own.

Her action is strikingly graceful; her by-play perfect. We have pointed out one defect of gesture. Perhaps her occasional habit of tapping her breast with her hands, is another. But it is an old tradition of the French tragic school.

The Interment of a Young and Beautiful Child.

DICKENS.

Along the crowded path they bore her now; pure as the newly-fallen snow that covered it; whose day on earth had been as fleeting. Under that pore, where she had sat when heaven in its mercy brought her to that peaceful spot, she passed again, and the old church received her in its quiet shade. They carried her to one old nook, where she had many a time sat musing, and laid their burden softly on the pavement. The light streamed on it through the coloured window—a window where the boughs of trees were ever rustling in the summer, and where the birds sang sweetly all day long. With every breath of air that stirred among those branches in the sunshine, some trembling, changing light, would fall upon her grave. Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust. Many a young hand dropped in its little wreath, many a stifled sob was heard. Some—and there were not a few—knelt down. All were sincere and truthful in their sorrow.

The service done, the mourners stood apart, and the villagers closed around to look into the grave before the pavement stone should be replaced. One called to mind how he had seen her sitting on that very spot, and how her book had fallen on her lap, and she was gazing with a pensive face upon the sky. Another told, how he had wondered much that one so delicate as she, should be so bold; how she had never feared to enter the church alone at night, and had loved to linger there when all was quiet; and even to climb the tower stair, with no more light than that of the moon rays stealing through the loophole in the thick old wall. A whisper went about amongst the oldest there, that she had seen and talked with angels; and when they called to mind how she had looked, and spoken, and her early death, some thought it might be so, indeed. Thus, coming to the grave in little knots, and glancing down, and giving place to others, and falling off in whispering groups of three or four, the church was cleared in time of all but the sexton and the mourning friends. They saw the vault covered, and the stone fixed down.

Then, when the dusk of evening had come on, and not a sound disturbed the sacred stillness of the place—when the bright moon poured in her light on the tomb and monument, on pillar, wall, and arch, and most of all (it seemed to them) upon her quiet grave—in that calm time, when all outward things and inward thoughts team with assurance of immortality, and worldly hopes and fears are humbled in the dust before them—then, with tranquil and submissive hearts they turned away, and left the child with God. Oh! it is hard to take to heart the lessons that such deaths will teach; but let no man reject it, for it is one that all must learn, and is a mighty, universal truth. When death strikes down the innocent and young, for every fragile form from which he lets the panting spirit free, a hundred virtues rise, in shapes of mercy, charity, and love, to walk the world, and bless it. Of every tear that sorrowing mortals shed on such green graves, some good is born, some gentler nature comes. In the destroyer's steps there spring up bright creations that defy his power, and his dark path becomes a way of light to heaven.

ST. GEORGE.

St. George died in a state of poverty in 1799 at the age of fifty-four. He was justly considered the first swordsman and the best shot of his time. One of his feats was throwing up two crown pieces in the air and hitting them both with his pistols. He was an excellent musician, amiable and polished in his manners, and of a most agreeable conversation; his humanity and charitable disposition were universally acknowledged; and although engaged in many duels, he had generally been the insulted party, and was never known to avail himself of his reputation to insult any one less skilled in the science of destruction. He was often known, however, to give a salutary lesson to quarrelsome and troublesome young men; and an instance is recorded of his meeting at Dunkirk, in the company of several ladies, a young officer of Hussars, who, not knowing him, was boasting of his skill as a swordsman, and asserting that no fencer in France was a match for him. "Did you ever meet the famous St. George?" asked one of the ladies. "St. George! he could not stand a moment before me!" answered the Hussar, twirling his mustachios. "That is strange," observed St. George, "and I should much like to have a trial of skill with you, young man. Possibly the ladies could procure us foils, and an assaut d'armes might entertain them." The young officer assented to the proposal with a smile of contempt: foils belonging to the brother of the lady of the house were produced, and without hesitation the Hussar was preparing to shame his aged antagonist, who, politely addressing the ladies, asked them to name the buttons he should touch on his adversary's doliman. The delighted women, glad to see a cockcomb corrected, named the number of the buttons; which St. George touched one after the other, and then whipped the foil out of the inexperienced hand of the boaster, who, infuriated by rage and shame, wanted immediate satisfaction; when St. George quietly observed, "Young man, your time is not yet come; you may still live to serve your country: but recollect you have met St. George, for I am that very person, who could not at any time prove a match for you."—History of Duelling.

EXPENSE OF LIVING IN PARIS.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Star furnishes that paper with some "Hints to Travellers in France," from which we extract the following:

In the Chaussee d'Austin, or near the Tuilleries, or the Boulevards, the London prices are charged for lodgings. That is, for a well furnished bedroom, or sitting room on the first floor, in these fashionable quarters, about 250 francs a month, or 50 dollars. But for half the money you have equally as good rooms in the Faubourg St. Germain, which is not quite so fashionable. You have no more attendance, for this price, than the mere cleaning of the rooms, and must make a private arrangement with the porter to get attendance. If you have a family with you, you must have a suite of rooms with a kitchen, (every suite being as much isolated as a separate house) and then you take a servant. In the Faubourg St. Ger- main such a suite, accommodating a family of six, will cost 250 francs a month, and extra by the year such a servant (who also cooks) will be 2 francs a month extra. By the year such a servant would be paid 500 francs, or 60 dollars. Rent being much the same in the two capitals, what then, is the comparative cost of living in Paris and in London! Wines are 50 per cent cheaper in Paris, costing about the price of ale or porter in London! Fuel is twice as dear in Paris; clothing is very cheap in Paris (except boots and shoes) and 15 per cent cheaper than in London, so is butcher's meat. Fruit, 20, vegetables 30, bread 20 per cent., cheaper than in London. Household furniture as dear as not as good as in Paris. Carpets are twice as dear. Jewelry, Chandeliers, and Clocks, are twenty per cent. cheaper. On the whole, although it is not cheaper living at Paris than in London, it is not the price of the articles, but the mode of living that makes the difference. You consume less than in England. Expensive dinners and suppers are laid aside. In Paris you give a soiree and the tea, fruits, eau sucrée, and light wines don't cost a tithe of what a soiree in London would come to. It is this that causes the balance in favour of Paris.

ABROAD AND AT HOME.

One concluding remark on a further cause of the progressive decay of some of the English spas before I have done. It refers to the exorbitance of the charges, and consequently to the enormous expense which families of the middle classes have to encounter in these places of public resort, when they desire to live, according to their station in society, at some of the principal hotels. I have alluded, in treating of Harrowgate, to the weekly expense of a gentleman and his lady, with three daughters, and two men and a woman servant, who, while living at one of the principal hotels at the spa, and using the public rooms, was disbursing seldom less than twenty guineas a week; and had he desired a private sitting-room, the charge would have been three guineas more. Now mark the difference in the spas in Germany. The same number of persons would have been magnificently lodged and sumptuously fed in the New Hotel at Wildbad, called the Bellevue, (which has started into existence since my first commendation of that spa, and is one of the most short and comfortable establishments of that kind in Germany, and much to be recommended,) for 109 Carlins a week, including every possible expense for master and servant, instead of 281, which are the representatives of twenty-three guineas. Again, a single gentleman, with a servant, who desires to pass his allotted time at the hotel of the Dragon, at Harrowgate, must consent to pay five guineas a week, using a table d'hôte and the public sitting-room. But at the same spa of Wildbad, in the comfortable hotel of Meine Herr Klump, I have known a dignitary of the church during the last season occupy an extremely neat room, with another for his valet, and to have two excellent repasts, besides breakfast and the board of his domestic, for forty-five florins, or one third less than the charge at the English spa.—Dr. Greville's Spas of England.

THE STORY OF MANDRIN, THE SMUGGLER CAPTAIN.

In the public records of Montbrison, a town in the south of France, near the banks of the Rhone, there is a most remarkable document, which has as remarkable a history. The paper is brief; it is a receipt, and originated in the following circumstances.

About the middle of the eighteenth century, or, to be more pointed, in the year 1764, Mandrin, the famous brigand, presented himself at the gates of Montbrison. He was accompanied by such a force, that no one dreamed of offering the slightest resistance. He took possession of the place in the same manner as the Duke of Nemours had done in the sixteenth century; but with this difference in favour of the brigand, that the latter exacted not one coin from the inhabitants, and caused a rigorous discipline to be observed by his band. One of them, who ventured to appropriate an article of the most trifling value, was publicly punished in the market place.

After making various dispositions for security of his own safety and that of his men during their stay, and for relieving the inhabitants from fear, Louis Mandrin, elegantly attired in a rich court habit, according to the accounts of the old people of the place, betook himself, accompanied by two of his men in the dress of lacqueys, to the house of M. Palmaroux, receiver of taxes for the district. He entered with the greatest coolness into the dwelling in question, but at the same time with the urbanity of deportment which he knew well how to assume, and by which he took a pride in distinguishing himself from the vulgar bandits of the day.

"M. Palmaroux," said he to the receiver-general, "I am come to do myself the honour of supping with you."

This speech was accompanied with a low bow, and an elegant wave of the hat, which was ornamented by a nodding plume of feathers.

"May I request to know, sir, to whom I am indebted for the honour of this visit?" answered M. Palmaroux, stammering through surprise and a suspicion that his free-and-easy visitor, though not known to him, was not of a very pleasant order of persons.

"A very simple question that is, and very easily answered, Mr. Receiver-general," said the brigand; "my name is Louis Mandrin."

"Louis Mandrin!" muttered out the tax-gatherer.

"Pray, do not make a noise, M. Palmaroux," said Mandrin; "that would be imprudent; and do not be alarmed. You judge by report; it is wrong to do so. The only way to acquire a knowledge of people is to see them close at hand; and that is precisely the advantage which I meant to give you in coming thus to treat with you, glass in hand."

"Treat with me!" cried M. Palmaroux; "I do not comprehend what kind of relations there can be between you and me."

The financier did not speak the exact truth here; for a certain tremulousness in his voice, and nervous agitation in his limbs, indicated that he had made a good guess at the business hinted at by his visitor. Mandrin did not allow him at any rate to remain long in the dark.

"Oh!" said the brigand, "our treaty is not one that requires any discussion. It is a simple matter; 'conclude and sign!' You will find me perfectly honourable, and scrupulously regular in my transactions. What! I compromise the credit of an honest receiver? Nothing is farther from my thoughts. I am all for right and justice, and that is the reason that I usually travel with a few musqueteers about me; for you know, my dear Mr. Financier, it requires a certain degree of energy in this world of ours to make equity triumphant. But we'll talk of business afterwards; let us first sup. Where are the ladies? Oh! they have concealed themselves, I wager. What nonsense! They told me that Madame Palmaroux is musical; I shall be enchanted to hear her. One of the disagreeable features of my profession is the deprivation of music. You would scarcely believe, my dear Palmaroux, how much I miss it. Your good lady!"

"Certainly, sir," stammered out the receiver; "but I fear—I fear my wife is indisposed!"

"To see me?" interrupted the bandit in his turn. "Oh these confounded reputations! But I would soon reassure your lady."

In fine, with not the best grace in the world, M. Palmaroux was necessitated to make his wife appear. Madame Palmaroux was a woman; and though she could not enter the presence of the famous brigand without fear and trembling, yet she took the precaution to appear as well dressed as possible, reasoning with herself probably in some such way as this. "Though one cannot help being frightened for a robber, it is needless making one's self a fright for all that."

The supper was announced. Mandrin presented to Madame Palmaroux a very white hand, decorated with a variety of costly rings. In the supper-room, the brigand kept his two pretended lacqueys behind his chair. During the repast, the conversation was light and animating. The visitor of the receiver chatted of the court, theatres, romances, and Madame Pompadour, and dropt not a word regarding the motive of his visit. But, at the dessert, he changed the conversation so markedly, that madame foresaw what was coming. Her husband begged her to retire, but she requested to remain, imagining that the man who chatted so gaily with her would be accessible to her influence in the business about to be transacted. But she soon found that Mandrin had two characters, and that there were points on which he made no concessions.

"Well," said Mandrin, swallowing a final glass of champagne, "let us finish our business. How much, Mr. Receiver, have we in our treasury?"

"Ah! very little, M. Mandrin," said Palmaroux; "the people will not pay. They lock their chests against us, and beat our collectors."

"Ah! that is very ill done, indeed," said the bandit; "but let us not lose time. How much have we exactly?"

"Perhaps from seven to eight hundred livres, more or less," answered the receiver-general.

"Take care what you say, my dear M. Palmaroux," said Mandrin, "you know that accuracy is every thing in financial matters. And don't imagine that I come to you as a spoliator. By no means; I am not one of those rude sort of fellows. I intend to put into your coffer, in place of money, a good and valid receipt; one much more regular, I shall be bold to say, than most of those you receive. You understand, it shall be a quitance, signed by me, and sealed with my signet, with a hundred and fifty muskets at my back to give weight to the document. It will be a sterling receipt; every bank in the world would accept such a tender. Come, Father Palmaroux, without more words, what sum have you on hand at present?"

Something in the brigand's manner led Father Palmaroux to delay no longer. "Upon my conscience, six thousand livres." At these words, Mandrin took from his pocket a scrap of paper, and glancing at him, said, "Six thousand seven hundred and ninety livres; that is the sum you have exactly. You see, my dear receiver, we are pretty well informed. But seven hundred livres is a small matter in the conscience of a receiver-general."

The bandit then turned to one of his lacquey attendants, and said "Accompany Mr. Receiver to his office, and get from him the sum of six thousand seven hundred and ninety livres. You know that I never touch money, it soils the fingers; and, besides, it would be ungallant to leave the lady here alone. I have also the quittance to write. I carry stamps always about with me. Regularity in every thing, that is my motto."

And, in truth, the brigand drew from his pocket a small book, containing proper stamps, with writing materials. Having first carefully turned up a portion of the table-cloth to prevent any staining, he then wrote out a receipt in the following terms: "I, the undersigned Louis Mandrin, have collected from the coffers of M. Palmaroux, receiver-general of taxes at Montbrison, the sum of six thousand seven hundred and ninety livres, taken against their will from the people of the district; and declare the said receiver duly freed of the said sum, and to be exempt from all recourse on the part of farmers-general or their agents; in notification of which I leave him the present receipt to serve as an available and valid discharge. LOUIS MANDRIN."

After this exploit, Mandrin took a courteous leave of his host and hostess, and, soon after, of the town of Montbrison. Though Monsieur and Madame Palmaroux could not say much for the pleasure resulting from the visit paid to them, yet they afterwards spoke with wonder of the urbanity of the notorious robber.

After a life in which strange affectations of breeding, and even acts of direct generosity, were mingled with acts of violence and spoliation, chiefly in the department of smuggling, Mandrin was taken, condemned, and broken on the wheel. Sir Walter Scott, in alluding to the comparative apathy which he himself felt after the first shock of his misfortunes was over, compares his case with that of Mandrin, who, when undergoing his final punishment, declared with his dying breath that he felt no pain, the first blows having so deadened his sensations, as to render the rest productive of no suffering.

END OF PART I.
